28405 * The accused stated that it was his view that the entry into Jehol was done under the Japan-Manchukuo Pact of September 15, 1932. It was not true that it had been decided as early as December, 1931, that Jehol was to be included in the area of operations.

28406 * Since no one would know who the opponent was to be in the Chinese Army, no one could tell how far the Army would be able to go. Therefore, since the one responsible for the unsettled affairs in Manchuria was Chiang Hsueh-liang, accounts had to be settled with him. The problem came up as to how far Chiang's authority extended. Since it extended to Jehol, that was what they decided on. Their real desire was not in the use of armed force, but the INUKAI Cabinet wished to settle things peacefully and quickly. That was the main outline of the INUKAI Cabinet's policy. (Reference was made to exhibit 3162. in connection with that answer).

28407 The accused stated it was not true that operations against Jehol actually began in July 1932 and continued through August 1932. * At the time he heard nothing whatsoever concerning atrocities at Nanking. He first heard of it when testimony was given before the Tribunal. Cabinet advisers were not shown reports coming from the Consul-General at Nanking. He did not know that military were sent to Nanking to investigate the matter.

28408 * He had never seen an account in Japanese newspapers concerning the massacre of Chinese. He knew that MATSUI was replaced in February, 1938, but didn't know the circumstances nor did he inquire into the reasons. He knew that on 16 January 1938, the KONOYE Cabinet decided to have no further negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek. At the time of this announcement, all cabinet advisers gave strong opinions concerning the phrase "No further dealings with the Chiang Regime". The phrase was ambiguous and the wording not of the best. No one could predict what the effect of such a statement would be.

28409 * When asked if the decision was not to fight to a finish with China, he stated that Cabinet advisers hardly heard anything of such a nature. The Cabinet issued the statement, and the accused felt it was very kind of it to show the statement at all before it was published. * The 28410 opinion of practically all cabinet councillors was that although the wording was ambiguous, it meant that all negotiations with the Chiang Regime would be cut off.

0162 0002 0012

Page

He did not know what was discussed at the Cabinet meeting, but did know that the statement to the effect that Japan would not deal with the Chiang Regime was issued without alterations.

28411

When asked why in May, 1938, he joined the government which had rejected his advice on all vital questions of policy, he stated that he felt it was still * too early for him to go completely into retirement, and he should make one more effort for his country. He also accepted partly because of KONOYE's urgent pleas. When the accused met KONOYE later and asked him about the statement, KONOYE said that he did not issue it with the thought that negotiations with the Chiang regime would be cut off. If that regime re-considered, they were willing to take up the negotiations again. He did not remember that the statement was repeated in December, 1938, or that steps were taken by the Cabinet to establish Wang Ching-wei as a rival government.

When asked why he remained a member of the Cabinet which continued to act in opposition to his policies, the accused stated that he still felt there was * some way his hopes could be realized. He bent all efforts to that end, but because of his Cabinet position he had no means of knowing about the policies nor of those matters. His advice was not sought. He did not even know when Wang Ching-wei came to Japan.

The accused stated that during the time he was in the first KONOYE and HIRANUMA Cabinets, matters were decided by the 5 Minister's Conference, and he was not consulted. He was asked if it were not the truth that no decision taken by the 5 Minister's Conference could be put into effect until it had cabinet approval. He stated that would be so if a policy was actually carried out after being decided upon, but at that time hardly any important policies were decided. He was not sure whether he was present on 10 June, 1939, when the HIRANUMA Cabinet decided to establish the Wang Ching-wei regime. * He did not even know that Wang had been brought to Japan at that time.

He did not recall making a speech on the first anniversary of the China Incident, in which he stated that Japan would not lay down arms until anti-Japanese China was completely crushed. He believed such a speech must have been taken from the Monbu Ji Hyo, or another document referred to before.

28414 The Education Ministry review (Monbu Ji Hyo) was published by the Ministry, and there was a section which handled it. Somebody must have written that statement, and perhaps he had glanced through it. There was nothing more than that. He remembered that when he was shown one of those monthlies, he did remember it. That was the extent to which the matter went. * If the whole document were looked at, it would be found that the real import of the article did not include such an idea. (Exhibit 2281).

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. McMANUS.

28415 * The accused stated that he had been interrogated 20 odd times. The three interpreters who had appeared in the court were not the only ones which appeared before him at Sugamo. There were others.

28418 * The accused was handed a document which was a statement from Commander SHIRAKAWA regarding the cessation of hostilities in the Shanghai Incident. He was asked if he were personally responsible for the statement. He stated that previous to SHIRAKAWA's departure, he instructed him as he had instructed Commander UEDA that the ideas of the government and the military were the same as those subsequently embodied in his statement. He believed that the statement was issued in accordance with his intentions, that the matters should be solved without recourse to arms.

28419 * The accused stated that the policy of non-expansion was not restricted to China Proper, but applied everywhere. * He was asked if he knew anything about the Japanese plan OTSU. The accused stated that he believed the OUSU plan was an operational plan. He did not know about it.

28421 * The accused stated that on 11 May, 1932, he made a statement concerning the withdrawal of troops from Shanghai. * On October 30, 1933, he had suggested an Asiatic Peace Conference for all countries concerned to participate for the promotion of world peace.

28424 The accused * identified a document handed to him as a report written down by a newspaper man who came to see him concerning the proposal he had made for the holding of an Asia Pacific Conference. He did not know anything, however, regarding the latter part of the document.

28425 * When asked if he did make such a suggestion, he stated that his affidavit showed the efforts he made toward the realization of the conference after the Tangku truce.

28429 * Exhibit 3166, a letter dated 20 January 1934, from ARAKI to Premier SAITO concerning basic suggestions for the emergency, was received in evidence.

28432 * Exhibit 3163-A, a statement by General UEDA to the Commander of the 19th Route Army, dated 18 February 1932, stated that the Chinese Army was to stop fighting at once and complete withdrawal from the present front at 0700 February 20. Withdrawal must be completed by 1700 February 20 from a described area. Furthermore, fortresses and other military facilities within this area must be withdrawn and not re-established. The Japanese Army would not shell, bomb, nor pursue after the Chinese Army commences to withdraw. However, reconnaissance planes will not be restricted. * After withdrawal, the Japanese will hold only the area in the Hung Kiu vicinity. After withdrawal, the Japanese will send investigators to the zone to ascertain execution. The Chinese Army must thoroughly protect the lives and property of Japanese nationals in the Shanghai area. If protection is not complete, appropriate steps would be taken. Effective measures were also to be taken against guerrillas. Separate negotiations concerning the protection of foreigners in the Shanghai area would be made.

28435 From exhibit 3163-B, the statement of Commander SHIRAKAWA, dated 1 March, 1932, to the Ninth Division, stated that he had just arrived to take command of the Shanghai Army, to protect Japanese there in cooperation with the Navy. However, Japan had made every effort to settle the matter peacefully, it had been in vain. Now that the Ninth Division had taken to arms, * the Chinese were going to resist with heavier preparations and a larger force. Japan was thus obliged to increase her forces.

They did not, however, want to fight and complicate the matter. If the Chinese accepted their demands and evacuated, they would not hesitate to cease military action. * Exhibit 3167, a report by ARAKI to the House of Peers on 23 March 1932, stated that the anti-Japanese movement in China, which has been a great hindrance to peace in the Orient, had precipitately enlivened its activities lately. The rights of Japan had been ignored by Manchurian authorities and pressure placed on Japanese and Koreans. Their insolence has resulted in the slaughter of these people. * This situation culminated in the murder of Japanese army officers. They had tolerated these outrages with patience. The state of things had grown worse, and challenged by the violence of Chinese soldiers near Mukden, the Japanese have been forced to rise against their will, in self-defense.

Since then, the army had faced with minor forces an enemy which outnumbered them, with continuous operations night and day under difficulties. An encouraging resolution had just been received, and they had met with enthusiastic support, borne of public wrath. Thus unified, the people had gone through many international crises.

At present, the Japanese force in Manchuria * numbered less than 30,000, and were stationed in a vast area two and a half times as large as the Empire. They were directly charged with protecting the lives and property of one million Japanese and Koreans, and indirectly with the preservation of peace and welfare of thirty million. The soldiers had fulfilled their duty and took their stand in the lifeline of national defense and safeguarded security.

At the outbreak of the Incident the Japanese force consisted of only 10,400. The force around Mukden was only 4,000 strong at the time of the Incident. The Chinese army approximated 220,000, with 14,000 stationed near Mukden. At the outbreak of the conflict, a brigade was sent from Korea, and other troops have been sent to meet the requirements. * In this manner, minor forces have stripped Manchuria of the menace near the Liaohsi and swept away disturbances in North Manchuria.

Bandits had been suppressed and pacified with few casualties on the part of the Japanese. However, the circumstances deemed of no optimism, and the authorities were engaged in measures to cope with the situation. They hoped for eternal peace in Manchuria and her development even from the standpoint of Japanese national defense. This condition necessitates the existence of the present forces and more if possible.

28441 Concerning affairs in the Shanghai vicinity, the army saw the necessity of taking deliberate measures, judging from its character which was different from Manchuria, at the end of February the Cabinet council decided to send * reinforcements. The authorities wished for an immediate solution without bloodshed and repeatedly negotiated with the Chinese, who showed no sincerity and replied with bombardment. It was a matter of regret that Japan was compelled to exchange fire.

28442 The Chinese army was reinforced with guards under Chiang Kai-shek, in addition to the 19th Route Army. The total strength was six divisions, who threatened to take the offensive. Therefore, two Japanese divisions and adjunct troops were dispatched, and early that month, with one blow, they defeated the main body of the enemy. At present, Japanese forces were assembled in a limited area in a state of suspension of hostilities, with a view to restoring peace. In harmony with the fundamental government policies and in cooperation with the navy, the army * had succeeded in attaining its object and avoiding a full-scale conflict. The object in sending troops to Shanghai was to protect Japanese residents and preserve peace in the International Settlement. So long as China did not menace with a large-scale offensive, the authorities had decided to withdraw the forces on their own accord. The middle of the month, a division and a brigade had been instructed for evacuation, and were then under transportation.

28443 In view of present conditions, a careful examination of the incident showed that it was not one incomparable in its gravity with the Siberian expedition or the Manchuria Incident, but might be said to rival even the Russo-Japanese war in importance. It was natural that the morale of the soldiers and the nation had been enhanced. It was their earnest desire to safeguard the nation's security and the * peace and welfare of the people by virtue of their loyalty, devotion, and thus see a glorious conclusion.

28446 * From exhibit 3166, a letter dated 20 January, 1934, from ARAKI to Premier SAITO, it was stated that the present situation might appear different when looked at from different angles, but he firmly believed that it was not an emergency situation, but a critical juncture, at which the Empire's fate was at stake. Opinions seemed to differ as to whether or not a crisis in Japan would result, but really important affairs are apt to arise without a days notice. His opinion was that a nation must be ready at all times to avoid trouble and secure a * basis for further development. He was not inclined to believe they could take a rose-colored view of things. Potential danger was often made actual when people avoided tackling difficult problems and sought to comfort themselves by taking a light view.

28447 He didn't believe it far-fetched or intentional pessimism if unforeseen difficulties in the immediate future were forecast. This was the moment when national unity was required to bring about the Empire's prosperity. He had already expressed his views on various occasions, including that of the Five-Minister Conference, to cope with the situation. He took the liberty of making further suggestions, and he solicited the Premier's consideration over the future of Japan and asked that it be put into practice.

28448 * it had not entirely slipped his notice that some people had misgivings concerning the military attitude toward international problems. He would state that this attitude had been consistent and rigid in the past, and would remain so, vis-a-vis those whose ideology and views were not reconciled with the national character. He had been exerting what service he could toward promoting Japan's position among the powers, and their confidence in Japan. He explained to them wherever possible the principle of the Empire's foundation in connection with national policies and principles of the present. His intention in doing so had been to seek efforts among the powers so that the Empire would not be entirely isolated. He hoped the Premier would render his assistance in realizing closer relations between the foreign and military authorities, with whose cooperation Japan might maintain her superior position in the international community, and that her

It was an urgent matter to inspire the people with the moral sense of the Empire and to reveal the essential qualities of its culture by perfecting national power based on nation-wide harmony, and moreover, to strengthen recognition of the national structure, further peace and security, and expedite the establishment of peace in East Asia and the Pacific.

28450 * Because of international crises in 1935 and the tendency toward renovation among jurisdictional courts and other circles, unfavorable social trends were expected to be revealed, which were liable to produce unrest among the people, and world communities in particular. Combined with the disturbance in educational circles and the labor field, conditions would be aggravated, and some, if not all military personnel, might be influenced and led into restlessness. The present situation seemed to be apparent tranquility, but it was not his opinion that it would be impossible for the government to tide over the difficult situation unless means were devised to dispel prevailing unrest. These tendencies refused to be driven away by ordinary or mediocre measures. The affairs in Japan should be a matter of religious service.

The fundamental aims should enable the people to live in peace and contentment, by observing such virtues as worship of gods, intimacy between the sovereign and his subjects, and perfect harmony between high and low. They should act in observance of virtues peculiar to the Empire and reject both Communism and Fascism.

28451 A tendency should be adjusted after it is taken into consideration, and then directed to a proper course.
* Natural tendencies do not always take reasonable courses. Those who govern must devote themselves to assisting in the Emperor's rule, in conformity with nature, and by transcending reason to bring about the development of national power and let the people live peacefully.

28452 Since these tendencies had gathered strength and the crisis was impending, they must be prompt in judging where the trend would lead. They must sacrifice themselves to render allegiance and assistance to the Emperor. Since appeal to the Emperor and then to transgress the Imperial Way would constitute an act deserving death, they must petition the Emperor to grant amnesty for past crimes. Thus, they could purify life and drive the offenders to devote themselves to a new way of living in expiation of their sin. This could effect a complete change of public feeling, * and they must carry out large-scale reforms in government. For this purpose they should have to request Imperial decision so the people might be informed on the plan, and should have to adjust this tendency. By thus establishing the basis of national power, they must discharge their great duty of assisting the Throne.

28453 * From exhibit 3166, letter dated 20 January, 1934, from ARAKI to Premier SAITO, it was stated that by judging the international situation, they could determine policies, especially those toward the Soviet, U. S., and China. Certain policies must be decided on while preparations were being made for a peace conference to establish a basis for peace in East Asia and the Pacific.

28454 The policy toward the Soviet should mainly concern international relations. Toward China, U. S. and the League, it concerned mainly with Manchurian problems.
* Policies toward Britain and the U. S. mainly concerned the London Disarmament Conference, and toward Britain, U. S. and China concerned international economic relations.

28455 * The witness identified Exhibit 3168 and verified 28456 it. The affidavit stated * that the witness was Vice Chief of Staff from January 1932 to 19 June 1933, a War Councillor, Inspector General from January 1934 to 16 July 1934, a War
28457 Councillor again and transferred to the reserve in March 1936. When he became Vice Chief of Staff * the Chief of Staff was Prince KAN-IN and the War Minister was the accused ARAKI. When he assumed his post, ARAKI explained to the witness that the state of affairs was quite alarming. There had been many internal incidents and relations with the League were not satisfactory.

The situation in Manchuria had become more aggravated. There was every danger it would develop into a regular war, and they must leave no stone unturned to immediately safe the situation.

28458 ARAKI told the witness that when he was appointed War Minister, the Chinchou District was in a critical condition. Unless they saved it, residents and troops would be in danger. Diplomatic negotiations were at a standstill. The situation was aggravated and the Kwantung Army was in difficulty. Therefore, the government was obliged to decide to liquidate * the district for self-defense and to protect residents. The General Staff ordered the Kwantung Army to that effect. ARAKI told the witness that the Liquidation Campaign had just been finished and he thought there would be no need of further operations unless the army was challenged. They would try to cease hostilities within the smallest possible scope and on principle the government was still dealing with Chang Hsueh-liang who was still disturbing peace and order. Therefore the scope of operations was limited to Chang's sphere of influence. ARAKI told the witness to bear this in mind and control the army strictly.

When the witness assumed the post as Vice Chief of Staff, he met INUKAI, who explained political affairs and made remarks similar to those of ARAKI. He did not in any way suggest that he intended to petition for an Imperial Order to withdraw troops from Manchuria and the witness never heard from any one that Premier INUKAI had any such intention.

* The witness reported to the Chief of Staff, Prince KAN-IN, what he had heard from INUKAI and ARAKI and with his approval, conducted matters in accordance with those policies. While doing so, it was decided by the Ministry to send troops to Shanghai which had been requested by the Navy as reinforcements to protect the Japanese there. The witness took every precaution to observe ARAKI's principle so that the troops sent would not exceed the scope of their primary object. Divisional Commander UEDA also followed this principle and tried to settle the situation without bloodshed. The witness remembered UEDA made a proclamation requesting reconsideration by the enemy of their action. Contrary to his expectation, the Chinese increased preparations to fight. There were signs that an overall clash was inevitable.

* Under such circumstances, further reinforcement was decided on to solve the situation. When the second reinforcement landed at Chillaikou, the 19th Route Army began a retreat and as it was driven beyond the expected line, attack ceased, ending in three days with almost negligible casualties. An agreement was later signed to ensure future safety.

28461

* This agreement gave Japan the right to station troops there, but in view of ARAKI's principle, they decided to evacuate all troops from China and withdrawal was made within a month after signing the agreement. The Jehol and Hulunpeirh campaigns and the task of the Kwantung Army under the Japan-Manchukuo Protocol, and because of constant disturbances around Jehol and in Hulunpierh, it became necessary for the Japanese and Manchukuo forces to resort to action under the Protocol. It took place after recognition of Manchukuo and as precautions were taken throughout the campaign not to divert from the principle of bringing about law and order the operation was extremely difficult. As to Hulunpeirh, their object was achieved through the good offices of the Soviet and as to Jehol, efforts were made to limit action within the Great Wall. Observance of this policy was sternly requested to the troops at the risk of operational inconveniences. There was an occasion when troops advanced beyond this limit * but they were immediately ordered to return and further action

Page was stopped. Hostilities were finally settled by the Tangku Agreement.

The witness believed that ARAKI was one who was most seriously worried about the Manchurian Incident. Because of his worry, he made a firm determination to settle it, which finally led to the Tangku Agreement. After the agreement was signed, ARAKI strove to settle the overall situation by adjusting foreign and domestic affairs. ARAKI often told the witness that he was devoting his efforts to letting the people live up to Japan's original teachings, enhancing the Emperor's virtue of benevolence and improving aggravated international relations by realizing the advocated international peace conference.

The natives' wishes for Manchukuo's independence were ardent when the witness was appointed Vice-Chief of Staff. The General Staff did not interfere on principles as it was a political problem. ARAKI assumed the most prudent attitude toward it and he was in accord with the officers.

* ARAKI also exerted efforts to calm the minds of young officers who were indignant at the current situation and had caused considerable trouble. He did his best to develop their spirit so they might devote attention to their duty. He also let subordinates spare no time in teaching and guiding younger officers. In due course, they showed signs of composure and no army officer was a participant in the May 15th Incident.

Reference was made to the witness' affidavit where he had said that the natives' wishes for Manchukuo's independence were ardent, that the General Staff did not interfere with it, and that ARAKI assumed the most prudent attitude toward it. When asked if he remembered being interrogated in Sugamo, * the witness stated he did not. He recalled an interrogation in which he had said that he had something to do with setting up Manchuria as an independent state, but the meaning was entirely contrary. Page entirely but he thought they did not clear up the mess, and advised the Emperor and Premier SAITO to set up an independent state, he explained that when he went to Manchuria he found Japanese officials in all quarters. Under such a state of affairs, it would appear as if Japan had occupied Manchuria. Therefore, the witness stated emphatically that under such a situation, Manchuria could not be properly governed and administered. Administration must be left entirely in Manchurian hands. When asked if he had said on interrogation that he felt any occupation of Manchuria by Japan violated the Nine-Power Treaty, he stated * that with regard to treaties he was a complete layman, but he did feel that would be a violation.

When asked on interrogation if he stated that while Vice-Chief of Staff he went to receive the Emperor's permission to different matters, and especially recalled that he went to get this permission at the time the 14th Division was sent to Shanghai, and that the Emperor said he could see no reason for sending them, the witness stated that the Emperor did not say he saw no reason. The Emperor stated to the effect that it would be all right if it were necessary to send more troops. He made inquiry to that effect. * He had not said that the Emperor felt that with the situation coming back to normal in Shanghai it was not necessary to send the division there. He did not know that before even the Naval party landed in Shanghai the Chinese Mayor had accepted all terms demanded by the Japanese Consul-General. He said it wasn't the case that he said on interrogation that he told the Emperor that they were already on the move and if they were not to be used in Shanghai, they were needed in Manchuria and he finally reluctantly agreed. The witness stated that there was a war going on in Shanghai and it was doubted whether troops were needed there and so they took precautions. Half the troops were at sea and half on the move and they couldn't stop them. It was carried out on the plan that if they went to Shanghai and were not needed there, they should be transferred to Manchuria where they were needed.

Troops of the various powers were stationed in North China and Shanghai and at that time ideas pertaining to sovereignty were superficial and they hardly thought about it. When he said it never entered their heads, he did not refer to anyone in particular insofar as diplomatic affairs were concerned. He was following the directions of the government.

28470 When he said that the question of sovereignty did not enter their heads,* he did not include ARAKI because he of all persons placed great emphasis and importance on international treaties. ARAKI did not tell the witness that this was a breach of them.

With regard to the despatch of forces, ARAKI agreed because it was a cabinet decision. In regard to the statement in his affidavit where he stated that ARAKI's opinion toward the League was quite clear, that he fully explained his opinion at the cabinet meeting and induced the decision that Japan would not withdraw from the League, the witness stated that he was not present at the meeting but he had frequently heard this from ARAKI.

He did not know that the truth was that ARAKI expressed the opposite opinion at the Cabinet meeting. He placed implicit trust in what ARAKI told him but he did not know for himself what took place in the meeting.

* The affidavit stated that when ARAKI was War Minister, the witness was Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs and at the time of the first Konoe and Hiranuma Cabinets, he was Foreign Minister when ARAKI was Education Minister. When ARAKI was Cabinet Councillor the witness was Foreign Minister. After that time, they met often at private parties. The first Konoe Cabinet held Five-Minister Conferences consisting of Prime, War, Naval, Foreign and Finance Ministers to debate on important affairs.

28487

* The problem of reinforcing the Anti-Comintern Pact was discussed at one of these conferences but ARAKI did not attend because he was Education Minister. ARAKI was chairman of the committee of the General Spiritual Mobilization because his official position as Education Minister was closely connected with that field. As far as the witness could remember, he was appointed in the same way as ex officio. In regard to ARAKI's connection with the Japan-German Cultural Agreement, Japan had entered into it with Germany and Italy and it was intended to be concluded with as many others as possible. Cultural agreements were entered into with Hungary, Brazil, Siam, and Japan carried out culture exchanges with Poland, Portugal, Argentine and Belgium.

As for the U.S., a Japanese fine arts exhibition was held in San Francisco. These agreements were cultural problems aiming at culture exchange in the world. As to the conclusion of such agreements, and its enforcement, the Foreign Office always conferred with the Education Ministry.

ARAKI insisted on an exchange of culture throughout the world, emphasizing that it should not be limited to Germany and Italy. The Foreign Office agreed. The witness heard many times that ARAKI

At the resignation of the HIRANUMA cabinet due to Tripartite Alliance issue, ARAKI was considered to head the following cabinet. One of the principal reasons he was considered was that he had such an opinion regarding the Tripartite Alliance.

The witness said that to carry into effect any decisions of the Five-Minister Conference they would have to be weighed by the entire cabinet.

28490 When asked if it were not true that the negotiations with Germany and Italy in 1938 and 1939 were not known to the other cabinet ministers, including ARAKI, the witness stated * that if the other ministers were aware or familiar with the discussions held at the Five-Minister Conferences they could not have heard it officially but only informally. Asked why ARAKI was considered a possible successor because he was opposed to negotiations for the Tripartite Alliance if he did not know about such negotiations, the witness stated that he did not think ARAKI was familiar with all the details discussed at the Five-Minister Conference, but with regard to the proposed Tripartite Alliance, it was widely discussed in public. Not once was there an official or unofficial discussion of it at a cabinet meeting.

28491 * A matter such as the compromise in May or June 1939 on whether the proposed alliance should commit Japan to military action to support Germany and Italy against countries with whom they might be at war, other than Russia, was discussed at the Five-Ministers' Conference.

28492 * Never had a discussion of the Five-Ministers' Conference been reported to the Cabinet and there debated. When asked that if ARAKI had told them in his interrogation (Exhibit 2218) that questions of foreign policy were reported from the conferences to the Cabinet and there decided upon, if ARAKI were wrong, the witness stated that he recalled no decision which was so reported to the Cabinet. No such decision was ever made by the Cabinet that Japan should enter into a treaty with Germany and Italy by which she was bound to give military support if they became involved in a war with Russia.

Page When asked if that decision was made by the Five-Ministers Conference, the witness stated it was difficult for him to speak of the problem which was discussed very simply, inasmuch as * the question was discussed on many occasions by the Five-Ministers Conference. He hesitated to make a definite reply, because he might make a mistake. He said he hardly expected the details of the Tripartite Alliance to be discussed.

He knew the late Baron HARADA well. He never reported to Prince SAIONJI himself, but on many occasions gave information to HARADA which he might use on reporting on diplomatic and political developments to SAIONJI.

28494 * He did not recall the exact phraseology used but generally he thought that the point in dispute was whether the treaty should include an undertaking to give military support to Germany and Italy if they became involved in a war with a country other than Russia.

When asked if it were not true that HIRANUMA, ITAGAKI and OSHIMA were in favor of giving such support and it was opposed by YONAI and himself, the witness stated that it was a fact that he and YONAI were opposed.

28496 * When asked if there was not a compromise arrangement arrived at that in the event of Germany or Italy being at war with a country other than Russia, Japan would give political and economic support and military aid if possible, but that it should be explained that it would not be possible to give effective military aid, the witness stated there were compromise plans on at least two occasions and was not limited to one only. Since he had made no preparations to discuss details of these discussions, he could not state accurately if this compromise was adopted about 4 May 1939. He did not think that the compromise was made known to all cabinet members and the Chief Secretary.

Since the decision of the Five-Ministers Conference was not reported to the Cabinet as a whole, there could not have been a possibility of the cabinet approving it.

28497 * He could not say whether the draft plan just read to him was sent just as it was to Germany but it was a matter of course that a compromise plan somewhat to that effect was communicated to the representative in the field. To every extent the discussion of this subject was limited to the Five-Ministers Conference. It was in the preparatory state and only after arrangement was reached between Japan and Germany or the other party that the matter was to be submitted to the cabinet for approval. Only thereafter would the treaty be formally signed.

The witness was asked whether he discussed matters with HARADA because he knew that HARADA was the channel through which SAIONJI gave advice to the Emperor. He stated he did not know whether SAIONJI ever expressed * opinions on diplomatic questions directly to the Emperor, but when any cabinet changes took place it was SAIONJI's responsibility to recommend a successor and it was necessary for SAIONJI to have correct information with regard to political and diplomatic movements.

He did not know whether that was the reason all various ministers and others were anxious to let HARADA know their views. When asked if that was his reason, he stated he had not one iota of thought to try to better his own position. When asked if the draft on the question of the Alliance which was drawn up as result of the compromise was rejected by the Germans because they had an alternative draft, he stated that he did not know whether they actually rejected the Japanese offer. An alternate plan was, however, submitted by the Germans.

* When asked if a new agreement was reached on 5 June, he stated he did not remember the date exactly but the German draft was discussed at the Five-Ministers Conference.

28504 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3170 as his affidavit.

28505 * The affidavit stated that the witness was from January to August 1939 and from February 1944 to February 1945 Minister of Finance, from January to July 1940 and from February to April 1945 Chief Cabinet Secretary, from April to October 1941 Chief of the General Affairs in the IRAA, and from June 1945 to January 1946 Minister of the Imperial Household.

In July 1941 while he was Chief of the General Affairs of IRAA, he was requested by the Kokumin Press to have a table talk with a person who would be most suitable.

28506 * He replied that ARAKI was the best one to talk with if he would accept, because he knew him to have an intention of non-expansion of the China Incident and knew he did not agree to the Tripartite Alliance. These intentions ARAKI had expressed to the witness many times. Their idea was to make the talk a feature, with ARAKI's opinion inserted at several points. ARAKI, the witness, and press representatives met together and the talk lasted two hours. ARAKI gave his reminiscences of the Siberian Expedition. The witness was interested in what ARAKI said, but the journalists were puzzled because the conversation could not make an intended article. Later the journalists asked the witness to agree to their making an article of their own composition out of the talk.

28507 * The witness replied that it might be inevitable to alter the talk, but they must be careful not to create a story from it lest it cause trouble. The article (Exhibit 667) published in the paper was far different from the talk. The witness' words were increased much more and ARAKI's was omitted more than half. Besides, the dictation was poor and many parts of the article were not clear to the witness.

ARAKI, during the talk, had compared the situation at the time of the Siberian Expedition with the current time (1941) and he deplored the government in having no definite policy to unify the army and navy and he

The witness observed that after ARAKI resigned from the HIRANUMA Cabinet in 1939, he refrained from facing the public and was noted as a recluse from current affairs. Army authorities were opposed to him. At the time when ARAKI and the witness were colleagues in the HIRANUMA Cabinet, the Five-Ministers Conference discussed current problems and made decisions. ARAKI did not participate at all. As to the Nomohan Incident, even the witness was not informed after its occurrence.

When the YONAI Cabinet was formed, the witness appealed to ARAKI to become Home Affairs Minister. ARAKI declined on the grounds he could render no service as the currents of the time were against him.

* As the situation at the time of the table talk was more critical than the time when the YONAI Cabinet was formed, ARAKI's gravest anxiety was why the government did not establish a strong policy to support the army and navy and work out a plan for the nation's security. His anxiety was manifested on the pretext of his old story of the Siberian Expedition as far as the witness could recollect. The article that appeared in the paper was much distorted and confusing and did not depict what ARAKI's talk actually was.

* Exhibit 2378, the affidavit of IWAMATSU, Goro, who was recalled and part of whose affidavit had been read before, stated that before ARAKI became Education Minister there was an attempt to promote an exchange of good will between Germany and Japan. Young men were sent to Germany and young Germans would be sent to Japan. When ARAKI became Education Minister the Japanese youths had returned from Germany. He stated to the witness that he regretted that they had returned home with Nazi principles. He did not like this. If the program was to continue in the future, it would be his suggestion that the young men visit not only Germany, but England and France as well.

When the German-Japanese culture agreement was signed, ARAKI wanted the witness to devise some means to conclude the agreement with other nations. * On one occasion ARAKI stated to the witness that if a nation became a first class country because of the strength of her armed forces, it would not last long. To become a first class nation, it had to do so by virtue of culture. He encouraged science study, and negotiated with the Finance Minister to obtain an extra three million yen annually for the study of basic science in colleges and universities. He respected technical education, and listened to the opinions of business men. He desired to carry out vocational education.

During the China Incident, ARAKI was opposed to the suggestion that the art exhibition and the teaching of English in schools should be abolished, although there was public clamor for this. He said that the culture of a nation is not the kind to be temporarily stopped.

Concerning the abolition of English teaching, he thought it might have originated from an anti-foreign principle, and * ARAKI quoted to the witness one of Emperor MEIJI's oaths, that Japan should not indulge in a superior complex, nor flatter itself that it was superior. The Japanese must become admired, loved, and respected by all. The study of English should not only not be abolished, but should be encouraged, and students should learn more languages. He brought to the attention of the students that the U. S. and Britain were studious enough to study Japanese, and Japan must follow suit.

The people should nourish unbiased judgement and attain the culture which had been in existence 2600 years. * He encouraged the education of the deaf and blind, and was an ardent champion of loyalty.

The witness remembered that a group of Niseis visited him and requested his opinion as to the action they could take in the event of a future struggle between Japan and other countries. He advised them that their first duty was to the country of their birth, but he further stated that if they were reluctant to engage in conflict with the country of their ancestors, they should do all they possibly could to prevent any such unfortunate happening and try to iron out misunderstandings.

28546 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3172
as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was Chief Cabinet Secretary in the second and third KONOYE Cabinets. In the summer of 1940 he went to ARAKI by order of KONOYE and asked him to be a Cabinet Councillor, but he declined because he opposed the establishment of the IRAA and the conclusion of the Tripartite Alliance. ARAKI opposed the IRAA because the prevailing political partisans' attitude could not always be approved, but the IRAA was said to aim at establishing one party for the whole nation, 28547 * and rejected the co-existence of different political parties. Probably it would lead to despotic autocracy, depriving everyone of freedom of opinion. It would be against the spirit of the constitution and Emperor MEIJI's intentions. It would be a system contrary to the structure of the state and the Emperor's will. Later, it was clar-ified that IRAA was not a political, but a public association, but at that time this was not clear.

28548 ARAKI opposed the Tripartite Alliance because of his ideological standpoint that most Japanese leaders not only over-estimated Germany's strength, but also confounded the idea of the Imperial Way with German totalitarianism;
therefore, the Alliance was misleading in clarification of Japan's real standpoint. ARAKI opposed it from his professional military standpoint, because it would lead to aggravating the feelings of the U. S. and Britain toward Japan with a resultant difficulty of settling the China Incident, * so much so that it might become inevitable for Japan to wage war against the U. S. and Britain.

28549 * ARAKI stated that the IRAA as a domestic problem and the Tripartite Alliance as an international problem were both extremely important. Conferences for settling these problems ought to be conducted with prudence, but since they had already decided his opinion could affect them no longer. Therefore, he said the post of Cabinet Councillor was meaningless.

The witness told ARAKI that KONOYE's opinion was the same. However, there were some who wanted to found IRAA on Nazi totalitarianism, but KONOYE rejected it because it might revive the Shogunate. To settle the China Incident, not existing political parties but a nation-wide organization was necessary to suppress the Army. This is what IRAA aimed at.

in December 1931, ARAKI was appointed War Minister. The witness often called on him to hear him speak on various questions. ARAKI was worried over the Manchurian Incident, and said there was a danger of it developing to an all out clash. If they should leave it to take its own course and as the League failed to grasp the truth of the situation because of Chinese propoganda, he himself would do his best to put an end to the fighting and prevent an all out clash. ARAKI then said that after that he would endeavour to see the League and other powers brought together to take the right cognizance of the situation.

He was absolutely against Japan seceding from the League. When the witness met him after Japan's secession, ARAKI said that at the cabinet meeting, a provision had been made for non-withdrawal from the League, but as a result of the proceedings at Geneva withdrawal became necessary. He complained that politics was a difficult thing.

28558 * In January, 1934, ARAKI caught pneumonia, and resigned his post as War Minister. When the witness went to the sanitarium to inquire of his condition, ARAKI said that he was sorry that he became ill at a very important moment. Japan was already out of the League. What he wished to do was hold a Far Eastern Conference to restore cooperation, but he had become ill and found it impossible to take active steps. This was the reason he resigned, but he had presented his plans before Premier SAITO and other ministers. As for the Army, since his successor,

* In exhibit 3174, the minutes of the Privy Council meeting of 30 January 1932, ARAKI stated that he would answer a question regarding army actions. In the declaration of the Kwantung Army Commander at the beginning of the Manchuria Incident, there was a portion stating Japan would turn Manchuria into a land of bounty. The statement was made to calm the population, and it would be improper to conclude it defined army objectives. However, ARAKI had sent a warning to the Kwantung Army Commander.

The cause of the Manchuria Incident was primarily due to Chiang Hsueh-liang's inability to maintain friendly relations with the Japanese forces. Therefore, army action must naturally extend to the limits where Chiang formerly exercised influence. As to this action, there were rumors that the front line forces were not submitting to control, but were acting at their own discretion. Since they had resorted to measures of self-protection, they were obliged to take the initiative to attain objectives and maintain prestige. In the course of such action, there might be acts giving the impression of being excessive, * but ARAKI begged that they would give sympathetic cooperation to tactics relating to operational command. As to relations with the diplomatic authorities, they were most amicable and smooth.

Foreign Minister YOSHIZAWA explained the contents of the budget requested by the Foreign Office. Although the total amount requested was over three million yen, necessary expenses had been met twice before by expenditures from the second reserve fund. Amounts requested included police expenses in Manchuria, relief expenses of the Japanese nationals in south China, telegraphic communication expenses for classification of the Incident to the League and governments concerned, and secret funds and miscellaneous expenses. These expenses were required in connection with the Manchurian Incident.

* YOSHIZAWA's conviction was that the first objective of action in Manchuria was the maintenance of peace and tranquility. It was difficult to maintain perfect order over such a bandit ridden land. * In his opinion, the peace of that region was a necessity of the Empire. The second objective was the protection of their rights and interests. They should bear in mind Manchuria's history. Japan's past action had been based on this principle, and it would hold true in the future.

28583 As to the views of the cabinet concerning the action of a new government, that matter originated among the Chinese themselves in Manchuria. This was of deep concern to Japan, and they were careful considering the policy regarding it. In the past there was a secret Russo-Japanese agreement establishing a boundary line, but the agreement became void as a result of the Russian revolution. As a consequence, they considered it was not binding them, but Russia has great interests in the Far East. As to the dispatch of troops in Harbin, this, as ARAKI had stated, was done by the Kwantung Army as a temporary measure * to protect Japanese lives and property in North Manchuria which were endangered by bandits. YOSHIZAWA considered that further steps should be taken, and decided according to the future situation.

Japan's acts were based on the maintenance of order and protection of rights and interests. They would even send troops to the North Manchuria area whenever Japanese lives and property were imperiled, but they were giving careful consideration to Russian relations.

28584 * Exhibit 3175-A, an excerpt from a pamphlet entitled "Proceedings of the Education Council" held on 13 January, 1938, included a statement by the accused 28585 * KIDO that at the conference on 11 January, the Cabinet decided upon a policy to make the young men's school a compulsory education course. Concerning that question, the Temporary Education Committee organized in 1917, adopted a report recommending the government to make a part or all of the supplementary technical schools a compulsory course. Again in 1935, the Educational Administration Exchange, which deliberated on the general plan of the young men's school, adopted a side decision for making that school a compulsory course. Since the young men's school was an important institution, they expected that the Council would discuss all problems concerning it. The results of such discussions would be respected and followed by the government.

28604

* The witness stated he could not answer what the original duties of the Organ were, because the specific duties were set forth in instructions issued to the Chief of the Special Service Organs from the Army Commander, and were given to the Chief of the Organ by the Kwantung Army Commander. Instructions were either confidential or secret, and the information in them were not generally disseminated. Consequently the witness, as a civilian employee, had no personal knowledge of the orders, but knew generally what they contained.

Generally, the duties were similar to those of the Kwantung Army press section, and consisted of announcing to the press news from the fronts communicated by Japanese troops. For example, in the Jehol operation, four clerks * were kept busy decoding telegrams for press releases. The specific duties of the witness were to translate radio broadcasts from China and assist in deciphering.

At the end of the Jehol operation, when DOIHARA arrived, their duties modified, because the supply of news curtailed at that time. Their duties consisted of collecting information and issue of press releases, and was mainly concerned with political movements and the state of public peace in Fengtien, Jehol, and Inner Mongolia.

The Special Service Organ had a branch in Dairen, which gathered information from Chinese sources, useful for reference in relations to the progress of Manchukuo. It compiled information concerning movements of the Japanese in Manchukuo and especially in SMR circles. 28607 The witness could definitely state that at no time while he was connected with the Organ or while DOIHARA was connected, did it ever have anything at any time to do with opium. The Special Service Organ was not a large organization, as many believed. * It consisted only of the head of the organization, his assistant and four clerks. From personal knowledge, he knew everything that went on within the Organ, because of its small size.

When asked if what he knew about the functions of the organ was limited to the nature of the work assigned him during the period from 1933 to 1936, the witness stated that he had described not simply the work assigned him personally, but the general work of the organ.

Even though subordinates were unfamiliar with the exact contents of instructions given to the Chief of the Organ by the Commanding General, still they were able to know what the functions of the organ were because it conducted the work of collecting intelligence, information, and giving out press releases.

28612 * In the course of his employment under DOIHARA, he had no knowledge that in 1935 DOIHARA was launching a political offensive to create a separate state in North China under the threat of sending five divisions within the Great Wall and moving the Manchukuo Emperor to Peiping.

28613 * He did know that DOIHARA was in Peiping and the Tientsin area in November 1935, in connection with that movement.

28614 * He did not recall that newspapers all over the world were reporting the activities of DOIHARA in the Tientsin and Peiping area with regard to the 5 Provinces Autonomous Movement. 28621 newspapers commenting on the two, and the report thus received from the press was included in that particular report. DOIHARA's name constantly appeared in the newspapers, which frequently reported that DOIHARA was engaged in conspiracies and plots, but as a matter of fact during the years the witness served under him there was no evidence of his ever participating in such movements. *(This report was received in evidence as exhibit 3177.)

Reference was made to parts of the witness' affidavit where he stated that from the time of DOIHARA's arrival the duties of the witness were modified, and where he stated that the Organ took charge of supervision and guidance of Japanese in the Manchukuo Government and that he kept a complete list of their conduct.

28622 When asked if he remembered how many Japanese officials were there at that time, the witness stated that the Organ was not in control of Japanese officials or officials of Japanese extraction. * While he had said that the reason for the supervision and guidance of persons of Japanese extract in the employ of the Manchukuo Government was to see that they did not act overbearing or go to extreme, supervision and guidance were quite different from control.

When asked if he did not now admit that the work of the Organ under DOIHARA was not confined to the collection of news and the issuing of press releases, the witness stated that those were their functions. He did not recall whether or not the Organ's functions also included the supervision and guidance of officials of Japanese extraction. It was a fact that the Organ collected information concerning them to prevent them from interfering in the Manchukuo Government by acting overbearingly.

28623 * There were no divisions or sections within the Organ. There were only the Chief and his assistant.
28625 When asked if he knew that there were Special Service * Organs of the Kwantung Army at Shanghaikwan and Antung besides the one at Dairen, the witness stated the only branch of 28626 the Mukden Organ was in Dairen. * Other organs were entirely separate and not under Mukden's jurisdiction. In his recollection, there were no organs in Antung or Chinchow. The organ in Shanghaikwan did not receive orders from DOIHARA, nor was the organ in Harbin under his direction.

by Mr. Warren.

28627 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
 28629 3178 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that from December 1928 to October 1931, he served under Chiang Hsueh-liang as a military adviser. From December 1928 he was also assistant to DOIHARA, who was for that period military adviser to Chang. At that time he became well acquainted with DOIHARA, knew his policies, and often discussed them with him. On many occasions DOIHARA emphasized that the secret of friendly relations between Japan and China was for the Japanese to study more deeply Chinese affairs and carry on friendly relations in good faith, discard the Japanese superiority complex, and 28630 * refrain from enforcing their will by unilateral force.

Not only did DOIHARA advocate this, but in territories under him required strict observance. In January, 1938, the witness accompanied the accused UMEZU, who was then War Vice Minister on an inspection of battle lines in North China. At that time they visited DOIHARA's headquarters to Tsoushieng, and he was greatly surprised to learn that tranquility prevailed throughout the city and that it was at the height of prosperity. It was hard for him to realize that this was the base of military operations nearest the front.

28631 * In 1937, prior to this tour and at the time of the occurrence of the China Incident, DOIHARA commanded the 14th Division, and was ordered to North China. The masses of the people there were deeply impressed by his policy and crowded to areas under his control, because they knew they could pursue their callings in peace and contentment without undue interference from the Japanese military. Their inspection tour confirmed everything they had heard concerning the situation in the territories under DOIHARA's command.

On 9 September 1931, immediately prior to the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident, the witness was sent to Tokyo by order of Chiang Hsueh-liang in connection with the murder of Captain NAKAMURA, and returned to Peking on September 24. While the witness was in Tokyo, DOIHARA was there to make his report as Chief of the special military organ at Mukden on the progress of the NAKAMURA case. The witness talked with DOIHARA on September 14.

* During the prosecution's case, General Ching Teh-chen, with whom the witness was well-acquainted, testified that five days before the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident, he met a friend by the name of SHIBAYAMA, who was also a friend of DOIHARA in Peking. Ching stated that SHIBAYAMA said that DOIHARA was about to go to Manchuria to embark on some big project. Ching had always been friendly with the witness, and the witness considered Ching a friend. After his testimony, the witness contacted Ching, who stated he had used the witness' name before the Tribunal. The witness was surprised at Ching's carelessness in using his name in such connection, because the witness knew he was the only SHIBAYAMA who was a friend of both Ching and DOIHARA.

As shown by his previous statements concerning his whereabouts on the date referred to by Ching, it would have been impossible for the witness to have had a discussion with DOIHARA at that time and place. He had never told Ching anything about the foregoing affair, nor mentioned DOIHARA's name in connection therewith.

* Because he was engaged in the NAKAMURA case and knew DOIHARA was spending most of his time on that case and knowing his whereabouts just prior to the Mukden Incident, the witness was greatly surprised to learn that anyone seriously considered DOIHARA had any connection with it.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. BROOKS,
Counsel for MINAMI.

28634

* The witness stated that he had met MINAMI about 18 September, 1931, when he was in Tokyo. As the witness was about to return to Mukden, he asked MINAMI if he had any directions. MINAMI requested the witness to orally communicate with General HAYASHI, the Korean commander, en route. The message was that under no circumstances should the Korean Army be permitted to cross the Yalu River into Manchuria. MINAMI did not state the reason. The witness was at that time a major.

* When asked if he gave the message to HAYASHI, the witness stated that he first wired HAYASHI and arranged to see Chief of Staff KODAMA. KODAMA and the witness travelled together to Seoul, after meeting at the station. At that time he was not on MINAMI's staff.

The reason the witness was employed to send such a message, in his judgement, was that the matter required early and urgent attention. Because he was leaving Tokyo for Mukden, he presumed that was why the message was entrusted to him.

- 28636 * The circumstances under which he met MINAMI were that at time he was military adviser to Chiang Hsueh-liang in Mukden, and was receiving frequent directions from War Minister MINAMI. Therefore he went to visit, thinking there might be some instructions. He recalled that the time was the night of 19 June, in the War Minister's official residence.
- 28637 * It was true to state that SHIBAYAMA arrived in Tokyo on September 12, as prosecution exhibit 57 had declared. His mission was to communicate to headquarters the intentions and wishes of Chiang Hsueh-liang in connection with the murder of Captain NAKAMURA. At this time the witness was an officer in the Army. He thought he delivered the message to KODAMA on the 20th, on board a train bound for Seoul.
- 28638 * He believed that MINAMI gave him the message because MINAMI wished to bring about a local settlement of the Manchukuo Incident on the smallest possible scale.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY JUDGE NYI.

- 28639 The witness stated that it was true that he served as military adviser to Chiang from December, 1928, until October, 1931, and that he had been connected with Chiang before that. When asked in what capacity, he stated that in the previous year when he was in Chinchow, Chiang Hsueh-liang came there with his army.

The witness was DOIHARA's assistant for only seven months during the first few years. It was not true that when DOIHARA left Chiang, he recommended the witness as his successor. Chiang had two Japanese military advisers at that time, but no non-military advisers. The other military adviser was Colonel SENO.

- 28640 The reason Chiang picked the witness out to go to Tokyo to settle the NAKAMURA case was because Chiang felt the necessity of communicating to the Japanese authorities his desire to bring about a peaceful settlement of that affair.
- 28641 * He did not know if it were also because he was close to Japanese military circles.

At that time he had no intimate connection with such circles, because he was purely an adviser only to Chiang, and there was no need for him to respond to Japanese army orders. Chiang's desire was to see that the NAKAMURA Incident be carefully investigated by both sides, and if after investigation he would be found responsible, he said that depending on Japanese representations, he would listen to them and try to bring about a peaceful settlement.

* He was sincere in his effort to bring about a settlement. The witness did not know by that time that a second inquiry into the case had been ordered.

28644

* The witness stated he made a trip to China after the outbreak of hostilities in 1937. The witness stated he had not met DOIHARA twice in 1938 in North China, but met him elsewhere that year.

DOIHARA and the witness were not sent on an inspection trip to North China in August, 1938, but inspected both North and South China. * It was not true the mission was for the creation of a new central government to be headed by Wu Pei-fu and Tang Shao-yi.

He had never heard DOIHARA say that it would be close to his idea of maintaining friendly relations by creating a new government. It was not true he went there on the request of TERAUCHI.

The witness stated he travelled from Tokyo to Korea, after talking to MINAMI, by rail.

* The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3179 as his affidavit.

* The affidavit stated that the witness was in the diplomatic service in 1931 as Consul General at Tientsin and had held such a post prior to and at the time of the Manchurian Incident. As Consul General, he collected information concerning the Accused DOIHARA in connection with his * actions regarding the Manchurian Incident and wired this to Foreign Minister SHIDEHARA or to the Chief of the Asia Bureau. Some of the wires were introduced as Prosecution Exhibits 287 to 293, 295, 296, 300, 304, etc.

Concerning the method used in securing the information, the witness explained that there was disagreement between the Foreign Office and Kwantung Army regarding PU-YI's coming out of retirement. The Army was acting independently and they received no official information from the Kwantung Army as to its activities and they had no means by which they could do so. He could not say whether it was possible that the Foreign Ministry was receiving such information.

The witness was f too busy conducting investigations of the actions of DOIHARA and had to depend upon subordinates to collect what information they could.

* They secured information from such sources as newspaper articles, conversations with Chinese and Japanese, rumors and other information throwing light on the activities of DOIHARA. This information was reported to the witness who sifted it and drew conclusions. His conclusions comprised the contents of the telegrams introduced in evidence. This was the only source of information he had. Because it was large, its authenticity could not be checked. He had to do the best he could as he had no further personal information.

The witness met DOIHARA on two occasions when they exchanged social conversations.

* After receiving reports of the consular police, he never used them as data for telegrams to the Foreign Office. The consular police reports were not immediately

Concerning the two opinions of the Kwantung Army and the Foreign Office regarding PU-YI's coming out of retirement, the witness stated that according to the Foreign Minister's views and instructions given to the witness, it was not time for PU-YI to appear in Manchuria.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY JUDGE NYI

28652 * When asked if before sending the wires to SHIDEHARA in November 1931, he had been sent instructions to stop the abduction plan of PU-YI and to be on guard, the witness stated that he received instructions from SHIDEHARA to see PU-YI and advise him against going to Manchuria. In accordance with these instructions, he interviewed PU-YI and communicated the advice.

The witness understood the instructions from the Foreign Office to be that it wasn't yet time for PU-YI to appear in Manchuria. That is all he knew about the Ministry's attitude.

28654 * In none of his telegrams had he ever referred to his talking with DOIHARA.

28660 * The witness stated that he had no knowledge that his telegrams not only contained reports from sources of his own but were also corroborated by reports of the Consulates in Shanghai, Nanking and Peiping regarding DOIHARA's activities. He did not know that afterward, because such telegrams were not circulated to his Consulate, * DOIHARA came to the Consulate General and came to the witness' room only once. On that occasion only greetings were exchanged and nothing more. The witness recalled that talks were held with DOIHARA through a member of the staff of the Consulate General on two or three occasions.

* Reference was made to statements of the witness that he had no discussion with regard to the moving of PU-YI with DOIHARA and was asked if it refreshed his memory to read a sentence from a document, beginning with "I told him as my personal opinion." On being shown the document, the witness stated that the personal opinion mentioned was not his opinion but that of one of the Consulate staff. There were words to this effect at the end of the document. This telegram states at the outset that it is according to a report made by a staff member and that at the end are the words he so stated. That was the way he filed the report.

28665

* The witness stated that he had no reason to doubt the accuracy of anything he told Tokyo on that occasion, after being read a part of the telegram which stated that the staff advised DOIHARA about relations with China, and that it was his personal opinion and advised him of his personal opinion.

28666

* From Exhibit 300, the witness was read a portion which stated that he had fully talked with DOIHARA twice not to commit rash acts but it appeared he was continuing plans to overthrow Chang and there was apprehension that he might start another Incident in the Peking-Tientsin area. After hearing this, the witness stated he had nothing to answer.

28667

* The Defense referred to Prosecution's Exhibit 245 where it was stated that in order to perform these duties and functions, the Consul General's office availed itself of all possible channels of information. One of the sources was the consular police and it was the duty of their office to draw conclusions from information so obtained.

28669

* Exhibit 3180-A, an excerpt from a volume entitled, "Far Eastern Commission of Inquiry", being a record of an interview with DOIHARA on 3 May 1932, with Lord Lytton, was received in evidence. While the exhibit was not read, it was pointed out that the Lytton Commission had confidence in the veracity of DOIHARA and likewise the people and officials of the places where he was stationed also had confidence in him.

- 28671 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3181 as his affidavit.
- 28677 * The affidavit stated that the witness was a Lieutenant General at the surrender and during his career he was well acquainted with DOIHARA, having been intimately acquainted with him since he was a captain. Prior to the China Incident and during March 1937, DOIHARA was Commander of the 14th Division stationed in Japan. At the outbreak of the Incident in July 1937, DOIHARA was Commander of the Division and the witness was a staff officer. They were ordered to North China in August and engaged in operations along the Peking-Hankow Railroad.
- 28678 * At the time the China Affair broke out, while they were under mobilization orders, DOIHARA gave instructions which were later repeated on the field, emphasizing that the Affair was not a war of aggression but aimed at cooperation with China. He enjoined them that rigid enforcement of his regulations concerning the protection of the Chinese would be made. During operations, DOIHARA gave primary attention to purely strategic matters, but he never lost sight of his duty to his subordinates and never hesitated to assist them when it came to the protection of the Chinese. He tried to avoid injury or oppression to noncombatants.
- 28679 * During one operation, his men decided to use a Chinese farmer's house as a command post. When this was called to DOIHARA's attention, he noticed women and children taking refuge there and forbade his subordinates to enter. Because of this they camped around the house in the open air and attended to their business.
- On another occasion DOIHARA scolded men for burning firewood belonging to Chinese families. On another occasion DOIHARA severely reprimanded soldiers who had hired a Chinese to carry his knapsack.

Page better than the Japanese soldiers. He had a high regard for the Chinese and noncombatants and the witness knew no occasion when the Chinese general public in any jurisdiction under DOIHARA were not settled and peaceful toward the Japanese. They continued their businesses without interruption and in prosperity. It was not uncommon for Chinese to assist Japanese soldiers in drawing water, preparing meals, etc. Their regard for DOIHARA was such that they would inform him of any bandit attack they anticipated.

28681 * DOIHARA also endeavored to execute his own views and put them in practice. It was not only words, but a sincere attitude that he was known throughout the division for his ideals and teachings. DOIHARA constantly instructed and advised staff officers and all subordinates and they found his instructions of great value in peacefully dealing with the Chinese people. DOIHARA often confided in the witness. The witness knew DOIHARA had an opinion opposed to the China Affair from the beginning, but as an Army officer he had to obey orders. But to his intimates he always deplored the affair.

28682 * In February 1938 the witness was returned to Japan and thereafter continued to correspond with DOIHARA. In a letter received by the witness April 22, 1938, DOIHARA stated that Japan had no basic strategic principle and seemed to be operating passively, decoyed by opponents and leading a hand-to-mouth existence; without strengthening the scaffold on which she stands, she supports both the north and central China regimes and unconscious of the urgent need of consolidating the foundation, tries to arrange mere formalities with these governments. He stated he was greatly disappointed and concerned and had no intention to rejoice in giving a big talk. He begged the witness to explain to the authorities with regard to these points and ask for reflection.

28683 * The north regime was Wang Ko-min's temporary government, and the central government was Liang Hung-chih's restoration government. Knowing DOIHARA, the witness knew this letter was but another of his protests against the China Affair, and DOIHARA realized that the witness shared his views.

DOIHARA from his youth cherished an ideal for bettering relations with China. When he was in the army college, he studied the Chinese language and history. After graduation he was a member of the General Staff and was sent to China for many years. His name was well known, even to Chinese civilians. While in China and Manchuria, he served twice as Chief of the Special Services Organization in Mukden, which was primarily to gather military information.

* CROSS-EXAMINATION BY JUDGE NYI

The witness stated that he had been attached to some other units besides DOIHARA's in the China War. It was customary for local Chinese residents at the end of operations to move back and resume their occupations. He did not know what percent of the local population were forced to leave their homes and settle in the interior. By China Affair he meant the hostilities which started at Marco Polo Bridge in 1937.

* The reason he hadn't stated in his affidavit that DOIHARA deplored the Mukden Incident is that he had not written of all matters relating to DOIHARA. He had heard it as a rumor, that after DOIHARA wrote the letter to the witness referred to that he was summoned to Japan to head an organization called the DOIHARA Organization for the withdrawal of Chinese Generals from current hostilities. He did not hear this directly from DOIHARA and he did not know how he knew there was a rumor.

28687 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3182 as his affidavit.

28689 * The affidavit stated that immediately following the Lukouchiao Incident of 7 July 1947, he was Vice-Chief of the Political Department of the Osaka Mainichi Press and shortly after that arrived at Tientsin. The China Incident had not been settled locally and one of its objects was for the Army to advance toward Pouting under command of Lieutenant General KATSUKI, who initiated the actions. The witness recalled that the divisions engaged were the 6th Division under General TANI, who took the central offensive, while General KAWAGISHI took the right, and DOIHARA's Division the left offensive. DOIHARA's Division moved on the left in the direction of Kuan and Manching, south toward * Pouting.

As a resident, the witness was with the TANI Unit and was not in a position to observe DOIHARA. Without encountering a major opposition, the TANI Unit entered Pouting the 24th of September 1937 and DOIHARA's Unit entered the following day. The witness visited DOIHARA at Command Headquarters and conversed with him about two hours. The witness found DOIHARA cooperative, frank and willing to answer questions.

As near as he could recall, DOIHARA told the witness that apparently because of Japan's action there was little choice but to continue an offensive. After the initial step, it would be foolish to hope the attack on Pouting would end Japan's action against China. * The original incident, though regrettable, had aroused the Japanese to the point where further action would have to be taken. He told the witness that the national government would continue to resist, and that the only alternative was for the Japanese to withdraw. It did not appear that such action would be taken by those in command. When asked how far he believed Japan would have to advance, DOIHARA answered that Japan had no way but to continue to attack because Chinese territory was boundless and it was impossible for him to state how far they would have to go. There were many difficulties, and no hasty judgment could be formed. He did state that the Chinese public, as distinguished from enemies. To consider them such would be a great mistake.

28692 He had placed rigid discipline on his troops regarding the treatment of Chinese civilians. * He had warned against harassing the Chinese public or non-belligerents, and in time of battle his subordinates were not to injure the Chinese public's feelings. It was his policy to punish strictly those who conducted themselves so as to harass the people under any situation not absolutely necessary and to safeguard their own lives and property. This policy would be put into practice within his jurisdiction because Japan should never cause the Chinese people to become her enemy.

DOIHARA was deeply worried about the Sino-Japanese war and displayed his feelings. He was genuinely concerned over the damage that would result to the Chinese public. The witness was particularly impressed that DOIHARA displayed no pleasure in the victorious attack on Pouting, but he observed DOIHARA's deep worry about the future.

28693 After the interview, the witness felt he had come closer in touch with the real nature of the war than before * and the interview had a profound effect upon the witness' understanding of Sino-Japanese relations. After that the witness was not attached to DOIHARA's unit but he had friends who were and while he did not question DOIHARA's sincerity he was interested to see if he did continue the policies he had outlined. His friends who were with DOIHARA verified that not only did he carry out the policy but was so strict in carrying it out that there was often dissatisfaction among his troops who openly stated that DOIHARA loved the Chinese more than he did his own soldiers. This dissatisfaction was generally contributed to the strict control DOIHARA exercised with reference to the treatment of noncombatants.

28694 * DOIHARA's strictness became widely known among the Chinese public and it is also a fact that they would remain in their homes when DOIHARA advanced into their territory. As a result of that treatment, it was also true that the Chinese supplied provisions and labor and otherwise assisted DOIHARA's unit.

There was no cross-examination of the witness.

28701

* The affidavit stated that the witness served as a staff officer of the 5th Division from May 1932 to July 1934 and DOIHARA was Commander of the 9th Brigade under that Division. After the outbreak of the China Incident, the witness was a staff officer in the 1st Army Corps, remaining there until November 1938. In the meantime, DOIHARA commanded the 14th Division under the 1st Army Corps. From 15 April to 12 June 1938, while the witness was staff officer of the 1st Army Corps, * the 14th Division carried out operations simultaneously with the battle of Hsuechow. In the course of these operations, the witness was attached as a 14th Division Staff Officer additionally. Serving on DOIHARA's staff and receiving training from him during operations, he performed his duties while fierce fighting went on.

28702

Early in 1938 the 1st Corps Headquarters was in Shihkiachwang (Shihmen) and the 14th Division Headquarters in Sinsiang. The witness was chiefly engaged in supply, and the Supply Unit was temporarily attached to the 14th Division in Sinsiang. Officers who had been relieved of their duties or who had served their time in the garrison area of the 14th Division * who had returned to the 1st Corps told the witness that DOIHARA had such concern over the protection of the Chinese masses that he always issued strict orders. He saw to it that his orders were carried out and all members of the division observed them.

Inhabitants of regions occupied by the DOIHARA Division, who had taken refuge elsewhere, would return in a day or two and peacefully resume their work. DOIHARA's love toward his subordinates was such that the officers and men of supply units used to say, "Chinese civilians first, then the 14th Division, then the units attached to the 1st Corps."

Early in May 1938, to cross the Yellow River, the Division of the witness had to leave Sinsiang, where they were to begin preparations for the crossing. The people of Sinsiang had such confidence in DOIHARA * that they could not leave without bidding farewell to the Business Club President and all others, but a river crossing required secrecy and to tell them they were moving eastward would have revealed the movements. Therefore, the witness told the President that they were moving west. Thereupon, the President said he was sorry to part from DOIHARA, whom he loved and admired, and that the Sinsiang inhabitants would like to give a farewell banquet in his honor. The witness had to dissuade him from this because it would reveal movements.

On May 5, 1938 Division Headquarters started by train from a station outside Sinsiang. Once the people gave DOIHARA a gift in praise of his high moral character.

On 11 May 1938 in the face of the enemy, the 14th Division under DOIHARA crossed the Yellow River and took the enemy by surprise, dealing them a severe blow. The following day a chase started and that evening Chinese refugees were seen fleeing across a vast plain and taking cover in the barley fields. The witness, who was riding a horse immediately behind DOIHARA, saw DOIHARA order his interpreter to tell the Chinese that the Japanese had not the slightest intention of attacking anyone of the Chinese forces. The people at large should return home and resume work. Also DOIHARA told refugees and Chinese to return. * Although they fled at first from their homes, relying upon these words they returned afterward to their villages and served tea and refreshments to the officers and men.

On 5 June the Division attacked the Walled City of Kaifeng. Before launching an attack it was customary for them to be given a large scale map on which were marked churches, hospitals, and establishments which were the property of the U.S., Britain, France, etc. They had strict orders not to direct shell fire or launch attack against them. In Kaifeng were buildings belonging to the U.S. and Britain and DOIHARA stressed repeatedly to his men and gave orders that they were to be cautious in their assault,

On 5 June Kaifeng was captured. One force mopped up enemy ramparts in the city * while others pursued the enemy toward Chungmow. On 6 June, DOIHARA with his staff inspected the city lest looting and other aqts should be committed. All the inhabitants had fled because of the bombardment. When DOIHARA saw a Japanese soldier coming out of a Chinese house with a chicken, he spoke to him, telling him he should not have looted, disobeying instructions. He ordered him to return it at once. DOIHARA set good examples and even the rank and file came to observe his instructions. The DOIHARA Unit became the equivalent of doing no harm to Chinese civilians. It became known to the refugees that the DOIHARA Unit had captured Kaifeng and two days later they returned to work.

When the TOSHIMA Brigade pursued * the enemy to the vicinity of Chungmow, the enemy broke open the Yellow River embankment, flooding the district. Japanese Army Engineers engaged in rescue work and many Chinese civilians suffered damages. Rescued Chinese expressed their thanks. The commander of the engineers was praised by DOIHARA for these rescue operations.

While the Division went out to intercept the Lunghai Railway, they often saw distant fires at night. On such occasions, DOIHARA urged the witness to take all precautions lest Chinese houses be burned. He told the witness to warn subordinates to put fires out when they left camping grounds. DOIHARA enforced strict discipline in regard to fire and not a single house was burned in the Division's operational and garrison area.

* The affidavit stated that at the time of the Nomonhan Incident he was a staff officer of the Kwantung Army. The witness could state as a positive fact that DOIHARA was in no manner concerned with the Nomonhan Incident. He was Attache to the General Staff in June 1938 and Commander of the 5th Army 19 May 1939, and held that post until he was Supreme War Councillor in September 1939. The Nomonhan Incident occurred 12 May 1938, just a few days before DOIHARA became Commander of the 5th Army. The 5th Army Headquarters was the Tung-an in Eastern Manchuria and its duty was the defense of that area.

* The witness knew that the creation of the 5th Army had nothing to do with the Nomonhan Incident. The 5th Army's units did not participate in any manner in that Incident which was going on and continued on for a short time after DOIHARA's appointment. He knew that DOIHARA was never transferred to an area that had any connection with the Nomonhan Incident but confined his duties to defense in the Tung-an area.

Confusion may have arisen as to the 5th Army participation in the Incident because after it developed, the Kwantung Army Commander withdrew units from each army in Manchuria, adding them to the 6th Army's 23rd Division which was fighting at Nomonhan. Such units were taken from the 5th Army, as well as others, but DOIHARA was not officially concerned in any manner with the withdrawal of these units and could not have issued orders for such withdrawal.

* Toward the end of the Incident, the 5th Army's 3rd Cavalry Brigade was withdrawn to add to the Nomonhan military strength, but before this unit could be added the Incident was concluded and the Brigade never participated. CROSS-EXAMINATION BY COLONEL IVANOV

The witness stated that two new armies, the 5th and 6th, were formed in the Kwantung Army in 1939. He knew that DOIHARA was appointed the first commander of the 5th Army seven days after hostilities at Nomonhan had begun.

- 28714 * He knew that military operations in the Nomonhan Area continued for four months in 1939, during which time DOIHARA was Commander of the 5th Army in Manchuria. He recalled that DOIHARA left his post in September 1939 and in September 1940. Operational command of the Nomonhan area was the responsibility of the Kwantung Army Commanding General. If units of the 5th Army were to be dispatched to the fighting, that would mean the transfer of such units to the command of other army units. This meant that * 28715 responsibility did not rest with the Commander of the 5th Army but with the Commanding General of the Kwantung Army. The 5th Army did not participate in the fighting at Nomonhan.

28718 * The 5th Army was in charge of the defense of Manchuria's eastern borders; When asked if the Kwantung Army informed DOIHARA of these tasks, the witness stated that as far as operational plans were concerned, he believed a draft was shown by the Kwantung Army Commander. DOIHARA knew of these plans so far as they concerned the 5th Army.

28719 The witness stated he knew of the contents of the operations plan for a war against the USSR in 1939, and of the tasks under this plan allotted to the 5th Army. * The witness was asked if this plan provided for operations aimed at seizing the Soviet maritime province, and whether or not the 5th Army was to take part. He stated that among the duties of the commanders of the armies under the control of the Kwantung Army * there had to be a distinction between those in time of war and in time of peace. Wartime duties were not given until after the actual outbreak of war.

28720 When asked if it was not the task of the 5th Army to take part in the operations for the seizure of the Soviet maritime province, he stated that was not so. The primary duty of the 5th Army was always defense, and that would be its first concern and first action. But, in considering defense, there is always the possibility of * offensive defense. The offensive action stemmed from the thought of an offensive defense.

28721 The witness was not in charge of war plans against the USSR while he was a staff officer, but he did have to do with strategic or operational plans.

28722 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 28723 3186 as his affidavit. * The witness stated that among his various positions during the recent war, he was staff officer of the 7th Area Army from July 1944 until April, 1945. The 7th Area Army was organized 15 April, 1944, under the Southern General Army, and its first commander was the accused DOIHARA, who held this post from April 1944 to April, 1945, when it was taken over by ITAGAKI.

Command jurisdiction of the 7th Army was Malaya, Sumatra, Java, and British Borneo. Borneo was divided into British and Dutch areas. At first the army was charged with preserving peace in the British area and the navy with that in the Dutch area. The 24th Army had no jurisdiction whatsoever over the latter area. The Borneo garrison, a part of the 7th Army, was the unit responsible.

28724 * Repeated attacks in New Guinea by Allied forces increased alarm, and in fact most parts of New Guinea were conquered. Need for general reorganization became urgent, and in August, 1944, the Borneo Garrison was reorganized into the 37th Army and withdrawn from under the command of the 7th Army. The 7th Army commander had no further responsibility, and no command over its operations. This move resulted in the removal of all things relating to British Borneo from 7th Army command as of August 1944.

28725 * At no time was any POW camp within the jurisdiction of the 7th Army. They were always under the control of the Southern Army. The commander of the Southern Army, TERAUCHI, controlled the administration of the camps and placed responsibility upon the camp commanders. In areas such as the territorial jurisdiction covered by the 7th Army, intermediate commanders had no responsibility in the administration of POWs and were not authorized to and could not issue any orders concerning them. Their responsibility was functional and not administrative.
 Their duty was limited to security to guard POW camps, or take measures to safeguard them from the enemy. They had no voice in camp administration or treatment of POWs.

In the chain of security command, there is first the Commander of the Southern Army, the Commander of the Area Army, and the Commander of a subordinate army or garrison. An intermediate commander would be the army commander, and not the army area commander. The chart which he incorporated as a part of his affidavit showing command and security channels depicts this.

28727 Full responsibility for administration and treatment of POWs was under the Southern Army Commander. Security of POW camps was the responsibility of the army or garrison commander, and the army area commander had no responsibility or authority whatsoever. The Southern Army Commander, in addition to reserving direct administration and treatment of POWs, also reserved ship transportation and naval and army aerial units. These units and services even located within the territorial jurisdiction of an area army, were not subject to any command function exercised by the commander of the area army.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY COLONEL MORNANE.

28728 The witness stated that his rank was lieutenant colonel when he was staff officer of the 7th Area Army, which had headquarters at Singapore. He remembered that on 23 October, 1944, as result of an agreement between army and navy authorities, command of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands went from the navy to the 29th Army, which was under the 7th District Army. It did not happen that by a similar agreement the army became responsible for the whole of Borneo. * In August, 1944, the defense of Borneo came under the jurisdiction of the Southern Army, but he knew nothing of what happened after that.

28729 It was suggested to the witness that the 37th Army was not formed until 12 October, but the witness stated that according to his recollection it was formed in August 1944, under the Southern Army. It was suggested to the witness that the 7th Army was formed on 27 March, but he stated he believed it was the 15th April, 1944. The district army was formed before he became a member of its staff, and he was relying on records since as to the formation of that army. * He had seen these records within the last three months, at 7th Army Headquarters in Singapore. Upon being re-asked if he had seen any of these records within the last three months, he stated he had not.

28730 If the Central Liaison Office said the army was formed on 27 March, he would not be in a position to deny it. In regard to the normal functions of an area army in relation to the armies under it, * the area commander has power to give orders in relation to education, personnel, operations, supplies, etc. The area army does not have any troops apart from headquarters troops. The area commander would be directly responsible to the general army commander.

28732 * He was asked if there were any other cases where an army commander was directly responsible to the commander of the general army and not to the army area commander, and he stated POW camps had a special chain of command, and he knew of no other case. As far as administrative functions were concerned, the POW camp at Rangoon was not under the Burma area army. The Burma area army was the same as that of the 7th area army and other armies. To the witness was read a statement from article 3 of the ordinance of POW camps of December 23, 1941, saying that POW camps shall be administered by a commander of an army * or garrison commander under the general supervision of the War Minister. He was asked to reconcile the practice of the Southern Army Commander with regard to POWs with that article. The witness stated that provision applied to POW camps in the Japanese homeland. As for POW camps overseas, he believed it should be interpreted that the commander of the Southern Army was the one referred to.

28738 * The witness identified exhibit 3188 as his affidavit, and after corrections verified it. The affidavit 28741 stated that the witness * became acquainted with DOIHARA in 1934, when he was Chief of the Special Service Organ in Mukden. At that time the witness was a staff officer of the Kwantung Army, holding that post from August 1934 to March 1936. During this period his work often brought him in contact with DOIHARA, and he became familiar with the methods he used and the administration of his official affairs, and became intimately acquainted with him, 28742 * learning his viewpoints with reference to Japan-Chinese relations.

28743 When DOIHARA was Inspector General of the Air Force, the witness served under him as Chief of the General Affairs Section, and DOIHARA was his immediate superior. During this time he became familiar with the duties and responsibilities of the Inspector General of the Air Force. * He could state that the Inspector General was under the command of the Emperor and subordinate only to the War Minister. The Inspector General was in charge primarily of technical education. Although the Chief of Army Air Command Headquarters was subordinate to the War Minister regarding maintenance, supply, etc., neither had authority to participate or advise on operational matters. They were precluded from participating in the preparation of any operational mission with reference to armed forces in the field or in war. The Inspector General and the Chief of Army Air Force Command Headquarters were two distinct posts. As Inspector General, DOIHARA was under the command of the Emperor directly.

28744 As Chief of the Army Air Command Headquarters, the chain of command went from the Emperor * through the War Ministry, then to General DOIHARA. In this position he did have duties with reference to air corps supply, but did not participate in planning operational matters.

When DOIHARA was Inspector General of Military Education, the witness did not serve under him, but was fully acquainted with his office's operations and responsibilities. The Inspector General of Military Education was responsible for the administration of technical and army service schools generally and educational matter, with the exception of technical matters pertaining to aviation.

The witness was fully acquainted with the Supreme War Council, of which DOIHARA was once a member. The Council is more of an honorary position than an integral part of military command. It was merely a military inquiry organ * to respond to the Emperor's questions on important military problems. It had little or no political authority and was an organ receiving reports of general affairs, and the military situation from various army leaders.

While DOIHARA was Chief of the Air Command, the witness knew of occasions when he was required to deal with civilian aircraft industry problems with political significance. When these matters came up, DOIHARA merely clarified the army's position and left concrete matters in the hands of the industrialists and refused to engage in politics with them. The witness never knew DOIHARA to offer them a hand for the sake of political artifice, but he remained aloof to the extreme.

* DOIHARA became Inspector General of the Air Forces and Chief of the Army Air Command Headquarters six months before the outbreak of the Pacific War, at which time the witness was his assistant as head of the General Affairs Section. From discussions with DOIHARA, the witness knew that he had scarcely any knowledge up to the war's outbreak of the essential problems of political and military significance in the country. The witness could say this, because just before the war's outbreak when he asked DOIHARA a few questions concerning the strained and gloomy prospect, DOIHARA had not the slightest idea as to the import of the witness' questions. Instead, he asked the witness what it was all about. After the discussion, DOIHARA ordered him to get information from the War Ministry and General Staff Headquarters, so he would have the necessary knowledge to discharge his duties.

 witness was Chief of Staff to DOIHARA at the time he was his policies and system for the control of POWs in the Tokyo area. At the end of the war the witness was a 28752 The main function of the Eastern Area Army was the defense of Tokyo and adjacent territory. * As its commanding general, DOIHARA had under him several divisions, air defense units, hospitals, and others. There were literally hundreds of separate units under his command.

28753 There was a special arrangement regarding the handling of POW detachments in the main islands in Japan.
 There had been established to deal with POW affairs the POW Information Bureau and the POW Control Bureau. The chief of both was the same person, and both were directly under the War Minister. All complaints from foreign nations and others were routed to the Chief of the Information Bureau. There was also an area office in Tokyo for the centralized control of POW detachments within the jurisdiction of the Eastern Area Army. The main office was in the chain of command under the Eastern Army Commander. There were about twenty branches and detachments, with about 4,000 prisoners. * The Control and Information Bureaus were not connected with the command of the Eastern Army, whose commander had no control over them, but in accordance with the War Minister's orders or upon his own initiative the Chief of the Bureaus directed the chiefs of the POW camps in regard to control of POWs.

He or his subordinates often visited the various branches to observe and inspect and give instructions to them. The Eastern Army Commander was responsible for the control and administration of POWs within his jurisdiction, but in actual practice the activities of the Control and

The witness knew that despite his many duties, DOIHARA was interested in the welfare of POWs, and visited the camps under his control. On a visit to the Naoetsu camp, DOIHARA learned there was not adequate skilled medical care and that in an emergency the camp had to depend upon the services of doctors from cities as far away as Shibata. Despite there being many units and detachments of the army and many civilian communities as devoid of medical attention as this POW camp, DOIHARA managed to make special arrangements to provide the camp with medical care by army physicians at the base hospital at Takata, nearby.

28766 They must recognize that England, after her competition into the Caucasus after the Russian revolution, desired to hold on to Baku's oil. * It was necessary to take advantage of this fact. * The witness identified exhibit 3192 as his affidavit and verified it. * The affidavit stated that the witness knew the accused HASHIMOTO very well. In August, 1937, when HASHIMOTO became Commander of the 13th Field Heavy Artillery Regiment, the witness was a battalion commander under him. From that time until he returned to Japan from China in April, 1939, the witness was always with him.

When he arrived about eight miles west of Wuhu on 11 December, 1937, HASHIMOTO received an order from Commander YANAGAWA and returned to Wuhu immediately. This order read that HASHIMOTO should command his regiment together with an artillery and an infantry battalion and attack near Wuhu, ships carrying Chinese soldiers and sailing up the Yangtze. That order came about 2 a. m.

HASHIMOTO's order to the witness was that he should command his unit, together with an artillery battalion, and occupy the wharf of Wuhu and attack the fleeing Chinese fleet. This order was about 5 a. m. On HASHIMOTO's orders, lieutenant NAKAMURA was to advance to a point about a thousand meters downstream and wave a handkerchief when he saw the fleeing ships by telescope. When the witness saw this handkerchief he was to fire upon the ships.

28771

While it was still before dawn and not yet light, NAKAMURA waved the handkerchief. The witness saw by telescope five or six ships gathered, anchored about fifty meters apart. He instantly began firing at about 4,000 meters. Even before dawn, it was difficult to see the ships clearly because of deep fog. He could only discern ships loaded with Chinese soldiers. After twenty or thirty shells had been fired, one of the ships put out a black smoke screen. Under cover of the screen, one ship sailed toward them. * Seeing it coming, they thought it was about to surrender and stopped the shelling. As the ship neared its hull became clear, and at 3,000 meters it was discovered not to be a Chinese Army ship. After ceasing fire and while waiting for the ship to reach the wharf, they found by its flag that it was British and had received two direct hits. Upon being asked why they had fired, HASHIMOTO replied that they had done so because the ships were loaded with Chinese soldiers. They then asked why we fired on British ships. HASHIMOTO answered that due to the heavy fog they could not see that they were British ships.

* One death had occurred from the shelling, and the British captain asked them to attend the funeral service. They sent one representative. This British ship was the "Ladybird", and the witness later learned that the incident was taken up through diplomatic negotiations. As to its details, he knew nothing.

HASHIMOTO and his forces had no connection with the sinking of the "Panay", and never saw it. The HASHIMOTO force was stopped at Wuhu, near Nanking, shortly after Nanking's fall. This force was ordered to Hangchow and never participated on the attack of Nanking, nor entered it. Neither did the HASHIMOTO force attack Hangchow or enter its vicinity, nor did that force attack or enter Canton.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. TAVENNER.

* The witness stated that the shelling of the "Ladybird" occurred about 37 miles north of Nanking at about 9 o'clock. Beyond the orders to NAKAMURA to advance to a point 2,000 meters down the river from the witness' battery, no other orders were given NAKAMURA. After assuming his post, NAKAMURA was about two thousand, four or five hundred meters from the Ladybird.

* The witness was asked if he had seen a handkerchief dropped by NAKAMURA 2,000 meters away if there was any knowledge which would have prevented him from discerning a flag on a battleship 2,500 meters away, and the witness stated that there was a fog. NAKAMURA gave no report when he dropped the handkerchief or made any signal to indicate this was a ship of a third power. It was not true that he failed to give such warning because it was understood all the time that the ship of a foreign power would be fired upon if observed.

It was pointed out to the witness that his affidavit stated that it was still before dawn and not yet light, when he saw NAKAMURA wave the handkerchief through the telescope. The witness stated that if it were a distance of about 2,000 meters, the mist over the land was comparatively lighter.

28780 * The witness did not know whether General YANAGAWA was still living. When asked why, since the flag of a ship is larger than a handkerchief, the handkerchief and not the flag was seen, the witness stated that the handkerchief was waved at a distance of 2,000 meters, but the ship was at least 4,000 away. Furthermore, the mist from the land was lighter than that from the water.

28781 * According to the witness' recollection, the "Ladybird" was a gunboat.

The purpose of the Great Japan Youth Party were to abolish established parties and accomplish domestic reform. Since public feeling at that time was that these parties and the Zaibatsu had appropriated to themselves the government so that extreme corruption was everywhere and the only ones whom the public could trust were the military and judiciary. The Youth Party absolutely did not have aggressive war as its object. Its membership never reached 20,000 * and never included a military man on the active list or an influential government official. Its expenses were met by fees paid in by the members and it never received financial aid from the military or any other source.

The "Taisho Dai Ni" the official news organ was not circulated outside its membership. The Great Japan Youth Party (Deinihon Sekiseikai), a thought organization, was formed on the dissolution of the Youth Party out of a portion of the latter's membership. The Loyalty Society had as its objects the guidance of Japanese Youth thought and the encouragement of increasing rice production. Aggressive war was no part of the society's objectives.

Its membership was about 5000 and never included a military man on the active list nor any influential government official. * Its expenses were met by fees charged its members and there was no outside financial aid. The Loyalty Party took over the news organ of the Youth Party (Dainihon Seinento). After the transfer of management to the Loyalty Party efforts were made to publish articles concerning increasing rice production. There was no circulation of the news organ outside the membership. The witness stated he had not been connected with the IRRRA.

28791 * The accused identified and verified Exhibit 3195 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the accused began army services in December 1911. In August 1934 he was a colonel and became commander of a field artillery regiment and was transferred to the reserve in August 1936.

He was called to the colors in August 1937 and sent to North and Middle China as an artillery regiment commander until April 1939 when he again went to the reserve list. Except for these two periods of active duty, the accused had never been in government service and was at all other times an ordinary civilian. He had never occupied any official position of sufficient importance to have entitled him to take part in any planning, preparing, or conspiring with relation to the Manchurian Incident, China Incident, or the Pacific war.

28792 Nor did he participate in any of these. He had never been on friendly terms with any of the defendants. At the time of the October Incident, he was severely reprimanded by ARAKI and confined by order of MINAMI. Certain named publications * and essays which appeared in the "Taiyo Dai Nippon" were all written and published when he was an ordinary civilian. In them he described only his personal opinions and they represented no plan. While a civilian he had made public speeches but they conveyed only personal convictions arrived at independently and not through any plan or conspiracy with others.

28793 In September, 1927 the accused was appointed military attache to the Embassy in Turkey and served there until June 1930. Nov. 15 1929 he sent to Deputy Chief of Staff OKAMOTO a report entitled "Situation in the Caucasus and Its Strategic Utilization". This report was made in the course of his duties. In it the phrase "Subject to change, of course, with the then existing world situation" and "in case trouble should arise between Russia and Japan" should be interpreted to mean that Japan's attitude had to be altered in accordance with international relations * and if unfortunately war should break out with Russia. From this report and examination of other evidence it was obvious that he never plotted, prepared or conspired to wage aggressive war against Russia.

In October 1930 he inaugurated, with a view to national reform, a study and discussion group called "SAKURAKAI" or Cherry Blossom Society whose members consisted of officers under the rank of Lt. Col. The society was not secret and had no regulations and no fees were charged. It had no connection with the Kwantung Army or its officers. Discussions were not held relative to the Manchurian problem nor did it have any connection with the Manchurian Incident.

He did not form any research group on Manchu-Mongolia issues nor join or back incognito any such groups. He had never even heard of the existence of such groups. In March 1931 he participated in the March Incident plotted by OKAWA * with the aim of reorganizing the cabinet headed by Gen. UGAKI. The plan was not realized because of UGAKI's disapproval. The Incident was not linked with the Manchurian Incident.

* The accused thought up the October Incident in October 1931 to bring about a cabinet headed by ARAKI for national reform and urged ARAKI to accept. ARAKI severely reprimanded the accused who was arrested on the orders of War Minister MINAMI. After twentyfive days confinement he was relegated to the post of regimental officer. This Incident had no connection with the Manchurian Incident. It was first thought of in the course of a conversation with Capt. CHO, Isamu in the first part of October 1931 after CHO returned from Peking. The plan never materialized and no civilians joined in it. The accused KOISO was not related in any way to the Incident.

The accused had never had a chance to talk to TANAKA, Ryukichi concerning the Manchuria Incident. In August, 1934, the accused commanded a military regiment at Michima City. He knew nothing of the meeting sponsored by SUZUKI, Takashi at the Akebonoso restaurant. He had never been there and did not know its whereabouts.

* In April 1931 as Chief of the Russian section of the 2nd Dept. of the General Staff at the meeting for Estimation of Situation he advanced the opinion that Headquarters should recommend that the government take a firm attitude toward settling the Manchurian question. At the time of the Marco Polo Bridge Incident, July 1937 he was living in Tokyo as reserve officer on inactive duty and had nothing to do with it. While at the front, pursuant to order of Gen. YANAGAWA the accused at Wuhu fired on ships fleeing from Nanking which were carrying retreating Chinese soldiers. The British Gun Boat "LADY BIRD" which was among the Chinese ships, was struck and an incident created. The fact that the shooting was a mistake due to dense fog which made him take it for a Chinese ship was brought to light and the accused was set free from responsibility. He had nothing to do with the PANAI Incident.

* Neither he nor the officers under his command had ever been at Nanking, Hankow or Canton. He had never ill-treated POWS nor committed inhuman acts against others. He had never permitted those under him to do such acts. He had never been in a position where he could have performed such acts. After leaving active service he founded in October 1936 for national reform the Great Japan Youth Party of which no soldier on active duty nor any distinguished persons were members. It was supported by one yen entrance fee and one yen annual membership fee, paid in by less than 20,000 members. It was never subsidized by the army or from any other quarter. It did not aim at aggressive war.

After its dissolution in October 1940, the accused established the Great Japan Loyalty Society, consisting of some members of the former. No soldiers on active duty nor distinguished personages were members and it was maintained by about 5000 members entrance fees of two yen each and an annual fee of one yea. 28799

*The witness stated that he had attended a meeting in 1929 of the Japanese military attaches in Berlin which MATSUI also attended. When asked if either he or MATSUI made any plans or decisions against the USSR, the accused stated that no decisions were made at that time. The meeting was in April 1929. The military attaches received an invitation saying that since MATSUI, former head of the Second Dept of the General Staff was coming to Europe it would be a good idea to have a meeting at Berlin attended by all European * attaches. At the meeting MATSUI talked to them on the situation at home while they talked to MATSUI about the situation in the countries in which they were stationed. That was all that transpired.

* The accused stated that he was chief of the Russian section before he became acquainted with OKAWA and met him off and on while holding that position. He did not know whether OKAWA was engaged in propaganda work or not but he did know that he made speeches on several occasions. Since he had only heard his speech on one occasion he did not know how many hundreds of speeches OKAWA may have made.

28806

* He did not know that OKAWA was at that time engaged in fomenting the Japanese for the so-called Manchurian Incident. He had never talked to OKAWA on political subjects and met him only in restaurants, although there was no reason why politics could not be discussed in restaurants. He had never talked with OKAWA on specific political questions. He had often talked with him on political corruption in Japan. He had talked to him about fomenting a disturbance in Tokyo.

28807

* He participated with OKAWA in the March Incident. The accused KOISO was concerned in it as OKAWA was given bombs by the accused and KOISO took them away.* OKAWA never told the accused that he advocated reformation of the government to settle the Manchurian problem. He did not know that that was the doctrine OKAWA stood for and which he preached. The accused could hardly believe that OKAWA had such power and ability that he could stir up the people and rouse dissatisfaction to such an extent that the army fell in line with him.

28808

During the accused's term in the General Staff it was far from the facts that after the dissatisfaction of the people became so great after OKAWA's propaganda missions, even the General Staff began to send out lecturers.

* The suggestions the accused made about settling the Manchurian problem were made at the occasion of a conference on the estimate of the situation, in April 1931. At that time repeated Incidents were breaking out in Manchuria threatening Japanese lives and property. Their right to live and engage in business and railway rights were threatened. The foreign office protested only once and tried to settle the Incidents on the spot. The incidents amounted to over three hundred. The accused advocated that it was the General Staff's duty to strongly urge the government to take firm line toward the Central Government of China and carry out negotiations firmly.

He said that positive action must be taken * to settle these questions. His plan with OKAWA to stir up a mass demonstration was altogether separate from the Manchurian question.

OKAWA once told him that he had a plan to make UGAKI premier and through him reform the corrupted political parties. To this proposition HASHIMOTO said he was in complete agreement. They should go ahead. But if OKAWA wanted to make UGAKI premier he must first find out what UGAKI thinks of the plan. He told OKAWA he had better go to UGAKI and ask him. OKAWA returned and said that after talking with him UGAKI was not reluctant. In order to carry it out a disturbance must be created in Tokyo.

*He asked HASHIMOTO if he had bombs which would make some kind of noise. The accused gave OKAWA such bombs * but two or three days later UGAKI said he had no such desire and was against the whole thing. Thereupon the plan fell flat. When asked if it was the purpose to stir up this demonstration so that martial law would be declared and the army put in control of the government, the accused stated he had nothing to do with the plans after giving the bombs to OKAWA.

He had not gone to OKAWA and advised him that the upper class of the army was burning with indignation at the Diet and that the Diet should be crushed. All OKAWA told him was that UGAKI seemed willing to go on with the think and asked him for bombs. When asked if his position was that he meekly followed the dictates of OKAWA, the accused replied that OKAWA thought up the plan, that he agreed to it and gave him the bombs.

*After giving the bombs he had nothing further to do with it, and did not know anything more. He did not think the plan involved such a big thing as having the army called out. He believed that Vice Chief of Staff NINOMIYA knew about the plan. He did not know whether Gen. TATEKAWA was a party to the scheme.

OKAWA asked him for paper bombs and he had difficulty in finding them so he consulted TATEKAWA about the problem and TATEKAWA told him he would give him a letter of introduction to the Infantry School Commandant and thereupon the accused obtained the bombs there. That was the extent of TATEKAWA's participation.

28813 *TATEKAWA was chief of the First Dept of the General Staff which dealt with operations. Gen. NAGATA was not involved. When asked about his saying it was a very small affair and not agreeing that the very top notch ranking officers of the Japanese army were involved, the accused stated the question depended on the meaning of the term "involved". He did not think it could be said that it went as far as that the upper crust of the army was involved.

The bombs were taken away from him by an officer and another one wrote him a letter of introduction when he had trouble in obtaining the bombs. That is as far as the matter went and he did not think he could say they were connected with the incident.

28814 * The accused KOISO took the bombs which he had given to OKAWA. The accused KOISO was chief of the Military Affairs Bureau.

The witness was quoted part of OKAWA's testimony at his trial in 1934 in which OKAWA stated that KOISO taking charge of everything told him that since there was danger of discovery if too many fussed about it they should pretend to have it suspended on the surface and that OKAWA should represent the civilians and KOISO the army. The accused stated he did not recall this and did not believe those were the facts. He had not heard * OKAWA testify that their idea was to set up a new political power and form a cabinet centering around the army.

28815 The accused stated he was not present at such trial. He stated he was the originator of the October Incident which occurred shortly after the Manchurian Incident but OKAWA did not assist him. In the March Incident OKAWA and the accused participated. However, the accused began to feel that if civilians were let in on such plots matters were apt to leak out and it would be difficult to carry them out. They came to the decision not to let civilians in on their plans.

28817 *The witness was handed excerpts from his interrogations. He was asked what official position he held with the Sakura Kei and he stated that the Sakura Kei had no chairman and the leading members were called sponsors. 28818 In October 1930 Sakura Kai commenced its researches. It was not given that name until April 1931. He controlled the society from October 1930 to the end of November 1931. During that time he belonged to no other society. The next society he formed was in 1936 after * he had been relegated to the reserves. This society was the Great Japan Youth Party. He belonged to no societies between 1931 and 1936. He organized the Youth Party on Oct. 17 1936 and was its head until October 1940.

In October 1940 the Youth Party was reorganized as the Great Japan Loyalty Society and he was president until September, 1944.

28819 The accused was asked to examine a part of his interrogation and to state whether he made the answered attributed there. He stated there was a big error in the text. The question in the interrogation was if he had admitted certain plots, the last being whether he denied knowledge of complicity in the February 26 affair. His reply was that was correct meant that he had nothing to do with the February 1926 affair.

28820 * The first part of the question reads that the way it stood he admitted plotting with TATEKAWA, KOISO, NINOMIYA, SUGIYAMA and OKAWA to bring about the March and October Incidents. When his answer was taken in conjunction with the question as a whole it would seem as if he was accusing them of plotting with him in the October Incident but he had no such intention. If the questions before this question were read it would be found that a question was asked who was connected with the March and October Incidents, and it follows that TATEKAWA, KOISO, NINOMIYA, SUGIYAMA and OKAWA had nothing to do with the October Incident. The October Incident involved himself alone.

26821 The witness stated that subject to that exception the answers attributed were correct. (The questions and answers referred to begin with the fourth line at top of page 15676 and extend to the seventh line from the bottom of the following page).

26822 *Another excerpt from his interrogation was shown the accused where he was asked under whose orders he acted when he shelled the LADY BIRD. He stated the phraseology might be somewhat different but there was no mistake in the meaning. He said this was on the understanding that reference was made only to the one question and 28824 Another excerpt from the interrogations (p.15675) was pointed out to the witness. * He was asked whether he made the answers attributed to him. With reference to the question whether he wanted to get the British out of this sphere, to which he answered ye, the accused stated he did not know exactly what the prosecutor meant by the question. Since he did not want to bother asking him he just got impatient and replied yes. When asked if he wanted to get Britain out of India, Philippines, China, Burma and Asia he stated he wished to get the British out of political domination of these areas. Asked if he meant to expel them by force, he stated there might be occasions when force might be necessary. But he was hoping this would not arise. He felt it would be fortunate if they would get out without the use of force. He was not thinking at the time of Japan immediately declaring war to get them out by force.

22825 * asked if he did not advocate it later the accused stated that the point of his argument in his writings was that the China Incident was still unsettled and the reason why was that Britain was backing China. Unless accounts were settled with Britain, the Incident would never be settled.

He preached to the members of his society which aggregated 20,000 people advocating an attack on the British and driving them out of Asia completely. His ideas were published in books published by himself of articles originally in the Taiyo Dai Nippon.

28829 * The accused stated that it was true that in an article entitled "Short-cutting Remarks on the Present Situation" which appeared in the 1 June, 1939 issue of Taiyo Dai Nippon, he had stated that the enemy that blocked their way to the south was England.

28830 The accused stated that on January 11, 1941, he had publicly declared that they should rise up resolutely. The time approached. They should begin a sweeping campaign against sympathizers of Britain and U. S. and at the same time start a movement to inspire moral support of the advance southward program through the country. It was true that he also stated publicly on 30 January, 1941, * that Japan embrace the continent of Asia and seize control of the Pacific, and that Britain and the Soviet would account for nothing. By these moves to the south and the seizure of the Pacific, he meant the seizure of Singapore, the extention of control to the Persian Gulf, establishment of naval bases in Australia, and extension of control to New Zealand, the Aleutians, and parts of the Soviet. He did not include the seizure of Burma. He advocated the inclusion of a part of the territory of the Soviet in Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere. He also included the Philippines and Hawaiian Islands.

28832 * When handed exhibit 2188, the interrogation of the accused, it was pointed out to the accused that part where he had said he published the book entitled "Inevitability of the Renovation", he agreed that book was published by him. * When he was asked whether that book was published while he was an officer of the IRAA, he replied "Yes". The contents of the essay were from essays published by the Japan Loyalty Society regarding the answers he gave to interrogations in exhibit 2188, which were pointed out to him. (Page 15695).

28835 * He stated that, generally speaking, with the exception of the interrogators opinions, he had written all the other things himself. The answers to the questions were true. When asked whether a question was asked and whether he answered as appeared in another part of the exhibit (page 15703), he stated that the interrogators interpretations of the contents of the essay were not correct, but what he personally wrote was. The accused stated that he had never said to TANAKA, Kiyoshi, on 4 August 1931, that about the middle of September a plot was about to be expected to be laid by the Kwantung Army, and that an opportunity of solving the Manchurian-Mongolian problem should be made and the country should be radically reformed. * As to the reform of the country, the brains of the General Staff had reached a thorough understanding.

* The witness was asked whether his being decorated, as shown by exhibit 105, in recognition of service during disturbances from 1931 to 1934, was for his contribution to the Manchurian Incident. He stated that he received it because he went to Manchuria as a member of the garrison there in 1932.

Counsel for KOISO.

Reference was made to exhibit 2188, to show that KOISO's part in the March Incident was merely to arrange to getting the bombs back to put an end to the plot.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. HAYASHI.

* Reference was made to the question of the prosecution asking the accused to confirm a question and answer pertaining to YANAGAWA's orders in exhibit 2188. The accused was asked if at any other time he had been asked by the prosecution questions regarding the "Ladybird". He stated that he had explained to the prosecutor that shelling of the gunboat was a mistake caused by thick mist. He gave additional explanation of the general situation by illustrating with a map.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MIYANO, Masatoshi,
by Mr. Kanzaki.

28867 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
3197 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that when 28869 * the Doolittle fliers were captured, two of their aircraft landed in China, one in the 13th Army Area and one in the 11th Army's. When this was reported, the order was given to the Chief of Staff, who asked to send them there immediately. All the fliers went to Tokyo together and came back together to China.

28870 * When they returned to China from Tokyo they were sent to Shanghai, at which time the order was that those fliers would be tried by the China Expeditionary Force, which did not mean China Expeditionary Force Headquarters.

One part of the order stated that a new military law for the treatment of fliers who raided Japanese areas had been created, and ordered them to post the new law.
The second part ordered that the fliers be tried by military court in accordance with this new law. This order was received 28 July 1942.

28871 The accused, HATA, was opposed to trying the fliers by military law, but wanted to treat them as POWs.
He stated this to his Chief of Staff, and the witness heard it because he was there at the time. * HATA stated it was his intention to give the fliers as generous consideration as possible. He said that if Tokyo insisted they be tried under the new military law, he would give them the lightest possible or most generous decision possible at the trial. If there were the slightest extenuating circumstances, he would consider them and pass as light a sentence as possible.

28872 * Since the China Expeditionary Force Headquarters had no military court and since Tokyo had sent the fliers to Shanghai, it was decided that the trial would be held by the 13th Army, whose headquarters were there.
Because HATA opposed trying the fliers by a military court, instead of ordering the 13th Army to proceed with the trial he ordered it to investigate whether or not the fliers would be tried by military law or could be treated as POWs.

* Neither HATA nor Headquarters received any answer from the 13th Army saying the evidence was not sufficient to hold a trial. When HATA expressed his intention of generous treatment to the fliers to his Chief of Staff, General USHIROGU, on the same day USHIROGU wrote Vice-Chief of the General Staff TANABE, stating HATA's intentions and asking the intentions of the Tokyo central authorities. As a result of this letter, Col. ARISUE came from Tokyo from the Chief of the General Staff and expressed the Chief's desires. These were to carry out the trial in a very strict manner, and that the punishment must be very strict. As a matter of fact, the Chief of the General Staff was expecting the death sentence. Further, it was the Chief's order that the decision be * forwarded to Tokyo for action. Execution of sentence should be stayed until the decision was forwarded from Tokyo, after action was taken there. After execution of sentence, no announcement was to be made by the Expeditionary Army Headquarters, but all announcements would be made by Imperial Headquarters.

HATA told ARISUE that because of the seriousness and importance of the matter, he wanted the Tokyo orders in writing. ARISUE reported that because of the seriousness of the matter, the Chief of Staff had decided to forward the orders not in writing, but by his special emissary, ARISUE, as this was the most reliable way of conveying them.

After HATA forwarded the orders to Tokyo that the fliers should be tried, he took no further action. He did not appoint the members of the tribunal, the prosecutor, * nor defense counsel. He made no appointment for any position with regard to the court or its members. This was not within his province. The trial was to be held by the 13th Army, which had its headquarters in Shanghai where the fliers had been delivered. With the arrival of ARISUE and the orders that they were to be tried by military court, which court did not exist in Expeditionary Force Headquarters in Nanking, control of all matters in the trial was out of the latter's hands. As Expeditionary Force Headquarters, they were now the channel through which all orders relative to the trial would pass and be forwarded to the 13th Army in Shanghai.

28876 HATA did not make known to the 13th Army his intention to treat the fliers generously, because he had already been told by ARISUE as to the intentions and desires of the General Staff. If this had not happened, HATA, as the highest military authority in China, could have expressed his desires, but since he had been told directly what the Tokyo authorities wanted he had to control his own desires as to their treatment or the demands to be made for sentence. HATA still did not give an hope of giving the fliers a light sentence because there was still the order to forward to Tokyo the trial decision. Also, execution of sentence was to be stayed until the Tokyo decision was made known. HATA thought Tokyo would consider the matter carefully and mitigate the sentence after minute consideration of the entire case. He put every expectation on the further decision in Tokyo.

28877 * Since it had been ordered that final decision would be made in Tokyo, HATA could not suggest to his superiors in Tokyo what they should do or offer his recommendations. His intentions to treat the fliers generously had been communicated to Tokyo through his Chief of Staff. That was why Tokyo had sent ARISUE to HATA to notify him of the intentions of the central authorities. HATA had good reason to expect, since he knew his intentions were known to the General Staff and since they had ordered execution of sentence stayed until further order should be given by Tokyo, they would mitigate the sentences. HATA was correct in this, because later decisions came from Tokyo saving the lives of five of the fliers.

When the fliers were tried by military court under the new military law promulgated by Tokyo and ordered posted in China, the court could find the fliers guilty or could acquit them. At no time was HATA authorized to exercise discretion in the setting up of the tribunal, its members, or recommendation to them of decision. With the arrival of ARISUE, the entire matter was in accordance with Tokyo orders as if the trial had been held there.

28879 The only difference was that Tokyo sent the fliers back to Shanghai * and ordered the trial held there. Everything, including the decision to hold the trial, the law under which the trial was to be held, review of sentence, time of execution of sentence, and even the announcement of the trial and its sentence and execution, were all handled by Tokyo. At no time were they permitted, or were they in a position to alter those decisions or offer recommendations. After the fliers were captured by the 11th and 13th Armies. Tokyo assumed entire control. They were ordered to Tokyo for questioning and examination and after that were returned to Shanghai, and the order arrived that the trial should be held in China.

28882 * The witness knew that on one day HATA told SAWADA, Commander of the 13th Army, that he did not know whether SAWADA liked the sentence of the tribunal or not, but that it was a matter beyond his control. * He could do nothing about it.

28883 The witness stated that he had seen exhibit 3131, that the words in that exhibit "With regard to this matter we request your approval" was not customary phraseology of the Japanese Army. He had not seen such phraseology. In his recollection, he thought the words "Something should hereby be done" was what was originally said.

28884 * The phrase "Your approval is requested" had the effect of an order by the Chief of the General Staff to the Commander of the China Expeditionary Force.

28884 * The witness stated that he thought the Doolittle fliers were captured on April 19 but headquarters did not know about them until the 21st.

28885 * Report was made to HATA's Headquarters by the Commanders of the 13th and 11th Armies but he did not have a copy of that report. The witness did not know whether the telegram ordering the fliers to Tokyo was addressed by the Vice Chief of the General Staff to the Expeditionary Forces' Chief of Staff, or from the Chief of the General Staff to HATA. At any rate, the purport was that it was from the Chief to HATA.

28886 The five fliers captured in the 11th Army's Area were sent two days after capture to Nanking where they were held for two days by the Kempei-Tai. The three fliers captured by the 13th Army were sent to Shanghai where they were held by the Kempei-Tai * and shortly sent to Tokyo. The witness had no recollection of the place the fliers were held in Nanking. The Military Prison there was under HATA's command.

28887 * HATA had jurisdiction over the gendarmerie units in China. He did not know that the fliers while kept in China were given the water cure, kicked and slapped. The witness did not know that Lieutenant Neilsen was handcuffed and hung on a peg until unconscious.

28888 * When asked if Lieutenant Hallmark was put on a stretching machine, the witness stated that such matters were outside the knowledge of General Headquarters then. He believed that HATA was also unaware of them and he believed that HATA had never heard of them until now. The fliers were under HATA's command until they were brought to Tokyo where they were kept three months. He thought they were brought to Tokyo about the 25th or 26th of April, but he did not know if they were kept in solitary confinement. Asked if they were not kept in leg irons, not permitted to wash or shave or undress, and were beaten, kicked and

28890 * When it was suggested to the witness that they were returned to China on 18 June 1942, he stated he might be mistaken in his recollection. The order directing that the fliers be tried by the China Expeditionary Force was issued by the Chief of the General Staff. The witness stated that they had the means to know how the fliers were treated in China but he did not think they were able to be informed of all the circumstances.

 Asked if they made any efforts to ascertain the facts, the witness stated that at that time operations were on, and only officers in charge of the investigation, etc. of the fliers were connected with the affair. General Headquarters did not know all the details.

 His section handled the business routine but did not engage directly in an investigation of that kind. With regard to the Doolittle Fliers' investigation, HATA ordered the 13th Army to take charge. The Army took charge and studied to find out whether conditions were sufficient to bring them before a military court. The 13th Army did not report the steps they took as a result of the investigation.

28892 * The rest of the order they received from Tokyo was that it should be applied generally to all fliers captured in China, but a verbal explanation was added to the effect that the ruling must be applied immediately to the Doolittle Fliers. HATA had a letter sent to the Chief of Staff expressing disagreement with the idea of placing the fliers on trial before a military court. After the Chief of Staff received the letter, the order was sent out by him that the fliers should be placed on trial. There was no room for HATA to make any alterations or take other steps concerning the trial.

28893 * When shown Exhibit 1992, Army Secret Order dispatched from the Vice War Minister KIMURA to all Chiefs of Staff, dated 28 July 1942, the witness was asked if that was the order he referred to as having been received from Tokyo, authorizing the trial by the Expeditionary Force. The witness stated it was not.

Page This document was prepared by the War Office, establishing a regulation as to handling the Doolittle fliers and was not concerned with placing them before a military court. What he had been talking about was an order sent by the Vice Chief in the name of the Chief, ordering the trial, which was sent by the General Staff to the Expeditionary Force.

28894 * The witness stated that the date of Exhibit 1992 was July 28. When shown Exhibit 1993, notification of matters pertaining to the treatment of crew members of raiding enemy planes, the witness was asked if this was one of the orders to which he referred. He stated it was, and that its date was July 28. He did not think there were any further orders, but verbal orders were sent from the Chief of Staff through ARISUYE. The order received by HATA directed the fliers to be tried by a military court.

28895 * When asked if HATA ordered the 13th Army to set up such a military tribunal, the witness said there were no such piece-meal orders. HATA's instructions to the 13th Army were in connection with the prospective trial of the fliers before a military court. The 13th Army was first to investigate to find out whether conditions would warrant a military trial. HATA also ordered the 13th Army that they must not conduct a military trial of the fliers pending orders from himself. *In the meantime he communicated to Tokyo that he was opposed to a military trial of them. He sent this communication toward the end of July.

28897 * Asked if HATA ordered the 13th Army to set up a military tribunal to try the fliers, the witness replied no. Such phraseology was not used. He first directed the 13th Army to prepare for a military trial and also communicated to Tokyo his personal objections. His objections not being accepted, he had no alternative but to issue an order for the conduct of the trial. HATA ordered the 13th Army Commander SAWADA to try the fliers under the provisions of an order issued by him on 13 August 1942.

28898 * When shown a document, the witness identified it as a military ordinance of the China Expeditionary Forces providing for the punishment of enemy fliers, Page dated 13 August 1942. This was issued by HATA and the Doolittle Fliers were tried and convicted under it. The order from HATA to SAWADA was supposed to have been in writing so HATA sent such an order.

(The attention of the Court was called to SAWADA's testimony at Page 2,452)

- 28899 * The trial was held about 20 August but the witness did not remember exactly. No counsel was provided in accordance with the provisions establishing the military court. It is military regulations that neither HATA nor SAWADA could make modifications providing for defense counsel. The witness understood that the fliers were told the charges levelled against them. Asked if it were not true that they were not given opportunity to plead guilty or not guilty, the witness stated he was unaware how the trials were conducted.
- 28900 * The witness stated he had read reports of the trial but did not recall details.
- 28901 * He did not know that the papers presented at the trial were read in Japanese and not translated. HATA received a report of the trial which showed the circumstances surrounding the trial and conviction, but no reports were made to HATA as to the manner in which the trial was conducted. The reports showed the judgment and reasons for it. Among the reasons, it was stated that the fliers in Tokyo and Nagoya machine-gunned school children and bombed civilian homes which could be clearly distinguished from military objectives.
- 28902 * The witness thought the report showed the evidence. No investigation was made by HATA after the trial. Reports to be sent to Tokyo were channeled through HATA's Headquarters. The witness did not recall that the reports showed that one of the convicted fliers was a navigator. HATA's order of 13 August 1942 provided that under special circumstances execution of military punishment shall be remitted.
- 28903 * Asked if HATA at any time after the trial suggested special circumstances in mitigation of punishment, the witness stated that inasmuch as HATA had Page already communicated disposition to the central military authorities and since he was on intimate terms with the Chief of Staff, and since HATA placed confidence in the views he had already set forth to the authorities, he felt there was no need to write another recommendation. He found no need for further investigations.

28904 * The witness did not know whether HATA requested the 13th Army prosecutor to ask for the death sentence. The witness stated that he had testified in the trial of SAWADA and others held in Shanghai in February 1946 in which the defendants there were charged with the unlawful trial and punishment of the Doolittle fliers. HATA was not a defendant at that trial. SAWADA and the other defendants there were all convicted. The witness was asked if he did not swear in the SAWADA trial that he did not remember if Nanking issued orders to the 13th Army in regard to the treatment of the fliers; that HATA ordered the trial to be held at Shanghai and requested the 13th Army prosecutor to ask for the death penalty; * that Hata requested the sentence to be executed; that HATA requested the prosecutor of the 13th Army to ask for the death sentence. The witness answered that in the document just read to him, there were words to the effect that a demand was made for the execution of sentence or something to that effect, but no such demand was actually made. He hadn't said that.

28906 With regard to the request made by HATA to the prosecutor to demand the death penalty, the statement the witness actually made was that such a demand was supposed to have been made. He said at that trial that since an order had come from the Chief of Staff, it was supposed to have been delivered, but at the trial in Shanghai, HATA said he had not heard of that before * and neither had any of the co-defendants. The fact was that they had not heard of it before so he would have to revise his recollection on this matter and say he did not know.

28907 * The witness was asked whether the questions and answers read to him were the questions put to him in the Court in Shanghai and were the answers given by him there under oath. The witness answered that he could not reply.

28916 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3198 as his affidavit.

28917 * The affidavit stated that the witness was Navy Minister in the HAYASHI, First KONOYE, HIRANUMA and SUZUKI cabinets, and Premier from January 16 to July 21, 1940. When the Marco Polo Incident broke out, 7 July 1947, he was Navy Minister in the First KONOYE Cabinet and at that time HATA was Commander of the Forces in Formosa. Neither the Formosa forces nor HATA had any connection with this Incident. It was not until February 1938 that HATA went to China when he became Commander of the Forces in Central China. When the witness was Premier, HATA was War Minister. With respect to the Tripartite Pact, his Cabinet was opposed to it and the question never came up in Cabinet conferences.

28918 * There was a feeling in the Army to make use of Germany to settle the China Incident but his Cabinet paid no attention to this. HATA cooperated with the Cabinet policy and opposed the Pact. Since his Cabinet opposed such a pact and was not pro-German, a desire to overthrow the Cabinet came. Those opposing the YONAI Cabinet tried to have HATA, who was opposed to the Pact, resign from the government and overthrow the Cabinet. Eventually, their plan was carried out. When HATA resigned the witness believed that his resignation was not of his own free will but that he was forced by elements he was powerless to fight. Today he was more convinced than ever that his beliefs were correct.

28919 * The witness asked HATA to recommend a successor and HATA said this would be decided in the Three Chiefs' Conference composed of the Chief of Staff, the Inspector General and the War Minister. HATA returned looking worried and said there was no one who would succeed him. He looked sad because he knew this lack of successor would cause the fall of the YONAI Cabinet. After the Cabinet's resignation, HATA called on the witness and told him that he understood his situation but he did not blame the witness at all. HATA looked sad.

The witness stated that HATA opposed a military alliance between Japan and Germany. The witness recalled that he was interrogated by a Soviet officer on 15 May 1946. He did not recall being asked then what HATA's position was concerning a military alliance with Germany. He never replied that HATA thought the conclusion of such a treaty would be advantageous to Japan.

28922 * The witness stated that the YONAI Cabinet during the latter part of its existence did not take steps to strengthen ties with Germany and Italy. He knew nothing about conferences between the War, Navy and Foreign Ministries in July 1940 or strengthening harmony with Germany and Italy. He knew nothing about Foreign Office instructions to Ambassador SATO prior to 12 July 1940 to confer with German authorities on strengthening coalition.

28923 SATO had not exchanged views with Ribbentrop. He did not know anything about the Foreign Office in his Cabinet preparing a plan for coalition with Germany as a result of the conference. * He had never heard that this plan was presented to the joint conference of the War, Navy and Foreign Ministries on 12 July 1940. He denied that this plan provided for intimate connection between the two nations and mutual assistance in diplomatic and economic affairs. In his Cabinet there was no discussion about a Japan-German alliance.

28925 * He did not know if there was a further meeting between the War, Navy and Foreign Ministries held 16 July 1940.

(Reference was made to Exhibits 527 and 528.)

Relations between the witness and HATA prior to the end of his Cabinet were very good. The witness did not recall a Four-Minister Meeting about 20 July 1940, at which he conferred separately with HATA.

* At first HATA was not in favor of the resignation of the YONAI Cabinet. The witness had asked HATA prior to 20 July 1940 if he was aware of the circumstances around the visit of the Vice Minister and the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau to the Chief Cabinet Secretary ISHIWATA, urging mass resignation. The witness had not received a report, however, that the Vice Minister was there. The War Minister HATA did not reply that he knew of the visit but they must take such opinions as personal. HATA instead said something to the effect that he would like to have it considered as purely private opinions. The witness denied asking HATA what he thought.

28929

* The witness stated that he thought he had a conference with HATA about 16 July, 1940. He did not recall discussing any big problem with him in June. * At that time he received a report that the Vice War Minister did not meet Chief Cabinet Secretary ISHIWATA, but he did not recall positively if that occurred on 12 July 1940. On or about 16 July, 1940, HATA announced his desire to resign, but it was not accepted until the 18th, according to the recollection of the witness.

28930

28931

HATA, between 12 July 1940 and his resignation, took no action which indicated his views were different from those of the Cabinet and that it should resign. The witness received no note on 14 July, 1940, setting out his views, nor did the witness recall receiving such a note before HATA's resignation.

28932

The witness was asked whether he received a note some days prior to HATA's resignation, in which HATA said that they were now facing the greatest transition in world history, and the strengthening of the domestic organization and reformation of foreign policy had become most pressing problems. However, the government was doing nothing, but was losing an opportunity and was blocking complete settlement of the incident. * To give the people's minds a change and promote the establishment of the new organization from a broad viewpoint, how about deciding to have the Cabinet resign? The witness stated he did not think there was anything carrying such a meaning, and he did not recall that HATA had delivered to him such a note.

28933

* At that time it was said that the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau made such a statement to ISHIWATA, but he firmly believed that HATA would not say such a thing. * HATA expressed no opinions to the YONAI Cabinet since its formation, and made no statement of the nature at a cabinet meeting. This showed he was not opposed to the YONAI Cabinet's policy.

The witness was asked if he recognized a document handed him as the 17 September 1940 issue of the Tokyo Asahi Shimbun. He recognized it as such. When asked if he saw there an article on the "Liquidation of the YONAI-ARITA's Diplomatic Policy", the witness said that he had not read the whole article, but whatever the press might write, he still insisted * there was no mistake in what he had stated.

- 28936 Asked if there was in the article any reference to a note from HATA to him, the witness stated he didn't believe that the YONAI Cabinet's foreign policy was mistaken in any way. * He was again asked if there was a reference about a note from HATA to him in the article, and he stated that since he had no recollection of receiving such a note he could not reply.
- 28937 * The witness stated that the Asahi Shimbun had the largest circulation in Japan at the time of the YONAI Cabinet. When again asked if the article referred to a
- 28938 note from HATA, * the witness stated that such a fact as was there written he had never heard from HATA, nor
- 28939 received in writing from him. * The witness thereupon read the article, which stated that, next, on the 11th, the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau called on the Chief Cabinet Secretary and amplified the desires of War Minister HATA. On the 14th HATA again made a recommendation to Premier YONAI in writing. This said that the present
- 28940 conditions showed they were facing the greatest transition phase in the world situation, * and strengthening the internal structure and reforming foreign policy have become most pressing. The government was doing nothing, and were losing an opportunity and was even blocking complete consummation of the China Incident. To give the people's minds a change and promote establishing a new structure, how about deciding that the Cabinet resign?
- 28941 * Exhibit 3199-A, an excerpt from the Asahi Shimbun of 17 July, 1940, which was the article just read, was received in evidence. The witness stated that he still insisted that he received no note from HATA in July prior to his resignation.
- 28942 * There was no conversation with a member of the Cabinet Secretariat on 3 June, 1947, relative to the receipt of this note. He did not say in that conversation with the secretariat member that HATA had delivered to him a note of such purport. He didn't recall saying that he returned the note to HATA after looking at it. When asked if he had received a note of the purport of the one which he had read in the Asahi Shimbun from HATA, if it would have indicated HATA was intending to destroy the Cabinet, he
- 28943 stated * that he denied that and there was nothing of the kind. The note published in the Asahi Shimbun had never been brought to his attention until today.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF ARITA, Hachiro,
by Mr. Lazarus.

28944 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
28945 3200 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness had been Foreign Minister in the HIROTA, 1st KONOYE, HIRANUMA, and YONAI Cabinets.

28946 The YONAI Cabinet was opposed to the Tripartite Pact, and the Pact was never put on the agenda for discussion by the Ministers of the YONAI Cabinet. * War Minister HATA, throughout his tenure, was in full accord and cooperated with this policy. The witness knew HATA opposed the pact, since it was first discussed in Japan.
While waiting to be received by the Emperor while he was Foreign Minister in the HIRANUMA Cabinet, the witness met HATA, who was then Aide-de-Camp. The subject of the Tripartite Pact came up, and HATA stated that the Emperor and he himself were personally opposed to it. Besides HATA's personal opposition to a German Alliance, he also opposed it because he saw no benefit to Japan in a pact which would work against her interests and antagonize Anglo-Saxon countries.

When HATA resigned from the YONAI Cabinet, the witness believed there must have been some strong reason that forced him. HATA's cooperative attitude in the YONAI Cabinet led the witness to believe even then that his resignation was against his will.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. KEENAN.

28947 * The witness stated that he was well acquainted with Japan's foreign policy and her international relations, generally speaking, but details would involve a question of memory and he would have to have references to speak with accuracy. The witness stated that when he joined YONAI's Cabinet he knew him well. He had great faith and trust in him then, and had the same feeling today.

28948 * The China Affair, both before and after the YONAI Cabinet, was the most important thing that had happened in modern Japanese history. The utmost desire of the China Affair was to bring about its settlement to the best interests of Japan and China.

28949 When asked if that included the continuance of a policy of using whatever force, including military, as was necessary to enforce Japan's concept. the witness stated * the question seemed to mean that Japan was forcing upon China a political organization as a part of the China Affair policy. That was not Japanese policy. It was a dual policy of peaceful settlement and also arms measures.

28950 * It was completely wrong that where they were able to carry out their policy by peaceful means they adopted such means, but where it became necessary to adopt force they adopted force. * It was not true to say that where it was unable to enforce its policy or bring it about through peaceful means it was willing to adopt military measures. Although armed measures were exercised at the outbreak of the China Affair, government policy even previous to the YONAI Cabinet was carrying on movements to effect a peaceful settlement.

28951 Asked if there was any change in the foreign policy regarding China from 18 September, 1931, until the YONAI Cabinet's fall, the witness stated that at different periods where armed force was exercised, it was used because there was no other alternative. Where armed forces were not necessary, such policy was quickly abandoned and successive cabinets had settlements peacefully.

When he said strong force was used only when necessary, he had meant when necessary to carry out Japan's foreign policy toward China. At such times it was necessary because there was no other means available.

28952 * While circumstances of the four different cabinets were different, there was no change in the policy of peace. Armed measures were never used for the purpose of enforcing diplomatic policies. They considered the war in China an incident, and according to the interpretation of the time it was not a war. The sovereignty and territorial integrity of China were respected, but since force was necessary at times, within the limits in which it was exercised there might have been some infringement of Chinese sovereignty and integrity.

* The witness stated that the stage had not been reached where matters concerning Europe, as well as those in China, were required to be discussed at a cabinet meeting. At the time of the YONAI Cabinet formation, it was understood that it was completely opposed to the Tripartite Pact. Reports had been made to the cabinet of the situation in Europe, but there was no discussion of it. The Ambassador to Berlin when the YONAI Cabinet came into power, he thought, was OSHIMA. * This was an important post. The witness retracted his statement that it was OSHIMA when the YONAI Cabinet party came in.

At the time of the HIRANUMA Cabinet, talks regarding the Tripartite Pact were dropped because of the German-Russian non-aggression pact. He thought OSHIMA returned again to Germany after the second KONOYE Cabinet was formed. OSHIMA returned to Japan once, and he thought he returned to Germany at that time. He could not recall who was Minister to Berlin when he became Foreign Minister in the YONAI Cabinet.

* He did not know OSHIMA well, but knew KURUSU very well. * He did not know what OSHIMA's views toward the Pact were at the outset of the YONAI Cabinet, but did know his views at the time of the previous HIRANUMA Cabinet. The witness thought OSHIMA believed a German-Japanese rapprochement was favorable to Japan. In the witness' recollection, OSHIMA became the Ambassador to Germany midway in the first KONOYE cabinet and returned to Japan during the ABE Cabinet, which succeeded the HIRANUMA Cabinet.

* When asked if the Foreign Office, when he was the Minister, gave instructions to Ambassador SATO to confer with German authorities on strengthening the coalition between the two countries, the witness stated that SATO went to Italy to return a good will visit. Asked if SATO dropped in on Ribbentrop, the witness stated that while en route, SATO had instructions to carry a good will message to the German Government, to create more friendly relations. SATO's rank was Special Ambassador, and he thought it the same as KURUSU's when the latter went to the U. S. in 1941. SATO was under the authority and subject to the instructions of the witness.

28962 * The witness did not recall if SATO told Ribbentrop that just as in Europe a new order would be brought about by Germany, that Japan was seeking a new order in the Far East and South Seas. Asked if SATO did not state that in these parallel efforts close cooperation seemed to be operating, the witness stated he hardly had any exact recollection. At that time it was the government's policy to make efforts not to aggravate relations with Germany.

28963 Asked if SATO told Ribbentrop that for three years Japan had been holding the attention of the British, French, and U. S., making Germany's establishment of a new order easier, the witness stated he had no exact recollection. Since it was a good will mission, he was sure SATO made complimentary remarks. * Asked if this remark was merely a complimentary one, the witness stated that he had no recollection, but what SATO had said had to fit the atmosphere prevailing then in Japan. Even if SATO had used such words, they would have no choice but to condone it. It was a good will mission, and every opportunity was utilized to convey good will intentions to Germany. The YONAI Cabinet's policy * was to continue good relations with Germany so that it would not be seriously harmful to Japan's major interests.

28964 He did not recall that SATO had told Ribbentrop that since the beginning of the Chinese War, Japan had tied up the U. S. fleet in the Pacific. When asked if such a statement would have been in the confines of a good will mission, the witness stated that at that time Germany demanded Japan's assistance. It was Japan's intention, instead of giving positive assistance, to make statements to the Germans so they would believe they were receiving some kind of assistance. The witness did not believe that at that time Germany could be said to be threatening Japan. There was an opinion in Japan that a cooling off of German-Japan relations would be unfavorable to settling the China Affair and other problems.

Asked if the two countries were not very closely linked, the witness stated yes, since the anti-comintern pact good relations were continuing, and there was no intention to deceive Germany. He did not know whether Ribbentrop told SATO that he long favored cooperation with Japan, and that the work of he and OSHIMA had borne fruit. He didn't recall if Ribbentrop stated he would be glad to hear further of Japan's plans for cooperating.

28966 * As a result of these conferences, the foreign office did not prepare a plan for coalition. When asked if this plan was not presented to the War, Navy, and Foreign Ministry Representatives on 12 July, 1940, the witness stated that he learned of this for the first time in an article reporting the proceedings of the Tribunal. At that time he had no clear recollection of it and gave it some thought. Japan desired to continue relations with Germany so that they would not be aggravated. There were circles who desired to strengthen such relations, and so he instructed subordinates to conduct a study to render closer relations with Germany so far as it would not endanger major Japanese interests.

28967 * He asked his subordinates to explore and find out whether such was possible, but up to the time of the YONAI Cabinet's resignation he received no report on the study. Asked if the plan provided that Germany recognize Japan's sphere of influence and political leadership in 28968 FIC, NEI and the South Seas, the witness stated that since he did not receive a report he did not know whether such was its context.

Asked if the plans further included that Germany would give support to the disposition of the China Incident and Japan take steps to check Britain in East Asia and if the final draft of the agreement was approved at a four Ministrie's meeting on 16 July, 1940, the witness stated that this absolutely was not the case. The YONAI Cabinet was about to resign on 16 July, and while it was functioning on 12 July, 1940, it received no reports.

The attention of the Court was called to exhibits 524, 528 and 528.

28969 * The witness stated he had no exact recollection that he was present at the fourth meeting of the Budget Committee of the 75th Diet, on 7 February, 1940, where he was asked a question by Committee Member KUBOI. He did, 28970 * however, remember KUBOI asking him a question.

28973 * Exhibit 3201, Proceedings of the 75th Diet, was received for identification and handed to the witness.

28974 The witness was asked if he was not asked * the question by KUBOI and if he did not give the answer recorded in the document. In exhibit 3201, Committee Member KUBOI stated that in regard to this subject, the Foreign Minister stated he had not given it any thought. From the viewpoint of deciding how to settle the Incident, he should like to ask the Foreign Minister and Premier if the government had any intention of renouncing the 9 Power Treaty. Japan participated in World War One to keep faith with Britain, with whom it had an alliance at that time. Because of Japan's participation, peace came to the Far East. In that war, Japan attacked Germany in Tsingtao, and the Navy advanced to the Mediterranean. At the end of the war, Britain announced that it would renounce the alliance, and the Nine Power Treaty was a sort of substitute for it. The 9 Power Treaty was a scheme of Britain and the U. S. which

28976 A treaty could not be renounced unless there was a serious change in the situation, but if the present situation were compared with that at the time the treaty was signed, major changes had taken place, such as Manchukuo's independence and the waging of the war by Japan. * Ordinarily, wars are waged for trifling reasons. There was no greater change in the international situation than the establishment of Manchukuo by means of war. No greater changes have ever been made than the change in the Orient and China. Has the government, in view of these changes and in the light of this international principle, the determination to announce renunciation of the treaty in conformity with international law principles?

Soon the central government would be established and it was needless to say that in the settlement of the Sino-Japanese Incident and in all negotiations of the central government with third countries, the treaty would create difficult international problems. KUBOI believed that the War and Navy Ministers realized how Japan had suffered in executing the Incident. He asked how much had the Foreign Minister suffered. In his opinion, the announcement of the abrogation of the Commercial * Treaty by the U. S. was based on the 9 Power Treaty. It was a disadvantage to Japan that there was such an unfavorable treaty.

Referring to the treatie's provisions, if they would read through KONOYE's statement it would seem Japan's attitude toward the China Incident was determined mostly from 9 Power Treaty articles. In spite of the difference in spirit and the way of thinking in Japan, the Foreign Office or those in diplomatic affairs were apt to be swayed by the articles of a treaty. If it is said that the spirit is lacking, as long as there is a treaty it would be natural they should be swayed by it. Comparing the text of the KONOYE statement with that of the Treaty, KUBOI felt as though the smooth movement of the pen was driven by the 9 Power Treaty. He asked whether the Foreign Minister had the intention of renouncing the 9 Power Treaty.

* He asked if, when the so-called new central government was established, whether Foreign Minister ARITA was ready to renounce the treaty in cooperation with it. ARITA replied that there were some articles in the treaty which did not suit the present situation in the Far East. There was a possibility that renunciation might cause repercussions. They needed to compare these two sides, and there was a necessity for considering the problem of renunciation. When the central government would be established in China, careful deliberation would be required as to what measures Japan and the new central government should take in regards * to renunciation of the treaty.

28979

The witness stated that he thought those questions were asked and that he gave that answer to them.

* He didn't recall that HATA was present at the Budget Hearing when those questions were asked and he gave that answer, but seeing the record of the proceedings he noticed there was an answer given to an interpolation by HATA, so he presumed HATA was there.

28981 * When asked if he had a conversation with HATA and Premier YONAI on 1 July 1940 with reference to SUMA, Chief of the Information Bureau, he stated he didn't recall the exact date, nor whether YONAI was present. He did have a talk with HATA with regard to SUMA.

When asked if he referred to such conversation in a conversation he had with HARADA on 2 July 1940, he stated he didn't remember the exact date. He met HARADA at that time and spoke on such matters, but since he provided him with various information he might have told him about SUMA.

28982 * The witness knew that HARADA was reporting information to Prince SAIONJI, who was in those days responding to inquiries from the Throne with regard to the premiership of succeeding cabinets. SAIONJI was the sole surviving Genro. It was questionable whether his position was prime or important, but his task was limited to responding to inquiries from the Throne with regard to recommending premiers at times of cabinet changes. * He could not say whether his task involved anything more than that. Although this was something that HARADA himself had said, SAIONJI was quite old and it was difficult for him to express opinions every time a political change occurred, especially when they occurred frequently.

28983 * He could not say whether his task involved anything more than that. Although this was something that HARADA himself had said, SAIONJI was quite old and it was difficult for him to express opinions every time a political change occurred, especially when they occurred frequently.

28984 * Generally, he thought, HARADA was fully compos mentis and capable of receiving and recording conversations accurately, but since these questions involved political, economic, and other matters, there was room to doubt whether HARADA understood all that.

With regard to the diary, it was his understanding that they were notations HARADA took down in reporting to SAIONJI, supplemented and amplified later. He did not doubt HARADA's capability, sincerity, or good faith, but there was room for doubt whether he was conveying the truth and full facts in every instance.

28985 The witness was asked whether on 2 July, 1940, he told HARADA that the day before he had an interview with the War Minister and the Premier, at which time the War Minister incessantly said, "Peace and Order would not be * restored in the ministry until SUMA was relieved as Chief of the Information Bureau". YONAI asked HATA, "Did you read the written testimony of SUMA at Kempei Tai Headquarters?", and HATA answered "Not yet". Continuing the witness' reported statement to HARADA, the Premier said they must both study the matter, and the witness was reported to have told HARADA that HATA's attitude was suspicious. He was thinking of seeing the Premier that day.

With regard to this statement, the witness recalled having a conversation with HATA about the SUMA case, but his recollection was that the contents of the conversation were quite different from what was purported to have transpired according to the prosecutor's reading.

28986 * He didn't recall that he had ever said anything about being suspicious of HATA's attitude. With regard to the interview he had with the War Minister in regard to the SUMA case, HATA, who was chief aide-de-camp at that time, had a fair and just attitude. With regard to the question, HATA and the witness published a joint statement in the press. It was clear in his memory that HATA's attitude at the interview was very just and fair.

28987 * The witness had read what happened in the newspapers at that time pertaining to matters of cabinet 28988 importance. * Asked if during the YONAI Cabinet it was 28991 the witness stated that * since such questions were not discussed nor decided on by the Cabinet, he did not know whether they represented the views of the government, but it was agreed between the Foreign and Prime Ministers and sometimes when the War and Navy Ministers entered the discussions, that they should loyally and faithfully observe the Pact whenever they discussed relations with the China Affair, but inasmuch as military action was already going on they made every effort to bring about an expeditious settlement if any violation of treaty provisions took place.

HATA never said that the 9 Power Treaty should not be permitted to interfere with military operations of Japan in China.

Attention of the Court was called by Mr. Cunningham, counsel for OSHIMA, to exhibit 121 to show that OSHIMA resigned his post and went into retirement in December, 1939, at the time of the ABE Cabinet.

28999 HATA then submitted MUTO's name to the Three Chiefs Council and MUTO was then designated to the position. * HATA always followed military procedure and he accepted the witness' recommendation without question and submitted his name to the Three Chiefs Council. All that was done was in accordance with regular procedure in the War Minister.

29000 CROSS-EXAMINATION by Mr.Sutton.

* The witness stated that he did not know whether HATA was or was not in a position to accept his recommendation of MUTO. When asked if he did not know whether there was any obligation to follow the recommendation the witness stated he did not know what was meant by whether he was under obligation.

29001 * The witness did not know that the war minister was necessarily required to follow his recommendation. The same applied to the Three Chiefs Conference. Since there were no objections to the witness' recommendation, ordinary procedure was followed. Only when objections were raised were there steps taken.

29002 Either HATA or the Three Chiefs Conference were at liberty to select whomever they thought fit. The Chief of the Personnel Affairs Bureau prepared a plan and submitted it to other related organs in the General Staff and the Inspectorate General of Military Education. * The next step in the procedure was for them to report the recommendation to their chief and ask for opinions. If there were no objections the plan was formally completed by the lower level and since the three Chiefs were already familiar with the plan before the official plan was submitted, the plan would be carried through if there were no special objections. The witness stated HATA was supposed to have authority to recommend as chief of the Military Affairs Bureau some person other than the person suggested by the witness. HATA was a member of the three Chiefs Council.

About September 1941 Gen USHIROGU, Chief of the Staff of the China Expeditionary Forces called upon the witness as a messenger from HATA, the China Expeditionary Forces Commander. The message from HATA stated that recently relations with America had been deteriorating. America was opposed to Japanese troops in China. To avoid a clash he believed they must withdraw all troops from China.

He requested the witness to do his utmost to prevent a conflict with America.

There was no cross-examination of the witness by the Prosecution. But in response to a question by the Tribunal, the witness stated that the messenger probably went to the War Ministry first and then came to the Navy Ministry. However, he had no positive knowledge. The message was oral.

* The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3205 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that from October 1939 to November 1940, the witness was Vice Chief of the General Staff and the Chief during that time was Prince Kanin. In 1940 because of Germany's victories, her fame spread through Japan and the view became predominant in army circles that Japan should use German power and influence to solve the China Incident favorably.

The Army and War Minister HATA desired peace with China and an end of the China Incident. HATA contended that the best way to secure peace was to reduce Japan's strength in China. He sought to decrease in drawing up the 1940 army budget the number of troops in China from 900,000 to 500,000. The General Staff was completely opposed and said it was impossible. * The matter was discussed between the war minister and the General Staff and eventually the troops were decreased to between 600,000 and 650,000. Toward the end of June, 1940, while the witness was in China for inspection he was called back to Tokyo. On his return he found that the Cabinet contrary to army desires was against close connections with Germany.

It was Prince KANIN's desire to solve the incident through the use of Germany. About the beginning of July 1940 he told the witness he intended to hasten peace with China through German mediation and he intended to use the war ministry to break the deadlock between the army and the cabinet.

He ordered the witness to consult with war ministry officials. The witness called on Vice Minister ANAMI. ANAMI said that as long as the Chief of Staff did not modify his views on using Germany to accelerate peace with China there was no alternative but to change the present cabinet.

* In view of the cabinet's character it was impossible to comply with Prince KANIN's objective even if some changes were made. The Vice-Minister told the witness that that was not the opinion of HATA, but the opinion of the Vice-Minister and the men below him.

The witness pointed out that the matter was of extreme importance as the army and cabinet opinions were opposed to each other. They had better meet again after the witness had again consulted with the Chief of Staff.

The Chief of Staff KANAN after hearing the witness' report stated that since his opinion represented the army majority and since according to the vice-minister there was no way but a change of cabinet, they must do their utmost to follow that method. He was sorry for the war minister that such an extreme measure had to be taken but it must be borne for the good of the country.

The witness again called on vice-minister ANAMI and told him the Chief of Staff's decision. ANAMI had not changed his views.

* Some days later on orders of Prince KANIN, the witness * wrote a letter. This letter was delivered to War Minister HATA. He did not know what became of it after that. Nor did he hear any trace of it later.

The letter was sealed and signed by Prince KANIN and he ordered him to deliver it to HATA which he did. HATA received the letter and the witness was not quite sure but that it might have been the following day or the day after that HATA submitted his resignation and the YONAI Cabinet then resigned.

Prince KANIN besides being Chief of the General Staff was a member of the Imperial Household and a father of the Army etc. and it was natural that HATA although War Minister, as a loyal subject of the Emperor was compelled to obey. The YONAI Cabinet had been a conservative one and was opposed to cooperation with and use of Germany in the settlement of the China Incident.

* A majority of the Army branded the YONAI Cabinet as too weak to settle the Incident or the general situation. To overthrow the Cabinet and effect peace by using Germany was predominant in the Army. HATA supported the YONAI Cabinet policy. Military circles' opinion was that HATA was not useful in hastening attempts at closer ties with Germany and use of German power to effect peace with China and that he lacked the desire to do so * and the change in war ministers was strongly urged. This opinion of the military circles was reflected in the Chief of Staff's decision.

Direct Examination by MR. COLE, counsel for MUTO

*The witness stated that the reason the General Staff wanted Germany as mediator between Japan and China was that there were two methods open: to settle matters directly or try to get a third party as mediator. At the time military representatives of Japan and China were secretly negotiating at Hongkong but they were not proceeding very successfully. Therefore they desired to obtain the good offices of a third party.

At the time of the ABE Cabinet a plan was drawn to seek Britain's offices. This was approved by the General Staff and at Imperial Headquarters but it finally came to naught. At the time of the YONAI Cabinet a plan was discussed to seek the good offices of the United States. But that finally came to nothing.

*In the meantime Germany gained sweeping victories and the entire world situation underwent a great change.

29025

* The witness recalled he arrived in Tokyo the end of June or the first of July and after some time toured parts of Japan. At the beginning of July the witness returned to Tokyo from China. At that time the Emperor had already left Tokyo and was not there at the time of the YONAI Cabinet's fall.

* He did not know whether MUTO accompanied the Manchukuo Emperor's party but it was but natural that important war ministry officials should accompany the emperor on such a visit.

Shortly before HATA's resignation the witness talked only with ANAMI on this problem and talked to no one else. He could not remember the exact date he handed the letter to HATA. He believed it was either the 16th or 17th of July that HATA resigned but was not sure.

There was no cross-examination of the witness.

29038 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 29041 3206 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that at the time of the raid on Tokyo by American fliers in April, 1942, the witness was Chief of the Military Service Section of the War Ministry.

29042 Because school children had been shot and non-military areas bombed during the raid, there were different opinions as to the treatment to be given fliers who became prisoners. The General Staff in Tokyo decided that all decisions as to the trial and treatment of them should be exclusively within its province. As soon as the fliers were captured in China, the General Staff ordered their delivery to Tokyo. Investigations were made in Tokyo, and preparations were made to hold the trial there. One opinion as to the treatment to be given the fliers * was supported by the General Staff, and the other by the War Ministry.
Because of these conflicts, the General Staff gave up its intention to hold the trial in Tokyo and ordered it held in China. Orders to such effect were forwarded to the China Expeditionary Army Headquarters, and the fliers were sent to Shanghai.

At that time there were no regulations that fliers could be tried by a military court, and so in Tokyo a new military law as to the treatment of fliers raiding the Japanese homeland and areas under its control was promulgated. A copy was sent to the China Expeditionary Force, with orders that the law would be in effect there also. In this same order was another order to the Expeditionary Army in China that the fliers would be tried under this law there. Since there was no military court in the Expeditionary Forces Headquarters at Nanking, the trial was to be held by the 13th Army at its Shanghai Headquarters.

29043 * When the decision was announced to try the fliers by the new law, the witness protested to General TANABE, Vice Chief of Staff, and told him that in his opinion the fliers should be treated as POWs. TANABE stated that he agreed and that he had received a letter from HATA's Chief of Staff, USHIROGU, that HATA was of the same opinion and desired to treat them as POWs. TANABE stated that nothing could be done because the General Staff had already decided to try them by military law.

NARRATIVE SUMMARY OF THE RECORD

DEFENSE - HATA

According to army practice, the letter USHIROGU wrote to TANABE was never written by the Commander, but always by the Chief of Staff. When the Chief of Staff expresses anything in an official letter, it is the intentions of the Commander-in-Chief. Such a letter would never be addressed to the Chief of Staff, but always to the Vice-Chief.

29044

* When the witness learned that USHIROGU had written a letter containing HATA's views addressed to the Vice-Chief, he knew it was an official letter informing the General Staff of the opinion of the Commander of the Armies in China, HATA. As a result of this letter containing HATA's opinion, Colonel ARISUE was sent by the General Staff to HATA with the orders and desires of the General Staff. It was afraid HATA would not carry out the instructions to put the fliers to trial, and ARISUE was sent to notify HATA to do as he was ordered, and that no theory of his would be accepted by Tokyo with reference to the case. Another apprehension of the General Staff was that even if the China Expeditionary Force tried the fliers, they might have found a decision of not guilty and that HATA would then have released them after trial.

29045

* All orders with reference to the trial were issued by the General Staff in Tokyo, and the trial held by the 13th Army in China. Headquarters of the China Expeditionary Army was merely a channel through which the orders were transmitted to the 13th Army. Expeditionary Force Headquarters had absolutely no discretion or judgment on its part with reference to the trial.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. KEENAN.

*The witness stated that he had personal knowledge with reference to the shooting of school children by the fliers. He did not see them actually shot, but merely received reports.

It was true that there were two different opinions as to the treatment to be given the fliers; one, that they be executed, and the other that they should be treated humanely as POWs. The witness advocated the mild opinion.

The opinion of the General Staff was sent to the War Ministry and a conference of Bureau Chiefs by the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau, SATO. At the conference, War Minister TOJO definitely opposed this view, saying it was wrong. Some junior officers were rather extreme in their views, but since the War Minister said the extreme view was wrong, the witness believed it right to say the view of the War Ministry was that they should be held as POWs and not executed.

The Military Service Bureau was against execution to the end, and did not set its seal on the procedure until the General Staff obtained Imperial sanction. The reason that bureau had to put its seal on the document ordering this procedure was that as it was the agency controlling the Kempei Tai it had responsibility in the case, since the Kempei Tai had investigated the fliers and sent a report.

* The term "extreme view" was a polite expression for execution, or the death penalty. The men who wanted to execute the fliers were General SUGIYAMA, Gen, Chief of the General Staff, * the Vice-Chief, Lieut. Gen. TANABE, who although he first opposed the step later agreed to it, and all the members of the First Department of the General Staff. The Chief of the First Department was TANAKA, Shinichi, but he had forgotten the names of the section chiefs.

The fliers were captured in China the day after the Tokyo raid, and a few days later were returned to Tokyo. It would have been in accordance with ordinary procedure to have the trials take place at the location where the alleged offenses were committed. On this occasion that procedure was departed from. * If they had been tried in Tokyo, the witness would have had nothing to do with the actual trial, but would have been connected with the investigation that would lead up to the trial. He agreed that might have a great deal to do with what occurred at the trial.

* When asked who the subordinates in the War Ministry were who favored execution, the witness stated he had no exact recollection, but there were some junior officers who held extreme opinions. He remembered that members of the Military Administration Section of the Military Affairs Bureau held extreme views, but he had forgotten their names. He agreed that it was a habit at that time and some years previous, that when extreme views about executing and murdering people were held, they were declared to be held only by junior officers.

The witness stated that Defense Headquarters held a very strong opinion in favor of a trial of the fliers. Its head was Prince HIGASHIKUNI. Asked if that view was held by HIGASHIKUNI, the witness stated that since he heard this strong opinion from KOBAYASHI, Chief of Staff of Defense Headquarters, he did not know what HIGASHIKUNI's opinions were personally.

* Asked if HIGASHIKUNI had anything to do with the promulgation of any regulation having to do with the execution of captured fliers, the witness stated that it was the duty of Defense Headquarters to issue laws concerning the Japanese homeland, just as the Commander of the Expeditionary Forces in China received a certain standard from central authorities and promulgated a law relative to the trial of the fliers in China based on that standard. It was Defense Headquarters which in the Japanese homeland issued such orders.

29053

* Regarding subordinates in the War Ministry who favored execution for the Doolittle fliers, the witness recalled that it was a Lieut. Col. OTSUKI, serving in the Military Administration Section, who came to the witness and urged that the fliers should be severely punished. The Head of the Military Affairs Bureau at that time was Colonel NISHIURA.

29054

The violent difference of opinion as to treatment of the fliers arose immediately on receipt of word that the fliers who had bombed Tokyo had been caught in China, the day after the raid. The reasons those who wanted the fliers executed gave was that since they were very afraid of the possibility of American bombing raids on Japan, * if the fliers were executed it would cause the American Air Force to fear their possible fate and desist from bombing Japan. It was a campaign of terrorism.

* Asked why the proceedings could not have been held in Tokyo and why it was necessary to send them back to Shanghai, the witness stated he did not know the exact reasons, since even in his opinion it was wrong for a new military law to be promulgated after the act occurred and the fliers tried on that law, central authorities felt it would not be proper to hold the trial in Tokyo. He thought it could be said that it was the desire of the central military authorities to evade their own responsibility. He supposed they felt that they could get their desires of executing the fliers carried out better by sending them to China.

The witness recalled that the law was promulgated * about the end of July, and the fliers were sent to China on 18 June. The draft plan of the new law had been drawn up long before, but because of violent opposition, promulgation had been delayed.

If HATA had refused to carry out the law, he probably would have been relieved of his post and a new commander sent out, and the witness believed the new commander would have carried out the execution. The witness agreed that the worst that would have happened to HATA would have been that he would be relieved, even assuming that the instructions he received were tantamount to a command.

* The first order that went to HATA was for the trial of the fliers. A later order was that they be severely punished. This order stated that the sentence would be carried out against the three whose sentence was not commuted. The

* The witness identified and verified exhibit 3207 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that in the autumn of 1945, the witness was in Tokyo as Chief of the Manpower, Food, and Civilian Supplies Division of the U. S. Strategic Bombing Survey. He understood and spoke Japanese, and was present at several interviews between Japanese and the Survey. Their purpose was to find out the effects of warfare, particularly aerial bombing on Japanese economy and industry.

Many Japanese interviewed were reluctant to talk, thinking they might be investigating war criminal responsibility. It was necessary to put them at ease and reassure them that they wanted information for bombing survey purposes only. He could not say whether any Japanese were made positive promises or assurances * that the interviews would not be used against them in any war crimes prosecution, although they might have gotten that impression from the preliminary remarks.

A preliminary conversation was usually had with the interviewee to put him at ease and explain their aim. They exerted efforts to allay suspicion and overcome reluctance to give information.

The witness was present at the interviews with the accused HOSHINO during November, 1945. HOSHINO was not placed under oath, and interrogations were in a friendly, informal atmosphere. The one interpreter was much overworked, spoke good Japanese, but often needed help in translating technical terms.

The witness had been shown exhibit 454, a transcript of the bombing survey interviews with HOSHINO in November, 1945. * The transcript was accurate so far as the questions were concerned, but did not contain the preliminary remarks nor an exact or full record of HOSHINO's answers. When asked a question, HOSHINO sometimes spoke as long as five minutes before his remarks were translated. The witness could not always follow him or retain the full substance of his longer replies. Neither could the interpreter. In such cases the latter translated as much as he remembered, or gave the gist to the stenographer.

Sometimes they went over the answers after the interview to edit, correct passages or fill in missed portions or where exact words or sentences had been forgotten. He recalled that several times HOSHINO attempted corrections. So far as he knew, HOSHINO was not shown the final transcripts after editing and corrections. There was only one stenographer to record the interviews, and neither the interpreter nor stenographer were sworn.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY BRIGADIER QUILLIAM.

* Asked if he was unable to state whether, in fact, the preliminary statements were made to HOSHINO, the witness said he could not recall the exact words said to HOSHINO, but he was positive he was given some kind of explanation of the bombing survey's objectives. Asked if he realized that he didn't say that in his affidavit, and that his affidavit was cast in general language and referred to a practice, the witness stated it was the practice before the interviews to give a preliminary discussion explaining objectives, and he was sure that in HOSHINO's case such a discussion took place. * The witness believed he could be sure of this, because HOSHINO's interview was the first one he attended. There were three interviews, and the witness recalled that the preliminary remarks were made at the first meeting. He didn't recall the others.

29082

He could not remember the exact words of the statement. The statement was probably made by one of the interrogators, or the chairman of the group. The witness stated he had some knowledge of Japanese. He had seen the interrogations in exhibit 454 recently.

29083

* He could not point to any answer which was inexact, but thought almost every answer except the "yes" and "no" replies was incomplete. Since he had forgotten, he could not say that any of the answers was incomplete in a material respect, nor could he indicate where a correction was asked for by HOSHINO and not made. The answers, except for one or two, were not read back to the accused, as far as he could recall.

29085 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
 29086 3208 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was an American missionary to Japan, and was formerly connected with the U. S. Strategic Bombing Survey, serving with it as an interpreter after the war. He was the only interpreter during interviews with HOSHINO on 19, 22. and 28 November, 1945.

29087 Before the first of such interviews, he was instructed, as was the practice, to talk with HOSHINO and put him at ease, explaining that the only purpose was to get information on the economic effects of the war, and to reassure him that the interview had no connection with war crimes prosecution, nor the fixing of individual responsibility. Such assurance was considered necessary to get the information needed. * The witness did this.

Neither he nor the stenographer were sworn. For purposes of the survey, it was sufficient to take down the gist of the conversation rather than a verbatim record.
 The witness stated that he had been shown exhibit 454, a copy of the interviews with HOSHINO. As far as the questions went, it appeared to be a verbatim record, but in the answers the words were in many cases the witness' own, or were a condensation of what HOSHINO said. HOSHINO often spoke continuously for several minutes, and the witness gave no running translation. From time to time the witness received help on technical terms.

29088 The document did not show statements made to HOSHINO before the informal interview, and as he recalled,
 * it was not a complete record of the conversation in other respects. HOSHINO understood some English and suggested corrections, but the witness could not say whether all corrections were actually made. Neither HOSHINO nor the witness got a chance to read the transcript afterwards, and the witness never saw it until it was shown to him recently.

29089 * The witness stated that he did not remember the exact words he said to HOSHINO in the preliminary statements. The intent was to explain to him that the purpose was simply to get an overall picture, and did not concern individual responsibility or connection with the warfare. He could actually recollect making such a statement to HOSHINO.

29089 * The witness was at three interviews of HOSHINO, but thought he made the preliminary statement the first time only. The witness assisted at the interrogation of 29090 several other persons besides HOSHINO, * and supposed there were six or seven. The chairman in charge authorized such a statement, and he thought Mr. Bisson probably instructed him, but could not be sure.

He thought the questions appearing in the record were verbatim. In a sense, all the answers in the record were all the witness's.

29091 * When asked to distinguish the answers which were his and those where a condensation had been given, the witness stated that the words were the witness', but the answers were HOSHINO's. He could not pin this down, and it would depend upon their length. The short answers were verbatim. He could not remember an instance where a correction was asked for by HOSHINO. Very often to clear up points there was a conversation between the one interrogated and the interpreter and they cleared this up, and he passed this on in the answer, but there were times when HOSHINO, in attempting to follow the English, thought the witness had deviated. Usually, a mere explanation satisfied him.

29092 * The witness believed the best was done to see that the record was accurate and reliable. Asked if there was anything in the record which could be called unfair to HOSHINO, the witness stated he did not take the answers down, but that he interpreted them as fairly as he could.

29093 * To the best of his ability, he attempted to discharge his duty to the Survey authorities and to HOSHINO.

When asked if he could point to any respect in which the document was inaccurate or incomplete, the witness stated that he understood that refers to the preliminary remarks which were not recorded prior to the actual interview. From the standpoint of interpreting, he had no reason to doubt that the record was in all material respects accurate.

29101 * The affidavit stated that after HOSHINO entered the Finance Ministry, he was the witness' colleague in the Revenue Bureau of the Ministry and at Osaka for many years, and the witness was intimate with him.

29102 In June 1932 the Manchurian Government asked the Ministry to send them a person to assist its Department of Finance. After consultations, Finance Minister TAKAHASHI selected HOSHINO. However, HOSHINO strongly rejected the offer. * The witness called on HOSHINO and finally persuaded him to accept the offer and in July HOSHINO went to Manchukuo. The witness knew that HOSHINO, after taking his post in Manchukuo Government, wholeheartedly exerted himself to promote the welfare of the people there. He did everything in his power to prevent any Japanese policy adverse to the interests of the people in Manchukuo from being carried out. He persistently insisted that Japan relinquish the special rights and interests she had enjoyed * and frequently visited the Finance Ministry to realize this plan.

In 1935 HOSHINO criticized such issues as the raising of tariffs on agricultural products of Manchukuo and the prohibition on the importation of Manchukuo products, and urged the Finance Ministry to bring the issues to a conclusion. He stressed the necessity of relinquishing extraterritorial rights and the executive powers vested in the railway zone authorities.

At one time he visited the Finance Ministry and insisted that in the event these were relinquished, Japanese installations be transferred to Manchukuo at cheap prices. Such an attitude led to his criticism as laying too much stress on the interests of Manchukuo at the expense of Japanese interests.

The witness did not know the circumstances under which HOSHINO took part in the Second Konoye Cabinet, but

29106 * The affidavit stated that the witness had been Chief of the Secretariat, Chief of the Legislative and the Vice-Chief of the General Affairs Board under HOSHINO who was the Chief of that Board. The Chief of the General Affairs Board in Manchukuo was the one who rendered assistance to the Premier and who exercised general control over it. The Chief was not competent to decide State affairs and even after the decision of routine matters, reward and punishment of those below the clerical staff was made by the Premier himself.

29107 * At the end of 1936, Board Chief ODATE resigned and HOSHINO succeeded him. Reasons for this were that since five years had passed since Manchukuo was founded, it was deemed fit to appoint someone to the post from those who were in actual service in Manchukuo. Also, Manchukuo became in need of an able financier and economist who could render assistance to the Premier. In the light of these needs, HOSHINO was appointed on the recommendation of his predecessor and the Premier.

29109 HOSHINO had due regard for the opinions of the Manchurians and was ever mindful of the promotion of those with superior ability. Important positions, such as private secretary to the Chief, Assistant Chief, etc., which had heretofore been occupied by Japanese, were replaced by Manchurians. * He held Manchurians in such regard that he was accused of overvaluing Manchurians' intentions. Before, there had been discrimination between Japanese and Manchurians with regard to the salaries for certain officials. This was because the cost

In 1938 HOSHINO removed this discrimination. There never was a case in which the Kwantung Army dictated to the General Affairs Board, although the wishes of the Army were sometimes laid before the board. At such times, HOSHINO took necessary measures after consulting with government organizations and the Premier. * Even the wishes of the Kwantung Army were not followed if they were not considered appropriate. When the renovation of administration was effected in June 1937 and the Department of Public Peace was formed, the Kwantung Army proposed to have a man from the military ranks appointed as Vice-Minister of the new department. After consultation, HOSHINO recommended one of the civil officials disregarding the Army's desire and eventually he was appointed as Vice-Minister.

HOSHINO paid attention to stabilizing the national life and elevating the economic life of the Manchurians and he was always concerned about their afflictions and assumed a cautious attitude. Because of the European and Sino-Japanese Wars, commodities became scarce and economic control was made stricter.

* HOSHINO negotiated with the Japanese government and others so that Manchukuo might sell food and other goods profitably so that she might purchase commodities that were important. There was a case where the government reduced the price of salt and distributed it to the people although other prices were going up. There was no cross-examination of the witness.

29115 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3211 as his affidavit.

29116 * The affidavit stated that on 12 October 1937, Manchukuo decided on a ten-year program of opium prohibition and the witness, as Councillor of the Planning Board, assumed responsibility for drafting the program with his colleague, Yung Shan-Chi. From the first, Manchukuo had earnestly planned to eradicate the evil custom of smoking or eating opium and established a monopoly system for the production, delivery and consumption of opium to curtail its use. In December 1936, HOSHINO became Chief of the General Affairs Board. At that time the opium monopoly was efficiently enforced. HOSHINO called together young Manchurian officials * for free discussions of the opium problem. After discussing it for several months it was concluded that Manchukuo had reached the point where they could enforce a prohibition policy. Most of the young officials agreed that quick measures should be taken for the drastic eradication of opium addicts.

The discussion created a great sensation and among Japanese-borne officials there was loud criticism of HOSHINO's attitude as currying favor with native-borne officials. However, HOSHINO ordered them to map out a program to be enforced by the government. The number of those poisoned by opium was estimated at more than one million at the beginning of Manchukuo's establishment.

29118 * After study it was concluded that even if strong measures were taken, it would take as long as twenty years. Many prominent people outwardly expressed approval of prohibition, but secretly expressed opposition. The witness informed HOSHINO that it would take twenty years to achieve complete prohibition, but he insisted upon the ten-year plan and that they should endeavor to achieve the high objective. HOSHINO admonished the witness that when Manchurian youths were about to march on toward the ideal, the Japanese should rejoice over their enthusiasm and aid them rather than worrying whether the goal was possible. HOSHINO told those in the accounting section that if the opium monopoly profit were appropriated as a source of revenue * prohibition would become difficult. If it were used for the expenses of the prohibition policy, finances would not be affected even if prohibition were carried out. They should carry out the necessary means for prohibition without stinting the expense and they should not worry about the consequent decrease in revenue. There was no need to use opium revenue for general expenses.

* The draft which the witness and his Manchurian colleague wrote was decided on by a cabinet meeting and the plan was put into effect after January 1938. The central force for the project was HOSHINO and a group of young Manchurian bureaucrats. The decision on prohibition which included that public officials and members of special companies who did not refrain from opium smoking within a fixed period be dismissed was realized. The prudent among them took leave and received treatment and improvement among the leading class was to a remarkable extent effected. The government gave special consideration to prohibition in towns and cities with registration, controlled relief, propaganda, etc. and results were improved.

* The number of registered opium addicts immediately before the war was reduced to over 200,000. One could hardly see an addict in Hsinking in 1944 and all sanitariums were turned into lodging houses for laborers. HOSHINO devoted himself and contributed to the unification of the monetary system and the abolition of the extraterritoriality from 1936 to 1937.

Despite the chaos of Manchukuo's finance before and after its establishment, HOSHINO succeeded in reforming it by guidance and encouragement. Unification of the monetary system was regarded as very difficult but HOSHINO's efforts and enthusiasm led to monetary stability in August 1935, * less than three years after the foundation of the state.

Remarkable effects resulted upon the stabilization and elevation of the living of the Manchurians. Before Manchurian finances were disordered, lacking in fairness, with a most primitive system. The people groaned under heavy taxes. To remedy this, a system aiming at reduction of taxes and fairness was established HOSHINO had a positive view on the abolition of extraterritoriality although Japan did not necessarily agree with Manchukuo about the time and method of its execution. * Most people in Manchukuo believed the time was immature and some government circles thought they should take a cautious attitude. HOSHINO, as Chief of the General Affairs Section of the Finance Department, strongly advocated the prompt abrogation of extraterritoriality for the sound development of Manchukuo, and made efforts in persuading and negotiating with the authorities. "The treaty concerning the Residence of Japanese Nationals in Manchukuo and the Taxes in Manchukuo" was concluded in July 1936. It greatly increased taxes upon the Japanese. Although there was much opposition from the Japanese, it was due to HOSHINO's efforts that extraterritoriality was abolished.

- 29123
- 29124 * When HOSHINO became Director of the General Affairs Office, he tried more than ever to realize a complete abrogation of extraterritoriality and a transfer of the powers of the South Manchurian Railway Zone authorities, although he had many difficulties. As to the abrogation of judiciary powers, many in Japan thought it still premature because the executive and criminal facilities were not completed. HOSHINO went to Japan and conferred with government officials to persuade them to agree to his plan. Because of their division of opinion, there were deadlocks but HOSHINO passed his own judgment broadly to bring the negotiations to a satisfactory end. * "The Treaty Concerning the Abrogation of Extraterritoriality in Manchukuo and the Transfer of the Executive Powers Vested in the South Manchurian Railway Company Zone Authorities" was put into effect 1 December 1936. Some question arose as to whether it should be put into effect as of 1 December and some Manchukuo officials suggested 1 January of the following year. HOSHINO, however, decided that the date of enforcement should be 1 December. The abrogation of extraterritoriality abolished the long standing discrimination between Japanese and Manchurians and contributed to Manchukuo's economic development and had a favorable psychological effect.

* In Exhibit 3212-A, an excerpt from HOSHINO's interrogation, the accused stated that the extraterritoriality right was enjoyed by almost all nations at one time.

29128

* Following the influx of Japanese into Manchukuo, it was realized that the freedom of taxation enjoyed by them would create inequality and unfairness. It was thought necessary that extraterritoriality should be abolished. In the railway zone, both Chinese and Japanese were not taxed and this situation had to be remedied. He stated that he conducted negotiations with General UEDA and Vice-Foreign Minister OHASHI. The latter and the accused made a recommendation to the Japanese Government for the abolition of extraterritoriality in the railway zone.

* Late in 1936 or early 1937, as a result of the Japan-Manchukuo Treaty, this result was obtained. It was not necessary to bond issues of Manchukuo to the Kwantung Army from 1932 to 1936, but support was usually requested from it. He did not remember any case of the head of the Kwantung Army refusing to give support in the period 1932 to 1934. In 1935 140,000,000 yen worth of bonds were issued for the purchase of NMR from USSR, at which time the accused came to Japan several times in connection with floating the bonds. It was not necessary for him to get Kwantung Army approval. It was rather their moral support.

29130

* Great efforts were made to sell shares of newly established companies among the Manchukuo population. His department from 1932 to 1936 was mainly concerned in a sales campaign to have the shares held by as many people as possible. The accused stated that the Army in general did not oppose the Zaibatsu but there was such an atmosphere among the Kwantung officers who believed that they monopolized industry in Japan, and such should not happen in Manchukuo.

29131

* Since HOSHINO did not believe that the Zaibatsu monopolized industry in Japan, he felt that anyone could go to Manchukuo and make investigation. The China Incident was a surprise to the accused. General HONJO was in Manchuria when he was there but he had never talked with him concerning the Manchurian Incident.

29132 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3213 as his affidavit.

29133 * The affidavit stated that those in the Privy Council were the President and Vice-President of the Council, the Councillors and the Premier and State Ministers. Besides the above, the adult Imperial Princes of the Blood resident in Tokyo were also to attend, although they never had been present until the witness was relieved of office. A State Minister other than the Premier, or a Minister without portfolio had no seat in the Privy Council. Assistants of the Premier, Ministers without portfolio, cabinet officials and the Ministries could attend the Council to assist. Ministers without portfolio often attended as "explainers." The "explainers", sometimes more than 10, * were able to supplement the explanation of the Minister in charge.

The Investigation Committee of the Privy Council was composed of members nominated by the President from among the Vice-President and the Councillors. They deliberated over bills entrusted to them and reported the result. The Committee would make inquiries of the Cabinet and the Ministers about the matter and get their replies. As a general rule, the Minister concerned had to make a reply, but this was sometimes done by subordinates who were all called "explainers." No shorthand was used at the Council and the record of proceedings was merely a record of minutes written by the secretaries and not an exact record of all utterances.

29135 * There were no regulations for taking notes of the proceedings and only the gist was recorded. The practice for a long time was simply to record the subject, list of members present, summary of proceedings, etc. The records were sometimes precise and sometimes not, according to the judgment of the secretary or the circumstances, and sometimes only a part of an utterance was taken down. No notes on the proceedings were ever shown State Ministers or "explainers" for confirmation. * An "explainer" did not have the right to vote at a Privy Council Meeting.

There was no cross-examination of the witness. Prosecution directed the attention of the Court to Exhibit 552.

29137 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3214 as his affidavit.

29140 * The affidavit stated that from 1932 to 1940 the witness made a number of trips to Manchuria on business. At that time he often saw HOSHINO, who was then first in the Finance Ministry and later Chief of the General Affairs Board in the Manchukuo Government. In the first years in Manchukuo it was difficult for Japanese or other business men to do business, but it became easier after HOSHINO became Chief of the General Affairs Board.

Some young officers and officials in Manchukuo did not welcome outside business men, but HOSHINO tried to decrease this feeling. There was no discrimination between Japanese and other foreign business men and the same regulations applied to both. HOSHINO welcomed foreign capital which was interested in building up Manchuria and was not aiming at speculation.

29141 The witness had a plan to start an automobile industry there * with a Japanese company and the General Motors Corporation from the United States. HOSHINO agreed with this idea and to the necessity of U.S. capital. Later, AIKAWA set up the Manchurian Industrial Development Corporation and one of AIKAWA's inducements was his ability to obtain foreign capital. Manchurian authorities were strict in requiring that any corporation would have to be incorporated under Manchukuo law. The witness knew this because he was unable to set up a branch of SUMITOMO there but had to establish a Manchukuo corporation.

HOSHINO's idea was to develop all industries, particularly agriculture, to lay a solid foundation for the country's economy and the people's welfare. He was interested in developing both light and heavy industry, especially the automotive, since Manchukuo was vast and had insufficient railways. Trucks were particularly necessary for agricultural development.

29142 * HOSHINO was eager for Manchukuo to grow as an independent state generally. The China Incident disappointed him and he wanted it quickly terminated. While he was Chief of the General Affairs Board, he told the witness there were too many Japanese officials in Manchukuo and that native Manchurians should play a greater part in government and economic activities.

HOSHINO tried to reduce the number of Japanese officials and said that if Manchukuo needed technical help, the Japanese should assist if they became Manchurian citizens and acted as such.

29144 * On 22 July, 1940, HOSHINO was appointed President of the Planning Board and Minister without Portfolio in the second KONOYE Cabinet, and the witness was appointed Vice-President of the Board in August 1940. The witness was brought into the Planning Board to analyze production figures, and he and HOSHINO soon found out how impractical most of the plans were.

29145 * The China War and U. S. ban on exports added to economic difficulties, and they had to shift plans. The Board could make plans and recommendations only and final decision was the Cabinet's, and execution was by various ministries.

The Board formerly made plans for the allocation of the foreign exchange obtained by exports, but the foreign exchange shrunk rapidly. Since Japan could not get new materials, the Board had to devise means of getting by with what was available, and it turned to the plan for expansion of productive power, which had been set up in January 1939. This plan was exhibit 842, which was shown to the witness, * who identified it as correct.

This was another impractical plan which had to be revised constantly because production was decreasing as supplies from the U. S. were diminishing. They had to find new sources of such raw materials and products, and the plan for expansion of productive power was the only way to do it. Japan was weak economically, and the Board had to devise some means of meeting army, navy, and civilian demands.

* They were still importing some materials from the U. S. and NEI, but this was insufficient. It was planned to receive from them or any other source the normal amount of peacetime imports, and all planning was based on a continuation of such imports only. The only warfare considered in making plans was that in China, and neither HOSHINO nor the witness knew how much the army and navy needed there, for this was kept entirely secret. If they had had in mind any future war in making their plans, they would have been on a very different nature from the ones followed. The object of the plan of expansion of productive power was to turn out producer's goods for the most necessary items cut off from Japan by the export bans of foreign countries and to attempt to balance industries.

29148 Japanese heavy industry was far inferior to the light and needed great developing to bring the economy into balance. The direct purpose of this plan was not to increase the amount of steel and other items, but to increase the ability to produce them. The end of the plan was set for March, 1942, on paper, but they knew no definite accomplishment could be realized by then. No particular division of the Board had sole charge of the plan, so it was to be handled temporarily by the 5th Division, which had formerly made allocations of foreign exchange and other funds, which had dwindled.

Although army and navy demands were very great, HOSHINO and the witness tried to cut down military allocations in favor of civilian goods and the expansion plan. The army and navy got first priority, but they always succeeded in reducing the allocations demanded by a large per cent, and they never actually got the full allocation because of material shortages. There was great difficulty and arguments from these allocations, and although they were supposed to be decided by April of each year, the witness remembered that when he joined the Board, the allocation was deferred from April to early July. When the witness resigned, the authorities had reached no agreement on allocations for 1941.

29149 The witness stated that he had been shown exhibit 865, which contains the plan for the new economic structure. * The details were prepared by young Planning Board officials. HOSHINO presented the plan in the autumn of 1940 to the Economic Ministers of the Cabinet. They opposed the plan, especially Minister of Commerce KOBAYASHI, and HOSHINO agreed it should be changed. The Economic Ministers wanted it changed so that it would be more in favor of a laissez-faire economy. The original plan provided that large economic organizations were to take over all industries and weed out small and inefficient concerns. KOBAYASHI wanted the government to help the small businessmen, and HOSHINO agreed. The witness did not have a copy of the original plan, since it was not adopted.

29150 There were added to the original plan words to the effect that it was to stabilize the welfare and well-being of the people. This was to check too great emphasis on a synthetic and planned economy and on any radical * change being more in favor of maintaining the status quo.

In paragraph 3 of Section II, the plan originally read "enterprise must" instead of "may be separated or combined". In paragraph 4 of Section II the original read "medium and small enterprises shall be adjusted and unified". In Section III it originally read "economic organizations shall be operated under the guidance of the one leader principle". The final plan on which KOBAYASHI and HOSHINO concurred was a reversal of the original plan in many points.

After the changes made by HOSHINO and the other Economic Ministers, the plan became substantially as it read now, and was finally approved by the Cabinet. The Board had nothing to do with executing it, but this had to be done by the Commerce and Industry Ministry. The new plan looked to a partial transfer of * industry control from the government to the business men.

The Board's aim was a self-sufficient economy pointing to a bloc economy relationship with Manchukuo and China. Japan was to be the center of the highly developed industry because it was more advanced, and Manchukuo and China would emphasize the raw material and basic industries. Industries in those two countries were included in the planning because they had been in past economic plans. The three countries, from the point of view of natural resources and production techniques, were interdependent, and did not seem prosperous without cooperation.

Regarding the population policy which was contained in exhibit 865, at that time the percentage of population increase in Japan was declining due to the change in social conditions and the China War. The plan proposed a state of peace and aimed at 1960. Its real effects would not have been seen until that time. An immediate effect of it would be a decrease in the labor supply, since it encouraged marriage and restricted the employment of women over twenty. It was a visionary paper plan, and it was prepared in the Welfare Ministry and was to be carried out by it. It was customary to explain such plans to the Board. HOSHINO did not show much interest in the population plan, although he gave some explanation of it. He expressed no opinion on it to the witness.

HOSHINO resigned in early April, 1941, and in accordance with the custom the witness five days later resigned.

29153 * The witness stated that HOSHINO always held the opinion that the China Incident was a disappointment, and he wanted it terminated. The witness did not recall a speech by HOSHINO, expressing approval of the Incident.

29154 The witness knew of the Japan-Manchukuo-China Economic Council, which he was a member of. He thought he attended some conferences of the nature referred to, * but he didn't recall clearly attending such a one. He thought he was at one or another conference of that kind. He thought it was an important conference, but had forgotten whether the proceedings were published in a book.

29156 In the speech, HOSHINO said that looking back upon East Asia in the past, although it contained one-tenth of the world's land area and over one-fourth of its population, it seemed to have been vainly wandering in the dark. However, the trend of the Orient was to restore her proper position in world civilization. The bell for the awakening was sounding long ago in the Meiji Restoration. The first step realized on the continent was the Manchurian Incident, the recent China Incident being a development and expansion thereof. In consequence, there was first established Manchukuo, and next new governments in North China, Central China, and on the Mongolian Border. This was a revelation of God and the voice of Heaven.

29157 The construction of a new East Asia was a great duty imposed upon them, and they must advance toward its * fulfillment bravely by staking their eternal lives and honor.

Having read that extract, the witness still asserted that HOSHINO was opposed to the China Incident.

Exhibit 3215, the full report of that speech, was received in evidence.

- 29159 * The witness had heard of HOSHINO's disappointment in the China Incident directly and frequently from the accused himself.
- 29160 * The witness did not attend the meeting allegedly held in Hsinking in 1938.
- 29164 * Exhibit 2797-A, an excerpt from the official report of the U. S. State Department, Research and Analysis Branch on War Production Controls in Japan, stated that the adoption of the new economic structure, sanctioned by the Major Industries Association Ordinance of 1 September, 1941, indicated the failure of the army plan to introduce a drastic program for state regimentation of industry and the transformation of private cartels into public organs directed by government officials. The plan was inherited by the TOJO Cabinet. Under the provisions of the Imperial Ordinance, former private cartels had theoretically become public organs termed control societies, responsible to the Ministry of Commerce and Industry. The Ministry's powers, however, were largely negated by inability to appoint directors of the control societies. * The president of the control society was chosen by a nominating meeting of industrialists appointed by the competent minister. The president, in turn, chooses the other officers and directors from experienced people. This committee tended to appoint as presidents of the control societies the presidents of the leading cartels.
- 29165
- 29166 * In exhibit 3212, the prosecution's interrogation of HOSHINO, the accused stated that he did not become a member of the IRAA in any particular sense, but as a member of the Cabinet. He was an adviser, as were all Cabinet Ministers. He was not an officer of the IRAA, but he was a member of the committee. He was called upon to become a member to study health matters after his resignation. That is all he did with the IRAA.

29167 The accused stated that in the spring of 1940, MATSUOKA went to Germany and Italy. HOSHINO had resigned when MATSUOKA returned, * and he didn't know the concrete details of the trip results, but the most important result was the Russo-Japanese Treaty of non-aggression, which was signed the middle of April. The accused did not attend a Cabinet meeting, at which it was considered, for he had already resigned in April and traveled during March, when he did not attend Cabinet meetings.

Page 29168 Exhibit 3216, the affidavit of USHIBA, Tomohiko, * stated that the affiant had previously testified concerning the writings of KONOYE, for whom he was private secretary. He recognized a document shown him entitled "The Change of Cabinet Ministers Related to Economic Affairs" as being in the handwriting of ARAYA, KONOYE's secretary. It was similar to other documents dictated to ARAYA by KONOYE.

29169 Exhibit 3216-A, being the document referred to in the affidavit, was received in evidence. The exhibit stated * that after the Diet session, reshuffling the Cabinet became recognized as a matter of common sense. It was said that the Ministers related to economic affairs were the weak point. Even if such Ministers had held conferences, it was said there would have been none capable of putting the matter into shape. Since Home Minister HIRANUMA and he were not well versed in economic affairs and since there was no alternative but to select a suitable person from outside, KONOYE, after consulting with HIRANUMA, had to decide on the proper person. Although IKEDA was thought to be a good choice, there were strong objections to him by the reformists.

29170 * IKEDA's opinion was that the Finance Minister too, must be replaced, and NAKAJIMA, Yadanji, was suggested. OGURA, of Osaka, claimed this was not necessary and that NAKAJIMA was not acceptable. For Commerce and Industry Minister, OGURA suggested HATA, MURATA, and FUJIWARA. For President of the Planning Board, SUZUKI, Teiichi, YAMADA, Tatsuo, KAYA, AOKI and INO, were suggested.

29171 The Tokyo Nichi Nichi reported on the conference between OGURA and HIRANUMA and on OGURA's entrance into the Cabinet on the March 30 issue. On the following day OGURA's retirement as General Director of the Sumitomo Honsha was announced. It was urgent to make an announcement, and KONOYE told the War and Navy Ministers about OGURA's entry to the Cabinet and received their support. After discussing OGURA's independent entrance into the Cabinet with him, OGURA still maintained * that he would be distressed if he were not appointed with the others.

OGURA later visited KONOYE and consented to enter the Cabinet alone. He said he had changed his mind but the persuasion of YAMASHITA seemed to have had considerable effect. KONOYE told newspaper reporters that this reconsideration was an independent thing, but they apparently construed it to mean that the problem of the change of Cabinet Ministers relating to economic affairs had been temporarily settled.

NARRATIVE SUMMARY OF THE RECORD
September 24, 1947
DEFENSE - HOSHINO

Page Accordingly, the subsequent change in the Minister of Commerce and President of the Planning Board was a complete surprise. On 2 April, KONOYE reported to the Emperor, and the same day OGURA was invested as Minister of State. When KONOYE conferred with OGURA as to the choice of SUZUKI, Teiichi, as President of the Planning Board, * he expressed his approval. On 2 April, KONOYE called SUZUKI and proposed his appointment to the presidency. SUZUKI replied it would be all right with him, but the Navy might object. He asserted a balance of power between the army and navy would be a problem, and he said he could not decide the matter himself and showed disapproval.

29172

This point of view was justified, and on hearing it, the thought occurred to KONOYE that he should select the Minister of Commerce from the Navy, and appoint Vice Navy Minister TOYODA, Teijiro. The story that TOYODA, at the Conference of Vice Ministers, once argued down the Vice Minister of Commerce and Industry * on the problem of iron and coal, showed he was qualified for the post. Also, according to Baron ITO, HIRAO had TOYODA in mind as his successor as President of the Nippon Iron Manufacturing Company. In addition to the fact that TOYODA was not altogether an amateur in commerce and industrial administration, his appointment would make the character of the Commerce Ministry as a Munitions Ministry become clear. This, together with the Planning Board headed by SUZUKI, would mark an advance toward perfection of the national defense structure.

It would mean that the balance of power between the army and navy would be maintained. As for Commerce Minister KOBAYASHI, he would lose face if he were replaced by a business man or young bureaucrat, but if his successor came from the military the matter of prestige would be dissolved. When KONOYE mentioned the matter to SUZUKI, he said it was a capital idea and he would mention it to the War Minister.

SUZUKI told KONOYE that should the topic of the conversation leak out, he would tell newspapermen that they discussed various matters pertaining to the East Asia Bureau of the IRAA. * On 3 April, when KONOYE met Navy Minister OIKAWA, he discussed the matter and OIKAWA endorsed it and said that since War Minister TOJO was not there, he would speak to KONOYE later about it, after conferring with TOJO. KIDO also endorsed the matter.

The War and Navy Ministers met KONOYE together and gave him their replies of endorsement. TOJO suggested SUZUKI be placed on the reserve list and appointed not only as President of the Planning Board, but also hold the additional office of Minister of State Without Portfolio. KONOYE agreed. OIKAWA also stated that TOYODA would be placed on the reserve list.

* KONOYE talked to OGURA about the appointments of SUZUKI and TOYODA, and he heartily endorsed it. KONOYE then reported the progress of the discussions to KIDO, HIRANUMA, OIKAWA, and TOJO. OIKAWA later called KONOYE and told him that TOYODA was reluctant and requested time to ponder the appointment.

On 4 April, OKA, Chief of the Bureau of Naval Affairs, informed KONOYE that it was still difficult to realize, so KONOYE requested that OIKAWA try once more to persuade TOYODA. OIKAWA reported that although everything would be all right, he wanted KONOYE to speak in person. * KONOYE did so, but TOYODA did not reply in the affirmative, saying he had no confidence in his ability. He asked TOYODA to give a reply by 1800 that night.

Then the War and Navy Ministers called on KONOYE later, they asked about TOYODA's reply. TOJO wanted an answer by 1500, saying 1800 would be too late. Since the army had already obtained SUZUKI's consent, there was a fear of leakage and therefore it wanted the navy to expedite the matter. They decided to have OIKAWA persuade TOYODA once more. KONOYE summoned HIRANUMA, and requested that he persuade TOYODA. At 1500 of the same day, OIKAWA and TOYODA came to KONOYE's residence with a reply of consent.

* OIKAWA said he would recommend the promotion of Vice Minister TOYODA to full Admiral. Since TOYODA desired to remain in active service, it was arranged to have him put on the reserve list in exchange for his promotion to full admiral.

KONOYE called and told HOSHINO, President of the Planning Board, of TOYODA's consent. He had already been informed by TOJO. On the part of Commerce Minister KOBAYASHI, various rumors circulated that he might refuse to resign, so KONOYE had KAZAMI go to KOBAYASHI. Upon hearing that his successor was TOYODA, KOBAYASHI gladly entrusted his resignation to KAZAMI, saying the choice suited him, although he would not consent to FUJIWARA.

 was a Section Chief in the Home Ministry, was asked if he would go to the Total War Research Institute, which was to be opened soon. The witness gave his consent to the request of the authorities in the Home Ministry.

The aim and objects of the Institute was as the witness understood then that its chief object was rather to educate the younger people and do away with tute staff consisted of 7, including the witness, and they were to start work with a clerk, a typist, and a telephone operator, in the rented office. Being without orders from the Premier, under whose administration the Institute was placed, or from HOSHINO, the staff had to study by themselves what kind of work should be carried on.

29184 At the end of October, 1940, the office was moved to a Cabinet house, but they had to share it with other offices for some time. After April, 1941, about 35 students entered the Institute. * The budget of the Institute for the first year was 160,000 yen, to be spent in paying personnel and office expenditures. There was no estimate of expenditures for the work of the Institute. As the Institute did not operate until January of 1941, when General IIMURA became President, they had no business on which to report to HOSHINO. During this period HOSHINO did not visit the Institute, gave no orders or instructions concerning it, and showed no interest. The witness had to go to HOSHINO's office twice to ask him as to when the president would be selected.

Page About May or June of 1941, HOSHINO was selected by the Institute as one of the 15 or 16 councillors. The position was nominal and honorary, and included no practical work in relation to the Institute. HOSHINO, as such, gave neither instructions nor suggestion.

29185 IIMURA was appointed President in January, 1941, but took over practical leadership in November, 1940. After this, the work of the Institute became more concrete. Plans were drafted and preparations made for education. The adoption of the system of the total maneuver in education was one of the plans framed under IIMURA's guidance at this time.

The witness was told that IIMURA was picked as President because he was well-qualified as an educator of young students. As President, he proved to be a good educator, although he once spoke jokingly of his holding such a second-rate position.

29186 As for students, they admitted from one to four from each department of the government proportionate to the number of officials therein, and also took six or seven from business organizations, and there were some from the press. * Institute personnel were reduced on account of the policy of simplifying administration at the end of 1942, and for practical purposes it ceased to operate at the end of 1943, when the third group of students finished their course.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. SHIOBARA, Counsel for KIMURA.

29187 * The witness stated that KIMURA never attended any meeting of the Institute. While KIMURA was a councillor, as he had explained, this was in name only, and he did not engage in any activities of the organization.

29188 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
29189 3218 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that in July, 1940, when HOSHINO became President of the Planning Board, the witness was appointed his secretary. From then until April, 1941, when HOSHINO resigned, the witness worked closely with him. Even after resigning, at HOSHINO's request, the witness lived at HOSHINO's house and took charge of the transaction of his miscellaneous business, collecting materials for speeches and arranging manuscripts.

29190 * After retiring as President of the Planning Board, HOSHINO spent his days chiefly in reading, exercise, and travelling. Those who visited him most frequently at that time were ISHIWATA, Sotaro, IRIMANO, and OBATA, who were HOSHINO's intimate friends since school days. There were a few others who came to play tennis, and these were about all who ever visited him during that period. No visit was made by any so-called professional politician.
HOSHINO visited TOJO only once. Immediately after his resignation, he called on TOJO for a courtesy call. He never visited TOJO since then, ever seen TOJO outside their homes, nor ever talked to TOJO on the telephone.

29191 HOSHINO said that he resigned from the Planning Board because he had been away in Manchuria for a long period, and there was a necessity for him to look over conditions. Therefore he traveled on long trips and short trips, and hardly found time to rest at his Tokyo home.
Except for one trip, they were all made with his daughters or other family members.

29192 In October, he returned to Tokyo to attend the discussion sponsored by the Oriental Economist Publishing Company and then he traveled to Northern Kyushu and Korea.
* Making use of his few days stay in Tokyo, on 19 October he went to the Kabuki Theater, and on entering it read an extra reporting that the Imperial Order came for TOJO.
This was the first time HOSHINO knew that fact. His only observation was that TOJO would have hardships. He went into the Kabuki Play, but about 8 p. m. was called out and told to go to TOJO's residence. On this account he was obliged to cancel his prearranged trips after the 19th.

THERE WAS NO CROSS-EXAMINATION OF THE WITNESS.

* The witness identified and verified Exhibit 2950 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was Chief of the General Affairs Section of the Cabinet Secretariat from November 1937 to April 1945-at the time when HOSHINO was president of the Planning Board and Minister without Portfolio in the 2nd KONOYE Cabinet in 1940. Later after HOSHINO's appointment as Chief Secretary of the TOJO Cabinet in October 1941, the witness served under him.

One of his duties was to have charge of documents filed in the Cabinet Secretariat. In this post the witness used to receive notices from the Secretary of the Privy Council to send the minimum number of Explainers necessary to attend a particular Privy Council Meeting. He would notify the ministers of this and they in turn would issue orders to subordinates as to who would attend as Explainers to assist.

At about 6 o'clock P M on the day TOJO was appointed to form a cabinet in October, 1941, the witness was requested to see him suddenly. When the witness went to TOJO, Col. AKAMATSU who later became TOJO's secretary was waiting for the witness. TOJO told the witness that he had to select someone as Chief Cabinet Secretary. Since he was not familiar with civil service affairs he asked the witness his opinion on the proper person for the post. Pressed by AKAMATSU for his answer, the witness stated that the Chief Secretary should be an able man, not autocratic and with a good civil service record. TOJO gave the witness some names, one of whom was HOSHINO and asked if the Secretariat could work smoothly under him. The witness replied that he thought HOSHINO the proper person.

* TOJO then asked the witness the procedure to be followed in forming the cabinet. The next day the witness learned that HOSHINO had been appointed chief secretary. HOSHINO later told the witness that all he had done after resigning from the KONOYE Cabinet in April, 1941 until this appointment was to travel around Japan.

One of the duties of the Chief Secretary was to have Imperial Rescripts prepared. Late in November, 1941, HOSHINO ordered the witness to prepare a Rescript in the event negotiations with the United States should be successful and another one proclaiming a state of war with the United States and Britain. The former was listed on a memo which HOSHINO gave the witness saying "This should also be prepared as it may be necessary. This memo was in HOSHINO's handwriting and read that in case Japan should suffer great hardship the Emperor should be requested to proclaim an Imperial Decree to settle the peoples' minds and retain national power.

* The memo was returned to HOSHINO after typing and placed in the Secretariat files. He heard it was later destroyed in an air raid. After receiving the memo the witness began drafting the Rescript and showed the draft for Peace to HOSHINO early in December, after he had been told to hurry preparation of it. HOSHINO did not approve of the draft and returned it for reconsideration. The witness intended to revise it but the press of other business was too great and it remained in a pending status until after the outbreak of the war. If the draft had been needed for actual use the normal course would have been to revise it until it was satisfactory.

The general purport of the draft was that Japan would be in a very difficult position but the people should try to maintain national strength and friendly relations with other nations. The draft was never used and after the outbreak of the war the witness destroyed * the two copies. This was done as it was recognized there was no further need for the drafts and also it was the practice in the cabinet secretariat to burn preparatory drafts.

The witness stated that confidential documents handled by the Chief Secretary related to personnel matters and documents which had been referred to cabinet meetings. At the time of the TOJO Cabinet, there were four private secretaries attached to the prime minister.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY BRIG. QUILLIAM.

The procedure in appointing the Chief Secretary was for the Premier Designate to report to the Throne which made the appointment but the selection was made by the premier and investiture took place following Imperial sanction. Customarily when there is a change of premier there was a change of chief cabinet secretary. The witness recalled that TOJO mentioned HOSHINO * and SHIOBARA, Tokisaburo for the post.

In Exhibit 3212-A the interrogation of HOSHINO, the witness was asked what he did after resigning from the Planning Board until April 1941. He stated that for half a year thereafter he had no special job but visited various parts of the country. These were private trips except once he made a speech in regard to certain Chuchiku savings. He had been in Manchuria for a number of years and therefore made this trip to see conditions there.

* At that time the accused did not know the reason for the collapse of the third KONOYE Cabinet as he had been out on trips, since between August and October. He later heard it collapsed because of internal friction.

There was no special reason why he, the accused, became Chief Secretary of the Cabinet except he had been requested by TOJO on the 17th. At that time he had already purchased a ticket to go to Korea. The accused would not say that he and TOJO were exactly old friends. However, TOJO was in Manchuria at the same time as the accused for two years and he came to know him then and also when TOJO was War Minister and HOSHINO was on the Cabinet Planning Board.

KONOYE appointed the accused as president of the Planning Board originally. He did not attend cabinet meetings as a cabinet * member but did sit in along with two others. He had no right to vote on any question nor did he keep notes of the meetings. No one kept notes on the meetings but the President of the Information Bureau gave information to the newspapers.

In Exhibit 2225, the interrogation of HOSHINO, the witness was asked if he were the closest man in the cabinet to TOJO. He replied that as chief secretary he was the closest to TOJO but could not say he was the closest advisor.

Continuing with Exhibit 3212-A, the witness stated that he had not been asked for advice by TOJO previous to the war nor gave any. He just carried out instructions as secretary.

At the Imperial Conference of December 1st 1941 TOJO explained the situation which was in substance that if the negotiations did not succeed during the beginning of December there would be war. The accused was present at the conference but not as a member and he was not permitted to express anything at the Privy Council meeting on December 8 1941. At this later meeting the accused believed that the Chief of the Information Bureau was present but could not say definitely. As the chief and the accused were not members they did not have to attend the meetings except when they pertained to their duties. So possibly the chief may have attended this meeting.

29208 * From Prosecution Exhibit 83, an ordinance creating and regulating the Privy Council was read an excerpt stating that though the Privy Council is the Emperor's highest resort of counsel, it shall not interfere with the executive.

29209 Exhibit 3221, Regulations of the Declaration Conference, an Imperial ordinance dated Nov 10 1893 was received in evidence.

29210 Exhibit 3232, a telegram from Amb. Grew dated May 18, 1939 stated that at Grew's conference that day with Foreign Minister ARITA the latter handed him a message requesting him to deliver it to the U.S. Secretary of State on his forthcoming visit, to Washington so that the message might be brought to the attention of the President. The message stated that at present there was serious antagonism among European nations. No one could assure there would not be a clash in the near future. If war broke out its consequences would be beyond imagination, with indescribable suffering and destruction of civilization. It was necessary for them to exert efforts to prevent this. He believed that the main duty of the U.S. was to prevent a * conflict since they were outside the scope of the ordinary struggle.

On cool scrutiny of the European situation since World War No. 1, they concluded that although Germany and Italy might be advised to be more patient, Britain and France also had a great deal to reconsider. Intention of the United States was to prevent such catastrophe and save Europe from war. It was similarly Japan's wish that nations have their own proper place and thus true world peace might be established.

For himself ARITA was doing his utmost to realize this and believed that closer cooperation between Japan and the United States and deeper understanding was possible.

29212 * Exhibit 3223, a telegram from Dooman, U.S. Charge de Affaire at Interim in Tokyo, dated July 8, 1939, referred to the message from the Prime Minister which was handed to Grew by ARITA in the previous exhibit. The Department desired to be consulted with regard to the question of the time when the reply should be delivered. Before arranging to call on ARITA for the purpose of handing the reply to him for transmission to the Department they should telegraph their opinion whether the opportune time for the reply had arrived. When the reply was delivered the Department desired that ARITA be informed that it was requested that it be strictly confidential and not for publication.

The reply to the premier stated that on Grew's return to Washington, he delivered to DOOMAN the message which the premier had placed in his hands through Foreign Minister ARITA. He had read with interest HIRANUMA's expressions of concern at the existence of antagonism among European nations and of the consequences to civilization should there be war. Prime Minister HIRANUMA saw it as the duty of both governments * since they were outside the scope of the European conflict, to exert efforts to prevent the casualty envisaged.

DOOMAN stated that he had also noted statements regarding strained relations in the European situation, the interest of the U.S. in preserving peace and the wish of Japan that relations might be arranged for true world peace. DOOMAN stated that Premier HIRANUMA would have no doubt that the U.S. desired to see established upon the basis of fair play a condition of true peace. The premier will be apprised of recent efforts of the U.S. including the president's message of Sept 26 1938 to the heads of several European governments, also of messages of April 14 1939 by the president and Hull respectively to Hitler and Mussolini * with regard to removing the pervading threat of European war.

It would be gratifying to Hull and the President if there could be ways for using Japan's influence toward discouraging among European governments, especially those with which Japan might have special relations, the taking of any action endangering peace.

HULL was confident that any such contribution would be a high service to those living in fear of war.

With further reference to HIRANUMA's desire to see world peace established, Hull observed that this objective was made more remote by the continuance of armed conflict and disturbances in the Far East. Just as European events had repercussions in the Far East, prolongation of abnormal conditions in the Far East contributed to unrest in Europe.

The U.S. opinion was perturbed by the trend of events there especially with regard to Japanese relations with China. If it should prove impracticable to make effective contribution at once to the settlement of European problems, there would still be an urgent need for efforts in connection with disturbed conditions elsewhere.

It was Hull's view that each peaceful settlement constituted an important step toward improving the world situation. HIRANUMA could be assured of the desire of Pres. Roosevelt and of Hull to do all within their power to convert into practical results those principles to which they had frequently given expression. The U.S. did not perceive any practicable additional steps but was sincerely interested in the suggestion contained in HIRANUMA's message. They would be pleased to have such further information as the premier might find it agreeable to offer.

29217 *The telegram replying from Pres. Roosevelt to HIRANUMA was received in evidence but not read. (Ex. 3224).

29219 Exhibit 3225, a letter to Hull from Charge de Affaire DOOMAN dated June 7 1939 stated that Dooman in his telegram of May 26th had observed that there were elements in Japan * who were not to be confused with those who had been saying that reaction to Japan's China policy was just around the corner, who realized that in the event of a European war the maintenance by Japan of neutrality between the democratic and totalitarian camps would afford little security to Japan and that national security could only be assured by liquidating the China conflict.

Dooman stated he was not unaware of the need for such observation on a firm basis. It was his purpose in this dispute to lay before the State Dept. the circumstances on which his view was based. As there was no discussion in the press or elsewhere of whether or not Japan should align itself with Germany and Italy, his information with regard to thought trends came by word of mouth. Whether by incident or design, Dooman stated he was approached on May 18th by a Japanese who had been unknown to him but whom Grew knew and who suggested that Dooman have a chat with the premier.

29221 Dooman informed Grew of the call and of this suggestion. Grew said he had a favorable impression of FUJII, the person who had called and saw no reason * why he should not return a favorable reply. Dooman told FUJII that he would be glad to make the acquaintance of the premier but had heard rumors of the possibility of a change in government and wondered whether the time was opportune.

The next day FUJII brought an invitation from HIRANUMA to dinner on May 23rd when he intended to explain his purpose in sending through Grew his message to the secretary and word to the effect no government change was impending. Dooman accepted the invitation and FUJII then emphasized the importance of keeping the forthcoming talk a secret. He said HIRANUMA's political position was reasonably secure but the alignment of factions over European policy was so delicate it required Prem. HIRANUMA to act cautiously.

As they went to the dinner by car FUJII proposed they alight some distance from the premier's residence and go the rest of the way on foot. At the gate were a number of policemen who though surprised to see a foreigner made no attempt to stop Dooman.

*HIRANUMA received him very courteously and said he unfortunately had few opportunities to meet foreigners and received at first hand their impressions on world conditions. HIRANUMA said that in his view the European situation was delicate and he felt confident that he could obtain from an American a more objective appraisal of that situation than from any European.

29223

Dooman expressed regret that he could give HIRANUMA no more information than was public knowledge. During the ensuing conversation HIRANUMA displayed knowledge not only of a factual nature of of political trends there which surprised Dooman. One point brought out was that Hitler provided an issue around which all elements in Great Britain can rally; the imperialists who could not tolerate a Germany equal to Britain, industrialists who feared German commercial competition, and Jews, radicals and Germanophiles who vied in their hatred of Hitler.

*HIRANUMA said the possibility of a European war was contemplated with horror. It would destroy civilization and no nation could escape eventual consequences. He had publicly stated that Japan could never be a democracy or a totalitarian state and that its greatest contribution would be to bring together the two groups of nations.

HIRANUMA said there were elements in Japan which considered she could not afford to be isolated and that security demanded she enter into special relations with Germany and Italy. HIRANUMA insisted, however, that Japan follow "moral diplomacy". A nation's existence could not be measured by decades and statesmen must fix their attention on long term objectives rather than on obtaining favorable tactical positions. The most important objective was a stabilized peace. Japan like the United States was not directly involved in European problems.

Those two were in a position to exercise a moderating influence on Europe. This was a duty they owed their peoples. The first step was to check the tendency toward the division of Europe into two political hostile camps. He wondered whether the views of the U.S. were responsive to those he had expressed in his message to the secretary.

* HIRANUMA said the belief was widely held abroad that Japan was considering a military alliance with Germany and Italy. He tried to explain the basis of Japan's sympathy for Germany and Italy. The basis of this was the fact that all three countries were in the same economic strategic position. He believed that Japan could not tie itself by special relations to any government whose stability depended on the continued existence and prestige of one individual.

In Germany and Italy were political currents which would gravely prejudice confidence in any political arrangement such as an alliance. Hidden elements would make themselves felt in time of war and were to be reckoned with as a threat to the success of Germany and Italy arms.

*after dinner HIRANUMA said that U.S. and Japan were the only powers which could help prevent the trend toward the division of Europe into armed camps. However there could be no confident hope that permanent peace could be established until worldwide economic and political conditions which brought about unrest in Europe and the Far East could be corrected. If an international conference could be called to solve these problems Japan would be prepared to agree to include the Far Eastern situation among the problems for discussion. Before such a conference, France, Britain, Germany and Italy would have to be sounded out.

If Roosevelt were prepared to approach the European democracies, HIRANUMA would be glad to approach Germany and Italy. * If favorable replies came he would be glad to have Roosevelt call a conference under such conditions as might be agreed upon. He wished to make it clear that he did not want to put forward the views of those Japanese who harbored hopes of restoring good relations with the democratic nations as being necessarily the views of the government. These were the views of a powerful element however and they could not be ignored.

Dooman alluded to the discrepancy between HIRANUMA's attitude and Foreign Minister ARITA who was preoccupied over the Anglo-Soviet negotiations. Hiranuma's desire for American collaboration to bring about peace could not be reconciled with the readiness which was almost an eagerness on the part of ARITA to meet a fancied threat from Britain. These two points of view reflected conflicting policies and which would prevail might be decided in the next few days.

29243

In May 1941 he attended a cabinet meeting with Premier KONOYE and MATSUOKA. The question of Japanese-U.S. negotiations then in progress was discussed. The witness recalled distinctly a speech made by HIRANUMA who was then Home Minister. The theme of the speech was that Japan must not fight for any reason. He said if war started between big powers it was almost inevitable that it would become worldwide. Such hostilities would become protracted and no one could foresee the damage and devastation.

Untold damage would accrue to the industries of all nations and the human race be thrown into misery. * He stated that considering the present economic conditions in Japan he believed she would not be able to withstand a protracted war. His speech lasted for about thirty minutes and was an impassioned plea against war. Since HIRANUMA was usually a silent and reticent man it was unusual for him to speak at such great length.

had been an admiral in the Japanese Navy, remaining in

After the February 26 Incident in 1936, he resigned.
From 1940 to the surrender, he attended many meetings of the Jushin, or Elder Statesmen.

29260 He was present at the meeting on 29 November, 1941. This meeting, instead of being called as usual by the Lord Chamberlain at the Emperor's request, was convened on the request of Premier TOJO, and the Imperial Palace was the place of assemblage. At the morning session, TOJO and Cabinet Ministers spoke on the current situation.
It was explained that negotiations with the U. S. had reached an impasse. While the speakers did not say so, it was evident that the government * felt war was inevitable. TOJO did not state that the government had decided to go to war, and government members did not attempt to persuade them in support of war. The Elder Statesmen asked questions of the Ministers, who replied that the government's position would be understood if the facts were shown and if they could disclose the figures which they had; but they stated they could not disclose them, as they were state secrets.

None of the Elder Statesmen supported or encouraged war, especially WAKATSUKI, KONOYE, HIRANUMA, and the witness. Without previous deliberation, they urged the government to reconsider and proceed cautiously in any matter which would bring about hostilities. The Elder Statesmen all expressed negative opinions.

29261 After the morning session they were given a luncheon by the Emperor, and afterwards they each submitted their dissuading opinions to the Throne. It may have been that one of the statesmen * made a statement that the matter would have to rest in the hands of the government. The witness did not recall who said this, but he did know it was not HIRANUMA. Since they had not been told that the government had decided on war, and since they were not informed of the grounds based on figures, which they had been told were state secrets, they could not go into the matter deeply and had to confine themselves to expressing negative and dissuading opinions.

29262 With reference to TOJO's views that Japan would be strangled slowly, the witness warned that the country must not be driven to a sudden clash, which would be worse than the slow strangulation TOJO feared. This opinion was concurred in completely by HIRANUMA. The opinions of the Statesmen submitted to the Throne repeated the views expressed in the morning session to the Premier and Cabinet Ministers. The majority, including HIRANUMA, * were not satisfied with the government's explanations, and they said the government must handle the matter with utmost caution.

The Statesmen were before the Throne for a comparatively short time, but spent the entire afternoon with the government officials. The attitude of neither, however, did not change, and they parted with no premonition that within ten days the attack on Pearl Harbor would be made. The Elder Statesmen who attended this conference were WAKATSUKI, KONOYE, HIRANUMA, YONAI, HIROTA, HAYASHI, ABE, and the witness. The Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, KIDO, was present at the luncheon and the talk following, but did not attend either session of the conference.

29263 Although Japan met with early victories, the situation later changed and conditions became bad, until in 1943, WAKATSUKI, KONOYE, HIRANUMA, and the witness, who had always opposed war, agreed that it must be brought to an end. With this end in mind, the four met frequently. * They first met in KONOYE'S houses, but this became too dangerous because of air raids and they rented a room in the Dai Ichi building. HIRANUMA and the witness acted as secretary for the group. They resolved that the first step was to introduce into the Cabinet a man who opposed war. They selected YONAI, and tried to secure his appointment. They went great lengths to create occasions when they could talk with the Premier to accomplish their end, but were unsuccessful in getting YONAI into the Cabinet. A position was offered him without portfolio, but this could not accomplish their ends and they sought to have him appointed as Navy Minister, but the government would not agree.

29264 The later dissatisfaction with the Cabinet in various circles was expressed, and they became imbued with the idea that the Cabinet could not cope with the situation. * On 17 July, 1944, WAKATSUKI, KONOYE, HIRANUMA, and the witness met at HIRANUMA'S home for a discussion, and they were later joined by three Elder Statesmen.

Page As a result, they concluded that to find their way through the difficult situation, it was necessary to renew the popular mind. All people must cooperate to build a powerful Cabinet which would surge forward unswervingly. Partial reorganization would be of no use.

29265 * This resolution was passed because it was apparent the Cabinet had lost popular appeal, and they believed it necessary to retire it to bring the war to an end. The witness handed this resolution to KIDO and reported to him what had happened in the meeting. On the next day, July 18, the Cabinet resigned en bloc, and an Elder Statesmen's meeting was convened to recommend a new government head. At this meeting, HIRANUMA pointed out that the army had lost the people's support, and further military interference with national life was not advisable. HIRANUMA supported KONOYE's suggestion, that SUZUKI head the next Cabinet, and he praised SUZUKI's personality. Eventually, however, KOISO was recommended.

29266 After the meeting, WAKATSUKI, KONOYE, HIRANUMA, and the witness conferred, and KONOYE went to the other statesmen to get their agreement and make arrangements for the Emperor's order * for the new Cabinet, which would be given to KOISO and YONAI jointly and appointing YONAI to the Navy Minister. Such an order was unprecedented, but YONAI succeeded. Having YONAI in the Navy Ministry was to insure a man in the Cabinet who opposed war.

29267 At the Statesmen's meeting of 5 April 1945, when the KOISO Cabinet resigned, HIRANUMA succeeded in recommending SUZUKI Kantaro, as the next Premier. HIRANUMA had long averted SUZUKI, who had served the Emperor * as Lord Chamberlain for a long time.

29269 * On August 9, 1945, the Supreme Conference for the direction of war was convened before the Throne to discuss and decide whether Japan should accept the Potsdam Declaration. HIRANUMA was then President of the Privy Council and not a regular member of the conference, but did attend at the Emperor's request. At the conference HIRANUMA supported acceptance of the Potsdam Declaration. While the witness was not present, he knew personally that HIRANUMA attended, and learned his position from conversations held with him and other persons who were present. At the end of the conference, the Emperor approved acceptance of the Potsdam Declaration, and surrender was decided upon.

29270 * The witness stated he was present at the Elder Statesmen's meeting 5 April, 1945, when SUZUKI was recommended as Premier. HIRANUMA strongly advocated his appointment, and the witness had a conversation about it in which 29271 HIRANUMA gave his reason for supporting SUZUKI. * The reasons were that the next Premier must be a statesman who would be able to keep in some form the basis of Japanese political life so that it would retain its fundamental character. If that basis were destroyed, Japan would have to fight to the last man, and a man who could preserve the nation intact was necessary.

29273 The witness identified exhibit 3230 as a letter from him to KONOYE dated 13 August 1943. * The letter stated that the present situation was grave and greatly concerned them all. OKADA thought that it was the Elder Statesmen's duty to talk with the Premier and other Ministers, and proposed that KONOYE, HIRANUMA, and himself invite Premier TOJO, SUZUKI, KAYA, AOKI, and SHIGEMITSU, to lunch on August 30 at the Peers Club. The hosts would be the Chairman of the Privy Council, HARA, WAKATSUKI, HIRANUMA, KONOYE, YONAI, HIROTA, ABE, and OKADA. KONOYE was asked to reply if he agreed.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. KEENAN.

29274 * The witness stated that the Genro was the group of distinguished Japanese who brought about the Meiji Restoration and that they held a special position of reverence and standing in Japan. It became the duty of the Genro, as a matter of tradition, to recommend to the Throne the succeeding Premiers at the termination of each Cabinet. As the members of the Genro passed away 29275 there was no means of succession. * The last Genro was Prince Saionji, who died in November, 1940. Prior to that time, it was well known that he gathered information to enable him to make recommendations to the Emperor, and this function was understood and accepted.

29276 The Senior Statesmen consisted of former Prime Ministers and the President of the Privy Council. They were first organized at the time of the selection of the Premier for the second KONOYE Cabinet about 22 July, 1940. At that time, Prince SAIONJI, being advanced in years, was ill, and it was found necessary to provide a plan to continue the Genro function in making recommendations to the Emperor. * The plan evolved was that the function of the Genro on the death of SAIONJI should be performed by the Lord Keeper, who should advise with the Senior Statesmen.

The second meeting of the Senior Statesmen had to do with the selection of KONOYE in his third Cabinet, and the third function concerned selecting TOJO as Premier.

29277 * The witness thought it was highly necessary that the Senior Statesmen be well and completely informed on vital matters affecting Japan's national and international problems. When asked if unless this was done if the meetings of the Senior Statesmen would amount to a meaningless gesture and a fraud, the witness stated that to some extent that information was imparted to them by the Lord Keeper. It was necessary for the functioning of the statesmen that information be possessed before they advised the Emperor. The witness thought the meeting of 29 November 1941 was held with the Emperor's consent, but was not brought about by the Grand Chamberlain. * They would not have been there unless the Emperor wanted to know their views. This was the only time that the Senior Statesmen had been called upon to function on any occasion other than the selection of a Premier. This gave the meeting a special significance. It was understood by the witness and the other former Premiers and the Privy Council President that it was one of the most important occasions in modern Japanese history.

29279 * They were called upon to confer with the Cabinet and deliberate so they could faithfully give advice to the Emperor at this fateful moment. It was well known to everyone present that there was grave danger of war breaking out with the U. S., Britain, and the Netherlands.

At the time of the Russo-Japanese war, the witness was on the ship "Admiral Togo", and he participated in the Japanese-Russian naval engagement in that war. When asked if he learned then that war could break out with Japan attacking very suddenly, he replied that he didn't know anything about that.

29280 * At the meeting of 29 November 1941, state secrets were not disclosed. Although they asked for the 29281 information, it was refused on that ground. * The witness did not know which or how many Senior Ministers or the Privy Council President were not trusted by the Cabinet.
29282 * He did not know after they were refused this information by the Cabinet whether it was likewise withheld from the Emperor.

Page He had not heard any information that at the 29284 meeting of 29 November, 1941, the most important information
 * they desired to obtain was whether an attack against the 29285 U. S., Britain, and the Netherlands had been definitely determined. * The Senior Statesmen all desired to know the true domestic and international situation. They wished to know whether the government intended to strike at the U. S., Britain, and the Netherlands by way of war, but were not told of it. At that time the witness was not a War 29286 Councillor. * He did not know whether if he had been one, if he would have had that information on 29 November, 1941, although he had been a War Councillor at one time.

29289 He believed there were elements attempting to control Japan's future by the employment of force, who were difficult to ascertain. * They did not know that war had been decided upon when they were to advise the Emperor. Six weeks before, the Cabinet had been chosen with the approval of the same Statesmen that sought 29290 information on 29 November, 1941. * After the conference, they lunched and advised with the Emperor.

29291 It was not so that the most important thing to advise him was whether or not war should be instituted against the U. S., Britain, and the Netherlands. This was a very important thing, but up to that moment they had not heard a word as to whether the government was actually intending to open hostilities. He did not know that at the time they were seeking information from TOJO'S Cabinet a fleet was on its way, prepared and under orders to strike at Pearl Harbor. At that meeting, each Statesman expressed his views to the Emperor. * Eight statesmen were present, and the witness thought that he expressed to the Emperor that he had sought information as to affairs with the U. S., Britain, and the Netherlands, and that he had been refused such information on the ground it was a state secret. He did not remember others expressing this.

The Lord Keeper, KIDO, was present at the luncheon and at the meeting following. When asked if he had specifically stated that he had sought this information and it had been denied, the witness stated that he expressed it in much milder terms.

29292 * When asked what he meant in his affidavit by the words "Negative opinion was expressed" or "Dissuasive opinion was expressed," the witness stated that the meaning was that they could receive no worth-while information from TOJO, and were worried about this. This was told the Emperor, who listened only and did not talk.

- Nothing was said to indicate that the Emperor knew a fleet was on its way under orders to attack Pearl * Harbor. Most likely the Emperor knew nothing about this. This was the opinion expressed by the Elder Statesmen after the meeting. * If they had known the fleet was on its way to Pearl Harbor, they would have vehemently urged the Emperor to make every effort to avoid opening the war. Of all those present, the one whose official duty would have been to make notes and record the proceedings would have been the accused, KIDO.
- 29295 * From exhibit 1196, the KIDO Diary, was read to the witness an excerpt which stated that from about 2 o'clock, for about an hour, the Emperor listened to the Senior Statesmen's opinions. The Emperor remarked that the times had become very difficult. WAKATSUKI replied that he was not worried about * the spiritual strength of the people, but in the matter of materials the question of whether they could stand a long-range war deserved careful study.
- 29296 HIRANUMA stated that WAKATSUKI had spoken of the spiritual strength and he agreed with him, but when they had already been engaged in war four years, if things should develop into a protracted war, hardships and privations would become necessary. HIRANUMA stated that adequate measures and efforts to brace up public sentiment were necessary. After having been read this, the witness stated he did not recall any precise remark to the contrary made by HIRANUMA.
- 29297 * In regard to the meeting in July, 1944, KIDO did not attend the meeting of the senior statesmen. It was evident at that time that the TOJO Cabinet was about to fall. In regard to the statement in the affidavit that the resolution was passed because it was apparent the Cabinet had lost popular appeal, the witness was asked if it were not a fact that things had gone badly and the real purpose was to get a Cabinet to meet that emergency. He replied that that was so, and at the meeting the senior statesmen recommended the appointment of the accused KOISO as Premier.
- 29300 * When asked if what KIDO had recorded as having been said by HIRANUMA refreshed his recollection and if he had denied or agreed with what KIDO said, the witness stated he could not recall very clearly. * HIRANUMA always said it was necessary to find a man who would be able to carry the war through to the end, so he may have said what KIDO wrote.

29302 From exhibit 1282, another excerpt from the KIDO Diary. HIRANUMA stated that there were two phases of opinion in regard to concluding the war. They must have a person who would fight it out, and they could not recommend any peace advocator. From this import, the choosing of a Premier had important bearings. He was unable to say if * this means that all they have to do is appoint the Premier and the rest be left to him. He stated he was strongly opposed to any advocacy for peace and cessation of hostilities.

29303 When asked if the purport of his affidavit was to the effect that HIRANUMA, on 5 April, 1945, which was the date of the excerpt read, was a real advocate of peace and the cessation of hostilities, the witness stated that in order to bring the war to an early conclusion it was necessary to have a man who would go at it with a fighting spirit to the end. * He did not mean something by way of a suicide attempt, but it was a little different. What he meant was that to bring the war to an early conclusion, it was necessary to go about things with the spirit of carrying the war through to the end with firm determination. Unless one went at it with that spirit, it would be difficult to conclude the war.

He believed HIRANUMA's contention was to bring the war to an end as early as possible. HIRANUMA did not indicate to the witness on 5 April, 1945, that he wanted to accelerate the end of the conflict by way of negotiations for peace.

29304 * The witness did not recall if, during the discussions of the Elder Statesmen about 29 November, 1941, there was any that concerned advice that efforts should be made to subdue and control lawless elements before attempting to rectify things in China, the U. S., and Britain.

The witness could state definitely that on the eve of the Pearl Harbor Attack the Emperor was not concerned in winning or losing the war. He disliked war, but was unable with all his power to avoid it.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY DR. KIYOSE,
Counsel for TOJO.

29306 * The witness stated that at the meeting on 29 November 1941, the government refused to give information on all points, saying they were state secrets, and did not reply to any questions. The witness did not mean there were no replies. TOJO made many, but he did not give information as to what steps were to be taken.

* That the witness wanted to know was information regarding not only the present situation, but also the future. He wanted to ask what the government intended to do, but they did not know of the present situation either.

* The morning session began around 9.30, and continued until about 11.30. He did not recall clearly as to whether the meeting continued longer than that, and that finally upon the Emperor's permission, the questions and answers continued until past noon. The government, through Foreign Minister TOGO, explained the impasse in Japanese-U. S. negotiations, and TOJO gave a general explanation of events, but these were things of which they were already informed. * They learned nothing of what they really wanted to know.

When asked if there were nothing else, the witness stated he did not understand distinctly. Perhaps there was an explanation given by the accused SUZUKI, President of the Planning Board. That they wanted to know pertained to the resources of Japan and her national strength. He did not recall that SUZUKI gave a detailed explanation, but he did recall he gave some. He believed SUZUKI gave them figures taken at random and that the explanations were haphazard and not reliable.

29310

* Asked if he had the knowledge necessary to be able to describe SUZUKI's explanations as haphazard, the witness stated that in certain connections, he himself had made a study and had his own figures. He did not ask SUZUKI if his figures were correct.

29311

* During the audience with the Emperor after the luncheon, he told him that the morning session was devoted primarily to government explanations, and the more the witness heard from the government the more concerned he became. TOJO had stated that if he gave them the figures and statistics he believed they would understand, but since they were state secrets he was unable to do so.

When asked what figures, the witness stated he would rather have TOJO asked about that, but the figures refer to the answers which had been made to his questions. In reply to the witness' questions, TOJO had stated that he believed he would be able to understand if he quoted figures, but he could not do this * because they were state secrets.

29313 The witness knew the Emperor's feelings very * well. He was not concerned with winning or losing a war as much as his hatred for war from the standpoint of human welfare. The witness agreed with this sentiment. After the meal, each submitted his dissuading opinion to the Throne.

When it was suggested to the witness that in view of what he had said previously it would not be thought that the question of dissuasion or of carrying things ahead could arise, the witness stated that that was how he felt, but did not know exactly what the other senior statesmen felt.

29314 In the morning session the government had made explanations concerning the impasse in Japanese-U. S. negotiations. He believed this was the purpose for the government's convening the meeting. * The witness had not heard the Emperor say that there was one question to be settled. He believed the purpose of the meeting was to explain the situation vis-a-vis the Japanese-U. S. negotiations.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY, Counsel for TOGO.

29315 At the meeting of 29 November, 1941, TOGO explained the progress of Japanese-U. S. negotiations in considerable detail. He believed that two or three questions were put to TOGO. * TOGO replied to the questions, and the witness believed those who asked them were satisfied with the answers.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. WARREN.

29316 * The witness stated that he had heard from HIRANUMA himself, that HIRANUMA thought the war could be brought to an end if SUZUKI accepted the portfolio of Premier. * When asked if HIRANUMA told him the reason he had not stated publicly the reason he gave the witness in private as to why he thought SUZUKI would make a good premier, the witness said he had heard the reasons from HIRANUMA. HIRANUMA told him privately that SUZUKI'S appointment would bring about early peace. This statement could not be offered in public, because if he did so this would not have been peace and it would prevent the formation of a succeeding Cabinet.

29323 On the night of August 14-15, 1945, there were two air raid alarms, the second about 5.30 a. m. They learned that on the second raid the planes were not the witness heard a terrific noise and loud shouting outside the house. Looking through the window, she saw a gang of men coming through the front gate, making for the house. She had been warned by the police guards stationed in the house that something unpleasant was likely to happen.

The day before, one of the guards told her he didn't like the way Japanese army planes had been flying low over the house, and that they had better be prepared in the event they should drop bombs on them. She knew the mob had come after HIRANUMA, because they had the fifteen police guards lined up with their hands over their heads.
 She heard the leader of the gang, whom she later learned was an army captain named SASAKI, shouting. He was shouting,
 "Don't you know what sort of a _____ HIRANUMA is? He is a notorious leader of the pro-Anglo-American group and a traitor." SASAKI asked if they didn't realize the country was going to collapse and be destroyed. They should be

In the library was a lone police guard, who made a sign to her indicating HIRANUMA was hiding in the building. Some of the gang appeared to have been students and one of them threatened the nurse and children with a drawn sword in an attempt to tell where HIRANUMA was.

Opening Statement by Mr. Kamaoka.

* Exhibit 3232, an excerpt from the Tokyo Asahi Shimbun of 15 October 1932 described a newspaper interview with HIROTA, the then Ambassador to Moscow when he arrived in Tokyo from his post. HIROTA stated in the interview that Japan's despatch of troops to Manchuria after the outbreak of the Incident there temporarily shocked Russia, who concentrated military strength on the Soviet Manchurian Boundary. At that time Russia had serious financial and other difficulties. There seemed to be a rumor in Japan that Russia was at the bottom of the recent Manchuli Incident. This was an instance which a great nation should be ashamed of. It was the Soviet policy to make previous arrangements for the peaceful settlement of disputes. This was reflected in her apparent intention to conclude a non-aggression pact with Japan and Manchukuo.

HIROTA stated that he believed Ambassador Troyanovsky had undertaken negotiations in Tokyo on this problem. * There were apprehensions in some quarters that even if Russia concluded such a pact, she would still attempt aggression in ideological warfare, but there was no need of such apprehensions. Italy had concluded a non-aggression pact with Russia but no trouble had arisen although in Italy Red propaganda was strictly prohibited. In Germany the existence of Communists was officially admitted, yet that did not end disputes with Russia. In HIROTA's opinion, Japan might conclude the same pact. It was meaningless for Russia to conclude a non-aggression pact with Manchukuo. The other party to the pact ought to be Japan. The Soviet had given de facto recognition to Manchukuo and not only desired a Manchukuan Consul in Manchukuo but also suggested that the Japanese Ambassador hold Manchukuan consulship concurrently. Russia would formally recognize Manchukuo if it benefitted her and negotiations for formal recognition would be pushed forward after consular exchange. * Delimitation of the Soviet-Manchurian boundary had not yet become a subject of discussion.

29394 * The witness had previously identified and verified Exhibit 3202 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that after the resignation of the YONAI Cabinet, the witness, as Chief of the Personnel Affairs Bureau used scrupulous care in recommending HATA's successor as War Minister. He considered the views in the War Ministry of the General Staff and consulted fully with War Vice-Minister ANAMI. The witness decided that TOJO was suitable and recommended him to HATA. There were others who were considered but they are already in other important positions.

29395 TOJO, on the other hand, was in Tokyo as Inspector General of the Air Force and had formerly been Chief of the Military Affairs and of the Maintenance Bureaus and had been War Vice-Minister in the HIRANUMA Cabinet. The witness considered him a suitable administrator and Army circles felt that no one except TOJO would do. In accordance with the recommendation, HATA submitted TOJO's name to the Three Chiefs Conference on 18 July 1940 and the latter were unanimous in recommending TOJO. The witness' recommendation and HATA's submission of TOJO's name to the Three Chiefs was in accordance with standing procedure. The witness stated that the Three Chiefs Conference, which selected TOJO as War Minister, consisted of War Minister HATA, Chief of Staff Prince KAN'UN, and Inspector General YAMADA. The name recommended by the witness was submitted by HATA to the three chiefs. HATA had authority to recommend some person other than the one suggested by the witness. HATA asked the witness to suggest a successor immediately after he tendered his resignation * and the witness received no such request from HATA at any time prior to the YONAI Cabinet resignation. The witness did not know if YONAI asked HATA to recommend someone nor if HATA replied that the successor would be decided in the Three Chiefs Conference. HATA did not tell the witness on 16 July 1940 that he reported to Premier YONAI that there was no one who would be his successor. The witness had no knowledge that HATA made that statement to YONAI. The witness did not know if this failure of HATA's to recommend a successor caused the YONAI Cabinet to fail.

When asked if HATA was very desirous that TOJO replace him, the witness stated that he expressed his views recommending TOJO * and HATA merely agreed.

The witness did not know if HATA, before KONOYE formed his Cabinet, went to the Emperor and recommended that TOJO be appointed. When asked if this was done secretly by HATA, the witness stated he did not think anything was done secretly. He did not know if the Emperor stated that he thought the procedure was wrong because KONOYE was still forming his Cabinet and had not accepted TOJO. The witness did not know if the Emperor stated that he considered HATA's action in secretly recommending TOJO as being over-hasty and out of order.

* Exhibit 3205-B, sworn statement of KANZAKI, Masayoshi, stated that to obtain the letter demanding resignation sent from Prince KANIN to HATA in July 1940, the deponent had requested the First Demobilization Bureau to take all measures possible to search for the letter but it could not be found. Further, with the help of HATA's wife and son, HATA's house had been searched but the letter could not be found. (In spite of the previous two exhibits, the Court sustained an objection to proving the contents of the letter by secondary evidence.)

* DIRECT EXAMINATION OF TANAKA, Ryukichi
BY MR. LAZARUS

The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3233 as his affidavit.

29408

* The affidavit stated that the witness knew the accused HATA very well since December 1924 and their relations had been very close. When HATA was War Minister in the ABE and YONAI Cabinets, the witness was in the Military Service Bureau and he knew HATA well and was very conversant with the workings of the War Ministry. The witness knew that HATA was strongly opposed to the Tripartite Pact and this was known in Army circles. The Army was in favor of the Tripartite Pact and because of HATA's opposition * his orders in the War Ministry were not obeyed.

At the time of his fall, HATA was War Minister in name only because a successor had already been decided upon in Army circles. On 14 February 1945 the witness met General ANAMI, who told him he regretted the part he had played in opposing HATA and in bringing about his resignation. ANAMI had been Vice Minister of War in the YONAI Cabinet. There were other reasons why the Army opposed HATA. Hatred and dislike of him persisted from the day he first supported the readjustment plan of the Army when UGAKI was War Minister and increased when he became War Minister in the ABE Cabinet.

* Other incidents served to heighten hatred and dislike for HATA. Another man had been recommended by the Three Chiefs in the ABE Cabinet, but the Emperor ordered that HATA should have the post. Also, HATA was strongly opposed to participation by Army officers in politics and when he became War Minister for the first time, he told the officers in the War Ministry Building that the present Army was not trusted by the Emperor and it was their first duty to endeavor to recover this trust. All military personnel should cease any participation in politics and return to their regular duties of soldiering. In 1939, when HATA learned that a Colonel made a speech attacking the U.S. and Britain, he became indignant and ordered the witness to have that officer brought to Tokyo. * HATA reprimanded him and transferred him to an outlying post. In the fall of 1939 when HATA was War Minister in the ABE Cabinet, the witness began, under HATA's instructions, negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek for the peaceful settlement of the China Incident. HATA told the witness he wanted to bring about peace by the reduction and then withdrawal of all troops from China. Because of opposition they would have to work under cover and unofficially. Arrangements for the dates and place for the messengers from HATA and from Chiang to meet was a point on which they were to work and the basis of the peace treaty would be the evacuation of all troops from China. HATA said that during negotiations he would show his good faith to the Chinese by reducing troops in China from 900,000 to between 500,000 and 600,000 when he made the next budget. The witness knew that in the 1940 budget he did reduce the number of troops in China * to about 600,000 despite great opposition in the War Ministry and General Staff. It was insisted that Japanese troops should be permanently kept in the Shanghai and North China areas. HATA opposed this and stated they must evacuate all troops and that if they did not evacuate there would be no hope of concluding a peace treaty with Chiang Kai-shek.

The negotiations with Chiang were so secret that at first steps had to be carried out with signal codes. It was difficult to convince Chiang's side that a sincere attempt was being made. Gradually, they were convinced and came to believe that a peace treaty was possible and started deciding on dates and places for future meetings.

* In September 1941, when HATA was Commander in China and when U.S.-Japanese relations were steadily deteriorating, HATA sent his Chief of Staff USHIROGU to Tokyo to see the witness and tell him that HATA wanted to withdraw all troops from China to avoid war with the U.S. HATA asked the witness to help push this plan in the War Ministry. USHIROGU told the witness that HATA instructed him to go to the War Minister, Navy Minister, Chief of Staff and the Premier and give them the same message. After USHIROGU had seen them, he told the witness their answers.

In the spring of 1940 it was proposed to use Chinese prisoners in Japanese coal mines, but HATA opposed it and the plan did not go into effect. In 1942 this question again came up and HATA, who was then Commander of the forces in China, again opposed it and the plan was not carried out. The witness knew that in 1944 Chinese laborers were brought to Japan. This was through the Greater East Asia Ministry. HATA had nothing to do with it and he had no control over it because labor supervision * had been detached from army control and had come under the Greater East Asia Ministry.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. SUTTON

The witness stated that USHIROGU told him after he had met TOJO that TOJO had said that if the U.S. would accept Japanese demands, peace would be secured between the two countries.

29416

After 1939 HATA became Commander of all Japanese forces in China. In 1939 he advocated the withdrawal of troops. From 1 March 1941 to 22 November 1944, he extended the theater of military operations to large portions of China. Troops under his command in 1941 captured Fuchow * and Ichang. In 1942, 1943 and 1944, his troops captured Lungling, Tunchung, Changteh, Chinchow, Loyang, Changsha, Hengyang, Kweilin, and Liuchow.

29427 The witness had previously identified and verified Exhibit 3234 as his affidavit.

The affidavit stated that the witness had served in the Foreign Office from 1922 to 1946. From 1930 to May 1935 he took charge of business concerning the Soviet, holding a post in the first section of the Bureau of European and American Affairs. He was directly in charge of the business concerning the conclusion of the Soviet-Japanese Non-Aggression Pact and the purchase of the East China Railway. He had served in the Embassy at Moscow between May 1935 and November 1937 and from December 1940 to March 1945.

29428 On 2 May 1933 Foreign Minister Litvinov proposed to Ambassador OTA, who had succeeded HIROTA, to open negotiations for selling the ECR and negotiations started on 27 June 1933 at Tokyo. * The crucial point was the selling price of the railway and negotiations dragged on for about a year and often came to a standstill. The Soviet side demanded at the beginning of July 1933 about 625,000,000 yen at what the Soviet claimed the official rate of exchange. The USSR maintained that the retiring allowance for Soviet employees of the railway should be paid by Moscow. Manchukuo proposed to pay 50,000,000 yen and later the Soviet proposed to reduce the selling price by 50,000,000 rouble. After more bargaining on 23 July 1934 Foreign Minister HIROTA suggested an intermediary plan that the selling price be 120,000,000 yen and the pension * for Soviet employees be paid by Manchukuo. Manchukuo agreed but the USSR rejected this and demanded 160,000,000 yen. Negotiations deadlocked in August 1934. Conversations were then held between HIROTA and Ambassador Yurenev which progressed smoothly. Agreement was attained by the end of the year and on 23 March 1935 the agreement concerning the ECR between Manchukuo and the Soviet was signed. The price of the railway was fixed at 140,000,000 yen and the pension was to be paid by Manchukuo.

29433 * There was no cross-examination of the witness but the attention of the Court was called to Exhibits 692, 693, 748 and 749.

29436 * Exhibit 3235-A, an excerpt from a pamphlet entitled "Collection of the Publications in connection with the Negotiations for the Purchase of the Chinese Eastern Railway" gave the reply of the Soviet delegate at the first formal conference on 26 June 1933. The delegate expressed gratitude to Japan for offering its good offices as an intermediary in connection with the settlement of the question of the Chinese Eastern Railway. The USSR sought to carry out its policy of peace and placed special emphasis on friendly relations with Japan. From the beginning of the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident, the Soviet had given ample proof that it adhered to a policy of strict neutrality and non-intervention. * It had shown it had due respect for Japanese interests and that it observed its treaty obligations and was prepared to guarantee friendly relations with neighboring countries and respect mutual interests. The Soviet had discussed methods for settling the CER dispute with Japan which had pledged not to infringe on USSR interests in North Manchuria.

Since the railway had become a source of dispute among USSR, Japan and Manchukuo, and since certain influences sought to aggravate their relations, the Soviet informed Japan that it was prepared to negotiate to settle the question by selling the railway.

However, the Soviet believed that it had a duty to protect the material interests of the railway which was constructed through Soviet labor and capital. The CER had important international significance.

29439 * In connection with the recent Incident in Manchuria, the deteriorating economic situation of the railway would be improved with the future development of Manchukuo. The Soviet delegation had entered into negotiations for the sale of the CER to secure mutual friendly relations. They desired that Manchukuo, which by note dated March 12 recognized obligations arising out of the Sino-Russian Convention and the Mukden Agreement, would manifest equal sincerity.

29448 Exhibit 3236, excerpt from Grew's diary, reported Grew's first interview with Foreign Minister HIROTA. It stated that HIROTA received Grew warmly and in the course of a short talk HIROTA said the cornerstone of his policy would be the development of better relations with the United States. This was the primary reason he had accepted the appointment which had come to him as a complete surprise.

29452 *Exhibit 3236, the address by Foreign Minister HIROTA before the diet on Jan 23 1934 stated that Japan was obliged to serve notice of withdrawal from the League on March 27th of last year because the Manchurian Incident and questions regarding Manchukuo showed no agreement on fundamental principles of observing peace.

The Imperial Rescript pointed out clearly the path the nation should pursue. The Rescript read that now that Manchukuo had been founded the Empire deemed it essential to respect its independence and encourage its development, so that an enduring peace may be established. The advancement of international peace is what they desired and the attitude toward peace was not changed.

29453 By quitting the league and embarking on a course of its own Japan did not mean it would stand aloof nor isolate itself. It desired to promote confidence between other powers and Japan and make known the justice of its course. HIROTA was convinced that if they united and acted in accordance with the Emperor's wishes the world would come to realize the justice of Japan's position. He was determined to carry out the national policy by diplomacy in the interest of world peace.

29454 Fortunately after withdrawal from the League, commercial and diplomatic relations with friendly powers in general have become even closer than before. Thanks to the efforts of the Regent and government authorities * and the collaboration extended by Japan, Manchukuo has made steady progress. In the various institutions, in the development of industry, communication, national finance, education and culture success has been achieved.

A decision was about to be made on the establishment of a monarchy which has been so eagerly awaited by her people and which would go far to solidify the foundations of an independent Manchukuo. HIROTA thought it behoved Japan to exert her efforts in assisting the healthy growth of the new state. The government had serious responsibility for the maintenance of peace in East Asia, but most essential was the stabilization of China.

* The government sincerely hoped for the political and economic rehabilitation of China and that she would be able to unite with Japan in performing their mission to contribute to the peaceful development of East Asia. Unfortunately the situation in China belied such hopes. It had been reported that the Chinese Government realizing the mistake in an anti-Japanese attitude had decided to take steps toward rectification Sino-Japanese relations. But so far no concrete evidence had come to confirm the report. Should China give tangible signs of sincerity Japan would reciprocate and meet her more than halfway.

It was gratifying to note that North China under the Peiping Political Committee was comparatively quiet. In view of Japan's rights and interests there and its territorial contiguity with Manchukuo and from the standpoint of the Tangku Truce Agreement, the maintenance of peace and order in North China was of special concern to Japan. She expected China to see to it that nothing would happen that might bring chaos to that area.

They were also watching with misgivings the activity of the Communist Parties and Red Armies in China. Regarding relations with the Soviet it might be recalled that after the Peking Basis Treaty in 1925 normal contact was maintained between the two countries and even after the Manchurian Incident there was a mutual understanding of their respective positions and no difficult question was encountered.

Recently however, the Soviet attitude had changed. It was surprising and regrettable that the Soviet should broadcast unwarranted criticism against Japan and circulate exaggerated stories for political and diplomatic purposes. Japan had consistently preserved a fair attitude toward the Soviet before and after the Manchurian Incident.

* Despite fundamental differences that divided the two countries they had endeavored to keep on good terms with the Soviet and solve all questions by pacific means. Since Manchukuo's establishment, Japan had been acting upon the conviction that the proper adjustment of the relationship between Japan, Manchukuo and the Soviet was of paramount importance for East Asia's peace. Japan was setting up no military troops along the Manchukuo-Soviet frontier, Moscow propaganda notwithstanding.

Between Japan and the U.S. there was no question intrinsically difficult of solution. Far from picking a quarrel Japan fervently desired U.S. friendship. HIROTA was confident the U.S. would not fail to appraise correctly Japan's position in East Asia.

For a time after the Manchurian Incident, U.S. public opinion was against Japan and there was a temporary estrangement.

* It was hardly necessary to repeat that Japan was activated by no ulterior motive other than a desire to establish peace. If the U.S. would perceive the actual condition and realize Japan's role as a stabilizing force the emotional tension between the two peoples would disappear. He hoped the two would continue to join forces in cultivating their historical friendship and good understanding.

Japan's traditional friendship with the British Empire remained unshaken. The two powers occupying geographically similar key positions could serve the cause of peace through sympathetic appreciation of their respective stands and whole-hearted collaboration. It was in this sense that Japan was seeking to readjust whatever conflicting interests regarding trade there might be and to strengthen friendship.

* The negotiations with India over commercial problems had been substantially concluded and was a source of gratification. A survey of the world revealed economic disorder, political unrest and conflict of ideas threatening to destroy international equilibrium while mutual confidence appeared to have wilted. HIROTA stated that no unreasonable difficulties need be anticipated in settling any question if the nations showed sincerity and met in a generous spirit.

What was wanted was the abandonment of jealousy and antagonism and the reinforcement of unity and mutual independence. But international trade barriers were fast multiplying. Of late Japan's industries had taken strides and extended overseas trade. Owing to economic nationalism one country after another had set up obstacles against the advance of her export industries.

* Since mutual understanding of one another's unique national culture was of value in fostering good will, Japan was planning measures for facilitating cultural intercourse with the outside world. HIROTA could not deny that foreign relations were then and would be in the future beset with serious problems. The path of a rising nation always had this. So long as they were united and prepared to face difficulties and retained composure and strayed not from the path of rectitude he was confident Japan had nothing to fear and the future would be full of hope. They should not forget that Japan in East Asia bore the entire burden of responsibilities. It is in this important position and responsibilities in which her diplomacy and national defenses were rooted.

29461 Her national defense was organized for self-protection. At the same time diplomacy had no claims to put forth except what was legitimate with the national mission. He believed that eventually Japan's position would be rightly understood by other powers.

29463 Exhibit 3238, Minutes of the Proceedings of the House of Peers, February 7, 1934, reported the answer of Foreign Minister HIROTA. HIROTA stated that since the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident there had been considerable difficult problems. He believed the relations between China and Japan was destined to be improved through generations. Times were when these were anti-Japanese activities and the Japanese cried for punitive measures. These were passing phases and ultimately the two were destined to be friendly.

HIROTA intended to cope with the Chinese question with this fundamental belief and it was hard for him to even imagine that trouble would occur between China and Japan.

29469 * Exhibit 3239, Personal message of Foreign Minister HIROTA to Secretary of State HULL, dated Feb. 21 1934, stated that it was significant that ever since Japan and the United States opened their doors to each other the two had always maintained a relationship of friendliness and cordiality. They produced very few commodities representing conflicting interests in foreign trade. Each supplied what the other wanted and they were strengthening this relation of interdependence year after year.

When the situation was studied from all angles no question fundamentally incapable of amicable solution existed. He did not doubt that all issues would be settled when examined with mutual understanding, frankly discussed and approached with a spirit of cooperation and conciliation.

29470 HIROTA could state emphatically that Japan made it a basic principle to collaborate in harmony with all nations and had no intention to provoke trouble. It was her sincere desire that peaceful relations would be normally established with the United States. To this end he had been exerting his best efforts since he became the foreign minister. On the occasion of the arrival in the U.S. of the new ambassador SAITO he availed himself of the opportunity to lay before HULL, through SAITO his thoughts as to the necessity of promoting their traditional friendships. 29475 DIRECT EXAMINATION OF KUWASHIMA, Kazuo.

He was transferred from the consulate at Tientsin in August 1933 to the directorship of the Bureau of Asiatic Affairs. The foreign minister then was UCHIDA. About one month after that UCHIDA resigned and HIROTA succeeded him. Relations with China and the western powers were gloomy at the time of Foreign Minister UCHIDA because of the Manchurian Incident.

29483 * Diplomatic relations with China were half broken off though ministers were still exchanged. It was HIROTA's firm resolution on becoming foreign minister to alleviate the oppressive tension and HIROTA had told the witness that frequently and made newspaper statements to this effect. At the Diet HIROTA made it clear that his policy aimed at alleviating the tense relations with China. People called UCHIDA's diplomacy "burnt ground diplomacy" and that of HIROTA the conciliatory diplomacy.

HIROTA carried out his resolution steadily. The Ambassador to China when HIROTA became foreign minister was ARIYOSHI who was eager for rapprochement. ARIYOSHI had exerted all efforts to alleviate tenseness but could not attain the desired object easily. After the Manchurian Incident the Chinese avoided association with the Japanese and this worked as an important restraint for ARIYOSHI's activities.

29484 * Because of ARIYOSHI's efforts the attitude of the Nationalist-Government toward Japan changed considerably after 1934. It resumed the payment of private loans on a small scale. ARIYOSHI opened conversations with WANG, Ching-wei, Home and Foreign Minister of the Nationalist Government. The ARIYOSHI*WANG conversation progressed. WANG at first maintained that the settlement of the Manchukuo question was a requisite condition for the improvement of relations. ARIYOSHI however explained that Japanese public opinion would not allow the government to retract recognition of Manchukuo since Japan had already recognized it and any government which would venture to do that would find it difficult to exist. WANG seemed to understand Japan's awkward position.

* The Nationalist Government however had to consider its own public opinion and the main subject of the ARIYOSHI-Wang conversation thereafter lay in harmonizing the contradictory standpoints of both governments. The documents concerned were said to have been lost by fire during the war, but Telegram 368 of April 20 1934 addressed to HIROTA from the Consular General at Nanking escaped the fire and reported the contents of the ARIYOSHI*Wang conversation of April 18. Thus the efforts of HIROTA to improve relations appeared hopeful in 1934.

On April 17 1934 when negotiations between ARIYOSHI and Wang had hardly been open there arose the question of the so-called unofficial statement of spokesman AMAU. At that time Monnet an expert financier of the League Secretariat was in China. The foreign office frequently received information that Monnet was drafting a plan for cooperation to China from which Japan was to be excluded, in concert with those antagonists of Wang, Chin-wei.

The Foreign Office thereupon instructed the Minister to China and other officials to keep in touch with Monnet and restrain his activities in China. Instructions to the same effect were frequently given to the representatives in China from the Bureau of East Asiatic Affairs in which rather exaggerated reports were used to impress Monnet strongly.

The statement of AMAU to the newspapermen was a patchwork of the contents of those telegraphic instructions. When this was reported by the press as if it had been a government policy, that gave rise to public discussion. HIROTA told the witness that he had nothing to do with the ama statement before it was * published and to reprimand AMAU.

HIROTA emphasized his policy for rapprochement between Japan and China as well as his confidence in the nationalist Government in his Diet address on Jan 22 1935, and in his Committee Statement afterwards. At the Committee he declared he had no doubt about Chiang Kai-shek's sincerity for the improvement of Sino-Japanese relations and aroused public attention.

On the other hand, Wang, Chin-wei, and Chiang-Kai-Shek expressed their intention in response to HIROTA's statement. After that the Nationalist Government resumed control of anti-Japanese movements in real earnest. Trade between the two countries regained its activity.

29488 Early in May HIROTA took the initiative to submit to the cabinet conference the question of raising the Japanese and Chinese Legations in their respective countries to Embassies. * The Cabinet Conference passed this, the Nationalist Government agreed, and the raising of them to status of legations was decided on May 17th. The exchange of ambassadors had been advocated by pro-Chinese for a long time but when ARIYOSHI returned at the end of April the rumor was already abroad that it would be realized.

The North China situation had generally been calm since the Tangku Truce agreement of May 1932. But it began to change at the beginning of 1935; especially after May, various matters occurred. There were frequent skirmishes between the Kwantung Army and the Chinese near the Jehol border and Hopeh and Chahar provinces which were out of the way places where no foreign office official was stationed. The Kwantung Army and sometimes the North China forces would lodge direct protests with the Chinese government on the ground they were provocative acts.

29489 They would impose strict conditions such as the withdrawal of Chinese forces from these provinces or the extermination of the Kuomintang branches and enforce fulfillment with an ultimatum. The Chinese government regarded these as systematic plots of the Kwantung Army or the North China Forces on small occurrences or troubles. The Foreign Office was not so credulous as to believe everything the Chinese government pleaded but still recognized that the military in China were prone to raise a storm in a teacup. They earnestly hoped they would act more prudently and warned them.

29490 The envoys had hardly returned to Tokyo before trouble arose in defiance of the new policy. The Chi-tung Regime was established demanding self-government against the Nationalist Govt. rule, at the end of November * 1940 the unfortified zones established by the Tangku Truce Agreement, in the border between North China and Manchuria. The foreign office suspected this regime had a close connection with the Kwantung Army.

In November, the foreign office received information the Kwantung Army was concentrating mechanized troops at Shanhaikwan to intimidate North China. They warned the army. In the middle of December the Chi-cha Administrative Committee was formed. The Foreign Office suspected that military authorities in China had a hand in its organization. However this committee corresponded with the Nanking Government and was admitted by the latter to enjoy a degree of independence within the limit that it did not overshadow the sovereignty of the Central Government.

* The foreign office opposed the establishment of the Chi-tung Regime. The smuggling in North China caused by that regime's low tariff rates was disadvantageous to Japan. The witness engaged directly with the Kwantung Army about this and inspected the actual circumstances when he was sent to Manchukuo and China by orders of Foreign Minister ARITA from the beginning of June to July.

The foreign office took different attitudes toward the Chi-cha Administration Committee. It had nothing to do with its formation but consuls in those areas dealt with it after they learned that the Nanking Government had approved its formation.

* Negotiations for the improvement of the Sino-Japanese relations progressed and ambassadors were exchanged in May 1935. The national sentiments of China however seized this opportunity to take an unfavorable turn for Japan and in November and December the situation got serious. Wang Ching-wei barely escaped assassination in November and his cooperator Under-Sec'y for Foreign Affairs, Tang Yu-Jen was assassinated in December. The witness considered such a change in Chinese sentiments due to the activities of the Japanese military against North China.

In HIROTA's address to the Diet Jan 21 1936, the three principles became known to the general public for the first time. But the principles had been decided on on October, 4, 1935, and it was shortly after that HIROTA showed the three principles to the Chinese Ambassador Chiang Tsuo-Pin, and Chiang-Kai-shek's opinion was revealed to Amb. ARIYOSHI in response.

After the announcement of the three principles, the February 26th Incident broke out. The OKADA Cabinet collapsed and HIROTA received an Imperial mandate to form a new ministry.

The Foreign Office was anchoring its hope upon the future development of the negotiation when the SUIYUAN Incident broke out owing to the activities of some officers of the Kwantung Army in Inner Mongolia. The Chinese Government's attitude toward negotiations changed suddenly and went so far as to disapprove the results of the past negotiations on the pretext of this Incident. Negotiations came to a standstill and no progress was made in spite of Japan's efforts.

29494 The Diet was to open in mid-January of the following year. From the government's political standpoint it was considered untoward to leave the negotiations as they were at a deadlock. The Foreign Office was thus compelled to close the negotiation except for the settlement of the Chengtu and Pakhoi Incidents upon which perfect understanding had been reached.

The HIROTA Cabinet resigned in January 1937 at which time the witness also resigned as director of the East Asia Affairs Bureau and was then transferred to the post of Japanese Minister to the Netherlands.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY, Counsel for UMEZU

The witness stated that he thought the accused UMEZU was Commander of the North China Garrison in the spring of 1935.

29495 * The witness was asked whether he knew of any border incident in the spring of 1935 which was participated in by the North China Garrison. The witness stated that the incidents were small clashes around the borders between Jehol, Chahar and Hopeh Provinces between the Kwantung Army and the Chinese troops and negotiations pertaining to them were conducted principally by that army.

The witness had however been told that at times the military attache in Peking and at times the Tientsin Garrison assisted. The instances he had mentioned of direct negotiations with the Chinese by Japanese forces included the Ho-UMEZU Agreement in the general negotiations. He did not particularly include it with regard to negotiations pertaining to border clashes.

29496 The Ho-UMEZU Agreement did not come about as a result of a border clash. That agreement was in connection with the assassination of a pro-Japanese newspaper man residing in the Japanese concession in Tientsin. Asked whether the Ho-UMEZU agreement was an instance as having been enforced by an ultimatum the witness stated that in his recollection it was the result of a considerable strong demand but he did not think it had a time limit.

29497 At that time UMEZU was about to leave for Hsinking or some other place and his chief of staff SAKAI told him that in his opinion a rather friendly and moderate warning should be given. To this UMEZU was said to have replied if that was the case it would be excellent.

29501 He didn't recall any instance of MINAMI's acting contrary to the Foreign Minister's instructions, nor that MINAMI ever sent an ultimatum to the Chinese contrary to the wishes of the government. The affidavit of the witness had stated that there were frequent skirmishes after May between the Kwantung Army and Chinese forces near the Jehol border and Hopeh and Chahar Provinces, where no Foreign Office officials were stationed. The witness was asked if he remembered the Northern Chahar or Chang Pei Incident in June, 1935. He replied that he didn't remember the details, but remembered that three or four small incidents occurred. * At that time there was a Japanese Consul at Kalgan, but he didn't remember if his name was HASHIMOTO.

Regarding the statement in the affidavit that the Kwantung Army and sometimes the North China Force would lodge direct protests with the Chinese Government, the witness was asked if that statement also applied to the Northern Chahar Incident. The witness recalled that these border incidents were the first and second North Chahar incidents and the first and second Chang Pei incidents. In these the army negotiated directly.

29503 * The witness was quoted a statement of Ching Teh-chun in exhibit 199 describing the incident; which stated that after the departure of four Japanese soldiers retained by the Chinese, Consul HASHIMOTO at Kalgan protested and demanded the punishment and assurance against recurrences. The witness did not recall receiving such information from the Consul at Kalgan. * It was remarked to the witness that according to exhibit 199, the matter was referred to Japanese garrison Force Headquarters in Tientsin, after Consul HASHIMOTO negotiated, but the witness stated he didn't recall this. He didn't know if the Tientsin Garrison Force was independent from the Kwantung Army, but had heard that this was so. He had never heard that the Northern Chahar Incident was the only case in 1935 of which General Ching Teh-chun made complaint in exhibit 199.

29506 * The witness was reminded of his testimony in the DOIHARA phase, that he received information from newspaper articles, conversations, rumors, etc. He was asked if his information on this occasion was the same as the statements he had made earlier. He stated that when he testified relative to DOIHARA's action, the telegram was actually sent by himself. At that time, the Consulate made reports to him on information obtained from the sources mentioned. However, he had no means of knowing on what basis the telegram sent from the Peking Legation was made.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. YAMADA,
 Counsel for ITAGAKI.

29508 The witness stated that regarding the Suiyuan Incident, the Foreign Office, and especially himself as Director of the Bureau of East Asiatic Affairs, knew nothing about it * when it occurred, since it was in a remote place. It was only when they received a protest from the Nationalist Government that they first became aware 29510 of it. * The witness immediately sent a query to the central military authorities concerning it. An officer there told him that this was the activity of one or two junior officers in the Kwantung Army.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. COMYNS-CARR.

29511 The witness stated that he was always in very close contact with HIROTA while he was Foreign and Prime Minister, and believed he always disclosed to him his real opinions and intentions. * He could testify to anything HIROTA told him while he was Director of the East Asiatic Bureau, but since this was over ten years ago his memory might fail him on some points. He had stated in his affidavit that it was HIROTA's firm resolution on becoming Foreign Minister to alleviate the oppressive tension in Sino-Japanese relations, and that HIROTA carried out his resolution steadily.

29512 HIROTA, that he was constantly trying to work out a smooth * relationship between diplomacy and national defense. In consequence, the war budget problem would become urgent.
 HIROTA said he intended to clarify his position, standing between as a third party. They would expand their utmost by foreign policy, and when this policy arrived at its limits they would leave the matter to the army and navy for disposal.

 The witness was asked if this quoted statement did not represent HIROTA's real opinion and intentions when he first took office as Foreign Minister in 1933. The witness replied he didn't know when and in what connection HIROTA made such a statement, but did know that in September 1933, when HIROTA became Foreign Minister, he told him that because of the critical stage of Sino-Japanese relations it was his intention to bring about closer relations with China and also third powers. HIROTA considered this his sole mission.

29513 * It was suggested to the witness that HIROTA made the quoted statement to Baron HARADA in the Foreign Ministry on 11 October 1933, but the witness said he never heard of such a statement. He recalled that the Prime, War, Foreign, Finance, and Navy Ministers attended the 5 Minister's Conferences.

29514 He was convinced that HIROTA never had any idea of securing Japan's expansion by negotiation if he could, or use threats and ultimatums by the army, to secure compliance with his negotiation demands. When the army conducted negotiations directly with the Chinese, there never was an instance when they consulted either with HIROTA or the Foreign Office. HIROTA never allowed the army and navy to enforce its demands by force. HIROTA's negotiations were all conducted through regular diplomatic channels.

29515 * Regarding the conversation between ARIYOSHI and Wang Ching Wei in which the question of Manchukuo was raised, in which the witness had said in his affidavit that ARIYOSHI told Wang that Japanese public opinion would not allow retraction of Manchukuo's recognition, the witness stated that this was not only HIROTA's or ARIYOSHI's opinion, but the public opinion in Japan at that time.
 Japan had recognized Manchukuo the previous year.

Page Wang often asked ARIYOSHI that Japan withdraw recognition. In reply to such requests ARIYOSHI made the statement referred to. The witness was convinced this reply had nothing to do with Japan's attitude toward Manchukuo, but was directed to showing the impossibility of withdrawing recognition which had already been granted.

29516 * In his affidavit, the witness had stated that the main subject of conversation lay in how to harmonize the difficult and contradictory standpoints of both governments, and he was asked if he thought chances of harmonizing the two opinions were improved by action taken in Manchukuo by the government of which HIROTA was a member. The witness stated that they had adopted this policy because they felt if the difficult questions were set aside or conversation avoided for the time being and an effort was made to attain mutual understanding in other spheres, the solution of these problems themselves would become much simpler.

29519 * Asked if he knew that on 5 November, 1934, HIROTA informed the U. S. that control of the oil industry in Manchuria was not within the concern of Japan as it was the act of a state recognized as sovereign and independent, (exhibits 939, 941, 965), the witness stated he had heard nothing about this matter at that time, because the Commerce Bureau was handling it.

Page Asked if these statements were made by HIROTA or they were false, the witness stated that the matters were not within his confidence, and he could say nothing about it. He could speak with confidence as regards the structure of the Foreign Office. The Commerce Bureau handled economic matters, whereas his Bureau handled mainly political matters.

29520 * His Bureau may have issued a statement on a Cabinet decision on 20 March, 1934, a few months before these discussions began, entitled "The Summary of Japanese-Manchuria-Economical Administration Policy", the economic policy of Japan vis-a-vis Manchukuo was through peaceful exploitation of resources to reap the fruits of happiness for both Manchukuo and Japan.

The witness had no recollection in regard to details of a Cabinet decision, which was that certain enterprises would be operated by special companies which held a dominant position in Manchukuo, and as a general rule they would be directly or indirectly under the Empire.
29521 * The witness did not recall if the list of industries to be controlled in that manner included the petroleum industry.

He didn't recall clearly if there was an agreement between Japan and Manchukuo in July, 1935, with regard to economic control, * nor did he remember whether HIROTA attended the Privy Council meeting on 3 July, 1935, to explain this to them. Asked if he would be one of the officials who would go with HIROTA to the Privy Council, the witness stated that he did not remember exactly who went on each occasion, but that on economic matters it was the director of the Commerce Bureau who accompanied him.

When an agreement was actually signed, other bureaus other than the competent bureau would be privileged to see the relevant document, but since the matter was outside his jurisdiction he didn't remember it too distinctly. He did know that a joint Manchukuo-Japanese Committee, to deal with all economic matters, was set up in Manchukuo with four members from each country. * He did not recall whether HIROTA explained to the Privy Council that it was quite all right because one of the Manchukuo members would always be a Japanese who could be trusted to support the Japanese side. 29524 Regarding the AMAU statement, the witness heard from HIROTA that he had reprimanded AMAU, but did not believe he was punished. What was wrong about the statement was that the Chief of the Information Bureau, AMAU, published the statement in the newspapers without first receiving HIROTA's understanding. * Also, the statement was not in harmony with Japan's foreign policy at that time.

The witness was reminded that he had said that it consisted of a patchwork of telegraphic instructions which had been sent to Japanese representatives in China. The witness stated that from the summer of 1932, the League sent experts regarding economics.

29526 The Foreign Office received repeated information that Monnet was drafting a plan for international help to China, from which Japan was to be excluded. To get Monnet to stop or put off the plan, the Bureau of East Asiatic Affairs announced that such a plan would have no good results for China and that its execution without Japan would be utterly unacceptable. With such a view, the Bureau sent telegraphic instructions to carry on negotiations with Monnet on that basis to Ambassador ARIYOSHI in Nanking and to the consul-general in Shanghai. The telegram was sent merely as an indication of how to conduct negotiations to get Monnet to stop or put off the plan, and it * certainly did not represent Japanese foreign policy.

Asked if the reprimand of AMAU was a punishment, the witness replied that according to Japanese law a reprimand is a punishment, but he did not know whether in this case it was in that category or not. It was in the records of his Bureau that HIROTA reprimanded AMAU, but he recalled that it was not made public.

29527 Asked if AMAU's real fault was that he disclosed to the world what the Foreign Office was doing in secret, the witness stated that in his view it furnished an indication to the representatives in China in negotiating * with Monnet with a view to discouraging his activities and did not represent foreign policy. The instructions only concerned Monnet's activity and not general policy.

The AMAU statement appeared in the morning papers on 17 April, and in a press conference two or three days later HIROTA declared it was not government policy. Immediately after the statement, the U. S. and British ambassadors appeared at the Foreign Office, and in reply

29528 * Asked again if AMAU's real fault was that he had disclosed the instructions being sent to the Japanese representatives in China, the witness stated that he believed he was reprimanded not only for having been careless, but also because he made his statement so as to cast suspicion on Japan that that was the real foreign policy, whereas it was not. By saying it was not the real policy, he did not mean it was an instruction to make false statements to Monnet.

29529 The witness was in the Foreign Office on 17 April, 1934, but did not know whether HARADA visited HIROTA then. Asked if HIROTA and SHIGEMITSU told HARADA that the AMAU statement was nothing serious, * the witness stated that since he did not know HARADA came to the Foreign Office and was not actually present if it did take place, he could say nothing about it.

29530 * In his recollection, the instructions were sent only to the diplomatic representative in China.

29531 With regard to the Ho-UMEZU agreement, he did not know about a time limit being set. He knew nothing about that agreement, but since he had heard through documents that in regard to many other minor negotiations they were carried out with ultimatums, he had put in the mention about time limits in his affidavit. He himself had never conducted or participated in such negotiations, and he could not say whether there was a distinction between a strong demand with a time limit and an ultimatum. His interpretation was that in an ultimatum the right was reserved to take free action after the time limit expired. In the case of a demand with a time limit, he believed it was merely a demand to reply within a certain period.

29532 Asked if he didn't know that the demands were accompanied by a threat of military action at the end of the time limit, the witness stated he recalled they were demands to reply by a certain date. He had used the word "ultimatum" in the sense of time limit. Since at that time in the Foreign Office documents referred repeatedly to ultimatums, he included that term in his affidavit. * He agreed that his distinction was that when the threat of force was only a bluff he called it a time limit, and when it was really intended he would call it an ultimatum.

The witness remembered that when the agitation in favor of an independent North China was created in November, 1935, that the Kwantung Army was concentrating mechanized troops at Shanghaikwan to intimidate North China. However, Japan was not actually conducting agitation to foment an independence movement, for this was done by junior officers of the Kwantung Army. At that time there was a branch office of the Consulate at Tientsin at Shanghaikwan, with a vice-consul, and he received this information from him and immediately called on the central military authorities to express strong * disapproval and to state that such news was alarming. The authorities told him that they had no intention to threaten China.

* In the report from the Vice-Consul, words were used to the effect that that was the ideology of the junior officers, and the military authorities told them also that the junior officers were trying to set themselves up against their superiors. He did not know whether mechanized troops could be concentrated without the orders of MINAMI and ITAGAKI.

The witness did not recall if HIROTA first obtained a promise from MINAMI that troops would not actually be sent beyond Shanghaikwan on the Great Wall without Imperial command. He did remember that liaison officers of the military authorities told him repeatedly words to this effect.

* He did not recall HIROTA's giving instructions to the Foreign Office that the fact troops would not move without Imperial command must not be allowed to leak out to China. Asked if the reasons given were that if it leaked out the Chinese would cause trouble and take the Japanese for fools, the witness remembered something to that effect from the army authorities. He didn't recall if HIROTA's other reason for taking extreme precautions that it did not leak out was that the army would be very angry if it did.

He had never heard that the North China and Kwantung Armies had threatened that if the new independent councils for Hopeh-Chahar and East Hopen were not established by a named day, military action would be taken.

* He had never heard that on 18 November, 1935, DOIHARA announced in China that if autonomy for the North was not proclaimed he was prepared to send five divisions into Hopeh and six into Shantung.

He did not know that North China authorities, or on behalf of the North China Army, DOIHARA had fixed an ultimatum to expire at noon on 21 November if the formal proclamation to autonomy was not issued. He didn't know that on the same day DOIHARA told newspapermen in Peking that he expected a formal announcement of the new regime shortly. Until the actual establishment of the East Hopeh anti-Comintern Autonomous Regime and the Hopeh-Chahar Political Council, the Foreign Office and East Asia Bureau knew nothing, either verbally or through documents, of the proposed establishment of such regimes.

Asked if he personally made a collection which was filed in the Foreign Office of U. S. and other newspaper reports on this matter. the witness stated maybe his subordinates did this, * but as director he did not know anything about the two regimes until they had been established.

On being handed a document, the witness recognized his own seal, and thought it also looked like SHIGEMITSU's seal on it. It was a report from Charge d'Affaires FUJI in London to HIROTA.

Exhibit 3242, * a telegram from FUJI to HIROTA dated 16 November, 1935. containing the seals of SHIGEMITSU, the witness, and AMAU, of the Information Bureau, stated * that since the previous telegram, newspapers with one or two exceptions had become more quiet. However, considerable attention was aroused by reports on the situation of the independent movement by Japanese military authorities, and that North China had come under Japan's control and that landing of Japanese marines in Shanghai did not give a shock to the Chinese residents, etc.

The witness stated that he had no recollection of his bureau making a file of newspaper reports, but remembered that they received many press telegrams from representatives in Europe and the U. S. * The witness was handed a document and asked if it was not a file of newspaper reports on this subject made in his section. He stated it was compiled by the Information Bureau, but did bear the seal of his Bureau and the seal of the Chief of the First Section. In his recollection, it was not true that newspaper clippings came to the East Asia Bureau, and after study were sent to the Information Bureau for filing. Its full text was forwarded to him for reference. * The witness stated that he was sure his Bureau did not see these newspaper reports. He did not recall if he reported to HIROTA on their contents. Even if it was not reported directly to the Foreign Minister, he was sure they reported it to Vice-Minister SHIGEMITSU.

29544 Asked if he had forgotten that the reports contained all the matters which he asked about, the witness stated that since they were numerous it was difficult for him to recall their contents. * He did not recall, either from the Evening Post of 18 November 1935 or from consular reports, that DOIHARA had announced that if autonomy for the North was not proclaimed, he was prepared to send five divisions into Hopeh and six into Shantung. * He did not recall from the 20 November 1935 issue of the same paper or from consuls that DOIHARA had announced the ultimatum would expire at noon the next day.

* The witness stated he was convinced that HIROTA's China policy was an endeavor to effecuate conciliation and cooperation and to take steps to prevent the Army in China from taking action which would prevent conciliation. It was absolutely not so that the Foreign Ministry, the witness, HIROTA and SHIGEMITSU were themselves pushing this policy and using army threats to get it adopted.

* He could not believe it would be right for SHIGEMITSU to say that it would be true to some extent that this was the result of a Japanese plot. Asked if it would not be in accord with HIROTA's policy for SHIGEMITSU to tell Ting that for North China to meet her development properly she must strive for harmonious rapprochement of China, Japan, and Manchukuo, the witness replied that it was necessary that Sino-Japanese conciliation be effective all over China, especially in North China, which bordered Manchukuo.

29550

* Asked if Ting denied the truth of that situation, the witness stated he didn't remember this so-called conversation and could say nothing about it. * The witness stated he was in constant touch with Vice-Minister SHIGEMITSU, as well as HIROTA.

29551

To the witness were quoted statements that it was desired that the army make an autonomy statement with regard to North China. It was desired to send the Kwantung Army into Shanghaikwan and Hopeh to put a scare into them. It was desired to have everything done the way the army wants it before the Emperor returns.

* The witness was asked if these statements did not represent the real policy of both HIROTA and SHIGEMITSU. * He replied that he was convinced SHIGEMITSU could never have made such a statement. He had never heard HIROTA say on the same day that he would like to have the autonomy declaration issued at such a time that it would not aggravate the Nanking government.

At that time, the Kuomintang government said it was prepared to accept HIROTA's principles as the basis of negotiations, but that because of various incidents in North China it was difficult to continue them. This report came by telegram. Since the Chinese government made this representation, it was difficult for them to continue the negotiations and so it was also difficult for the Japanese.

* He didn't recall that HIROTA was not willing to continue the negotiations, nor had he ever heard that he was hesitating about giving China any decisive reply. Asked if HIROTA's reply was that they should continue the matter only after anti-Japanese movements were under control when the Chinese government proposed a Nanking Conference, the witness stated HIROTA never told him he was not willing to continue negotiations unless anti-Japanese movements were given up.

It was in December, 1936, when HIROTA was Premier, that the so-called Suiyuan Incident broke out, owing to activities of the Kwantung Army in Inner Mongolia. * He knew that HIROTA exceedingly regretted this incident.

To the witness was quoted a statement, that probably a military operation would be impossible in the Suiyuan area due to weather conditions; therefore, he wanted the problem settled diplomatically. They should have the determination to take action in the event the Chinese Central Army entered Chahar. The witness was asked if this was a correct representation of HIROTA's real views about the Suiyuan Incident. The witness stated that since he was a mere Bureau Chief he never asked HIROTA his opinion, but it was his view that since HIROTA while Foreign Minister had striven earnestly for Sino-Japanese rapprochement, it was but natural he would try to solve the Suiyuan and Chahar Incidents through peaceful diplomacy.

Suiyuan is in Inner Mongolia. * Asked if the Japanese established their independent regime under Prince Ter, he stated he had never heard to what extent Japan was concerned with the Mongolia autonomous regime. From the viewpoint of maintaining peace and order in Mongolia that was true, but as to the other viewpoints, he stated them in a general way and did not know anything about what was suggested to him.

29559

* Asked if it was the policy of HIROTA's government for a subordinate of Prince Teh to make a secret overture to the Chinese Army, and if HIROTA thought that the combat morale of the enemy would be very high, the witness stated that from the information he obtained, he gathered that the government and military authorities knew nothing about the Incident right up to the moment it occurred.

29560

* The first news he heard of it was that when Mongolian troops had invaded Eastern Chahar from Suiyuan and suffered a heavy defeat by the Chinese, but he could not give the exact date. So far as he knew, the Kwantung Army itself did not participate in the battle, and he never heard that the Inner Mongolian troops operated in conjunction with that army.

* The witness was again quoted a statement that they would expand their utmost by foreign policy, and when this arrived at its limits they would leave the matter to the army and navy for disposal, and he was asked if this was not HIROTA's real policy. He stated that all in the Foreign Office from HIROTA down were convinced they should strive to remove the obstacles the army put in the way of negotiations with China, and to try to settle outstanding issues through diplomacy. They were convinced that these negotiations would bear fruit.

 29570 SUMA in Nanking to Foreign Minister HIROTA received by the Foreign Office on 20 April 1934, stated * that it was addressed to HIROTA from Minister ARIYOSHI. On the 18th ARIYOSHI told Wang Ching-wei that it was a matter of satisfaction that the conversation on radio communication between Japan and China had been started and was making progress. If progress on other questions was made in this manner, it would contribute toward improving the situation. ARIYOSHI explained to Wang HIROTA's peaceful policy and explained the interview HIROTA gave to U.S. correspondents.

29571 He told Wang that if he had any desire to lay before them, he would transmit it to HIROTA on his return to Japan. Wang stated he had great admiration for HIROTA's peace policy and desired to take steps to improve relations. Wang stated that this was not in the nature of a diplomatic proposal but by way of consultation. To improve relations, he thought it would be effective to establish general principles and to proceed in accordance with them. Such principles were the two countries should live and let live and that co-prosperity should be a hundred year policy. Page of relations was the Manchurian question and positions of the two toward it were fundamentally at variance. In view of the fact that the present situation shows that improvement of it was impossible without touching this question, he would like to set up a principle that they settle the Manchurian question sincerely and peacefully and agree that Japan would not use arms nor would China counter-act with force.

ARIYOSHI replied that with regard to Wang's statements about co-prosperity, he had expressed agreement when he took his post. * There was no objection that the two co-exist and co-prosper. In regard to the Manchurian question, he stated that he had repeatedly said the existence of Manchukuo was a fait accompli admitting of no change. If Wang's proposal touched that fact, there could be no room for consideration. Wang stated that from the Chinese point of view, ill feeling would not terminate as long as the Manchurian question remained unsettled. Friendship with Japan was difficult as the Chinese were making restoration of Manchuria a prerequisite. It was necessary to show them some guiding basis.

29574

ARIYOSHI told Wang that he presumed he was aware of the causes of the Manchurian Incident. He reviewed the state of things after the Russo-Japanese War, the past independent status of Manchuria, wrongs * committed by the Chang family, etc., and stated it was their earnest hope that China would make a clean sweep of past ill feeling and would adopt the policy of co-prosperity.

* Wang said he understood the past circumstances. It was his view that although there was a good chance of settling the Manchurian question during the INUKAI Cabinet, the opportunity was lost. It was now impossible for the Chinese to understand if they were told to shake hands with Japan and leave the situation as it was. The Manchurian question was a reef between the two and must be removed. It was difficult to remove it all at once and he intended to temporarily retain the reef to let the ship go through. ARIYOSHI told Wang that he understood from what he explained that since the Manchurian question was difficult, it would be reserved as it was but by

He told Wang that he would report the matter to HIROTA * for his consideration. Wang said he had entertained this opinion for a long time but refrained from proposing it before because he thought it would cause opposition and mar success if he made it public without knowing the prospect of its realization. If the Japanese would agree to this principle, he was confident in carrying it out on his side. He asked ARIYOSHI to make efforts to realize the plan. ARIYOSHI told Wang that it was necessary for both countries to remove suspicion and to calm public feeling to meet the situation.

- He pointed out to Wang that it was a mistake that China had hitherto asked help from European and American countries and adopted the policy of checking one by using another. * He pointed out instances of favoring Europeans and Americans by the Chinese. Wang replied that China had asked for a little help from European and American quarters but had not had a policy of checking one country by using another. He understood it displeased Japan to consult only with these countries without asking Japan's help. At present it was difficult to shake hands positively with Japan but he would make efforts to avoid stimulating ill feeling on the Japanese side. He referred to the Fukien Incident and hoped Japan would refrain from becoming involved in such Chinese disturbances. This would be effective in giving guidance to the Chinese people.

The substance of them was that it was presumed that the source of the recent statement was authoritative and Britain could not ignore it. The Nine-Power Treaty stipulated equality of rights and Britain insisted they be respected, although it recognized exceptions in the case of special agreements.

* Insofar as the statement was motivated by concern over Chinese integrity and peace, it concurred with Britain's aim but if it was assumed that Japan alone was entitled to decide what measures were prejudicial, Britain must take exception. Under Articles I and VII of the Treaty, Japan had the right to invite attention to measures of other signatories she considered injurious to her security. Since this right guarantees Japan's security, it was presumed the statement did not purport to repudiate the common rights of the parties toward China or that Japan sought to violate treaty obligations.

* Foreign Secretary Simon stated in Parliament that it appeared the statement was due to apprehension that certain activities of the powers in China were injuring peace in the Orient or Sino-Japanese relations or Chinese security. There was no reason for such apprehensions as far as Britain's policies were concerned and she was avoiding injurious measures. The British government wished to inquire of Japan concerning the statement in a friendly spirit.

Lindley summarized his instructions as being (1) notwithstanding that Japan under the Treaty possesses the right to invite attention to measures she considered injurious, why should she find it necessary to issue such a statement, (2) If Japan sought to be the sole judge of injurious measures, it would be tantamount to claiming something over and above the equal rights of the Nine-Power Treaty. The British Government was not by any means blaming Japan for violations.

* HIROTA then requested clarification on Lindley's inquiries and stated that he appreciated Simon's statement that Britain would take no measures injurious to peace in the Orient and to Chinese integrity. However, Japan had adhered to the Treaty, never violated it, and had repeatedly given assurance that she did not intend to violate it. It was strange that other nations should entertain doubts and he found it difficult to understand why Britain had referred to the Nine-Power Treaty and what points of it had come into question.

* Lindley answered that the statement of the 17th had created the impression that Japan was claiming rights over and above those she possessed in common with the Powers under the Treaty, and that she especially claimed judgeship as to whether the policies of the other Powers were injurious to peace in the Orient and to Chinese integrity.

To HIROTA's remarks that the conscience of the conspirators was the most accurate judge and that as to claiming rights under the Treaty over the common rights of the others, it could not be thought of so long as that Treaty was not denounced. Lindley nodded agreement.

HIROTA said that Japan respects the principles of the open door and equal opportunity and did not object to bona fide commercial activities of the Powers with China but the situation was such that she did not enjoy equal opportunity due to the Chinese boycott, and Japan had more reason than the others to insist on the principles of the open door and equal opportunity.

* With respect to investments in China, while China was neglecting the loan consortium, in view of the present situation, their investments would not only mean money thrown away but would give rise to harmful results for China. While it appeared that persons claiming to represent the League or under the pretext of doing business were pouring into China and engaged in activities from ulterior motives, Japan could not view this with indifference. In view of their geographical relations, was it not logical for Japan to feel greater concern if a fire broke out in China?

Lindley said he understood HIROTA's explanations and would telegraph his government. HIROTA told him that he felt he had in general answered him, * but would reply further if it were necessary.

Page stated that on the 26th Ambassador Grew called and stated he had a telegram from his government to obtain a translation of the Amau Announcement of the 17th. HIROTA explained that this unofficial announcement was not only not official in any sense but was merely printed in the newspapers from replies made by the official in charge to various questions asked by reporters and therefore there could be no translation. However, the replies appearing in the newspapers generally explained the standpoint of the Japanese Government and HIROTA handed him a translation of their gist.

He had handed the contents of the separate telegram also to the British Embassy with explanations and added in both cases that there was no objection to quoting the contents.

29587 * Exhibit 3246, a telegram from HIROTA to various Embassies and the Consulate General at Nanking, dated 26 April 1934, concerning the question of the Amau Unofficial Announcement, stated * that Japan had not infringed upon Chinese independence or interests nor intended to do so. She sincerely desired the preservation of Chinese territorial integrity and her unification and prosperity. These ends should be attained by China herself.

Japan had no intention to trespass upon the rights of other powers in China. Their bona fide financial and commercial activities would redound to Chinese benefit which was welcome to Japan. She subscribed to the open door and equal opportunity in China and was observing all existing treaties and agreements. However, Japan could not remain indifferent to any one's taking action under any pretext prejudicial to law and order in East Asia for which she, in view of her geographical position, had the most vital concern. She could not afford to have Chinese questions exploited for the execution of a selfish policy.

It was consideration of these relationships that Japan had carried on negotiations with the U.S. and Britain. It was in the spirit of this policy that they wished to deal with all countries, especially neighboring states. They had been guided by the same spirit in negotiations with the Soviet. Negotiations on the transfer of the NMR had made progress and it would not perhaps be long before agreement was reached. If the transfer eliminated the source of disputes along that railway and strengthened friendship between Japan, Manchukuo and the Soviet, the prime objective would have been attained.

They were planning to hasten the peaceful development of Soviet-Japanese relations by redoubling their efforts.

* Hearty cooperation by the Soviet was essential and HIROTA hoped that the Soviet would give special consideration to the erection of military works in the Far East, especially along the Soviet-Manchukuo frontiers with a view to promoting mutual trust. The political situation in China had lately become somewhat quiet. Except for fighting between the Communists and government armies, there was no civil war, but it could not be denied that many serious possibilities were still latent in the Chinese political situation. While the main strength of the Red armies appeared to have been driven away from Kiangsi and Fukien, their remaining units were said to be establishing contact with allies in Kueichow and Szechwan and moving westward. Coupled with the reports of the Sovietization of Sinkiang, Japan would be obliged to continue to watch with concern * Communist activities in China. It was to be regretted that in certain localities, anti-Japanese agitation had not been completely ended. Japan attached importance to friendship with other states in East Asia and counted on their participation in maintaining peace and order. He hoped that not only would the Chinese recover stability but would awake to the whole situation of East Asia and undertake to meet the general aspirations of Japan.

29596

In view of Japan's position as Chinese neighbor and as a stabilizing force, it was their policy to assist China in this goal. Japan was glad to acknowledge the fact that there was a growing trend among the Chinese to appreciate her true motives and he hoped China would collaborate further in that direction.

29597

* HIROTA was sorry to state that the policy of trade restriction was as prevalent as ever among foreign countries. Such a situation was extremely regrettable not only for the sake of Japan but from the broader viewpoint of the world's economic rehabilitation. They were trying to come to a fair agreement with the powers concerned to have trade restrictions modified or removed to promote mutual interests. For Japan, with a vast population and meagre natural resources, foreign trade was an important peaceful means of livelihood. The advance of Japanese commodities on world

Page markets was the fruit of the nation's united labors for many long years. They were resorting to no unfair devices to expand trade while the development of their industries benefited countries producing raw materials.

29598 * Foreign trade, though expanded, amounted to only 3% of the total volume of world trade and Japan was only 7th or 8th place among the principal trading nations of the world. This meant there was room for even more efforts. These facts were being understood more and more by the intelligent public of all countries. While upholding their position on a fair and just basis, they would strive to obtain the adjustment of mutual interests with other powers.

The negotiations with the Netherlands had reached no concrete conclusion owing to the complexity and variety of questions. However, the delegations had succeeded not only in clarifying the respective positions of the two countries with reference to trade removing misunderstandings, but also in laying an important foundation for the negotiations to follow.

Page 29603 Exhibit 3248, a record of the House of Peers of the session on 25 January, 1935, gave an answer of Foreign Minister HIROTA to the question of the Japanese foreign policy toward the U. S., Britain, and others. HIROTA stated that Japan had been compelled to withdraw from the League owing to the Manchurian Incident, but this did not mean she separated herself from the whole world. The League was a place of conference, and not to attend it would not mean that diplomatic relations with the nations in it would be severed at once.

In connection with diplomatic relations with the U. S. and Britain, there was the problem of naval disarmament. Japan would follow a policy of peace in dealing with this problem, and he was reluctant to speculate on measures in case the effort to reach an agreement failed.

29608 * In exhibit 3249, an answer of HIROTA to a question in the House of Representatives on 21 February, 1935, he stated that he thought there were Japanese who were suspicious of Chinese moves. For himself, he had not the slightest suspicion of Chang Kai-shek's attitude.

29612 * In exhibit 3250, minutes of a House of Representatives Committee Session on 1 March, 1935, in response to a question, HIROTA stated that as it would be difficult under present conditions in China for her to promise special privileges to Japan, he had suggested that China should treat her in the same manner as others and take an impartial attitude and extend the same privileges.

29614 * Exhibit 3251, telegraphic messages between HIROTA and Litvinov in celebration of the signing of the agreement concerning the C.E.R. stating that in the message from Litvinov to HIROTA dated 23 March, 1935, Litvinov expressed satisfaction with the signing of this agreement. He offered congratulations on the completion of the negotiations in which HIROTA took so active and fruitful a part. He was sure they would continue further cooperation to limit any cause for conflicts and misunderstandings and for strengthening friendly relations between the two countries.

29616 * Exhibit 3252, a statement from Litvinov's "Foreign Policy of the Soviet Union" published in 1937, gave a statement of Litvinov to Japanese correspondents on the meaning to Soviet-Japanese relations of the 29617 initialling of the agreement on the C.E.R. on 14 March, 1935. It seemed to Litvinov there could not be different opinions, that the agreement must be regarded as a solution of one of the most complicated Far Eastern problems, and was also a great event in the development of Soviet-Japanese relations.

29619 Looking on the sale as a source for strengthening Far East peace, the Soviet had shown utmost good will and concession in the negotiations, * departing considerably from its first position. Tribute must also be paid to the Japanese-Manchuria side, which gradually came to meet their concession.

The negotiations continued about two years, and they attributed success to the efforts on both sides. In overcoming these difficulties, HIROTA had rendered no small service, and his residence in the Soviet as Ambassador had no doubt helped establish mutual understanding.

29621 * Exhibit 3253, a telegram from HIROTA on 5 August 1935 to the Japanese Ambassador to China, Charge d'Affaires at Peiping, and Consuls-General at Tientsin and Nanking, stated that in view of the change in the situation, he directed the bureau concerned to conduct in strict secrecy with army and navy authorities, a fundamental reinvestigation with regard to China policy. Page 29622 On the part of the army and navy there seemed no objection to the purport of the plan, and it was expected to be decided upon shortly, and the addressees would be informed as soon as a decision was made. Meanwhile they were to keep the matter strictly confidential.

29623 It was the essential point of foreign policy to secure stabilization in East Asia by cooperation between Manchukuo, Japan, and China, and the three should enter into friendly relations. This was the foundation of China policy. The principles on which they resolved to attain this object were that China should control anti-Japanese speeches and activities. * Japan and China should make efforts to establish and promote friendship and cooperation by mutual respect and assistance. The two should work for development of relations between Manchukuo and China. These relations made as their ultimate aim China's formal recognition of Manchukuo, and all three nations would conclude an agreement to regulate relations in accordance with these principles.

For the time being, China was to agree not to deny the fact of Manchukuo's existence at least in North China and the Chahar district and stop anti-Manchukuo policy, and enter into relations in the economic and cultural fields with her.

29624 * Since the Bolshevik menace from Outer Mongolia was a common menace to the three nations, cooperation at least between Japan and China should be worked out in districts bordering Outer Mongolia to remove such menace.

29625 * Exhibit 3254, a telegram from HIROTA on 28 September, 1935, addressed to Ambassadors in China and Manchukuo and other diplomatic posts in China, stated that the future policy toward China had been a matter of consideration for some time, with army and navy cooperation. As a result a draft policy was being forwarded to the addressees, * and steps were being undertaken to have it understood by the Ministers of the Departments of Foreign Affairs, War, and Navy. The addressees would be further informed when decision was made, but were requested to keep the matter confidential. They were, however, authorized to give a copy of this and separate telegrams to army and navy representatives upon request.

The separate telegram stated that it was the fundamental basis of their foreign policy to secure East Asia stabilization and work common prosperity through cooperation by Japan, Manchukuo, and China, with Japan as the center.

Page This was the aim of China policy. To accomplish 29627 it, it was first essential to invite China to regulate relations with Japan and Manchukuo * to bring about a situation establishing fundamental relations between the three countries. China should control anti-Japanese speeches and activities and stop depending on European and American countries, and adopt a friendly policy toward Japan and carry it out, cooperating on concrete questions.

Although it was essential that China formally recognize Manchukuo ultimately, for the time being she should give tacit consent to Manchukuo's independence and cease her anti-Manchukuo policy. China should, at least in North China, enter into relations in the economic and cultural fields with Manchukuo.

In view of the Bolshevik menace from Outer Mongolia, which was a common menace to the three nations, China should cooperate in measures in districts bordering Outer Mongolia to remove such menace.

29628 * If these points are executed and Japan felt convinced of China's sincerity, the general agreement to establish relations between Japan and China should first be concluded, and then an agreement for the regulation of new relations between the three countries should be included.

29630 * Exhibit 3255, a telegram from HIROTA on 4
October 1935, to the Ambassadors in China and Manchukuo and diplomatic posts in China, stated that with regard to the telegrams (in exhibit 3254), the matter was decided on 4 October, according to them as a matter understood by the Ministers of Foreign Affairs, War, and the Navy. The Premier and Finance Minister also acknowledged. The addressees were requested to keep close connection with the Foreign Office with regard to application of the principles. They were not expecting at present active application in any post other than the Ambassador to China at Nanking, Peiping and Tientsin. Other than this, they were requested to keep the matter strictly personal.

29631 * They should also maintain contact with army and navy representatives.

29633 * Exhibit 3256, telegram from Consul-General
SUMA at Nanking to HIROTA dated 14 November 1935, stated that opinions toward Japan within the Nationalist Government had suddenly grown hostile. Communists and other elements were suspected to be at work.

As to the attempted assassination of Wang Ching-wei and other accidents, they were not to regard them as mere contingents in dealing with them. If there occurred some more serious events in North China, there would be danger that the pro-Russians, war advocates, pro-Europeans and pro-Americans among the Chinese people might be driven to desperation.

29634

* According to SUMA's observation in North China, there were signs that undesirable events might take place against these three fundamental principles decided at the recent Cabinet council. There were again fears that British assistance to China, in response to the monetary system plan, might urge an unfavorable turn of the situation. SUMA stated he was secretly informed that Japanese mechanized troops were being concentrated at Shanghaiwan for the past several days. Grave events might be caused if wrong measures were taken. Proper steps should be made so that authorities in North China might act strictly in conformity with the Cabinet council's decision.

29635

* Exhibit 3257, two telegrams dated 21 November 1935, from Consul-General SUMA in Nanking to HIROTA, reported a conversation between Ambassador ARIYOSHI and Chiang Kai-shek. Ambassador ARIYOSHI stated that pursuant to the conference, he asked Chiang his opinion on the three principles recently proposed by HIROTA. He frankly replied he completely agreed and had no "counter proposals" to make. He was determined to learn Japan's desire immediately, * to discuss the matter concretely, and carry it out promptly. He desired that Japan give due consideration to the present North China situation, because if something happened there, discussions on this question would be impossible.

ARIYOSHI then asked Chiang if he intended to decide whether he wanted to carry out the three principles on condition the North China situation would be peacefully settled. Chiang replied he didn't mean to make it a condition, but the three principles were closely connected with North China and it would be impossible to carry out the articles regarding formal recognition of Manchukuo and cooperation against the Bolshevik menace, if an incident broke out in North China.

ARIYOSHI told Chiang that he also was worried about this point, which was why he first drew his attention to the North China problem. He told Chiang he would consult him as to the manner of carrying out the principles.

He said if the three principles were enforced immediately, Japanese suspicion would be cleared and it would promote diplomatic relationship.

Chiang replied there would never be anti-Japanese movements. He was by no means anti-Japanese, and sincerely hoped for friendly relations. The Chinese who love China would never start an anti-Japanese movement.

* In Exhibit 2434, a speech of Foreign Minister HIROTA at the House of Representatives on 21 January, 1936, he stated that the establishment of a joint committee was now talked about. The Manchurian Government insists on clarifying the Manchukuo borderline. The point they were concerned about was the excessive military preparations by the Soviet in East Siberia. This incited the feelings of the Manchurians and Japanese, and they were demanding the sincere consideration on this point of Soviet authorities.

* They sent Ambassador Debuchi to Australia to reciprocate the friendly mission of Foreign Minister Latham, and they made DEBUCHI visit New Zealand to promote friendship there. As for the South Sea Islands, Japan looked forward to amicable relations, expecting the development of commercial intercourse with them. They sought the development of the Philippine Commonwealth which had been lately founded.

Last year Japan was unfortunately obliged to apply the Protective Trade Law on Canadian merchandise, but later compromise was reached with Canada and their intentions were understood and they ceased to apply the law.

spite of the reformation of the system of the War and Navy Ministries, there was a way left for those on the reserve list to be appointed War or Navy Minister.

29650 The witness participated in the attempted forming of the UGAKI Cabinet. On that occasion UGAKI was warned by a gendarmerie that the army would raise an objection to his forming a Cabinet. This proved true as soon as he set about selecting members. * War Minister TERAUCHI and an Inspector General advised him to give up the idea. It was hardly possible then to appoint a War Minister, and this proved fatal, and there was nothing to do but give up all thoughts of forming a cabinet. However, UGAKI did not change his mind, but saw the Lord Keeper YUASU and reported to him the progress of his negotiations with the army.

29651 UGAKI suggested three counter measures for the army veto. 1, form a Cabinet without a War Minister and then have the Premier take charge of the War Minister's business; 2, appoint a general or lieutenant-general from the reserve list after placing him on the active list;
3, ask the Emperor to order a general or lieutenant-general on the active list * to cooperate as War Minister.

The Lord Keeper replied that he feared that either of these measures would trouble the Emperor, which he didn't want to do. The difficulty concerning the appointment of the War Minister from the viewpoint of government organization was out of the question, and the key of the problem lay in strong army opposition. YUASU feared that even if UGAKI succeeded in forming the Cabinet, it would be doomed to collapse owing to army opposition. It would be impossible for UGAKI to receive an Imperial audience and ask for decision in this connection. Thus, he gave up all hope and excused himself on 29 January.

29651 In March, 1936, the HIROTA Cabinet was formed. In May, 1936, the House of Representatives passed a resolution on parliamentary reform, and in July the government established the Parliamentary System Investigating Committee. Towards the end of October, * army opinion on the reform was published and evoked much comment and criticism. Especially, representatives who had a majority in the Committee, were indignant at it, saying this was a retrogressive step.

The Committee requested the War Minister, at its meeting on 2 December, and plied him with many questions, but this failed to satisfy the Committee. The tense atmosphere was brought over into the Diet session resuming on 21 January, and developed into HAMADA's interpolation demanding hara kiri of War Minister TERAUCHI.

Thereupon the War Minister demanded dissolution of the House of Representatives, but the government rejected this, asking Imperial sanction for a two day recess. The government expected the excitement to be quieted, but the War Minister resigned January 22.

29652 * Because of army opposition, HIROTA judged it difficult to maintain the Cabinet any longer, and it resigned en masse the following day. The date and reasons for the resignation of War Minister TERAUCHI were different from those of the other Cabinet members.

The whole business in general was under the charge of the witness. As President, HIROTA charged himself with political negotiations with cabinet members who objected to the draft plan of the * bureau concerning the constitution and competency of the Insurance and Sanitation Ministry, among whom was Mr. NAGAI, Ryutaro, Communications Minister.

HIROTA also had charge of signing documents in connection with the business of the Bureau at the Cabinet Conference.

CROSS-EXAMINATION by Mr. Comyns Carr.

In the witness' recollection when HIROTA was appointed president of the Bureau June 10 1937 he was not also appointed vice-premier. In the witness' recollection he was Foreign Minister only.

29667 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3260 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that during the period 1911 Dec. 2
29684 *to Dec 21 1940 the witness was among other positions, vice-foreign minister under ARITA in the HIROTA Cabinet from April 10 1936 until he was appointed Ambassador to the U.S. October 15, 1938.

29685 He was also under Foreign Minister HIROTA in the first KONOYE Cabinet from June 4 1937 to May 26 1938. The foreign office did not have the slightest inkling of the Marco Polo Bridge Incident. The telegram reporting its outbreak reached Tokyo July 8 1937. The following day HIROTA was at Kugenuma when he received a telephone call from the foreign office reporting the outbreak. The foreign office policy was to make its utmost effort to seek an amicable settlement of the matter as soon as possible. An extraordinary meeting of the cabinet council was held Sept 9 which decided the government attitude was to hold fast to the policy to arrest the scope of the disturbance and seek an immediate local settlement. The decision was largely due to HIROTA's opinion.

In North China Maj Gen HASHIMOTO, Gun, chief of staff of the North China affairs, and others negotiated with the Chinese 29th Army reaching an agreement at 8 PM on the 11th. The 29th Army accepted Japanese Army demands that a representative should express regret, punish the responsible and make a vow that recurrence of such event should be prevented. As the concentration of Chinese troops near Fengtai where Japanese forces were stationed was liable to cause incidents, the Chinese troops stationed at the citadel of the Marco Polo Bridge and Lungwangmiao should be withdrawn and replaced with police forces. Anti-Japanese forces should be strictly controlled.

29686 * These terms seemed to be carried out by the Chinese before July 22. But in the meantime there were frequent skirmishes between Japanese and Chinese troops as the latter after withdrawal reappeared in the areas and the situation called for prudence and caution.

HIROTA said however that the matter might already have been settled locally and that consideration of the army's proposal should be postponed until further reports reached the government. The discussion was once postponed. But the awaited report being late in coming, the cabinet council assembled again the same day and was compelled to approve the army's proposal. This provided that to secure the apology and future guaranty by the Chinese, necessary forces in the homeland and contingents from the Kwantung and Chosen armies should be mobilized and despatched to reinforce North China forces.

All possible efforts should be made for peaceful settlement in conformity with the policy of local settlement. The despatch of troops should be immediately stopped when this object was attained and the apology and future guaranty fulfilled by the Chinese.

29689 *HIROTA consented with reservations that the despatch of troops should be exclusively for protecting Japanese residences and securing the safety of the North China forces which were comparatively small in strength, and that the decision for mobilizing home troops was nothing more than an attitude of preparedness as contended by War Minister SUGIYAMA. Holding fast to the policy of speedy local settlement, the foreign office was determined to spare no effort for its attainment. By HIROTA's order, the witness asked the Chinese Charge d' Affaires to call at the foreign office on July 11th and called the attention of the Chinese Government to the critical North China situation urging quick local settlement.

29690 The witness told him that instructions to the same effect had been given orally that morning to the Japanese Ambassador to China, *Mr. KAWAGOYE. KAWAGOYE was on his way to North China, leaving Shanghai the day the Incident broke out and Councilor HIDAKA executed the instructions on his behalf.

They received reports that the Nanking Government however, was despatching reinforcements to North China. The Chinese 29th Army, probably influenced by Nanking's military actions, came to show a dubious attitude regarding execution of the terms of settlement agreed upon on July 11th. The Foreign Office ordered Councillor HIDAKA to call upon Nanking not to interfere with the execution of the three terms and to check the northward movement of the Chinese central armies. Nevertheless these armies were reported still advancing northward.

In view of China's attitude, the cabinet decided on July 20 that preparations should be made for mobilizing three home divisions.

* The Foreign Office did not give up the hope of amicable settlement and had Councillor HIDAKA pursue the Nanking negotiations in earnest. Unfortunately there were clashes in North China since July 25th or 26th and orders for mobilizing the three home divisions were issued July 27th. From the 28th onwards hostilities in North China spread and the situation in Shanghai vicinity became disquieting. Thus all efforts of HIDAKA in Nanking proved fruitless.

In Tokyo, British Charge d' affaires Dodds called on the witness July 15th and asked if Britain could be of service. The witness told him he thought there were prospects of local settlement. From then until July 20th, Dodds came almost every day and kept him informed of conversations between Ambassador Huggessen and the Chinese Foreign Minister. The witness told Dodds they had not yet given up hope for a local settlement * . On the 22nd Ambassador Grew made an offer to HIROTA that his government would render services short of mediation.

HIROTA replied that in the light of the North China situation on the 19th there was still some hope that the agreement of August 11 might be carried out. The foreign office had not given up the hope of local settlement but was making desperate efforts.

In July a draft of terms was worked out by the authorities of the foreign and war offices and the navy minister. Its main points were the establishment of unfortified zones along the Pai-ho River, the withdrawal of Japanese and Chinese troops from the areas specified, and no annexation of territories and no indemnities. The Foreign, War and Navy Ministers and the premier approved the draft on August 5th.

* In early August HIROTA made up his mind to send FUNATSU, an authority on China to Shanghai to attempt to restore peace. FUNATSU was to have talks on the lines of the August peace terms with KAO Tsung-wu chief of the Asiatic Bureau of the Chinese Foreign Office who had direct contact with Chiang Kai-shek.

FUNATSU arrived in Shanghai on the 7th at which time Amb. KAWAGOYE returned to his post there. The two decided that KAWAGOYE negotiate with KAO Tsung-wu. At the interview on the 8th KAWAGOYE revealed the terms of the August plan as his personal propositions. KAO said he thought there were prospects of peaceful settlement upon the terms and promised he would immediately return to Nanking and report to Chiang Kai-shek. But it happened that a Japanese Naval officer was killed by Chinese soldiers on August 9 (OYAMA incident) * and after the 13th Japanese and Chinese forces entered into hostilities in Shanghai district, suspending communication with Nanking. The KAWAGOYE-Kao interview thus ended without results. Even then HIROTA did not give up hope of an amicable settlement.

He asked ARITA, the foreign Minister in the HIROTA cabinet to go to Shanghai where leading figures of the Nanking Govt. often gathered and stay there for a chance of having informal talks with them. ARITA accepted and it was arranged he would first visit Manchuria and North China until HIROTA wired him of the proper time to start for Shanghai. ARITA left on the 28th on his tour of inspection but as the situation did not become favorable for his Shanghai visit, he was compelled to return to Tokyo the end of September.

* In September after the failure of the KAWAGOYE-Kao conversations, chiefs of bureaus of the foreign office, and war and navy ministries talked over how to deal with the peace problem. They agreed that if the peace endeavor was to be continued, they must ask for the good offices of a third power to find a settlement on the terms of the August plan. This opinion was approved by the premier, the foreign, war and navy ministers.

At the same time the chiefs of the bureaus assembled to discuss government policy in connection with the China affair but could not attain agreement on two or three points. The witness conferred with the war and navy vice-ministers and settled the points and this was decided as government policy on October 1st, with the approval of the premier and the foreign, war and navy ministers.

On Sept 21 the League asked Japan to participate in the 23 Power Consultative Committee. Japan however had seceded from the League and had maintained a firm attitude not to participate in League political activity. On September 25th Japan replied that it could not accept.

29697 October 20th and November 7 1937 Belgium invited Japan to participate in the Brussels Conference which was to be held in accordance with article 7 of the Nine Power Pact. Japan was compelled to reply to the Belgium request * that it could not accept.

29698 * article 7 of the Nine Power Pact states that the contracting powers agreed that whenever a situation arose which in the opinion of any of them involved application of the treaty and rendered desirable a discussion of applying it there should be full and frank communication between the contracting powers concerned. The foreign office interpretation of this was that either in the light of the wording or in consideration of the circumstances under which this article was discussed at the first meeting of the sub-committee for the Pacific and Far Eastern Problems of the Washington Conference December 2 1922, it was evident that "communication" meant communication in any form and not necessarily in the form of a conference.

Proceedings of the subcommittee showed that generally communication should be made through ordinary diplomatic channels and communication in the form of conference was not in the least expected. In accordance with this interpretation the foreign office understood that to reject participation in the Brussels conference was not against the provisions of the Nine Power Pact inasmuch as participation was expected to be detrimental to Japan's internal affairs.

29699 * Early in September British Amb. Craigie arrived at his post. He set about settling the case of Amb. Huggessen's accident of Aug. 26 and solved this after talks with vice-navy minister YAMAMOTO and the witness.

Oct. 27th HIROTA in an interview with the Ministers of Britain and the U.S., Germany and Italy told them Japan could not accept the invitation to the Brussels Conferences but desired either of the four powers to use its good offices to bring about direct peace negotiations on the terms of the August plan. As Craigie informed HIROTA of Britain's willingness to use its good offices, HIROTA accepted and there were several exchanges of views. It was realized later that there was strong army opposition against Britain as a go-between and the scheme had to be held in abeyance.

29700 * A similar offer was also made by Grew at about the same time on condition that both Japan and China asked for it. This offer did not materialize. The army maintained that the good offices of Germany should be asked but HIROTA hesitated and doubted if the services of Germany alone which did not have a strong voice in China, were really effectual. In the meantime Craigie suggested the joint services of Britain, the U.S. and Germany. But the army's objection against participation by Britain and the U.S. was too obvious.

29701 HIROTA then asked Craigie to take the initiative in requesting Germany to let the other powers participate, for inasmuch as Germany herself had agreed to act with Britain and the U.S. the army also might consent. But Craigie reported later that the German ambassador told him that as the approach to China still remained in the stage of sounding * consideration would be given later to the British and U.S. proposal when China responded to Japan's efforts.

In December, HIROTA received a personal letter from German Amb. Dirksen that he had an important matter to discuss with him. HIROTA called on Dirksen and was told that when the German ambassador to China, Trautmann, met Chiang Kai-Shek on Dec. 2, Chiang Kai-shek revealed he had no objection to starting negotiations on the basis of the Japanese terms.

29702 Derksen asked HIROTA if there was no alteration in the peace terms of the August plan yet. HIROTA then had the director of the East Asiatic Bureau confer with authorities in the War and Navy Ministers and it was made clear that neither had objection to the terms of the August plan. The question had to be submitted to the Liaison Conference * of the government and army and navy and it was placed on the agenda for the December 20th meeting.

The fall of Nanking on Dec 13 stiffened Japanese feeling toward China. For example Home Minister SUYETSUGU was known for his drastic attitude toward China and against the peace negotiation itself. At the Dec.20th meeting of the Liaison Conference, SUYETSUGU laid his strong opinions before it and after a heated discussion the conference decided upon the four fundamental terms which were less compromising than those of the August plan.

29703 These terms provided that China shall be requested to give up its pro-Comintern and anti-Japanese, anti-Manchoukuo policy and cooperate with Japan and Manchukuo in their anti-comintern policy. Unfortified zones shall be set up and special administrative machineries established in needed areas. *Close economic relations should be created among the three nations. China was requested to make necessary reparations.

Japan expected a reply before Jan 5 or 6 of the following year. These terms were presented to Dirksen and submitted to China through Trautmann on Dec. 26th but no reply came by the appointed date. The foreign office urged the reply several times through Germany and as late as Jan 13th the Chinese Foreign Minister replied to Trautmann that as the peace terms were too wide in scope, China wished to know further details in order to make a final decision.

29704 Dirksen conveyed the Chinese reply to HIROTA January 14th. As to the contents of the four fundamental terms a detailed explanation had already been given through the German government. It was incomprehensible that China * should request further details. In the light of the progress of past negotiations between the two governments since the outbreak of the Incident Japan could not but regard it as an artifice to delay settlement and the foreign office was greatly discouraged by this reply.

The reply was discussed at the cabinet council January 15th. The council also regarded it as a delaying artifice and decided to close the negotiations. The declaration not to deal with the Nationalist Government hereafter was made on Jan 16th. Regarding the term not to deal with the Nationalist government hereafter, it was first decided to use the expression "to discontinue the negotiation" but the Foreign Office opposed such an expression.

29705 * It was decided that the more or less vague expression be adopted. This proved that the foreign office intended to leave scope enough to resume negotiations.

In March Italian authorities at Shanghai frequently transmitted to the Japanese Embassy the Nationalist Govt's intention concerning the peace terms. The witness remembered that HIROTA gave tacit consent to the Shanghai Embassy to keep in touch with Italian diplomatic authorities. HIROTA always considered the safeguarding of third power interests in China even after the outbreak of the Incident. He mentioned this several times in announcements of the government and exerted all efforts in its favor.

29706 * In April or May 1938 he ordered the witness in response to a British offer to discuss with Craigie questions regarding the maintenance of the Chinese customs system and the modification of tariff. *As a result of several meetings an agreement was concluded and made public. The agreement restrained the modification of the tariff rates within a certain limit so it might not be against the interests of third powers. It also aimed at forestalling seizure of Chinese customs by the Japanese Army.

Craigie had kept close contact with the United States and French Ambassadors before the agreement was arrived at and he told the witness that both countries had no objections to the agreement. HIROTA exerted efforts to keep the effects of military measures upon the interests of third powers within the least limit through negotiations with those third powers.

The originals and copies of the telegrams referred to in the affidavit had been lost by fire and were not in the files of the foreign office.

Exhibit 3261, the deposition of HAYASHI, Kaoru of the foreign office testified that the telegrams referred to in the witness' affidavit were lost by fire and could not be found in the files of the foreign office was received in evidence but not read.

29708 * The witness was handed Exhibit 3260. He stated that he remembered HIROTA's having a conversation with the British Ambassador before Oct 27 1937. HIROTA unofficially requested Craigie to offer his good offices to enable Japan and China to conduct direct negotiations between themselves.

29709 * Conversations between the two were held from the end of Sept. to the beginning of October. Since the Incident HIROTA had met several times with Chinese ambassador, Hsu-Shish-ying and had talked with him regarding settling the matter.

29711 * The witness stated he did not attend on every occasion.

29712. * HIROTA always told the witness about these matters and Craigie later told him that on such and such a day he had such and such a conversation with HIROTA. 29740 The witness stated that at the conversations * between Craigie and HIROTA prior to 27 October, 1937, Craigie proposed he would do anything within his power to assist in recovering peace. HIROTA replied he desired the assistance of Britain, which he felt was held in confidence and trust by China.

29741 At first HIROTA expressed the desire that inasmuch as he hesitated to present terms as a representative of Japan, he would like to have the terms proposed as though coming from very reliable quarters. * Craigie said that that would not do, and they would like to convey the proposal as coming from the Japanese Foreign Minister.

HIROTA then said his name might be quoted, but only as his individual views. Craigie consented. This procedure was customarily used in diplomatic negotiations. At first there were informal talks, developing into more formal conversations.

29742 One of the personal views HIROTA expressed was to have a demilitarized zone in North China, from which Chinese and Japanese troops would withdraw. He also desired to adjust relations on a practical basis between Manchukuo and North China. * He desired to have China control anti-Japanese movements and to have recognized the principle of equal economic opportunity in North China. These views were conveyed by Craigie to the Chinese government, which conveyed their desires two or three times to HIROTA by Craigie.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR COMYNS-CARR.

29745 * The witness stated that he was not present at the Cabinet Meeting on 9 July, 1937, but he got information about it from HIROTA. He had referred in it to their seeking a prompt local settlement.

29746 * In regard to the terms agreed between General HASHIMOTO, Gun, and the Chinese 29th Army on 11 July, they were decided on the spot, and not discussed by the Cabinet on 9 July. He was not saying that the Cabinet on 9 July left it to the local commander to enforce any terms he thought fit. Two major principles were decided by the Cabinet on 9 July. The first was that every effort be made to seek a peaceful settlement, and the second was that settlement be made locally.

29747 * The Cabinet policy decided on at the meeting was to see that the incident was settled promptly on the spot, and the military authorities there were to negotiate with this policy in mind. Inasmuch as the Cabinet was not informed of full details of the situation as of 9 July, their decision was only with reference to general policy. It was not left to the local commander to decide terms. Negotiations were to be conducted on the spot, but final decisions were to be made by the government.
- 29748 * With regard to agreements between governments, any terms the local commander might secure from the local Chinese commander would not be effective unless approved by both governments. The terms were effective insofar as they concerned the armies of both sides on the spot.
- When asked if it was also left to the local commander's discretion what means he should adopt to compel the Chinese army to accept his terms, the witness stated that general policy was to effect and promote local settlement in accordance with the policy of non-expansion and non-aggravation. The local commander was permitted to conduct negotiations on terms of settlement in so far as they accorded with this general policy.
- 29749 * When again asked if it were left to the local commander's discretion what means he should adopt to compel the Chinese to accept his terms, the witness answered that he was instructed or ordered to carry on negotiations. It was not so that it was obvious to the witness and HIROTA that nobody would have accepted the terms except under threat of force.
- 29750 * It was true that the Foreign Office had representatives in various parts of China. He didn't recall any special instruction to them to find out the real facts as to the original outbreak of the Incident. * He didn't recall any special instruction to that effect, but the representatives, as a matter of course, reported anything they heard or learned about to the Foreign Office.
- 29752

Asked if they discovered that the Chinese denied the Japanese Army's version of the matter, the witness stated they confirmed some. The Chinese confirmed some parts of the Japanese version and denied others.

The Foreign Office considered and studied information from all possible sources, as well as the views of the Chinese authorities. HIROTA did not accept all the Japanese Army's story.

* The witness did not think the trouble had arisen because the Japanese chose to hold maneuvers up against the position where Chinese forces were entitled to be stationed. Asked why the Chinese had to withdraw from a place where they were entitled to be in order not to cause untoward incidents, the witness stated it was his understanding that both sides negotiated to satisfy their mutual interests to avoid further trouble. It was discussed between the two to satisfy their interests to arrange that troops on both sides would be kept apart.

Regarding the results of the Cabinet meeting of 11 July which he had mentioned in his affidavit, the witness heard this from HIROTA. * It was not true that the actual result of the meeting was that the Cabinet made an important determination and decided to take necessary steps regarding the dispatching of troops to North China. As he had said in his affidavit, in the case of any eventuality preparations needed to be considered. He didn't recall HIROTA taking a hasty measure for strengthening diplomatic staffs in North China.

The witness did not know that what the prosecutor had been reading to him was from the Office Report for 1937 published by the Secretariat of the Foreign Ministry on 1 December, 1937. (Exhibit 260).

* The witness had not heard that the War Minister insisted on sending immediate reinforcements to the five thousand men in Tientsin, or that the whole Cabinet, including HIROTA, consented to his proposal. He did not know if the War Minister said to the Emperor that he would send a large force to smash the opposition and settle the issue in a short time.

He did not recall that immediately after the Cabinet meeting of the 12th, a message came in stating that the Chinese had agreed to the terms, nor did he recall that the message said that the Chinese answer was very sincere. He did not recall the Army General Staff expressing the view that this was a Chinese ruse to make the Japanese stop military preparations.

* Asked if the reinforcements from the Kwantung and Chosen armies were sent in spite of Chinese acceptance, the witness stated that they accepted but did not carry it into execution. Asked if he now said that was untrue, the witness replied that he didn't know how his words had been translated, but in Japanese he said it seemed as though the terms would be carried out. He did not say they were carried out.

29757

* When shown the English copy of his affidavit, the witness stated the English might convey such a meaning, but what he really wished to say was set forth with clarity in the Japanese text. He wanted to point out that even in the English text, the words are "seemed to be" and not "to have been".

29758

He had never thought of the agreement by the Chinese as merely a ruse to stop Japanese military preparations. * Asked if contingents from the Kwantung and Chosen armies were in fact sent to North China immediately after 11 July, the witness stated that at that time the Foreign Office was not familiar with the details of military movements. Asked if it were not essential for them to find out what they were doing if they were trying to check military expansion, the witness stated that every effort was made to inform themselves, but as to the time and type of military actions these matters belonged to the category of strict military secrets, known only to those vitally or directly concerned.

29759

* Asked if HIROTA took any steps to find out whether reinforcements had been canceled when news came of the Chinese acceptance of the army's terms, the witness stated that as he had said, the Chinese military authorities accepted, but at that time they received no reports that they had carried out the terms. He did not know whether HIROTA took any steps to find out what measures had or were being taken. * He did not recall whether HIROTA took any steps to find out whether reinforcements had, in fact, been sent. The witness heard later that they had been sent.

* They got reports that the Nanking government was dispatching reinforcements to North China from the army as well as Foreign Office authorities. The troops were being moved by the Chinese government in Chinese territory, it was true. When asked what right they had to object, the witness said not object but negotiate. 29762 * Reference was made to the witness' affidavit where it stated that the Foreign Office ordered Councillor HIDAKA on 16 July to ask the Nanking Government not to interfere with the execution of the three terms and check the northward movements of its armies. When asked what right they had to do that, the witness stated it was natural that by such negotiations a peaceful settlement could be effected.

The witness was reminded that he had said it was not left to local commander's discretion to settle what terms they pleased, but that the two governments would have to confirm them. He was then asked why HIROTA called upon Nanking not to interfere with them. He stated there were prospects that the matter could be settled locally. Because they entertained these prospects, they desired that Nanking approve the idea of a local settlement and assist in the execution of the terms.

Regarding the draft of terms referred to in his affidavit which he said was approved on August 5 or 6 by HIROTA, SUGIYAMA, the Navy Minister and the Premier, he did not know where the draft was now. He had taken steps to find it, but because many of the Foreign Office files had been burned he could not locate it.

29763 * Asked why he had not included it in his affidavit as having been burned, the witness stated he thought there was no objection to testifying from memory.

29764 HIROTA did his best to have the Shanghai Incident settled locally. Asked if he expressed approval of increasing Japanese marines in Shanghai and of sending additional warships there for the purpose of local settlement, the witness stated that HIROTA had no alternative but to give his approval to this action. In spite of the existence of a demilitarized zone in Shanghai, the Chinese Peace Preservation Corps infiltrated, causing a need to protect the lives and property of Japanese residents and the safety of the very small naval landing party there.

29765 * The witness thought HIROTA did give his consent when the question arose at a meeting of the Cabinet.

Asked if HIROTA said that on 13 August, 1937, the causes of the Incident were the assassination of Lieutenant OYAMA, the rousing of excitement in Shanghai by the increased number of Japanese warships and of marines to three thousand, the witness said he had no recollection of ever having heard that. Various reports on the OYAMA case were assembled and studied.

It was not true that they came to the conclusion that the reports from the navy on the spot were obvious nonsense. Every effort was made to compare the reports sent also by Foreign Office authorities to find out the true facts. * He did not consider the navy reports nonsense.

To the witness was quoted a purported statement of HIROTA that if they should announce the issuing of a mobilization order, the situation would be troublesome, so that at the Cabinet meeting of 12 August it was decided mobilization orders would be issued but not announced. The witness stated he had no recollection of this statement.

Regarding the negotiations of 24 September, 1937, he thought there was something to the effect that the Cabinet decided to mobilize four divisions and have another four in readiness.

* Regarding the discussions between HIROTA and CRAIGIE, the approach was made by Craigie, who said he would be happy to assist in the negotiations.

To the witness was quoted a purported statement of HIROTA's that his personal idea would be to draw a line slightly south of Tientsin and Peiping, and work out a demilitarized zone in which neither Japanese nor Chinese troops would be stationed. The witness stated that he could not acknowledge the expression was correct or accurate, word for word.

* He didn't recall whether the word "recognition" was used, but the terms "ceasing of anti-Japanese movements" and "defense against communism" were used. In the phrase, "The maintenance of equal rights in China", he understood the words were "equal opportunities".

29769 Regarding the demilitarized zone, the place to be demilitarized was Chinese territory. Asked what right they had to demand that Chinese troops be turned out of Chinese territory, the witness stated there was no permanent meaning to that at all. It was simply a temporary measure to avert possible clashes. * Japan had the right to station troops in North China under the provisions of the Boxer Protocol. They did this in accordance with the original provisions, but there were some gradual departures from the Protocol.

Asked if by 26 September 1937, they were not covering a large area not mentioned in the Protocol, the witness stated that was as a result of hostilities.

With regard to the terms, recognition of Manchukuo, ceasing of anti-Japanese movements, and defense against communism, HIROTA had for years been trying to persuade China to agree to those terms, but he was not now using the opportunity of Japanese Army successes to compel them to do so.

29770 * The witness understood that HIROTA considered this to be a most opportune moment to bring about fundamental peace and good will with China. It was not the case that HIROTA was using the fact of a state of warfare and army success to try to compel them to adopt what they had not been willing to adopt in years of negotiations.

It was nothing in the nature of an ultimatum, and they were merely terms HIROTA had Craigie convey to the Chinese government as his own personal views and to invite the Chinese to enter into negotiations on the basis of the proposal. They were not proposed as a way of escaping from the warfare which was in progress.

* Reference was made to the affidavit of the witness where he referred to a document accepted by the Premier, Foreign, War and Navy Ministers on 1 October 1937. When shown a document, he stated that it bore the signatures or seals of those four Ministers, was dated 1 October 1937 and was the document he referred to.

* Exhibit 3262, "An Outline regarding the settlement of the China Incident", the document being identified by the witness, stated that the present incident would be speedily concluded through the efforts of armed forces combined with diplomatic action and making China abolish anti-Japanese and pro-Communistic * policies and establishing bright and lasting friendship with China. They would make harmony and co-prosperity between Japan and Manchuria and China the main objective. To withstand lengthy use of military force, necessary measures would be taken.

29773

The objective of military operations was China's speedy relinquishment of hostile intentions. Occupation of any points and other necessary operations would be taken to achieve this. The objective of diplomatic measures would be to urge China's reconsideration of her hostile attitude and induce her into a position they desired. With China and third powers, negotiations and operations would be carried out. On concluding the incident, China would be made to give up anti-Japanese and pro-Communistic policies and diplomatic negotiations would be conducted along lines of epoch making diplomatic readjustment unbiased by past circumstances.

* In employing military, diplomatic and other necessary measures, utmost care should be exercised not to overstep international law. The principal areas where land forces would operate were mainly Hopeh-Chahar and Shanghai. In areas where necessary, sea and air operations would be conducted. To make operations smooth and to cope with a possibility of a change for the worse in the international situation, nationwide mobilization, wartime laws and realization of durable national unity would be resorted to.

In Central and South China, they looked forward to a situation suitable for the advancement of Sino-Japanese commerce. Measures taken in regard to rear operation zones in North China would shake off the idea of its being occupied enemy territory. In that zone no administration would be conducted but security would be maintained under military forces. The administrative organization would be left to independent native organization but proper guidance would be given to make it a bright institution.

The management of communication and exploitation of natural resources necessary for military purposes would be carried out under necessary control. * However, the last two points would not affect readjustment talks or diplomatic relations taking place at the amicable settlement.

* Matters relating to commerce, economics and finance between Japan, China and third powers would be regulated with the main objective making China give up her hostile attitude.

Diplomatic policies toward third powers and various connected operations would, along with having third powers entertain goodwill toward them, voluntarily be executed so as not to brew conflict or invite interference. In carrying out military operations and other measures, utmost care should be exercised to comply with the main objective.

* Relief would be administered to Japanese residents and concrete plans for these provisions would be decided separately. Regarding conditions for the settlement of the situation, demilitarized zones would be established in North China. A demilitarized area would be so established where public peace and order would be entrusted to restrictedly-armed Chinese police.

The minimum of Japanese demands in North China was that if necessary Japan would reveal her intentions to reduce voluntarily as much as possible the number of occupation troops, limiting it to the number at the outbreak of the Incident.

* Another minimum demand was the Tangku Truce with the various arrangements concluded in accordance with it. Those arrangements, such as seizure of the Gateways of the Great Wall, through railway traffic, establishment of custom houses, mail service, and air service would be excepted and the DOHIHARA-Chin-T-Chen Agreement and UMEZU-Young-Chin Agreement would be dissolved. Central forces in Hopei would be withdrawn. Control over anti-Japanism and prevention of Bolshevization in the demilitarized areas would be strictly enforced.

The Hopei-Chahar and Eastern Hopei Councils would be abolished and administration would be conducted by the Nanking Government, but it was desirable that administrative leaders of the area be influential for bringing about realization of Sino-Japanese friendly relations. Japan would make an agreement aiming at economic collaboration with China. The collaboration depended upon joint management on an equal footing.

* A designated demilitarized zone around Shanghai would be established where international police or restrictedly-armed Chinese police would be responsible for peace and order, assisted by the Settlement Municipal Police. It would be unnecessary except for the anchorage of warships for each country to retain land forces in the settlement. Simultaneously or subsequent to the truce parleys, negotiations for readjusting Sino-Japanese relations would be conducted without being influenced by past affairs. Upon the conclusion of the intended truce parley, the two countries would issue a statement that they had entered upon a new deal to bring about close friendship.

* China would grant formal recognition to Manchukuo, an Anti-Comintern Pact would be concluded and especially strict control would be enforced in the North China demilitarized zone.

In addition to the abolition of the Hopei-Chahar Council and Eastern Hopei Regime, Japan, with regard to Inner Mongolia, would try to persuade China to concede to Japan's righteous demands in that area, recognize the present status of Prince Teh in the SI and CHA Banners which would be made a mutual zone.

China would undertake control over anti-Japanism and effect the Ordinance of Friendly Relations with Powers, especially in demilitarized areas.

* Free aerial flights would be abolished, custom tariffs would be reduced and Eastern Hopei special trade would be abolished and restoration to the Chinese of freedom to control smuggling in the sea off the demilitarized areas would be made.

The plan regarding settlement of the situation was to minimize danger of future conflict by establishing demilitarized zones and removing deep-rooted causes for clashes by readjusting diplomatic relations.

Pending issues were to be solved through normal conversions, as establishing cheerful diplomatic relations. * Along with the expansion of the aspects of war, the people's expectation of the fruits of war would grow larger and they would be anxious to secure more tangible conditions, such as indemnities. Accordingly, they must be consistent and broad minded in the settlement of the situation but at the same time they must negotiate on readjusting diplomatic relations.

Regarding such conditions, indemnities for direct damages to Japanese properties and rights which China had assumed responsibility for protecting, and direct damages due to illegal use or disposal by China of Japanese owned properties and rights would be required.

Another such condition was the formation and operation of a large scale Sino-Japanese joint syndicate engaged in * marine transportation and aviation. The syndicate would also operate railroads, including the Shangtung Railroad and Tsingshih Railways. It would operate gold, iron and coal mines in North China and agriculture and other suitable enterprises.

29785 * Settlement of pending issues would come in the following order:

(1) Conclusion of a Sino-Japanese tariff treaty with reduction or removal of import and export duties,

(2) Removal or modifications of the ban and restrictions on import and export,

(3) Removal of restrictions on the production and export of salt.

29786 * Another document was handed the witness, and he stated it was on stationery customarily used by the Foreign Office.

When it was suggested that it came from Foreign Office files, he stated he had no basis upon which to confirm its authenticity since it did not bear the signatures of the Foreign Minister, Vice-Minister or Bureau Directors.

With respect to the document, he had no positive recollection and when asked if he recognized it as a decision reached by the three ministries, including the foreign, he stated he could not reply as he had no assurance as to its authenticity or correctness.

Regarding the account of the negotiations he included in his affidavit, it was impossible to remember all details. He could say there may have been such a thing as the decision mentioned in the document but he had no positive recollection whether the document itself was a result of discussions.

29788 * Based upon the document, the witness was asked if HIROTA, together with the War and Navy

The witness stated it was the fixed policy to reject intervention or arbitration by third powers. When asked if those three ministers on October 22, two days after the first invitation to the Brussels Conference, immediately decided to reject the invitation, he stated he did not know whether it was two days later, but the government decided to reject it.

The witness was quoted the statement which said that with the advance of the military movement, when its purpose should be practically attained, the Nanking Government would under pressure of force want to sue for peace.

When asked if the three ministers decided this, he stated he had no recollection whether it was decided that China would be forced to take such measures by pressure.

29789 * It was not true that this was the whole object from the beginning.

Asked if the three ministers on that day desired that when the purpose of the military movement was practically attained, the good offices of the U.S., Britain and other third parties would be advantageous, he stated that he thought it was their policy, that this would be welcome if the means were proper.

The good offices of Germany and Italy were welcome and HIROTA also welcomes those of the U.S. and Britain.

29790 * Asked if the three ministers decided on or about 22 October 1937 to refuse to exclude hasty intervention or arbitration by third parties, the witness said it was Japan's policy to reject intervention or arbitration whether it was early or late. 29791

Asked if by October 22, the situation had got far beyond any question of protecting anything, the witness stated Japanese interests were to be found throughout China. Asked if that was a sufficient excuse for occupying all China, he stated that complete occupation of that large territory would be impossible but they believed that their purpose could be carried out by occupying important points.

Asked if they were not willing to accept the services of third parties until the military purpose had been nearly achieved, the witness stated that informal negotiations were already in progress and if the meeting of the three ministers mentioned actually took place, he would presume that when the proper time came they would like to place negotiations on an official level.

29792 * The witness was asked if they decided not to publish their intention of accenting third parties' services or make known to foreign governments because that would indicate weakness within Japan. He stated that such a possibility could exist as such precautions are common in diplomatic practice. He thought that was HIRCITA's policy at that time but he did not recall that they decided on that day that they would only notify the policy beforehand to Germany and Italy. He did not recall that they decided that they would have another meeting to decide when the purpose of military movements toward China had nearly been accomplished and when they should notify Germany and Italy of the policy.

29793 * The witness was asked if after these questions from the document which had been handed him were put, if he still doubted as to whether it was an authentic Foreign Office document. He stated that what he had said in reply to such questions came from his recollection and he could not say more. He recalled a meeting at the end of October, in which HIROTA invited a number of industrialists to tea. The witness attended the meeting and at that time there was an anti-British movement in Japan. The witness was quoted a statement from a document that the anti-British movement was very bad. If England was disregarded, there would be no country that would act as an intermediary with China. * If such things were done, the government would be troubled. In the end they might have to fight England or collide with her sometime, but such things were absolutely out of the question right now. Diplomatically, if such things were done, the government would be greatly inconvenienced. The witness was asked if HIROTA said this to the industrialists. The witness replied he did not recall all HIROTA said on that occasion but HIROTA did say that inasmuch as Britain was the most proper country to bring about reconciliation with China, the anti-British movement would be troublesome and embarrassing.

The witness did not recall his saying that in the end they might have to fight England. He would be surprised if he himself had told HARADA that HIROTA had said that.

* Asked if HIROTA had not in the previous fortnight agreed with the War and Navy Ministers that it would be much better to have Germany and Italy as intermediary, the witness stated he had no recollection but HIROTA had no objection to using those two countries for the purpose. However, HIROTA constantly stated it was not proper nor effective to rely only on Germany and Italy.

Ambassador Craigie told HIROTA that even after the good offices of Germany and Italy were requested inasmuch as they would not have the trust of China, it would be more advantageous and effective to rely upon the good offices also of the U.S. and Britain. HIROTA replied that he heartily approved of this suggestion.

* HIROTA in no case ever entrusted sole responsibility for negotiations to any Ambassador Dirksen. * The witness did recall that HIROTA did ask Dirksen to undertake negotiations. The witness 29798 Asked if HIROTA said that in view of anti-British agitations, he thought that England would not be the best country to conduct the negotiations, the witness stated that his recollection was that it might have been difficult if Britain alone handled the matter. Asked if HIROTA said England was the most suitable country and nothing could be settled if Germany and Italy came into the picture, the witness said he thought such a conversation was possible because HIROTA always thought Britain was the most reliable to serve as mediator. *

Asked if HIROTA said that immediately after he had asked Dirksen to initiate negotiations, he stated there was no objection to Germany and Britain participating together but he thought he recalled HIROTA telling Craigie that there were no objections to their working together. Because of the army's opposition to British mediation, the witness recalled HIROTA telling Craigie he would like to have him talk over the matter with Dirksen and to take a cooperative role.

29801 * The witness stated he did not have the letter referred to in his affidavit, which HIROTA received from Dirksen, and did not know what had become of the letter. He received the account of the conversation between HIROTA and Dirksen from HIROTA, but was not present himself.
- 29802 * He did not know if some time in November or early December the army stole a telegram between Dirksen and Trautmann. Asked if the army discovered the terms and said that owing to the advance which Japanese armies had made the terms would have to be stiffened, the witness stated he did hear there was a certain element in the army holding such opinions. HIROTA did not agree to stiffen the terms. He asked Ambassador Dirksen to use his good offices on the conditions agreed upon between the Foreign, War, and Navy Ministries. From the beginning, there was an element, especially among younger officers in the General Staff, opposed to these terms, and they said the Foreign Minister's attitude should be firmly opposed.
- 29803 * The witness did not recall if, a few days before the fall of Nanking on 13 December, the Japanese Cabinet decided that when Nanking fell they would issue a statement of non-recognition of Chiang's government. Asked if it were true that HIROTA, at a Cabinet meeting on 18 December, brought up the terms he had submitted to Dirksen and a detailed proposal of terms for China, the witness stated he didn't remember those proposals were presented to that Cabinet conference or not.
- 29804 He did not recall if the General Staff at that date put forward the view that war in China must be stopped at the earliest moment. He did not know if they gave as their reason the necessity to prepare for war against Russia. * He did not know if they insisted that the full terms in detail which Japan was prepared to accept, should be put before China.
- 29805 The witness stated he could testify as to whatever HIROTA told him as far as he could remember, but he didn't remember HIROTA's saying anything about the Cabinet meeting of 18 December. * Regarding the manner in which he got information from HIROTA, it was necessary to divide the problem into two parts. First was the question of whether HIROTA thought it necessary to tell the witness of what transpired on every occasion, and he would not go so far as to say that HIROTA always told him all he had on his mind. The second question was whether the witness remembered all HIROTA told him.

He didn't remember whether the details of the terms were discussed in the Cabinet meeting of the 18th or 20th. When asked where the notes were that HIROTA gave him the witness stated he had meant that HIROTA handed them to Dirksen.

29807 HIROTA did not tell the witness that the Cabinet, at the insistence chiefly of KIDO, had refused the General Staff's proposal for lenient and detailed terms to China, and had insisted that only the four vague terms should be presented. * HIROTA did not tell the witness that he agreed with the proposal that only vague terms should be given the Chinese. The witness stated he was not present at the Liaison conference on 20 December, but got his information about it from HIROTA. Asked if HIROTA told him that on that occasion the General Staff had expressed strongly for immediate peace with China, the witness stated he had not heard of that. HIROTA had, up to 2 December, continued to inform the German Ambassador that the same terms he had offered before were still open.

29808 * The witness did not remember exactly if a Cabinet meeting was held on 21 December. (Exhibit 2259). Asked if there was not immediately after the Liaison conference of 20 December a Cabinet meeting which settled the draft of the answer to Dirksen with regard to the negotiations, he stated that he remembered that new terms were presented to Dirksen and that his further good offices were requested. According to his recollection, the terms were the four general principles. It was also decided that if necessary additional explanations could be given by HIROTA, and the points on which the explanations were to be made were also decided. * He repeated that what was presented to the German Ambassador were these four terms.

29810 As to the detailed explanation, some of them related to unfortified zones, specifying them, and there were also details of demilitarized areas around Shanghai. In relation to reparations, explanations were made that they would be asked for damage suffered by Japanese nationals, the government, and other public organizations. It was further explained that these were reparations and not indemnities.

HIROTA told the witness that details were transmitted at that time.

It was of vital importance to create a new North China regime capable of winning public confidence, both in North, Central, and South China. The leaders of the regime should have the confidence of all China, and the regime should have an organization appropriate for the new era. It should maintain an outline of policy worthy of being advocated to all China.

Regarding supervision of the regime, this should be done according to a policy of non-interference in the * particulars of administration, but restricted to internal supervision by Japanese advisers. The areas to be included in the regime should depend on the development of military operations, but should mainly be Hopei, Shantung, Shanhsi, and a part of Chahar, Provinces. They should pay attention to the harmonization of international revenues and disbursements and the adjustment of supply and demand. The chief and all lower ranking police chiefs should be Chinese, but a reasonable number of Japanese councillors should be appointed to cooperate with him. The employment of foreign councillors should be considered, if necessary. The number of Chinese police and their armaments should be established separately, and police authority for Japanese residents in the Special City should come under the jurisdiction of the consulate police.

Financial administration should be maintained by revenues, including the kinds of taxes levied in the old City of Shanghai, * and would be obtained by taking over organizations under the control of the former Kuomintang government.

In expectation of the establishment of a new regime in Central China, the Special City should be an open port, and foreign rights should be recognized. To establish Japan's economic development in Central China with Shanghai as a base, the areas around the concession should be called the Special City and a national policy * company should be established to maintain control of the various public utilities. The scale and order of the undertakings of this company should be determined separately. The capital of the company should be provided from funds on the spot, so far as allowable for that purpose.

Capital to Japanese entrepreneurs in the Special City and concession and the acquirement of real estate in the concession by Japanese, should be taken into consideration separately. Official establishments in the Special City formerly owned by Chinese authorities should be taken over and utilized. Those required by the Special City authorities for administration should be used by them.

* The Special City should be utilized as the base for communications, transportation, and airways between the Shanghai vicinity and Japan, North China, and Manchuria. Suitable steamship companies should make use of Chiukiang and Chaoshang Chu piers. Facilities for communication rights in the future would be controlled.

29829 A large market should be established in the Special City. For the present, utilizing the Shanghai fish market should be considered, * and small crafts permitted to enter and leave the port freely.

As for business which could be immediately started, this should be started promptly on condition that they be properly disposed of at the time of the establishment of the national policy company. The Public Peace Maintenance Committee or the district governments should, for the present, be dealt with in negotiations for these economic rights.

Regarding the management of North China, as for major transportation and communication enterprises, management by a single company in all of Manchuria and China should not be permitted. The North China regime's finance should be strengthened to promote public and other enterprises in North China to maintain and improve international revenues and disbursements between North China and any third country. and appropriate policy should be taken.

29830 * The gold production industry in North China should be immediately taken from the viewpoint of international revenues and Japanese disbursements. These circumstances should be considered when making future adjustments.

Regarding the management of areas around Shanghai, the national policy company should be permitted to execute business in connection with land under the control of Japanese army and civilian authorities in the Soecial City.

29831 * The witness did not recollect if on 8 January, 1938, HIROTA informed Dirksen that if the Chinese wished to ask questions to understand the four points more freely, Japan would answer them, and if he asked Dirksen to obtain them from Trautmann in China. He did recollect that HIROTA

He didn't remember whether HIROTA saw Dirksen and told him that Japan expected an answer with the utmost speed on 10 January. He did recall that he told Dirksen he hoped China would be urged to reply as quickly as possible.

* He did not remember HIROTA's saying on 10 January that the military insisted upon an immediate and clear answer. (Exhibit 486-F). He did not recall if the General Staff were insisting that the terms should be clarified and that the Cabinet insisted that they should not be.

29835

He had omitted the Imperial Conference of 11 January, 1938, from his affidavit, because he had not remembered it, although he had not forgotten all about such a conference. * He did not recall who called for the conference, or whether HIROTA said he saw no need for it. He did not hear at that time that the army said that one reason they wanted the conference was that Generals TERAUCHI and MATSUI in China were urging that the government should have nothing more to do with Chiang Kai-shek. He did not hear that the General Staff said they wanted to suppress those opinions and make an immediate peace.

29836

* According to his recollection, the outline of the measures for the China Incident were recognized at that Imperial Conference and a decision was arrived at by which Japan would no longer recognize the Chinese government. (Reference was made to exhibit 270 and 2235).

The witness was handed a document and was asked if it was not the official record of the Imperial Conference. He said he supposed it was.

* Exhibit 3264, records concerning the Imperial Conferences, being the document identified by the witness, stated that on 11 January, 1938, an Imperial Conference was held to decide policy toward China. The previous autumn, when the China problem became serious, there were arguments insisting on establishing a firm national policy through an Imperial Conference. Under the varying situations, it was difficult to decide policy and the government did not realize it until then. There had been on one hand the German movement for mediation, and on the other the Chiang Kai-shek regime would not collapse easily and it seemed not to reject such mediation.

29839 * In case peace came suddenly or Chiang's regime was annihilated, the government recognized the necessity of deciding counter measures for that. The government petitioned for an Imperial conference and held Liaison and Cabinet conferences extending to the 9th and 10th. The Chief of the Naval General Staff made an offer that it was desirable that the Emperor also ask a few questions. However, as Prince SAIONJI was prudent about the Emperor's speaking, the Lord Keeper told HARADA of this on the 10th and asked him to hear SAIONJI's opinion, adding that he, the Lord Keeper, believed the Emperor's speech might be admissible unless it included a final decision. HARADA * requested SAIONJI's opinion, and he stated that he agreed with the Lord Keeper, meaning he didn't want to fix responsibility upon the Emperor and that he regarded other questions admissible.

KONOYE received an audience with the Emperor on the 10th on the matter of an Imperial conference on the 11th. He met with the Lord Keeper, and told him that in proceeding with the Imperial Conference there would be no need of the Emperor's speech, since he was going to bring a plan which was mostly already decided.

* The Lord Keeper also considered the proceedings of the Conference and received an audience on the 10th, after the withdrawal of Premier KONOYE. He told the Emperor he thought it appropriate for KONOYE to manage conference procedure, and it was decided that the Emperor would grant permission to this effect. On the 11th the conference convened, and the President of the Privy Council, HIRANUMA, participated by special order. Because of the Privy Council's connection with diplomacy, KONOYE privately requested and received sanction to have HIRANUMA take part.

KONOYE stated that with the Emperor's permission, he would manage the council, and had Foreign Minister HIROTA explain the original draft. The Chief of the General Staff stated that he approved the draft from the standpoint of a permanent peace. The Chief of the Naval General Staff also approved. HIRANUMA approved, and stated that if some agreement were reached with the Chiang regime, consideration must be given to offering full protection to those hitherto in the pro-Japanese administration in North China and elsewhere. He requested the Home Minister to give special thought to domestic public order. The Emperor made not a single remark.

Page 29842 The various circumstances were explained on the day before to HIRANUMA * by the Chief Secretary and Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs. HIRANUMA seemed dissatisfied that such measures were taken for the first time that day. On the day of the council, HIRANUMA said he had a few questions, which were replied to prior to the council.

The government issued a statement on the 16th to draw up a liaison conference and a cabinet meeting were held on the 14th and 15th. The matter had not been settled because of the General Staff's insistence upon efforts for reconciliation. The government plan was finally accepted, but individuals of the General Staff added that they still believed the reconciliation doctrine was satisfactory.

29843 * Reference was made to the document where it showed that HIRANUMA and HIROTA were present at the council in the Imperial presence on 11 January 1938. The exhibit stated that the inflexible policy of the Empire was to form an axis for peace in cooperation with Manchukuo and China. To settle the China Incident in accordance with this policy,

29845 Japan, by applying closely unified political and military tactics, should carry out the following measures. * If the Chinese Central Government should reconsider and ask for reconciliation, they would negotiate in accordance with the conditions of the negotiations for peace between Japan and China, as indicated on the attached sheet (A). If the Empire recognized that China had carried out the peace conditions, she should not only rescind the provisions of guarantee on the attached sheet (B), but also cooperate sincerely with China for her reconsideration.

If the present Chinese Government does not ask for reconciliation, Japan would not wholly depend upon settling the Incident by taking them as her opponent, but would assist the formation of the New Chinese Government with which to negotiate and cooperate. As for the present Chinese Government, Japan should be determined to annihilate it or take measures to absorb it under the new government.

* To carry out this policy, they should promote rapid cultivation and arrangements of total national strength, especially defense power, and improve relations with third powers.

29847 * They should respect the rights and interests of third powers and try to obtain the predominant position in economic developments only through free competition. They should guide public opinion to make the people realize the fundamental policy for settling the Incident. The same should apply to foreign peoples.

Attached sheet (A) stated that regarding details of the conditions for peace, China should grant formal recognition to Manchukuo, renounce anti-Japanese and anti-Manchukuo policy, and establish demilitarized zones in North China and Inner Mongolia.

29848 North China should establish an organization under Chinese sovereignty to realize the co-prosperity of Japan and Manchukuo and China, and give the organization authorities and make special efforts to bring about economic cooperation. * An anti-communistic self-government in North Mongolia should be established, and its international position should be similar to that of the present Outer Mongolia Government. China should establish an anti-communistic policy and cooperate in carrying out this policy.

29849 * Non-armed zones should be established in the occupied areas in Central China, and Japan and China should cooperate to maintain public order and develop economic activities in the Greater Shanghai district. All three countries should conclude an agreement regarding the exploitation of natural resources, customs, trade, etc. China should make due reparations to Japan. Troops should be stationed in certain districts of North China, Inner Mongolia and Central China for the period deemed necessary. Talk on the armistice pact should commence after an agreement on these provisions had been reached between Japan and China.

When China had carried out these provisions and truly cooperated, Japan would not only rescind the provisions of guarantee, but also offer to cooperate for China's recovery and national development.

29851 * The witness was asked if when the Army General Staff was negotiating with the foreign ministry about this Imperial Conference, if a representative probably Vice-Chief TADA said to HIROTA that the truce conditions were so aggressive that they might impair future diplomatic relations between Japan and China. The witness replied he did not recall hearing such a thing. He did not hear them say it was therefore necessary to hold a conference in the presence of the Emperor.

29852 * The witness stated he was mistaken when he said the decision not to deal further with the Chinese National Govt was arrived at at this Imperial Conference. He should have said that such measures were considered in such an event.

The witness was asked if the General Staff while negotiating with the Foreign Ministry prior to the Imperial Conference said that because the truce terms were so aggressive it was necessary to establish a basic policy for reconstruction of Sino-Japanese relations by holding the Imperial Conference. He stated he did not recall and added that when an Army opinion was conveyed to the Foreign Office it was the custom for an army representative to convey it. He did not recall that it was conveyed at a meeting between the War, Navy and Foreign ministries attended by the General Staff on January 10, 1938.

29853 * He heard nothing to the effect that the General Staff said it was necessary to prepare a counter policy against the aggressive domestic tendencies. The witness was handed a document and he identified his signature at the top of it. * Exhibit 3265. The document so identified

29855 "Concerning the Basic Policy for Settling the Chinese Incident (Subject Before a Council in the Presence of the Emperor) (January 10, 1938, East Asia) stated that * 29856 the Army proposed that its drafted plan of the policy for solution of the China Incident, Appendix No.1, (Dec.1,1937) should be decided at a council in the Imperial Presence after discussion among the three Ministries. But the Foreign and Navy Ministries left the army proposal as it was because it was unnecessary to make a new policy as they already had prepared a main policy. Moreover the main policy (a) had been established in case of both peace and war and all investigations concerning a peaceful solution with Chiang Kai-shek had been finished when the answer was given to German Ambassador Derksen in Tokyo.

29857 Certain opinions became more influential among the General Staff after the answer was given to Derksen. These were that conditions of truce were so aggressive that they might impair future diplomatic relations * in China and it was not necessary therefore to establish the basic policy by holding a meeting in the presence of the Emperor and to prepare a counter policy against the too aggressive domestic tendency.

The General Staff attended the conference of the three ministries and explained this. The Foreign and Navy Ministers thought the Army's broad view was a good thing and agreed it might be well to discuss the subject in the presence of the Emperor. Consequently the subject of discussion at the meeting in the presence of the Emperor (Appendix II) was drafted.

29858 * The witness stated that the Chief of the East Asia Bureau at that time was ISHII, Itaro but he did not recall if MATSUDAIRA was Chief of the first section. The witness stated that it was his recollection that immediately after the Imperial Conference on Jan 13th a reply from China came through the German Ambassador on Jan 14th.

29859 * The witness was asked if when the reply came HIROTA said that China through the Army General Staff Hqrs as well as through the German Military Attache was aware of the concrete proposals but despite this still insisted that the proposals were not understandable. There was no hope in that sort of a reply. It had been determined at the Imperial Council that there was nothing to do but launch the alternate plan to transfer present hostilities into a long term warfare. It was vital to strengthen their determination to this effect. After being quoted this statement the witness said he had no recollection that HIROTA ever said it to him.

29860 * When asked if that represented the witness' attitude the witness stated he did hear that was the atmosphere in the cabinet but did not hear that HIROTA was especially the one who agreed with this. He was not present on Jan 14th when HIROTA met DERksen and the Chinese reply was presented.

29862 * He had heard that HIROTA told Derksen the Chinese reply was unsatisfactory and since he had already given a detailed explanation there was no need to add to that. He did not hear that the German Ambassador told HIROTA that that was not true.

When asked if the General Staff finally gave way because of a threat that if they did not either they or the cabinet would have to resign, the witness stated he never heard the General Staff was threatened. He did hear that it expressed the opinion that they wished the negotiations to continue. They did not ask that they be continued on the basis of ameliorating the conditions but that they be continued on the basis of the conditions which should remain.

The witness did not remember that the cabinet meeting was interrupted while the General Staff retired to consider why they should do about this threat. He did not know if the General Staff capitulated and agreed that the declaration refusing to have further dealings with Chiang-Kai-shek should be issued.

* He did know that the cabinet did arrive at such a decision. But he did not understand that the decision went entirely beyond what had been determined at the Imperial Conference. (The attention of the court was called to Exhibits 268, 486-B, G and I, 972-A and G, and 2260.

29865

The witness did not remember if on Jan 21 KONOYE sent HIROTA a document containing the general principles of policy after the declaration had been issued. The witness was shown a document and asked if it was not a copy from the Foreign Office of the document from KONOYE to HIROTA. He stated that he did not recall and it was difficult to confirm whether it was a cabinet decision *. He admitted it was important to him as Vice-Minister to know the new policy but he could not confirm whether this document was a copy of the cabinet decision.

29866

asked if he could suggest any reason why the Foreign Office should file a copy of a message from the Premier to the Foreign Minister if it was not authentic, he stated that generally official documents were filed by the Document Section after being looked over by the Minister, the Vice-Minister or Bureau Chief and such a document always bore his signature or seal. This document did not bear a filing number, or certificate from the chief of the Archives Section.

The witness said that he was not claiming that extra copies were never made and filed separately but to ascertain later whether such copies were made there must be definite proof. * From the document was read a part which stated that military aims in the China Incident shall be perfectly attained and the status of general mobilization completed. All measures should be taken in response to the prolonged resistance of China. He was asked if that was not a part of the policy decided upon at that time and he stated he did not recall.

He did not recall, if in February 1938 HIROTA issued instructions to Foreign Ministry representatives in China as to methods of propaganda to disintegrate the Chinese army.

* The witness was handed a document and asked if it was not issued by the Chief of the Information Section of the Foreign Office from HIROTA to such representatives. He stated he did not recall the contents but it might be a telegram sent out by the chief. Asked if he observed it was from HIROTA he stated it had always been a custom that all outgoing telegrams were sent in the Foreign Minister's name even when sent by the Information Bureau Chief. It was possible to suppose it might have been sent by the chief. It did not bear either the signature of the chief nor of the chief of the competent section.

* It was difficult to confirm the authenticity.

29870

* The witness stated he knew Baron HARADA. Asked if he met him on February 14th and asked HARADA if he had heard about the liaison conference of Feb 14 1938, he stated that he did not recall. Asked if he told HARADA that at the conference there had been a dispute between the army and navy as to whether the army would advance as far asanking so the navy might use it as a bombing base, he replied that he did not quite recall.

* He did not recall telling HARADA that the reason of the difficulty was that the army was preparing against the Soviet. He did not recall telling HARADA that the Emperor asked the War Minister if it was possible to put into effect a simultaneous plan for long-term hostilities, military preparations against Russia and the expansion of the navy.

He did not recall telling HARADA that War Minister SUIGYAMA replied to the Emperor that he would discuss the matter with the cabinet and take proper action. The witness did not recall this matter being subsequently discussed in the cabinet.

The witness was handed a document and asked if he recognized it as a foreign office record of the East Asia Bureau of "Matters regarding the Imperial General Headquarters Council in the Imperial Presence dated Feb. 18, 1938. The Vice-Minister did not have the duty of reading all incoming documents. The witness did notice that the contents of the document were similar to the same effect as what was suggested the witness told HARADA. However, he had no recollection of having a conversation with HARADA along those lines nor had he ever seen this document.

* The witness noticed that there was a pencil notation on the top of the document reading "Original copy at negotiation" but he did not know whose writing it was. When asked if the document was not of such importance that he must have seen it, he stated the document was classified as "material for research". Since the Vice-Minister was very much occupied with other matters it may have been he did not see this document.

The witness noticed that the document stated that to this statement from a naval viewpoint the navy insisted on the necessity of extending naval power for preparing against Great Britain and America. Asked if such a document which disclosed the Navy's intentions came into the Foreign Ministry if it would not be essential for both him and HIROTA to see it, he stated that he did not say that the document was not important but that he had no recollection of ever having seen it. The document merely purported to be a copy and he had no proof that it actually was an official document although it was on Foreign Office paper. It was impossible for him to state that it was an official document.

* There was a distinction between official documents and other documents filed in the foreign office. He had no recollection whether the conference referred to in the document took place.

29876

The witness stated that he knew that Grew continually protested to HIROTA about breaches of the open door policy and attacks on American lives and property. HIROTA took pains on one hand to explain the real facts of the situation and on the other hand called attention of the Army and Navy to the protests and did his best to protect the interests of third powers. He sent repeated instructions to the diplomatic representatives in China to take all possible steps to safeguard the interests of third powers.

(Attention of the Court was called to Exhibits 941, 944, 954-C, 955, 968, 969, 973)

The witness remembered the "Lady Bird" Incident and recalled that December 30, 1937 HIROTA sent an official note to Britain that the firing upon the "Lady Bird" by the Japanese army was entirely due to a misunderstanding. He recalled that a similar explanation was made with regard to the attack upon the "Panay".

It was absolutely not true that he knew the explanation was untrue. The witness was asked if on December 14th a fortnight before the note was sent if he saw Baron HARADA * and he replied that he did not remember whether he saw HARADA on that day. He was asked if he said to HARADA that the naval air forces bombed and sank an American merchant ship and that at about that time an English warship was shelled at Nanking and men wounded, that this was a real disaster and that the English warship was a small one. However it was 26 miles up stream from Nanking. The regiment of which HASHIMOTO, Kingoro was commander, fired on it by the order of HASHIMOTO. The witness stated that he did use words of a similar nature but did not recall ever using the word deliberately.

Even if the firing was carried out under HASHIMOTO's orders it was possible that he might have mistaken the ship for a merchantman. He never at any time suggested that HASHIMOTO deliberately gave an order to * fire on the British warship knowing it was British.

She had concluded treaties with France, Czechoslovakia and Outer Mongolia and backed Communist activities in China. It was necessary for Japan to make common cause with another nation to check the Soviet. It was considered proper and easy to choose Germany for both she and Japan had similar standpoints as regards their international situations, especially their relations with the Soviet. *There were two points demanding precaution in realizing this coalition, (1) needless to say the coalition should obtain the greatest effect in checking the Soviet. The coalition should not stimulate the Soviet unduly * and efforts in realizing it should not lead to a war against her. Germany's relations with the Soviet were comparatively simple. Japan's borders were directly contiguous to the Soviet and she held many concessions in Soviet territories. There were many questions between the two nations and it would be disadvantageous if Japan unduly stimulated the Soviet.

(2) The coalition should not unduly set the Western Powers especially Britain, at unrest. Anglo-Japanese relations were presently by no means friendly because of a discrepancy of views concerning Chinese problems and economic questions. It was necessary to cultivate Britain's friendship. * In view of the Soviet menace with her colossal armaments in the Far East the unsatisfactory progress of Anglo-Japanese conversations and the present stage of negotiations in Berlin for a Japanese-German coalition, Japan should be cautious lest the latter agreement stimulate Britain unduly. They should take steps toward readjusting Anglo-Japanese relations by an agreement for a frank solution regarding the settlement of important problems common to both countries.

Unofficial conversations were recently made in Berlin in absolute secrecy among the Japanese Ambassador and a military attache to the Japanese Embassy and Amb. Ribbentrop to realize the political coalition. Germany has submitted to Japan a tentative anti-comintern pact and a secret political agreement annexed to it.

* The Japanese criticism of the tentative anti-comintern pact was that if they conclude it exclusively between Japan and Germany it would stimulate the Soviet Union, when disclosed and it might be used as propaganda material. It was essential to limit the scope of the agreement within such substantial necessity that the two countries exchange information on communist activities and opinions about counter measures.

Regarding the annexed political agreement it was criticized because the first article declared neither country would take any measure placing the Soviet in an advantageous situation.

It was simply of negative import and did not restrain either nation. It would be proper to change the original conditional that in case either of the two nations were subjected to a menace or an attack, which covers too wide a scope to read that in case either were subjected to or menaced with an unprovoked attack. It was not desirable that this provision plainly name the Soviet. It would be safer to alter it as "a third state" with an understanding that this meant the Soviet.

*It was further hoped that the the provision that in the above stated case both governments would hold frank consultation with each other be inserted in the first article.

Regarding the second article, it was hoped to be struck out. It was necessary to give sufficient explanation regarding Japanese and Soviet problems to convince Germany that it was impossible to deal with the matter uniformly. It was also necessary to make sure of German intentions to handle the Rapallo Treaty and the Berlin Neutrality Treaty so as to accord with the spirit of the present pact, lest there be a disproportion of obligation between the two. While proceeding with the negotiations with Germany, Japan should also negotiate with Britain.

Once a British agreement is reached a firm resolution on Japan's part would be demanded to abstain from acts against the spirit of the agreement and to assure Britain that her Chinese concessions would be respected.

The undesirable effect that these pacts may have on Britain if they were disclosed could be prevented if the draft were amended and steps taken to readjust British relations in view of the present tense situation in relation with Russia and the peculiarity of relations with Britain. If this were done Russo-Japanese relations would sustain little damage and Japan's international status would be ensured.

The suggested British-Japanese agreement was that * both should carry on frank deliberation with the object of cooperating on important problems. The agreement should remain in force five years from the date of signing.

He was in the office of the Councillor of the Embassy at Nanking from April 30 1937 to Aug 16 1937 and later at Shanghai from Aug 29 1937 to March 3 1939, returning to Tokyo after he had served as Consul General at Shanghai from Mar 17 to Dec 12 1938.

In April 1940 he was Councillor of the Embassy at Nanking holding it until November 1942. * He first heard of the Marco Polo Bridge Incident by official telegram July 8th despatched from Peiping and also received a telephone call from the Chief of the Japanese Section the evening of the same day. The Chief of the Japanese Section TUNG said he hoped the Japanese army would be prudent so that the matter might not become serious. The witness replied that Japan had no intention to aggravate the situation and requested self restraint by the Chinese.

On the 10th he received from the Chinese Foreign Department an official note that Japanese troops causing the incident should be withdrawn to their original station and wait for a judicial settlement. The Chinese Foreign Dept. would reserve all judicial demands in connection with the matter. The Japanese replied that it was by treaty right that their troops were in North China and manoeuvred *there. It was provocative conduct by the Chinese that compelled them to take steps for self-defense and the Chinese were responsible.

Japan could not accept the Chinese claim to reserve all judicial demands. On the 11th the witness received instructions from his foreign office ordering him to convey the intention to settle the matter locally and requested Nanking not to obstruct their efforts. The witness conveyed the import of the instructions to the Chinese Vice Foreign Minister and then to the Foreign Minister and demanded that Japanese troops be withdrawn and that no reinforcements be sent.

29904 The witness asked the Chinese Foreign Minister if he was right in believing that if an agreement stopping hostilities was reached Nanking had no intention to deny or destroy it. The Foreign Minister showed no indication to deny it though the Foreign Dept. sent the witness a note to the effect that any local understanding already concluded or to be concluded would take effect upon confirmation by the Central Government. The witness also asked the Chinese Foreign Minister if the reported mobilization or northward movement of Chinese troops was true and he did not deny it.

On the 16th the witness again received a note from the Chinese Foreign Department demanding that Japanese reinforcements be instantly withdrawn , that the Japanese troops responsible for the Incident be withdrawn to their original stations and that China would reserve all claims in connection with the Incident.

* On the 17th the witness received instructions ordering him to demand that Nanking not obstruct the terms of settlement about which agreement had been reached between the Japanese and Chinese military authorities on the spot July 11th, and that he should also demand that China stop provocative speeches and actions. Thereafter he called on the Chinese Foreign Minister conveying these instructions and persuaded him that the most urgent step to be taken was to prevent further aggravation of the situation by execution of the agreement of July 11th. The witness pointed out that the Japanese forces in North China was incomparably inferior to the Chinese force there and reinforcements were being eagerly awaited

He emphasized the necessity of carrying out the July 11th agreement to alleviate the situation * and called his attention to the danger of further reinforcements to North China by the Nanking Government. The Chinese Foreign Minister promised to reply on the 19th. The note the witness left was translated and sent to Britain and the U.S. Ambassadors for reference.

On the 19th the Chief of the Japanese Section TUNG handed the witness an official note to the effect that Japan was despatching a large body of troops to Hopei Province. China could therefore not but make proper preparations for self defense. China proposed that both countries should simultaneously stop the movements of their respective forces and withdraw them to their original stations. Any local settlement should be affirmed by the Central Government.

* The witness asked Tung if this was a reply to the Japanese note of July 17th but the witness got only a vague answer. On the 20th he called on the Chinese Foreign Minister and ascertained that this was intended to reply to the note of the 17th. It was however far from the practical necessity to alleviate the tense situation. The witness considered that if they wasted time in a roundabout negotiation the situation would get more aggravated and he earnestly persuaded the Foreign Minister but he only repeated his usual abstract argument.

The witness talked to Kao Tsung-wu, Chief of the Asiatic Bureau who had direct connection with Chiang Kai-shek on the 25th. Kao hinted that Chiang Kai-shek himself intended a prompt and practical settlement. The witness had a conversation with Chang Chun, governor of Szechwan Province meeting him three or four times from July 25th to July 27th and he negotiated in close connection with Chiang Kai-shek. Chun declared that China had no objection to the July 11th agreement. It was agreed that as soon as the July 11th terms were guaranteed, Japan would make a voluntary statement to withdraw and that actually Chinese Central Force would move first southwards, directly followed by Japan's withdrawal.

The witness thought the Incident was settled. But the Langfang Incident of July 25th and the Kwangan incident of July 26th had already occurred and from the 28th onward, collisions between the two forces got more serious. Thus the agreement between the witness and Chang Chun proved fruitless.

The witness informed the progress of the negotiations to representatives of other nations.

After the Marco Polo Incident, Shanghai was comparatively calm. At the end of July or the beginning of August it began to grow threatening and they could perceive that many forces were being concentrated and munitions and troops being transported from Nanking to Shanghai.

On August 8th British Ambassador Huggessen presented to the witness his opinion regarding peace around Shanghai. The witness was aware that Japan earnestly desired to avert a collision in Shanghai and the witness reported Huggessen's opinion to the foreign office.

29910 The Japanese in Shanghai including the navy had no intention of making the matter serious. The witness had been told by the vice-chief of staff of the Landing Forces who arrived in Shanghai shortly before the outbreak there that he had received a special secret order from the Naval *General Staff that collision must be averted at all hazards.

On the 11th Huggessen on behalf of the British, U.S., Germany, Italy and France representatives offered to Ambassador KAWAGOE that the representatives of Japan and China and these five powers should cooperate to maintain peace in the Shanghai vicinity. The witness reported this to the Foreign Office and on the 12th received a telegram that Japan would accept the joint offer if China would observe the truce agreement of 1932. This was conveyed to the representatives of the five powers and Chiang Kai-shek. Consul General OKAMOTO attended as the Japanese delegate.

29911 The same day the witness received a telegram from OKAMOTO asking him to request Nanking to withdraw the Chinese peace preservation *corps stationed near the foreign settlements in Shanghai and to remove military equipment and construction around the settlements. The witness called on foreign vice-minister Wang and made this request. On the 13th the witness received a telegram from the foreign office to the same effect and he called on Foreign Minister Wang and repeated the request. Wang however argued the validity of the truce agreement and there was no result.

According to a telegram from acting Consul TAKAI at Changsha the end of July, a staff officer of the Governor of Hunan Province told TAKAI that Nanking had given him a secret order to open fire on the Japanese warship off the Changsha coast in case of a collision between Japan and China in Shanghai and asked TAKAI to use his influence to withdraw the warship.

29912 The witness left Nanking on August 16th and returned to Tokyo. He talked to HIROTA on the 21st and asked for his advice in connection with his verbal report to the Emperor. HIROTA advised him that China's circumstances should be reported to the Emperor so as to suggest hope of peaceful settlement. War Minister SUGIYAMA told the witness he feared that Japan's peace proposal might be rejected. The witness replied he felt there was still hope.

The telegrams and documents the witness referred to in his statement had been lost by fire and could not be found. There was no cross-examination of the witness.

Foreign Minister HIROTA to Consul General OKAMOTO at Shanghai dated 4 August 1937, was admitted in evidence, and exhibit 3276, a telegram from HIROTA to Ambassador KAWAGOE in China dated 7 August, 1937, was admitted into evidence.

29917 Exhibit 3275, * the affidavit of OKAMOTO, stated that the witness was Consul General at Shanghai from 8 May 1937 to 21 March 1938. The Marco Polo Bridge Incident broke out on 7 July, while he was at that post. He did his best on HIROTA's instructions to maintain close cooperation with the Chinese to secure peace in Shanghai, when he received on 6 August telegraphic instructions from HIROTA.

29918 * Exhibit 3275. telegram from HIROTA to the witness dated 4 August 1937 stated that FUNAZU was expected in Shanghai on the 7th, and it was necessary that he hold a secret meeting with Kao Tsung-Wu immediately. Since it might attract attention if Funazu proceeded to Nanking immediately, the witness was requested to make arrangements so he could meet Kao in Shanghai on the 7th, without creating the impression that the consulate or other authorities were conducting liaison. One plan would be to send TSUTSUMI of the Cotton Mill Owners' Association to Nanking to contact Kao and ask him to go to Shanghai.

Since the matter was of the utmost secrecy, the witness was requested to exercise caution and see that Kao understood that the meeting would be kept in absolute secrecy.

29922 * Exhibit 3277, a telegram from HIROTA to Ambassador KAWAGOE in China dated 7 August, 1937, regarding the draft proposal of the truce, stated that a designated area in Hopei Province and six provinces of Chapei would be a demilitarized zone, and the Tangku Truce would be abrogated.
KAWAGOE should secure consent to the liquidation of the Hopei-Chahar and the East Hopei administration, and to direct administration of the area by the Nanking government.

Page 29923 * The affidavit continued that Ambassador KAWAGOE, who had left Shanghai for North China on 7 July, was on his way back and that was the reason the instructions were addressed to the witness. Besides, the Embassy was in the Consulate-General at Shanghai at that time.

29924 Upon receipt of the instructions, the witness asked TSUTSUMI to go to Nanking to see Kao. On 7 August KAWAGOE returned to Shanghai, and the matter was reported to him. * The same day FUNATSU returned to Shanghai from Tokyo and consulted KAWAGOE, and it was decided that KAWAGOE himself meet Kao.

The conversation between Ambassador KAWAGOE and Kao, the Director of the Bureau of Asiatic Affairs, was held about 10 August at the Ambassador's residence. Kao sought the Ambassador's opinion on speedy settlement of the North China situation. KAWAGOE told him that although he had not yet received instructions to open negotiations, it was Japan's policy to settle the Incident as soon as possible. As for the terms, he thought they must be of such a nature that both governments could accept them.

29925 KAWAGOE's tentative plan was of the same line as the terms mentioned in the Foreign Office instructions, * which were establishment of demilitarized zones, dissolution of the Chi-chi Administrative Committee and the Chi-tung Regime, and economic cooperation in North China. The copies of these telegrams are at present in the Foreign Office.

29926 Kao stated that though there might be difficulties, he thought there was a hope of success if the terms were of this nature. He would return to Nanking for consultation and see KAWAGOE again. KAWAGOE told the witness the contents of this conversation. On 9 August, Lieutenant OYAMA was murdered, and a few days later Shanghai was the scene of armed conflict between the Japanese and Chinese, * and the conversation between KAWAGOE and Kao was interrupted without bearing fruit.

29927 Exhibit 3276, the telegram from HIROTA to KAWAGOE dated 7 August, 1937, on the subject of commencement of truce negotiations, stated that as a result of active consultations among the War, Navy, and Foreign Ministries on settling the present situation, it was hoped an agreement could be reached along the lines of a separate message * expected to be adopted in a day or two.

Page It was desirable that initiative on truce negotiations come from the Chinese. Arrangements had been made to dispatch FUNAZU. Reinforcements were to be dispatched from Japan, and they thought it important that an agreement be reached before 20 August, when they finished their concentration. FUNAZU was to see Kao in greatest secrecy and inspire in him a prospect of peaceful settlement and persuade him to approach KAWAGOE with a truce proposal. It would be unwelcome if Kao responded by an indefinite proposal as a mere feeler, as it was imperative that a Chinese proposal should be founded on determination on their part. Kao's proposal to KAWAGOE must have the full understanding of Chiang Kai-shek.

29928 * If Kao made a proposal with the understanding of Chiang and if Japan had already decided on the policy mentioned before (exhibit 3277), KAWAGOE was to proceed with a preliminary conference with Kao along the lines of this policy, but if he had not received by that time a telegram to the effect that the government had decided on a policy along the lines stated in this message, he was to ask for instructions immediately, reporting the details of Kao's proposal.

29929 Pending the government's decision, it was necessary that this be kept in strictest secrecy, even from military or naval attaches. * The government was willing to open parleys for adjusting diplomatic relations. Free from considering past circumstances, this was expected to be decided on in a few days. Only a very limited number, even at the top of the army and navy, were informed of this, and they were trying to arrive at a decision first and then force it through.

THERE WAS NO CROSS-EXAMINATION OF THE WITNESS.

29931 * Exhibit 3278, the affidavit of HAYASHI, Kaoru, showing that the original and copies of the telegram of HIROTA addressed to OKAMOTO and referred to in exhibit 2515 were lost and could not be found, was admitted in evidence but not read. From exhibit 2515, an earlier affidavit of OKAMOTO, Suemasa, it was stated that the Marco Polo Bridge Incident brought serious anxiety to Chinese and foreigners at Shanghai. At that time the HAYASHI Cabinet had fallen, and KONOYE had formed a Cabinet with HIROTA as Foreign Minister. A few days

29932 * after the Incident, the affiant received instructions that the government was maintaining the policy of local solution and no enlargement. He should take all means to prevent any incidents at Shanghai.

29934 Exhibit 3279, an excerpt from the Grew Diary dated 6 August 1937, stated that Britain now proposed an Anglo-American offer of good offices to both the Japanese and Chinese to smooth out difficulties that might occur in negotiations for withdrawing troops. Before acting, they wanted Dodds' and his opinion as to probable Japanese reaction to such an offer.

29935 * Exhibit 3280, a telegram from HIROTA to Ambassador KAWAGOE dated 8 August, 1937, concerning instructions for the truce negotiation with China, stated that the object of sending troops to North China was as set forth in the Cabinet resolution of 11 July. Although they were forced subsequently to drive out the 29th Army, 29936 * a punitive expedition was no part of their intention.

If the Chinese should sue for peace, it should be the generous attitude of Japan to show appreciation and cooperate with China. On the 7th, the War, Navy, and Foreign Ministries agreed that not only would the Chinese peace proposal be entertained along the lines of separate telegram 170 (exhibit 3280-A), but also to take a big stride toward improving relations.

29937 When the Chinese should make a truce proposal and if KAWAGOE was convinced it was in good faith, he could enter into negotiations, bearing in mind his instructions, and he would see that the Chinese made the first move and report the manner of their approach and ask for instructions. * Since the Chinese seemed to at last come to talk of recognition of Manchukuo, it would be better if they could be persuaded to recognize her at this time.

Since the separate telegram (exhibit 3280-A) expressed their innermost mind, KAWAGOE was requested to keep it to himself and try to lead the negotiations as favorably as possible. He would understand that the broad-minded policy would be beyond Chinese expectation, and was worthy of winning world respect.

* Exhibit 3280-A, telegram 170, from HIROTA to KAWAGOE dated 8 August, 1937, regarding conditions of truce negotiations, stated that the following would be designated as demilitarized zones in which no Chinese troops were to be stationed, and peace would be maintained by a Peace Preservation Corps.

Four different plans were then described, setting out the demilitarized areas. * To indicate that they had no intention to voluntarily reduce the number of troops within the extent of the number at the Incident's outbreak, was a limit of their concession. A second concession limit was abrogation of the Tangku Truce, the DOIHARA Chin Te-Chun Agreement, and the UMEZU-Ho Ying-chin Agreement, with the exception of understandings based on the Peiping Arrangement, which were described.

29940

* The third limit of concession was consent to liquidation of the Hopei-Chahar and East Hopei regimes, and committing them to free administration of the Nanking Government. Principles of economic cooperation were to be agreed upon. The form should be joint enterprises and other similar plans standing on the basis of equality.

The UMEZU-Ho Ying-chin Agreement, though to be abrogated as a concession limit, was still effective pending consummation of present negotiations, the Chinese to withdraw from Hopei Province.

* Parallel to the truce parleys, it was requested that the Chinese promise to enter into a negotiation to adjust relations unfettered by past circumstances. As soon as the withdrawal of the Chinese troops from the demilitarized area and evacuation from HOPEI Province was completed, upon consummation of the truce, voluntary withdrawal of Japanese troops would follow. It was proposed that on completion of the truce parley, both nations should issue a statement that they were entering a new era devoted to amity.

* Exhibit 3280-B, telegram from HIROTA to KAWAGOE dated 8 August, 1937, (telegram 171 concerning the truce negotiation), was an explanation of exhibit 3280-A. The purpose of proposing the line designating the demilitarized zone connecting Manchukuo, etc. was to include the strategically important hills on the river banks and all important points, such as Tientsin and Taku.

Page As for the withdrawal of the Central Army, it was natural that they should first demand this step, as they had always insisted that its presence in Hopei violated the UMEZU-Ho Ying-chin Agreement. No truce parley could materialize so long as this requirement was not carried out.

29943 As for liquidation of the East Hopei regime, the army was very reluctant to agree, but finally gave in. As for negotiations for the adjustment of relations, * it would be most desirable to carry it on side by side with the truce parley if there was prospect of quick agreement. It was undesirable that the parley be delayed on account of the negotiation for adjusting diplomatic relations.

Exhibit 3280-C, telegram 172 from HIROTA to KAWAGOE dated 8 August 1937 concerning the outline of the plan for over-all adjustment of Sino-Japanese relations, stated that China was to recognize Manchukuo, or tacitly promise not to make an issue of Manchukuo henceforth. An anti-communist pact should be concluded.

29944 * Besides the liquidation of East Hopei and Hopei-Chahar as a truce condition, Japan was ready to discuss the subject of Inner Mongolia and Suiyuan. In case they admitted Japan's just demands, they would not insist upon including Nanking's influence from these areas.

29945 China was to suppress anti-Japanese movements and enforce to the letter the good neighbor policy. Regarding military affairs, the Shanghai Truce Agreement was to be abrogated. They were to desist from arbitrary aviation, * reduce tariff rates, abolish special trade of East Hopei, and recovery by the Chinese of freedom to control smuggling on the sea belonging to the demilitarized area. There was to be a promotion of the normal increase and development of trade.

29946 * Exhibit 3280-D, telegram 175. HIROTA to KAWAGOE dated 8 August, 1937, referred to telegram 170 (exhibit 3280-A). It stated that since the War Minister keeps the truce plans and for adjustment of diplomatic relations under closest secrecy owing to strong military opposition, only a very limited number of high officers in the War Ministry and General Staff were taken into confidence.

29947 Plan one for the demilitarized area (exhibit 3280-A) was an ideal plan. They might content themselves finally with plans 3 or 4. * If the Chinese desired to fix a term with respect to the establishment of a demilitarized zone, they were prepared to consider it.

Page 29948 * Exhibit 3281, an excerpt from the Grew Diary dated 20 September, 1937, stated that evidently these representations impressed HIROTA, because he saw the Emperor the next morning, and later concrete indications were noticed that the government was disturbed about the effects of indiscriminate bombings and was taking steps to control the aviators. Probably as a result of their representations and foreign reactions, the government sent an admiral to Shanghai to discuss the situation with Commander HASEGAWA, and word was sent out there would be no further bombing of Nanking after 25 September.

29951 Grew then turned to the announced plans to bomb Nanking the next day at noon, and made emphatic representations on the serious danger to foreign diplomatic establishments and personnel and other non-combatants which would occur if such a course was pursued. He spoke of the serious effect in the U. S. if some accident should occur and remarked on the steadily mounting feeling in the U. S. and other countries against Japan, * which by her action was laying up for herself distrust and suspicion. He told HIROTA that the good will between their countries which they both had been building up was rapidly dissolving. While the American people were patient, they were easily aroused by some serious incident involving their legitimate interests, and that he was constantly dreading the effects of a serious accident touching the honor of the Americans.

29952 Grew spoke earnestly of HIROTA's responsibility for Japan's foreign relations and for restraining military forces in China. Grew said that the military and naval forces did not understand and appeared not to care about Japan's foreign relations and her world position, and it was HIROTA's responsibility * to guide the course of action in China. The force of Grew's statements left nothing to HIROTA's imagination.

Page HIROTA did not try to counter his observations, but listened gravely. HIROTA observed that four hours before he had ordered the naval command in China to make every effort to avoid injuring foreign diplomatic establishments or non-combatants in Nanking in connection with the proposed bombing operations. Grew reported that the press had already reported bombing operations there yesterday, but HIROTA said these were unimportant and far away from diplomatic establishments. HIROTA volunteered the opinion that the warning by the navy that bombing operations would commence at noon on 21 September was too short.

29953 * Although Grew spoke to him with unprecedented directness, HIROTA gave no indication of resentment. HIROTA received the observation sadly, but without rebuttal. While recent developments indicated that HIROTA had and was making efforts to avoid antagonizing the U. S. by cautioning the military and naval forces in local issues, the fact remained that civil government had very little influence with these forces where their general objectives were concerned.

29955 * Exhibit 3283, an excerpt from the Grew Diary dated 21 and 22 October 1937, stated that a colleague had told Grew that he made renewed representations to HIROTA to persuade Japan to participate in the 9 Power Conference at Brussels. The colleague advanced the argument that the Japanese case had gone by default at Geneva, but Brussels would offer them a further opportunity, for the powers there wished above all for a peaceful settlement of the Sino-Japanese hostilities. HIROTA replied that since his last talk he had consulted many prominent people, and sentiment against participation, especially among political leaders, was practically unanimous. However, no final decision had been reached.

29956 YOSHIZAWA told Charge d'Affaires Dooman on 21 October, that so far as the Foreign Office was concerned, the 9 Power Conference invitation would be definitely declined, * and that a favorable reply could not be expected so long as the invitation did not specify that the conference did not arise out of the League resolution and the U. S. announcement of 6 October.

29957 * Exhibit 3284, an excerpt from the Grew diary dated 6 November 1937, stated that HIROTA's talk with Grew was that according to reports from Brussels, it appeared that the draft final resolution contemplated united action against Japan. HIROTA had seen only the original draft and did not know if it was passed without amendment. If it did

Page call for united action, HIROTA feared a very unfortunate effect on Japanese public opinion, as united action would imply some sort of sanctions and not help stop hostilities but merely encourage the Chinese. According to certain diplomatic representatives, the U. S. not only took the initiative in proposing the conference, but was also taking active leadership.

29958 HIROTA said these rumors would soon appear in the Japanese press and have a very unfortunate effect. Hitherto the Japanese public had felt * that the country foremost in developing a solid front against Japan was Britain. but if the press now reported that leadership at Brussels was by the U. S., the onus would be shifted to America. Good relations with the U. S. were HIROTA's fundamental policy, and he greatly feared these results. Up to then it was felt by Japan that the U. S. was the only country whose impartiality in the Sino-Japanese hostilities had been genuine, and it was hoped that the U. S. might play an important role in bringing about peace. This situation had been somewhat altered by Roosevelt's Chicago speech, but since he omitted mention of the Far East in his address to Congress, the Japanese public had the impression that the U. S. attitude was not quite so strict as had at first been feared.

29959 * HIROTA then said that the Japanese campaign in China was proceeding smoothly and it would probably not be necessary for the army to go any further than they had already gone. It would be to China's own interest to bring about a peaceful settlement. If the Chinese Government evacuated Nanking it would be a foolish move. Opposition was forming to Chiang Kai-shek, and his position was not too secure. Japanese terms, if peace were made now, would be reasonable, and no foot of Chinese territory would be retained. If hostilities continued, the attitude might change and more drastic terms result. The U. S. could best help by persuading Chiang Kai-shek to negotiate for peace. If a willingness to negotiate were indicated, HIROTA would send a representative to Shanghai to talk with a Chinese representative.

29960 * Grew told HIROTA that he hoped he would do everything to prevent the Japanese press from publishing unconfirmed reports with regard to the U. S. attitude. Grew told HIROTA of what Eden had said in the House of Commons and of State Department denials that the U. S. had taken the initiative in calling the Brussels Conference. HIROTA said he would do his best to keep the press quiet.

- Page When Grew pointed out that the Chinese Ambassador was still in Tokyo and that diplomatic channels for peace still appeared to exist, HIROTA assented but made no comment.
- 29964 * Exhibit 3285, an excerpt from the Grew diary dated 13 December, 1937, stated that Grew was informed that HIROTA was coming to see him at the Embassy and realized that this was an unprecedented step and that something terrible happened, and he thought immediately of the Panay. HIROTA was in the Embassy when Grew got there, and at once told him of the reports of the sinking of the Panay by Japanese planes. He made no effort to pretend it might have been Chinese planes, and expressed the government's profound apologies and regrets. HIROTA seemed genuinely moved, saying he could not tell Grew how badly they felt about this.
- 29965 Grew cabled the State Department of this call of HIROTA and also that the Navy and War Ministers had likewise * expressed regrets through their attaches.
- 29967 * Exhibit 3286, an excerpt from the book "Behind the Japanese Mask" by Ambassador Craigie, stated that one serious incident occurred in December, 1937, when the Japanese were pursuing the Chinese up the Yangtze after the fall of Nanking. The British gunboat Ladybird was above Nanking, and every alteration in her position was promptly notified to Japan. In the middle of November the Ladybird was slightly damaged by Japanese field artillery. Her commander protested to the artillery commander, who showed no contrition.
- 29968 The reaction of Japan was both prompt and commendable. * As soon as he heard the news, HIROTA called on Craigie and begged him to convey to the British government Japan's sincere regret and an offer for compensation for the damage. HIROTA had obviously been much upset, showing more than usual emotion. Having regard to the feelings of the Japanese extremists, HIROTA displayed considerable moral courage in taking the unusual step of a personal call. Britain accepted the apology, and the cost of repairing the gunboat was promptly made good by Japan.

29969 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
29970 3287 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that on 7
July 1937, two months after he became Director of the Bureau of East Asiatic Affairs, the Marco Polo Bridge Incident broke out. Japanese forces entered Nanking about 13 December. Following that, Consul-General FUKUI returned to his post at Nanking. His first report to the Foreign Office was about the atrocities there. This was transmitted to the Director of the Bureau of Military Affairs.
29971 HIROTA, being alarmed about the matter, urged the witness to take some steps * to suppress such disgraceful deeds.
The witness replied to HIROTA that a copy of the report had been sent to the War Office, and that he intended to warn the military against the deeds at the coming liaison conference.

29972 At that time it was customary that the Chief of the First Section of the Military Affairs Bureau, Naval Affairs Bureau, and Bureau of East Asiatic Affairs, sat at the conference of their respective superiors. The witness brought forward the problem of atrocities, and reminded the Chief of the First Section of the Military Affairs Bureau of the high ideal of the Holy War, and demanded he take strict measures. * The military delegate shared his feelings and acceded to his demand. Shortly after a written report of the Acting Consul-General at Nanking reached the Foreign Office. It was a detailed account of the atrocities drawn up by an international security committee. The witness read the report closely and reported the outline to HIROTA, and showed it to the Chief of the First Section of the Military Affairs Bureau, and repeated the demand. The military delegate told the witness that a strict warning had already been given to the Nanking occupation force, and from that time atrocity cases grew less.

About the end of January, 1938, central army leaders sent a special envoy to the occupation force at Nanking. Later it was learned this was Major-General HOMMA. After that the atrocities were exterminated.

29973 * The telegrams and reports referred to in the affidavit were not found in the Foreign Office files, but had been lost. HIROTA, as the witness was told, requested War Minister SUGIYAMA to take strict measures with regard to the Nanking atrocities. The witness was told this by HIROTA, and at the same time made the same request to War Office authorities.

Counsel for MATSUI

- 29974 * The witness stated that the telegram from the Acting Consul-General in Nanking concerning the atrocities was written in Japanese. Asked how the term atrocities was rendered in Japanese, he stated no special term was used. By atrocities he referred to the incendiarism and looting in Nanking.
- 29975 * The questions of the Panay and Ladybird were discussed at the Liaison Conference between the Ministries of the Foreign Office, War and Navy. When asked if the despatch of HOMMA to Nanking was not for investigating means to adjust relations between foreign interests and the action taken by the military and to prevent further infringement on foreign interests in the future, the witness replied that he did not know the details of HOMMA's mission but he had heard from the War Department that it was to enforce stricter discipline.
- 29976 * The witness was asked if he were not mistaken in stating that he had discussed problems frequently with the Chief of the First Section of the Military Affairs Bureau and was shown Exhibit 3031, a chart of the Japanese Military Organization in December 1941, which showed there were no first or second sections of the Military Affairs Bureau in the War Office, the witness stated he may have been mistaken to use the words "First Section" but he recalled that the person who held the office was Col. Shibayama Kanashira. * He did not remember the date exactly when he got the report of atrocities but believed it was immediately after the entry into Nanking. He believed the Liaison Conference was one or two days after they received the report of atrocities.

witness was asked if he did not receive a whole series of such reports and he replied yes.

29978 * The witness was asked if although he had stated that the military delegate had told him the atrocities grew less after the warning, if he did not know in fact that from those reports they continued as bad as ever down to the first week of February 1938. The witness stated he did remember that but such cases were much less than on the large scale at the time of the occupation and entry. He did not recall receiving a report dated 2 February 1938 reporting 76 atrocities in Nanking the last four days of January. He did recall receiving a document reporting over 70 such cases but did not remember the date or period of time covered.

29979 * When he spoke of a military delegate telling him that a strict warning had been given to the occupation force, he was referring to Col. Shibayama. He did not hear Shibayama say when the warning was given * but he did not think many days elapsed after this first discussion was taken up in the Foreign Office. He thought it was shortly after the report from FUKUI, after which the question was taken up by the Foreign Office and a Liaison Conference held so he thought it was just a few days after the first Liaison Conference that he gave the warning. He had never heard the date when a warning was sent by the Central Army authorities to the Nanking Army.

29981 * He did not remember whether it was the second or third Liaison Conference when Military Delegate SHIBAYAMA gave him the information. This was soon after he received the first of the reports from the International Committee. The Liaison Conferences were not held regularly but he thought they were held once or twice a week. He took the view that Acting Consul-General FUKUI's report called for immediate action. * The report was transmitted to the Army immediately after its receipt. Two or three days later the witness sponsored a Liaison Conference calling their attention to the matter. The witness thought the Army took the matter up immediately. * Col. SHIBAYAMA did not tell the witness to whom the warning was Page addressed. The witness was asked what further steps he took when the reports continued to pour in from the International Committee. He replied that the words "poured in" were used in the question but he recalled that the reports came in one or two bunches.

29984 * When these later reports came in, he had the impression that the warning issued by the army authorities was not thoroughly taking effect but he did not suspect that they had never issued it.

29985 To the witness was quoted an extract from Exhibit 329, wherein a German resident stated that the fateful days of Nanking clearly showed a lack of discipline, atrocities and criminal acts of the entire Japanese Army * and it seemed a mockery to see this bestial machinery appear as a champion of anti-Communism and the renovation and deliberation of China.

Asked if that was the impression produced on his mind when he read the reports, he stated he did not recall the German who had been referred to but the impression he still retained was that the atrocities were very severe.

All the documents forwarded by the Consul, being the reports of the International Committee, were reported to HIROTA.

29986 * The witness did not recall the date HOMMA arrived at Nanking. He did not ascertain who the Central Army leaders were who were responsible for sending HOMMA and he had never heard that anyone was sent before HOMMA to make an investigation.

29988 * At that time the Foreign Office had an Information Bureau where studies of the foreign press were made but he had no connection with that bureau. Asked if the bureau reported to him and HIROTA that the world press was full of denunciations of the rape of Nanking, he replied he received no report to that effect, but received information from time to time from the Information Bureau Chief as to what appeared in foreign publications. He reported that there were many references

Page to what was called the rape of Nanking. These reports were circulated to the Minister, Vice-Minister and Bureau of Directors * but he did not recall if they were circulated to the Cabinet. He did not recall if a resume of foreign press reports was circulated to the Cabinet but he did think that such summaries were prepared to inform government members. He did not know, however, what the object of the Information Bureau were. He did not recall ever seeing a reference to the Nanking atrocities in the Japanese press, but he did not know whether such items were suppressed. * He did not think the Information Bureau reported as to what appeared in Japanese newspapers.

Asked if HIROTA brought this matter before the Cabinet, he stated he had not heard it was presented to the Cabinet. HIROTA told the witness that he had referred the question to the War Minister. The reports continued to come from Nanking about the continuing atrocities after that. Asked if HIROTA took further steps when he reported this to him, the witness stated that he didn't think HIROTA took up the question with the War Minister frequently, but only once or twice.

29991 * He did not know if HIROTA took it up with anyone else. Asked if this was not a very suitable matter to be brought before the Cabinet Advisory Council on China, the witness stated that was not a body which could take up such a matter.

29992 * HIROTA and the witness had several discussions regarding further steps to stop the atrocities and told the witness frequently to lodge serious warning with War Ministry authorities. They never talked about bringing the question up before the Cabinet. The witness did not regard the Cabinet as a body to discuss such a question for it was not in a position to deal with questions regarding the military in the field.

In his position it was necessary to know something about international law.

* The witness was asked if he and the Foreign Office accepted the Nanking reports at face value. He stated that they considered most of them to be facts and generally accepted them at face value. There were many points of duplication between foreign reports which also included reports from the Chinese. The action of the Foreign Office and himself in calling the Liaison Conferences and issuing the warnings was based on this assumption.

29997

* Asked why they did not take any further steps, he stated that the Foreign Office could not do more than that from the standpoint of the authority it held.

29998

* Exhibit 3287-A, the affidavit of HAYASHI, Kaoru, showing that the originals and copies of the telegrams and reports referred to in the above affidavit, were lost and could not be found, was received into evidence but not read. From Exhibit 328, telegrams and despatches in the files of U.S. Embassy at Nanking, was read a despatch of Grew, which stated that he had handed a formal note to HIROTA, reviewing the reports of depredations and looting of American property by Japanese forces in China, and presenting the substance of the final paragraph of the State Department's instructions. * Since he had received from the Department a comment on his oral representations to the Foreign Minister, he assured they were not disapproved and he therefore took an equally strong attitude in his talk with HIROTA. He told HIROTA that the data which he was presenting in the note disproved the reports from Japanese sources that the U.S. was depending upon Chinese information. They were now giving precise dates on which looting had been seen by U.S. citizens. He spoke of the steadily mounting evidence of Japanese depredations which was coming before the U.S. public. The inflammable 30000 * HIROTA said the strictest possible instructions had gone out from General Headquarters to all China Commanders to the effect that the depredations must cease, and General HOMMA had been sent to Nanking to ensure compliance. HIROTA said he expected immediate cessation of such looting and authorized Grew to inform the State Department that full indemnification would be made for losses and damages inflicted.

(Reference was made to Exhibit 972-G, the last address by HIROTA in the Diet, 22 January 1938.)

30001 * Exhibit 3288, the answer of Foreign Minister HIROTA before the House of Representatives Committee on the Budget, on 29 January 1938, stated that as to China's future, Japan hoped for a government to carry out an anti-Communism policy while continuing cordial relations with Japan; he wanted to help the regeneration of the Chinese.

Japan had not the slightest idea to establish a government and separate it from the rest of China. The unification of all China was necessary for its integrity.

30002 * Exhibit 3289, a statement by HIROTA before the House of Peers Budget Committee on 4 March 1938, stated that HIROTA thought it would be well if in the future there was an opportunity for the powers to discuss naval disarmament.

The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3290 as his affidavit.

* The affidavit stated that the witness was Foreign Minister in the HIROTA Cabinet from 2 April 1936 to 2 February 1937 and later was Foreign Minister in the KONCYE and HIRANUMA and YONAI Cabinets. HIROTA was appointed State Councillor in the YONAI Cabinet. The system of State Councillors had been established during the first Konoye Cabinet. The succeeding HIRANUMA Cabinet retained the system but when the YONAI Cabinet was formed, three or four Councillors resigned because they disagreed with his policies. MATSUOKA was among those who resigned. His appointment was considered to be due to his diplomatic experience, * and YONAI asked for the witness' views in choosing a man to succeed MATSUOKA. He recommended HIROTA, who was considered to have opinions contrary to MATSUOKA's and he was appointed State Councillor in March 1940. He was recommended because he was of sound diplomatic opinions and against the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact.

The YONAI Cabinet resigned in July 1940 and the second KONOYE Cabinet was formed. The Tripartite Pact was concluded shortly after. The witness used to call on HIROTA to exchange views on diplomatic problems. After the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact, he had a talk with HIROTA in which HIROTA reiterated his opinion against the Pact, saying he could not understand its necessity. The most important thing should have been termination of the China Affair and the Pact would cause grave reaction on the part of the U.S. and Britain. * China would take advantage of this state of affairs and the settlement of the China Affair would become more difficult. He pointed out that so far, Japan had been able to keep its economy through friendly intercourse with Britain and the U.S. but if she fell into strained relations with them, future economic development could be expected. He pointed out the possibility

HIROTA told the witness that when the Cabinet called a meeting of the senior statesmen to report on the Tripartite Pact immediately after its signing, MATSUOKA was the principal speaker and explained the Pact for about two hours. HIROTA told him that he put several questions * but MATSUOKA only answered that it was a matter of opinions and no convincing replies were obtained.

The witness remembered a meeting with HIROTA on 16 April 1941 when he revealed his feelings that the course of the Cabinet foreign policy seemed very dangerous. The opinion gained in influence that it would be more desirable to choose the Premier from among active or retired generals who could exercise strong control over the Army because they expected the military might become more prudent. HIROTA set forth a similar opinion in their frequent meetings.

Reference was made to the affidavit of the witness where he said he recommended HIROTA as a State Councillor because he knew he was against the Tripartite Pact. discussion as to the next Premier. He said he had no knowledge whether there was any indication regarding the resignation toward the end of August.

30015

* The witness was asked if on 10 August he met HIROTA and told him that in a Five Ministers Conference, HIRANUMA stood up and said that the War Minister came the other day and explained the Army proposal. Since the HIRANUMA government had recognized the necessity of a treaty, they had done their utmost, although War Minister ITAGAKI says that this Army proposal was not a hindrance, HIRANUMA could not think of it as such. HIRANUMA asked all the Cabinet members questions. The contention of the Army was that the situation required a military alliance. Its first step was to follow the pre-arranged plan. If this could not be done, the second step, being the conclusion of a military alliance, was to be followed. The witness stated he did not have any definite recollection as to saying this to HIROTA on that date.

30016

* He did not know that between the 10th and 12th of August 1939, HIROTA told KONOYE that his opinions on the question of an alliance were very similar to the Army's. He did not know that for that reason KONOYE recommended HIROTA as the next Premier.

* Exhibit 329i, the affidavit of YONAI, Mitsumasa stated that the affiant was Premier from 16 January 1940 to 22 July 1940. HIROTA was State Councillor in his Cabinet. One day they had a talk in which HIROTA told him his opinions on foreign policy. At that time a German-Italian Alliance was being advocated by some Japanese. HIROTA stated that the safer course was to keep contact with Britain and the U.S. and the Cabinet should make the conciliatory attitude clear as soon as possible. HIROTA pointed out that Japan might be involved in the war * if she concluded an alliance with Germany and Italy, and professed that he was absolutely against the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact.

He often had opportunity to call on HIROTA by the orders of the Lord Keeper or to sit with him at various meetings. In most of these cases, he told the witness with regard to the Cabinet that there was a necessity of adjusting the eccentric way of the military and there was no other way but to have military leaders occupy responsible positions and assume * the helm of state with a strict control over the military, and that civil statesmen lacked such capacity. As to the Imperial Headquarters, its constitution should be enlarged by appointing senior statesmen to its staff instead of constituting it exclusively with military and naval officers.

30032 * Exhibit 3293, the affidavit of Tadeusz Romer, stated that the affiant was Polish Ambassador to Japan from 2 November 1937 to 4 October 1941. His personal relations with HIROTA dated from the time he was in such post. It was during HIROTA's term as Foreign Minister and largely owing to him that on 1 October

30033 1937 the Polish and Japanese Legations * were raised to Embassies. He had opportunity to meet HIROTA more frequently than other diplomatic representatives and of conversing with him on current political matters. From the notes he took on their conversations, he quoted one dated 21 January 1941, which he later communicated to Ambassador Grew. The note stated that the affiant gathered confidentially from HIROTA

30034 that HIROTA judged MATSUOKA's policy with the utmost * severity. According to HIROTA, Japan, by her hasty and thoughtless access to the Axis, pointlessly deprived herself of all freedom of manoeuvre. She was being forced down a dangerous slope and may suddenly find herself in a war against the U.S.

A note dated 30 January 1941 regarding a conversation with HIROTA and LATHAN, the Australian Minister, stated that from HIROTA's reaction to the affiant's picture of the Japanese political situation he could deduct that HIROTA shared his views and was definitely critical of the government's policy. He agreed that a war with the U.S. would be fatal.

30036 * Exhibit 3294, an excerpt from the Grew Diary, dated 1 February 1941, stated that it was known that ARITA had been interpellating Foreign Minister MATSUOKA for days on end. It was known that HIROTA had said that MATSUOKA was following a foreign policy fatal to Japan, and that according to several Diet members, assurances had quietly been given by the Government that a policy aimed to avoid a clash with the U.S. would be followed.

OPENING STATEMENT BY MR. MATTICE.

Exhibit 3296-A, an excerpt from the pamphlet entitled "Construction of New Manchuria and Mongolia" showed those present at a discussion meeting of Japanese and Chinese notables under the auspices of the Asahi

Newspaper at Mukden on 11 January, 1932. * Ambassador YOSHIZAWA had his statement read to the group, as he was unable to attend.

In the statement, he said that military activities in Manchuria seemed to be settled generally. The important problem was future construction of Manchuria and Mongolia, and it required the people to give their best effort. Japan was playing a part in international economic life and her diplomacy in international relations was similar, and she must therefore settle the problems of Manchuria and Mongolia.

* TAKEUCHI, Chief of the Asahi Mukden Office, stated that Manchuria and Mongolia were emerging into a new construction era. It was the newspapers' responsibility to report the opinion of influential people, and they had invited them to hold this discussion in connection with Manchuria's and Mongolia's construction. For convenience sake, the topics would generally be divided into politics, diplomacy, economy, military affairs, national defense, thoughts, and culture.

* About remedial measures, they believed not only the problems of the new regime or of a new independent nation, but also the problem of unifying the Japanese organs in Manchuria, was the central issue at present. Therefore, TAKEUCHI stated that they would first like to hear from the Chinese.

Mr. Yu, (Director of the District Autonomy of Mukden Provincial Government) stated that the most important thing was respect for public opinion. The best thing was to construct a new nation.

Mr. Ting, (Chairman of the Northeastern Communication Committee), said he was of the same opinion. * Lieutenant-colonel ISHIHARA, Kanji, (Staff Officer of the Kwantung Army), stated he thought that it would be best if the Chinese notables had such wishes.

Page TAKEUCHI then asked what sort of a national constitution and administration should the new independent nations of Manchuria and Mongolia conform to. Mr. Yu replied that a constitutional monarchy was better.

ISHIDA, (Director of the Mukden Newspaper), stated he believed it would be well to establish an administration as a result of conferences based upon public opinion. It was premature then to express opinions about a monarchy or republic. He was still anxious as to whether or not the independent nation would actually be realized. This question came before the question of the form of administration.

30069 * TAKEUCHI said that the next problem was probably whether the new Manchuria-Mongolia independence should have the administration division of the four Northeastern Provinces, or have six provinces by making the Harbin Eastern Province Special District and the territory of Mongolia additional provinces.

Mr. Yu said there were many arguments whether to make the provinces small or leave them as they were. Last year the Nanking Government held discussions on whether they should create 24 or 50 odd provinces. While the problem could not be settled immediately, autonomy was necessary, and if it were not carried out satisfactorily no nation could carry on. He hoped Mukden would be made its model.

30070 * TAKEUCHI asked where the basic policy lay in the present autonomous system of Mukden. Mr. Yu stated that though the district autonomy system had been established generally for many years, it had not been thoroughly effective due to internal disturbances. It was urgent to restore the former system. The new autonomous policy of Mukden had the principle of good government and the rule of right as its slogan. He could not agree to adopting the electoral system in view of past evils in China. The aim of autonomy was to create a land of ease, by allowing

of the Kwantung Army and was appointed a 5th Division staff officer under Lieutenant-General ITAGAKI, retaining this post until about 15 June, 1938, when the witness was transferred to the post of Senior Adjutant of the War Ministry. Just before this, ITAGAKI left the command of the 5th Division and became War Minister. The witness remained in his post until about 1 August, 1939.

30082 * The 5th Division, after taking part in the Taiyuan battle, was ordered to Paoting in Hopei Province, remaining there from November 1937 to January 1938. It was afterwards organized into the Second Army, which was in the Tsin-Pu Railway area. From mid-January 1938 to the end of March, the division was along the Kiao-Tsi Railway, and after 30 April participated in the Hsuehchow campaign.
The 5th Division was thus moving toward Paoting from Shansi Province when Nanking fell on 13 December, 1937, and at Paoting ITAGAKI and staff were informed of the city's fall for the first time. Needless to say, the officers and men of the 5th Division under ITAGAKI had nothing to do with the Nanking Affair.

30083 * ITAGAKI was particularly desirous of enforcing discipline and gave strict warning against any unjust action against the Chinese. His policy was to punish severely, according to military law, any guilty man. He attached importance to the responsibility of commanding officers, and reprimanded such officers when they neglected their duties in enforcing discipline. He was also deeply concerned about discipline of other units, and did everything to bring out the true quality of the army and maintain its prestige.

30084 Because of his long years in China, ITAGAKI was regarded as an authority on China. He was well versed in Chinese affairs, and had a deep affection towards the Chinese people. On one occasion, surrendered Chinese soldiers and captured bandits were not left to the disposal of his subordinates, * but were brought to ITAGAKI directly when possible, and he would personally question them with courtesy. After the capture of Taiyuan, he prohibited the soldiers from lodging in the city, and took precautions against illegal action against the properties of the local people.

To further materialize and practice the Imperial messages to the soldiers to cope with situations in the field. ITAGAKI always maintained it was important to distribute among all officers and men such instructions as "Battlefield Code" (exhibit 3069). The fact that this code was published later based on his suggestion was proof of ITAGAKI's fine character.

THERE WAS NO CROSS-EXAMINATION OF THE WITNESS.

 By Mr. Banno.

30085 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
 30087 3299 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was formerly president of the Domei News Agency.
 He first became acquainted with ITAGAKI shortly after World War I, at Peking, where ITAGAKI was assistant to the Military Attache.

30088 In April, 1938, the witness was preparing for a business trip to Peking, when KONOYE had a talk with him and told him that the Sino-Japanese Incident had become serious in spite of the government's localization policy.
 KONOYE said he thought it was urgent to change present policies to cope with the situation. To achieve this,
 * the Cabinet must be reformed, and War Minister SUGIYAMA's successor must be one who could carry the localization policy out with enthusiasm. He thought ITAGAKI was well qualified, and he knew privately that the military also favored him. Since KONOYE knew the witness was well acquainted with ITAGAKI, he asked him to visit him in North China and hear ITAGAKI's opinion about settling the China Incident and as to his intention in case he was recommended as War Minister.

30089 The witness consented to this request and met ITAGAKI in Shantung. When the witness asked ITAGAKI's opinion as to settling the Incident, he said very earnestly that they must reach a peaceful conclusion, withdrawing the entire forces from China as soon as possible. * He stated he was not qualified for the post of War Minister, as he was a junior in the army, and since he had long served in the line of supreme command he was uninformed as to administration matters.

The witness thought, however, that ITAGAKI's acceptance or refusal would depend chiefly on the army's attitude and KONOYE's enthusiasm. The witness reported the talk to KONOYE by telegram, and on reaching Tokyo gave a further account and suggested that ITAGAKI had a strong desire for the entire withdrawal of the military forces and a peaceful settlement of the Incident.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY JUDGE NYI.

30090 * When asked if ITAGAKI had caused any troops to be withdrawn after he became War Minister, the witness stated that troop withdrawal would take effect after peace negotiations were successful, but military matters were beyond the province of the witness.

DEFENSE - ITAGAKI
FURUNO - Cross

Page The witness knew that after ITAGAKI became War Minister, the war in China intensified and extended to middle and south China. Asked if he kept an interest in ITAGAKI's speeches and activities after he became War Minister, the witness stated he did not give particular attention to ITAGAKI after he became War Minister. He gave his attention to general conditions.

30091 The witness was in Japan the last part of June, 1938. Asked if he knew that ITAGAKI, in an interview with Domei News Agency on 26 June, 1938, stated that Japan * should be prepared to fight for ten more years and he asked for popular support, the witness stated that he had no recollection of that, but it was possible ITAGAKI said it.

30092 When handed exhibit 2197, the witness stated it was an English news item in the Japan Advertiser. As English newspapers not only printed stories by Domei, but also translations of items appearing in vernacular newspapers of Tokyo, he could not say whether this was a Domei issue. * Since military operations were then continuing, responsible military persons made public and official statements that the fight must be intensified, but at the same time there were uninterrupted efforts to bring about peace between Japan and China.

30094 * Exhibit 3300-A, an excerpt from the KONOYE Memoirs, stated that as soon as KONOYE formed a Cabinet the Marco Polo Bridge Incident broke out. Despite the policy to localize the affair, hostilities spread to the entire North and to Central China. During that time the army attitude was unreliable, and the remarks of War Minister SUGIYAMA were inconsistent. Embarrassed by the state of things, it was necessary for KONOYE to get a War Minister who was able to follow the localization policy advocated by Lieutenant General ISHIHARA, Kanji, of General Staff Headquarters. KONOYE proposed to the army that ITAGAKI, whose ideas were generally similar to ISHIHARA's, enter the Cabinet as War Minister. UMEZU, however, demanded as a condition that TOJO be appointed Vice-Minister. With this condition, KONOYE succeeded in changing the Minister of War.

30095 Exhibit 3300-B, an excerpt from the KONOYE Memoirs, stated * that when Nanking fell toward the end of 1937, peace negotiations were started with the Nanking Government through the good offices of German Ambassador Trautman.

30097 On 3 November 1938, another statement was issued that if the Kuomintang Government should drop its anti-Japanese policy and try to establish a new order, Japan would not refuse to listen. For these ten months there were no communications with the Chungking Government. On 22 December, KONOYE made another announcement and pointed out that Japan sought neither territory nor reparations, * but perfect harmony.

 Exhibit 3300-C, an excerpt from the KONOYE Memoirs, stated that when the China Incident broke out, the Cabinet and Army followed a policy to localize it, but in reality it steadily assumed serious proportions. At that time the Army Chief of Staff was Prince KAN-IN, Vice-Chief was TADA, and Chief of Operations Department was ISHIHARA, Kanji, while SUGIYAMA and UMEZU were most prominent in the Army.

30098 * The year before, when KONOYE asked ISHIHARA why the China Incident had assumed such serious dimensions despite the fact that he had advocated localization, he replied that he was betrayed by those who ostensibly supported him while they secretly planned otherwise.

Page DIRECT EXAMINATION OF YAMAWAKI, Masataka,
by Mr. Banno.

30098 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
30101 3301 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that on 19 December, 1938. he was transferred from the post of Chief of the General Affairs Department and became War Vice Minister until mid-October, 1939. Subsequently he took over command of the 3rd Division in Central China.

30102 * ITAGAKI was War Minister when the witness became Vice Minister. At that time ITAGAKI told the witness his fundamental principles of administration. These were that Japan and China should not quarrel, but should cooperate.
They must devote themselves to bringing about peace.
Toward foreign countries, they should adjust diplomatic relations and promote friendship, and toward the Soviet they must gain a sense of security from the standpoint of defense and remain calm. Military discipline should be enforced and army unity tightened, and they should try to increase national strength, taking into consideration that peace with China might not be realized immediately.

30103 * In establishing peace with China, ITAGAKI approached the problem broadly, his basic idea being mutual respect for sovereignty and cooperation in culture and economy. The so-called Konoye Three Principles of 22 December, 1938. were synonymous with ITAGAKI's intention, and he made every effort to carry them out.

He cooperated with KONOYE, who was seeking cooperation with Shoo-i and Wu Pei-fu, and shared enthusiasm with Wang Ching-wei and the rest of the Kuomintang officials in their hope to set up a new Central government consisting of both Wang Ching-wei and Chiang Kaishek.

30104 ITAGAKI was for strengthening the anti-Comintern Agreement on the grounds that Japan might be free from international isolation through close cooperation with Germany, and Germany might be induced to act as intermediary in peace with China; at the same time the Soviet threat might be mitigated.

According to information given the witness by ITAGAKI, Japan's basic condition regarding the pact was that the Soviet was the primary object, but Britain and France might also become objects if the situation changed.
In the latter case, whether Japan would give armed assistance to her allies depended upon the circumstances. To the outside world, this new agreement would have to be explained as an appendix to the anti-Comintern Pact.

30105 In utilizing it for political purposes and in spite of her knowledge that Japan could not afford to participate in an armed conflict, Germany maintained that Britain and France were outwardly the object of fighting and refused to assent to secret clauses. Many days elapsed without definite conclusion, and in the meantime government officials argued to reach a happy medium by changing the words of the Pact without affecting Japan's basic conditions. * Difficulty was added to concluding the Pact because Germany began to doubt Japan's sincerity.

The Army wished its speedy conclusion to attain peace with China and insure security toward the Soviet. Some in the Army even maintained that outwardly it might be unavoidable to conclude the agreement unconditionally, if that would help Germany to understand Japan's sincerity.

* At a Five Minister's Conference on August 8, 1939, ITAGAKI stated that to conclude the agreement, the army considered it unavoidable to make certain changes in its form. Since it was impossible to change established policy, he would try to conclude the agreement in line with that policy. If Germany did not meet their terms, he would take the political responsibility.

30107

This is what the witness was told by ITAGAKI after the conference. Regarding the blockade of the British concession in Tientsin on 14 June 1939, local negotiations were in progress since the matter was connected with the North China Army. On 20 June, Ambassador Craigie proposed to have the Japanese-British conference transferred to Tokyo, but local military authorities did not favor this * and an anti-British movement was in the making and rightist-led riots were feared. In spite of this, ITAGAKI consented to the British proposal, hoping it would prove Japan's true intention to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion and also be a step toward peace with China.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY JUDGE NYI.

The witness stated that ITAGAKI acted as he had already stated in his affidavit with regard to the methods he employed to bring about peace with China. The witness did not know that there was a special committee on China Affairs under the Five Minister's Conference to work out important stratagems in connection with China.

Asked if this was entrusted to the Committee on China Affairs, he stated that he knew DOIHARA was engaged in such work then, but he didn't know what kind of a committee existed. He didn't know if leading personnel were sent by the Army to work on Tang Shoo-i and Wu Pei-fu, although he was Vice Minister at that time. * He didn't know who was sent with DOIHARA to work on Tang and Wu. He knew only of DOIHARA and his activity. He recalled that Wu was in Peking when DOIHARA went to China, but did not remember what Tang was doing. Both were retired. He didn't know who sent DOIHARA to work on Tang and Wu.
- 30110 * Asked if it was one of the strategies advocated to work on retired Chinese statesmen and generals like Tang and Wu to bring about the self-destruction of the then existing government, he stated that may have been one of ITAGAKI's methods to attain the ideal he held in connection with relations between the two countries, but he didn't know whether anything of this nature was calculated to bring self-destruction to the Chinese Government or bring about a peaceful settlement. He had some recollection of an agency established in the spring of 1930 for carrying on work of this sort, but didn't recall if it was named the DOIHARA Agency.
- 30111 He recalled having communication with DOIHARA. * Asked if he was fully informed of the developments of the Agency's work in China, he stated that all he knew was that DOIHARA was in communication with Wu. He did not know whether he was informed of DOIHARA's work on Wu and another.
- 30112 He did not recall whether DOIHARA contacted Wang Ching-wei * or any representatives of Wang. The witness was handed a document, but didn't recall if it was a telegram sent to him as Vice Minister, but still didn't remember if DOIHARA contacted others than Wu. Telegrams of this nature were addressed to the Vice-Minister, but their actual disposition was handled by various sections and bureaus.
- 30113 * The witness gave his opinion on important matters to the War Minister, and ITAGAKI himself consulted the witness on important matters. Understanding had been reached that the activities of Fu's faction would be confined to intelligence.

There were arrangements regarding residence, etc. if Wang Ching-wei was to come to Shanghai, and they would like to get the approximate date beforehand. Both Chou and Mei are of the opinion that the time was not yet ripe for Wang Ching-wei to visit Shanghai.

30117 * The witness did not recall whether ITAGAKI spoke firmly on KONOYE's three principles when HIRANUMA succeeded KONOYE as Premier in January, 1939, nor did he recall if ITAGAKI promised to remain in the HIRANUMA Cabinet on condition that HIRANUMA accepted his seven points, including the continuance of the KONOYE statement of 22 December. He had no recollection as to the first three of the seven points, which were described to him.

30118 * At that time the witness had just come in as Vice Minister, but he had no exact recollection of the conditions under which the War Minister wanted to stay at that post. The witness was dispatched by ITAGAKI as his proxy to Cabinet headquarters to reply formally to ITAGAKI's acceptance to remain as War Minister, but he didn't recall the other conditions of his remaining in that position.

30119 * A document was shown the witness on which he saw the seven conditions and his own name at the end of the article. Asked if he recalled that HIRANUMA accepted all ITAGAKI's conditions and reminded that this was the mission that he was entrusted with to tell HIRANUMA that ITAGAKI had accepted, the witness stated that he was unable to see HIRANUMA and left something in writing. He had not read the contents and did not know what the document contained, but he left with SHIONO the conditions for ITAGAKI's acceptance.  ITAGAKI, upon HIRANUMA'S request, called on HIRANUMA and 30121 * was asked to remain as War Minister. After revealing army requests, ITAGAKI left. The points requested by the army and revealed to HIRANUMA by ITAGAKI were, 1, with regard to the China Incident, the aims of the Holy War should be achieved; the declaration of 22 December on China policy should be entirely adopted; 2, to cope with new circumstances, the plan for national defense should be established and the preparation and expansion of arma-30123 supported and assisted by the witness. * ITAGAKI took personal interest in enforcing discipline.

- The witness stated that he became Vice War Minister at the time of the KONOYE declaration of 22
 December, 1938. He thought TOJO took office as Vice War Minister when ITAGAKI became the Minister. The witness 30124 replaced TOJO later. * The witness stated that his views coincided with ITAGAKI'S principles.
- * He thought an order was issued by himself to the 30125 armed forces for the direction and control of speech and 30126 action. * In connection with this order, he distributed a book entitled "The Situation of the Army Unit and Army Man Returning from the Disturbance Area". This book contained examples of the speeches and statements of returning soldiers, which the army sought to control. The book was top secret, and carried the notation that reproduction was prohibited, and it was to be handled with extreme care to prevent leakage.
- Exhibit 3304, entitled "Army Records of the China care was necessary was a soldier's statement that the thing he liked best during battle was plunder. * Other statements

Page Discipline was strict in the peacetime army, but in the battlefield it could not be so. Many conscientious workers fell early in the battlefield. At XX they captured a family of four, and played with the daughter as they would with a harlot. Since the parents insisted the daughter be returned, they killed them and continued to play with the daughter, and then killed her.

30129 One company commander instructed that as for raping, in order not to have problems, pay them or kill them after they had finished. * If the army men were investigated, they would probably all be guilty of murder, robbery, or rape.

Another soldier's statement was that in the half a year of battle, about the only things he learned were rape and burglary. Other statements were that in the battlefield, they thought nothing of rape. Some men resisted with firearms when discovered by military police in the act. Many men got souvenirs of precious stones, metals, etc.

30130 The army used many spies, but after they became unnecessary they were killed. * Plundering in the battle area was beyond imagination. Pacification was being practised in only a small part of the occupation area. Chinese prisoners were sometimes lined up and killed to test the efficiency of a machine gun.

30147 * The witness identified and verified exhibit reason War Minister ITAGAKI made peace efforts with Wu Pei-hi was to bring about a Sino-Japanese peace as quickly as possible, and he tried to persuade the Chinese by establishing peace societies in North and Central China. This found response in Yen Hsi-shan in Shanshi Province, who in answer to general public feeling, began 30150 to express * his desire for peace. He dispatched Major-General TANAKA, Ryukichi, Chief of Staff of the First Army in Shansi, as liaison.

In 1940, TANAKA reported the situation to General Headquarters. ITAGAKI in China supported the negotiation and instructed the North China army frequently, sending staff members to work for a general peace. The negotiations bore fruit after Chief of Staff USHIROKU was appointed, and the meeting between Yen Hsi-shan and the First Army commander was brought about. This was really due to the motive power applied during ITAGAKI's tenure.

30151 The movement for peace negotiations in Hong Kong toward Chungking went on from the spring to the summer of 1940. Lieutenant-Colonel SUZUKI, Takuji, military attache at Hong Kong, negotiated with Sung Tsu-chich, who was Not only the Supreme Commander in China and Imperial Headquarters recognized this, but the latter sent Section Chief USUI to Hong Kong to assist. The first step in the negotiations progressed to the discussion of fundamental

 POWs should be kept in Korea. Before the POWs arrival, the camps were either newly built or reconstructed. The principal camp buildings were about 500 meters from Army quiet and healthful.

The Jinsen branch camp was built on a healthful location, as also was the Konan branch camp. They avoided crowded places for camps, and they never chose a place for propaganda purposes or putting affront on POWs. Places of work for POWs were kept from crowded places in the city.
 If the work place was far from camp, they transported them far from propaganda.

30162 * The report entitled "Reaction of General Public

ITAGAKI, the Army Commander, was concerned about English POW's who were to come to Korea in cold weather and to climatic conditions. Considering that also they must be weak and sick from their long voyage, he instructed his men about the preservation of POW's health and to be careful about the position of the camps and equipment. Both the witness and ITAGAKI examined the buildings and equipment with staff officers. He instructed the camp commander and staff of the intendance corps.

* ITAGAKI often consulted the witness on POW treatment, and gave instructions about their food, clothes, and medical treatment, telling the witness to give them as much nutritive value as Japanese soldiers, but to get them food suitable to their tastes. Their own medical men were allowed to be present and were consulted when they were given medical treatment. The witness stated there were occasions in which the Chief of Staff decided matters on behalf of the C-in-C, as when the commander was absent or met with accident and there were urgent or relatively unimportant matters.

30165

* Asked if in such a case documents were issued under the commander's name without his knowledge, the witness stated it was the practice to report such decisions to the commander, but depending on the character of the Chief of Staff or on the contents of the decisions, there were cases when the chief did not report it.

30166

Exhibit 1975 was handed the witness, and he stated that it was the document he referred to in his evidence * and was a report sent to the Vice Minister on 13 October. The witness was familiar with the document, and its first part dealt with the arrival of POWs in Korea. He agreed that the report contained a statement that the fact that Koreans clearly recognized that they were directly participating in the Greater East Asia war when they saw Korean guards was worthy of special mention. The idea was very successful in driving all admiration for British and Americans out of their minds.

* The witness was shown exhibit 1973, and he agreed that it was a message from ITAGAKI to TOJO dated 23 March 1942. An excerpt from the document was quoted, which stated that the purpose of interning U. S. and British POWs in Korea was to make Koreans realize the true might of Japan and contribute to psychological propaganda for stamping out ideas of worship of Europe and America.

S. and as the Governor-General and the Army were strongly desirous of it, the Chief of Staff wished one thousand British and one thousand U. S. POWs would be interned in Korea. The War Vice Minister was asked to give special consideration regarding this matter. The witness believed he saw that document at that time also.

30169 * The witness did not recall whether he showed exhibit 1975 to the C-in-C, ITAGAKI. The report was a compilation of the reactions of the public toward POWs taken in Malaya and elsewhere and interned. They did not compile the report calling attention to the purport given in its first part.
 30170 * The usual practice was to have the commander's approval when they sent a document like this or subsequently refer it to him, but he had no exact recollection whether that practice was followed in this case, but he did not doubt that this was followed.

They took no steps to bring before the Governor-General the people's reactions to the arrival of POWs, as this was not their duty. When reminded that in a telegram he had stated to the War Vice Minister that the Governor-General desired POWs taken to Korea, the witness stated that his predecessor did not tell him of this telegram, 30171 and he didn't know who in the government-general was interested in this information.

30172 * POWS, when they first arrived at Korea, disembarked at Fusan, went by train to Keijo and other places, and some of the reports were as to what happened in Fusan.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. SASAGAWA.

30173 The witness was handed a document which he said was received in Tokyo at the War Ministry, * and there was no sign in it that ITAGAKI saw it. The subject of the document was a secondary matter in the circumstances then prevailing, and was not important requiring commandant's perusal.

30175 * Exhibit 3308. a report of investigation by the Red Cross on POW Camps in Korea from the Vice Foreign Minister to the Chief of the POW Information Bureau, stated 30176 * that the POW camp at Seoul, Korea, was visited 18 December 1942. It had a capacity of 500, there were only 433 inmates. Just before the visit, 100 were sent to Mukden and 11 died.

Page 30177 The camp was on dry soil in a healthful spot. The largest building was a former spinning factory, four stories high, where POWs were billeted. * There was sufficient air and light, electric lights, iron stoves, common wash places, Japanese-style lavatories, and sewerage.

30178 The ration was described, which amounted to between 3251 and 3383 calories. The average weight of the POWs was 61 kg. * There was a canteen which sold tobacco and a few toilet articles, with some of the latter items being distributed free. Clothing was for summer use, but the Japanese government had supplied heavier clothing. There was an underwear shortage, but Japanese troops were in the same condition.

There was one Japanese and three POW doctors. Serious cases went to the military hospital. The medical places were in good condition. There were thirty patients of which two were in the hospital.

30179 * There was a playground of 900 square meters, a small library of English books, an English daily newspaper, and Sunday services were held. Their money was deposited at a savings bank, and work was left to the prisoners' choice. Their pay per day was 10 to 37 sen. They could send a specified number of letters, but they had received no incoming mail as yet. No visiting or going out was permitted. The relations with the commander were good, and their conduct was fair.

30180 * The Jinsen camp was visited 19 December, 1942. As in the Seoul camp, with one exception all POWs were from the British convoy. It was situated in a healthful spot. The average temperature was 11, one higher than at Seoul. The building, 6354 square meters of which were used for the POWs, was built in 1941 and was an army barracks. There were Russian style brick stoves, washing stands, and one Japanese and two POW doctors were on duty at the camp.

30181 * There was a playground and vegetable garden. There were 58 patients, of which 27 were in the hospital. The officers wanted to be separated farther from enlisted men. The POW dentists required dental instruments. The commandant of both camps was very kind. In other details, this camp was similar to the camp at Seoul.

 beds. The internees cooked for themselves, and there was plenty of food stuff. They were allowed to buy things, by Mr. Sasagawa.

30195 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
30196 3311 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness had been a Staff Officer of the First Section of the 7th Area Army from 29 January 1945 to the surrender.
The Commander of the 7th Army was DOIHARA until 21 April, 1945, when ITAGAKI assumed the post. The affidavit described the units which were under ITAGAKI's command.

30197 * The defense area for these armies were, 16th
Army Java, 25th Army Sumatra, 29th Army Malay Peninsula, 37th Army Borneo. Singapore Island was under direct jurisdiction, and after June, 1945, the entire province was included. There were some air units and communication units in the defense area, but they were under the C-in-C of the Southern Army and received instructions from the area army only with regard to the ground fighting. The same was true with naval units.

POW camps were under the C-in-C, Southern Army, and the local army commander had only limited control over them and was concerned only with supply. The system of administration was set forth by the Administration Bureau and by the Southern Army.

30198 * POWs were used according to regulations, and in using such labor the camp chiefs were consulted. In Singapore they were used in construction work. They were healthy POWs, and were never used in work directly concerned with fighting. In accordance with ITAGAKI's suggestion, the amount of food given them was increased to the level of that given Japanese soldiers.

30199 After April, 1945, communication by sea between Japan and Singapore was completely cut off. Only a small number of plane trips were made. There was no chance to get munitions from Japan. * Regarding communications between Singapore and other places, there were 15,000 tons of usable ships which travelled between Singapore, Java, and Palembang. They could not effectively meet the transportation demand, due to enemy interference. Planes transported only a small number. Goods transported between Singapore and Java amounted to 10,000 tons per month, one half rice and the remainder arms and munitions. It was planned to use sail boats with motors and warships, but this proved to be inadequate.

Page Goods transported between Singapore and Palembang, Sumatra, amounted to 5 or 6,000 tons per month, mainly food and materials. Since Sumatra was itself short of food, little could be transported.

30200 * Since areas near Borneo were always under the control of Allied planes, the use of large ships was impossible. They tried to use sail boats with motors, but after June, these were unusable. Landing boats were tried but proved to be incapable of transportation. Most of the goods for Borneo were stored at Singapore. Sail boats with motors were used to transport rice between Singapore and FIC, but this amounted only to 1,000 tons per month due to motor troubles and enemy interference.

30201 Between Singapore and Siam, transportation was by junks and railways, and 3,000 tons monthly were transported. * After April, 1944, sea communication with Burma was cut off. Railways were damaged and transportation was practically unavailable. In May or June, a convoy of three or four ships was sent twice to Andaman and Nicobar, but the ships were practically wiped out by Allied forces. Plane communication was attempted only a few times.

30202 The Army in these islands suffered greatly from the acute food shortage, but had no means to correct the situation. To feed the people and troops in Singapore required at least 8,000 tons of rice per month, but transportation to Singapore became so difficult that after July they could not depend on food from other areas. It was planned to save the rice in store, and the people's rations and the troops were cut to two-thirds the normal quantity around March. * In spite of this measure, the rice in store was not enough to last six months. Efforts were made to become self-sufficient, but due to poor productivity the expected aim was not accomplished.

Supplies for POWs inevitably decreased, but efforts were made to give substitutes to POWs, who were instructed to alleviate the situation by raising vegetables, etc. Medical supplies were not sent from Japan. Efforts were made to produce such items locally, but refined, critical medicines were lacking.

30203 The 37th Army came under the 7th Area Army on 20 May, when the war situation in Borneo was becoming difficult and sea and air communications with Borneo were almost cut off. * As a result, wireless contact was barely maintained for 30 minutes twice a day, due to lack of fuel and electric source in Singapore.

Page When they sent a plane, they were uncertain whether it would reach its objective. When it did, its return was questionable. The one hour radio communication a day was not enough even to send or receive urgent operational reports, and they were not able to learn what was going on in the rear Allied areas.

A staff officer was sent to Borneo by plane to get information, but the plane got lost and the condition in Borneo was never made clear up to the time of surrender.

30204 As it was virtually impossible to ship out materials, * the war supplies they were able to send to Borneo constituted only 5 or 6% of the request. They were in such a predicament that they never had opportunity until the day of surrender to send the relief items for POWs which had arrived in Singapore.

Because of communications conditions, they had no alternative but to let the 37th Army commander handle everything concerning his army. Transfer of POWs in Borneo was planned by this army before it came under the area army's command, and the latter army was not in position to find out how it was carried out. Since the area army commander was not directly responsible for handling these POWs, he had nothing to do with this.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY COLONEL MORNANE.

30205 * The witness stated that in addition to Malay Peninsula, Andaman and Nicobar Islands were also under the 29th Army. When he spoke of the limited authority of the army commander, he meant it was limited to the extent ordered by the general commander under POW regulations made in Tokyo. (The attention of the Court was directed to exhibit 1965.)

30206 In addition to supply of provisions, the area army also had to supply medicines and provide for hospitalization. * As regards the type of work that was to be done by POWs, this was decided after consultation with the Southern Army commander. The area army would not consult him every time they wanted POWs for labor. Details were decided by the area army, but general policy by the Southern 30207 Army. * The area army would decide how many men were required each day and request the camp chief to supply that number. The camp commander would be asked to make a report on the condition of POWs and on its basis details were decided.

It could not be said that the witness had nothing to do with POWs, but that was not his main duty. Asked if he could not say that sick POWs were never used for construction work, he stated that he was concerned with it to the extent that whenever strategy required, laborers would be sent to such and such a place, but he would not supervise the work at all.

* The witness stated that POWs were used to construct anti-aircraft shelters for non-combatants, but not for constructing defense positions in July when it was feared Singapore would be invaded. When asked if POWs were used at Bukittimah Rifle Range for constructing defensive positions, he stated they were merely used to build anti-aircraft shelters.

30209

Prior to March, 1945, when the ration was cut down to two-thirds the normal ration, they had been receiving 600 grams of staple foods. POWs at that time were receiving 500 grams. * When he referred to ITAGAKI's increasing the ration, this was after he assumed his post. He had not arrived in March. When ITAGAKI came, POWs were receiving two-thirds of 500 grams. It was about March when the rations were so reduced, and this continued until the end of May.

30210

* The witness did not know the date, but ITAGAKI inspected the camps to find out in detail supply conditions and ordered rations increased for those going to work, and to the same amount as that of Japanese soldiers. A special patient's ration was decided on for the sick. It was not true that the sick only got two-thirds of what POWs who worked got. For non-working POWs and those who rested, they got two-thirds of 500 grams. * Working POWs got 400 grams of rice up to the surrender, which is the same amount received by Japanese soldiers.

30211

30212

* When asked if at Kranji Camp large stocks of butter and other captured commodities were sent by the Japanese immediately on the surrender, the witness stated that at the time of the surrender they were still prepared for a long war and had kept those supplies in reserve so that even in stringent circumstances they could give them a sufficient supply. These stored supplies included medicines.

In regard to Dutch Borneo, the 37th Army was responsible for land warfare there.

In April, 1944, 7th Area Army Headquarters was formed at Singapore, with DOIHARA as commander, and Malay, Java and Sumatra areas were put under it. At the same time the witness was attached to the 7th Army Headquarters. At the end of June, 1944, he became Chief of Staff of the 7th Army. At that time he had not recovered from a wound and could do no manual work.

* In April, 1945, DOIHARA was transferred and ITAGAKI became commander. The witness' duty was the same up to the surrender. About November, 1943, the affiant had opportunity to inspect POW treatment and camp accommodations at Changyi in Singapore. The billets were wooden, but clean, and the compound looked comfortable. According to the officials, the POWs were on the whole content with the treatment, though there was discontent with the food. Because of his injury he had no chance to inspect.

30218

* About May, 1945, the affiant recalled that ITAGAKI inspected the POW and internment camps in Singapore. ITAGAKI was a just man and a champion of humanity, and endeavored to give the best possible treatment, and there was marked improvement. At ITAGAKI's arrival, a Japanese steamer with a full cargo of relief goods for POWs came to Saigon, Singapore, and Batavia from Japan. Many Japanese civilians unable to return home were still there. * With due permission they sailed for Japan aboard this vessel, the Awa-Maru. In spite of an Allied guarantee that the Awa-Maru would be safe, she was attacked and sunk by an enemy submarine in the waters of Formosa. When the report reached there that there were no survivors among the two thousand and several hundred, Japanese public opinion became excited and expressed the opinion that distribution of relief goods brought over by the Awa-Maru to the POWs be suspended. ITAGAKI attempted to allay this opinion, admonishing that "Bushido" did not permit it. From the standpoint of justice and humanity, they should distribute the goods with pleasure, and he ordered the distribution without delay.

* Since before ITAGAKI's arrival, land and sea transportation had been considerably reduced by enemy attack, and from January 1945 the rice supply from Siam had decreased to less than one-third the amount needed. There was no alternative but to decrease rations.

On one hand, military strength in the Malay and Singapore areas had been increased, making the supply of provisions all the more difficult, and on the other hand provisions had to be reserved to make preparations for new operations. In the Japanese forces, the ration of rice per day was cut from 700 to 600 grams in February, 1945, and to 500 in March. The rice ration for POWs and internees was 200 grams less than for Japanese soldiers, but this was supplemented by potatoes obtained by self-production, and thus they were allowed to get a total quantity of 700 grams. * The additional supply of meat and vegetables was obtained by self-support.

30222

ITAGAKI gave special orders to provide POWs engaged in anti-air raid construction work with the same staple rations given to Japanese soldiers. He also added not only corn or tapioca as rice substitutes, but luxuries such as coffee, sugar, etc. Under such circumstances, POWs were delighted to engage in this work. The affiant heard that when ITAGAKI visited the internment camp in May, 1945, he specially inspected the rations provisions and desired the men in charge to increase them.

* It was unavoidable to make POWs work, when Japanese soldiers and even Japanese civilians were engaged in labor. Since ITAGAKI's arrival, the labor was chiefly limited to anti-air raid construction, and those engaged in it were chosen because they were especially healthy. Most of them lived and worked with the soldiers, and as regards food and other rations were given equal treatment. The treatment thus improved as compared with the previous period.

* As regards sanitation, any army medical supplies or medicines was given them immediately, and no discrimination was made. Working POWs were allowed to undergo medical treatment like Japanese soldiers. There was no case of airing grievances at that time. It was unavoidable that in the treatment of POWs rations had to be decreased. These were uniformly reduced among the army forces too, but special consideration was given to those engaged in labor in providing them with increased rations and adding luxuries. All this improvement served to show ITAGAKI's leadership based on his respect for humanity.

From April, 1945, to the surrender, supplying food to other areas became totally impossible, and imports from Japan were entirely suspended. Communication became dangerous, and each area had to find means of support. On Singapore Island and Southern Sumatra it was difficult to obtain food from the natives. * Attempts were made to import rice from Java and Siam, and between April and August, 20,000 metric tons were sent from Java to Singapore, 5,000 to South Sumatra, and about 23,000 to Malay from Siam. The reserve and supply of rice for army forces had to be limited.

Since it was expected that war ravages would hit Singapore, they felt it necessary to disperse inhabitants to the Malay area to minimize this. After ITAGAKI's arrival, this policy was greatly accelerated. Although the food situation was serious, * food provisions for three months were distributed to the evacuees and subsidies given them.

The armed forces quickly sent a relief party to damaged districts whenever Singapore or the vicinity was bombed. The relief party was in charge of fire fighting, rescue work, etc. Military authorities did their best to relieve the citizens, distributing special relief food, and Japanese residents also volunteered their services. The inhabitants were very grateful for the kindness of the Japanese.

In respect to the treatment of native laborers, the area army paid much attention to it, since during DOIHARA's tenure ITAGAKI also gave necessary instructions regarding their treatment. * When an important construction work was to begin, he never failed to ask for stipulations regarding the treatment of native workers. He often sent officials to inspect and lead the construction work and help set up the medical relief party. In the construction of alumina works in Bintang Island and oil plants in Palembang, improvement of sanitation or other welfare for the laborers was under the direct control of Area Army Headquarters, and remarkable progress was achieved.

* The witness identified Exhibit 3313 and after corrections verified it.

* The affidavit stated that the witness was the Chief of the Java POW Camp at Batavia from August 1942 to March 1944 and Chief of the Malay Camp Singapore from March 1944 to the surrender and concurrently Chief of the Malay Detention Camp for non-military civilians.

* Although the witness had been imprisoned after the surrender he had not been questioned as to treatment of prisoners. When he was chief of the Malay Camp, the C in C of the 7th Area Army was DOHIMARA who was succeeded by ITAGAKI at the end of April, 1945. The area commander was in direct command of POW Camps and Detention Camps. But orders on overall management of prisoners were issued by the C in C of the Southern Army TERAUCHI and received through the Area Army.

Close liaison had been kept with the POW Information Bureau and the witness attended a conference of camp chiefs in Tokyo in July 1942 and in December 1943. They never received any order or suggestion to maltreat prisoners. The treatment, labor and punishment of POWS were executed according to laws and orders of the central authorities and no special policy or regulations were put into practice. There was no violation of these regulations and orders. No labor directly relating to operations was ever imposed. Working POWS got 600 grams of staple food, the same as given to the troops. He did not think working hours excessive in comparison with laborers in general.

The Malay food situation became critical under the Allied attacks and both soldiers and citizens had great difficulties. Rations were reduced from 600 to 400 grams and subsidiary foods became scarce. The Singapore situation was miserable. Under the leadership of the military every effort was exerted for self sufficiency in food but the decrease of food for POWS was inevitable.

However their rations generally equalled the troops. During the worst days the daily ration became 300 grams and conditions grew worse near the end of the war. Medical treatment was not refused. There was never a case of purposely refusing it. The witness heard after the war a young officer attempted atrocities. He called ITAGAKI call this officer and persuade him to refrain from this.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. MOHANE

The witness stated that the Third Branch Committee of the Malay Committee at Singapore was under his command and the Changi Camp was under his direct control. Other camps under his control were the First and Second Branch camps near Sumatra. As far as supervision of POWS went, the witness was not in the direct chain of command.

30234 *The Third Branch Camp had control mainly of Indian POWS. There were four camps inside Singapore and one at Changi. Two months after his arrival in Singapore he transferred the Changi Internment Camp elsewhere. The inmates of the Changi Camp were transferred. POWS who had hitherto been held in an airfield near Changi were transferred to the jail.

30235 Both those camps were under his control and also the hospital at Kranji #1. They did not have a detention camp at Kranji #2. At Kranji there was a hospital for Indian POWS who were interned and another one for white men. He remembered a place called Blakang Mati but he forgot the exact number of POW laborers there.

30236 * He knew that a party had been sent there before his arrival and that a unit there had charge of them. The supervising unit for the POWS was the one on the spot. There were occasions when he and his subordinates went there on inspection tours.

The Outram Road Jail was not under his control. He believed that ordinarily the 7th Area Army controlled it. Asked if the Siam Road Military Police Camp was under his control he stated he had nothing to do with the gendarmes. He believed that camp was for general civilian internees.

30237 *He did control general civilian internee camps, including the Siam Road Camp. Orders regarding POW labor came from the army and in accordance with these orders the witness disposed of the POWS. He never received complaints from the men as to their treatment while on these working projects. On one occasion he went as far as to refuse to send men out until he got assurance they would be better treated. Asked if that was not a result of complaints from the men, the witness said he understood complaints to mean those in regard to feed. But he did have complaints as to general conditions, such as ill treatment on working projects.

"The affidavit stated the witness was a staff officer of the 7th Area Army in charge of supply and communications from March 1 1945 to the end of the year. After that he was chief of the Liaison Section with the British Forces. The 7th Area Army Commander was ITAGAKI from April 22 1945 to the surrender.

He had read Exhibit 1514-A. While chief of the liaison section in Singapore he had heard that the Third Air Force in Singapore had entrusted the Utoram Prison with the care of the air force POWS about June 1945 without informing the Seventh Army Hdqrs and that junior officers of the air force had arbitrarily withdrawn and executed POWS later. * The allied airmen were captured by the Ninth Air Division in Palembang and sent to the Third Air Force. The Third Air Force junior staff officers who had executed the airmen committed suicide and the senior staff officer killed himself for leading the junior officers.

The Third Air Force was under the Southern Army and on equal terms with the Seventh Area Army which had no right of command over the Third Air Force other than in commanding field operations on the land.

While ITAGAKI was commander there was no case except this one where anyone was unlawfully executed in the Utoram Prison.

The witness had read Exhibit 1614-A. When he was in the liaison section in Singapore he was informed by counsel in the trial that inhabitants of Boatblare in the Andaman Islands had been forced by naval forces to evacuate to another island in August 1945 and that many had died. This took place in the naval area. Naval officers and men, including Vice Adm HARA were accused and executed at Singapore, as being responsible. The Andaman Island was a naval administrative area and the army did not participate in its administration.

ITAGAKI's only authority over naval forces was to command them in land battles. The defense of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands was the responsibility of the navy. But as the war situation became urgent on Feb 5 1945, the commander of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands was made responsible to the 29th Army commander so far as land defense was concerned.

To carry out a last attempt to supply the two islands and to withdraw a part of the garrison to strengthen Singapore defenses, the 15th Fleet at Singapore sent out a fleet headed by a cruiser but the cruiser was sunk and the objective never accomplished. After this sea communications were completely cut off.

It was also impossible to use airplanes and during 1945 no staff officer of the 7th Area Army or of the 29th Army was able to get to Andaman or Nicobar Islands. They did have wireless communications with them but because of the battery shortage could not use them as much as they would like and only urgent messages were sent.

He stated that until Feb. 5 1945 the navy was in charge.

He first heard about the unlawful execution of POWs at Outram Road Jail when he was chief of liaison in Singapore about May 1946, a year after it had taken place. * He had nothing to do with that camp during the war and at that time did not know what was happening there.

The witness was then asked on what he based the statement in his affidavit which said that while ITAGAKI was 7th Area Army Commander there was no case except the airforce one where any POW or others were unlawfully executed, in Utoram Prison. He replied that while he was in the liaison section he was in continuous contact with British authorities. On Colonel Wild's orders he conducted investigations and made reports. He never unearthed any instance other than the one mentioned in his affidavit.

* To the witness was quoted a part of Exhibit 1514-A which stated that between May and July of 1945 the affiant saw 17 allied airmen and 15 Chinese civilians taken out for execution. The burial party returned without the prisoners and looked dirty as if they had been digging. The affiant had talked with the airmen who had told him they had not been tried.

Mr. SASAGAWA

30250 About May 1945 bombings became so intense that sea communication between North Borneo and FIC, Malay etc. was cut off and that by air became difficult. The 37th Army Hdqrs moved from Jesselton to Sabon in early May. * The Keningo Air Field was used for planes acting as liaison between headquarters and the outside, but it took one day to reach the latter from headquarters and while telephone communication was had it was frequently broken.

Only radio could be used for communication with the Seventh Army but this frequently broke because of shortage of fuel and batteries. Communication schedule hours were greatly cut down, and was limited to important matters. But even this was often interrupted, growing worse toward the end of the war.

There was no cross examination of the witness.

30254 *The accused identified and verified Exhibit 3316 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that the accused was appointed staff officer of the Kwantung Army on 1 May 1929 and held it until 30 July 1932. The C-in-C of the Kwantung Army at the time of his appointment was Lt. Gen. HATA Eitaro. At the time of the Manchurian Incident the C-in-C of the Kwantung Army was Lt. Gen. HONJO, and the chief of staff was Maj. Gen. MIYAKE.

The duties of the accused were to receive orders from the Chief of Staff and to maintain contact between staff officers and manage the staff office and attend to liaison business. The duties and privileges of the C-in-C, Chief of Staff and Staff Officers were according to regulations of the Kwantung Army Headquarters. (Exhibit 1415).

30255 * Regarding the situation in Manchuria before the Manchurian Incident, since 1925 a movement for the recovery of alleged lost national rights had started in China and anti-Japanese actions increased. There were also violations of Japanese rights and interests in Manchuria. In June 1928 Chang Tsuo-lin was killed by a bomb and Chang Hsueh-liang succeeded him. In that year the Chang Hsueh-liang regime affiliated with the Nanking Government and let influence of the Chinese Nationalist Party penetrate into Manchuria.

The anti-Japanese movement there was organized under the Kuomintang direction and became active and intense. Japanese rights in Manchuria were infringed and Japanese nationals were squeezed in a strip along the South Manchurian railway. Extreme pressure against Korean immigrants, violence and oppressions of the Japanese and obstruction to communication etc. had intensified. In spite of Foreign Minister SHIDEMARA's sincerely cooperating policy no prospect for relaxation of anti-Japanese activities in China was in sight and the situation was aggravated.

30256 *Just before the Incident several hundred questions were pending. In the military field Chang Hsueh-liang after taking office as vice-commander of the Kuomintang Army in the fall of 1928 planned to strengthen his army increasing it to 200 odd thousand, enlarged the Mukden Arsenal, equipped the army with modern arms and strengthened discipline. As compared with the Kwantung Army at that time, his army was far superior in strength and equipment.

Since then anti-Japanese sentiments influenced Chinese troops and they assumed a contemptuous attitude toward the Japanese troops, boasting of their superiority and their greater experience in fighting.

* The disposition of Chinese troops was changed so as to encircle Japanese garrison areas along the South Manchurian RR and the dispersed Kwantung troops fell into a dangerous military situation. While no more than ten odd thousand inferiorly armed Kwantung troops were stationed dispersedly on a peace time footing in that area, nearly one thousand kilometers along the South Manchurian Railway they came to be under seige by the large and well-equipped Chinese troops and assumed a provocative attitude.

Under this situation the danger of collision between the armies gradually fermented. Its solution seemed difficult unless either would concede or compromise. The situation was a collision between conflicting demands, the recovery of China's alleged lost rights * and maintenance of Japanese rights and interests. But the Chinese had no intention to compromise. The situation was that anti-Japanism by force of arms would be inevitable. To avoid it there was no solution except to abandon the special rights and interests they had. But he would never would undertake this abandonment nor would public opinion permit it. Therefore the Kwantung Army tried to avoid friction and sought all means of appeasement and admonished its officers and men to be patient and cautious, prohibiting rash acts.

On the other hand they had to work out an emergency counter-measure in case of collision by positive Chinese military actions. The army desired to increase its strength, change the disposition of its troops and replete its equipment. But this was not approved by the central army authorities. Therefore the army mapped out a plan with the then existing strength and equipment and established an operations plan that in case of collision the main forces would be centered in the vicinity of Mukden and deliver a heavy blow to the nucleus of the Chinese troops in Mukden and thus settle the matter within a short period. They decided to make preparations in accordance with this plan and to make up for shortcomings in fighting power by utilizing the material for military operations which was in Manchuria. As a part of this plan they set up two heavy guns in the Mukden Independent garrison barracks which had become needless when Port Arthur fortifications were decreased. It was natural to make up their shortage of fighting power and it was not to stimulate the Chinese that they concealed the setting up of these guns.

C-in-C HONJO who arrived in August 1931 witnessed repeated occurrences of incidents due to the intensification of anti-Japanese feeling, especially such serious cases as the killing of Capt. NAKAMURA, the Wanpaoshan Incident, and disturbances against troops guarding railways and practicing maneuvers. He strictly warned against any rash act. He also instructed them to execute their duties positively once emergency arose.

The accused was accompanying HONJO on an informal inspection trip of his troops and finished the trips with the inspection of troops at Liaoyan September 18 1931. On that day HONJO was informed by Chief of Staff MIYAKE that Maj.Gen. TATERAWA, chief of the First Department of the General Staff was coming to Mukden. MIYAKE requested him to send either ISHIWARA or ITAGAKI to Mukden to meet TATERAWA.

*Assuming that the matter would be in connection with the terms of negotiation on the NAKAMURA case, HONJO ordered the accused to Mukden. Toward evening TATEKAWA arrived and ITAGAKI greeted and dined with him. TATEKAWA did not mention his business immediately except to say that the superiors were worrying about the unscrupulous conduct of the young officers. ITAGAKI told TATEKAWA he would hear him at leisure the next day because he seemed tired.

On the way to his billet after taking leave of TATEKAWA, ITAGAKI went to the Special Service Section of Mukden to get further information about the NAKAMURA case and chatted a while there with the staffs. * As ITAGAKI was about to return to his billet there was a telephone call from the garrison troops to the Special Service Section reporting a blasting of the railway line at Liuchiaokou. By several following telephone calls ITAGAKI understood that just after 10 PM Chinese troops blasted the S.M.R. at the western side of Peitaying, north of Mukden and Japanese patrols were fired on by the enemy in ambush.

The Hushihtai went to their rescue and battled the Chinese. The Hushihtai company was hard pressed by the enemy machine guns. From the railway guard's report it was clear the Incident was not a mere infringement upon the rights and interests in the shape of blasting the railway but a planned challenge of the Chinese Regular Army against the Japanese army and it was judged that the Seventh Brigade of Peitaying was in action against them.

30263 ITAGAKI felt the risk was so close that if they hesitated *the leased territories attached to the South Manch. RR. and the Japanese troops would be encircled and attacked, by the Chinese Army in Mukden.

30264 * At that moment SHIMAMOTO the Second Battalion Commander of the Independent Infantry Garrison and Col. HIRATA sent word to the C-in-C and others through the Mukden Special Service Section. SHIMAMOTO stated his troops would go to the rescue of the Hushihtai Company which was in desperate battle and the 29th Regimental Commander HIRATA declared he would cooperate with SHIMAMOTO by taking the Mukden Wall.

In the capacity of a staff officer ITAGAKI accepted their determination and took steps to report to the C-in-C. The reason ITAGAKI accepted was that the determination of the two commanders was absolutely necessary in line with the operations plan in case of emergency not only for self-defense of the Mukden troops but also for the benefit of the main forces.

30265 *He thought it necessary to give these commanders assurance since he was fully conversant with the C-in-C's intentions. When ITAGAKI reported to the C-in-C HONJO as the Army Hdqrs moved to Mukden Sept 19th he approved the steps as they coincided with his intentions.

On the night of Sept 18th they informed the Consulate General of Mukden of the outbreak and of the army actions and asked Consul MORISHIMA to come to the Special Service Office where they explained in detail the circumstances and asked his cooperation. ITAGAKI also talked about the matter with Consul Gen HAYASHI several times by telephone. HAYASHI said that since Japan and China had not yet formally entered upon war and as the Chinese through Consultant Chao Hsin-po had announced their adoption of non-resistance, he hoped the army would arrange the matter so it could be dealt with through diplomatic agents putting an end to military actions.

30266 *ITAGAKI then explained in detail and asked his reconsideration. The Incident was different from preceding ones because the regular Chinese Army had challenged the Japanese Army. Fighting was already under way and it was impossible for the present to separate the forces. Unless the present military actions would be settled it was practically impossible to rely on diplomatic negotiations. Though the Chinese were saying they were abiding by the principle of non-resistance, according to the report from the frontier they were attacking at Hushihtai causing dead and injured.

ITAGAKI could not imagine that Chao Hsin-po would be able to arrange a cease-fire agreement because he was a mere civil official with no influence in military affairs. It could not be known whether it might not prove to be the enemy's habitual trick to rearrange the situation by gaining time. ITAGAKI told HAYASHI they had to be careful and that the grave situation permitted no hesitation. He pointed out that the realization of *HAYASHI's contention was practically impossible.

The battle around Mukden ended Sept 19th. As Chinese administrative officials of the city had fled, the police, communications and banking services came to a standstill. The citizens closed their doors and the city became chaotic. Convicts ran rampant on the streets. They could not leave the situation that way in the interests of public safety. Because of these circumstances and to cope with the desire of the citizens HONJO, to maintain public safety promulgated immediately an emergency municipal administration and appointed DOHIIHARA as temporary Mayor.

The army had no intention of instituting a military administration and admitted no other soldiers except DOHIIHARA to take part in it and apart from a few Japanese advisers, the great part of the functionaries were Chinese. Its purpose was to maintain public peace as a temporary measure with the arrangement that whenever a qualified Chinese was * available the administration should be immediately transferred to him.

DOHIIHARA served as mayor only one month and on October 20th Chao Hsin-po became mayor and almost all of the advisors were removed. HONJO had been too cautious to disclose his political opinions during the Manchurian Incident. However, when the independence declaration of each Manchurian province as well as of influential persons therein created a general tendency for the establishment of a new state, HONJO at the end of October 1931 made an important statement. This was that in view of the fact that the Sino-Japanese conflict which had existed before the Incident lead to the present all out clash they must make certain that an incident of this nature would never recur. They must devise measures to settle the incident to the satisfaction of both countries.

* The first step would be to pay high regard to the expressed desire of the Manchurian people. The anti-Japanese movement had contributed to the development of bitter enmity. That feeling seemed to have been eliminated but they must completely wipe it from their minds by enhancing racial harmony.

So long as Japan maintained her special rights and interests in Manchuria it cannot help causing a sense of inequality and sense of oppression among the Manchurians no matter how legal those rights and interests might be. Therefore Japan should voluntarily give them up by renouncing extra-territoriality and return Port Arthur and Dairen to Manchuria...If by doing so relations between the two countries could attain such a standard where the interests of both became identical and where racial discrimination no longer exists.

* Since Japanese and Manchurian people constituted Manchuria based on equal footing, Japan should abandon their superior complex and the sense of special rights. They must realize they were on an equal footing with the Manchurians in the new state. Those who served the new country as government officials should determine to naturalize themselves to that country.

Maladministration of Chang Hsueh-liang caused hatred of Manchurian and Japanese government authorities and of the 30 million Manchurian people. His failure lay in his adoption of a sole party policy. Manchuria should be careful in the future to respect the peoples' will by rejecting the return of Chang Hsueh-liang and his party.

Restoration of imperial regime in Manchuria would be an anachronism and was apt to give birth to an evil cause depriving Manchuria forever of a possible opportunity to harmonize with China in the future. * Even if Pu-Yi were to become head of the new state in compliance with the request of the Manchurians there must be clear distinction between his assumption as head of the state and the restoration of imperial regime.

Independence was a result of a race freeing itself from the nation to which it belonged and this did not violate any treaty. Influential Manchurians should be fully responsible to the people. It was feared that independence might overshadow cooperation between China and Japan but it was possible for the new state to contribute to China-Japan collaboration and they hoped this would be the case. Everything depended upon good administration and the people's welfare. The government of the past administration by the former military clique should be improved. The heavy extortion of taxes should be abolished or alleviated. * Anti-Japanese laws should immediately be abolished. The Kwantung Army should be indifferent to Manchurian politics and should leave administrative matters to the independent and autonomous regime of the Manchurian people and should limit its action to assisting the Manchukians in law and order. National defense should be a joint problem of Japan and the new state and meantime the army should appoint itself to this task.

30273 It must gain the absolute confidence of the Manchurians. So far the Japanese government gave prohibitive instructions only and no definite indication as to future policy of the army had been shown by them. What they should do at this juncture was to make close observation upon the future relations between Manchuria and Japan so as to report the true aspect of the situation to the central government and should not * interfere with their political movement representing the unanimous desire of the Manchurian people. While they should not be reluctant in giving assistance they should never force themselves upon the Manchurians.

30274 * ITAGAKI had been taking every opportunity to talk with leading Chinese to ascertain their views so that he could report them to the military commander. He learned that among them was a strong feeling against Chang Hsueh-liang, a dislike of Kuomintang politics and an urgent desire for the independence of Manchuria. Lo Chen-yu of the Restoration Faction came from Lushun (Port Arthur) to call on ITAGAKI September 23rd in Mukden. He told ITAGAKI that the Restoration Faction wished to call Emperor Hsuan Tung to Manchuria. He then went to see Hsi Chia in Kirin, met Chang Hai-peng at Taonan and returned to Mukden September 26th. He told ITAGAKI that at Kirin Chang Hai-peng who was preparing for the independent movement was desirous of welcoming Emperor Hsuan Tung to Kirin and of the firm decision of Gen. Chang Hai-peng for independence and support of Emperor Hsuan Tung.

30275 *Yu Chung-han interviewed HONJO November 3rd and suggested the necessity of establishing a new state. A short time after the incident independence was declared in many provinces and districts. They got information that independent movements were growing among the principal political leaders since the general tendency in the Mukden, Kirin and Heilungkiang provinces had been settled by the entry of the Japanese Army into Tsitsihar in the middle of November, 1931.

30276 ITAGAKI interviewed, on HONJO's orders, between the latter part of November to mid December certain political leaders who supported independence * and heard their opinions. Without exception they were against the return of the Chang Hsueh-liang regime to Manchuria as they hated the politics of the Kuomintang and did not want the Nanking Government in Manchuria. Their common desire was the establishment of an independent state on the principle of border security and peace for the people. They told ITAGAKI that Japan's support was necessary for the construction of a new state. For the time being Japan must assume the defense and the new state required knowledge for which they would depend upon Japan's aid and both Japan and China should stand on equal footing.

ITAGAKI (DIRECT)

There were differences of opinion on the question of its polity and sovereignty. Well known personages of the Restoration Faction strongly advocated Pu Yi as the sovereign after making Manchuria independent rather than persistently sticking to a mere theory of restoration.

30277

* Representatives of the Mukden faction were strongly opposed to the mal administration of Chang Hsueh-liang and though they believed in border security and peace for the people, did not agree to the monarchical restoration but desired a republican regime. They would agree to install Pu Yi as president rather than to decide the ruler by election.

Ma Chan-shan was not the Governor of the Heilunghiang Province but was a man of real worth and possessed his own troops. It was said he would yield to the opinion of Chang Ching-Hui who had almost the same view as the Mukden faction, was against the restoration but in favor of a republic system. Wengelian princes were of the same opinion as the Kirin faction. Authoritative persons of the Mukden and Kirin factions were in a position to dominate the trend of affairs as to polity and sovereignty.

* It was clear that all political leaders unanimously agreed on an independent state. This was mainly due to the peculiar geographical and historical position of the East Four Provinces and to the fact that they had previously often declared themselves independent and that by the Japanese declaration of non-occupation of Manchuria the unsatisfied political leaders who were indignant with Chang Hsueh-liang over his maladministration came to the surface and moved by political aspiration desired to solidify their position and reject Chang's return to Manchuria.

ITAGAKI made a detailed report of these matters to HONJO. ITAGAKI having been called by telegram from the Central authorities left Mukden for Tokyo on January 4 1932. He reported to military headquarters the general tendency of Manchuria was toward an independent state. After having sounded prominent persons he could affirm they all advocated independence and the general public was against the return of Chang Hsueh-liang's regime and the advance of the Kuomintang Government to Manchuria.

He reported that the Kwantung Army was entirely absorbed in maintaining public peace and placed no limit on the political desires of the natives. If matters went as they were an independent state would be formed and Japan should be prepared to meet the situation.

HONJO was of the opinion there remained no way than to adopt the theory of an independent state. War Minister ARAKI told him that though the government policy was not yet decided, his principle was to observe the actual situation on the spot but he did not interfere as to the issue of independence.

During ITAGAKI's stay in Tokyo he explained the new conditions in Manchuria and the army authorities well understood. Returning to Mukden ITAGAKI submitted his report to HONJO and on HONJO's orders ITAGAKI interviewed Pu Yi in Port Arthur January 29 1932. An enthusiastic desire for an independent state had become extremely strong among the powerful as well as the general public of Manchuria at that time. The tendency to form a new state apart from the Restoration movement reached a high pitch with the probability of having Pu Yi the ex-emperor of Hsuan Tung as the sovereign of the new state. HONJO ordered him to meet officially with Pu Yi and ascertain his intention regarding this matter. He first gave Pu Yi general information and asked his opinion. Pu Yi was already aware of the trend for a new state.

Pu-Yi declared it was of great necessity to establish an independent State in Manchuria and have a good administration in close cooperation with Japan. He stated he had the intention to accept the sovereignty of the new State and insisted upon restoration.

His reasons were that the conditions afforded to the Ching family did not abolish the title of Emperor. He was still an Emperor and could not accept any post which did not carry that title. The cultural level of the Manchurian people being low, Imperial Rule was necessary. A general cabinet had to be established subordinate to a political organization directly under the Emperor who should decide himself all state affairs.

Itagaki wondered whether Pu-Yi's real intention was to decline to accept the sovereignty if the State was not formed according to the principle of Monarchical Restoration or whether he would accept the offer anyway. * Itagaki took leave of Pu-Yi and met Cheng Chui, the son of Cheng Hsiao-hsu, and asked him if Pu-Yi had any idea to refuse to become head of the new state. Cheng said that could not be so; but Pu-Yi understood the political situation and was ready to accept though he did not know the true meaning of Pu-Yi's talk to Itagaki. He thought it must have been a simple expression of his desire. Cheng was asked if Pu-Yi's attitude meant he would agree to become the head and if he could so report to HONJO. Cheng said yes, and Itagaki went to Mukden reporting to HONJO. The object of the interview with Pu-Yi was not to persuade him to head the new state, but merely to learn his intention. He had no notion to act so as to intimidate Pu-Yi or cause Cheng Chui to make Pu-Yi agree.

30283

* On 21 February, Lo Chenyu and son came to see Itagaki at Army Headquarters, saying they were sent by Pu-Yi. They said that he was still contending for the Imperial Rule. At that time the Northeast Administration Committee had already issued the Declaration of Independence on 18 February and decided on the 19th that they would establish a republican state and that Pu-Yi be requested to accept the administratorship.

30284

* They considered this move of Lo Chen-yu due to inadequate knowledge on Pu-Yi's part of the atmosphere of the Northeast Administration Committee. They saw the necessity of communicating to Pu-Yi the actual situation of the committee, and on HONJO's orders Itagaki went to Port Arthur, meeting Pu-Yi on the 22nd and conveying that information. Pu-Yi understood the circumstances and expressed his approval. In spite of his former views, he gladly accepted the decision of the Northeast Administration Committee and the decision in regard to the title of the state, national flag, etc. In the midst of the talk HONJO telephoned and Itagaki reported the interview.

* The Incident of 18 September was an accident and the Kwantung Army did not plan it. As to the establishment of Manchukuo and installation of Pu-Yi, they were carried out by the natural enthusiasm of the natives and there was no so-called puppet administrator created by the Japanese Government or Kwantung Army.

The allegation that the accused and a few other staff officers schemed and acted arbitrarily without following the desires of HONJO was a fabrication and no truth in it.

Regarding his second period of service in the Kwantung Army, the affidavit stated that Itagaki was attached to Army Headquarters as Chief of the Military Intelligence from 1 August 1932 to June 1933. In June he made a tour to Europe. He was Supreme Advisor of the Military Administration Department of Manchukuo from 1 August 1934 to 10 December 1934, and then became Vice Chief of Staff of the Kwantung Army * and Chief Staff Officer.

After the Tangku Truce, continuous efforts were made by Chinese and Japanese to alleviate tension. Communication was established between the two after September 1934. HIROTA spoke on the reproachment before the Diet in January, to which Chiang Kai-shek and Wang Ching-wei replied, and in June an Amity Law was promulgated.

In view of the Chinese Communist Army's northward expansion to intensify strain between the two nations, China issued an order in February 1935 to exterminate that army with Yu Hsun-Chung to head the expeditionary army. Nevertheless the Communist Army broke through the Nationalist Army and drew near the Mongolian Region.

* The USSR accused Japan of being imperialistic and aggressive. It was double tracking the Siberian Railway and fortifying bases in the Far East. The strength of the USSR was four times that of the Kwantung Army and was being still further increased. Armed communists and bandits in Manchuria were much curbed by Japanese and Manchurian forces but not entirely suppressed. Some notables of Japan and Manchuria began to advocate the abolition of extraterritoriality. If the principle of co-prosperity should succeed in forcing out communist plans, Japan, Manchuria and China could pursue the way of prosperity in peace. If Japan's advocacy should fail, the three would be thrown into war and the situation would be in favor of the communists. This prospect became more probable after the comintern meeting in July 1935 passed a resolution to concentrate on efforts to overthrow Japan and bring about world revolution.

30288

* The Chinese Communists issued a proclamation on the basis of this resolution and threatened to resort to an anti-Japanese united front. Army headquarters' opinion was that the basic policy was to strengthen Japan and Manchukuo by a co-prosperity society, financial construction, and securing national defense power. By diplomatic means, international friendship should be established.

30289

* While the accused was Chief of Staff, he cooperated with many persons in Manchukuo in this policy. In June 1936 the first abolishment of extraterritoriality came. Since the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident, he had favored this and had tried to aid in facilitating its materialization. In accordance with the Commander's orders, he assisted in the personal affairs of Japanese officials in Manchukuo's service but had nothing to do with internal personal administration and the personal affairs of Manchukuo officials. Page did not coerce Manchukuo in selecting or dismissing officials. The basic duty of the Army was to implement defense against the USSR. This principle was established at the time of NISHIO, whom he succeeded as Chief of Staff. * The program of the Army was based upon General Staff instructions and was of purely defensive nature against the USSR. They never made any aggressive war plan.

There were many Mongolians in Manchuria and the trends in outer and inner Mongolia had sharp repercussion on them and became a problem. Accordingly, the Army and Manchukuo had a special interest in outer and inner Mongolia. Inner Mongolia was assigned to the Army for collecting information concerning the USSR and Mongolia and the Army sent intelligence agents and collected information near the frontier.

30291 * The northward expansion of the Chinese communist army, the foundation of Manchukuo and other factors gave rise to Inner Mongolia's voluntary movement for local self-government. Japan and Manchukuo hoped for its healthy growth for defense against the USSR and the spread of Bolshevism but the Army did not seek to induce or suppress the movement as far as Itagaki knew.

The Army was interested in the North China problem to secure peace in the rear but this interest was concentrated on defense of northern and internal fortifications of Manchukuo toward December 1945. The Kwantung Army did not send troops to North China.

He learned about it from the newspapers and did not think it was serious or dream it would develop into the China Incident. He expected it would settle on the spot. However, negotiations on the the spot, based on the Japanese policy of localization, were ineffectual and because of the defiant attitude of the Chinese, the situation was not reassuring.

On 27 July an emergency mobilization order was issued to the 5th Division, and this was completed on 2 August with the first and second contingents leaving harbor by 7 August. * They reached Peiping and took part in battles in North China. At the end of May 1938, ITAGAKI left command of the 5th Army and returned to Tokyo. In December 1937 the main force of the 5th Division was concentrating in the direction of Paoting from Shansi. When he was in Paoting on 17 December he heard of the Japanese entry into Nanking but he had no responsibility or knowledge of the Nanking Incident. As Division Commander he only did his duty in accordance with the order of his superior and he paid special attention to military discipline, warning against misbehavior. Wrong doing was punished according to military law and in addition, the wrong doer's commander was punished.

* At the end of April or early May 1938, when he was in Shantung Province as Division Commander, FURUNO, Inosuke visited him as Premier KONOYE's representative. KONOYE's desire was that despite the cabinet policy of localization, the Page war was extended from north to central China. It was necessary to have a War Minister who would be able to change the China policy to one of peace. KONOYE thought ITAGAKI the best man and wished to know whether he would accept. He knew that KONOYE's intention coincided with his own, namely, the withdrawal of the entire Japanese forces * and peaceful settlement of the conflict. At the end of May, ANAMI, Chief of the Personal Affairs Bureau, visited him, carrying the official order for his appointment as War Minister, which had been recommended by the big three of the Army. ITAGAKI decided to accept and took office on 3 June.

As War Minister his fundamental attitude was that Japan and China should join hands. However, Japanese efforts toward local settlement were in vain and the conflict gradually developed to a large scale war. While Japan was thus reluctantly forced into such a situation * the Soviet increased her strength. Her armaments in the Far East were overwhelmingly superior, threatening the Japanese rear. The Anglo-American powers increasingly assumed an attitude of aiding Chiang and interrupting military movements.

They were especially concerned about U.S. pressure on Japan. If things went on, Japan should be doomed to stand alone against encirclement by Britain, U.S., the Soviet and China. Therefore, she must immediately make peace with China. He believed the two must end all past conflict and rebuild mutual diplomacy on a broad point of view.

* As for the policy for the fighting forces it was to establish discipline and to maintain fighting power against the Soviet Menace. As the policy of the state, it was to alter peace terms with China and accomplish a peaceful settlement. There should be an innovation in the management of government, recognizing the situation was grave, to reinforce defense against the Soviet and supreme fighting materials to attempt transfer of military strength and adjustment of the front line stabilizing the situation in the occupied area and to try to bring about peace with Chiang Kaishek. They should keep watch of the Soviet's debouchment and maintain peace with her. They should try to get Britain and France to stop their aid to Chiang. They should ask Germany

Page and Italy to cooperate in the settlement of the war and they should maintain friendship with the U.S. as a means to bring about an end to the conflict.

30300 * ITAGAKI took office as War Minister immediately after the Hsueh Battle. At that time it was believed that the Hankow Operation would be unavoidable. In June 1938 the circumstances were that the peace terms to be offered China should not be so exacting as the ones proposed when Trautman was go-between. Unless the terms were modified, Chinese acceptance appeared unlikely, but both public opinion and the government policy had been far from further reducing the terms.

30301 To conclude peace it had to be made possible to deal with Chiang Kai-shek. Confronted with the KONOYE declaration of 16 January 1938, which included the statement that Japan would not deal with the * Kuomintang Government, things were not likely to develop a tendency favorable to a further re-examination of this declaration.

UGAKI, who succeeded HIROTA as Foreign Minister on 26 May, was one of the important keys for the reorganization of the KONOYE Cabinet. However, no progress had been made on UGAKI's policy when ITAGAKI became War Minister.

China asked the League for help and it resolved to do so.

30302 The Japanese Supreme Command had counted on the Hsueh Battle being decisive for ending the war, but due to great differences in strength and the extent of the fighting area, the strategic object could not be achieved. The Chinese concentrated great strength before Hankow * and prepared for counter-attacks, exposing the Japanese forces to extreme danger. The Supreme Command considered the only thing to do was to deliver another counter-attack and prepare for the Hankow Operation.

They could discern important defects in defense preparations against the Soviet. ITAGAKI was aware of the extreme difficulties of the talk of leading the situation to peace. They had to aim Page at the end of the Hankow Operation, and on the other hand devise measures for a peace settlement.

30303 They were required to replace the fighting materials * and not neglect national power for defense against the Soviet.

30304 The reinforcement of the various emergency policies necessary for national mobilization (Exh. 857) and revision of the plan of demand and supply of important materials (Exh. 857) were made to remedy defects of defensive strength and not for preparing for aggressive war, although the Hankow Operation was planned and executed to cover the High Command's weak points and making a turning point for termination of hostilities and peaceful settlement. Its object could not be attained even after the fall of Hankow on 27 October 1937. As War Minister in the KONOYE Cabinet, ITAGAKI was confronted with the problem of keeping Soviet relations tranquil. * Japan was quite astonished therefore when the Chang Ku-feng Incident broke out in July-August 1938. In dealing with the Incident, ITAGAKI hoped for a diplomatic settlement and tried to achieve immediate local settlement with accord of views between the War Ministry and General Staff.

The Army, in spite of disadvantages, stuck to the principle of localization and was barely able to end the Incident before it became too serious. It brought greater attention to the menace in the north and realized Soviet superiority. Thus, it resulted in Japan's preparedness.

30305 After the outbreak of the China Incident, Japan refrained from establishing military government * and left civil administration to the Chinese. Not a few such accomplishments were due to the management by Japanese in the Department of Special Affairs, placing a considerable load on the Army. The China Affairs Board was proposed by the Army and adopted by the Cabinet to relieve the Army of these tasks. The board was established on 18 December 1938 with the Premier as President and the Minister of Navy, War and Foreign Affairs as Vice Presidents. About mid-March the liaison offices on the spot started

Page their work in cooperation with the Chinese administration to promote political, economic and cultural measures. Army intervention was held to the minimum. It was sine qua non for the realization of peace to amend the peace proposals and convert Japan to a policy of dealing with Chiang Kai-shek. ITAGAKI attached prime significance * to re-examining the national policy regarding adjustment of relations with China, making Japan's intentions understandable, demonstrating to the world that it embodied the national policy.

In the KONOYE statement of 3 November 1938 (Exhibit 268) Japan hoped to establish relations of mutual aid, ranging over all fields to realize these policies. The policy of adjusting new relations between Japan and China (Exhibit 269) was decided on the 30th. As a detailed explanation, the KONOYE statement (Exhibits 268 and 2535) was issued on 22 December 1938, declaring that what Japan wanted of China was not territory nor reimbursement of war expenses. Japan was willing to respect China's sovereignty and withdraw extraterritoriality. He * did his utmost as War Minister to promote that policy but China's reaction, especially Chiang's, was very weak and it was not a suitable time for peace negotiations. Before that, it had been deemed advisable to join hands with important Chinese believed to possess an ardor for peace. In July 1938, KONOYE instructed BANZAI to make liaison with Tang Shao-i and Wu Pei-fu to ask for their cooperation. The Army sent DOHIHARA and the navy, TSUDA, to cooperate, but the plan failed due to Tang Shao-i's assassination.

The problem of coalition of Japan, Germany and Italy was already under study before the accused became War Minister. * Ribbentrop's proposal arrived in early August 1938 and they sent a formal answer after consulting the Five-Ministers Conference and waited for Germany's formal proposal. The initial proposal arrived in November. ITAGAKI wanted to use it to obtain peace with China immediately after the Hangkiao Operation and proposed this before the Five-Ministers Conference on 11 November, but the proposal met with difficulty and they were unable to conclude negotiations with Germany to accomplish peace with China.

Japan's withdrawal from the League, which was decided through consultation on 2 November 1938 (Exhibit 271) was carried out because she could not continue to cooperate with the League and maintain national integrity. The accused made no statements in the conference deciding on this.

The agreement with Germany on cultural co-operation, which was discussed in the Board of Council Conference on 22 November 1938 (Exhibit 589, page 309) was not an intention to conclude this sort of treaty with Germany alone but with other nations as circumstances dictated, and contributed to general purposes of diplomacy, and had no political meaning.

30310

The policy of adjusting new relations with China was discussed at the Five-Ministers Conference on 25 November 1938 and decided by the Imperial Council on the 30th. The Navy proposal to secure Hainan Island was approved by the same conference as a temporary measure to make the blockade more effective and it was hoped it would hasten solution of the Incident. Japan should pay careful attention regarding the observance of laws of war, respect and protect third power interests and remove temporary obstacles and restore former conditions after the war. Japan would stand by the principle of equal opportunity. This was often declared by Japan in answer to third power complaints * and she tried faithfully to carry it out. However, the third powers pressed for strict observance of treaties which did not conform to the current situation, utilizing it as an excuse to assist Chiang and the tendency of the powers against Japan and to aid Chiang became more pronounced. Thus the KONOYE Cabinet, unable to accomplish peace, was forced to resign.

When the HIRANUMA Cabinet succeeded the KONOYE Cabinet, ITAGAKI remained as War Minister upon HIRANUMA's request. His fundamental attitude as War Minister remained the same. It became almost impossible to bring about a speedy peace and there was nothing left to do but to take measures to gradually break down the Chinese anti-Japanese attitude. This meant the demonstration on one hand of the determination not to shun even a long war,* and on Page the other, to lay great importance on urging their policy by measures other than military. Although this doctrine had been carried out in the KONOYE Cabinet, it was intensified during the HIRANUMA Cabinet. Principal matters dealt with while he was War Minister in the HIRANUMA Cabinet included the bill "General Principles of the Replenishment of the Productive Faculties" (Exhibit 842) drafted by the Planning Board and approved by the Cabinet January 1939. It had been previously studied at the War Ministry on the basis of a Five-Year Industrial Plan proposed by the General Staff about April 1937. Its real purpose was to establish Japan's economy, secure defense against the Soviet, and the safety of Manchukuo so that the Five-Year Plan for developing Manchurian industries projected by Manchukuo could be realized. * The plan was changed to a 4-Year Plan and its scope diminished. Their plans were such that they could not keep pace with the new situation.

As to the participation of Manchukuo and Hungary in the anti-Comintern Pact discussed by the Privy Council on 22 February (Exhibit 491), in view of the pact's aim, an increase of participating powers was always welcome and Japan merely intended to strengthen the pact.

Negotiation was also under way with Germany about the method of strengthening the pact to meet the attitude of the Comintern and the Soviet. The accused attended this Privy Council session but made no statement.

* Concerning the newspaper story of 17 March (Exhibit 2200) purporting to report a Diet speech of ITAGAKI, he never made such a speech.

Concerning the question of closing the British Settlement at Tientsin, HIRANUMA informed him in June that the British had proposed a question be carried to diplomatic negotiations at Tokyo, but as the army's idea must be predominant, HIRANUMA wished to know its intention before consulting Foreign Office authorities. ITAGAKI then summoned army representatives for a talk so that differences between authorities at the center and at the spot could be eliminated. On the problem of general principles, they succeeded in the issue of the Anglo-Japanese Joint Declaration on July 24.

In view of the success of the Anglo-Japanese talk, ITAGAKI believed * they could find a solution of the problems vis-a-vis the British in regard to relations with the U.S. He believed they might improve them when the loan negotiations with the U.S. then pending should succeed.

As he felt a good opportunity for peace was approaching, he asked Wang Ching-wei to accelerate the peace movement.

* As to the Nomonhan Affair, after deliberation with the Supreme Command, and with the consent of the Cabinet, he tried to bring about a speedy settlement approving the Kwantung Army's policy to settle the matter locally and defensively. He thought the negotiations with Germany and Italy were the best way to relieve the Japanese from death by suffocation, to save continental China, elevate Japan's international position, cause the Chinese Government to give up tolerance of communism, resistance to Japan, give the Powers opportunities to turn China to the cause of anti-communism, co-prosperity and co-existence, and strengthen her defense against the Russian menace.

At the Five-Ministers Conference of the HIRANUMA Cabinet, the Foreign Office's counter-proposal against the German proposition was discussed. After revision it was made the instruction and it was decided to send to Europe special envoys from the Army, Navy and Foreign Office. The instructions which the envoys took were that the main objective was Russia, but Britain and France might sometimes come within the objective. Military assistance would be given if the matter concerned Russia, but would depend upon the situation in the case of Britain and France. If those two were Bolshevized, military assistance and its extent would subjectively be decided. Another mission of the envoys was to explain it as an extension of the anti-communistic agreement. However, the Germans requested relaxation of the limitation on military assistance against third powers except Russia. HIRANUMA sent a message to Hitler around 5 May, telling him that Japan's position was such that Page she could not relax the limitation and asked Germany to concede that point. Just at that time complications set in. Wang Ching-wei visited Tokyo on 1 June and the problem of the blockade of the British Settlement in Tientsin occurred on the 14th, * followed by the attack of Nomonhan on 15 June by Russian and Mongolian troops. In view that there was no alternative but to require Germany to concede, ITAGAKI sent MACHIJIRI, Chief of the War Service Bureau, on 11 August to request German Attache OTT to make a concession on Germany's part. The conclusion of the non-invasion treaty between Germany and the Soviet on 22 August ended the matter of the proposed pact. On the 23rd, HIRANUMA indicated his intention to resign, with which ITAGAKI agreed. After presenting the resignations to the Throne, he conferred with the three army heads and recommended TADA, who advocated peace, to become War Minister.

30318 After his resignation, ITAGAKI was appointed a member of the General Staff. * During the time he was War Minister, the accused sincerely desired the restoration of peace with China and evacuation of Japanese forces from Chinese territory. He took every possible measure to attain this but it was regrettable that he was obliged to resign with the Incident unsettled.

On 12 September 193, when Headquarters of the China Expeditionary Army was organized, he was unexpectedly appointed Chief of Staff under NISHIO and left for Nanking where he remained until 7 July 1941. Here he tried to bring about a speedy settlement. As to military operations, they were small ones to strengthen the blockade of the supply route. They tried to secure the occupied areas, maintain public order and stabilize the living of the people.

* The collaboration with Wang Ching-wei's government was chiefly in charge of Ambassador ABE with the assistance of the Expeditionary Army to the extent it did not interfere with military operations. In particular it supported Wang Ching-wei's National Salvation Peace Movement and wished the Nanking Government to aim ultimately at joining with the Chungking Government.

Since the possibility of negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek through the offices of Sun Tzu-chieh was found by the Hongkong Organ early in 1940, ITAGAKI supported it enthusiastically and was ready to meet Chiang in Changsha. In anticipation of its success, he requested the delay of the establishment of Wang's Government but despite their wishes the negotiation failed.

In 1941 Chang Yen-hsiang told ITAGAKI of the desire of Doctor Steward, President of the Yenshing University, to talk with him. ITAGAKI thought this desirable and sent a staff member to Steward, who agreed to convey their wishes * to the President of the US that she would act as mediator to solve the Incident. The accused advised the central authorities to that effect but later, American-Japanese negotiations became aggravated and they could obtain no result.

The South China Expeditionary Army in Canton was released from command of the China Expeditionary Army on 5 July 1940, and placed under Imperial Headquarters. At the end of September a detachment of the South China Army was ordered to proceed to North Indo-China. Neither the accused nor the Expeditionary Army requested or advised this and had no control or responsibility concerning it.

ITAGAKI commanded the Korean Army from July 1941 to April 1945. * As the Army had been organized on a peace-time footing up to February 1945, he had no concern in the promotion of the Pacific War and had no operational duties concerning it until the Korean Army was reorganized on a war-time footing as the 17th Area Army and detailed to protect Korea on 1 January 1945.

Regarding the telegram of 20 February 1942 from the Chief of Staff of the Korean Army to the War Vice Minister, requesting the sending of POWs to Korea, and the telegram of 23 March 1942 from the Army Commander to the War Minister reporting on the plan of accommodating POWs, they were sent at the request of the Director of the POW Information Bureau, according to the report of TAKAHASHI, Chief of Staff of the Korean Army. The accused had been

He made it a rule to treat the POWs fairly and give them as many facilities and provisions as possible. He never saw the two despatches, did not know of their being sent and did not want them sent.

30322 * He was appointed Commander of the 7th Area Army in Singapore. He took command from 22 April 1945. Its duty was to defend its area, but before they could open hostilities, the war ended. Such conditions existed that communications with various quarters were destroyed by the enemy.

The accused stated that he never became a Supreme War Councillor throughout his career.

30323 * He stated that he had no connection with the March and October Incidents. He had no connection with the Sakura-Kai, nor did he even know about its existence. He knew OKAWA * but had no occasion to meet him during a period five or six years prior to the Incident on 18 September, nor had he ever conducted correspondence with him.

He knew General TANAKA, but did not meet with him nor have any conversation with him regarding the Manchurian Incident.

He knew Port Arthur well, but he did not meet nor talk with TANAKA there about June 1931.

30325 * Reference was made to the testimony of TANAKA (page 1985) where he said that he conversed with ITAGAKI, in which ITAGAKI said that the situation between China and Japan in Manchuria was extremely aggravated. However, after Chang's death it became even more so. The pending questions in Manchuria were so serious they could not be settled diplomatically and there was no alternative but the use of armed force to drive out Chang Hsueh-liang and afterward establish in Manchuria Chinese-Japanese cooperation to create a model state. When asked if he made any such statement to TANAKA or anyone else, the accused stated * 30326 that he was not in Port Arthur, but on a trip in Tsingtao, Peiping and Tientsin during June.

The NAKAMURA Incident shocked the Army, but even in this case settlement was through diplomacy. This should be proof that he could not make such a statement a year and three months before.

30327 * The witness stated he had no conversation with TANAKA at Port Arthur or any other place in June 1930 or June 1931 or any other time.

30328 * DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. KATO
COUNSEL FOR DOHIHARA

The accused stated that at the end of October 1931, DOHIHARA, under C-in-C HONJO, went to meet PU-YI at Tientsin, at which time ITAGAKI was a senior staff officer of the Kwantung Army.

Reference was made to Exhibit 300, which alleged that DOHIHARA at that time spent 50,000 yuan to bribe the Chinese Peace Preservation Corps and plain-clothes men and handed over to plain-clothes men arms sent by the Kwantung Army. The accused was asked if the Army ever sent money or arms to DOHIHARA for such purpose, and he replied that so far as his knowledge was they sent absolutely none.

30329 * When he was War Minister in the KONOYE Cabinet, a general peace with China was planned through Tang Shao-i and Wu Pei-fu. In November 1938 the peace effort came to a dead stop because of the assassination of Tang Shao-i.

30330 * He knew that after that Incident, DOHIHARA tried to further the peace movement until March 1939 and it was his understanding that DOHIHARA did not succeed and then returned to Tokyo. In March 1939 DOIHARA became C-in-C of the 5th Army in Manchuria.

The accused recalled calling on KIDO, the Page Minister of Welfare, in the KONOYE Cabinet on 18 June 1938, in which the general subject of conversation was how to settle the China Incident speedily. KIDO explained that the recent reorganization of the KONOYE Cabinet was to bring about a prompt settlement. KIDO's personal opinion was that it must be settled speedily and the accused agreed with him.

30332 * ITAGAKI was present at the Cabinet meeting on 2 August 1938 when the policy with regard to the Changkufeng Incident was discussed. KIDO was present at this meeting. On the previous day USSR aircraft had attacked Korean territory simultaneously with attacks from the ground causing serious doubts as to Russia's intentions. At the meeting it was decided to localize the Incident and effect speedy settlement. The policy was to transfer the matter to diplomatic negotiations and the Army's attitude was to effect a local settlement even though Japan might have to withdraw from the line the USSR claimed to be the frontier. KIDO agreed with the Cabinet decision.

30333 * DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. WARREN
COUNSEL FOR HIRANUMA

The accused stated that HIRANUMA asked him to remain in his Cabinet as War Minister. On 5 January the accused received a message from HIRANUMA asking him to go to cabinet formation headquarters. There HIRANUMA told him that the principal task of his cabinet would be a speedy settlement of the China Incident.

30334 * This plan was also the policy of the previous cabinet and therefore the new cabinet was merely continuing this. HIRANUMA said that since the accused was being asked to remain as War Minister, the retention of his office was important.

30335 The accused understood the intentions of HIRANUMA, told him he would have to discuss the matter with the three army chiefs. In this connection, he said there was one point of doubt * and he asked HIRANUMA if he had heard from KONOYE anything with regard to strengthening the Tripartite Anti-Comintern Pact. HIRANUMA replied that he had heard nothing of

At the three chiefs' conference it was concluded that HIRANUMA's intentions were clear and the accused was induced to accept the post as War Minister. Following the decision, the accused had HIRANUMA notified of his acceptance.

* When asked if it could be assumed from his answer that he did not name any conditions to HIRANUMA that must be promised before acceptance, the accused stated that what he had narrated constituted everything. He did not know anything about the witness YAMAWAKI's testimony that as Vice War Minister he handed to the headquarters for formation of the Cabinet a paper as to which the prosecution asked him if it did not contain seven conditions of acceptance.

30338 * The accused stated that the statement made by HONJO in October 1931 was not in writing. The accused 30339 memorized every word of it. * It was given by way of explanation from HONJO many times. It appeared HONJO had a memo. but he didn't know of that.

Regarding the operational plan of the Kwantung Army before the outbreak of the Mukden Incident, the operational plan was drawn up by officers in charge of operations, in accordance with orders from superiors in the General Headquarters. The accused had no direct connection with drawing up the plan.

30340 * It is a customary practice in all nations for operational plans to be drafted in accordance with General Staff Headquarters instructions. The Kwantung Army re-requested of the central authorities an increase in troop strength, the granting of newer and more modern weapons, 30341 or to change the disposition of the forces to meet actual conditions. * In spite of the army's desire, central authorities did not take the request up, so the Kwantung Army had no alternative but to draw up a plan in accordance with the troops, equipment, and material that it had available.

30342 * The plan was reported and approved by central authorities in Tokyo. The accused did not know of the Fokusui-Kai. He stated he could not answer whether consular authorities in Mukden ever took steps to check his activities in association with members of the Kokusui-Kai Society, because he had never heard of the Kokusui Society.

30343 * The telegram from Foreign Minister SHIDENARA to Consul-General HAYASHI dated 5 September, 1931, was quoted to the witness. This said that they had heard that ITAGAKI and others of the Kwantung Army were exerting themselves in various activities with ample funds, and were manipulating Japanese adventurers in China and members of the Kokusui-Kai. In view of the tardy progress of the negotiations regarding the NAKAMURA Incident, especially, they have decided on a concrete move the middle of the month. HAYASHI was to take steps for controlling the activities of the Ronin. After hearing this, the accused said the contents of the telegram were groundless, but in connection with the subject matter, he did have some knowledge.

- 30344 He thought it was after the Manchurian Incident that the Kwantung Army Chief of Staff, MIYAKE, placed a * telegram before him and told him to read it. MIYAKE felt that it was ridiculous to explain, but he could not quite withhold his indignation and went to HAYASHI and cast various sarcastic jokes about it. There were absolutely no facts to prove there were ample funds, or anything which would show any connection of himself with the Kokusui-Kai. He stated he had always been a poor man.
- 30345 * He did not particularly notice the Kokusui Society when he read the telegram, but did recall charges that many adventurers were being used.
- 30347 * The accused stated he had read the contents of a telegram handed him, and when asked if it had the same contents as the one shown him by MIYAKE, he stated this was different. Chief of Staff MIYAKE talked with Consul-General HAYASHI about it, and the talk ended more or less in a joke, but MIYAKE asked HAYASHI if he might not be shown the original and make a copy, consisting of two or three pages. He had these pages when he talked to the accused, and told the accused it contained such and such and asked him if he might not look at it. He did so, but could not recall whether the contents were the same as in the document shown him just now.
- 30348 * He had no recollection as to the form of the document, or whether the contents mentioned the name Kokusui-Kai. He did recall such words as "adventurer" or "ronin". It was not true that the carrying out of his
- 30349 plan involved actions of the garrison at Fushun. * He heard afterwards of the emergency defense meeting on 14 September at Fushun in anticipation of something to happen. He heard this after the outbreak of the Incident.
- 30350 He had no exact recollection, but thought Gen. TATEKAWA arrived in Mukden late in the afternoon. He thought that he himself arrived at Mukden from Liaoyang about two or three in the afternoon, and between his arrival and TATEKAWA's arrival he was in a Japanese inn. * When he met TATEKAWA at the inn, he was attired in a Japanese cotton lounging kimono supplied by the inn to relax in. Until this interview, he did not know that he had an important mission with TATEKAWA. He spent about two hours with TATEKAWA. * It was perhaps true that it was customary for a special emissary like TATEKAWA to deliver his message without delay. Asked if TATEKAWA apparently did not do so, the accused stated that he did not learn anything in regard to TATEKAWA's mission in addition to what he had already stated in his affidavit.

When asked why he made an effort to tell TATEKAWA there was no need for worry, the accused stated he replied to a question of TATEKAWA in accordance with his belief. That night TATEKAWA stayed in the same inn. Regarding why he called at the Special Service Organ if he told TATEKAWA there was no need to worry, he stated that he did so because it was too early to retire.

* Because there was no new information which had come in to the Special Service Organ, he had an informal chat with staff members. It was when he was on the point of leaving for his billet that an urgent message came in reporting the outbreak of an incident. This prevented him from returning to the billet. He thought the chat at the Special Service Organ lasted about an hour and a half.

* It was customary that any communication with army headquarters had to be requested through the Special Service Organ. The Organ had a telegraph code form which everyone did not have. If there was any need to send a coded telegram, it was necessary to call up the Organ.

When asked if the Organ had any activities besides collecting information and issuing press releases, the accused stated he thought its functions had already been fully explained. Whenever any negotiations relating to military matters had to be conducted, the important ones were relayed to the Consulate-General, and the less important were dealt with by the Organ with the Staff Office of the Chinese in Mukden.

* After SHIMAMOTO and HIRATA told him they were ready to fight, he immediately approved that plan. He tried to ascertain the situation as much as possible, and * heard every telephone call that came in from the front at the Special Service Organ. He made every effort to obtain data upon which to make a sound judgement. The Incident was unexpected, and the messages from the front were fragmentary and at times inconsistent. Though they tried hard to ascertain the true nature of the situation, it was difficult because the signal corps was constantly moving and it took time to establish contact with them.

30356

It was not he who recommended DOIHARA to be mayor, but the appointment was by General HONJO. When asked if he recalled that MORISHIMA advised against setting up the municipal administration, he stated that it was the Chief of Staff who called MORISHIMA, and he was just present at the meeting, * and Consul MORISHIMA did not present to him anything that would require his acceptance.

MORISHIMA asked the Chief of Staff whether a military administration was going to be established. The Chief replied that no military administration was contemplated. Other than this, the accused had no recollection as to what transpired.

Asked if HAYASHI called on HONJO to point out that it was a mistake to set up a municipal administration, the accused stated that he had not directly heard anything from HONJO, but what he had heard from the Chief of Staff was similar to what was said at the conversation between the Chief and MORISHIMA. * His recollection was that HONJO told the Consul-General that no military administration was being established.

30359

It was not true that HONJO told him that on the whole he agreed with him, but since the order had been issued he had no way to alter it. He didn't know who was Chief of the General Affairs Section. A person by the name of IORIYA was president of the Japanese Residents' Association, * but he didn't recall whether he had taken such an office. He did remember that several Japanese worked in the municipal administration, but could not recall whether any was a chief of any section or department.

30360

When asked why he could be so certain that the Japanese served only as advisors, he stated that responsible Chinese were not around. If they had been, there would have been no need for Japanese helping set up the administration.

30361

* When asked if certain named Japanese did not consist of key personnel of the administration, he stated that there were no responsible Chinese to undertake municipal administration, and there was no alternative but for the Japanese to take it over for the time being. * He didn't know exactly who was chief of certain sections.

* If he had replied previously that he was familiar with the personnel who were chiefs of sections, it must be some misunderstanding. He did know the name IORIYA very well, and the other names mentioned to him were Japanese.

He did not know that to raise funds, the municipal administration under DOIHARA had planned an opium monopoly and the issuance of lottery tickets. He did not remember if the Kwantung Army Headquarters had no objection but instructed the municipal administration to make clear stipulations to get Headquarters approval for this before the plans were put in operation.

* To the accused was read a telegram from Consul-General HAYASHI in Mukden to Foreign Minister SHIDEHARA dated 13 October, 1931. which stated that according to reliable sources, the municipal administration office planned a monopolization of opium and the issue of lottery tickets to raise their funds, and asked Army Headquarters for approval. They were also informed that though Army Headquarters had no objections, they instructed the office to state the stipulations and get Headquarters approval before the plans were put in operation and to report these to the Consulate and the police station. Not only are opium monopolization and the issuing of lottery tickets unfavorable for international relations, but a materialization of a part of army plans marked Secret 781 of 2 October. HAYASHI was asked to call on the top military to check the movement and in consideration of the delicate situation preserve absolute secrecy from the army as to receipt * of the telegram and the contents of the official letter mentioned.

The accused stated that he had never been approached on this subject, and he did not know if the army had been. Asked if DOIHARA was guiding the local Peace Preservation Committee in Mukden, he stated that the mayor handled only city affairs. It was true that DOIHARA was chief of the Organ up to the outbreak of the Incident, as there were no Army Headquarters there. This is why the organ was necessary. * As soon as Headquarters moved to Mukden, there was no need for the Organ and it went out of existence. Therefore, DOIHARA was no longer Chief of the Organ, but exclusively the mayor. There was automatic abolition of the Organ when he became mayor.

30365

When reminded that MINAMI had testified that the abolition of the Special Service Organ did not take effect until 1935, the accused stated that that was different. While Kwantung Headquarters was in Mukden, the Organ was abolished. After the establishment of Manchukuo, Headquarters moved to Changchun or Hsinking, and there was a short period when there was neither a Headquarters nor an Organ in Mukden. A necessity for the Organ arose, and it was revived in October or November 1932. Therefore, during MINAMI's tenure * there was a Mukden Organ.

The accused stated he did not know if DOIHARA prohibited setting up another political regime with the Four Peoples' Preservation Committee as the basis, headed by Kan Chao Hsi.

* He did not know if the local Peace Preservation Committee issued a declaration on 5 November, 1931, in which Kwantung Headquarters ordered the insertion of words that relations should be severed with Chiang Hsueh-liang's former regime and the National Government of China. He didn't recall that because of the Army's insistence on these words, influential persons like Yuan Ching-Kai and Yu Chung Han were placed in a dilemma. He thought Yuan was associated with the Peace Preservation Committee, while Yu Chung-Han was with the Self-Government Guiding Board.

It was not true that on 28 October, the Army called together garrison commanders and provost marshalls to support the policy. * He did not know if at that time Chief of Staff MIYAKE instructed that the enforcement of local autonomy and guidance by Japanese should never be revealed outwardly. Before and after the outbreak of the Mukden Incident, Tsang Shi-i was confined at home because of illness. It was not true that he was arrested and imprisoned and killed 15 December for refusing to help in establishing an independent government.

30369

* Asked if Yuan Chin-Kai was next approached, the accused stated that from the outset of the establishment of the Peace Preservation Committee, its president was Yuan Chin-kai. It was not true that about mid-November, 1931, Yuan was under strict watch by the Army because he was complaining to foreigners.

Chang Hai-peng was firm in his decision to support Pu-Yi. He learned that from Lo Chen-Yu. It was not true that he received Japanese aid in the form of money and rifles.

Asked * if he knew that the Consul-General in Mukden was told by Shih that Chang Hai-peng would enter Tsitsihar and declare Heilungkiang independent on condition of receiving Japanese aid, the accused stated he had no knowledge as to who told this to Chang.

30371

* There was no case in which the Japanese participated in discussions about what form of government the new state was going to take. Reference was made to exhibit 3296-A, which described a meeting in Mukden on 11 January, 1932, attended by both Japanese and Chinese notables, which discussed the form of government to be established in Manchuria. The accused stated that this was a meeting sponsored by a Japanese newspaper. It was purely unofficial and had no responsibility.

* He understood that it represented that Kwantung Army members attended, but this was in a private capacity and they had no official responsibility.

When he stated that political leaders agreed on an independence movement unanimously, these people had actual authority, being chiefs of provinces and army commanders. All had responsibility toward the people. It was necessary for Headquarters to understand the desires of these people of responsibility.

* Asked if he meant that they derived their authority and responsibility from the army, he stated that was not the case. He was speaking of the masters of the people living on soil not occupied by the Army.

30375

DOIHARA was sent to Tientsin to see Pu-Yi by order of HONJO. * He had understood the general outline of exhibit 2190, DOIHARA's interrogations, in which he stated that details of this meeting were arranged by ITAGAKI. With respect to DOIHARA's trips, matters such as travelling expenses were looked after by the accused. Asked why DOIHARA was given this assignment, he stated that it was to collect information in the Tientsin-Peiping area. At that time the position of mayor previously held by DOIHARA was delegated to a responsible Chinese and DOIHARA was free. He was especially considered the most suitable because his main task related to collecting intelligence.

30376

* Asked if before DOIHARA was sent, a certain UEZUMI was sent to Tientsin to contact SAKAI to take Pu-Yi to Yinkow, the accused stated that he didn't recall the name UEZUMI. There were many named SAKAI in the Army, but he didn't know whether a person by that name was in Tientsin then.

30377

Asked if it was not because the previous plan had not materialized that he found it necessary to send DOIHARA to enlarge the project, he stated that he knew nothing of a previous plan or a project. Inasmuch as DOIHARA's trip would require travelling expenses, the accused looked after that and minor details. * He didn't know what was referred to when other arrangements were spoken of. The accused was not the treasurer of the army.

In looking after these details, he gave orders to the intendance officer to provide necessary expenses. There was nothing more than this.

30378 OTANI. DOIHARA was free to take his assistant from Mukden or employ him after arrival in Tientsin. * Asked what would affect the finances over which he seemed to take charge, he stated he had no supervision over finances.
He had stated that he ordered the officer in charge of funds to give them sufficient money for two men for one month.

30379 Asked if he didn't know what DOIHARA was going down to Tientsin for, the accused stated that he knew only that DOIHARA was given the assignment by HONJO and left on it. * He went first of all to collect intelligence on the Tientsin-Peiping area. There were some troops of Chiang Hsueh-liang north of the Great Wall, and it was necessary to avoid clashes. to ascertain the true situation there, inasmuch as these troops might withdraw within the Great Wall. There was much information flowing into Manchuria to the effect that Pu-Yi desired to return to 30380 Manchuria. Since DOIHARA was going on this assignment to Tientsin. * he was given the additional assignment to ascertain whether this reported desire of Pu-Yi was true or false.

Asked how he found out the purpose of the trip, he stated that the assignment was made by the Commanding General, and all staff officers were informed. He did not give DOIHARA any particular advice. but being friends, he should think he told him not to overstrain himself.

30381 Asked if he was not in charge of intelligence in the Kwantung Army, the accused stated that Headquarters divided the staff office into sections. he was Chief of the General Affairs Section. The First handled operations, and the Second intelligence. * As Chief, the Intendance Officer was a subordinate. and it was only natural that he should give the orders regarding travelling expenses.

Reference was made to exhibit 2196, a telegram from HAYASHI to SHIDEHARA, dated 12 November, which asked the Army Commander regarding Pu-Yi's coming to Manchuria.
He replied that not only had he heard nothing of it, but he had had ITAGAKI notify the Tientsin Garrison that they were not to hurry about the Emperor's coming to Manchuria.
The witness stated he had some recollection of that.

30382 Asked if he notified DOIHARA to quit, he stated that he was ordered by HONJO through the Chief of Staff to send this telegram. * When he said he told DOIHARA not to overstrain himself, he meant that in connection with collecting intelligence in the Tientsin-Feiping area, there would be possibility of confusion as a result of possible troop withdrawal, and there was possible danger. It had no relation with the taking of Pu-Yi to Manchuria, because the assignment was to ascertain whether he desired to go to Manchuria.

 Asked if the Kwantung Army ever occupied any area outside of Manchuria, the accused stated that he supposed the question related to his affidavit where he stated that the Kwantung Army sent no troops to North China. He meant that there was nothing of the kind while he held office in the Kwantung Army.

30383 * During that time, the Army never occupied any area outside Manchuria.

* The accused stated that he recalled DOIHARA was in North China in November, 1935, on orders from the C-in-C of the Kwangtung Army, at which time the accused was Vice-Chief of Staff. If he had a duty to be informed about troop movements, he stated that the Chief had the concurrent duty of Assistant Military Attache and the Chief of Staff was in a position to know of those movements, but as for himself as Vice-Chief of Staff he had no power to make decisions and was not in a position to know of troop movements and planned operations.

Regarding DOIHARA's mission, he was sent to North China, and extensive consultations with military authorities were held. When he went there, there was a regime headed by Wang Fu. They had heard there was a desire in North China for a new regime. From the standpoint of national defense, the Kwantung Army had always been concerned with it against the Soviet and its main objectives were always directed toward the Soviet and in other directions. * Thus it was of the utmost importance that friendly relations be maintained with countries to the rear so they could obviate any feeling of anxiety.

30387

Since the people of North China desired a new regime, DOIHARA's mission was to make contacts with various people there to arrive at understandings, and by concluding friendly relations with them enable the army to feel secure in its rear. * It was not true that DOIHARA went there to demand a formal proclamation of the new autonomous state by noon of 20 November 1935.

30388

Asked if it was a fact that the new state would include the Five Northern Provinces, he replied that maybe the Chinese had some ideas, but he had not heard them. In view of the purpose of DOIHARA's mission, it was impossible for the accused to conceive that DOIHARA threatened the Chinese authorities, but if the demand was not accepted by noon he would cause Japanese troops to march into North China and remove Fu-Yi from Changchun to Peking. * The routine in connection with this was that there was a staff officer in charge of sending newspaper reports, and all pertinent items were passed on by him to the accused.

30389

It was not true that Japanese newspapers in Manchuria printed the same news story as foreign papers did about the Incident. Asked if the army mobilized its troops and air force in mid-November, 1935, he stated that to mobilize troops it was necessary to gain the approval of the authorities, and he could not recollect that they ever took steps to request such authorization.

30390

* When handed a document, the accused stated he had no recollection of ever having seen it, but it seemed to be a report from the C-in-C of the Kwantung Army to the War Ministry and was part of the Secret Great Diary of Manchuria. * The accused was read a part of the document, which stated that according to the object described in separate telegram 762, they decided to concentrate a part of the forces outside the Great Wall to cooperate suitably with the China Garrison Army, in case of need, and issued orders at noon on the 12th to take certain measures. It stated that certain troops should be placed under the Commander of the First Mixed Brigade, and should be made to concentrate the forces near Shanghaikwan by November 15 so as to be prepared for advancing into North China. The advance to the south of Shanghaikwan should depend on orders.

* Exhibit 3317-A, an excerpt from the Great Secret Diary of Manchuria, which was just read, was received in evidence. * Asked if the Army, on 16 November 1935, ordered the Air Force to be prepared for action by 20 November, 1935, the accused stated he didn't recollect that. The witness was handed a document, and stated it was an order issued by the Kwantung Army, and although there was no signature, MINAMI was commander at that time.

* Exhibit 3318-A, an excerpt from the Great Secret Diary of Manchuria, being the document identified by the accused, dated 16 November 1935, stated that in view of the subsequent situation in North China, the Army intended to gather part of its Air Force outside Shanghaikwan. * The Air Force commander should order scout planes, fighters, etc., to advance by 20 November, and make preparations for marching toward the Peiping-Tientsin area. The railway line sector commanders should dispose railway transportation service to facilitate the transfer of the two air squadrons.

30395

Asked now, after reading the two previous exhibits, if he recalled anything of that sort, he stated he heard later that there had been troop and air movements, but understood they were ordinary peacetime movements.

30397

* Asked if the Kwantung Army had control over harbors, rail, and water transportation in Manchukuo, he stated this was so within the limits of the appendix attached to the Japan-Manchukuo Protocol. He did not think the word "control" was appropriate, but believed many were joint Japan-Manchukuo enterprises.

- Page Among the appendices to the Protocol, there was the HONJO-Pu-Yi Agreement, a clause of which stated that since Japan was to take charge of national defense, various facilities such as railways, harbors, and water transportation would be administered by the Japanese, and Manchukuo agreed to this. Therefore, although the Manchukuoan railroads were owned by a Manchukuoan company, their operation was entrusted to the SMR.
- 30398 * The witness was handed a document which he identified as being from the Chief of Staff of the Kwantung Army to the Vice War Minister (Exhibit 3317-D). Asked if the railroads, harbors, and water transportation meant only railroads owned by the Japanese, he stated that Japan had powers of administration over the railways referred to in the document, under treaty provisions. In the beginning, the Army had a Special Service Department, and in it was a Communications Supervision Bureau. Under MINAMI, this bureau was abolished. The counts did not extend to railways not administered by the Japanese in pursuance of treaty rights.
- 30403 * The accused stated that control of tariffs belonged to Manchukuo, and was an internal matter.
- 30408 * Reference was made to his affidavit, which stated that KONOYE thought he was the best man for the post of War Minister, considering his career and ideas. He was asked how his ideas came to KONOYE, and he stated he did not know who recommended him to KONOYE. ISHIHARA had no reason to engage in such political activity, and he did not know whether it was he or whether it was KIDO. When he became War Minister, the Vice Minister was TOJO. He did not pick TOJO, but his consent was asked for later.
- 30409 TOJO became Vice-Minister before he became War Minister. He supposed this was about a week before.
- 30410 * In regard to important policies, the accused received information from his predecessors which was applied to the policy for settling the China Incident. Asked if he was aware of the decision of the Imperial Conference of 16 January, 1938, he stated he didn't know what this conference was about, and didn't know what it decided.
- 30411 * He heard, in connection with the statement of 16 January, that the true intent of the government was not necessarily destruction and non-recognition of the existing Chinese government. Asked if the government policy at the time of the declaration of 16 January, 1938, was continued when he became War Minister, he stated it had not yet been changed.

* Reference was made to the affidavit where he stated that the War Minister's policy was to alter the peace terms and that the terms should not be so exacting as the ones proposed through Trautmann. Asked if he made an effort to change or modify the terms, he stated that the result of his efforts was the declaration of November 3 and the outline adjusting new relations issued November 30. He did make efforts to change the terms. When the terms published in the outline on 30 November were compared with the terms offered through the Trautmann negotiations, they were as mild as they could be. * Because the effect given by the January 16 statement at the time of its issuance was very bad, they now stated that even as regards the Chungking regime, if they would be willing to approach Japan, she would deal with them gladly.

The main purpose of the Five Ministers' conference was to enable the Ministers concerned to meet and discuss major problems, and there were no special regulations.

30414

* Asked if he made a statement to the purport that the aim of the meeting was to discuss the war situation to the Domei News Agency, he stated he had made such a statement, and it went without saying that a speedy solution of the Incident was fully discussed. He, as War Minister, occupied a very important position in that conference. The important declarations and policies which were adopted by unanimous decision at the conference were in conformity with his views.

30415

Asked if he attended the conference in June, July, and August, 1938, he stated that on the whole he did so. * When handed a document, the accused stated that the title said that it contained the decisions of these conferences, but the results or decisions of the conference were not recorded at the meeting. His recollection of what took place was not accurate, and he did not know who recorded the decisions. * It was not a practice to keep minutes of the decisions, and he could not recognize that these were the decisions reached by the Five Ministers Conference.

* Asked if a sheet before him was a certificate, he stated that he could not tell, as he could not read English. * The accused stated that he did not remember if the Five Ministers' Conference on 8 July, 1938, decided the measures to be taken by Japan in case China surrendered.

30422 * He didn't remember if it was decided that in that eventuality Japan would either adhere to the decision of 11 January and treat the Chinese Government as a local regime which would participate in the setting up of a new pro-Japanese Government. It was not true that it was decided then that Japan would not try to settle the Incident through negotiations. He had no recollection whatsoever as to this, and at that time no one had any such idea.

He didn't recall if on that occasion they decided that the Chinese surrender would only be accepted on certain conditions, one of them being the retirement of Chiang Kai-shek. He didn't remember if the conference of 8 July decided on measures to be taken in case China refused to surrender.

30423 * It was not true that the policy was laid down that in that eventuality, Japan should concentrate her power on the destruction of the Chinese Government. He did not recall such a thing at all, and it was not so that it was decided that Japan would continue positive war operations so as to occupy all strategic points in China.

30424 He didn't recall if it was decided that in case China continued to refuse to surrender, pro-Japanese regimes would be made to combine. Asked if the conference on 8 July decided on strategy toward China, he stated he didn't remember whether there was a conference on that date, * and even if there was he didn't remember what was decided.

30425 * He had not forgotten the policies of the government and his own views and ideas. It was not true that it was decided then to bring about Chiang Kai-shek's fall and destroy Chinese fighting power. They did not have the purpose of confiscating the funds in China, or any foreign concessions there.

30426 * He did not remember whether the 15 July conference decided on the policy for establishing a new central government in China, and it was not decided that a new government be set up after the occupation of Hankow and Canton when the Chiang Government would have been reduced to a local regime.

Asked if the 15 July conference decided to provide for Japanese supervision of military affairs, foreign relations, economics, religion, and education in China, he stated they had no such plans, nor did the plan provide for appointing Japanese advisers and officials.

* Asked if the conference of 8 July decided that the main objective would be to stop British aid to Chiang, he stated he didn't recall exactly. The 12 July conference did not decide upon the attitude to be taken toward possible British and German proposals for mediation, and he didn't recall if there was any decision at any time to decline British proposals.

Asked if the 22 July conference decided on the procedure for settling the Chan-kufeng Incident, he stated he felt there was no important decision on that date. * He had stated in his interrogation that the Cabinet meeting of 2 August was devoted to that Incident. He did not remember if the 26 July Conference decided to set up a special commission for Chinese affairs.

* He had said in his affidavit that there was a special mission headed by DOIHARA, TSUDA, and BANZAI, but he could not recall whether it had a special name. The task of the Commission was not to draw up political and economic strategies for war against China.

He did not remember if the conference of 9 September, 1938, laid down the outlines for a joint commission of representatives of the local regimes. It was not decided on this occasion that complete guidance would be given to the Joint Commission by Japan, and he did not remember if that, in conformity with this decision, the Commission was established on 22 September, 1938.

* The accused stated that Premier KONOYE had sent DOIHARA to China in 1938. The accused did not recommend him as War Minister. The solution of the Incident was difficult, and it was a problem for the entire country and not the army alone. It was necessary to select the best man, and Foreign Minister UGAKI selected BANZAI. * DOIHARA, with Admiral TSUDA, was appointed to assist BANZAI and cooperate with him.

30432

The purpose of DOIHARA's mission * was to call on those who were earnest in their desire for peace and ask their cooperation. It was not true that one of his strategies was to work on retired statesmen and generals and set up a new government. It was not true that the government picked DOIHARA because he had had previous experience in setting up new regimes.

* Asked if the Special Commission was a secret organ, he stated he didn't recall the name "Special Commission on China".

30434 The group of BANZAI, DOIHARA, and TSUDA had no special name, but its purpose was to get together the best men who had an earnest desire for peace. Asked if there was a name DOIHARA Kikan, or Agency, which maintained communication with the War Ministry, he stated that he had forgotten the name, but since DOIHARA was the youngest of the three and the only one in active service, he administered the business of the group, maintaining a house in China. * The accused did remember that he used the name "DOIHARA Agency" when he communicated with the accused.

Asked if it was also sometimes called "Take Kikan", he stated he did not know. He did know the composition of the China Affairs Board, and as War Minister he was one of the vice-presidents and knew the important decisions of the Board.

30435 * He did not know the anti-Comintern National Salvation League. Reference was made to the affidavit, where it was stated that the National Salvation Peace Movement, in particular, supported Wang Ching-wei's

30436 national peace movement. * Asked if this peace movement was the same as the National Salvation League, he stated he did not know if there was such a league, and he hardly thought the salvation movement was financed by Japan.

30437 When shown a document, the witness was asked if it was a decision of the China Affairs Board. * He stated that he had no recollection of it, and could not recall if 30438 it was decided that the necessary expense * for the activities of the anti-Comintern National Salvation League should be appropriated from surplus funds of the Maritime Customs Revenue.

30439 * He did not recall if it was decided that when utilizing the surplus funds, Japanese names should be used to maintain secrecy and cover up the fact that this was a genuine Chinese movement.

30440 When DOIHARA was working on Wu Pei-fu, they did not have some arrangement about the expenses. He did not recall a document shown him as a decision of the China Affairs Board on 23 June, 1939. He did not recall that the expenses for the Wu Project would be defrayed in accordance with the expenses required for the Salvation League. * He had nothing to do with any matter concerning the arranging of money for launching these projects.

Asked if the DOIHARA Kikan was taken over by KAGESA, he stated the words "taken over" were not proper. The mission of the two was different, and there was quite an interval between when DOIHARA returned to Japan and the time when KAGESA was settled in China.

30441 KAGESA was not sent by the accused. He did remember that KAGESA went for political work with NAGAI and others, on government orders. He was sent by all ministers connected with the Five Ministers' Conference, in accordance with a decision there. In this group there were naturally navy men, civilians, * and Foreign Office personnel. In the beginning, his mission was to contact Wang Ching-wei and bring him from Hanoi to Shanghai.

30442 In reply to the statement by KONOYE on December 22, 1937, Wang Ching-wei had escaped to begin a peace movement and was in Hanoi, but since he was in danger there and desired to come to Shanghai, an emissary was sent to bring him. * The accused believed that Wang issued the statement a week after KONOYE's statement of 22 December, of his own accord.

The accused had heard KAGESA's testimony that KAGESA had informed Japan that the Chinese would expect a Japanese announcement on the peace terms, and that the KONOYE statement of 22 December, 1938, was prepared in view of the proposed escape of Wang to Hanoi.

30443 * Asked if he still insisted that the statement was Wang's own idea, the accused stated that he was convinced that it was. * Asked if the Five Ministers' Conference on 26 August 1938, decided on the policy for propaganda in connection with the Incident, he stated not on that date. Asked if this decision stated that in view of the prospective fall of Hankow it was a pressing need to push long-term construction plans, he stated that he recalled that on 26 August the conference discussed plans for strengthening the anti-Comintern Pact, and he recalled no decision on any other matter.

30445 When shown a document and asked if it was the decision of 26 August, he stated that he did not recall it. * As he had stated, he recalled only the discussion concerning the anti-Comintern Pact on that day. Even if he was told that the document was an official one, he still 30446 would say it was not the August 26 decision. * He could not think that the paper presented to him purported to contain the decisions of the 26 August conference.

30447 * He could not recall a conference between himself and the Navy and Foreign Ministers. No records were kept of the Five Ministers' conference, or any other. He did not recall that on 28 October, 1938, he, the Navy, and Foreign Ministers, decided policies for administration of the recently occupied Hankow and Canton districts. They did not decide that new administrations would be set up there under Japanese guidance.

30449 * He did not recall if it was decided that in economics, emphasis should be laid on acquiring supplies for the army. * He didn't recall that in the latter part of August 1938, the Five Ministers' Conference requested the various ministries to submit plans for establishing a new organization to deal with all Chinese matters. He did not recall if the Foreign Ministry at that time proposed a temporary organization for the duration of the China Incident, agreed to by the War Ministry.

It was not true that in early September, 1938, the army submitted a plan to establish a permanent China Affairs Board, which would continue even after settlement of the Incident. * Asked if Foreign Minister UGAKI strongly disagreed with the establishment of the China Affairs Board according to the army plan, he stated that UGAKI wanted to have a board set up within the Foreign Office, but the army felt it necessary to have an organization supported by the whole government. Asked if because of this disagreement UGAKI resigned on 29 September 1938, the accused stated that UGAKI did resign, but did not state his reasons. Asked if it was not because the Premier and Cabinet agreed with the Army plan, the accused stated that it was true that the other four ministers agreed with the army, but neither the Premier nor Foreign Minister said why UGAKI had submitted his resignation, and KONOYE said at that time he could not understand it.

30451

* He believed it was around November that the China Affairs Board was finally set up, and he thought UGAKI resigned around 26 or 27 September. He did not recall if the army plan was approved two days after UGAKI's resignation. Since the Board was set up in November, he could be sure that the decision was made between the resignation and November, * but he did not think it was immediately after.

He did remember that at the beginning of April, 1939, the Liaison Offices of the Board were established in China, but he didn't remember if HIRANUMA addressed the chiefs of the Liaison Offices or if any such speech stated that the government adhered to the KONOYE statement of 22 December, 1938.

* He didn't recall if, in a meeting of liaison officers on the 10th or 11th of April, 1939, a director of General Affairs instructed that the guidance of the Chinese regime and the future Chinese government in political and economic affairs should be according to the principle laid down by Japan. The purpose of the Board was

Page not guidance, but the idea behind it was to take charge of politics and economics so far as they related to Japan, and maintain liaison with China. He knew that the accused SUZUKI was in the China Affairs Board, but didn't remember his title.

30454 He could not remember if he attended the meeting of April 10 and 11, 1939. * He didn't recall if there was an instruction that in the guidance of China, the important points of Japan's desires had to be fulfilled, and he didn't recall if the decisions of the liaison offices were 30455 approved by the Board. * He didn't recall if the directions and the speech were approved by the Board before the meeting in April, 1931. He did not know if the instructions given at the meeting of the chiefs of the Liaison Offices included an industrial three year plan for China, or if that plan was contemplated to fit in with Japan-Manchukuo production expansion plans to fulfill Japan's defense and economic demands.

30456 * It was not true that after the establishment of the Board, the army tightened its control on Chinese and provincial local governments. Asked if he knew that it was reported that the Liaison Office of the Board in China still had to obtain the understanding of the local army before they could do anything, he stated that since the army was conducting military operations, it was glad to give all conveniences in its power to the administrative organs if they did not hinder operations. * He did 30457 not recall if Foreign Minister ARITA had complained of the interference of the army in such matters before the Five Ministers' Conference.

The accused recalled that the Imperial Conference of 30 November, which decided on the policy of adjusting relations with China, took place after the capture of Hankow and Canton. He stated that he was present at the conference. The Foreign Minister explained the policy.

30458 * When handed a document, he stated that it was similar to the decision of November 30, but he could not judge whether it was exactly the same. There was nothing in the document to show it was the original and he could 30459 not say it was the same. * and he could not understand the certificate. He could hardly believe that such a lengthy decision was arrived at at an Imperial Conference, for he recalled that ARITA's explanation was very brief.

- 30461 * The accused repeated that he could not identify the document but he remembered that the decisions reached that day were items relating to the adjustment of new relations with China.
- 30462 * The accused was asked if it was decided that the object of establishing a new order in East Asia should have conditions including general cooperation between Japan and Manchukuo, China, a special position for Japan in North China and Inner Mongolia, a special position along the lower Yangtze, Hainan Island and other islands along the South China Coast. He stated that was not accurate. In his recollection, the statement regarding establishment of the Co-Prosperty Sphere was set forth in the KONOYE statement of 3 November. Asked if the details were also laid down in the Imperial Conference decision, he stated he did not recall such details being carried out immediately. * It was not true that the details provided for the creation of a new China government on the principle of cooperation among separate regimes. The first of the points provided for was the maintenance of good neighbor relations and friendship, cooperation against communistic and economic cooperation. It was not true that it was decided that Japan would send advisors to the new central government and the local regimes. The policy decision upon which he called the principles for adjusting new relations which might serve as conditions for peace.
- 30463
- 30464 * Asked if it was decided that China would have to compensate Japanese subjects for the economic and financial losses during the China Incident, the accused stated it was exactly opposite. Japan was not going to take any reparations or indemnifications, entertained no territorial aggrandizement, and was firm on its stand of respecting the sovereignty of China. There was no idea of claiming any indemnity. She was determined not only to respect the sovereignty and territorial integrity in China but even relinquish extra-territoriality rights and effecting the rendition of concessions. It was not decided that economic activities and interests of third powers would be restricted.
- 30465 * Asked if HIRANUMA made a speech at which the Foreign Minister replied at the conference of 30 November Page 1938, he stated that such a matter was hardly possible at an Imperial Conference.

30466 * The accused was handed a document and it was suggested to him that it was written on Imperial Household Ministry's stationery. He stated that stenographers could not enter the conference room and no stenographic transcripts could be made. He noticed that his name appeared at the bottom of the document as one who attended it but he stated he could not possibly identify it.

30467 * Another document was shown him and he was asked if it included a speech by HIRANUMA. He stated that this was not possible in accordance with precedents. It was written on poor quality Imperial Household stationery and he was hard put to give any correct judgment as to what kind of document it actually was, and he placed no trust in it.

In regard to the purported speech by HIRANUMA in the document, he had no recollection of HIRANUMA stating that activities of Chinese troops in the occupied areas would have to be suppressed or otherwise the conference decisions could not be realized. He did not recall that HIRANUMA stated that the establishment of a new regime should outwardly be done by the Chinese but in reality it would depend on Japan. He did not recall if HIRANUMA stated that in areas where Japanese troops were to be stationed, administration would have to remain under Japanese supervision. He did not remember if HIRANUMA stated that in case third powers would oppose Japan, it would be necessary to deal with them resolutely.

30469 * He did not recall a Five-Minister Conference on 6 June 1939, three days after he became War Minister. He did not recall if it was decided at this conference that the constituent elements of a new central government should be Wang, Wu, the existing regimes, and the Chungking Government, provided it changed its mind and reformed.

The accused stated he did not know about any decisions reached in early June 1939. In his recollection, Wang Ching-wei arrived in Tokyo in early June and if that was the case, he supposed the conference would be held prior to his arrival.

30471)

* He stated that at the time of the Changkufeng Incident in July 1938, TOJO was Vice-Minister. Asked if the Naval and Army High Command had intelligence reports, that there were no indications that Russia was preparing for war against Japan, he stated that there was no clear-cut report to such effect. There were various reports but he could not recall anything in particular.

30472

The accused was asked if the Kwantung Army estimated the situation and declared that the Soviet forces must be compelled to withdraw from Changkufeng by force, and even if Japan resorted to force, Russia would not enlarge the Incident. The accused stated that this was not within the knowledge of the Kwantung Army because the Incident occurred on the Korean border * which would be under the jurisdiction of the Korean Army and he had never heard of it. It was not true that the Kwantung Army Headquarters persistently urged the use of force to General Staff Headquarters. The Japanese attitude was clearly decided upon by the Cabinet. It was not true that he and the Chief of Staff fully agreed with the report and recommendation of the Kwantung Army and sought an Imperial audience on the 21st to obtain Imperial sanction. He did not know if he had been told by the Emperor through his Chief A'de-de-Camp that if the intention of seeing him was to obtain sanction for the use of force, then he need not come.

30473

* The attitude at that time was decided upon definitely by the Cabinet. The policy was non-expansion, but because the Soviet took aggressive action, there was extreme danger and they had to take necessary measures to meet it.* He did have an audience alone with the Emperor at which he reported the policy decision on the Changkufeng Incident as laid down by the Cabinet. Asked if he was severely reprimanded by the Emperor on that occasion for telling a falsehood, assuring the Emperor that the Foreign and Navy Ministers had agreed to the use of force in Changkufeng, he stated that the subject matter was entirely different. Before he reported to the Throne

Page Foreign Minister UGAKI had an audience. The Emperor asked the accused if there was not some difference between UGAKI's report and his own. Although UGAKI and he had arranged their reports so that there could not be any difference,* because the Emperor asked such a question pointing out that there seemed to be a difference, he assured him that he would look into the matter, and left.

* When the Emperor asked him if there wasn't some difference, he stated he did not think so, but would look into the matter, but the Emperor did not say to him that thereafter he could not move one soldier without his command. It was not true that the Emperor excitedly told him that the actions of the Army in the past had been abominable and that in the Loukiaotou case and in the Marco Polo Bridge Incident, there was absolutely no obedience to central orders. It was not true that the Emperor said that there were infrequent instances where arbitrary and sneaky methods had been used and he felt it was abominable.

* He denied that the reprimand was so strong that he went to the Chief Secretary of the Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal and stated he could never look into the Emperor's face again and would like to resign.

In regard to the Nomonhan affair, at which he stated in his affidavit that he endeavored to bring about a speedy settlement, the accused stated that it was not true that he did not seek the approval of the Five-Minister Conference or Cabinet until the conflict had neared its conclusion.

* It was not true that he ever told HIRANUMA that hostilities should continue. It was not true that when he finally took the matter up with the Cabinet, YONAI stated it was a distasteful situation to start the Incident and then bring the problem after the Army had bungled it.

At first he approved wholeheartedly the actions of Kwantung Army Commander UEDA in connection with the Nomonhan Incident, but afterward he did not. UEDA was relieved from his post because after the rout of the Japanese forces, it was deemed impossible

30479 * (The attention of the Tribunal was called to Pages 22599, 23057 and Exhibit 766.)

30480 * The accused was asked in regard to the British Concession in Tientsin if it was true that five demands were presented to the British in July 1939, including the handing over of 50 million yuan, to the provisional government in Peking. He stated that such negotiations were not handled by the Army but negotiations were conducted through diplomatic channels. He had no recollection of having an Imperial audience in connection with this topic. Asked if there was a condition demanding the handing over of 45 million yuan, he stated that in the French Concession, there was a Chinese Bank of Communications in which there was deposited money, but he did not know whether it was 45 million. The Peking government decided to inspect this fund but the Concession authorities refused. * The money was federal reserve notes and it was natural for the Peking government to have the notes transferred to it. This had no connection with the Japanese Army and it was a problem of the provisional government. Asked if it wasn't the British rather than the French Concession, he stated that his recollection was that it was the French. Asked why the matter was discussed in Tokyo if it concerned the provisional government, he stated there were questions such as maintaining law and order and economics.

30482 * It was not true that about 7 July 1939 the Emperor summoned him and inquired the reason for the demand for handing over 45 million yuan and it was not true that he was again rebuked by the Emperor.

(In lieu of cross-examination in connection with the problem of POWs, the attention of the Court was invited to Exhibits 1614, 1617 to 1622, 1655-8, 1668-75, 1686, 1691, 1712, 1720-22, 1758 and 59, p. 43, 1512-18, 1769, 1778 and testimony at 5418-5491, 13471, 13573 and 13756.

* The accused recalled that Exhibit 3177-A and Intelligence Report of the Kwantung Army Special Service Organ read that in South China, to hear the names DOIHARA and ITAGAKI was something like mentioning a tiger, and the people turned pale. Asked if at that time he was in the service of the Kwantung Army, which was on 27 August 1934, he stated that he thought at that time he had concluded his travel abroad and was attached to headquarters, but did not recall whether he was at his post at that time.

* The accused was asked if he recalled in the summer of 1939 when UEDA was Foreign Minister, if there was submitted to Japan a draft of the Tripartite Alliance, drawn up by OSHIMA and RIBBENTROP. He stated that the proposal was presented by RIBBENTROP but the words "military alliance" were not suggested. The purpose was to bolster the Anti-Comintern Pact. Asked if the Alliance originally dealt solely with Russia but was extended in November 1938 to apply also * against England and France, he stated it was not an Alliance and the contents were different than this. Asked if he wired OSHIMA that UEDA agreed with the substance of the pact as extended against England and France, he stated that the War Minister did not directly send the telegram to an ambassador and he denied sending any telegram, nor did he recall that the War Ministry sent it.

* The accused was asked if the Five-Ministers Conference advocated strengthening the Pact by military alliance and if it also decided to have the anti-Comintern program directed solely against the Soviet. He stated that the official instructions to the Ambassador was that although the USSR was to be the objective, the pact might also be applied to third powers, depending on the situation. There could be various degrees of application. Such matters were decided by the conference and were not incorporated in the basic draft and this was forwarded by UEDA to OSHIMA with instructions. * He thought this conference was in 1939. There were three meetings between the middle and end of January and decisions of this nature were made then. It was not true that the Emperor urged the Army to apply the Page program to the Soviet alone. It was not true that the Army advised the Emperor. It was not in favor of that course. He had not heard that OSHIMA and SHIRATORI held the view that the military alliance should be directed against England and France as well. Asked if OSHIMA and SHIRATORI opposed governmental directives issued on this subject, he stated that according to what he heard from UEDA, one of the ambassadors communicated his opinions to the central government before passing the draft on to Germany that there seemed to be doubts and they had to hold another conference.

30492 * Asked if OSHIMA and SHIRATORI overstepped their authority and advised Germany that Japan would participate in war, he stated he had not heard that they did not submit to government orders.

The accused was asked if he as War Minister had an Imperial audience on 11 April at which the Emperor stated that it was an infringement upon Imperial authority for the ambassadors to express intentions of participating in war, he stated that the Foreign Minister was a competent minister on this matter and such inquiries would not be addressed to him as War Minister and there was no such audience.

30493 * He had no recollection that the Emperor said to him that under such circumstances it was not favorable for him to take an attitude of supporting the ambassadors. He did not conceal the actions of SHIRATORI and OSHIMA at the Five-Ministers Conferences and try to give excuses for them. The Army on its

30494 part had its own position. * Asked if after the conference, he asked the chief aide-de-camp who it was that told everything to the Emperor, he stated that he never had a talk with the Emperor on this question. He was asked if he knew that Foreign Minister ARITA, in reporting to the throne, told the Emperor that SHIRATORI and OSHIMA stated that Japan would participate in a war if England and France fought with Germany and Italy. He stated

30495 that he did not know what ARITA reported. * ARITA was a competent minister and he may have made some kind of report, but he did not know its substance and had not heard that he ever made any such report

30496 as had been suggested. * He did not remember that ARITA recommended that the statements of OSHIMA and

Page SHIRATORI should be rescinded as actions overstepping their limits. He did not recall if Hitler on April 28, 1939 replied to Roosevelt's request that Hitler and Mussolini give a 10-year guarantee of peace.

30497 * Asked if shortly before 28 April 1939, he sent instructions to OSHIMA to announce the positive attitude of Japan before Hitler's speech, he stated that he could not directly send instructions to the ambassador. Asked what means OSHIMA and SHIRATORI used to influence the policy of an all-out military alliance, he stated there could never be a case of the government being influenced by an ambassador and he did not know any means used by the two to influence it. Asked if OSHIMA and SHIRATORI threatened to resign, he stated that ARITA had never told him about that. He had never heard if a request from OSHIMA and SHIRATORI for their recall was placed before the Five-Ministers on 25 April.

30498 * Asked if their recall was considered such a serious question that it might influence peace and order within the nation, he stated there was nothing of this kind in his recollection. Asked if it was the government's view that it would be better to be satisfied with the results of the negotiations than to risk the recall of the ambassadors, he stated there was no question of recall. It was not the case that the government statement was made in this matter to the German and Italian ambassadors because of the opposition of OSHIMA and SHIRATORI to the will of the government.

30499 * He knew that the statement was conveyed to the German and Italian ambassadors. Before that the Foreign Minister had presented a proposal and with regard to it various discussions were held. This course was not taken for the purpose of ignoring the two ambassadors but rather to support them.

30501 The accused was asked if it was not true that soon after ARITA delivered the HIRANUMA declaration to the German and Italian ambassadors he received a wire from USAMI in Berlin that Gauss had submitted a proposed draft and inquired whether it would meet with Japan's approval. * He replied that he had some recollection, but had completely forgotten the contents. It was not a fact that in consequence of the proposed draft, ARITA investigated its origin and concluded it was submitted to the German Foreign Office through Japanese Army attaches. The accused had no recollection that even a few days after the delivery of the HIRANUMA Declaration, a wire was received from OSHIMA advising that Ribbentrop had made an inquiry to the effect that if Germany went to war and if there was no military aid from Japan, if it would be permissible to recognize Japan as being in a state of war, to which OSHIMA replied in the affirmative.

30502 * He did not recall that OSHIMA answered Ribbentrop that in the event of war between a contracting nation and another, Japan would be considered in a state of war although there might not be military support. The witness was asked if HIRANUMA supported his opinion in this matter, but he stated that did not refresh his memory.

30503 * He did not know if the Premier reported to the Throne that Japan would not participate in war, or if ARITA threatened to resign because of the opinions of HIRANUMA and the accused. * He did not know if the Gauss draft of the alliance was discussed at the Five Ministers' Conference of 9 May. Asked if the Navy Minister contended that before making a decision it was necessary to receive a reply to the HIRANUMA Declaration and that HIRANUMA contended this was unnecessary because OSHIMA had already replied "yes", the accused stated such a thing did not come up for discussion.

30505 * The accused was asked if it was not true that OSHIMA's reply to Ribbentrop was considered at the conference of 20 May, and that ARITA again advocated the annulment of the reply, while HIRANUMA took the position it was sufficient. He stated that he recalled a conference on that date, but didn't recall such a matter being discussed.

He was asked if there were not various conferences between the army and navy from 13 May to 20 May, 1939, resulting in a compromise agreement and a new proposal to be made reserving Japan's right to have a "voluntary" participation in a European war. He stated he didn't recall the contents of the Gauss draft, and such a discussion was not held.

It was not true that on 20 May, 1939, he sent YACHIJIRI to Ambassador Ott with a written declaration that the army was working for signing of the pact secretly and simultaneously with the signing of the German-Italian pact to give the pact a tripartite character.

* Asked if this compromise plan was approved at a Five Ministers' Conference on 20 May and reported to the Emperor, he replied that he recalled a conference on that date, but didn't recall if its results were reported to the Emperor. The accused was asked if it was a fact that the Army contended that ARITA's report to Berlin of the decision of 20 May was erroneous in that it failed to stipulate automatic entrance into war against England and France, but made participation dependent on the situation. He stated that the discussion on 20 May was circumscribed to matters contained in the HIRANUMA message of 5 May.

30507

* When asked if he recalled that the Gauss draft was approved on May 20, forwarded to OSHIMA and SHIMAZUMI for presentation to Germany and Italy, and if OSHIMA and SHIMAZUMI refused to deliver it, the accused stated that he didn't recall any discussions based upon the Gauss draft. It was not true that he and HIRANUMA continued efforts in behalf of the army plan for automatic entrance into war.

* When asked if it was a fact that the conference of 5 June, the army and navy found a basis for agreement, thus clarifying the problem of strengthening the anti-Comintern Pact, he stated that on that date the course of negotiations were concluded and the last instructions sent out. The accused was asked if in this agreement it was understood that in the event of war between Germany and Italy and England and France, Japan would participate but with a reservation that she should choose the time to enter, he stated that the contents were quite different from the question of that day. There were two points on which the Germans did not agree. This was with respect to the attached clause. One of the two points was to submit to the Germans that Japan was unable to give effective assistance in connection with armed assistance to third powers in East Asia, outside the Soviet.

* The second question was the method of making a diplomatic explanation. The treaty was directed toward the activities of the Third International, and there was some talk whether to present this matter to the Germans.

He didn't recall conferring with the Emperor prior to 7 July 1939, regarding sending TERAUCHI to the Nazi Party conference in Germany, or telling the Emperor it was necessary to send TERAUCHI to strengthen the pact and that the Emperor replied he did not think it good. It was not true that at such a conference the Emperor charged that at the conference of Supreme War Councilors the accused reported falsely that the Foreign Minister was in favor of a military alliance and that the Emperor told the accused that this was very insolent.

* He didn't recall the conversation with KONOYE prior to 23 July, 1939, in which he asked KONOYE if it was possible to change the Emperor's mind, and KONOYE replied that it was difficult. When asked if the alliance was discussed at a meeting of the Big Three on 3 August, he stated he had no recollection that such a meeting was held, and he didn't recall any action taken.

When asked if the army opposed the agreement with Britain regarding the Tientsin question on the ground it would hurt chances for a military alliance, * he stated that negotiations were held with Britain to bring about a meeting of minds. * When the accused was reminded that he made no reference with regard to the tri-Partite Pact in his affidavit in connection with Anglo-Japanese talks, he stated that the latter conversations and the Pact question were entirely separate matters. The army did not oppose the Anglo-Japanese understanding. With respect to it, the matter was transferred to Tokyo and laid in the hands of diplomats, and at these conversations representatives from the spot attended and cooperated.

He did not urge a Five Ministers' Conference prior to 3 August 1939, at which he was willing to push an all-out military alliance at the risk of a cabinet crisis. * When asked if at the conference of 3 August 1939, the army's contention was presented that a change of the situation necessitated an all-out alliance, he replied it was not a question of presenting a contention. It was not true that the army presented such views, although there might have been such a view in existence.

* The Army's position was that it must observe the conference decision of 5 June. At that conference, the accused told his conferees that he, as a State Minister, would abide by the decision, and he expressed the desire that a Pact be concluded through a German compromise within the scope of that decision.

30514 It was not the army's contention that if Germany refused to agree to a pre-arranged Plan, an all-out alliance should be concluded. * The accused was asked if he recalled that HIRANUMA asked him what he thought about the army contention, and he replied that he was both a State and War Minister, and that he approved the Pre-arranged Plan as a State Minister, but as an army representative he favored the military alliance. He stated that this was not the case. When asked if the plan was discussed at a conference of 8 August, he stated that they consulted in accordance with the Pre-arranged Plan of June 5.

30515 * He had no recollection that in the discussion following the conference of 8 August if YONAI answered the army contention that failure to conclude an all-out alliance would mean isolation. It was also not true that HIRANUMA asked him at this conference if the main point of the army proposal meant hindering the plan, to which he replied that it did.

He was asked if it was true that due to the wide gap between the Foreign Minister proposal and that of the army it was considered inadvisable to convene the conference on the 22nd of August, but instead on the 25th. He stated that on 22 August, they received the report of the non-Aggression Pact between Germany and the Soviet, so it was only natural there was no more need to discuss the Tri-Partite Pact.

30516 * The postponement was not due to the wide gap between the Foreign Minister's proposal and the views of the army.

30517 * When asked if the matter of the recall of OSHIMA and SHIRATORI was again considered, it was suggested that the problem of recall be solved by sending the Premier to confer with Hitler and Mussolini, he stated he could not understand how this question could arise. His opinion was that on the 25th, inasmuch as the non-Aggression Pact was concluded, this was in violation of the Anti-Comintern Pact as far as Japan was concerned. They probably arrived at a decision to protest to Germany. * There was a suggestion to send the Premier to see Mussolini and Hitler, but this existed on a lower level and was not placed on the conference agenda and had no connection with the question of recalling the two ambassadors. When asked if the Cabinet was ready to resign at this point but army circles desired that responsibility be diverted from the army, he stated the Cabinet was not ready to resign.

30519 When asked if before the question of sending the Premier was settled and before the gap was closed between the Foreign Ministry and Army proposals, if word was received of the non-Aggression Pact, he stated that this * question arose before the conclusion of the Pact. There was no question about the Foreign Ministry's or the Premier and the army's plan. The question was only studied at a very low level, and did not mature to the place where it could be placed before the conference. He agreed that word was received of the non-aggression Pact before the question of sending the Premier to Europe was settled and before the gap was closed between the Foreign Ministry and Army proposals.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. MATTICE.

30520 * The HIRANUMA Cabinet was formed on 5 January, 30521 instead of the 4th. * With respect to the Imperial audience of 21 July, 1938 in which something was said about a difference between the reports of the Foreign Office and his own, he informed the Emperor that he would investigate it, and he did so, reporting the matter to KONOYE, who relayed it to the Foreign Minister. KONOYE ascertained that his report to the Throne was not mistaken, and KONOYE reported to the Emperor, and later the original plan of the accused was again submitted and received Imperial sanction.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. LEVIN,
 Counsel for SUZUKI.

30523 * The accused stated that YANAGAWA, Heisuke, was Director General of the China Affairs Board, and not the accused SUZUKI.

EXAMINATION BY THE TRIBUNAL.

30524 *When asked if, at the outbreak of the Mukden Incident, special orders were given to army units at Changchun, Antung and Fushun, the accused stated that the orders were supposed to have been issued by the Kwantung Army commander. The accused was then in Mukden, and heard of this matter later.

The Changchun Troops were to be concentrated in the Mukden area, but this plan was changed and they were ordered to remain in Changchun. There were no direct orders given to the troops in Fushun. The commander of the 2nd Battalion in Mukden urgently wired the Fushun garrison commander, asking him to come to Mukden immediately. With respect to the Antung unit, he had no recollection.

When asked if he approved, the accused stated that at the time of the order's issuance he was in Port Arthur and was not directly connected. Asked if he could explain how fighting broke out at night in those three places, he stated * that based on reports received much later, the garrison commander in Changchun was to have come to Mukden, but was ordered to remain in Changchun, and advised he might be ordered to advance to Mukden later. Because of the need to protect the SMR and Japanese in the zone, the brigade commander, on his own initiative, opened an attack.

30526

When asked if he could explain why fighting broke out at all four points almost at the same time that night, he stated that the time of opening hostile action was different at different places. Hostilities commenced in Changchun on the 19th, around noon. There was no action at Fushun. * The Chinese troops at Huanfongcheng were disarmed, on September 19, after the telegraphic order had been sent by Headquarters at Port Arthur.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF SHIONO, Suehiko,
 b. Mr. Levin.

30536

30537

* On 7 July, 1937 a collision between the Japanese and Chinese took place at Lukouchiao, when the first KONOYE Cabinet was in office. Two or three days later, War Minister SUGIYAMA reported the outbreak, and according to him, Chinese troops made an illegal attack. SUGIYAMA stated that troops must be sent to protect the lives and property of Japanese in the area. However, KONOYE and other Cabinet members desired the incident to be settled on the spot and not allowed to expand. A few days later, SUGIYAMA submitted that they send a fairly large force, for unless they did so the troops in the area and Japanese nationals would be endangered. The Premier and other Cabinet members were of the opinion that if the dispatch of troops was necessary it could not be helped, but if they were sent * the Incident should be settled locally and the troops withdrawn as soon as it was settled. They requested the troops be limited to the barest minimum, for a large force might bring about a major clash. As SUGIYAMA agreed, the Cabinet decided to recognize the sending of troops.

During the first KONOYE Cabinet, the Cabinet members were not informed about the atrocities in China, and no report was printed in the newspapers. The witness did not know whether there were any foreign protests, but if there were they were never brought to the Cabinet's attention. The Panay and Ladybird incidents were reported to the Cabinet as inevitable or accidental, and he was told that compensations were paid to the U. S. and Britain and the matter settled satisfactorily.

The Cabinet was never consulted on plans and strategies of war. They were not even informed about the battles beforehand, and were told nothing of the attack on Nanking.

THERE WAS NO CROSS-EXAMINATION OF THE WITNESS.

30553 being employed with the Bank of Japan, * he was President of the Industrial Bank from 30 November 1936 to 2 February 1937, and concurrently holding the post of Chairman of the Central Depository of the Commercial Industrial Association.
From 2 February, 1937 to 4 June, 1937, he was Finance Minister, and became a member of the House of Peers in May 1937. From July 1937 to March 1944 he was President of the Bank of Japan, and was Chairman of the Temporary Funds Examining Committee. In February, 1937, he was appointed Finance Minister in the HAYASHI Cabinet, and one of the major policies he wanted to enforce was to rectify the previous financial policy.

30554 His predecessor had effected a drastic increase in the military budget, in conformity with military demands, and was contemplating a property tax. The witness was opposed to this, and was resolved to check the increase in the military budget. * He considered it most advisable to promote KAYA as Vice Minister to assist in combatting the military, for KAYA had toiled hard in the Finance Ministry to restrain military budgets.

The military budget approved by the witness' predecessor had already been submitted to the House of Representatives, and as he assumed office while the Diet was in session they had to withdraw it and present it again with all speed after revising it. This was difficult, as the military considered the original budget a fait accompli, and they were all-powerful in political affairs. Also, the time allowed for conducting negotiations with the military for a cut was extremely limited.

30555 * In spite of these difficulties, KAYA rendered every assistance and exerted his best efforts in negotiations with the military, and secured their agreement not to spend ¥46,000,000, which was a part of the previous increase. Although this cut was a mere fraction, it had a favorable effect in financial and economic circles, in that it served to give a sense of relief.

In June, 1937, the HAYASHI Cabinet resigned, and KONOYE received the Imperial command to form a new Cabinet. Fearing that the previous expansion policies might reassert themselves and convinced of the necessity of adhering to a strict economy, the witness recommended KAYA to KONOYE as Finance Minister.

Upon the death of the President of the North China Development Company in August, 1939, Premier HIRANUMA consulted the witness as to his successor. * The witness recommended KAYA, as he thought him best fitted, in view of the necessity of good economic collaboration with China.

During a tour of Manchuria, the witness learned of KAYA's assumption of the Finance Portfolio in the TOJO Cabinet. At that time the witness was President of the Bank of Japan. When he returned to Tokyo he saw KAYA, who told him that his profoundest concern when he was asked by TOJO to join the Cabinet was his policy toward the U. S. - Japanese problem. TOJO assured KAYA that he would use his best endeavors to carry on the Japanese-U.S. parley to a peaceful settlement. Being assured of this, KAYA said he consented to enter the Cabinet. It was true that since the formation of the Cabinet, TOJO and others at that time did their best to bring the parley to a peaceful end, but there was a danger in relations between the two becoming grave. KAYA told the witness that he was distressed at this. * The witness sympathized with KAYA over his difficult position, and encouraged him to redouble his efforts toward an amicable settlement. KAYA was a financial administrator, pure and simple, and he had never heard of his affiliation with any political party, rightist or leftist group or the militarists.

30558

* A survey of the financial situation in 1937 showed that Japan was beset with instability of the international trade balance, insecurity of the yen exchange, inflation due to the sharp increase of the national budget set up by Finance Minister BABA in the fall of 1936. When the witness became Finance Minister in February, 1937, he endeavored, with KAYA's assistance, to remedy this. In June, KAYA became Minister, but due to the outbreak of the China Incident the feeling of uneasiness in economic circles aggravated. Difficult problems cropped up one after another. The China Incident spread, and everything came to assume a war-time aspect. Some so-called reformists impatiently demanded a drastic reform, calling for the nationalization of financial organs, thorough-going control of the economy, etc.

* At this time the Temporary Funds Adjustment Law was enacted. KAYA, who framed it, told the witness that its real aim, though it could not be publicly revealed, was to avert an economic disturbance. KAYA's policy in enforcing the law was to allow the widest latitude for private adjustment of funds, and the major portion of routine work was relegated to the Bank of Japan.

The decisions of whether to give permission to investment or loans were made at a meeting of a committee formed of members from government offices and the Bank. Inasmuch as the criteria by which such decisions were to be made consisted in whether the industry for which the fund was required was essential in the emergency and whether there was a prospect of materials being obtainable, the military and the Ministry of Commerce and Industry and other government departments directly connected with the allocation of materials had the greatest say in making decisions, while the Finance Ministry had little authority. * Both the Finance Ministry and the Bank merely procured the funds needed. The Ministry placed a limit on the amount to be newly invested or loaned, planning to keep the total funds approved within the limit thus defined, and cooperated with the Bank to attain this. By this means, the over-supply of industrial funds and its becoming a major cause of inflation was prevented.

As it was pressing to remove uneasiness over the balance of international trade, the government tried to tighten control over foreign exchange. It was difficult to find a reasonable criteria to judge the propriety of applications for import bills, placing the government in a difficult position. To maintain an orderly economy, KAYA tried to adjust capital investments, ease credit, check the interest rate, stabilize the security market, and * keep open the stock exchange and ease the anxiety in financial circles.

In 1937 there was a fairly acute financial stringency, but in 1938 currency circulation increased, necessitating measures against inflation, and in April the government launched a National Savings Campaign. A National Savings Encouragement Bureau was inaugurated and a Committee was formed. The drive appealed to the consciousness of the people, inducing them to make voluntary savings. The fact that this movement depended on voluntary action contrasted with many wartime measures. This was characteristic of KAYA's policy, and another instance could be found in the Fund Adjustment Law. This moderateness characterized KAYA's policy and gave dissatisfaction to radical elements, such as ultra-extremists, etc.

* In August, 1937, the Gold Reserve re-valuation Law was enacted, whereby the value of pure gold was set at ¥1.00 per 290 milligrams. Up to this time the value was ¥1.00 per 750 milligrams, but in actual transactions the exchange was nailed at 1/2d per yen. Since this was the real value of the yen, the valuation specified by the Valuation Law could be said to have legally established the value that had prevailed.

About 1941 there was a good bond consumption, while currency circulation was not so swelled, prices were not so high, and there was no sign of vicious inflation. * At that time, since Japan had been divorced from the gold standard for several years and had a virtual controlled currency system working without trouble, the rate of gold reserve against currency issued lost its weight and gold came to count for less. This caused a great difficulty in foreign trade, and it became almost impossible to trade with Europe and America after the second half of 1941.

He was connected with the Tokyo Bankers' Association, the Tokyo Clearing House, the Clearing House Federation, the National Financial Association, as president or director, and was also a member of the House of Peers.

* In March, 1942, the Dai-ichi Bank and the Dai-ni Bank were merged into the Tokai Bank and he became Chairman of the Board of Directors. In March, 1944, he became advisor to the Law. The Extraordinary Fund Adjustment Law was put into force in September, 1937. Its aim being to limit the accommodation of fund only to indispensable enterprises for which the supply of materials required was assured, and to prevent inflation. Due to the China Incident, there had been large-scale bond floatation, and an increased call for funds for production expansion. The situation would have led to the wastage in fund with eventual inflation, but the Law did prevent inflation. In enforcing it, KAYA complied with the requests of private business to be allowed free individual activities and the financiers' autonomous adjustment was recognized. * It was also set up to mandate most administration of the Law to the Bank of Japan, instead of the Finance Ministry. The decision on investment or loan application was left to a committee selected from different Ministries and the Bank of Japan and the Industrial Bank. Approval or nonapproval on investment or loan was based on whether the enterprise was indispensable to the China Incident, or whether there was any prospect of a material supply required for the expansion of facilities or new establishments. To obtain Military circles' understanding, or the Commerce, or Industry was a prerequisite to making the decision. The measure weakened the Finance Ministry's voice, putting the Financiers in a position subsidiary to industry, and reduced the Ministry to a mere money raising machinery. The most conspicuous feature of Japanese economy since the Incident was that material had become the master and finance secondary.

* To finance the Incident, bond floatation was enormous and huge Government disbursements poured into the home market causing currency expansion and a fear of inflation. Though the money market had been stringent throughout 1937, currency became abundant in 1938, and about April, 1938, the Government issued a statement that it would start a savings campaign. The Savings Encouragement Bureau and the National Savings Encouragement Committee was set up in the Finance Ministry. The outstanding feature of the campaign was that it looked to the nation's self-awakening to the necessity of savings rather than compulsion. Legislative measures taken later were only auxiliary, the fundamental principle was based on spontaneous cooperation. This was unique among Japan's wartime measures and was owed to KAYA, who had always opposed compulsory savings. His method was not KAYA stressed that it was not to force on the people what was not understood by them and his policies were moderate and noncoersive. He was branded a liberal and his policies in 1937 were clearly manifested, his way being to avoid radical reformatory measures. The military and rightists dominating Japan were thus dissatisfied with him.

KAYA became Vice Finance Minister in February, 1937, and Finance Minister the following June. * Both KAYA and Commerce and Industry Minister YOSHINO were for the first time Ministers and many doubted whether they would be able to dispose of radical demands and proceed with a moderate policy. During the London Conference on Naval disarmament in 1930 he was appointed an aide to WAKATSUKI, the Japanese Delegate. KAYA was also an aide. The Finance Ministry's aides insisted that the conference should be brought to a success, while the Naval aides took the stand that Japan should not mind to break off the conference if her original proposition did not prevail, * and there were occasional impassioned controversies, KAYA firmly upheld the Finance Ministry's position and exerted himself to the utmost bringing pressure on the die-hard Navy opinions. It was fully recognized that behind the screen the conference owed its success in large measure to his efforts. When the witness was Vice Finance Minister in the OKADA Cabinet, KAYA was Chief of the Accounts Bureau and strove hard to curb the military budget. At the insistence of KAYA and others, Finance Minister TAKAHASHI, in compiling the 1936 budget, fixed a policy of gradual reduction in loan funds and proclaimed it to the public. *The major objective was to curb demands for increased military expenditures. The military every year put in demands for increased funds which could not be considered to maintain sound finance, since there was a policy of clamping down on them by tightening the limit to bond floatation. The Army and Navy were furiously opposed to this for it blocked the main source of revenue to satisfy their demands. After heated arguments and all-night Cabinet discussions, this policy was finally carried through.

In the February, 26th Incident, TAKAHASHI and other high officials were assassinated. Well informed quarters saw that the uncompromising stand of Finance Ministry officials with KAYA as its champion did much toward the outbreak of the Incident.

30580 The HIROTA Cabinet failed in February, 1937, and was succeeded by the HAYASHI Cabinet with YUKI as Minister and KAYA, Vice-Minister. They strove to curtail the BABA budget. * The HAYASHI Cabinet went out in June, 1937, and the first KONOYE Cabinet came in with KAYA as Finance Minister. In July the China Incident began and demands for increased military expenditures and expansion of production became intensified, and the financial circle became uneasy. KAYA racked his brains to keep finances in order through maintaining exchange rates, controlling the supply of industrial funds, etc. The plight was such that whoever might be Financial Minister would be required to do the utmost of his power to maintain order, leaving no room for preparations in economics and public finance for a future war of aggression. When he was Parliamentary Vice-Minister of the Navy, from 1927 to 1929, he often heard from Naval Minister officers that they were extremely annoyed with the opposition to the Navy's demand for an increase in the Navy budget by KAYA. When the witness was Railway Minister, KAYA, who was then Chief of the Accounts Bureau, strenuously endeavored to check the increase in the military budget, leading to a disagreement with War Ministry. At a Cabinet meeting in November, 1934, there was a heated debate and Finance Minister FUJII had to quit his seat and KAYA became the chief negotiator. He firmly opposed Army demands and, as a result, threatened a political crisis. He asked the War Minister to make a concession, fearing that the downfall of the UCHIDA Cabinet would be replaced by the rightist group. * The witness persuaded the War Minister, KAWASHINA, to make a concession by reducing demands and the burden on the general account was lightened by applying fifteen million yen out of the Railway Special Accounts to the Sinking Fund, and adding other amounts to this from other special accounts. By special expenditures the 1935 budget was completed.

30587 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 3326 as his 30588 affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was an Inspector Major General and had served in the Intendent Bureau of the Army from April 1933 to April 1937. During this time he was in charge of the completion of the Army's budget and discussions concerning it with the Finance Ministry. He was well acquainted with the accused, KAYA, who, during this time, was an official in the Accounts Bureau in charge of military budgets. He was Chief of the Budget and Settled Accounts Section of the Accounts Bureau from April, 1932, to 1936. During that time it was the witness's duty to present summarized budget estimates to the Finance Ministry to obtain approval. Army budgets were then continuously increasing. In connection with them, the attitude of the Finance Ministry, and particularly of KAYA, was very critical of Army demands and they were opposed to granting Army budgetary requests.

30589 * KAYA based his opposition on the ground that if Army requests were granted, it would be contrary to sound finance and they must not be permitted to exceed the limit of the state finance plan. This action of KAYA's was criticized by Army officers as anti-militaristic and infringing on the prerogative of the High Command. When the Army budget for 1936 was under preparation, there was an appropriation for completion of national defense which had been approved by the Diet as a continued ten-year expenditure. After the Manchurian Affair, the Army hurriedly completed its defense plan and requested this appropriation be revised as to each year's allotment and to shorten the previously scheduled ten-year period.

30590 * Finance Ministry officers led by KAYA insisted that they could not comply with the Army request. Negotiations failed and the problem was shifted to a Cabinet conference. Such instances were believed to provoke the young officers and were important factors in generating the February 26 Incident in which TAKAHASHI was assassinated. His policies were supported by KAYA and he too became an object of bitter Army opposition. In either 1933 or 1934 fiscal year, the witness accompanied Chief

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF TAMEMOTO, Hiroatsu
by Mr. Levin

30592
30594

* The witness identified exhibit 3327 as his affidavit and after correction verified it. * The affidavit stated that the witness believed KAYA was Chief of the budget drafting and Accounts-Settling Section of the Accounts Bureau from 1932 to 1934 and was Chief of the Bureau from 1934 to 1936. From 1932 to 1935 the witness served in the Accounts Bureau of the Naval office, which was concerned with the Navy budget, and had frequent contact with the Finance Ministry and became well acquainted with KAYA.

30595

* During this period, while there was considerable demand for the redemption of bonds and reestablishment of sound finance and for disarmament, there was also formidable support for establishing self-supply and self-sufficiency for national security. The period was marked by a steady increase of the Naval budget due to a Navy desire to increase its strength and because of the rise of prices. During this time KAYA advocated maintaining peaceful relations with other nations, preventing a rise in armaments, and establishing sound finance. The Navy office insisted that KAYA was excessively strict in assessing the budget. He recalled that after negotiations with KAYA that he had to yield to his insistence and consent to budget reduction by 20% to 40%, varying with the circumstances.

* During this time he recalled KAYA vigorously expressed the view that national defense without financial security was sheer nonsense and no armament supported by a starving nation could be of any service. With the adoption of the expansionist financial policy of Finance Minister BABA, from March 1936 to February 1937, it was understood that KAYA retired from the Accounts Bureau due to sharp differences with BABA. There was no cross-examination of the witness.

• Exhibit 3328. The affidavit of TOYODA, Teijiro, stated • that the affiant was a delegate to the Geneva Naval Conference of 1927 and the London Naval Conference of 1930, and was Commerce and Industry Minister in the Second KONOYE Cabinet. KAYA was present at both naval conferences and insisted on the necessity of naval limitation and asserted himself toward the conferences' success. When KAYA arrived in Tokyo from Peking in early October, 1941, when he was President of the North China Development Company, he called on the affiant and requested him to make every effort to maintain peace with the United States.

• Exhibit 3329. The affidavit of KOBAYASHI, Seizo, stated that, among other positions, he had been Navy Vice-Minister, Governor-General of Taiwan in 1936, and a State Minister without Portfolio from December, 1944, to March, 1945.

30600

• He was a delegate to the Geneva Naval Conference of 1927 as a chief attendant from the Navy, and KAYA worked out many figures to show that after the disarmament treaty was concluded, Navy expenditures would be cut down. The purpose was to encourage the delegation to raise an agreement on Naval limitations. He made clear how effective and important the treaty was for lightening the treasury burden. The witness was Chief of the Navy Affairs Bureau from December, 1929, to March, 1927, and Chief of the Naval Technical Department from February, 1929, to June, 1930, and Vice Navy Minister from June, 1930, to November, 1931. During this time he negotiated with Finance Ministry officials.

30601

• KAYA gave careful attention to the War and Navy budgets and ascertained every effort to cut them or check their increase.

30602

• In May, 1938, when the affiant was Governor-General of Formosa, he called on KAYA, the then Finance Minister, to talk on the Formosa budget. KAYA told the affiant that he was going to resign the next day. The affiant asked him why and he answered that when the China Incident broke out, the Government decided on a policy of nonexpansion. In compliance with this, KAYA said he tried to minimize military appropriations and had taken only emergency measures to cover them. Contrary to their wishes, the Incident spread with an increase in military appropriations.

• It would become inevitable to impose a heavy burden on the people and this was unbearable to him. As the Incident spread, dissatisfaction with him seemed to grow so he made up his mind to resign.

On 18 October 1941 the TOJO Cabinet was formed with KAYA as Finance Minister. The following day the affiant had a talk with KAYA and asked him how he came to enter the TOJO Cabinet. KAYA replied that if the TOJO Cabinet was all out for war he would not have accepted a seat. Since that was a matter of utmost concern, KAYA said he questioned TOJO about this. He answered that United States-Japanese negotiations would be continued and he was resolved to arrive at an understanding. KAYA, during this conversation, expressed the desire to bring the negotiations to a peaceful conclusion by all means.

30605 * Exhibit 3330, the affidavit of GOTO, Takanosuke, stated that he participated and was manager of the Japanese Federation of Young Men's Association, established with socialistic thinking people the Showa Research Society and engaged in research in political, economic and cultural problems.

30607 The affiant had known KAYA for a long time and had a real knowledge of his character and business life. KAYA's career had been that of a public official in the field of finance. He had no association with the military Rightist or Leftist * and was recognized as a distinguished financial expert and not as a political figure. KAYA never sought high position. The affiant also knew KONOYE very well and they exchanged views on political affairs. In June 1937 when KONOYE was forming his Cabinet, the affiant knew that he recommended KODAMA as the first candidate for Finance Minister, but KODAMA refused and KONOYE's thoughts turned to selecting KAYA, whom the affiant strongly recommended.

30608 While KONOYE recognized KAYA's abilities as Finance Administrator, he was aware that KAYA was not well considered in military circles because of persistent objections to increases in military budgets. Therefore, he was hesitant in naming KAYA, but since he failed to locate any other he deemed suitable, and because he wanted freshness in his new Cabinet, he recommended KAYA. The affiant heard this personally from KONOYE.

In May 1938 when the first KONOYE Cabinet reorganized as had been anticipated, KAYA resigned due to Army opposition. KAYA asked the affiant to request KAYA's resignation and he did so, and KAYA resigned, being replaced with IKEDA.

- 30609 * Toward the advent of 1941, there was grave concern over U.S.-Japanese relations. Both KAYA and the affiant exchanged views on this crucial matter. The witness was surprised and felt some displeasure when KAYA became Finance Minister in the TOJO Cabinet as TOJO was regarded as holding the strongest attitude toward the U.S. KIDO explained to the affiant that TOJO had no mind to start a war with the U.S. but would faithfully follow the Emperor's wishes of amicably settling the issue and was trying his best in conducting the negotiations. The affiant felt he had misunderstood KAYA's affiliation with the TOJO Cabinet and called upon him. KAYA told the affiant * that he would not have joined the Cabinet if it had already decided to make war. He had asked TOJO about this and he told him he wanted to continue negotiations and settle the issue by diplomacy. So, KAYA said he accepted the post. This dissipated the affiant's concept of KAYA's mind.
- 30610
- 30611 Exhibit 3331, the affidavit of YAMAMOTO, Kuraichi, stated that as he had before testified * he always attended the sessions of the Liaison Conference at the time of the TOJO Cabinet. KAYA attended these sessions but never played a leading roll in the discussions which centered mostly around U.S.-Japanese negotiations. Although the members of the conference were unanimous that utmost effort be made toward the success of the negotiations, opinions crossed on the policy to be taken in case of failure. KAYA directed his energy toward avoiding war, repeatedly advancing a thorough study on peaceful means to solve the difficulties which might arise from a failure in the negotiations.
- 30612 At the session of 1 November 1941, when it was discussed whether they should be resolved to take arms against the U.S. * if the U.S. would not accept either form of concessions in the so-called A & B Formulas, KAYA proposed a study on the possibility of solving the oil problem by importing it from North Saghalien or purchasing the territory itself. It was certain that if the negotiations failed they would be cut from oil supplies from either the U.S. or N.E.I. This would be a fatal blow and threaten to become a major inducement toward war. It was of the Page greatest concern whether there could be any means to solve peacefully the oil problem. KAYA's proposal could not obtain approval as "lacking in practicality," which was the ground also for rejecting his synthetic oil project.

30613 * The High Command's opinion was that Japan was threatened with an economic and military menace by the allies. If left alone, the nation's existence would be threatened. Unless the negotiations were concluded through December, defensive power on the western Pacific would become inferior to that of the allies. If they were attacked by the U.S. or forced to a war for existence, the High Command would be in no position to be held responsible for defense. The High Command's opinion was that it was imperative to make up their mind that if there was no prospect of success for the negotiations at the end of November, they would make their final resolution toward the U.S. and begin military operations at once. However, they should continue efforts for the success of the negotiations and if this was assured, operational preparations should be stopped. KAYA, however, contended that it was a grave matter that a situation might arise when the High Command said they could not be responsible for national defense.

30614 KAYA contended that it should not be lightly done * that they make a final resolution toward the U.S. even if all promise of success for the negotiations was lost. They must consider the incomparable misery of a war. The Japanese had already experienced considerable hardships since the outbreak of the China war. Moreover, there was no assurance of victory, in the opinion of the Naval High Command, if the war lasted over two years. There was danger of losing both the fruits and root if they lost the war and it must be avoided by some means. KAYA contended he could not forthrightly agree to the war plan and wanted it considered more carefully. Foreign Minister TOGO also insisted upon the necessity of careful reconsideration. The High Command insisted that unless they started on preparing for military operations at once, if they were driven to the worst, it would be impossible to fight, even if forced to do so at the end of November when all prospect of success might vanish for the negotiations. Otherwise, they must make up their mind on a final resolution or otherwise the High Command could not assume responsibility.

* KAYA and TOGO reserved their approval or disapproval, saying they wanted at least one more day's deliberation. At that, Chief of Staff SUGIYAMA manifested his dissatisfaction, saying it was regrettable that they hesitated. Under such circumstances, the High Command could not be responsible for naval defense. But both KAYA and TOGO would not withdraw their reservation.

The affiant did not remember whether KAYA was present at the Liaison Conference in December 1941 prior to the outbreak of the war.

* Exhibit 3332, an excerpt from the KIDO Diary, dated 2 November 1941, stated that the Premier telephoned KIDO stating that the Liaison Conference had adjourned as Foreign Minister TOGO and Finance Minister KAYA had requested for more time until 11:00 a.m. that day to seriously consider the matter as it was of great importance. The matter would be decided when their replies were received.

30618

* In Exhibit 3333, excerpts from the MUTO Interrogatory of 15 April 1946, MUTO was asked to give the names of those at the Liaison Conference who supported the view that Japan must wage war with the U.S. and those against the war. MUTO replied that he could not point out who were for or against, but after the message from the U.S. the majority became very pessimistic. He still remembered that at that conference, the decision was that Japan should take further steps to try to negotiate without going to war. Besides others, the two he remembered well who made that proposal were TOGO and KAYA, who were strong to continue negotiations.

A voluntary statement of MUTO said that when he had been asked earlier * who was particularly interested in carrying on peaceful negotiations, he had given the names of TOGO and KAYA. He believed they felt this way about the time the note from U.S. was handed to the Japanese Ambassador in Washington. After thinking about it, he thought the dates were wrong and these men were particularly interested in negotiations around the end of October or early November, and not later as he had previously said.

Page 30620 Exhibit 3334, the affidavit of KAWAGOE, Takeo, stated that he was Chief of the Budget Section and the Budget Drafting and Account Settling Section of the Accounts Bureau between 1924 and November 1932 and was later Chief of the Deposit Department and of the Bank Bureau. He was Finance Vice-Minister from March 1936 to February 1937 and had good knowledge of the post KAYA held in the Ministry and the scope of his authority. Just before KAYA's return to Japan from the London Disarmament Conference in March 1930, he was appointed Chief of the Accounting Section, remaining there until November 1932. The function of the Chief of the Accounting Section related to financial laws and regulations.

30621. At that time Accounts Bureau officials were in charge in the scrutiny of budgets presented by government offices. * KAYA was concurrently entrusted by the affiant with examining the Education Ministry budget. The man in charge of examining War and Navy Ministry budgets was ARAKAWA, and KAYA had nothing to do with the War Ministry's budgets for the years 1931 and 1932. KAYA was also particularly in charge of budgetary affairs on items readjusted after the Disarmament Agreement and on reductions of taxes made possible thereby. This was because of the knowledge he possessed as a member of the delegation to the Conference. This was only for the year 1930. KAYA was Chief of the Budget Drafting and Account Settling Section in November 1932 and became Chief of the Accountants Bureau in May 1934. From then until May 1936, when he was transferred to Chief of the Finance Bureau * he was continuously in charge of examining the budgets of government offices, including the War and Naval Ministries. The official in such post does his work in accordance with instructions of the Finance Minister and under the administrative system the subordinate is not held responsible to outsiders for his work done in conformity with orders.

About 1934 there was no official title corresponding to the so-called "Chief Secretary" in English in the Finance Ministry.

KAYA was very faithful in his duties and endeavored to place finance on a sound basis by preventing budget increase and always followed the Finance Minister's policies and other superiors. He

Exhibit 3335, the affidavit of KAMEYAMA, Koichi, stated *that he had held many public offices in the Welfare Ministry and elsewhere and was secretary of the Opium Committee from 21 September 1932 to 15 October 1937. The Opium Committee was established by an Imperial Ordinance of 31 November 1931. It was merely a consulting organ and the Committee was under the Home Minister and later the Welfare Minister and was authorized to investigate and consider matters relating to opium and narcotics in response to the request of the ministries concerned, and make recommendations to them. The Home Minister and later the Welfare Minister were the Chairman of the Committee and its members, not exceeding thirty, were appointed by the Cabinet on recommendation of the Minister from among the high civil service officials. * It was the custom for the ministries' Vice-Minister to sit on the Committee. Accordingly, when KAYA became Finance Vice-Minister on 2 February 1937, he was thereupon appointed to the Opium Committee on 1 March 1937. The principal objective of including the Finance Ministry among the government officials was to ensure the cooperation of the Customs House in preventing smuggling trade in opium and narcotics.

On 4 June 1937, when KAYA became Finance Minister, ISHIWATA became Vice-Minister and was appointed to the Opium Committee. Though no government notice terminated KAYA's membership, it was understood that leaving the Vice-Ministership automatically ended it. The Opium Committee held its 9th and 10th sessions on 30 November 1936 and 15 June 1937. There was no session during KAYA's membership in the Committee * and there was no recommendation made by the Committee to the Home Minister during that period.

30627

* In Exhibit 3336, excerpts from the Interrogation of TOJO on 7 February 1946, TOJO answered in response to a question that under the Japanese Constitution the Army and Navy Chiefs-of-Staff were responsible solely to the Emperor in matters of war. The Ministers of State were responsible to the Emperor for other governmental functions and had no right to interfere with the conduct of military affairs. It was the Chiefs of Staff the right to interfere in civil matters. * It was the responsibility of the Chiefs of Staff to advise the Emperor on the probable benefits or ill effects of war. There were two spheres of military command and civil government overlapped. This area included matters such as foreign policy and decisions to go to war, which problems were taken up by the Liaison Conferences. Strategic war plans were purely strategy and not known to Cabinet members and he did not know them himself in his role as Premier. He was also a member of Imperial Headquarters and War Councilor and as such received military reports on operations plans which were forwarded by the Chief of Staff. By war plan, he meant an army plan and not a navy plan. * The fact he received reports did not mean he could interfere or participate in matters involving command for these were the sole prerogative of the Chiefs of Staff.

In the 13 March 1946 Interrogation, TOJO stated that at first the government policy in regard to the China Incident was localization, but due to the independence of the High Command, the fighting kept spreading and the Premier KONCYE had a terrible time.

The responsibility of the Premier, Foreign, War and Navy Ministers and President of the Planning Board, together with the Chiefs of Staff for advising the Emperor through the Liaison and Imperial Conferences was of tremendous importance. The government policy was of non-enlargement of the China Incident, but because the civil government had no authority over the Supreme Command, the fighting was enlarged and the civil government was powerless.

* TOJO was asked how this system worked in regard to Southern Indo-China in 1941. He replied

0162 0003 4836

NARRATIVE SUMMARY OF THE RECORD

Page that at that time U.S. negotiations were underway and on the other hand Headquarters kept moving troops and supplies from Formosa to Southern China and Northern Indo-China. Because the movement of troops and supplies was the sole province of the Supreme Command, the civil government could say nothing. It was different with regard to Southern Indo-China for their troops were moved on the basis of a joint defense agreement and it could not be done by the Supreme Command alone. Troops could be moved from Central China into Southern China and into North F.I.C. at the convenience of the Supreme Command.

30631 * A similar situation existed in the Navy. In the Interrogation of 19 March 1946, TOJO said that it might be said that the Four and Five-Minister Conference, the Liaison Conferences and those for the Supreme Direction of the War and of the Imperial Headquarters were four stages of attempt to solve this problem of over-lapping authority. With regard to the over-lapping spheres, there was some success but the Cabinet's political forces could not control the entire command sphere of authority of the Supreme Command.

A good point of the independence of the Supreme Command was that it could conduct operations without political interference, but in these days when the influence of a single action was felt around the world, a certain amount of control by the political authority is necessary, but under the Japanese system it was impossible.

30632 * He had been talking about the problems of the government system and the Supreme Command's independence but he was responsible for the problems arising from the Supreme Command's actions. When it was suggested to TOJO that the independence of the Supreme Command was good from a military but not from a political or civil standpoint, he answered that it is good from a military point of view only if fighting were the only thing to be considered, but fighting was only a part of politics. From the political view, the independence of the Supreme Command required consideration. The independence of the Supreme Command was a big cause for the position in which Japan found herself today.

30633 * The accused identified exhibit 3337 as his 30634 affidavit, and after a correction verified it. * The affidavit stated that the accused was born in 1889, and after graduation from Tokyo Imperial University in 1917 30635 * he entered the Finance Ministry, becoming a civil servant. Subsequently he was a secretary to the Japanese Financial Commissioner in New York City in 1918, and was in the Accounts Bureau in 1920; went to the Geneva Disarmament Conference in 1927 and to the London Naval Conference of 1929, as an attendant to the Plenipotentiary WAKATSUKI. In March, 1930, he became secretary to the Finance Minister and Section Chief of the Accounts Bureau.
In November, 1932, he was Chief of the Budget and Settlement Section, and in May 1934 Chief of the Accounts Bureau. He became Chief of the Finance Bureau in May, 1936, and Vice Minister of Finance on 2 February, 1937. He was Minister of Finance from 4 June 1937 to 26 May 1938, when he resigned. In August, 1939, he was appointed President of 30636 the North China Development Company, and resigned on 18
October 1941 to become Finance Minister, from which post he resigned on 19 February 1944.

Except for the two years he served as President of the Development Company, his entire career was as an official of the Finance Ministry, devoted to administration.
The goal of his endeavor was a healthy national finance.
The affidavit stated that the accused had no connection with a rightist, leftist, or military clique, nor was he a member of any political party. For a short period after August, 1934, KAYA joined the IRPAA, but did not know whether it could be called a political party.

In the Ministry, much of his time was spent in the study and evaluation of military and civil budgets, and he constantly tried to slash military budgets and prevent them from increasing. Prevailing conditions made this task difficult, but he believed he succeeded in suppressing their growth.

30637 * At the Geneva and London Conferences, he exerted himself toward their successful conclusion. His effort to suppress military budgets and to conclude disarmament conferences were due to his superior's instructions and to his personal desire to maintain a healthy finance, lessen the burdens of the people, and increase hopes for peace.

* As to counts 1 to 5 of the Indictment, to which he was charged, even if the conspiracy and planning of an aggressive war did take place, he was not a party to them and had no connection. As to the Counts from 6 to 36 with which he was charged, of those referring to the Manchurian Incident, his record indicated that prior to the Incident and for some time thereafter he was no more than a Section Chief and had no connection with it. From December 1929 to November 1932, he was not even concerned with military budgets, and after those dates he was concerned with military budgets and exerted efforts to reduce them. Demands for military budgets increased greatly after November 1932, and KAYA vehemently opposed the increased demands and fought to keep them down.

He had no connection with any plan for aggression against FIC or the Soviet. * From 26 May 1938 to 18 October, 1941, he had no connection with the Cabinet nor the Tripartite Pact. He became Finance Minister on 4 June, 1937, and knew nothing about the Lukouchiao Incident before its outbreak, nor had the Cabinet any plans in preparation for it. After the Incident, the report was that hostilities broke out due to an illegal attack by the Chinese. The Cabinet decided to regard the Incident as local and settle it on the spot. It opposed sending troops from Japan, but if that became inevitable it would be limited to a small number. The sending or increase in troops was due to the army report that continued illegal attacks by Chinese and to massing their forces in the area, so when the army requested an increase to protect Japanese lives and interests the Cabinet could not help but give its assent, * and its motive in doing so was to protect the small Japanese force there.

He opposed especially sending troops to Shanghai, for he believed it would spread the Incident. He asked for reconsideration, to no avail, for the other Cabinet members thought it necessary. On every occasion, he tried to limit the budgets required for sending troops. The Cabinet was staunch in its policy to refrain from infringing on third power's rights.

The civil members of the Cabinet were not informed beforehand, nor consulted about battle plans, and they viewed with anxiety the spread of hostilities. The civilian members were not consulted about the Nanking attack, and received no report about alleged atrocities, nor read anything about them in the press. He did not know such things had been committed.

* He resigned as Finance Minister in May, 1938, before hostilities spread to Hankow and Canton. His resignation was requested by KONOYE, and he was happy to be relieved.

The arbitrary confiscation of Chinese enterprises, etc., in North China were made by the military for operation purposes, and the Cabinet had no connection. Although the prosecution had charged that when he was Vice Minister of Finance from February to June, 1937, the Five Year Plan for Steel and a Third Plan for North China were adopted, he knew nothing about them, nor did he know about or was he a party to the Army Five Year Plan for Heavy Industries when he was Finance Minister from June 1937 to May 1938.

* Prior to becoming Finance Minister, financial circles were uncertain, and he felt a difficult responsibility when he assumed the post. The outbreak of the China Incident increased unrest, and during his tenure there was no room for preparing for a future war. The Cabinet had its hands full with the China Incident and did not think about another war.

He was President of the North China Development Company from August 1939 to October, 1941. The Company was established in November 1938, in accordance with laws passed by the Diet, which set out its purpose and object. It aimed for economic cooperation with China, and was not established to infringe upon third powers' economic interests, but desired their participation in the economic development. The Company did not infringe upon Chinese rights, nor made any preparation toward war, nor received Cabinet instructions to that effect. The Company was not permitted to engage in industry, but served as a financial organ, and its activity was confined to investments and loans. It had no power to mobilize material wealth, nor engage in such work. In making loans or investments, the Company was limited by law, and could make them only to utility industries, small manufacturing enterprises, and in the wholesale of coal. It was not concerned with the spinning, tobacco, and milling industries, nor in general trade, agriculture, banking, or insurance.

* Investments and loans were generally made in Sino-Japanese joint stock companies, and other companies besides the Development Company also made investments. The Company did not exercise a monopoly over investments.

* It had no arbitrary rights, and no more power than any ordinary company. It aimed to adjust economic activities in North China. It had no control over the economy. Loans and investments were subject to contracts under which the company obtaining financial aid was required to obtain the Company's approval in certain matters to avoid over-investment or unwarranted expansion to bring about a sound economy in North China. The Company had no rights over any industry except those in which it had a financial interest. Even these rights were limited by contract.

All major acts of the Company were made at the instruction and approval of the China Affairs Board, and it was prohibited from taking any action on its own. The Company's accounts were mostly in the red, and government subsidies were required to pay stockholders dividends, of not more than six per cent per annum. Most of the affiliated companies were either in the red or made little profit. * Japanese stockholders were not given special favors in the payment of dividends.

All funds invested by the Company in North China were raised in Japan, and it received no property or special rights from the North China Political Council, nor was any monopolistic right granted to anyone by the Company, for it had no power to do so. The investments and loans handled were not large, and were small compared to those in Japan and Manchuria.

The Company received no instructions from the government, nor on its own did it attempt to expand the production of the affiliated companies, with 1941 or thereabouts as its goal. While the affiliated companies production increased, the Development Company looked forward towards long-range development. It endeavored toward a solid expansion of the industries it was concerned with, and as an instance, the Tatung Coal Mines was producing ten thousand tons of coal per day when the accused resigned.

* He thought of plans for the people's welfare, but could not carry them out due to disorder caused by fighting, but he was able to carry out one plan which did help the people. In early 1940 a famine swept the Peiping-Tientsin area, and he was told that importation of twenty million yen of wheat flour was necessary to tide over the crisis, but the North China Political Council and Government of North China did not have necessary foreign funds to buy the flour. Page pressed for foreign money, but he managed to obtain the help of the Vice-Minister of Finance OHNO. He next negotiated with the Communications Minister for transporting the flour, and although ship bottoms were short he succeeded in obtaining some and imported considerable amounts of flour into North China.

30648 In 1941 there were rumors that Japanese-U. S. relations were getting worse, * and since he had harbored a sincere hope for the maintenance of peace he felt bad. He did not know anything about the contents of the negotiations nor the policies decided on by the government.

On the night of 17 October 1941, TOJO telephoned the accused to join his Cabinet as Finance Minister. Before replying, he called on TOJO. To his query as to whether TOJO was decided on waging war against the U. S., TOJO replied in the negative, stating he intended to continue the negotiations and exert efforts toward an amicable settlement. The accused then told TOJO that there was a rumor that the Supreme Command and Cabinet did not always cooperate, that unless they reached a closer relationship it would be a stumbling block, and asked TOJO if he intended to do something.

30649 * TOJO replied that he fully understood the deep concern of KAYA and would work toward a closer relationship. KAYA told TOJO that there was a tendency to adopt reform policies. They should forget the ideology and adopt policies in keeping with the needs of the country. To this, TOJO agreed. The accused was quite satisfied with the interview, but left without replying.

The rumor at the time was that the army was especially pronounced in its attitude toward the U. S., and he was relieved to learn that TOJO planned to continue the negotiations. He felt he should join the Cabinet and do what he could, and he consented. Before joining the Cabinet, he had had no relations with TOJO, but had met him only once. * Even after joining, their contacts were solely official.

30650 He did everything in his power to avoid war after joining the Cabinet, realizing his goal should be the successful culmination of the negotiations, but the prevailing circumstances were mostly against settlement and he realized the necessity of working towards the prevention of war even if the negotiations were not settled.

The first cause for a possible war was the military pressure of Allied powers, and the second was economic pressure. The embargo on vital materials was a blow to Japan, and of all imported materials, oil was the most critical. Without oil, Japan could not maintain national defense. KAYA felt that even if oil imports from the U. S. and NEI should not be renewed due to the negotiations failure; if some other oil source could be found it could prevent war. He therefore suggested a plan for manufacturing synthetic oil and a plan to buy oil from North Karafuto, and if possible buy that territory.

* He realized the difficulty of his plans, but felt they must do everything possible to avoid war. However, his plans were turned down as impractical. He recalled that of the conditions in the negotiations, he was in favor of equal trade opportunity in all Pacific areas.

30652

At the Liaison Conference of 1 November 1941, a proposal for immediate war was brought up, but did not meet with favor. For the settlement of the negotiations, the "Yo" and "Otsu" plans were discussed. The conference was unanimous that Japan should give in as much as possible to settle the disputes, but the Supreme Command proposal plunged the conference into extreme difficulty. This proposal was that if by the end of November the negotiations showed no possibility of settlement, they should be ready to decide on war, and with that in mind commencing preparations now was needed. The Supreme Command stated that Japan faced a crisis due to military and economic pressures by the Allies. * If the negotiations remained unsettled and things went along as they were, Japan's defensive power in the western Pacific would decline in comparison with the Allies. They would reach a critical point, and if they were attacked after December or if there was a necessity of waging war in self-defense, Japan would be so weak that the Supreme Command could not accept responsibility for national defense. It stated that they must make up their minds to decide on war before the opportune moment was lost. With that in mind, they should decide on preparing for war.

According to this proposal, the failure of negotiations meant war. Discussions dragged on, but as for the accused it was his desire that they go along as it was, even if negotiations remained unsettled, but there was no way to bring this about. Since the Supreme Command was responsible for defense, it was not possible just to oppose this proposal.

* To give assent to the proposal meant making the possibility of war that much greater. He was in a difficult position and fully realized what suffering war would mean and they should avoid it if possible. Through experience he knew of the horrors of war. The China Incident had been going on for a long time and the people were feeling its effects. A war with the U. S. would greatly add to their sufferings.

30654

* The Supreme Command insisted that there was a chance for victory if war began at an opportune time, but the Navy Branch of the Supreme Command predicted that if the war dragged on for over two years its outcome would be uncertain. It was possible that the war might drag on for a long period, and if Japan should lose after a long war she would suffer more than if she had not gone to war at all. For this reason the accused felt he could not then give his assent to the Supreme Command's proposal, and insisted on further consideration, but the Supreme Command replied that the matter called for immediate decision; otherwise, it could not assume responsibility.

The accused argued against an immediate decision and was allowed to consider the matter for another day. TOGO made the same reservation. Returning home, the accused spent a restless night. A decision on the pending proposal was not a decision to wage war, but it meant it would be highly probable if the negotiations were not settled by the end of November. * He came to the conclusion that regardless of whether the issue was good or bad, circumstances did not permit him to stop it. If he opposed it he would have to resign, and if he resigned the effect would be unfavorable toward settling the negotiations and thus would aggravate the possibility of war.

The next morning TOJO telephoned twice for a reply. The accused believed that further delay would aggravate the issue, so he replied he was not opposed to the proposal, but sincerely hoped for an amicable settlement.

The Hull note of November 26 was a big blow to all. Japan could not accept its terms, and the Foreign Minister explained there was little room for U. S. reconsideration. The question was whether to commence hostilities or drift along with disputes unsettled. The Supreme Command believed that it could not accept responsibility for national defense if hostilities were not begun at once.

* If the U. S. showed the least compromising attitude there might be a way to continue the negotiations even by altering the "Ko" or "Otsu" plans, but the Hull note indicated settlement was not possible, and a decision to wage war in self defense was inevitable.

Japan was embarking on a perilous war, whether good or bad, and if he resigned the effect to the public would be great, as it would interpret the resignation to mean that financially, Japan was not in a position to fight successfully. When it comes to national defense, public feeling is especially important, and if the people lose confidence it would breed uncertainty and might cause defeat. He was against the war, but could not think of increasing Japan's dangers and felt it his duty to carry out his responsibility.

The decision for war was decided at the Imperial Conference of 1 December, 1941, but the hope for averting war, though dim, was not given up. He obtained at the Liaison Conference the Supreme Command's agreement that * war plans would be cancelled even after the outbreak of skirmishes if the negotiations reached a point where settlement was possible.

He didn't recall that the reply to the note of November 26 was ever discussed at any liaison or Cabinet meeting he attended. He thought the matter was competently handled by responsible officials. While the prosecution had charged that a declaration of war was discussed at the privy Council meeting of 8 December, 1941, such a declaration was discussed, but it was an Imperial Rescript on the declaration of war addressed to the people.

Operation plans were never discussed at liaison or Cabinet meetings. He was not consulted about the Pearl Harbor, or any other attack, nor was he ever informed about such attacks beforehand.

It was his sincere desire to avoid war, and he did everything to do so, but conditions against him were too strong and his assent for war was inevitable, but he firmly believed they were fighting a war in self-defense.

* As to the attack prior to formal notification in violation of international treaty, he did not know such a plan existed and could not have stopped it. Furthermore, the government had no such plans.

He had no connection with atrocities and acts in violation of the rules of land warfare. The Supreme Command was an independent organ, and civilian Cabinet members were not informed beforehand or consulted on plans and preparations for battles. Civilian Cabinet members had no power to stop or command a battle, and had no voice in choice of commanders. He, at least, was not even informed of the atrocities, officially or otherwise, and they were not mentioned in the press, nor was he informed about foreign protests, and he was of the impression the war was fairly fought.

As to the treatment of POWs, he was not informed, nor consulted at Cabinet meetings or elsewhere, nor knew of foreign protests. * He did not even dream of the ill-treatment dealt POWs, nor hear rumors that they were ill-treated, and the press and radio made no mention of it.

30660

He resigned from the TOJO Cabinet on 19 February, 1944, at TOJO's request. By 1945 it became clear that Japan was facing defeat. The sufferings of the people were extremely painful, and he felt his political responsibility to them. On 11 August, he learned that the government had decided to accept the Potsdam Declaration. Feeling his political responsibility, he made up his mind to resign all marks of honor the Emperor had conferred on him and become a plain citizen. As a private citizen he felt he should do everything he could for the people, * and if circumstances permitted, to do his part to prevent a bad inflation after the war.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. BRANNON, Counsel for OKA and SHIMADA.

The accused stated that by the Supreme Command he meant the General Headquarters, consisting of the Army and Navy General Staff, and he referred to the Chief of Staff and his subordinates, but he did not include the Navy Minister.

He heard from Chief of the Naval Staff NAGANO at the Liaison Conference of 1 November 1941, that the Navy predicted that a war dragging on for over two years would have an uncertain outcome. He had no recollection of ever hearing at any Liaison Conference he attended, that any member of the Navy advocated an attack without first giving a notice of war.

30662 * The accused was asked if between 26 May 1938 and October 18, 1941, he held certain named posts. He stated that with regard to the membership in these various committees he believed he was a member of them, but membership did not mean he was an official of the government.

30663 * He resigned from the first KONOYE Cabinet on 26 May, 1938, because he was requested by Premier KONOYE to resign, and he had desired to resign even before that. KONOYE told him that he wanted to carry out a Cabinet reorganization, and that the accused was not on particularly good terms with the military.

The attention of the Court was called to exhibit 841 and 842.

30664 * The accused was handed a document and asked whether he was familiar with it. He stated he had no recollection of having seen it, but the title of it was "Wartime Economic Life", while the book said that he was its author. The editor was his private secretary, and 30665 * he thought it was edited by him on the basis of various speeches and writings that the accused made. He had no clear recollection of having seen the book before, and in the "Editor's Note" in the book it was stated that his private secretary had gathered and edited some of the speeches and talks of the accused, and he assumed that he had reproduced the gist of various talks made by him.

30666 * The date of the publication was September, 1938.

Exhibit 3338-A, the book thus identified by the accused, entitled "Problems on Japanese Economic Power", was a speech given 26 October 1937, entitled "Armed War and the War of Economy". In it, KAYA said that the China Incident was actually a war. Since it was a war, military force was essential and important, but in order to give it full play they should make adequate preparations also in all spheres of thought, diplomacy, finance, and economy, and one of the pre-conditions of victory is to make adequate preparations to get the better of the other party.

30668 * When war commences, the question was how great a war expenditure they could afford. The war funds now ran to a considerable sum. There might be many who doubted whether their resources were sufficient to stand that expenditure. Everybody thinks that the question of how much war expenditure a state can afford is proportional to its economic power.

Page KAYA would tell them how much they could stand. During the Russo-Japanese war, a sum of two billions were required over about two years. * There were many ways of estimating economic power, but if he compared the figures to show the general economic situation, they would find that bank accounts in 1903 amounted to 777 million yen. Granting that war expenditures could be defrayed at this rate and that they could stand an expenditure of two billion during the two year Russo-Japanese war, they should come to the conclusion that they could afford at least twenty billions at present. To that extent the economic power of the country had developed.

30670 As to what should be the war-time footing in finance and economy, since it was war, * the first thing to be done was to meet the military demands to finance the industries related to their demands and national defense, and concentrate on goods, funds, and labor in those spheres.

30675 * Their brethren, the officers and soldiers of the army, were then fighting in China to bring about true peace and prosperity to the Orient. The most important thing is a preparation for a protracted war so as not to have the army feel the lack of war supplies. The war expenditure of 2500 million yen had been approved by the Diet, and additional expenditures of 4800 million yen were approved also, and amounted to the sum of 7400 million yen. * However, part of the expenditure had come from government bonds, and most would have to depend on the issue of bonds.

30676 The budget for 1938 would amount to about 80 hundred million yen, and the total of bonds issued would be about 56 hundred million yen.

An excerpt sub-titled, "Savings for the Purpose of Carrying out the Policy", stated that one year hence they must issue more than 15 hundred million yen of government bonds. Success or failure of war-time policies regarding finance and economy depended solely on whether the bonds would be absorbed satisfactorily.

* Exhibit 3338-C, an excerpt from the same book, entitled, "Women Behind the Guns", stated that all the world marveled at the glorious results their forces had achieved in the China Incident. These were ascribable to the Emperor's virtues and the loyal forces in the Army and Navy. The people must not be dazzled by these results and take things easy, for the anti-Japanese movement in China, in conjunction with Communist power, was stronger than they imagined.

In modern warfare they must be victorious not merely in battle, but also in the spiritual, diplomatic, and economic wars, and the economic war was the most important factor bringing war to a successful end. The government therefore had started the National Spirit General Mobilization Movement * and was trying to enhance the nation's spirit, and had reorganized its financial and economic policies to meet war-time requirements. Much attention was being paid to policies to meet the war-time situation so that the soldiers might not lack arms, the people might not be short of necessaries, and that prices might not go up.

The government policies in finance and economics depended on the people's efforts. What is called national economic power decided final victory, and the determination and cooperation of the nation were necessary. The women behind the guns should cooperate.

* The witness was asked if, in 1938 and 1939, until he became President of the North China Development Company, he continued these talks, speeches, and articles throughout Japan. He stated he conducted addresses and talks to quite an extent to encourage savings. In the spring of 1938 he became chief investigator with regard to adjusting prices, and undertook plans for creating a price structure, and therefore the number of speeches he made decreased. After he became President of the Development Company he had little time to go on lecture trips. In November, 1938, he became temporarily chairman of the Japan-Manchukuo-China Round Table Conference. He made no speeches in connection with this committee.

He acknowledged that in the book there was purported to be a speech given by him. In the book he read that he himself had said on that occasion that the sponsors were pleased that so many people, especially in influential financial circles, were able to attend the meeting.

* He could not say for sure if this was his speech, but it was possible. He had no doubt about what he had just read, but at this time there was an office known as the Secretariat of the Round Table Conference, which was not under his jurisdiction, and he could not say whether the contents were accurate.

He agreed that in exhibit 3215, the document which he had been handed, it stated that KAYA was Chairman of the Round Table Conference. * He supposed it was something somebody had written up concerning a greeting he gave, but he could not say whether the greetings were accurately reported. He was Chairman of this particular conference. In regard to the Round Table Conference, the Japan-Manchukuoan Central Society was its main sponsor. The Society asked to borrow his name as Chairman and make greetings, etc., and told him they would not bother him with any details, and therefore he accepted.

* In Exhibit 3339, a speech by KAYA taken from the book "Reports on Japan-Manchukuo-China Economic Round Table Conference", dated 2 November 1938, KAYA stated that sponsors were honored that so many people, especially those influential in financial circles, * were able to attend the meeting. It was hardly necessary to mention that the aim of the army's attack in the China Incident lay in destroying the Chiang Kai-shek regime which was thoroughly anti-Japanese and pro-communistic and did not understand the position of China and its mission in East Asia. Later they had received joyful reports that Wuchang, Hankow and Canton had been occupied. Now that the Chiang regime had suffered a crippling blow it was a great advance toward achievement of the purpose of the holy war. He was continually lost in admiration of the army's valour and loyalty and labors of its soldiers. It was hardly necessary to say that the holy war's aim was not merely annihilating the Chiang regime, but also the establishment of a new regime friendly to both Japan and Manchukuo so they might hope to rebuild a new China. Furthermore, it consists in establishing a basis of peace in the Orient through a far-reaching plan between Japan, Manchukuo and China. Unless the construction of a new era was completed, it could not be said that the mission of the troops had been completed.

As long as this completion was not in sight, he thought they could not compensate for the sufferings of those who lost their lives in the war. To establish peace in the Orient there must be a strong national union between the three nations which was more than friendly cooperation. One might say this was the dawn of a new East Asia and its foundation.

To realize their ideal of being a stabilizing force, they must contrive to establish and expand armaments and economic power. * Strong economic power was the underlying foundation of powerful armaments. It had been keenly realized how greatly armaments depended on economic power, even in normal times. The expansion of economic power was the basis for stabilizing and improving national life and welfare. It was a matter of course that great emphasis in future policies should be on completion and development of the united economic power of the Japan-Manchukuo-China bloc and public opinion was in favor of this. They should devote national energies to long-range economic construction and government and private enterprises would be promoted and diligent people would be able to obtain employment and their life would be stabilized. * A stabilized life did not mean during the construction period, idleness and abundant materials, but it would be a frugal, though healthy, life in which one worked hard, got much and saved much and contributed to the expansion of economic power. A strong Japan would be established to secure peace and the welfare of future generations would be promoted.

The most important point and the objective of future endeavor was the development of economic power in the three countries. Since the founding of Manchukuo, she had been formulating great plans for finance, economics and the people's welfare, striving for their realization.

* Japan also had exerted herself to assist her with funds, materials and manpower. That country was making rapid strides in the development of resources, heavy industries, transportation and communication, and in the greatness of her progress was worthy of wonder. These schemes aimed at the united expansion of the national power of Japan and Manchukuo based on the inseparable oneness of both.

30695

It would be a natural policy for Manchukuo to cooperate closely with the revived new China. In spite of the short existence of the temporary North China Government and the restored Central China Government, they were progressing in constructing a new China which would be friendly to Japan and Manchukuo and oppose communism. * It would not be long before there would be established a new regime uniting all China. The important trend of the new China was toward a united economic power by the three nations. Peace in the Orient was a great ideal that would contribute to world peace and which was important to the realization of national spirit. It meant a great deal Influential economists from Japan and China and Manchukuo had been invited for the conference. * KAYA believed that to attain this objective, much depended upon their assistance. He had requested their attendance to seek their understanding and hoped they would give full assistance.

30697 * The accused was asked if this speech was given on 2 November 1938 and he said he believed that was its general gist. He remembered a Round Table Conference at Hiroshima in late November 1938, at which he was present and made a speech.

30699 Exhibit 3339-A, excerpt from "Reports on the Japan-Manchukuo-China Economic Round Table Conference" given 29 November 1938 at Hiroshima was the speech acknowledged by the accused. * In it he stated that the aim of the present incident was a war for construction and not destruction. Hitherto, China's condition had been like a cancer, and since surgical removal was necessary, Japan had been performing that role. After the operation had been completed, new flesh and new life would appear.

The temporary government of North China, the restoration government of Central China, the Federal Mongolian Commission, and the Peace Preservation Committees in Hankow and Canton had made their appearance and were moving toward unification. They were on the way toward construction of a new East Asia but its basis must be a strong unification and economists must proceed toward welding an economic area.

30700 KAYA said he was one who believed that the foundation of the people's welfare, as well as cultural and national defense, * must be based in general upon economy. Therefore, the basis must be an economic one which would produce a union of Asia for the Asiatics. The fact that economic representatives from the three countries had been and were holding in various parts of Japan and China economic Round Table Conferences was something history would

Mr. Ting, who had come from Manchukuo, was extremely active in his nation's founding, was president of the Manchurian Electrical Company and was a prominent economist. Mr. Chin, from the Mongolian border, who was secretary of Industry in the Federal Mongolian Commission, was an ardent patriot who had labored * in behalf of Mongolian independence. Mr. Chu of Central China, and Mr. Chang of North China, were both influential economists and he hoped that the meeting would be a start toward the overseas expansion of Hiroshima Prefecture, especially toward the development of East Asia.

The accused was asked if those remarks were made at the meeting in Hiroshima late in November 1938, and he replied that he didn't recall that particular speech but he may have made it. Asked if after the Army had acquired certain mines and industries, he, as president of the North China Development Company, operated these mines and industries, he stated they were not in charge of operations. By his statement in the affidavit that the Development Company had no rights over any industry except those in which it had a financial interest, he did not intend to claim that the company * confined operations to those mines and industries in which it had only financial interests.

To companies to which the Development Company had given financial help or was a shareholder or had made a loan, they had certain rights of approval over certain matters which arose from the contracts they had with such companies. * The accused denied saying in his interrogation of 26 March 1946 that he was president of the Development Company which operated the mines and industries and the basis for the industries were acquired by the army and that he went there to develop them. This was a garbled version. The interrogator had asked him if there were industries in North China which the Army had taken over and he answered yes. Page at this time he was also appointed Councillor of the Department of the Imperial Household.

30722 In the Spring of 1930, when he became Chief Secretary, the London Naval Treaty was concluded and it became obligatory for Japan to reduce her Navy, causing dissatisfaction in a section of the Navy so that the question of infringement on the High Command by the Lord Keeper was raised. * Excitement ran high and it was no exaggeration to say that the big transformation which later overtook Japan was started at that time. Only two weeks after he became Chief Secretary, Premier Hamaguchi was assassinated by a Rightist. A long series of incidents was in store, including the March, Manchurian and October Incidents in 1931, the assassination of Finance Minister INOUE, the May 15th Incident, and the February 26th Incident. MAKINO, the then Lord Keeper, was greatly troubled to cope with these situations and KIDO, too, did everything to counteract the militarists' machinations under the guidance of the Genro and the Lord Keeper in conjunction with KONOYE, HARADA and others.

30723 * The March Incident in 1931 did not materialize but still caused a big shock, serving as a signal for the Army to set its hand to a reformist movement as a driving power in the political field. It was a manifestation of defiance of the superior by the subordinate and a deplorable tendency in the fighting services. He was tipped off on the plot and got in touch with KONOYE, HARADA, INOUE and others, and obtained information on it and reported it to the Lord Keeper. He did not know whether it was as a result of this report but he understood that the Emperor cautioned the Military Ministers to maintain strict discipline. One of the major duties of the Chief Secretary was to gather information under the Lord Keeper's direction * from government, military, and other quarters, which tended to cause misunderstanding that both the Chief Secretary and Lord Keeper participated in political and military matters, but in fact both were court officials with no power or responsibility for military affairs.

In November 1930, Premier HAMAGUCHI was shot and he became so ill that his Cabinet resigned on 13 April 1931. As an example of one of the duties of the Page Lord Keeper, the diary entry for 13 April 1931 showed that the Emperor consulted the Lord Keeper on the matter and he advised the Emperor to send for the Genro.

30725 * The accused was always an ardent admirer and follower of SAIONJI, whose logical reasoning made a deep impression. The entry for 14 April 1931 shows why he recommended Baron WAKATSUKI as the succeeding Premier.

30726 * SAIONJI's reasons were that since political 30727 unrest began he had received information. * There seemed to be many who advocated a non-party cabinet, but he thought an interim cabinet would only confuse the situation. As to a Seiyu-Kai Cabinet, that party had not won the people's confidence and some of its administrative measures were not desirable. The resignation of a cabinet because of the illness of 30728 HAMAGUCHI might encourage * assassination and would have unfavorable effects. Therefore, SAIONJI deemed it most advisable that the Emperor order the President of the Minseito, WAKATSUKI to form a new cabinet.

On 23 June 1941 HARADA told KIDO of a plot by military officers in Manchuria which was extremely regrettable to him as he was opposed to the army's operations in China and Manchuria. He relayed the information he received to the Lord Keeper.

30729 * As the Diary shows on 11 July 1931, he learned from HARADA that day that there was a report that the army would assume a resolute attitude toward making the budget, and if necessary would appeal to the throne. He was concerned about this as there might be a possible resignation en bloc of the cabinet.

30730 On 10 September 1931, TANI told them that if the Chinese commenced trouble, Japan would have to defend herself as the Japanese position in Manchuria was becoming dangerous. KIDO agreed with this in general as he was afraid the Japanese might be massacred. * On 12 September 1931 he talked with HARADA and both were concerned about and opposed to the political penetration of the army after the March Incident and were closely watching rumors of further army plotting in Manchuria. The first information he had of the March Incident was when he read about it in the newspaper the next day, on September 19, 1931. * His diary entry for that day showed that they listened to Chief Aide-de-Camp NARA's account of conditions. At 9:45 the War Minister MTNAMI went to the Palace to report to the Emperor. KIDO interviewed the Grand Chamberlain and communicated to the Lord Keeper, asking him to return to Tokyo.

* He understood that Premier WAKATSUKI had called HARADA and in fear of the strong Army attitude, asked him if there was any means to keep the Army under control. KIDO expressed his views that it was discouraging to find the Premier making complaints and resorting to external aid without making any noticeable efforts himself. Unless the Cabinet assumed a resolute attitude, political power might go to the Army and a constitutional crisis was at hand. He was most indignant at WAKATSUKI's unreliable attitude.

SAIONJI, HARADA and the accused ^{used} ~~ceased~~ every opportunity to localize the incident and curb military penetration in politics. SAIONJI did not want the Emperor to give Imperial sanction lightly to the advance of the Korean Army into Manchukuo. The Army was infuriated over the government's policy of non-expansion because the Emperor had approved this policy because of the efforts of his personal attendants. Fearing for SAIONJI's life, they decided it would be wise if he did not come to Tokyo. They were all opposed to the army and conditions were so critical they were apprehensive for the Emperor's safety, but he was never advised of their opinion that it might be wise for him to say nothing more about the Manchurian affair. They thought it better for the Emperor to let the Cabinet pursue its policy on its own responsibility.

When HAYASHI of the War Department spoke to the press and failed to explain how the Incident started, KIDO asked him to do so point blank, * and when he did not clarify the truth he deplored his attitude since the Japanese people were suspicious. That the military were trying to impose its will on the government was shown when the Chief of the Army General Staff told the Premier that the government should not interfere with the Supreme Command's prerogative. KONOYE, SHIRATORI and KIDO had a discussion on 1 October 1931, expressing alarm at the possibility of an army coup d'etat, and decided some measure should be taken to

After the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident, the army attitude became so tough that the problem of national reform began to be discussed and there was report that even reform of the Imperial Household Department was discussed. KONOYE and KIDO went to Imperial Household Minister ICHIKI and asked him to be more careful lest he fall into an army trap. * The Premier told the Lord Keeper that the army seemed to disagree with the government on solving the Incident through negotiations with Nanking and added that the government might come into a head-on conflict with the army. KIDO heard this from the Lord Keeper at that time.

On 6 October 1931 he reported to MAKINO his deep apprehension of Army intrigues and told him some appropriate measures should be taken.

* His diary entry of 6 October 1931 showed that he and KONOYE told MAKINO about the stiffening of the military clique, which they had told the Minister of the Imperial Household ICHIKI and wished him to take some appropriate measure.

30737

As Chief Secretary he always found it difficult to get information from Army circles. Through Marquis INCUYE, Saburo, he met the accused SUZUKI to obtain Army information * and cultivated his acquaintance solely for this purpose. The diary entry for 7 October 1931 shows he met SUZUKI, accompanied by HARADA, and conveyed the information obtained to KONOYE which concerned a plot by younger officers to seize control in Japan (the October Incident). They deemed it imperative that SAIONJI come to Tokyo as it was the wish of the Lord Keeper that he do so. The reports of a proposed coup d'etat of some militarists became increasingly alarming and SAIONJI was again requested to come to Tokyo to try to prevent it.

30738

* As the diary entry for 12 October 1931 shows, MAKINO asked HARADA to request SAIONJI to return quickly. HARADA was also asked by the Premier to convey to SAIONJI his wish that he return to Tokyo quickly. The plot progressed rapidly and on 14 October 1931, KIDO and some others heard more about it and they

Page thought a national welfare society should be formed to meet such situations. In the meantime an idea developed among the militarists to establish a new regime in Manchuria.

30739 * When he heard this from HAYASHI, he thought it was regrettable.

30740 The diary entry for 17 October 1931 showed that the rumors became realities. HARADA called him by telephone and told of the arrest of several General Staff officers. KIDO then called on Marquis INOUE and heard that leading generals, including MINAMI, had a conference the night before which lasted until 3 o'clock in the morning. A final decision was reached then and the accused HASHIMOTO, NEMOTO and ten others were arrested. They were planning to besiege and occupy the War Department and the General Staff Office and carry out the coup d'etat. They were going to assemble young officers at noon to give them directives. Within their faction was an Imperial Guard Regiment Commander and they were in a position * to mobilize one or two companies. KIDO reported this to MAKINO.

At this time there was talk of establishing a Council of former Premiers to direct the Cabinet. It was KIDO's opinion that this would interfere with constitutional government and he had always opposed outside interference with the Cabinet by the Imperial Household Minister, the Lord Keeper, the General Staff, Senior Statesmen or anyone else.

His stand on constitutional government was shown by the diary entry for 19 October 1931 where he recorded an exchange of views with OKABE and SHIMOMURA, Hiroshi. SHIMOMURA entertained uneasiness over this purported Council and KIDO shared his views. It was considered incompetency on the part of older statesmen if they conferred together but merely ended up by recommending a continuation of the existing Cabinet. Any such conference must produce a clear cut result but this seemed to be difficult. The holding of such a conference should be preceded by deliberate consideration. Moreover, a responsible Cabinet system was already well established and why was there any need for a Council of former Premiers? SHIMOMURA agreed.

* When the question of punishing those involved in the October Incident arose, it was KIDO's opinion that the dignity of the law should be maintained and the Army should not relegate to oblivion these irregularities by making an investigation and punishment ambiguous as was its habit.

As the diary entry for 28 October 1931 showed, OTSUKA told KIDO that no definite Army policy had been decided on in the case. MUTO and several division commanders insisted on due punishment. KIDO's opposition to the Army's advance in North China and regret that the government had no fixed national policy was shown in the diary entry of 13 November 1931.

At a meeting of the Juichikai Association * they agreed that deep concern rather than grief was caused by the country having no national measures relating to the "Northward Advance Continental Policy" of the military. It was regrettable that no concrete plan could be found. All KIDO's efforts to localize the incident proved fruitless and it expanded and the Cabinet's policy of localization was virtually ignored. The questions of Cabinet reconstruction and a coalition cabinet were raised. On 17 November 1931 Finance Minister INOUE stated that a coalition cabinet would not be strong enough to control the military and if unchecked, the country might come to ruin. KIDO agreed and advocated a strong national government policy to combat the military.

* The diary entry for 17 November 1931 showed that at a meeting at KONOYE's house they considered that a coalition cabinet's greatest obstacle was not the foreign but the financial policy, especially the problem of the gold embargo.

At a meeting with KONOYE, HARADA, ITO, Bunkichi, Finance Minister INOUE and the accused, INOUE stated that neither the so-called national cabinet nor a coalition cabinet would be strong enough to control the military.

* Although the present cabinet lacked strength, it was doing the best it could in restricting the military. It could not be helped then if the cabinet was not well spoken of by the military. A more powerful cabinet was not to be conceived of at present. If a cabinet strong enough to control the military could be organized it would be most desirable, however, and they should all support it. KIDO agreed and stated that the cause which had given rise to the tense situation was that the military had a national policy while outside military circles there was no firmly established policy. * Therefore, he believed it necessary to establish a national policy with the Cabinet its chief author. Seeing the real condition of the Manchurian Army, he would like to suggest that under the present circumstances in which staff officers, such as ITAGAKI and ISHIHARA, were exercising full powers and carrying out the maneuvers worked out by them, it was advisable to send a Foreign Office official, say SHIRATORI, to negotiate with them to come to a mutual understanding.

INOUE agreed with KIDO but HARADA suggested a council in the Imperial Presence to establish a definite principle. KIDO, however, objected, saying that the situation was such that the military had a national policy but outside there was none, and the hasty holding of an Imperial Council * without sufficient preparations would only lead to serious results.

He insisted that a prudent investigation be made. INOUE stated that the result of the discussion by the League of Nations Council could not easily be inferred at present but if the Army advanced to Tsitsihar, Japan would be disabled to hold her seat in the League of Nations army account. It would bring about a situation where Japan would have to withdraw.

INOUE said that the opinions offered on that occasion had impressed him that if the military, disregarding the government's policy, should occupy Tsitsihar, the cabinet would eventually have to surrender itself up.

On 11 December 1931 the WAKATSUKI Cabinet resigned en block.

* The diary entry for 12 December 1931 showed that the press reported that INUKAI, Tsuyoshi was expected to be given a mandate to form a new cabinet.

Page · KIDO talked with HARADA and found out that SAIONJI talked with the Lord Keeper, the Minister of the Imperial Household, and the Grand Chamberlain about the measures to be taken in the present emergency. HARADA had already told KIDO that SAIONJI had determined to let INUKAI form a new cabinet. However, the Lord Keeper's opinion was that a cabinet supported by the whole nation * was to be desired. It was reported that SAIONJI told INUKAI that adequate measures must be taken to keep the Army under complete control and great prudence was needed in financial and domestic affairs. The formation of the Cabinet must be on the broadest possible basis. INUKAI agreed and stated he could not approve of cooperation with such as KUHARA and ADACHI but was determined to purify political circles.

Grand Chamberlain SUZUKI visited SAIONJI, who told him that INUKAI would be the best qualified as Premier, and the Grand Chamberlain reported this to the Emperor. * INUKAI then received an Imperial audience and received the mandate to form a new cabinet. KIDO agreed with SAIONJI's advice to be cautious of the actions of schemers who were opposed to armament reduction and to use care in the selection of a Vice-Chief of the General Staff.

30750

As the diary entry for 16 December 1931 shows, concerning the appointment of Prince KAN-IN as Chief of the General Staff, SAIONJI said he would say nothing about KAN-IN's acceptance as there was nothing objectionable in the matter itself but he did want to direct his attention to the points that there should be perfect understanding * between the Emperor and the Prince; KAN-IN should be especially cautious in dealing with the Armaments Reduction Conference; and should use great prudence in selecting a Vice-Chief of the General Staff.

KIDO reported this to MAKINO and obtained his consent.

After having been saddled with the Manchurian Incident early in 1932, the government was faced with further army intrigues in establishing some form of government in Manchuria. KIDO opposed the establishment of a state controlled by the Page military and when ITAGAKI delivered a lecture on the new state, KIDO expressed astonishment at the plan.

30752 * Regarding his stand on constitutional government, he referred to the Sakura Gate Incident on 8 January 1932, in which a bomb was thrown at the Imperial cortege. This was an isolated incident and KIDO favored no reprimand by the Emperor to the officials responsible as there was constitutional machinery to handle such matters.

30753 * This opinion was likewise held by Lord Keeper MAKINO and they both felt it would not be proper for the Emperor to make a strong statement which might influence the agency concerned in reaching a verdict. There was no way but to wait for the decision of the Disciplinary Committee.

30755 When KIDO met the Lord Keeper on that day, he got information about the coup d'etat planned by some Army officers and MAKINO told him he had been asked by the British Ambassador about the truth of the rumor that a coup d'etat was being planned by some Army officers, including ARAKI. MAKINO told KIDO that SHIGETO * and other officers who were transferred to remote places after the October Incident, were attempting to accomplish the plan with OKAWA, Shumei, KITA, Ikki, SHIMONAKA, MIKAWA and others. The plot would be carried out about 10 February with the aid of AKAMATSU and his followers of the Social Democrat Party.

The diary entry of 28 January 1932 (Exhibit 2251) was his resume of MINAMI's lecture delivered

Page in the Imperial Presence on the Manchurian-Mongolian question. The lecture was not KIDO's idea and he was opposed to a state controlled by the military.

30756 * When he listened to MINAMI's lecture, he thought he could understand to some extent the whole aspect of Army intentions and he wrote it for future reference. Contrary to the prosecution's contention, he never thought it advisable to unify Japanese organs in Manchuria and Mongolia under one Japanese organ under a Governor-General.

In February 1932, the Shanghai Incident started. If it spread, there was a fear that a full-dress war might be unleashed. In view of Shanghai's international nature, SAIONJI and the Lord Keeper felt deep concern, especially so about the reported despatch of troops.

30757 * In the diary entry of 4 February 1932, HARADA told KONCYE and KIDO that Finance Minister TAKAHASHI was deeply anxious about the Army's actions and suggested that if possible the Emperor admonish the Army. KIDO reported this to the Lord Keeper, who said it was for the Premier to decide whether it be submitted to the throne. In the

Regarding KIDO's attitude toward UGAKI, to refute the Prosecution's contention that he did not hold UGAKI in high esteem, the diary entry for 8 February 1932 showed that INUKAI, Ken told KIDO that Governor General of Chosen, UGAKI, had tendered Page his resignation. KIDO replied that if the Premier and Governor General reached an agreement and the Premier desired UGAKI to stay, the Premier might report to the throne the Cabinet intention to have UGAKI remain and apply for Imperial approval.

30760 * Later, MAKINO told KIDO that he had told the Premier that if he wanted UGAKI to stay, he might when he reported UGAKI's resignation to the throne state that the Cabinet wanted to keep him in office. The entry also showed that after a lecture by MATSUOKA, the Emperor asked MATSUOKA about the possibility of close friendship with China. MATSUOKA replied that according to the principle of biology, it was difficult for close races to come into friendly relationship with each other and therefore friendship would be difficult.

30761 * The question of the Lord Keeper's responsibilities was much discussed. In order to obtain reliable information, the accused consulted Dr. SHIMIZU Cho, an authority on the constitution. His conclusion was that from the point of view of the constitution, the Lord Keeper was not held responsible to give counsel to the Emperor. There was no person responsible to the Throne except the State Ministers so far as State affairs were concerned.

Another legal problem was the establishment of a new state in Manchuria. MAKINO, HARADA and KIDO had always opposed the Army's actions in Manchuria so they consulted Dr. TACHI Sakutaro, the highest authority on international law.

30762 * TACHI's opinion was that from the standpoint of international law, open intervention on the part of Japan could not but be regarded as violating Article 1 of the Nine-Power-Treaty. BATEY, of the Foreign Ministry, had a stronger opinion that a state founded under pressure could not be an independent country. TACHI did not go so far, but said that conditions seemed to have gone beyond a question of law. The Emperor, MAKINO and KIDO were solicitous for localization of the Shanghai Incident and the Emperor not only disliked General MAZAKI's strategy, but feared that Japan would be attacked by the League.

* The Emperor seemed to have felt as if the Foreign Minister had given up hope of solving the problem. The Lord Keeper told the Emperor that perhaps YOSHIZAWA meant they could but wait and see what the Chinese would do and if YOSHIZAWA had given such an impression it was because his words were insufficient. When Chief of the General Staff MASAKI told the Emperor that if Chiang Kai-shek's army should support the 18th Route Army, they might have to reinforce their troops, in which case war with China would be unavoidable. The Emperor asked MASAKI if there were any means to prevent the expansion of trouble. KIDO sympathized with the Emperor in his anxiety.

* The diary entry for 21 February 1932 showed that MAKINO told KIDO that if more reinforcements were sent to China, there would be a growing possibility of a war. In that case, it might be necessary for the Genro and Senior Statesmen to have a conference or open a Privy Council session to deliberate on the Emperor's inquiry. To confer with the Genro beforehand, MAKINO went to him on the 20th in conformance to an Imperial order. When Premier INUKAI had an Imperial audience, the Emperor asked whether more reinforcements would be sent. INUKAI answered decisively that the Cabinet would not send more troops, * and the Emperor seemed relieved. The Imperial Household Minister and the Grand Chamberlain told KIDO that Shanghai's operations might require a sudden dispatch of troops, in which case there would be no time to confer with the Genro and he should be consulted beforehand. Therefore, KIDO arranged for such a visit. * When SAIONJI asked KONOYE for advice about his retirement he was indignant over the Army's attitude. KIDO advised KONOYE that SAIONJI should not retire but work for a political reform. * Prince SAIONJI told KIDO that the recent political tendency was contrary to what he had expected and in case of political change he could not recommend a soldier as Premier. If he did not make a careful considered resolution he would disgrace himself, so he wanted to surrender his peerage. * KIDO thought that SAIONJI was going into politics after surrendering the peerage and privilege of Genro, it was another matter, but in that case it would be impossible, perhaps, for him to reconstruct the political world. KIDO believed it better for him to remain in his present position and told this to KONOYE. KONOYE's interview with War Minister ARAKI revealed "direct Imperial Rule" was different from what the words literally meant, but similar to what they were thinking of. According to KONOYE, ARAKI said that as regards the Shanghai Incident, diplomats could not catch up with military operations and, to his regret, the Army was looked upon with suspicion. ARAKI also said that recently the Army had found that MORI was utilizing it. * MAN-CHUKUO was established in March 1932 with FU YI as Regent. KIDO was Chief Secretary for about one year prior to the commencement of the Manchurian Incident, and continued as such for four years after the new State was created, and had no connection with any plans in support of it. He was in no position to do so, nor to issue any orders aiding or abetting it. He and others close to the throne strove to localize the Incident, and he never collaborated or conspired to bring it about or encourage its continuance.

The prosecution had contended that while he was originally an anti-militarist, he was not against the Manchurian aggression on principle. * However, he was against the Manchurian affair in principle and practice. On 9 March 1932 he discovered the 30771 truth of the March and October incidents of 1931 from Colonel NAGATA, Tetsuzan. The facts confirmed his fears that the Army was planning a coup d' etat to seize political power. In the diary entry for 9 March 1932, NAGATA told a group gathered at KIDO's house that regarding the March incident, there were sufficient reasons that the military * should begin to be interested with political matters as well as military affairs. The most important were that following the disarmament problem, militarists were falling into disfavor with the world; the question of the so-called right of the supreme command raised at the London Conference; the question of the reduction of salaries; and maladministration of personnel affairs in the Army. The March incident's outline was that to bring about a political change in the Diet while in session, they were at the same time to presume to petition the Emperor to form a nonparty cabinet of their own choice, the leading figures OKAWA's partisans. OKAWA stated that present affairs could not be surmounted. NAGATA said he told OKAWA that if the plot was attempted he could not expect active Army support, but rather wish the Army to adopt a different attitude. OKAWA requested him to supply the necessary bombs. * OKAWA and his associates pretended that War Minister UGAKI agreed with the proposal. In certain Army quarters they participated in the plan because the War Minister had approved it, but in other Army quarters there was argument that the Army should not try to carry out political reform with outsiders. Thereupon, they reconsidered the plan and it was frustrated.

30773 Regarding the October incident, certain members of the Army General Staff who were indignant at the failures of their seniors began to plot to execute the plan with the Army alone. They planned by penetration to interfere with the regular functioning of the Army by suppressing its governing body by force. At the same time they would occupy Metropolitan Police Headquarters, * and by arrangement with court circles submit their plot to Imperial hearing to expedite the formation of their own cabinet. As the program progressed, some involved began to doubt its wisdom and the plot was betrayed by them before it was put in practice. As a result of punishments, most admitted they had been in error and reconsidered their positions. Although they should have been charged according to the military penal code, their motives and mentality were considered, and also the prestige of the Army, and their cases were disposed of administratively. Those who seem to hold such opinion might be limited to the accused, HASHIMOTO, SATO, and CHO. In recent Army opinion they could be classified into those who had connection with OKAWA's faction; those indoctrinated with the ideas of KITA, Ikki, and NISHIDA, Zoi; and those indignant on the question of the right of the Supreme Command. * From these different viewpoints are

Page are against plotting with the Genro. The latter are the majority, but their antipathy against the existing party was deep rooted. On 27 March 1932 KIDO had a conversation with HARADA, who told him it was SAIONJI's intention to have KONOYE take over the Government at the proper time and wanted KIDO to assume an important position close to the Emperor. * The plan of having KONOYE form a cabinet would be satisfactory, according to the Genro, but he chose rather to make him president of the House of Peers at the time and appoint him Lord Keeper one or two years later. Further, Genro's idea was to make KIDO Grand Chamberlain in the future to make the Emperor's position secure with reliable advisors. * The day after the May 15 incident, KIDO counseled MAKINO never to meekly acquiesce in the Army's outrage and attempt, but he should form a succeeding cabinet based on political parties, after consultation with the Presidents of the Seiyukai and Huisenjo Parties. This counsel was given to form a party government in the face of stout opposition voiced by Major General OBATA. It required considerable fortitude on KIDO's part to offer such advice. * On 16 May 1932 Marquis INOUE told him of the attitude of the military circles toward the incident and that seemed to have caused no appreciable excitement in the Army. In his view firm resolution was necessary and full consideration should be had to the formation of a new cabinet. He now thought the military would not be pleased if some political party merely perverted to constitutional normalcy was ordered to form a succeeding cabinet. The cabinet held a meeting and decided to resign. Premier TAKAHASHI tendered the resignations and the Emperor sent for SAIONJI. * Major General OBATA's view, according to KONOYE, was that the present incident was related to the Chamber affair. After the October affair the Army was devoted to establishing control within itself and had, to a great degree, succeeded. Army officers of major or below had been acting with naval officers, who had at last become out of touch with naval circles. So the naval officers at last brought about a naval affair. The younger military officers were originally of the same mind and followed simply toward those who participated in the affair. Fearing the affair might prove fruitless, some asked for an interview with ARAKI and others called on OBATA. * They seemed to be striving to take this opportunity to attain their objective. If a party cabinet was formed again, the dissatisfaction of the military would be such that even ARAKI would find it difficult to control the military. They seemed to disfavor even a HIRANUMA cabinet. But according to OBATA, he had dissuaded them from objecting to a HIRANUMA cabinet. KIDO's summary of measures to cope with the situation submitted to Lord Keeper MAKINO stated that regarding the national foundation by direct action should be avoided and the people should be warned against being induced to side with it. They should not act

- 30781 contrary to the constitution. Effort should be made to form a cabinet based upon direct unity by urging the political parties to rouse themselves. * A man of character such as SAITO should be selected to head the cabinet. Future national policy should be set out in an Imperial rescript, which would be a new interpretation of the constitution and the Five Article Oath. While admonishing the military, stress should also be put on remedying political corruption. To carry out these measures, SAITO should be asked to come to Tokyo to have confidential talks with War Minister ARAKI and Navy Minister OSUMI on general policy to obtain a full understanding. After that MAKINO should interview the presidents of the Seiyukai and Minseito parties and persuade them to action. MAKINO supported these measures.
30782. The sentences introduced as exhibit 2252 * tend to create the impression that KIDO's thoughts were set forth there, but he had only recorded information received from SUZUKI, Teichi, NAGATA, and others as to army intentions and the young officers' part in the May 15 incident. KIDO interviewed KONOYE and them for information to be offered to MAKINO. In the diary entry of 17 May 1932, SUZUKI said the incident had been brought about by the same faction as the October affair. In March, when officers of the rank of Captain, who were in the October affair, met with the Naval officers in the present incident, * the latter urged decisive action, but the army officers refused and they parted without agreement. ARAKI seemed to intend to strengthen unity within the army force and, then after extraordinary Diet session, recommend means to bring about national unity. But before he realized this, the incident happened. As the younger military supported the cause, they should make efforts lest the actions of the participants come to nothing. SUZUKI added that if a party cabinet was again formed, the present incident would be repeated, so some remedy must be devised. A whole nation cabinet might be suggested. War Vice Minister KOISO favored a HIRANUMA cabinet. SUZUKI thought that the declaration for safeguarding of political parties gave a direct incitement to the incident for some of the young military were extremely enraged at it.
- 30783
- 30784 * NAGATA told HARADA, KONOYE, and KIDO that he held a most moderate army opinion, but his opinion differed little from SUZUKI's. He said the military were against party government. If a single party cabinet was adopted, perhaps none would take up the portfolio of war and the attempt would prove abortive. It was obvious that NAGATA had an aversion to political parties, for he asked if it was difficult for a party member who joined the cabinet to have his name struck off the party register. According to KONOYE, MORI, Kaku had an interview with WAKATSUKI, and two other Minseito party leaders to discuss a succeeding cabinet. It seemed that it was unlikely that a coalition cabinet would be recognized. * MORI submitted a condition to President SUZUKI, Kisaburo, of the Seiyukai

- party that a powerful cabinet with a vigorous foreign policy be formed. If it was not accepted, he would not enter the cabinet. OBATA told MORI that military circles were criticizing, although OBATA and ARAKI had always screened MORI, but if MORI joined a new cabinet his political life would end. Therefore, MORI seemed resolved not to join a SUZUKI cabinet based on existing political parties. MORI interviewed ARAKI and on 21 May 1932 KIDO received information about public opinion and the political situation.
- 30786 * Director of the Police Bureau MORIOKA said that reports from prefectural governors in connection with the recent affair showed it had no considerable effect on financial circles. The cry against military tyranny was heard everywhere. Opinion in favor of a party cabinet was quite dominant, and if a new cabinet was not based on political parties, it would give rise to a constitution safeguarding movement. If a riot broke out in the city, the new cabinet would have to enforce martial law and it would be extremely difficult in submitting plans for a new cabinet to the Throne. It was necessary to obtain beforehand a full understanding of the political parties.
- 30787 * An Imperial rescript might be suggested as a last shift. According to HARADA, the Emperor told Elder Statesmen that he desired that SAIONJI select a person as premier who had no fascist leanings, and about whose character there had been no unsavoury rumour, and who was moderate and not militaristic. Although SAIONJI used to recommend a succeeding premier to the Throne, as he advanced in age he desired Lord Keeper MAKINO to seek the views, not only of the Genro, but also the Senior Statesmen. Subsequent conferences of the statesmen were held and thereafter the Lord Keeper attached great importance to their views.
- 30788 In the diary entry of 26 August 1932 MAKINO told KIDO that SAIONJI wished that in the future * the Emperor consult not only the Genro and the Senior Statesmen, and after deliberation the Lord Keeper should submit an answer to the Emperor. This refuted the prosecution's contention that when he became Lord Keeper, eight years later, KIDO developed a new function of advising the Emperor on every new premier. When KIDO visited SAIONJI on 27 August 1932, SAIONJI spoke of this idea and also approved KIDO's opposition to making the office of the Lord Keeper another Privy Council with the Lord Keeper going deep into
- 30789 politics. * SAIONJI said also that he didn't approve of a conference in the Emperor's presence, it would be a good idea when a cabinet resigned to make a senior statesman conference deliberate and submit an answer to the Emperor. On the question of creating advisors in the Lord Keeper's office, KIDO said he was against it if it resulted in providing another organ similar to

30792 * In the diary entry for 15 December 1932, SAIONJI said he wished to see the Genro system abolished and asked KIDO to explain the draft of the Senior Statesmen's conference. KIDO explained that we could devise no system apart from the Genro and that it was impossible to abolish the Genro system while SAIONJI lived. SAIONJI asked KIDO's opinion on the system of letting the Lord Keeper alone recommend a premier, and KIDO answered that the position of Lord Keeper would then be so important it was feared his position would be unsteady. * KIDO explained that in the Senior Statesmen's conference, the speakers of both houses, Marshalls, and Fleet Admirals were not included as a rule, but might be included by a conditional clause. KIDO told SAIONJI that he was especially needed at the post.

30793 As to Prince KONOYE, SAIONJI said that if he became Household Minister, he would find himself in a plight because he had a weakness to decline requests which might be made by the many acquaintances he had in all quarters. SAIONJI thought it would be better for KONOYE to become speaker of the House of Peers. As an example of another duty of the Lord Keeper, that of advising the Emperor on foreign affairs, the diary entry of 8 March 1933 showed * that the Foreign Minister reported to the Throne that the government intended to petition for an Imperial rescript simultaneous with an announcement of withdrawals from the League. After the Minister withdrew, the Emperor instructed Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs through the Grand Chamberlain that the rescript should include that it was very regrettable that Japan had been forced to withdraw from the League and that even though she withdrew she would continue to cooperate with other powers.

30794 * KIDO delivered to the Foreign Minister the Imperial intention and asked him to deliver it to the Premier, and read and reported this to the Lord Keeper. Regarding the Lord Keeper's interview with the Emperor about Japan's withdrawal from the League, 30796 MAKINO said that the Emperor asked regarding arrangements to resign from the League and whether it would still be necessary to withdraw now that the situation had improved after the settlement of the Jehol problem. The Lord Keeper told the Emperor that while his words were reasonable and Plenipotentiary was already active in accordance with the government's previous decision to withdraw, and that the government had taken a firm stand, and if that should now change their attitude, foreign countries would have the impression they were vacillating, while internally the people would become utterly confused. Therefore, the Lord Keeper, MAKINO, advised the Emperor * that there was nothing to do but let the government carry out its decision. In serving under MAKINO, KIDO became steeped in the duties of his office, and on 24 March 1933, as shown by the diary, MAKINO told him that regarding the Imperial rescript, the Emperor said enough results had already been gained as far as advancing military virtues, but they should now show encouragement concerning civilian virtues also. The Lord Keeper, MAKINO, then showed the Emperor the draft of the rescript from the cabinet and said that he thought the phrase "Military and civilian officers must be true to their duties, etc.," in the rescript revealed the Imperial wish. The Emperor then accepted the draft and warned MAKINO not to change the above phrase.

30797 * Exhibit 2253 shows the opinion of SUZUKI, Teiichi, about Russia. When General HISHIKARI became Kwantung Army Commander and concurrently Ambassador to Manchukuo, the Emperor stressed two points: (1) To respect the principle of equal opportunity, and (2) To maintain friendly relationships with neighboring countries. On 24 August 1933, KIDO was appointed to the position of President of the Bureau of Peerage to serve current with his position as Chief Secretary. * Although the prosecution apparently attaches great importance to his receiving a decoration on 28 April 1934 in connection with the Manchurian Incident, over 300,000 persons received the same decoration. He only received it because he was a member of the House of Peers and not because he was Chief Secretary, and he had never received a decoration from a foreign government.

30799 * As the diary entry of 9 August 1934 shows, SAIONJI told HARADA and KIDO that cabinet ministers should represent their views of general current problems to the Throne more freely rather than formally, and he advised Premier OKADA in the same way. When OKADA asked SAIONJI's view as to whether the Grand Chamberlain should attend on the Emperor when cabinet ministers were received in audience, SAIONJI said such a formality would make their reports formal and empty. He added that the Emperor's intention might be more reflected since he had attained maturity. It was a shame that instead of leaning heavily to the Greater Asia Principle, like they did, they did not settle world questions in concert with Great Britain and the United States.

30801 On 30 May 1935 KIDO was shocked to read in the newspaper that Japanese forces in North China had made an important proposal to the Chinese authorities. Therefore KIDO inquired about this to Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs SHIGEMITSU. Fortunately this incident did not become serious due to the efforts of Commander UMEZU. * SAIONJI knew that KIDO was opposed to the militarists and that he agreed with the Emperor's policy of peaceful relations with other nations. When there was talk of MAKINO's resignation as Lord Keeper, SAIONJI declared his preference to have KIDO accept the position, but KIDO's opinion was KONOYE would be a better choice.

30802 After the discharge of MAZAKI as Inspector-General of Military Education, and the assassination of Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau NAGATA in August 1935, sectionalism became recrudescent in army circles, * and there was a tendency for subordinates to defy their superiors. KIDO kept a vigilant watch on this and gathered information for the Lord Keeper.

30803 On 30 September 1935, KIDO visited the Lord Keeper and MAKINO told him that the Emperor warned the War Minister to deal with the younger men more firmly, even at the sacrifice of the War Minister himself. The Emperor asked Prince KONOYE to help the War Minister on this matter. * The Lord Keeper was answerable only to the Emperor, and if the Lord Keeper's views did not coincide with the Emperor's, the Emperor would ask for his resignation. This was shown by the diary entry of 17 December 1935, where it appeared that the Emperor wished MAKINO to remain as Lord Keeper. But if this was not possible, SAITO be appointed his successor. On 26 December 1935, MAKINO resigned and Viscount SAITO was appointed his successor, with KIDO continuing as his Chief Secretary.

30804 * Notwithstanding the Emperor's admonition to the War Minister on 30 September 1935 to control the younger militarists, the 26 February 1936 incident broke out. It was true the incident broke out suddenly but an ugly atmosphere had been discerned long before. Even now he could not understand why the military failed to take advance precautions.

30806 * As the diary extract for 26 February 1936 shows, KIDO was awakened at 5:20 a.m. and told that the Lord Keeper's residence was being attacked and both he and his wife seemed to be fallen victims. KIDO telephoned the Police Commissioner but could not ascertain what arrangements had been made by the police force. KIDO notified KONOYE and HARADA. When he went to his office KIDO was told that the Grand Cham-

30807 berlain, Premier OKADA, and Finance Minister * TAKAHASHI had also been attacked. When the War Minister was received by the Emperor, the Emperor said that whatever their excuses were, he was displeased with the incident and it had brought disgrace on their national character. War councillors appeared in the court, but none of the cabinet ministers were there, and unless a center administrative organ was established, remedial measures would not be worked out. KIDO therefore consulted Vice Grand Chamberlain HIROHATA, and under the directive of the Minister of the Imperial Household, contacted the Minister of Overseas Affairs KODAMA asking that the cabinet members proceed to the Palace. Because Lord Keeper MAKINO had been killed, they decided also to ask the President of the Privy Council to come. But the President was to stay * in the Lord Keeper's room until the cabinet formation was completed. One opinion among the War Councillors was that the rebels should be disbanded by an Imperial Decree, but others insisted on the enforcement of martial law.

About 5:00 p.m. KODAMA gave KIDO a message that they wanted the Emperor to appoint a Premier ad interim. But the Imperial Household Minister replied to KODAMA that the Premier's residence was surrounded by insurgents and they did not know whether he was killed or not, therefore, there was not time for such recommendation. It was understood that junior officers of the War Department and General Staff agreed to a provisional cabinet and made a proposal to that effect. This cabinet, it seems, would have a strong fascist tendency, and this same idea was shared by the insurgents. The War Minister demanded enforcement of martial law. * But if the army could not take responsibility, there might be no other way. Although Home Minister GOTO was against this proposal, he yielded at last. President of the Privy Council ICHIKI expressed a wish to resign because he was originally responsible for the incident. The Emperor did not approve of formation of a provisional cabinet. The Emperor is said to have confided his idea to Chief Aide-de-Camp HONJO, using words which implied the army wanted to "suffocate him by using floss silk for strangling."

30810

At 9:00 p.m. GOTO became Premier ad interim and the resignations of the cabinet members were tendered. The Emperor said that the insurgents should be brought under control as soon as possible and they should attend assiduously to their duties. At 11:30 p.m. the Privy Council passed a draft proclamation of a state of siege. * On February 27, 1936, KIDO talked with HONJO at 7:00 a.m. and understood that the military were boosting Prince FUSHIMI as Lord Keeper.

On 28 February 1936 KIDO received information that two of the insurgents still adhered to their original intentions, and consequently the authorities decided to bring pressure on the insurgents. The Imperial Household Minister consulted on a successor to the Lord Keeper and they could think of no other than KONOYE for the post. KONOYE was asked to have an interview with Imperial Household Minister YUASA. According to KONOYE he had received reliable information that 30811 the incident was motivated by Major-Generals OKAMURA and YAMASHITA and Colonel ISHIMOTO. A rumor ran that under the support of Colonels ISHIMOTO and KUHARA an attempt was made to put Admiral YAMAMOTO, Eisuke, in an important position, but the Navy rejected it. * Connection had been maintained among ISHIHARA, HASHIMOTO, and NEMOTO, etc., with respect to the incident, and it was confirmed that Assistant Professor HASHIZUME was urged to expedite a reconstruction plan.

As Premier OKADA proceeded to the Palace, GOTO was relieved as Premier ad interim. Since OKADA had presented himself at the Palace, the reason for the previous resignation of the cabinet had become void, and they thought it necessary for a fresh collective resignation. So OKADA again tendered the cabinet resignation.

30812 On 29 February 1936 at 6:30 a.m., Commander KASHII of the forces enforcing martial law issued a proclamation explaining why suppression of the rebel army was delayed and declared * that he had decided to repress them because they defied the Imperial Order. At 8:30 a.m. the army began to take action. At 9:00 a.m. KIDO conferred with the Imperial Household Minister and the Vice-Grand Chamberlain agreeing that it was indispensable to nominate the forthcoming cabinet as soon as possible, and they further conferred with President ICHIKI of the Privy Council. They decided that first, the Vice-Grand Chamberlain would report to the Throne that they were conferring on remedial measures and wished the Emperor to consult the President of the Privy Council regarding the next premier. Next, when the President was summoned by the Emperor, he would rep'v it advisable for 30813 the Emperor to ask for the advice of Prince SAIONJI. * After this Vice Grand Chamberlain HIRCHATA would convey it to SAIONJI. Lastly, considering the emergency, he would convey the intention by telephone instead of sending a messenger.

30814 At about 9:10 a.m. HIRCHATA proceeded to the Throne to convey their opinion. Though at first the Emperor seemed not to care for such an early launching of the remedial measures, he summoned the President and said to him that at last, as they had taken steps to take the rebels away, they must deliberate on a succeeding cabinet. The President replied that he desired that the Emperor seek the counsel of SAIONJI. Since SAIONJI must prepare himself for the Emperor's inquiry, * it was not always necessary that the time of inquiry be determined after settlement of the rebellion, and the President would inform the Emperor of the time at which inquiry could be made, after investigating the circumstances.

30815 * The Emperor's opinion was that the cabinet seemed very difficult to organize, for one which the military circles would approve would be hated by Finance circles, but they could not afford to concern themselves only about the interest of the latter. The president replied that it made it very difficult to form the cabinet then but a way would be found and SAIONJI was sure to be considering the situation. The Emperor expressed nearly the same opinion to HIRCHATA.

30816 At 2:00 p.m. Chief Aide-de-Camps HONJO reported to the Throne that the greater part of the rebel army was suppressed and HIROHATA, after conferring with the President of the Privy Council, and the Imperial Household Minister, asked the Emperor how it would be to make an Imperial Inquiry to SAIONJI at that moment, and the Emperor approved. HIRCHATA then called SAIONJI asking him * to proceed to the Palace.

Prince CHICHIBU stressed to HARADA that it would be absolutely improper for General MAZAKI to form a succeeding cabinet for rumor had it that MAZAKI was behind the February 26th incident, which was nothing but a Army coup d' etat.

30816 * On 2 March 1936 at 4:10 p.m. SAIONJI was received by the Emperor. At 9:00 p.m. KIDO called on HARADA and SAIONJI's son. HARADA entered after an interview with CHICHIBU. The conclusions of middle grade officers were that all the present generals should retire and such a persons as ITAGAKI should become War Minister, and one who would cooperate with ITAGAKI should appear. KAWAI and ARAKI were not satisfactory, and fair persons who had heretofore no connection with the army would be more preferable. HIRANUMA was also not satisfactory, * and he especially wanted to stress MAZAKI, for although some circles in the House of Peers seemed to back him, a MAZAKI cabinet would be absolutely unsatisfactory.

30819 Although the prosecution inferred he was a protagonist of fascism, KIDO had always opposed it and an example to show this was his diary entry of March 3, 1936, when he recommended Ambassador MATSUDAIRA, Tsueneo as Lord Keeper because he was well informed in diplomatic affairs and had no inclination toward fascism. The same diary entry also showed that he also recommended KONOYE to SAIONJI as succeeding premier as a man of moderation and rectitude, that CHICHIBU sent a message to SAIONJI * warning him against MAZAKI and others, and that when CHICHIBU went to the Palace, he stressed to the Emperor the necessity of dismissing MAZAKI.

SAIONJI asked KIDO whom he considered most suitable as Premier. He told him no one but KONOYE could be found. When KIDO told him that ICHIKI was intending to resign, and it would be difficult to find a successor as Privy Council President, and that ICHIKI had said that this time there might not be no other choice but HIRANUMA, SAIONJI strongly objected and also said that HIRANUMA was unsatisfactory as 30820 premier. KIDO was summoned on the same day by CHICHIBU who told him that there was a rumor that MATSUDAIRA would be appointed Lord Keeper, but * he was afraid some trouble would result because he was associated with the London Treaty. CHICHIBU thought he would like to avoid frequent sad events involving senior statesmen close to the throne. KIDO replied that CHICHIBU was right, but the Lord Keeper must enjoy the full confidence of the throne. One who wins the admiration from those now criticizing everything would not acquire the Emperor's confidence. Some might criticize MATSUDAIRA but they could not but select him. HIRAHATA told KIDO of the conversation between the Emperor and CHICHIBU and the Emperor told HIRAHATA to speak to KIDO about it. This conversation was that HIRANUMA was improper as the succeeding premier. MAZAKI would be discharged. As for War Minister, it was necessary to have a young person with no relation in any direction, 30821 * and get him to recognize and freely exercise his ability.

On 4 March 1936 SAIONJI recommended KONOYE as the succeeding premier, but because of his health he was unable to accept. SAIONJI then recommended HIROTA, who accepted the Mandate on 5 March 1936. When KIDO resigned as Chief Secretary on 13 June 1936, he felt relieved as had spent seven years fighting militarism and needed a rest. He had tried to complete every task to the best of his ability. Marquis MATSUDAIRA was appointed his successor. Considering the 30822 incidents of the seven years he held the post, * he was glad to have been free from serious fault.

* When he called on SAIONJI and told him he had retired from the office of Chief Secretary, SAIONJI told KIDO to do as his grandfather had done.

30824

* Exhibit 2254 stated that MATSUI called on KIDO and talked of discontinuing the sending of troops to North China and became indignant, but the MATSUI referred to was MATSUI, Seikun, and not the accused MATSUI, Iwane. Needless to say, KIDO had nothing to do with the China Incident, as he held no position in the government or military for one year and 21 days before it broke out, and his position as President of the Board of Peerage at that time was a very inactive one. KONOYE used to seek his views, but aside from this KIDO had no direct connection with politics. He knew of no preparations nor did he participate in the Incident and did not know it was going to happen, nor did he transpire or plan to bring it about.

30825

* KONOYE, who regretted the hostilities, did his best to pursue a policy of non-expansion, and KIDO counselled him in executing this policy. When the hostilities spread to Shanghai in August, hopes grew slim. At first the army made light of the affair and vauntingly stated China would be fixed up in three months, but the hostilities kept expanding.

KONOYE asked KIDO to join the Cabinet as Education Minister on October 17, but he declined at first, being dissatisfied with the China Hostilities, and thought it proper to assist KONOYE from outside the Cabinet. However, KONOYE insisted, and moved by his request, KIDO accepted, * only as a means of assisting KONOYE. To join the Cabinet, he had to resign as President of the Board of Peerage. The Emperor's approval of the resignation and his evaluation of KIDO appeared in the diary of 21 October, 1937.

According to the Imperial Household Minister, The Emperor said KIDO was needed in the Household Department, but was willing to let him go since the government needed him more. Should KIDO go into the Cabinet, he would do his best in persuading KONOYE not to take unreasonable steps in the amnesty question concerning the February 26 Incident.

* Exhibit 239, a plan for the heavy industries in Manchuria, was approved three hours before KIDO joined the Cabinet, and he did not attend the meeting that day.

Exhibit 2225 refers to a decision of an extraordinary session of the Cabinet with respect to its statement and answer in connection with the Nine Power Pact. This was five days after he joined the Cabinet and the policy had already been decided upon.

30828 Being interested in fulfilling his duties as * Education Minister, he was eager to receive information so he could make proper decisions, and his diary shows that he consulted with the President of Tokyo Imperial University and the Dean of the Law School. During his tenure as Education Minister he respected their requests for self-autonomy, and never interfered with their freedom of thought.

30829 After joining the Cabinet, there was an absence of teamwork, notwithstanding KONOYE's efforts. At KONOYE's request, he met and talked with War Minister SUGIYAMA (exhibit 2256) and intended to bring forth better understanding between SUGIYAMA and the Premier, * by finding out his real intentions regarding settling the China Affair. Even before joining the Cabinet, he had heard from KONOYE that he had been discontented with SUGIYAMA's attitude. After joining, he found the relationship between them divergent beyond his expectations. The reason why he joined the Cabinet was not explained by exhibit 2257, for it was to make every effort for settling the affair successfully according to the agreement made with KONOYE, but as soon as KIDO joined the Cabinet, KONOYE proposed his resignation.

30830 On November 15, 1937, he was told that while absent, KONOYE had telephoned. * When KIDO telephoned KONOYE after learning this, KONOYE revealed that Imperial Headquarters would be established soon, and when he had formed the Cabinet he had little expected the situation would develop so seriously. He then said he would resign by all means, and asked KIDO to obtain the understanding of SAIONJI and the Lord Keeper, and added that even though he were requested by the Emperor to form a new Cabinet he would not accept. KIDO was surprised to hear KONOYE's intention, but he would not change his mind.

30831 KIDO * considered that so long as KONOYE was in such a mood he could not settle the affair and should engage himself more seriously. Therefore, he dissuaded KONOYE from resigning, but this was not for the purpose of carrying out the war. KONOYE had extremely close relations with China, so there was no one else who would settle the affair successfully.

30832 * Exhibit 2258 sets forth a decision regarding liaison between Imperial Headquarters and the Government. The day before the General Staff amended Headquarters regulations to include the establishment of headquarters by adding the words "in the case of incidents" to the existing limitation "in wartime". KIDO deplored this revision and had nothing to do with it, comprehending that the military might abuse it. He inquired of the War Minister as to the reasons for this revision, and warned him about abuse of the regulations.

30833 KONOYE set up an educational council to revamp the educational system. To prevent militarists from becoming members, KIDO sought and obtained the services of non-military men as president and members. * The diary entry of 27 November, 1937, shows that KIDO called on Privy Council President HIRANUMA, and asked him to request Councillor ARAI to be the president of the Council on Education and Councillors HARA and MINAMI, Hitoshi, to be its members.

30834 OUCHI testified that KIDO demanded Professor YANAIBARA be dismissed from Imperial University. He denied making such a demand, but refused to interfere and left the problem to the proper university authorities. Furthermore, the testimony of IKESHIMA that the school system was reorganized and more time devoted to military training and subjects under his ministry was absolutely false.*

As shown in his diary of 8 December, 1937, KIDO called on KONOYE, and views were exchanged on the policy on how to terminate the war. In December, 1937, the question rose to open peace negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek through the German Ambassador in China, and KIDO hoped this might materialize. There was no proper liaison between the Cabinet and the High Command, whose attitude was not fully known to the Cabinet, causing KONOYE deep concern. KIDO recalled that he asked SUGIYAMA at a Cabinet meeting about the possibility of the peace negotiations, but failed to elicit any definite reply.

30835 The peace terms offered China through the German * Ambassador had been decided by the Cabinet Ministers concerned in early December, 1937, before they were submitted to the Cabinet, and as Education Minister he was not a member of the preliminary conference nor did he take part in any liaison conference, nor was he aware what proposals were made by Vice Chief of Staff TADA to the government.

In a message from KONOYE received 16 December, 1937, he stated he could not grasp the Army's real intentions and requested KIDO to ask War Minister SUGIYAMA on that point at the next Cabinet meeting. On the following day, KIDO said to SUGIYAMA at the Cabinet meeting that it would be a matter for sincere congratulation if the China Affair could be settled under the terms now being discussed, but as it was a bilateral negotiation he thought it might * become necessary to make a further concession according to China's counter proposals.

He asked SUGIYAMA if the Army was prepared for it, but SUGIYAMA replied, no, that these were the minimum terms. If they were rejected there would be no alternative but to keep up military action. KIDO failed to understand, therefore, that the Army had made a firm determination to bring about peace. After the question to SUGIYAMA, Admiral SUYETSUGU, the Home Minister, submitted his views, and the plan for epitomizing the peace terms under four points was drafted by SUYETSUGU. Even though KONOYE could not grasp the Army's real intentions, the Cabinet decided on peace proposals, which were submitted to Chiang through the German Ambassador.

KONOYE was eager to restore peace without a day's loss, so he agreed to the abstract epitomization of peace terms so as not to obstruct the negotiations but make room for a future concession to insure success for the negotiations. This was KIDO's idea also.

* It was suggested at the Cabinet meeting of 18 December 1937 that CHIANG's answer be requested before the year's end. His exhibit #259 shows the German Ambassador requested further instructions, which were given and that they discussed at the Cabinet meeting the principles for dealing with the Affair, and KIDO maintained that policies for cultural movement toward China should be established instead of carrying out military activities to no purpose and thus the way to Sino-Japanese friendship should be opened.

* China's reply was expected at the end of December, but it did not materialize. He understood it was decided to wait for the reply until 15 January, 1938. In view of the fact that the Diet would resume business on 21 January 1938, the authorities seemed in a hurry in deciding a new policy.

- Page Exhibit 2260 deals with the all-day Cabinet discussion of the proposed peace with China and the Premier's statement. With respect to the former, the Cabinet decision not to deal with Chiang was made on the basis of a plan drafted by the Foreign Office. Prior to the decision, the Cabinet received a report from HIROTA on details of the negotiations. Further, HIROTA said then that he had arrived at the conclusion that no good faith could be discerned on the Chinese side.
- 30839 * At that time HIROTA met German Ambassador Dirksen and received China's reply, which was of a dilatory nature and sought an elucidation on the meaning of Japan's proposals. KIDO recalled that the War Minister spoke briefly, and the general trend of the talk was in favor of peace with the new regime. KIDO expressed no opinion; hence the Cabinet decision not to deal with the Kuomintang Government any more, but establish peace in cooperation with a new China. It was to be regretted that Japan missed the first opportunity to make peace with China.
- 30840 General TADA was not present at any of these Cabinet meetings, although he may have been present at some Liaison Conferences, but KIDO never attended these. KIDO could not understand on what basis KAWABE was cross-examined, and asked if TADA told him that KIDO vigorously opposed peace with China. KAWABE clearly denied this, and no document of the prosecution substantiated this inference.
- 30841 There is no evidence that KIDO signed the statement of January 16, 1938 (exhibit 268), but the fact was that he did sign it as a Cabinet member. The statement spoke for itself. As it was ascertained that Chiang had no bona fides in restoring peace, Japan thought it a short cut for settling the affair to take constructive measures in conjunction with Chinese who shared her ideals, rather than over-run China with armed forces. Prior to the Nanking campaign, there was no unity between the military and government, and the High Command kept all military operation plans secret from the Cabinet, which therefore could not launch on timely diplomatic * demarches ahead of military operations. The Nanking campaign was started with the Cabinet losing the opportunity to take any advanced diplomatic move.

The prosecution contended that although he made no reference to the horrors of Nanking that they must have been known to him, and although KIDO may not have been responsible for the outbreak he was to blame for its continuance. The first time he ever heard of the Nanking atrocities was after the end of the war.

If he had heard about it at the time, he would certainly have tried to do something, even though it was not a matter of Cabinet responsibility.

* In March, 1938, there was public demand to judge Professor OUCHI and others who had been arrested in February and were awaiting trial on suspicion of communistic activities. Notwithstanding this, KIDO discussed the matter with three university professors and refused to purge OUCHI and the others pending their trial. While Education Minister, he sought and obtained the views of educational critics so as to better fulfill his duties.

30843

Exhibit 266, an article in the Tokyo Gazette entitled "The Japanese Spirit", was not written, edited, nor published by KIDO. * The first time he saw it was in the Tribunal. It was not a policy-making document of the Ministry. It was the custom in the ministries for individuals in the department to write articles for "Shu Ho", a weekly publication of the Board of Information. Manuscripts were collected and sent to the Board of Information, after approval of the vice-ministers contributions to the "Shu Ho", which were exclusively in their charge.

30844

The article "Enhancement of the Japanese Spirit" published in the "Shu Ho" was not written, edited, published, or approved, nor ever seen until recently by KIDO. * His efforts to find out who wrote it had been unavailing. After articles were published in the "Shu Ho", the Information Bureau would submit them for translation and publication in English in the Tokyo Gazette.

Exhibit 266 omitted one line which read that the Empire's action in the China Affair did not contemplate aggression or conquest.

* As further evidence of his desire to settle the Incident, exhibit 2261 showed that General HONJO had the same opinion as ITAGAKI, ISHIHARA, and others, that the China Affair had to be settled as soon as possible. The exhibit showed that ISHIHARA told KIDO that it was not good that Japan had no dealings with Chiang-Kai-shek, and the policy had to be changed. KIDO agreed, and promised to make efforts to that effect. They had begun to realize that breaking off relations with Chiang was improvident, and he had stated in his diary that it was necessary beforehand to give full consideration to prepare for breaking the impasse caused by the statement.

* The Premier's mental attitude was disturbed, and it appeared difficult for him to remain in office. KONOYE told KIDO on 11 May, 1938, that they must launch upon a new stage. For this purpose, it was necessary to strengthen the Cabinet, but it was difficult to reconstruct it. He had two alternatives, either for the Cabinet to resign en bloc, or to start afresh with a new line-up. He asked KIDO to think this over.

KIDO agreed with KONOYE. It would be difficult to settle the affair if things went on as they were, but when it came to a definite plan, it was no easy task. If the Cabinet resigned en bloc, it would be impossible for a succeeding one * to settle the affair unless suitable persons were appointed Ministers of War and Foreign Affairs. KONOYE was dissatisfied with the War Minister, SUGIYAMA, as were army circles, but no agreement of views were reached as to his successor. During the Diet session, criticisms were made against Foreign Minister HIROTA in connection with the statement refusing to deal with Chiang. Intelligent classes were skeptical as to the statement. KIDO thought the selection of a succeeding Foreign Minister would also be a big question. The retreat of the KONOYE Cabinet would have far-reaching effects in China, which would jump to the conclusion that the KONOYE Cabinet quit because of its failure to settle the China Affair. Further, should a political change be brought with these questions unsettled, the succeeding Cabinet would not be in a position to attain any success.

30848

* Meanwhile, it transpired that SUGIYAMA would resign, to be replaced by ITAGAKI on 22 May. KIDO called on KONOYE regarding reconstruction of the Cabinet following the War Minister's change by enlisting the services of UGAKI, IKEDA, and others. At KONOYE's request, he spoke with HIROTA, and told him the Premier's intention, asking him to think over his resignation. KIDO was relieved to hear HIROTA say he had entered the Cabinet partly to help KONOYE and partly because of the recommendation of SAIONJI, and so, if his resignation was desirable, he would resign at any time.

30849

The War Ministry opposed Cabinet reconstruction, but KONOYE and KIDO opposed them, as they were determined to bring about a settlement of the Affair. To accomplish this, they evolved an idea which took form in the Cabinet reconstruction of 26 May, 1938, which made UGAKI, KIDO, and ARAKI join the cabinet. The appointment of ITAGAKI, who understood China and the Chinese and was popular with them, was intended for settling the affair.

Page 30850 The selection of UGAKI as Foreign Minister aimed * at facilitating a rapprochement with Chiang. KIDO ceased being Education Minister on 26 May, 1938.

The diary entry of 26 May, 1938, showed that Chief Secretary KAZAMI told him that UGAKI wanted to postpone reorganization until the change in War Ministers was made, to which KIDO replied the Cabinet should be formed that day. Later in the day, KIDO met KAZAMI on the way to call on the Premier. UGAKI, it seemed, was uneasy about the change of War Ministers, but the reorganization plan had leaked out to the public, and furthermore, some of the War Ministry opposed the plan chiefly. If they hesitated it might become difficult to reorganize the Cabinet, and ITAGAKI's appointment might fail. Besides, if army opposition was strong, it might be all the more necessary to separate personnel changes of the army from the reorganization, and if reorganization failed because of army opposition, there might be an unfavorable impression in financial circles.

30851 * Thus KIDO strongly advised the Premier to execute reorganization at once, and told IKEDA that if reorganization failed, KONOYE would have to keep the Cabinet, if only for a month, to provide for future policies lest there be no way for KONOYE to apologize to the Emperor. KIDO stated it was necessary to complete reorganization that day, even by letting the Premier hold concurrently the office of Foreign Minister and by IKEDA as Finance and Commerce Minister if UGAKI did not consent. Calls to HARADA and KAYA resulted in persuasion on the part of YUKI and YAMASHITA, Kamesaburo, which had an unexpected prompt consent from UGAKI, and the reorganization plan was completed at 4 o'clock. During this whole time KONOYE and he were working on various plans. * Thus UGAKI was appointed Foreign Minister, IKEDA, Finance and Commerce, and ARAKI Education Minister. KIDO received an order that he was appointed Welfare Minister.

30852 KIDO dined with ITAGAKI on 18 June, 1938, and exchanged views with him on KONOYE's frame of mind, the necessity for an early termination of the China Affair, and the War Minister's intentions were revealed. * KIDO felt much reassured when he knew ITAGAKI was a person worth talking with.

On 23 July, 1938, he talked with KONOYE and stressed the necessity of concluding the Incident before the end of the year. At that time they also talked about the progress of the Five Ministers Council, but KIDO was not a member of it.

* The situation however, did not move as expected. New questions cropped up. On 20 July, 1938, the Changkufeng Affair occurred, when Soviet troops invaded Manchukuo, closely followed by Soviet planes invading and bombing Korea. The situation with the Soviet grew tense, and KONOYE, who sought KIDO's view, was told that the Affair should be settled through peaceful channels. KIDO had no part in the commencement of this Incident.

At the Cabinet meeting on 2 August, 1938, reports of conditions by ITAGAKI and UGAKI concerning the Changkufeng Incident and the Korea invasion, were heard. * They made the resolution that in dealing with it, they were to adopt a policy of non-aggrandizement to avoid war with the USSR, and to solve the problem by diplomacy, and if necessary withdraw from the Changkufeng line. In pursuance of these policies, negotiations were conducted, and the affair settled amicably.

30856

About this time, Germany submitted proposals for the conclusion of a military alliance to strengthen the anti-Comintern Pact. When KIDO learned of it from KONOYE on 9 August 1938, he thought it a serious question. He was not shown any draft of the proposals, and expressed no opinion. He believed any policy which would stimulate the U. S. and Britain and make them skeptical about Japan should be most cautiously studied, * and he told KONOYE of this. KONOYE was greatly embarrassed, though he agreed with KIDO. As KIDO understood, the Navy was opposed to a military alliance with Germany, and he stressed the necessity to make the Navy express its conviction.

The political situation became complicated, and KIDO thought it might be necessary to effect a drastic change of policy. There would be much room for discussion if Japan further approached Germany, leaving the China Affair as it was. If circumstances dictated, he thought it necessary to switch to a rapprochement with the U. S. and Britain, and he feared that certain rightists, extremists, and army officers opposed to settling the Incident would create disturbances if peace was established with China. He thought it necessary to take measures to control these elements, and interviewed KONOYE on 23 August, 1938.

The Diary entry for 25 August 1938 sets forth his interview with KONOYE. He understands that the Cabinet was called for indignance toward Rightists and in view of the situation it might be necessary to keep the party well together but if national policies necessitate a policy fight it would be necessary to take drastic measures and take arrangements in advance to make the Chief of the Police Affairs Bureau and of the Metropolitan Police move to the back and walls of the Premier, and KIDO urged the Premier to take such measures. KONOYE told him that when the Chief of the Police Affairs Bureau called he advised KONOYE to resign because of the growing tension but KONOYE was told by KIDO that this would be inexcusable and KONOYE agreed. Since KIDO was Welfare Minister at that time, he pointed out that in the domestic situation the unemployment question came to the fore and was a matter of deep concern for maintaining peace and order. Also, with regard to the China affair the statement refusing to deal with Chiang Kai-shek was criticized and opinion was gaining in a section of the General Staff that the affair be terminated even by negotiating with Chiang, if necessary. A similar opinion raised its head in the Rightist camp and together with distressed home conditions served to start a new party movement to strengthen political power.

At an interview with KONOYE on 7 September 1938 KONOYE was depressed at political matters and had unpleasant feelings toward the maneuvers of the UGAKI faction and again expressed his intention to resign but since KIDO believed that only KONOYE could settle the affair he emphasized that he should summon his courage and proceed resolutely even if it had to be with Chiang Kai-shek.

In view of the opposition at the time UGAKI had been appointed Foreign Minister and KIDO charged there was still opposition to him in Army circles. KIDO observed that so long as Ugaki remained in that position opposition would not be so pronounced as it would be if the plan to overthrow KONOYE and become Premier came about. KONOYE was still supported by the public but if UGAKI became Premier there would be political criticism of him and anti-UGAKI feeling in the Army would break out again. The atmosphere

30860 for forming a new political party suddenly brewed and the Home Ministry (cont.) considered the matter. KONOYE requested Home Minister SUYETSUGU to draft a plan, expressing his desire that KIDO and Justice Minister SHIONO take 30861 part in formulating it. *Consequently KIDO met SUYETSUGU and SHIONO on 27 September 1938, when KIDO found the new political party was patterned after the Nazi party. But it was KIDO's conviction that party leadership as practiced in Germany would be impossible in Japan, and a heated debate took place.

After several meetings, the draft platform and declaration of the new party were submitted to KONOYE on 15 October 1938. KONOYE, too, was worried that the draft and declaration were not freed from the party leadership complexion. Strong opposition to a government sponsored political party came from political circles and the Home Office plan was dropped and it was decided instead to study a movement for a national organization to convey the will of the ruling to the ruled, and vice versa. On 15 November 1938 KIDO met SHIONO and SUYETSUGU to study the 30862 question. * All state ministers concerned cooperated in evolving a definite plan but the Cabinet resigned before any definite plan was worked out.

30863 * While Exhibit 2264 records the Privy Council decision to cease cooperating with League bodies, KIDO was not a member of the Council, but did attend this meeting as a Cabinet Minister. Japan had previously withdrawn from the League and the matter concerning abandonment of cooperation with various League organs was proposed by the Foreign Minister. The conclusion was that Japan could not but abandon such cooperation because relations between Japan and those organs had become gradually unfriendly. The government failed to take measures at home deserving popular confidence, and there was no prospect of an early settlement of the China Affair, though there was information that Wang Ching-wei would flee from Chungking on 18 December 1938. There was no wonder, therefore, that KONOYE was inclined to resign.

30864 * The situation at the time showed that an ideological and intransigent spirit was stressed on one hand, and on the other Communist activities were brisk and the situation marked with confusion;

30861 many university students were rounded up as Communists. Reform of the educational system was a plank in the platform of the first KONOYE cabinet. The China affair was more than 12 months old and trade with China and the southwest was entirely paralyzed due to a Chinese boycott. A blow was dealt industry depending on exports. The unemployment question came to the fore and a relief committee was set up in the Welfare Ministry. It was feared that economic depression would be capitalized on by Communists, agitators and this worried KONOYE most.

30865 Under these circumstances Japan was not in a position to reject flatly a policy to check Communist infiltration but KONOYE watched the situation closely as he thought Japan would be called on to study what effect her cooperation with Germany would have on the United States and Britain. On 17 December 1938 KONOYE told KIDO that OSHIMA and others intended to conclude a military agreement with Germany even against England and France which was different from the policy decided on by the Five-Minister Conference and apparently was already proposed to the Germans. KONOYE was apprehensive and stated he would like to resign since he could not assume responsibility for such an extension of the pact. KIDO could understand that although OSHIMA might have to assume heavy responsibility for settlement of the China affair he would not like to be accused in regarding the fact which KONOYE could not approve also. EXHIBIT 2865 showed a conference KUDO had with HIRANUMA who thought the KONOYE cabinet should continue as it had been reported Wang Ching-wei had escaped from Chungking.

Exhibit 2866 showed SUZUKI, Terauchi, and KIDO to express the same opinion. The cabinet situation had gone so far that they could not help it so they all expressed the opinion that for a time there was no way for dissuading KONOYE from resigning. The KONOYE cabinet resigned in lieu on 4 January 1939 and KIDO's successor Welfare Minister called. He wanted to continue his private life but was invited by HIRANUMA to be the Director of the Ministry in his cabinet. HIRANUMA stated it was practically an accomplished fact as he had accepted the Premiership on condition KIDO be appointed Vice Premier.

KIDO declined the offer but HIRANUMA insisted KIDO was aware that ideological reformist opinion had strengthened in the Home Office under SUYETSUGU so he requested a free hand be given him in dealing with Home Office political questions. When this condition was approved KIDO accepted.

One of these political problems was that since SUYETSUGU was a Fascist devotee of international fame, a Fascist atmosphere prevailed among Home Ministry bureaucrats. Also a troublesome question was left for the Ministry by SUYETSUGU's retirement in the form of the bill reforming the municipality system drafted under his guidance. This aimed at fascistizing provincial administration by extending executive powers at the sacrifice of the legislative organ. Preparations had been completed for submitting the bill to the Diet but KIDO decided not to introduce it and requested the cabinet to meet on 17 February 1939 and submitted his decision. The cabinet approved and the same day orders were communicated to that effect and the bill died.

30870

The HIRANUMA cabinet demonstrated that there was a continuing of policy between it and its predecessor by appointing KONOYE Minister without portfolio. The most important question facing the HIRANUMA cabinet was that of the German alliance. The Army most enthusiastically advocated concluding the alliance but the KONOYE cabinet failed to arrive at a conclusion and transferred the question to the HIRANUMA cabinet which referred it to the Five-Minister Conference which failed to reach an identity of views due to Navy opposition to the alliance.

The question did not emerge from a discussion stage at the Five-Minister Conference so that KIDO not being a member of the conference had no direct connection. His only concern in the Tri-Partite Alliance question while he was Home Minister consisted in maintaining peace and order which he was duty bound to secure.

30872 Exhibit 2268 showed that the Premier told him about the proposed alliance and the difficult situation concerning it and that he had an interview with KONOYE at which they talked about the China affair and its settlement. KIDO was not in favor of strengthening the alliance with Germany and Italy but negotiations had been started without his knowledge or participation. The Five Minister Conference deliberated over the question but was unable to arrive at a decision because the Army wanted to conclude the Pact and the Navy opposed it. If the Army and Navy came into a frontal clash it could be imagined that they would stage a coup d'etat and assassinate the senior statesmen and government leaders. It was but natural that KIDO should be seized with apprehension and he endeavored to avert such a clash between the Army and Navy. Although he was informed of the uneasy situation it seemed to him that the cabinet should not resign. He stressed that it was necessary for the cabinet to surmount every obstacle and do its utmost and HIRANUMA agreed.

30873 On April 14, 1938 KIDO consulted ITAKAKI on the matter and they agreed to exert their efforts. He also consulted ARITA who stated that there was nothing but for the Premier to send letters to Hitler and Mussolini personally to explain the circumstances. KIDO stressed this must necessarily be done. If they made a mistake it should result in leaving calamity to posterity and the Senior Statesmen would be eliminated. If a clash occurred between the Army and Navy, riots would spring up and when China became aware of this breach it would be unfavorable. KIDO told HIRANUMA that he desired him to exert his best effort so as not to bring about an unfavorable effect on these problems whether the agreement was concluded or not.

30874 During conversations with OTA and Navy Minister YONAI, KIDO thought that if the cabinet would collapse because of the difference in view between the Army and Navy regarding the Alliance it would give uneasiness to the people and the cabinet had to avoid resignation en bloc by leaving the problem as it was. YONAI agreed to deal prudently with the problem. His Diary stated that since there was the other party with whom they must negotiate it was not necessary to conclude the alliance. This shows he was not eager for it but the focus of his concern was to maintain peace in the country. He vigilantly watched the development of the Tripartite Alliance question from this angle. While the prosecution had singled him out for particular responsibility for aggression against the USSR in the summer of 1939 he knew nothing of this until after the incident started. As a cabinet member he had no responsibility. On July 22, 1939 the cabinet adopted a statement for submission to the Japanese-British Conference which was expected to lead to settling the China affair. This was opposed by the Army, so KIDO took steps to maintain public order. At this time the Army was spreading propaganda in its efforts to obtain support for the Tripartite Alliance. KIDO was opposed to this and asked his subordinates to control this agitation and keep him so advised.

* As Exhibit 2271 showed, the Japanese hoped for settling the Incident by the establishment of the Wang regime and hoped for the success of the Japan-British Conference. It was rumored that the Army and Navy still disagreed on the military alliance problem and consequently the Army became impatient and planned to lead the Cabinet to resignation by having the War Minister resign, proclaim martial law and thus establish a military government.

* KIDO resisted this and considered that if the Army took such measures, public peace would be in danger and told ITAGAKI to that effect.

As Exhibit 775 showed, KIDO was surprised when he heard of Germany's treacherous act in concluding the Non-Aggression Pact with Russia in view of the German-Japan agreement against communism. There was no factual foundation for the prosecution claim that he supported a military alliance with Germany.

As a result of the Non-Aggression Pact, the HIRANUMA Cabinet resigned on 28 August 1939 and his Cabinet service ended. Exhibit 2272, the entry for that day showed he refused to interfere in conflicts within the Army, and * regarding the Emperor's order to the new Premier, showed KIDO was consulted by KONOYE regarding the Emperor's selection of a War Minister. KIDO gave him his view based on his experience while Chief Secretary and advised KONOYE to settle the matter smoothly. The entry also showed that the Emperor instructed the new Premier that diplomatic policy should follow the line of cooperation with Britain and the U.S. and that discretion should be used in the selection of Home Minister to maintain order at home.

30884

While the prosecution had contended that while he held Cabinet posts, he had a general responsibility for all events in that period, he had absolutely nothing to do with most of these events. * With respect to the various bills passed during that period, they were approved by the Cabinet and passed by the Diet. He did participate in drafting the Motion Picture Law of 5 April 1939, and voted in favor of bills presented by other ministers based on the explanations given for their passage.

At no time did he know or suspect that any of them were designed for promoting aggressive war, but the 30885 After the resignation of the HIRANUMA Cabinet, KIDO led a retired life detached from politics. * As to the political situation, simultaneously with the formation of the ABE Cabinet, the European war broke out and everyone sensed the possibility of a second World War so the ABE Cabinet issued a declaration for non-intervention.

30886 * The question of the procedure to be adopted in selecting a new Premier when a Cabinet fell, after the incapacity or death of SAIONJI, was being considered and KIDO's opinion was sought by KONOYE and on 10 November 1939 he talked with Marquis MATSUDAIRA and KONOYE. These conversations were reported in Exhibit 2273.

30887- (KIDO submits translation challenging the Prosecution translation of Exhibit 2273.)

30890 * As Exhibit 2273 showed, he suggested it was undesirable to charge the Lord Keeper solely with the duty of selecting a new Premier but believed the senior statesmen should deal with it. Though this suggestion was supported by KONOYE, it did not materialize. KIDO wished to point out that when he was appointed, Lord Keeper, SAIONJI, was still alive and he followed the principle which he had contemplated and reported it to the Throne after SAIONJI's death in October 1940. KIDO studied this problem but could not get a definite plan for leaving the problem to the senior statesmen alone, so had to act according to the former Premier.

30891 The ABE Cabinet fell on 12 January 1940, being succeeded by the YONAI Cabinet. The Lord Keeper YUASA became ill and KIDO was informed on 8 May 1940 that SAIONJI desired that he accept the post * but KIDO recommended KONOYE for Lord Keeper and HIRANUMA for Chairman of the Privy Council.

After the outbreak of the European War, there was heated discussion on political reconstruction. An atmosphere was created for merging all political parties into a new one and the question of national reorganization was discussed vigorously. There was a movement for having KONOYE preside over the new political party and from early 1940 he seemed to consider these questions but paid more attention to the movement for national reorganization than for leadership of the new political party. It was KONOYE's intention to prevent the Army from making a political advance * by concentrating political power. On the strength of KIDO's Cabinet experience, he felt the necessity of establishing a political party but was opposed to one state, one party, after the Nazi fashion. He hoped political power might be established by combining all existing parties, but at that time stood aloof from political circles and only got information through his friends.

On 14 April 1940 KIDO exchanged views with Count ARIMA on the movement for combining all existing parties with KONOYE as leader. The new party movement gained momentum. It was rumored that the YONAI Cabinet would resign and KONOYE become the next Premier. It was * KIDO's intention to support KONOYE as long as KONOYE was active in politics so KIDO expressed his opinion frankly that he had no intention to lead a new political party. The IKEZAKI referred to in his Exhibit 2274 was at that time a member of the Lower House and a Councillor Parliamentary of Education.

30894

The belief that the YONAI Cabinet would soon retire and a KONOYE Cabinet be formed became more pronounced. KONOYE felt that his former Cabinet not having a political party's support, had found it difficult to carry out his policy and was desirous to obtain the people's backing in some form.

30895

* The result of a meeting between KONOYE, ARIMA and KIDO appeared in Exhibit 2275. They inquired first into a policy to be adopted in case KONOYE was commanded to form a Cabinet. KONOYE strongly opposed "one state, one party" but they thought instead of a union of political parties. KONOYE had strongly opposed this when a movement for the new party was inaugurated during the first KONOYE Cabinet. * The new party would emerge only after KONOYE received the mandate to form a new Cabinet, and they agreed that due consideration would be given to organizing a Supreme National Defense Council with the object to suppress the Army and restore

Page political leadership to the Premier's hands. Since they were still at war with China they believed consideration should be given Army and Navy wishes regarding finances, national defense and foreign affairs. They also considered the request to all political parties to dissolve.

30896 On 31 May 1940 HARADA told KIDO he was being recommended to the position of Lord Keeper * but KIDO told him he had no confidence. KIDO was recommended as Lord Keeper by such anti-militarists as MATSUDAIRA, SAIONJI, YONAI, YUASA, and KONOYE, and knew of no militarists who recommended him. He accepted after due consideration and was duly installed. IKEZAKI had intended to recommend KIDO as president of the new party, but knew that if he became Lord Keeper, the intention could not be realized, and came to dissuade KIDO from taking that office, but KIDO did not listen to him.

30898 In Exhibit 1294, he was again merely reporting what ARITA told him regarding a conversation with Grew about a proposal for a treaty between the U.S. and Japan, and it was not his attitude toward the U.S., Britain and the Netherlands that was set up. * ARITA's and not KIDO's opinion also was recorded in Exhibit 1295 and KIDO merely listened. The spectacular achievements of the Germans in Europe imported strong stimulus to the army and rightists and a reformist atmosphere grew and criticisms were heaped on the YONAI Cabinet for its alleged pro-U.S.-British character as well as for its maintenance of the status quo.

30899 * The diary entry of 5 July 1940 referred to a report about the July 5 Incident which was to kill various moderates and KIDO understood later he was also on the list. The men to be killed were all

Page close personal friends of his, and all except two^o were in the Court Circle and had the reputation of being against war. KIDO reported the incident to the Emperor, telling him the plotters' actions were blame-worthy, but so far as their motives were concerned, the administrators must seriously reflect. Such untoward incidents would take place unless the leaders made deep introspection.

Exhibit 532 showed KONOYE's popularity and that HIRANUMA's representative told him that no one but KONOYE would be recommendable for the next Premier * and that KONOYE was almost the only person fit for premiership. Exhibit 532 showed it appeared that the Army would support KONOYE. KIDO's reaction was that judging from the political situation, a political change might be inevitable. He discussed with KONOYE the concentration and strengthening of political power but KONOYE was identifying himself with a new political structure, having resigned as president of the Privy Council. KIDO thought there would be no one suitable except KONOYE but was uneasy when Vice War Minister ANAMI assured him that the Army solidly desired KONOYE because KIDO feared the Army might push its own policy, taking advantage of KONOYE's overwhelming popularity. To KONOYE it seemed that political moves were steadily taken to counter the Army's advance in politics. Should KIDO refuse to recommend KONOYE for fear of Army political machinations, the result would be to hand over political power to the Army. Therefore he thought he would have to recommend KONOYE.

Exhibit 534 showed the steps he took to ascertain the information the Emperor requested him to obtain about heavy artillery mobilization in the South China Campaign and showed he told the Emperor he would avoid direct negotiations with the military but have the Chief Aide-de-Camp investigate. If this was unsatisfactory, KIDO would negotiate. As Lord Keeper, he always tried to avoid direct contact with the military on operations and only discussed policy matters with them.

In Exhibit 532 he set forth the circumstances concerning the YONAI Cabinet's resignation. It fell * because after War Minister HATA's resignation, the Army refused to suggest a successor. The entry showed Page that the procedure used in the selection of a new Premier was the same as that used by KIDO's predecessor, YUASA, except that the senior statesmen were to be consulted as a body, and not individually. This minor change had been previously discussed with KONOYE and MATSUDAIRA on 10 November 1939 and 27 June 1940. He had also discussed it with SAIONJI and the Emperor approved.

30903 On 17 July 1940 a senior statesmen meeting took place to select a succeeding Premier, with Privy Council President HARA and ex-Premiers, WAKATSUKI, OKADA, HIROTA, HAYASHI, KONOYE and HIRANUMA present. HARA, a noted pacifist, asked KIDO about the truth of the resignation of the Cabinet and KIDO told him the gist of what he had learned. At the * conference, WAKATSUKI first recommended KONOYE and the others agreed. KIDO concurred as KONOYE was depended on to settle the China Affair and it was apparent that KONOYE was the popular choice of the political parties as well as the Army.

KIDO sent his Chief Secretary to SAIONJI who did not dare give any opinion because of illness and old age. When KIDO reported to the Emperor, he asked KIDO if he could give KONOYE some advice, and KIDO told the Emperor that KONOYE should be especially prudent in the choice of Foreign and Finance Ministers due to conditions at home and abroad. This appears in Exhibit 532.

30904 Exhibit 539 recorded a statement that it was wrong in formalities that War Minister HATA * recommend to the Emperor that TOJO be appointed his successor and KIDO advised the Chief Aide-de-Camp that the act should not be a precedent.

Of all the members of the KONOYE Cabinet, it was MATSUOKA who was regarded as a problem minister and a dangerous character. MATSUOKA carried out a big shakeup of diplomatic representatives on the ground the situation could not be pulled through by the old court diplomacy. The ambassadors chosen by him, which included OSHIMA to Germany, attracted widespread attention and deep concern was felt. KIDO drew KONOYE's attention to the matter and though KONOYE was deeply concerned, he could not stop it.

* As a result of MATSUOKA's shakeup, the pro-British and pro-U.S. colorings of the diplomatic front began to fade.

The diary entry of 9 August 1940 showed that the Emperor expressed regret that MATSUOKA failed to have any clear prospective of the U.S.'s future policy. On 10 August 1940, the Emperor told KIDO of his conversation with Prince FUSHIMI about the Navy's attitude and lack of preparations for war.

On 9 September 1940, KIDO was advised by the Chief Aide-de-Camp that the proposal for peaceful advance into Indo-China was in negotiation, but their forces suddenly invaded causing a reversal of negotiation. KIDO was clearly indignant at the actions of the military in the field.

* MATSUOKA's suggestion that an ultimatum be sent to FIC was pending in September 1940. The Emperor told him that the views of MATSUOKA and the Army General Staff did not coincide. In case the explanation of the government or Supreme Command regarding policy was deemed well grounded, the Lord Keeper used to advise the Emperor to approve, but in such case the Lord Keeper was cautious if he was asked and gave his own opinion. Much more so was it the case here.

30907

As the Emperor told KIDO he thought there was nothing to do but have the government policy carried out, KIDO replied that he agreed, but as KIDO was aware that things were grave and that the Emperor did not so heartily approve, he added that the Emperor had better direct the government to take a cautious attitude. Exhibit 627 * showed that KIDO merely reported to the Emperor what he heard and only advised him to follow constitutional government.

In September 1940, German Ambassador STAHMER came when an important negotiation was started for concluding an alliance with Germany. MATSUOKA conducted the negotiation so secretly that even Foreign Office Divisional Chiefs were not aware of it except for advisors. KIDO learned of it from KONOYE for the

Page first time on 12 September 1940 and was surprised at 30908 its progress. KONOYE and KIDO were among the disciples of SAIONJI. Since KIDO was appointed Chief Secretary * to the Lord Keeper, he made it a rule to call on SAIONJI almost once a month. SAIONJI repeatedly stressed the necessity for Japan's cooperation with Britain and the U.S. KIDO entirely agreed so the question of the alliance with Germany tormented KIDO and he could not bring himself to approve it.

30909 * Especially he feared the alliance would lead to war between Japan and the U.S. He drew the attention of KONOYE and MATSUOKA to this; however, they surprised him by arguing the alliance was not intended to prevent the U.S. from joining the war and that if Japan was isolated without an alliance with Germany she might be attacked by the U.S. any moment. Notwithstanding their explanations he felt deep concern as he thought eventually they would have to oppose both Britain and the U.S.

On 16 September he told the Emperor that the alliance would divide the world into two parts notwithstanding KONOYE's and MATSUOKA's opinions, and that the China Incident was an irritant to the U.S. and should be concluded quickly.

30910 * On 21 September 1940 he told the Emperor that with regard to solution of the China Incident, eventually they would have to oppose both Britain and the U.S.
if they concluded a military alliance with Germany and Italy. They should therefore make necessary adjustments regarding relations with China. KIDO was helpless to prevent the government from approving the alliance. Once the government approved it, tradition dictated the Emperor approved the decision, though prior to that the Emperor might express his views or caution the Cabinet to reconsider. In this case it might be imagined the Emperor inwardly felt uneasy but sanctioned the requested conclusion of the alliance.

30911 * The Emperor expressed that conclusion of the alliance would necessitate an anticipation of eventual war between Japan and the U.S. and asked KONOYE and MATSUOKA about this. Both stated that the alliance was intended to avert war and if it was not concluded danger of a Pacific War would be the greater and they petitioned the Emperor to sanction it.

To prevent war with the U.S. and Britain, KIDO thought they should eliminate one of the major factors irritating the two, which was the China Affair. This is why KIDO advised the Emperor to resolve the affair and told him this should be accomplished even if concessions were required.

On 26 September, KIDO was advised that an army unit had landed in FIC to bomb Haifong and as Exhibit 643 showed, he was indignant.

* On 24 November, SAIONJI passed away. There was no prospect of an early settlement of the China Affair and peace moves taken toward Chungking led to no tangible results. True to his policy of unifying diplomacy, MATSUOKA was determined to take up negotiations with Chungking in his own hands and sent TAJIRI, MATSUMOTO and others to Hongkong to conduct negotiations.

30913

At first the negotiation appeared to make some progress, but later proved to be in the stage of political warfare after all. The Liaison Conferences between the Government and High Command on 28 November 1940 decided that a basic treaty be concluded between Ambassador ABE and Wang Ching-wei, paying no attention to the negotiation with Chungking. * As a result, the China Affair entered a definite stage of protraction.

As 1940 ended, their power was becoming exhausted and KIDO was extremely pessimistic as to settling the Affair and told the Throne they would be unable to settle it by compromising with positive action proponents, but would only have national strength exhausted. This reply was in answer to the Emperor's expressed solicitude about the formula for dealing with the Affair and the Emperor told him that the moves hitherto taken toward Chungking must be regarded as a failure, while conclusion of the treaty with the Wang Ching-wei Administration would make the affair protracted.

* The success of the Russian Five-Year Plan and relations with Russia caused the Emperor great concern and he asked KIDO for his opinion. As KIDO was opposed to war, he advised the Emperor on 3 December 1940 that the USSR was in the most favorable position in the world for the less she moved the Page better her position got. Russia was haughty and it was possible she would not readily consent to negotiating with Japan. After the war, the only uninjured countries would be the USSR and the U.S. Then Japan would be placed between the two and subjected to enduring hardship, but they need not be pessimistic because even those two powers would inevitably deteriorate. * Provided Japan was prepared for ten years of hardships and cultivated simplicity and verility, he believed it not so difficult to emerge favorably in the end.

Germany's military achievements had far-reaching effects in Asia. The question arose as to the propriety and otherwise of advancing to the south as France had collapsed and British influence had waned. When Japan mediated in the border dispute between FIC and Thailand, an "Outline of operations on French Indo-China and Thailand" was adopted to establish leadership in the south and with access to raw materials, seize the occasion to bring pressure on China to hasten settlement of the China Affair. It was natural that Japan could not look on the world-wide upheaval with folded arms, there being no objection to trying to have access to oil, rubber and oil resources by Japan, who was lacking in them; but these moves must * be taken through peaceful channels and resort to force should be strictly guarded against. KIDO feared that tactless display of force might excite doubt in Britain and the U.S. and possibly lead to a clash. He drew KONOYE's attention to this and the Emperor was solicitous about it. When the Chiefs of Staff of the Army and Navy reported on the military agreement with Thailand, the Emperor expressed fear it might stimulate Britain and the U.S. and KIDO agreed.

30916

30917 * The Emperor instructed the two Chiefs to give due deliberation with regard to the time of enforcement and after coincidence with the opinions of both parties they were to carry out the plan on the condition that this was strictly observed.

30918 On 1 February 1941 the Chief Aide-de-Camp told KIDO that the outline of operations in FIC and Thailand was intended to establish Japan's leadership in the South and prepare the ground for her southern advance,* taking advantage of FIC and Page Thailand's acceptance of Japan's mediation in their border dispute. The Navy intended to use Camranh Bay and the air base near Saigon, but its objects could not be boldly expressed so that such phraseology as safeguarding trade and communication and guarantees for the prevention of recurrent disputes between FIC and Thailand was used. In case armed force was resorted to, it was arranged that Imperial sanction be obtained afresh.

The term "leader position" began to be frequently used and worried the Emperor, who stated that one's leader position should not be imposed on others, but Japan's leader position would only be established after she was looked up to as leader.

30919 * On 3 February 1941, the Emperor reported to KIDO on his conference with the Chiefs of the Army and Navy General Staffs on the measures to be taken toward FIC and Thailand. The Emperor said personally he did not approve in principle these policies of taking advantages and making demands while the opponent was weakened, but in dealing with the fast changing world it would not be gratifying to err on the side of benevolence, so he approved the policies.

30920 KIDO regretted that the Emperor's advice was not embodied in the measures taken by the government and in a subsequent conversation with KONOYE gathered that the Emperor's advice was given to the Chiefs, but he was not certain. KIDO did not approve MATSUOKA's proposed visit to Europe * and suggested to the Emperor and KONOYE that careful consideration be given this.

30921 Exhibit 1058, the diary entry of 3 April 1941, stated that KIDO's advice was sought by KONOYE on the prospective appointment of Admiral TOYODA as Minister of Commerce and Industry, and SUZUKI as President of the Planning Board. It was for carrying out personnel affairs smoothly that the Lord Keeper was consulted about the appointment of the minister. The Lord Keeper would agree about that matter in case there was nothing particular to be censured concerning the character and career of the person in question. This was to ensure that there would be no reflection on the Emperor as to the character of the appointees.

Page The custom of consulting the Lord Keeper about the appointment of a Minister did not originate when KIDO was in that position, but it had been practiced for many years.

30922 * On his way home from Germany and Italy, MATSUOKA concluded a neutral pact with Stalin, adjusting relations with the Soviet. On 18 April 1941 a telegram was received from Ambassador NOMURA, asking for instructions on a draft plan for understanding between the U.S. and Japan, which had evolved as a result of negotiations conducted by NOMURA with Hull and Roosevelt in secrecy. The telegram delighted KONOYE as he had come to realize that the Tripartite Pact had failed to restrain the U.S. as it was intended to, but relations had become worse. KONOYE got in touch with MATSUOKA and pressed him to hurry home. Not only KONOYE, but the army and navy were enthusiastic over the projected understanding with America.

30923 * The China Affair was stalemated so the Army thought it would be fortunate if it was settled as a sequel to an understanding with U.S. As to the Co-Prosperity Sphere in East Asia, they were convinced its object never did lie in conquering by arms the countries to the south, and it was never in conflict with relations with U.S. to strive for mutual prosperity with those countries. They concluded that they had to explain the Japanese policy to remove misunderstanding with U.S. and materialize the understanding with her.

Concerning the meaning of the Co-Prosperity Sphere, KIDO believed that the policy was necessary for the actual situation was that France and the Netherlands, to which various colonies in the Southwest Pacific belonged, had fallen, and Britain was being threatened with a landing operation by Germany.

30924 The issue of the southern colonies and its affect on Japan's existence * became a matter of grave concern. Some positives advocated that Japan should secure those areas by appealing to force. KONOYE and others being worried by this trend of opinion thought of this policy with a view to unifying public opinion and checking such a radical idea. KIDO agreed but strongly opposed to advance with arms. There was an opinion that FIC might become German or American if America participated in the war which would present a grave menace and KONOYE was greatly concerned about

On 28 April 1941, Chief Secretary MATSUDAIRA told KIDO that the Emperor wanted his opinion as to whom he should consult on diplomatic matters if the Premier, the Foreign Minister and the Lord Keeper were simultaneously ill. * KIDO told MATSUDAIRA that as the Lord Keeper had no authority concerning diplomatic matters but to convey Imperial questions to the Premier or Foreign Minister, nor had authority to answer a diplomatic problem on his own responsibility if the Lord Keeper was ill, the Imperial inquiry should be conveyed by the Grand Chamberlain to the Premier or Foreign Minister. KIDO submitted his views on the Japanese-American negotiations to the Emperor on that occasion. He could not recall what he stated, but did recall that he submitted that the negotiations would be a favorable development because the Premier was anxious to push them, though there was some difficulty with MATSUOKA.

* When MATSUOKA returned to Tokyo on 23 April 1941, a Liaison Conference between the Government and High Command was held to deliberate over the instructions to be sent NOMURA. MATSUOKA was extremely dissatisfied with the negotiation with America and though he attended the conference, he withdrew before it was closed without touching on the question. The next two weeks MATSUOKA made no progress with the plan under a pretext of studying. Meanwhile, the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau and Chief of the Naval Affairs Bureau and others visited him, urging him to approve the understanding with the U.S. as a result of which instructions were cabled to NOMURA on 12 May 1941 on his approval, but the negotiation did not progress due to MATSUOKA's indifference.

Exhibit 1084 merely showed that KIDO read OSHIMA's telegram concerning the outbreak of war between Germany and USSR and also MATSUOKA's estimate that this was not so imminent.

Exhibit 1089, the diary entry of 18 June 1941, showed that MATSUOKA told KIDO he had sent instructions to the Reich to negotiate with Vichy in connection with the FIC problem.

The substance of his one hour of conversation with KONOYE on 20 June 1941 (Exhibit 1090) was that KONOYE, who was of weak character, worried about MATSUOKA's attitude and told KIDO again of his intention to resign. KIDO could not agree to his resignation so he told him that he had better talk frankly with MATSUOKA and ascertain his real intention, explain his policy to MATSUOKA and persuade him into it. If MATSUOKA still did not agree to it, he should ask him to resign, but if KONOYE met MATSUOKA's refusal to do so, then KONOYE must take responsibility for the lack of unity in the Cabinet.

* The diary entry of 21 June 1941 (Exhibit 781) recorded a talk between KONOYE, HIRANUMA and the accused. They gave KONOYE encouragement and hoped he would display his power and take a lead in the emergency period. On 22 June 1941, hostilities opened between Germany and the Soviet. This was a big question for Japan as Germany was Japan's area while a pact of neutrality existed with the Soviet. To conduct foreign affairs in such a complicated situation was delicate and difficult.

30929

* MATSUOKA began to advocate over KONOYE's head a military expedition to Siberia, but this met with disapproval not only from the Cabinet, including KONOYE, but Army and Navy leaders. Frequent liaison conferences between the Government and High Command resulted in a decision to settle the China Affair, to bring pressure upon China from the south instead of pursuing MATSUOKA's policy.

30930

The diary entry of 22 June 1941 (Exhibit 1093) showed KIDO reported to the Emperor the talk he had the day before with KONOYE and HIRANUMA that MATSUOKA had an audience with the Emperor; that there was a difference of opinion between the Foreign Minister and the Government and High Command regarding MATSUOKA's opinion that Japan would advance to both the north and south; that KIDO phoned KONOYE to be prudent and that MATSUOKA told KONOYE his report to the Throne did not refer to immediate action. * The Emperor was perturbed with MATSUOKA's opinion and since returning from Germany, MATSUOKA's attitude was not understandable and he took a disdainful attitude toward KONOYE. KIDO often heard KONOYE complaining that he could not understand MATSUOKA's attitude and it was reported to KIDO that MATSUOKA was emphasizing Page the necessity of sending troops as far as Irkutsk and Soviet Russia. Expecting he would be sure on receiving the report of the outbreak of the Russo-German War, to proceed to the Emperor, KIDO previously told the Emperor about MATSUOKA's possible action and asked him to be prepared for it.

On 23 June 1941 (Exhibit 1094) KIDO reported to the Emperor the conversation of KONOYE with MATSUOKA. The conversation he had with KONOYE on that day included an exchange of views on various problems. * KIDO told KONOYE that Germany by way of waging a war against the Soviet had violated the principle that it was necessary for both states to adjust relations with the Soviet. Germany had agreed to this at the time of the alliance, and her waging a war now changed one of the elements by which the pact was formed, and KONOYE should consider whether the alliance should be continued. KONOYE agreed and said he would examine into the matter and KIDO heard later that KONOYE expressed to MATSUOKA a strong desire to reconsider the alliance, but MATSUOKA did not take it seriously and only protested to RIBBENTROP.

30932

* The diary entry of 25 June 1941 (Exhibit 1095) recited what KONOYE told KIDO of his conversation with Wang Ching-wei. Also that the Premiers and Chiefs of the Army and Navy General Staffs reported to the Emperor the decisions of the Liaison Conference with respect to the entry of Japanese troops into FIC.

On 28 June 1941, after an audience with the Emperor, War Minister TOJO explained the matters listed in Exhibit 1098. KIDO expressed no opinion. At that time it was a grave concern that the Kwantung Army with the outbreak of war between Germany and the Soviet might start some action, so TOJO told him that the Kwantung Army was taking a calm and prudent attitude and would not violate discipline. He said that while the China Affair remained unsolved the war had broken out between Germany and the Soviet and the situation had become strained. He would like to have Imperial Headquarters strengthened so staff members might assemble at the Palace daily and prepare for any situation. He also spoke about information from Ambassadors and of the progress of Japan's political declaration toward China.

* Prior to the Imperial Conference of 2 July 1941, KIDO was advised that the discussions at the Liaison Conferences centered primarily around MATSUOKA's idea of proceeding north against Russia and which KONOYE was opposing. Of secondary importance after the outbreak of the Russian-German War was the public discussion of the necessity of Japan's southward advance to obtain materials and necessities for defense and to end the China War. After the conference, KIDO was informed that MATSUOKA's idea of going north had been disapproved and that Japan's policy was to proceed south by peaceful means. KIDO never knew until he saw KONOYE's memoirs that the plan at the Convention contemplated an advance to FIC and was to be carried on even if it meant war against the U.S. and Britain.

30934

* The diary entry of 5 July 1941 (Exhibit 1112) sets forth MATSUOKA's attitude toward the invasion of FIC. KIDO did not express his views but was interested in getting this information as he wanted all the knowledge he could have to reply to the Emperor's questions. Relations between KONOYE and MATSUOKA were extremely aggravated and KONOYE frequently told KIDO he could not grasp MATSUOKA's real motives.

30935

On 3 July the so-called oral statement from Hull to KONOYE was received, apparently intended to hint that Hull could not trust MATSUOKA. MATSUOKA was indignant and contended that it be refused and then the matter for negotiation be commenced to the U.S. * but KONOYE held that it be handled lightly and not hamper the negotiation and that the reply to the oral statement be sent with the matter for negotiation on the ground that there was fear that the negotiation might be interrupted if MATSUOKA's contention was accepted. The Army and Navy supported KONOYE, who sent Diplomatic Advisor SAITO to MATSUOKA to make the latter agree to his view. MATSUOKA did not reply until midnight but sent a reply to the oral statement also on his own judgment. Hence KONOYE's decision that he could not work together with MATSUOKA. As Exhibit 1115 shows, KIDO told his Chief Secretary that he thought MATSUOKA should resign so as to prevent a resignation en bloc, Page but if he did not, it would be best to have KONOYE form a new Cabinet upon a resignation en bloc.

* When KIDO told KONOYE that it was advisable to have MATSUOKA resign to avoid a Cabinet change, KONOYE disagreed, saying that if this were done, MATSUOKA and his party would make propaganda that his resignation had been compelled by U.S. pressure. KIDO's interest in this was based on the fact that the Emperor was anxious to conclude peaceful relations with America, and MATSUOKA was a stumbling block. To accomplish the Emperor's purpose he made this suggestion to KONOYE.

30937

The Second KONOYE Cabinet resigned on 16 July 1941. * KIDO was summoned to the Palace and received an Imperial Order that the Premier had tendered a general resignation. In regard to selecting the next Cabinet, the Emperor had ordered the Lord Chamberlain to invite the Privy Council President and the ex-Premiers to the Palace and the Lord Keeper was to ask their opinions as to who was the suitable person.

30938

The next day a conference of Senior Statesmen was held. The most important question was adjusting relations with America. In view of the fact that negotiations had been in progress, it was thought there was no other suitable candidate but KONOYE. * ABE was first to recommend KONOYE, and the others heartily concurred, except WAKATSUKI and HIROTA who were not so positive in their support. YONAI said no other person would do, and KIDO reported to the Emperor.

30939 * In forming a new cabinet, KONOYE replaced MATSUOKA with Admiral TOYODA as Foreign Minister, and KIDO understood MATSUOKA's appointment was aimed at facilitating the negotiation with America. The cabinet change synchronized with a flareup of anti-Japanism in the United States, causing concern to the Emperor. This anti-Japanism was stimulated by the sending of Japanese troops to French Indo-China. It was profoundly regrettable that Imperial concern about the operations turned true. In July the United States froze Japanese assets and the effect of this caused a critical situation. War clouds gathered and a rupture with America seemed inevitable. Those not trained in diplomatic matters thought the freezing of assets was America's first step towards war, but KIDO felt hopeful of peaceful relations.

30940 On 31 July 1941 when Navy Chief of Staff * NAGANO reported to the Emperor on the contingency of war with America, it was a matter of solicitude to the Emperor. KIDO gave the Emperor his views, refusing to share NAGANO's statement, but stressed the necessity for pushing the negotiation. NAGANO's opinion regarding war was the same as FUSHIMI's had been, in that they should try to avert war as much as possible. NAGANO seemed strongly opposed to the Tripartite Alliance and he thought as long as it existed adjusting relations with America would be impossible.

30941 * If the adjustment of relations with the United States was impossible and they were cut off from oil supplies, oil in store would run out in two years. When war with the United States broke out, the oil would only be sufficient for one and one-half years and, under these circumstances, there would be no alternative but to take the initiative. According to the report submitted, the Emperor believed Japan would win, since it was stated there in the written report. When NAGANO was asked if it was possible to win a sweeping victory as in the Russo-Japanese War, NAGANO replied that it was even doubtful whether they would win, to say nothing of a great victory.

30942 KIDO was filled with trepidation about the Imperial anxiety and answered the Emperor that NAGANO's opinion was too simple. The United States recognized the existence of the Tripartite Pact and KIDO was doubtful if they could deepen United States confidence by annulling the pact, as the United States * respected international treaties. They must deliberate in a constructive manner, and KIDO would urge KONOYE's consideration on the point.

While the prosecution contended that KIDO disagreed with NAGANO and stated that if the pact was annulled, the United States would not have faith in Japan, he denied saying this, his expression was one of contrast. He told the Emperor that he was doubtful whether they could deepen United States confidence if they annulled the pact, or whether 30943 they would be held in contempt if they annulled it. The prosecution overlooked that there were several means to be tried with respect to relationship with America * which was the advice he gave, and that he advised that further constructive deliberation was necessary.

30944 Up to that time KONOYE took the attitude to control the army by relying on navy influence. However, the navy markedly stiffened its attitude after NAGANO's report. On 2 August 1941 KONOYE expressed to KIDO misgivings about the government's cooperation with the High Command, pointing out that opinion was gaining strength in naval circles for a vigorous policy. KIDO told KONOYE that it should not be hastily decided to go to war with the United States then, Japan's actual power was not fully studied. * Fundamental national policies must be exhaustively discussed with the military ministers. Should KONOYE fail to reach agreement with them, it might be inevitable that he should quit.

30946 * The military ministers approved the plan. Common sense told them that the outcome of war with America would be horrible. As an agreement with America was not easily arrived at, KONOYE was much worried and, when in August the navy attitude became strong, he was very much concerned. * When KONOYE asked KIDO's advice on 7 August 1941 (Exh. 1130), KIDO told him to make deliberate consideration and tried to show him the hopelessness of war with America. He told KONOYE it was high time for the government to put forth a concrete and constructive view to learn whether it was acceptable to the army, with a view to checking the army from rushing to war and get it to keep pace with the government policy. He pointed out that the situation was hopeless from the standpoint of oil alone. KIDO's sole thought was to advance positive arguments to convince the military, and intentionally omitted what was related to humanity and peace as those are fundamental. He concluded the talk by advocating that they should do everything to restore friendly relations.

30947 Although pressed economically, they should resolve to toil through ten years of hard struggles. KIDO also pointed out that they needed materials, and their hopes lay in the southern regions. He had no thought of obtaining these * other than by peaceful means. He realized that if Japan succeeded in warding off war with the United States and the European War ended, a desire for peace would be possible after war and it might then be possible to get politics to follow their proper course through redoubled efforts to reconstruct politics and check the military. These views were expressed to convince the militarists of the vital necessity for an understanding with America, as they would not swallow the no-war formula unless accompanied by a constructive plan in another direction. He thought it might be possible to secure raw materials if Japan fostered her resources.

KONOYE was expected to take a step in the direction counselled by KIDO, but judging by the result he made no development in that direction but instead committed himself to the fateful Imperial Conference of 6 September 1941.

Ever since August 1935 when * NAGATA was assassinated, the Metropolitan Police had protected KIDO and family from the militarists and rightists by assigning police protection. After a rightist's attempt to assassinate HIRANUMA in August 1941, the police guards were doubled because of KIDO's well known pro-American and pro-British and anti-militaristic stand. At 4:30 p.m., 5 September 1941 when KONOYE went to submit the agenda of the Imperial Conference to the throne, he came to KIDO's room. The draft agenda consisted of three points: (1) War preparations be made against America and Britain, (2) In parallel, negotiations with America be pushed very hard, and (3) In case no prospect of amicable conclusion with America came in sight in the first ten days of October, Japan was to make up her mind to wage war with America and Britain.

30949

* To that day, KONOYE made no reference to the question which was advanced to KIDO. KIDO was astonished at its nature and blamed KONOYE for submitting such a serious plan to the Emperor so suddenly. KIDO told KONOYE that the plan showed the time limit was fixed in the first ten days of October and it was disastrous to fix a time limit, and asked him to modify this point, and if he could not see his way to abandoning the plan. KONOYE stated, as it had already been decided by the liaison conference between the government and the High Command, it was difficult to modify or give up the plan, and there was no alternative but to bring the negotiation to an amicable conclusion.

30951

When KONOYE submitted the agenda to the Emperor, the Emperor asked him strategical questions, to which he could not * reply and petitioned the Emperor to summon the Chiefs of Staff and promised to consult with KIDO. KIDO requested then that the Chiefs of Staff proceed to the Palace with the Premier and they were granted an audience at 6:00 p.m.. The only advice KIDO gave the Emperor was that he should follow the Premier's advice to summon the Chiefs. KIDO did not attend the audience with the Emperor to which the Chiefs appeared, * but KONOYE called on KIDO after the conference and told KIDO that the Emperor asked various questions. He asked Chief of Staff SUGIYAMA as to when the projected southern campaign would be terminated, and SUGIYAMA answered he expected the campaign would be terminated in a short time. The Emperor reprimanded SUGIYAMA reminding him that he had said a similar thing at the outbreak of the China Affair, but SUGIYAMA pleaded that there was a difference, China being a continent, while the southern area was mostly islands. Chief of Staff NAGANO interposed and said if things went on they would steadily lose the game, but there would be a hope of recovery if there was a drastic operation, and that was war.

30952

* KONOYE told KIDO further that the Emperor asked why diplomacy was not placed first. KONOYE replied that it was aimed at attaching primary importance to diplomatic negotiation, and asked the Emperor to approve the plan as it was. The Imperial Council was to be held the next day, and before being summoned by the Emperor the morning of September 6, KIDO suggested to HARA that he ask questions at the conference emphasizing continuation of diplomatic negotiation rather than preparation for war. When summoned by the Emperor, he told KIDO he would like to put questions at the conference. KIDO replied it would be a good idea but he thought Privy Council President HARA would cover the important points in his questions, and it was KIDO's desire that the Emperor point out the importance of the conference's decision, and order the * High Command to extend full cooperation in bringing negotiations to an amicable conclusion. KIDO was not present at the Imperial conference.

30953

HARA asked if primary importance was attached to diplomatic negotiation, to which Navy Minister OIKAWA alone replied, and there was no reply from the High Command. This was regretted by the Emperor who took the High Command to task and ordered it to extend full cooperation in the negotiation * and avoid war by all means. This was told KIDO by the Emperor (Exh. 1135).

30954

* On 11 September 1941, TOJO came to see KIDO, after an audience with the Emperor, telling him the result of preparations for war with the United States (Exh. 1138). In view of the decision of 6 September 1941, the army was investigating preparations for a case in which there was no hope of leading the negotiations to a successful conclusion. KIDO remembered that the talk he and TOJO had on that day impressed him that preparations were being made, thereof he didn't recall the details. TOJO said that when the Emperor asked about the preparations, the Emperor said he understood his words at the 6 September conference had made it clear to TOJO of his desire to avert war.

TOJO explained that the army understood the Emperor's desire and was making strenuous efforts to bring the negotiations to a conclusion.

30956 He said that the army was bound at that time to make adequate preparation by the 6 September decision.* Exhibit 1138 showed that Foreign Minister TOYODA told KIDO about the progress of negotiations and he discussed this later with the Emperor. SHIGEMITSU also spoke to KIDO on their progress on 25 September, and on the 26th, KONOYE called on him telling him he had to quit as he had no confidence, if the army meant to start war on October 15.

30957 Whereupon KIDO chastized him that he was responsible for the decision of 6 September * and it would be irresponsible of KONOYE to quit leaving the 6 September decision as it was. It would be better for him to propose a review of that decision. If he failed to reach an agreement with the army, it could not be helped if he quit. At the end of the talk, KIDO cautioned KONOYE to be prudent. KIDO did not discuss the possibility of war at this time.

30958 On 29 September the Emperor ordered KIDO to investigate the amount of resources from which the United States would be able to draw, for he was worried about newspaper propaganda underestimating United States power. * The same day HARA told KIDO that he thought that the Imperial conference as it stood was so perfunctory that it would pass any bill in its original form and the method had to be improved. He asked KIDO if there was any way to have Senior Statesmen attend and express their opinions. KIDO replied that any remedial plan would have possible merits and demerits, but he would consider it carefully. HARA said he made this suggestion in connection with the Imperial Council meeting in which the decision as to war would have to be made if the diplomatic parley failed. This suggestion was followed in the meeting on 29 November. HARA and KIDO both felt that the prudence and acumen of the Senior Statesmen would be a steadying influence.

30959 * The gist of talk with the President of the Planning Board SUZUKI, on 1 October 1941, was that both were worried about the adjustment of relations with America which made little progress, and they agreed that war should be evaded (Exh. 2280). The prospect of negotiations became slimmer while war moves, let loose by the military, gathered momentum. On 7 October, Chief Secretary of the Cabinet TOMITA told KIDO he would urge KONOYE to display his powerful leadership and TOMITA explained the attitude of army and navy sections (Exh. 1143). KIDO merely listened without expressing any opinion. TOMITA was further worried that the date fixed by the Imperial Conference, 6 September, was drawing near.

30960 On 9 October, KIDO interviewed KONOYE counselling him * that the 6 September decision appeared too abrupt, and asked him if it was not better to change the policy and devote his all to solving the China question

30961 instead of deciding on war with America. KIDO set forth a positive solution which KONOYE could use in arguing with the military, and this policy was given for the same purpose as that advanced to him on 7 August. The diary entry of 9 October (Exh. 1146) followed the above, * and that KIDO said that judging from the situation, it was difficult to predict the outcome of war with the United States and they better reconsider. It would be inadvisable to declare war immediately but the China incident was the first consideration and they should acquire freedom without paying attention to economic pressure. The Japanese should be made to understand the necessity for ten or fifteen years of hard struggle to establish a defensive nation. If necessary, they were ready to put belligerency in action to promote the completion of the China incident and use their whole military force in China.

30962 KIDO knew the army would never agree unless a positive * diversionary attitude was put forth. It was for this reason that he offered the last suggestion as an inducement to them to complete the China affair, for he knew the army would not listen to any plan which held entire cessation of hostilities. His suggestion was a sop to avoid a clash with America. Exhibit 1147 related what was told him by three different people and no opinion of his appeared. KOYAMA, mentioned there, was a liberal indignant at army control of politics, who expressed the opinion that he wished for redoubled efforts by KONOYE. KATO was Commander of the Gen-darmerie Army who told him about the political situation.

30963 * KONOYE had called a conference of the War, Navy, Foreign Ministers, and the President of the Planning Board on 12 October to discuss how to deal with the decision of 6 September, and the third visitor, TOMITA, came by KONOYE's order to tell KIDO about the conference. According to the information KIDO received from him, TOJO contended that the government should make up its mind to wage war, in accordance with the 6 September decision, as he thought there was no hope for the negotiations, but added that he did not want war if a convincing explanation was forthcoming; that the negotiations would be brought to an amicable conclusion. OIKAWA said he thought there was still hope for the negotiations. If they were to restore friendly relations through diplomacy, it should be done in a thorough-going manner. If the negotiation was 30964 concluded amicably through diplomacy, * it was desired that Japan should come to terms with America, even making considerable concessions.

It would be embarrassing to conduct half-baked negotiations for some time and then suddenly start war. In any event the Prime Minister was desired to display his leadership.

Foreign Minister TOYODA said it would be impossible to make any prediction, but he thought there was hope for the negotiation. KONOYE stated that there was still hope and he should like to continue. TOJO was not satisfied with KONOYE's explanation. The conference rose after it was decided to draft a memorandum and entrust TOYODA with its study. TOYODA also told KIDO that from conversations with Admirals OKA and OIKAWA, the navy was opposed to war, but could not openly express its views and would leave it to the Prime Minister to make the decision.

* They made an agreement among themselves on the advice of TOJO that they should not change their policy * of stationing troops in China, or the other policies connected with it, and should not entertain anything affecting the result of the China incident. It should be found out whether negotiations within the time set forth by the High Command could succeed. When this had been ascertained, the matter should be settled through diplomacy and all operational preparations be discontinued, and TOYODA should study this to find out whether it was possible or not.

Thus the last important meeting of the third KONOYE cabinet ended with no decision as to whether Japan should go to war with America. The only decision reached did not involve a decision for war but concerned the policy to be adopted toward the China incident and the possibility of negotiations with America. Everyone's opinion at the meeting hinged on the success or failure of negotiations with America, and even Foreign Minister TOYODA could not answer TOJO's inquiry.

* On 13 October 1941, in consequence of this conference, the political atmosphere became so tense that it was feared that war would break out any moment under militaristic pressure. The situation was so delicate that on that day the Emperor showed his concern in discussing with KIDO an Imperial Rescript in case, he was required to grant sanction to the opening of war (Exh. 1149). The Emperor said that the negotiations seemed less hopeful, and that if it ended in war that we should have to issue a proclamation. In past rescripts, especially the one at the time of their withdrawal from the League, * the cause of world peace was emphasized and the necessity for harmonious cooperation of the civil and military officers in the country, but the people seem to have overlooked this point. It was regrettable that when the edict was issued at the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact, the people missed the point that the pact was proposed to bring peace and took it as if it were our challenge to the United States and Britain. If a proclamation of war were issued, the Emperor would like to have KONOYE and KIDO assist and have their sincere thoughts well expressed in the proclamation.

30970

Page

In case of war with the United States and Britain, they must study all specific conditions, especially the truth underlying the peace talks between Britain and Germany, and Germany and Russia, and they must, through diplomacy, stop Germany from concluding an individual peace, and they must have Germany assist in the war with the United States. They must also make plans as to what to do at the end of the war, and must adopt good will policies, such as exchanging envoys with the Vatican City.

30971

The same day KONOYE came to KIDO, after a conference * with the Emperor about Japanese-United States problems. Later SUZUKI visited KIDO to talk about his political views, which might contribute to a new turn in the political condition. Their conclusion was that the Premier should promote mutual understanding with the War and Navy Ministers. SUZUKI, in fear of a possible change of government, or a sudden plunge into war, expressed his opinion to KIDO, who communicated his views to SUZUKI that KONOYE should have a talk with the War and Navy Ministers to solve the dilemma to bring about a peaceful situation.

30972

* The desire for a cabinet lead by a prince of the blood, Prince HIGASHIKUNI, suddenly raised its head and was expressed by the followers of both KONOYE and TOJO. Rightist quarters also voiced such a desire. It was no wonder that a cabinet lead by a prince of the blood should be desired by the people, but KIDO thought it would lead to grave consequences unless the matter was handled cautiously. On 15 October 1941, when SUZUKI came to convey TOJO's intentions and referred to a HIGASHIKUNI cabinet, KIDO told him that anything relating to the Imperial family must be handled cautiously, and that the petition to HIGASHIKUNI to emerge as Prime Minister must be predicated on an agreement between army and navy. KIDO asked him if his understanding was correct, and stressed the necessity for furthering study of the question. Later KONOYE asked KIDO about a HIGASHIKUNI cabinet, and KIDO said he was considering it carefully.

*After further deliberation, KIDO decided to recommend a policy against HIGASHIKUNI as succeeding Prime Minister. Advocates of a HIGASHIKUNI Cabinet had all different motives. There was no doubt that KONOYE wished for HIGASHIKUNI as Prime Minister to restrain the army and avert war. As for the army, even granted that TOJO agreed with KONOYE, it was doubtful the real motives of the young military. The possibility of availing themselves of HIGASHIKUNI's emergence as Prime Minister and dragging the country into war was in full evidence, especially since the Prince's entourage included many dangerous elements. While HIGASHIKUNI was talented he lacked political experience, making it impossible * for him to grasp the complicated situation. The result would be that HIGASHIKUNI would be a mere figurehead and actual power would be assumed by the Deputy Prime Minister, which would probably be concurrently assumed by the War Minister. The possibility of averting war would be very small under a HIGASHIKUNI Cabinet.

30975 If war broke out, direct responsibility would be borne by the Imperial family. KIDO's outlook was that no optimism should be warranted for a Pacific war, but a very pessimistic view should be taken. Should the worst happen, he thought the Imperial family might become the target of hatred by the people and the question of national policy would be involved. The only case permitting a cabinet formed by a prince of the blood would be one organized as the result of the army being convinced of its error and deciding to effect a volte-face. For the purpose, the army might petition a prince of the blood to form a succeeding cabinet as it would be beyond the power of a subject * to effect such a reorientation of policy.

At 4:00 p.m. the same day, KONOYE told KIDO he would have to resign as a breach between him and TOJO had reached the point where TOJO did not wish to speak with him. In response to KONOYE's request for KIDO's opinion about a HIGASHIKUNI cabinet, KIDO repeated what he had told SUZUKI. When KIDO spoke with MATSUDAIRA, he too strongly objected to such a cabinet. In the afternoon of the 15th, KIDO spoke with SUZUKI again trying to find out TOJO's real intention and requested SUZUKI to find this out and report. KONOYE joined us then and said he had seen the Emperor who would approve a HIGASHIKUNI cabinet if the army and navy would first agree on a peaceful policy. Later SUZUKI reported that TOJO wanted to establish harmony between the army and navy by the influence of HIGASHIKUNI. KIDO told him he objected as a peaceful policy should first be agreed upon.

30979 * KONOYE telephoned KIDO to say he wanted to secure an informal consent of HIGASHIKUNI, but KIDO answered it would be too early to do so, though he had no objection to him as long as his action was in capacity as Premier. At midnight KONOYE sent a report that HIGASHIKUNI had asked for a few days' consideration, * and a meeting with TOJO and KIDO.

30981 A cabinet change at that time presented a crisis. To meet it successfully, it was necessary to comprehend fully Japan's situation in world affairs. KIDO spent sleepless nights in an endeavor to find a solution which would avert a catastrophic war. Foremost was the negotiations with America. An atmosphere was being created, partly due to militarist propaganda, for making the people keenly feel pressure from the so-called ABCD encirclement line. The news from abroad was stimulating the nerves of the Japanese people and the young military and naval officers, who had secured * the 6 September decision, proved a powerful driving force for an ominous situation.

KIDO realized it would be well-nigh impossible to form a cabinet aimed at effecting a volte-face, nor would it be possible for anyone not acquainted with the circumstances to form a cabinet, since serious difficulty would be experienced in appointing the war minister, just as UGAKI had found out some years prior. Troops having been sent so far as Southern French Indo-China, nobody could tell that if the army got out of control an untoward incident might not occur. But if it took a long time in forming a new cabinet, KIDO was afraid the country might be plunged into confusion which might develop into civil war. The military might resort to anything, as they were in high spirits with their armaments replenished, if the government made a bid for a volte-face. In such eventuality the negotiations with America would have broken down.

* On the morning of 16 October 1941, SUZUKI called on KIDO (Exh. 1151), who opposed a HIGASHIKUNI cabinet because a prince's cabinet should be carried out only when unavoidable. A member of the Imperial family should never be asked to overcome the obstacles that then existed. Formation of a HIGASHIKUNI cabinet would indicate they lacked suitable person among the subjects, and great problem would be created if war with the United States broke out under such a cabinet. There were important reasons why even KONOYE was prevented from carrying out * the policies decided at Imperial councils, and if they asked a member of the Imperial House to assume a responsibility he could not fulfil, the Imperial House would become an object of public hatred.

30983

On the afternoon of 16 October, KIDO was asked by TOJO for an interview, receiving him in the official room of the Lord Keeper. TOJO repeatedly stressed that the time had come, there was no course left to Japan but to carry out the 6 September decision. KIDO replied that it was needless to say that the decision of the Imperial conference was extremely important, and therefore must be respected and executed, but asked TOJO if it was not proper to reconsider in case there was any point manifesting want of care therein, because he thought the decision was careless. KIDO drew TOJO's attention to the report that the navy necessarily had no confidence. TOJO agreed, adding the decision could not be executed as it was, though he did not receive such a report about the navy.

30984

*TOJO said that if things could not go on as they were, it would be difficult for the KONOYE cabinet to handle the situation, and he thought there was no alternative but to petition a prince of the blood. KIDO asked if that meant the army had decided to change its past policy and that a prince would be petitioned to dispose of the aftermath, as such a volte-face could not be affected by a subject.

TOJO replied in the negative, adding that a prince would be petitioned to form a cabinet for the purpose of deciding on future policy. KIDO strongly objected, stressing that a cabinet headed by a prince of the blood should not be formed except when the country decided on an absolute peaceful policy. When TOJO asked KIDO what would become of Japan then, KIDO replied that Japan might become a third-or fourth-rate power if what he was doing was persisted in, and pointed out that the least Japan expected was true unity between the army and the navy.

30985

* The interview with TOJO lead to no definite result*, but KIDO thought that if he talked to KONOYE and he exerted a little harder, a way out of the difficulty might be found, judging by the interview with TOJO. KIDO lost no time in telephoning KONOYE, who, however, had been making his cabinet tender their resignations, and KONOYE tendered his resignation the same evening.

30986

* As KIDO thought a succeeding cabinet headed by a prince of the blood would not receive Imperial sanction before the government had established an absolutely peaceful policy, KIDO consulted KONOYE after KONOYE resigned, telling KONOYE that the 6 September decision was "cancer" and should be scrapped so as to start afresh. For the purpose, one fully acquainted with the whole circumstances must undertake formation of a new cabinet. If one not acquainted with these circumstances, which were kept secret, attempt to form a new cabinet, there was no doubt he would meet with army opposition. Therefore, KIDO thought there would be no other course but to make OIKAWA or TOJO form a new cabinet and told KONOYE to that effect, pointing out the good and bad features of either's appointment. Since TOJO had disagreed with KONOYE, it might be taken as a surrender if TOJO were appointed. But if it were offered * to OIKAWA, because the navy did not want war, the army might react stronger.

If TOJO were selected and ordered to disregard the Imperial conference, 6 September decision, he would be able to control the army and if he continued peaceful negotiations, the effect on America would be favorable as she expects war upon the resignation of his cabinet. KONOYE agreed and said that Japanese forces were as far south as Southern French Indo-China. If the army got out of control, no one could tell what situation might be precipitated by troops on the spot, and they might eventually drag Japan into war. To avoid this, TOJO, who had the army in hand must be made to undertake the formation of a succeeding cabinet, especially since he did not advocate immediate war with America, judging by his most recent remarks. As TOJO said that Japan would not be able to wage war if the navy had no confidence, it would not mean opening hostilities, even if he organized a new cabinet. A way out of the difficulty might be found if the Emperor granted a message to TOJO on this point when the Emperor commanded him to form a succeeding cabinet.

30987 KIDO asked KONOYE to give this matter further thought. * Recalling the interview with TOJO, KIDO noticed he became more thoughtful, as it did not seem he would necessarily advocate war if the navy opposed it. A change had apparently come over his thinking in the last few days. Another reason was his character, for since appointed War Minister, TOJO much respected Imperial wishes. This is one of the reasons why TOJO was pressing for the execution of the 6 September decision, which was held in the Emperor's presence. If the Emperor ordered it scrapped and review the situation on a fresh basis, KIDO had confidence that TOJO would change his policy in pursuance of Imperial wishes, as the backbone of his contention would be gone, for it would not be obligatory to execute the decision, and it had become clear that it would be difficult to carry out the past policy.

30989 KIDO understood that cynical criticisms were rampant among foreign residents in the country, and that * it would be no use to ask the Prime Minister or the Foreign Minister about Japan's foreign policy, which would be known only by the General Staff of the army. In deference to these criticisms, KIDO thought that if the army was made to conduct state affairs, and if the cabinet formed under the army itself, undertook to adjust relations with America, American misgiving might be dispelled.

30990 * On the morning of October 17, KONOYE telephoned KIDO that it was his opinion that TOJO would be a better choice as Prime Minister than Navy Minister OIKAWA provided he was given an Imperial command to scrap the 6 September decision and use his efforts to effect cooperation between the army and navy and strive for peace. KIDO did not discuss TOJO's appointment with either TOJO or OIKAWA before the meeting of the Senior Statesmen, and so far as KIDO knew, TOJO never knew he was going to recommend him. MATSUDAIRA was of the same opinion as KONOYE and KIDO.

30991 Several days after the 17 October conference (Exh. 1154), KIDO dictated a resume of it * which showed that KIDO stated to the conference that since the present cabinet change was complicated, he intended to invite KONOYE to give an explanation. But KONOYE had just sent word he was ill and unable to attend, but nevertheless he would send a document which KIDO would read.

30992 This document of KONOYE's * stated that the 6 September decision had provided that in case there was no prospect for contentions being accepted through diplomatic negotiation by early October, the government would immediately make up its mind to open war with America, 30993 Britain, and the Netherlands. The army held that there was no prospect of their conditions being accepted and it is a natural conclusion, based on the 6 September decision,* to make up its mind for war at the middle or late October. Whereas the government contended the current situation of the negotiation could not be regarded as having no prospect of being accepted and, further judging by the notes exchanged with America and other information, the United States also desired the negotiations brought to an amicable conclusion. The real intentions of Roosevelt and Hull had been obscured by misunderstanding and misgiving, for instance army units in North French Indo-China had increased piecemeal since early October, though this was done in accordance with treaty provisions.

30994 Therefore the government held that if more time was given, it could not be thought hopeless to bring negotiations even with the terms then submitted to America. If the army modified its terms* the government had believed that there was hope even then for an amicable end of the negotiation.

30995 * Attention must be paid to the fact that the army, which in pursuance of the demand from the Supreme Command, had been urging the government to make up its mind by early October as decided by the Imperial Conference, was then pressing the government to do so by the middle of October, and at the latest by the end of October, otherwise the army warned the government that it would be extremely disadvantageous in prosecuting war. The negotiation with America was still on the way.

30996 It could not be imagined that America's real intentions had already been clarified, but difficulty which had been so far experienced could be reduced to the following three points; (1) The question of withdrawal of troops from China and stationing of troops in China, (2) Japan's attitude toward the Tripartite Alliance Pact between Japan, Germany, and Italy, and (3) The question of commercial nondiscrimination in the Pacific area. * Those three difficult points centered in the question of withdrawing troops in China, and their stationing there might be said to be the only difficulty in the negotiation.

The army's contention as to this was Japan's terms of peace with China as submitted to America were extremely generous, demanding no territorial annexation or reparation. However, communistic and other lawless agitations were rampant in the interior of China, thus menacing the security of both Japan and China. It was therefore necessary for economic development, as well as for peace and prosperity of Japan and China, to station Japanese troops in designated districts for a prolonged time to carry out joint defense. But the troops might be withdrawn following the settlement of the China Affair with the exception of those needed as mentioned. According to the army's contention, stationing of troops in China was necessary. * Therefore, this was the first basic principle, because it was the only result of the China Affair. Should the affair be settled on the basis of troop withdrawal, without permitting troops stationed at designated districts, the army could not acquiesce, for this was the army's heart, without which defeatism would spread.

America's real intentions with regard to troop withdrawals had not yet been manifested. It was not thought impossible to have the terms accepted by America if only time were given for negotiation. America's contention had been so far regarded as follows; that troop withdrawal should be accepted by Japan in principle. It was not necessarily clear if America would recognize the stationing of troops, but judging by past negotiation, there was a point-giving impression that America would not pursue an attitude * flatly refusing the stationing of troops. America wanted to ascertain Japan's sincerity concerning troop withdrawal. The government's stand on this question was that negotiations with America should be kept up, with more time granted for the purpose. Japan should demand the right to station troops in view of the necessity, but should this question become the key to the success of the negotiations, how about accepting withdrawal of troops in principle and formally making a concession to make an arrangement for having Japan's stationing of troops virtually recognized by America?

30999

* Regarding the view of the government and army on war, pointing out that it had become almost impossible to import military supplies since the freezing of assets, the army held that if the situation was allowed to take its own course, Japan would become impoverished. She would not be able to counter it, even if America brought pressure to bear, nor would she be able to rise in self-defense. The army further contended that there was some risk, but if the nation united there would be no occasion for anxiety because they had their own weakness just as Japan did. The army held that if too generous terms were offered in settling the China Affair through the intermediary of America, it would deepen China's contempt and it might be necessary to launch a second punitive expedition within three years. To this fact the Prime Minister held it would be impossible for anyone who keenly feels the growing heavy responsibility since the outbreak of the China Affair * to plunge into a big war in the midst of the China Affair. A dwindling of war supplies since the American freezing of assets might represent the steady impoverishment of Japan, but with regard to securing oil resources, it was problematical whether Japan would be able to expect her desired volume of oil in a year or two, even if she conquered the Dutch East Indies, because destruction and risks of oil transportation must be considered. If it was planned to increase synthetic oil instead of going to war, it would not be necessarily impossible to produce 500,000 tons of synthetic oil by the end of 1943, and increase the figures to 4,000,000 in 1944. Due to the China Affair, national resources were drained and popular morale was lax. Therefore KONOYE believed that at this juncture, Japan should settle the Affair by some means and steadily foster her resources by going through hardship and privation with the navy as her hope.

* The Navy's view was that Japan was at a cross-roads. If it was to be settled through diplomacy, she must stick to diplomacy to the finish. It was impossible to go to war after two or three months diplomatic negotiations on the ground there was no chance of success for diplomacy. Since it was the government that decided on diplomacy or war, it must be left entirely to the Premier. There was a strong opinion in Navy circles that war should be avoided as far as possible, and the best must be done to adjust relations through diplomacy.

* As regards the development of diplomatic negotiations with America in mid-April, Under-Secretary Welles submitted the draft understanding to NOMURA, telling him relations would be able to be adjusted if points concerning the attitude of the two powers toward the European war and their relations to the China Affair were clarified. Japan's counter proposals were sent, after approval by a Liaison Conference in mid-May.

31003

Late in June, the U. S. submitted counter proposals, and the opening of the German-Soviet war added to the gravity of the situation. * Japan sent troops to South FIC in accordance with treaty provisions, whereupon America froze Japanese assets. In mid-July, Japan sent her reply to the American proposals of late June, but the second KONOYE Cabinet resigned before it was handed to the U. S. In early August the third KONOYE Cabinet proposed a personal interview between Roosevelt and KONOYE for heart to heart talks, and in late August KONOYE sent his personal message to Roosevelt.

31004

An "Outline of Execution of the Empire's National Policies" was decided by the September 6 Conference, but it was clear that the outline aimed at settling the question with America and Britain through diplomacy, and that * recourse to war might be added only when there was no chance of success for negotiations. Early in September he hastened the Roosevelt-KONOYE interview, and Japan submitted to the U. S. matters which might form a basis for the interview.

On 20 September, Japan collected the proposals and counter proposals, submitting them to the U. S., and in acknowledgement the U. S. sent an aide-memoire on October 2. With regard to the aide-memoire, a divergence of views developed between the government and army, one holding there was no chance of success for the negotiations, while the other refused to believe this, contending the negotiations be kept up or their terms modified.

* After the KONOYE message, which was read by KIDO to the statesmen, the affidavit continued with a resume of the proceedings of the Conference. WAKATSUKI said advocates of war with America often based arguments on the danger of resources being gradually exhausted. Nothing could be more dangerous.

HARA said the oil situation was the gravest of the situation. He was told the Navy stock would last two years, but he would like to know how much oil the Army had. OKADA said that no matter how long they might discuss the oil question, it would afford no conclusion.

ABE said these were extremist views or those desirous of prolonging negotiations or permitted by the same sentiment on the question of oil. He wondered how deeply the Premier had pursued this subject. * KIDO said it seemed KONOYE had duly pursued this study, but had not been able to handle the question fully. WAKATSUKI said the decision of the Imperial Conference should be respected, but its handling was totally legalistic. * Even if there was little hope of attaining the objective through diplomacy, was it wise to wage war at once? He asked if it was not proper to pay more political consideration to the question.

31007

OKADA stated that the Navy contention that if they went by treaties, everything must be regulated by treaties might be admissible. KIYOURA asked why the government must decide its attitude at once, when the Ambassador abroad said there was a chance of success. KIDO said, as for that point, the Imperial Conference fixed the date of decision in early October. There had developed a divergence of views between the government and army, and he thought the government could not help being pushed to the wall.

ABE noted that, as KIYOURA pointed out, it was incomprehensible why the government had to quit when there was a chance of success. KIDO said that point was difficult to understand. America, who believed Japan was dominated by the Army, would not reveal her real intentions so easily. * KONOYE wanted to meet Roosevelt and decide policies on broad lines first and thereafter upon details. Herein lay the divergence of views. While America's final reply had not yet been forthcoming, the date of the Imperial Conference was fast approaching.

WAKATSUKI pointed out that the China Incident was already four years old, and asked how long they thought the war with America would last. YONAI replied that the Navy said Japan would win in a war with America, which meant it would win if it fought the American fleet in the Pacific. No one could tell when such an engagement would take place. Endurance was another question.

HIROTA said that since they were in the midst of the China Incident, he thought politics must be conducted with the intentions of the Imperial General Headquarters at center. KIDO said that since they were in a time of war, it was needless to say that the intentions of the fighting services were important. When a question such as risking national existence was concerned, a perfect agreement between the army and navy was essential.

ABE said that the present moment called for a certain influence rather than a specific man, and HIROTA stated that the backing of the army and navy was necessary. OKADA said it was necessary to have a man who would be able to bring the army and navy into harmony. HIROTA asked if it was not necessary to ask Imperial Headquarters desires. HARA asked if HIROTA meant to have the Supreme Command recommend the next Premier, and HIROTA replied that he thought that might be one of the plans worth studying. OKADA questioned its advisability. KIDO thought that to make the Supreme Command recommend the next Premier was a question to be studied cautiously. The Supreme Command might be embarrassed, as it might not be able to recommend a Cabinet. HIROTA agreed.

31010

* HAYASHI said it was necessary to establish teamwork between the army and navy and cooperation between the government and Supreme Command. How about asking a prince of the blood in naval service to form a new cabinet? YONAI doubted the practicability of this. KIDO said that this had been proposed in certain quarters. The proposition might be practicable if the army and navy worked together. If the services of an Imperial Prince were desired as a step towards cooperation between the two services it might be practicable, but the prevailing situation had not reached that stage, and it would be a serious question to ask an Imperial Prince to tackle this question.

31011

* People might wonder if subjects lacked talents. Should the new Cabinet formed by an Imperial Prince decide to wage war, he would be called upon to tackle a question so difficult that even a statesman of KONOYE's character had failed to manage it. Should he fail, the Imperial Family might be denounced by the people, and KIDO could not agree to the plan.

31012 WAKATSUKI asked KIDO for his view on a succeeding Cabinet. KIDO thought it might be best for the Emperor to command TOJO to form a Cabinet. Paradoxical as it might sound, * the poisonous and irradicable difficulty was the decision of September 6. On this point, he had an exchange of views with TOJO, the result being to ascertain that the army was aware it would be impossible to wage war without the navy's determination. The army could not help proceeding in accordance with the September 6 decision unless the navy manifested its intention to modify the decision. When real cooperation between the army and navy was still not forthcoming, the September 6 decision was hurriedly made. He thought it would be most practicable to command TOJO to form a succeeding Cabinet on the part of the Emperor, and the same time order him to effect cooperation between the army and navy and re-examine the Imperial Conference decision, as TOJO was fully acquainted with the development of the situation and had the difficulty of attainment keenly driven home to himself. Even if an inactive general or admiral was commanded to form a new cabinet, there might be an unexpected result if his 31013 * formation of a Cabinet was restricted by a section of the public with the Imperial Conference decision.

31014 KIYOURA said that as for a cabinet formed by an Imperial Prince, he thought HIGASHIKUNI would not be proper. It might be proper for a military representative to form a new cabinet. WAKATSUKI thought KIDO's idea was reasonable and he should like to recommend UGAKI, but would not do so because UGAKI was in the same cabinet with him. UGAKI might be one of the most powerful candidates, though it would be embarrassing should the militarists oppose him as before. KIDO also thought UGAKI one of the most powerful candidates, but some time before UGAKI had declined the order to form a succeeding cabinet due to military opposition. * KIDO's sense of responsibility dictated caution. KIDO had not yet explored that ground, but according to the Chief Secretary, if UGAKI was commanded, KIDO thought there might not be such opposition as before. Nevertheless, there had not yet been created in the army an atmosphere in which to extend full support to UGAKI, and he believed it would be extremely difficult for UGAKI to restrain the militarists.

31015 WAKATSUKI * asked what others thought about UGAKI. ABE said UGAKI used to be looked upon as an influence by other than military circles, since it was desired to restrain the army. UGAKI's name impressed one as the very man for curbing military demands. Therefore, it might be difficult for UGAKI to control the situation.

31016 OKADA said he had no intention to say anything personal against TOJO, but the Cabinet might be regarded as having been overthrown by the Army, and he was skeptical as to whether it would be proper for the Emperor to command the War Minister representative of the Army to form a Cabinet. KIDO said his version was different. TOJO's attitude at present * was different from the attitude of HATA under the YONAI Cabinet. On the basis of a survey of the truth of the case, it could not be said that the Army alone was to blame. OKADA said that the army embraced a vigorous opinion. The Lord Keeper said the Army fires the rifles from the rear, but he was afraid it may develop into a gun.

KIDO said there was occasion for worry on that point, but the question was how useful Navy strength would be. YONAI asked if KONOYE did not quit because the Navy was not only ambiguous in its attitude, but unreliable. KIDO said this could not be said so clearly. An agreement between the army and navy and a re-examination of the Imperial Conference decision must be the foundation for saving the situation. It might be a good idea to make the Navy Minister undertake the job, as he stood for prudence, but OKADA thought it would not be absolutely proper for the Navy to recommend a new Premier from among its leaders, and YONAI agreed.

* OKADA thought UGAKI might be a good candidate if military circles became reconciled to him. WAKATSUKI said if TOJO was chosen he thought a bad impression might be created abroad. HARA said if it was to be arranged as KIDO stated, he thought it might be necessary for the Emperor to show the course of action clearly in issuing the Imperial Command, and KIDO thought he would pay full consideration to that point.

31018

HIROTA asked if it was the Lord Keeper's plan to make the Premier concurrently assume the portfolios. KIDO replied yes, and HIROTA said then it would be all right. ABE supported KIDO's plan. KIDO asked if OKADA, besides WAKATSUKI, recommended UGAKI. * OKADA replied that he had not necessarily recommended UGAKI, but thought there were some points in the Lord Keeper's plan to cause worry. HARA said that while the plan could not be said to be satisfactory, since there was no other they could not help but proceed with it. KIDO said he understood their views and would report them to the Throne and obtain Imperial sanction.

Page The affidavit continued, and KIDO pointed out that he had been charged with being present at and concurring in the decisions taken at the October 17 Conference, but no decision was taken then. He listened to the Senior Statesmen' opinions and expressed his opinion, but it was subsequent events which led to war. In recommending TOJO, neither the Statesmen nor he had any intent to do anything or had any opinion that they were doing anything preparing for or leading to war. They hoped that the recommendation of TOJO would avoid war.

31019 KIDO reported the results of the Conference to the Emperor, recommending TOJO. * Since it was difficult to settle the situation by merely setting up a new Cabinet, he asked the Throne for special instructions to be given upon issuance of the Imperial Command to TOJO, and later to OIKAWA, to make clear the Imperial wish for closer army-navy cooperation and disregarding the September 6 decision. The Emperor gave his consent. KIDO waited for TOJO and OIKAWA, and after their audience with the Emperor conveyed to them the Emperor's wish. He told them he presumed they had just received the Emperor's words in regard to army and navy cooperation. He was commanded to convey to them the Imperial desire that careful consideration be given to studying both the internal and external situations more profoundly, regardless of the September 6 resolution.

31021 * The Imperial instruction to TOJO was that he had been commanded to form a new Cabinet and would observe the Constitution. TOJO would see to it that cooperation between the army and navy would be made closer than ever. The Emperor intended to tell this to OIKAWA by calling him in later.

 The Imperial instruction to Navy Minister OIKAWA stated that the Emperor had called in TOJO, commanding him to form a new Cabinet, and told TOJO that the country was in a serious situation and he must see to it that army and navy cooperation was made closer. OIKAWA was to exert himself in conformity with this wish.

31022 * The prosecution contended that it was significant that KIDO rejected the appointment of UGAKI, but as shown at the Senior Statesmen's Conference, only WAKATSUKI favored UGAKI, and only HAYASHI suggested a prince of the blood. What UGAKI might have done was problematical and speculative. It was the opinion of KIDO and others that he would not have been able to form a Cabinet, or if he did there would have been revolution and war would have resulted. KIDO did not suggest TOJO until he was asked his opinion.

* The prosecution also contended that KIDO made no attempt to induce TOJO to adopt an attitude toward the negotiations which would offer the slightest hope for their success. He wished to point out that he was opposed to the war from the beginning to the end. The official duties of the Lord Keeper dictated that he should not interfere in national policies, and therefore he was not in a position to give public expression to his opposition.

31024

When KONOYE was Premier, he sought KIDO's views, as he was a close friend, and KIDO stressed to him the necessity for working hard to avoid war with America. The situation became worse, and KIDO gave serious thought to enable the Emperor to do his best, and made it a rule * to petition the Emperor to make the government study the situation from all angles before making a decision. Once the government decided on a national policy, he used to counsel the Emperor to approve it by trusting the government, in accordance with constitutional government.

When the TOJO Cabinet was formed, the Emperor commanded TOJO, through KIDO, to scrap the September 6 decision, a line of action which had no parallel, and KIDO presumed the Emperor had recourse to it as a last resort.

Regarding the prosecution contention that he induced the Emperor to give an instruction to the Navy which could only mean they should appoint a Navy Minister who would do whatever TOJO told him, he wished to state that the Emperor told both TOJO and OIKAWA that they would see to it that cooperation was made closer. * Neither was told to do the other's bidding. In view of the Emperor's desire for peace, his thought coincided with KIDO's, that on the Army's part it was to refrain from acting in defiance of Navy intentions. This was the thought behind his statement at the Senior Statesmen's Conference, that it would be most practical for TOJO to form a Cabinet on the part of the Emperor and at the same time order him to effect real cooperation between the army and navy.

31026

* While the prosecution had contended that in exhibit 2250, written in November, KIDO abandoned the excuse for appointing TOJO which he had given on 2 October in exhibit 1155, KIDO had never offered any excuse for TOJO's appointment. He had nothing to do with the appointment of any member of TOJO'S Cabinet, and was never consulted.

Page On 17 October, Prince KANIN asked KIDO to submit 31027 to the Throne a memorial having TOJO remain in active service and promoting him to full general. * He merely acceded to KANIN's request to do this. (Exhibit 1155).

As a result of the formation of the TOJO Cabinet, TOJO, in obedience to the Emperor's instructions, canceled the September 6 decision and set about re-examination of it. This eased the tension for war, and the Emperor was exceedingly glad.

KIDO had only one motive in recommending TOJO, and that was to avert war with America, and he sincerely felt that war had been averted. (Exhibit 1156).

The Emperor's words, "Nothing ventured, nothing gained", expressed that he was pleased that he had succeeded in making those with strong opinions give in to his own ideas to avert war. KIDO told the Emperor that one mistaken step might have needlessly plunged them into war, and that the recommendation he made was the only choice possible.

31028 * After the Cabinet formation, TOJO devoted his all to the negotiations with America. When TOJO was asked why he had concurrently assumed the portfolio of Home Affairs, TOJO told KIDO that if the negotiations with America were amicably concluded, he was afraid the country might be plunged into confusion, in which eventuality he would like to assume responsibility for peace and order.
KIDO heard from both KAYA and TOGO that when they asked TOJO if the Cabinet would be a War Cabinet, he assured them his cabinet would not be such but would devote all its efforts to adjusting relations with America.

31029 * TOJO made efforts to overcome the difficulties in negotiations with America by holding Liaison Conferences day after day, and proceeding to the Palace almost every other day to report to the Emperor. He came to KIDO's office after such audiences, telling KIDO of these reports.

The TOJO Cabinet settled the pending questions from various angles. On 29 October, SUZUKI reported the progress of the Liaison Conferences, (Exhibit 1162), and told KIDO that the Conference was generally taking a course toward evading war.

31030 At that time it seemed the fighting services were pushing war preparations. KIDO knew that if they were to come to an understanding with America, all-out efforts should be put forth with no bluff. * When he interviewed TOJO on October 29, he drew his attention to this.

Page TOJO, who apparently took a different view, told him that negotiations would be brought to an amicable conclusion only when they manifested their firm determination, and that preparations for both peace and war were necessary.

31031 With its study mostly concluded on October 31, the government undertook to reach a conclusion. On that day, after TOJO conferred with the Emperor, he reported to KIDO on the progress of the Liaison Conference, telling him that from the next day the Conference was going to enter on the final stage of discussion. Then and also on November 2, TOJO told him he wanted to avoid war as much as possible, but as a result of studying the situations the government would be called on to prepare for both peace and war, especially since consideration would have to be paid to a rupture in the negotiations. * Therefore, KIDO knew the government was preparing for both peace and war since October 31, and it was the fundamental attitude in which the government faced the Imperial Conference decision of November 5.

As exhibit 1168 showed, the Conference decided Japan's policy toward the U. S., Britain, and the Netherlands according to the principles studied by the Liaison Conferences. KIDO was not present at the Imperial Conference, and after it TOJO told him of its results with little details. He told him a final effort would be made for settling the negotiations by sending KURUSU to America, and on the other hand the Southern Army should be organized in the event of a rupture. KIDO listened without comment.

31032 * The war party in Japan, which mistook the emergence of the TOJO Cabinet for the opening of hostilities, was in high spirits for a time, but when it was disillusioned the atmosphere overnight became very ugly, and KIDO's police guard was increased and he had to follow a different route to and from office. The situation showed no easing, and the solidarity of the young officers was tightened, and an atmosphere was created in the fighting services opposing army and navy leaders' policies for adjusting relations with America. News from America became 31033 inflammatory, stiffening the military attitude, * and propaganda was spread that if Japan further dilly-dallied she would be attacked by America. KIDO strove to prevent a Pacific war, and on November 19 counseled the Emperor to deprecate strongly entering into war with the passing of the end of November as if it were a routine matter, but instead handle the situation cautiously. Page 31034 KIDO advised the Emperor that when the Premier asked his final decision, the Premier should be ordered to hold the council in the Imperial presence with all Senior Statesmen participating. KIDO felt that the fact that November was ending did not warrant the inevitability of war, and that re-examination should be made of the November 5 decision. * He thought he could bring the negotiations to an amicable conclusion by invoking Imperial intervention. The situation failed to show improvement, while foreign news became more stimulating.

The Emperor asked him to seek the views of the Senior Statesmen on November 26, and KIDO replied that the Emperor's decision this time would have a final one, and it was desirable that every measure be taken so the Emperor might not be sorry for it later, and he counseled him to issue commands to TOJO freely.

31035 As exhibit 1190 showed, KIDO met Privy Council President HARA regarding a Senior Statesmen's Conference, * and that in the audience with the Emperor, the Emperor feared that the worst might come to the worst, recommending another Senior Statesmen's Conference. Whereupon, KIDO stressed the finality of the decision and prayed that the Emperor command the Premier without reserve.

31036 * Exhibit 2249, a telegram from NOMURA to KURUSU on 26 November, received in the Foreign Ministry on the 27th, suggested that if the condition did not change, negotiations must be given up, and they were humiliated by their lack of influence, and the only way to bridge the difficulty would be to let Roosevelt cable the Emperor. The telegram also discussed occupancy of NEI, and ended with a wish that the telegram be shown to the Lord Keeper. KIDO never saw this telegram, and had no recollection of ever talking to TOGO about it. If he did talk to KIDO about it, it must have been after receipt of the Hull message of the same date. If TOGO spoke to him about it, it must have been very slightly, and after TOGO consulted TOJO. KIDO had nothing to do with TOGO's answering telegram of November 28 and never saw it until the trial.

31037 * The formula for saving the situation by invoking Imperial intervention was found impossible when Japan received the Hull note of November 26. The American proposal was so strong and so beyond the pale of contingencies anticipated by KIDO, and the government said it was tantamount to an ultimatum.

Page Pursuant to his suggestion to the Emperor on November 19, the Senior Statesmen met on November 29 and listened to a full report by TOJO on the development of negotiations. The meeting was not attended by the Emperor nor KIDO, but the Senior Statesmen, some Cabinet members, and KIDO lunched with the Emperor, and KIDO learned what had transpired in the morning.

31038 * After luncheon, the Emperor had an hour's meeting with the Senior Statesmen, at which TOJO and others from the government were present, and KIDO attended solely to be at the Emperor's service, but did not participate nor say anything. The meeting was different from the Senior Statesmen's conference for the selection of a new Premier, and they gave their unreserved views. After the luncheon, the Senior Statesmen resumed their meeting with the government from 3 p.m. until 4. Neither the Emperor nor KIDO attended, but KONOYE told KIDO what transpired.

31039 * Exhibit 1196, the diary entry for 29 November 1941, showed that KIDO conferred with the Grand Chamberlain at 10 a. m. It had been arranged that the government would hold a round table conference to discuss the American negotiations. The conference lasted longer than anticipated, and it appeared they discussed all questions seriously.

31040 * From about 2 p. m. for about an hour, the Emperor listened to the Senior Statesmen's opinions.

WAKATSUKI said he was not worried about the people's spiritual strength, but in the matter of materials the question of whether they could stand a long range war deserved careful study. OKADA thought they were truly confronted with a critical situation, and he was concerned with whether they could put full confidence in their ability to supply necessary materials. While there was a government explanation a short while before, he was not still convinced. HIRANUMA stated he agreed with WAKATSUKI on the spiritual strength of the people, but if after they had been engaged in war four years things developed into a protracted war, hardships and privations would become necessary and efforts to brace up public sentiment would be necessary.

31041 * KONOYE deeply regretted he had not been able to do anything toward adjusting Japanese-American relations, but expressed his appreciation for the zealous efforts of the present Cabinet. To his regret, he was forced to conclude on the basis of that morning's government explanation that further continuation of negotiations would be hopeless.

Page

He asked, however, if it was necessary to resort to war at once, even though negotiations had been broken off. Would it not be possible, while carrying on things as they were, to find a way later out of the deadlock? He thought he would like to question the authorities on this point later.

31042

YONAI prayed that they might take care not to lose everything by trying to avoid becoming poor gradually. HIROTA said that after having talked on conditions of each of the world powers since World War I, Japan had adopted every means to avoid the intervention of Britain and America into the China Affair. * In spite of this, the diplomatic situation had become serious. According to the government's explanation, they were face to face with a diplomatic crisis. Though this had a close relation to the strategic moment, he thought the true intentions of both sides in negotiations were only revealed after several crises, and asked why they should hastily rush into war immediately after being confronted with the present crisis. Granting that war was inevitable, he believed they should be on watch to seize the opportunity for a solution by diplomatic negotiations, even though blows had been exchanged.

31043

HAYASHI said he thought there was no alternative but to rely on conclusions of the Cabinet, after cooperation and study with headquarters. ABE said that according to the government's explanation, it seemed that the continuation of negotiations would be difficult, and he believed they could not expect anything further from the Cabinet, as they appeared to have studied matters from every angle, * but it would be necessary to take the Chinese people's attitude into account.

31044

WAKATSUKI wanted to say that if it was necessary for the preservation and self-defense of the Empire, they must rise to arms even though they could foresee defeat, since it was dangerous to execute state policy or use national strength to achieve such ideas as the establishing of a Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere or "The Stabilizing Power of East Asia".

After the conference concluded KONOYE came to KIDO and they conversed on relations with America. * All the Senior Statesmen expressed cautious and prudent opinions with respect to any decision regarding war. He had been charged with being present at and concurring in the decision of November 29, but he was present only at the one hour meeting with the Emperor, Senior Statesmen, TOJO and others, which was called primarily for the Emperor to hear the opinions of the Statesmen.

Page TOJO spoke briefly, and KIDO could not recall what he said other than that war was inevitable. No decision was made at this meeting, and it was reported to him that no decisions were made at the other two meetings either, and he was not present at them.

31045 * On November 30, the Emperor summoned KIDO and said that Prince TAKAMATSU had told him that the Navy appeared to oppose war, and wanted to know the Navy's 31046 real intention. * KIDO advised that the Emperor's decision was of such gravity that if one decided it could not be later retracted. Hence if there was the least uncertainty, every possible precaution should be taken, and requested that the Navy Minister and Chief of the Naval General Staff be called to ascertain Navy intentions, and that the matter be conveyed to the Premier also.

31047 After the Emperor's conference with the two Navy representatives, KIDO was called in and told to instruct TOJO to proceed as planned. The prosecution contended that the Emperor told KIDO that in view of the fact that the Navy Minister and General Chief of Staff had given affirmative answers as to the success of war he had told * the Premier to act accordingly, but as was shown above, the Emperor's instructions were to proceed with the Imperial Conference, not the war.

On December 1, the Council in the Imperial presence decided on war with America, and TOJO called on KIDO to consult about the Imperial Rescript on the declaration of war, where the words "at last" appear in exhibit 1210. These words were not an expression of expectation, but of finality.

31048 * On December 6, the Cabinet Secretary consulted KIDO on the wording of the Imperial Rescript, and KIDO offered his suggestions. Exhibit 1220, the diary entry for December 7, showed KIDO conversed with HOSHINO, who reported to him that the Rescript had been corrected in accordance with the suggestions he had given to Cabinet Secretary INADA. They discussed nothing else.

At 12.40 a. m. on the morning of December 8, TOGO telephoned KIDO and said that Ambassador Grew had brought to him a telegram from Roosevelt addressed to the Emperor, and asked for KIDO's advice in handling the message. KIDO told him he thought TOGO should talk with the Premier about it, and did not believe the Emperor would mind being disturbed at midnight. At 1.30 a. m. Imperial Household Minister MATSUDAIRA also called about the telegram. KIDO was notified that TOJO had proceeded

Page to the Palace, so he went there at 2.40 a. m., but only spoke for a few minutes. KIDO did not see the telegram, nor did TOGO tell him of its contents, and KIDO went home.
31049 * arriving there at 3.30 a. m. He heard nothing in advance about the dispatch of a telegram to America in connection with the breaking off of Japan-American negotiations. The next morning a little after six o'clock an aide-de-camp telephoned him about the naval attack on Hawaii, but did not go into details. This was KIDO's first information about the Pearl Harbor attack. He did not know in advance it was to be attacked, nor knew of any plan to do so. These were all military matters of the greatest secrecy, and he understood later that even military men in high places did not know of the attack before it occurred, which was not unusual due to the fact that KIDO and other court officers were not in sympathy with war with America and were not taken into the confidence of the naval officials.

Furthermore, after the assassination of the Lord Keeper in the February 26, 1936 Incident, the Emperor advised the Lord Keeper on matters pertaining to the High Command as little as possible to avoid any implacation that the Lord Keeper was interfering in military operations.

31051 * Once the war was commenced, the people were intoxicated with the initial victories, and an outcry was raised against KONOYE, accusing him of evading the responsibility of opening war. This weighed on KONOYE's mind, and he confessed he wanted to give up the peerage and retire from active service, but KIDO advised him that this was too rash and the time would come when he would have to exert himself again.

31052 * On December 18, (Exhibit 1269), TOJO visited KIDO, mentioning the need for controlling discussion about KONOYE. but this was a mistranslation and it was KIDO who mentioned this to TOJO.

The military achievements for the first six months after the war intoxicated the nation, and KIDO * shared their rejoicings, but none the less could not believe Japan would emerge victorious, and inwardly thought it necessary to exert every effort for peace. He believed Japan would commit a blunder if she went too deep in it, elated over her initial successes.

Army and navy leaders, however, did not think too seriously about this, and Chief of Staff SUGIYAMA, in response to an Imperial inquiry on the draft change for the conference of September 5, 1941, optimistically stated the Southern Campaign would be finished in three months, but KIDO could not share his sanguine optimism. On February 5, 1942, he told the Emperor * that the enemy had an indomitable fighting will, though he had suffered reverses. The Pearl Harbor attack not only strengthened the feeling against Japan, but unified American public opinion, and the war would not easily end. The shortest way to peace was to fight it out, but they must also pay due attention to construction. It would be necessary to seize the occasion to return to peace soon to minimize war ravages. The army and navy had recently stated that they had gone through elaborate preparations and training, but it was problematical if the picked, specially trained troops would be maintained for long with replacements. It was inevitable that the time would come when a difference in the resources of the contending powers counted, and full consideration must be paid by the army and navy to this.

31055

* The Emperor seemed surprised at KIDO's strong warning, but appeared to understand that an alarming situation was in store. KIDO's statement to the Emperor served to help the Emperor grasp the full significance of the war. * In an audience with the Emperor on February 12, the Emperor told KIDO that when TOJO was received the day before, TOJO reported that all future home and foreign policies would be studied by the Liaison Conference. The Emperor told TOJO that he presumed he was paying full attention so as not to miss the opportunity to terminate the war, for it was not desirable for the sake of humanity and peace to have it drag on needlessly. The solution of this might depend on the future attitude of America and 31057

31056

Britain, * and it might also be necessary to ascertain the future development of the situation between Germany and the Soviet. It would not do in handling the natural resources in the south to take half measures, * but Singapore fell on September 16, and there was a quick succession of military successes, and army and navy circles were making pronouncements that elaborate care had been taken in war preparations.

31058

Page

31059 These pronouncements captured the people's fancy, and they reposed greater confidence in the fighting services. KIDO and others were not aware that special training had been gone through by army and navy units, and was all the more surprised at the big successes. Neither was the Emperor aware that such elaborate training had been undergone as the fighting forces had announced, and the Emperor was not free from uneasiness. * Later, however, army and navy leaders seized every occasion to report to the Throne on the special training undergone.

KIDO was skeptical, that even if picked troops had gone through elaborate training, they could not maintain successes for long. The result was uneasiness, that a difference in the resources of the contending countries would eventually tell. KIDO thought it would be no easy task to terminate the war easily.

31060 As exhibit 1985 showed, Imperial Household Minister MATSUDAIRA called on KIDO on March 13, 1942, about the speech delivered by British Foreign Minister Eden, who referred to violence committed by Japanese troops on British POWs in Hong Kong. MATSUDAIRA thought they would have to pay considerable attention to this * problem, and KIDO reported this to the Throne, and the Emperor consulted TOJO. TOJO examined into things in Hong Kong, receiving a report that the treatment of POWs was just and fair. KIDO was relieved, and reported to the Throne, and believed the report.

31061 Quick successes in Java and Boendang intoxicated the people with victory, and no one thought of peace except for a very few. * SHIGEMITSU returned home from China, and on April 11 KIDO heard from him about the China situation. SHIGEMITSU disclosed that the actual situation was not developing as satisfactorily as the army claimed. He stressed the necessity for a reorientation of Japan's policy toward China, emphasizing that Chinese independence and sovereignty be recognized and China returned to the Chinese and the two countries work on a cooperative basis. KIDO approved SHIGEMITSU's moderate policy, promising to support it. KIDO thought it may be possible to settle the Affair, which might pave the way for ending the Pacific War itself.

31062 * On May 21, the Chief Aide-de-camp advised KIDO that the fliers who had raided Tokyo on April 18 had been taken prisoner in China and would be court-martialed in Tokyo. As this was a military matter, KIDO expressed no opinion, assuming they would be given a fair trial because the Emperor had previously reprimanded SUGIYAMA when he suggested immediate execution.

* The Midway Campaign ended in a big failure early in June 1942, and Japan's fleet air force was swept out of existence. It was foreseen it would not be easy to build replacements and the necessity for seizing occasion at the earliest opportunity to save the situation was again brought home to KIDO.

* At this time there were some in the intellectual classes who thought seriously about the necessity for hastening the return of peace. One of them was YOSHIDA Shigeru, who called on KIDO on 11 June 1942, telling him about a plan to have KONOYE go to Europe and sojourn in Switzerland so as to get in touch with leaders of various countries when opportunity arose. KIDO had no objection to YOSHIDA's basic idea to terminate the war as soon as possible, but told him he would like to think over the propriety of KONOYE's immediate visit to Europe. * YOSHIDA and KIDO pledged to do their bit for an early peace.

31066

Exhibit 1273, the diary entry of 1 September 1942, revealed the circumstances surrounding the resignation of TOGO from the TOJO Cabinet because TOGO objected to the establishment of the Greater East Asia Ministry. From the rationalistic point of view, KIDO did not dissent from TOGO's opinion but thought that the first thing to be avoided was a change of government for this would reinforce the enemy * and being desirous of evading a great political change, he used his good offices. Abolition of special service agencies in China was one of the purposes of the Greater East Asia Ministry.

31067

The court martial of American flyers was under the Chief of the General Staff. On 3 October 1942, TOJO told KIDO about the disposition of the American flyers, but KIDO was not told of any "treatment." TOJO told KIDO that he was advised that the death punishment would be inflicted, but that he caused the penalty for most of them to be reduced. At TOJO's request, KIDO reported this to the Throne, pending a report by Chief of Staff SUGIYAMA. KIDO knew nothing of the treatment of the flyers while they were prisoners.

31068

* The war situation progressed decidedly against Japan and the necessity for terminating hostilities was further driven home to KIDO and on 4 February 1943, he exchanged views with MATSUDAIRA at the request of KONOYE who had repeatedly stressed the necessity for ending the war without delay on the ground that the Communist movement would become recrudescent if the home structure were to be strained. MATSUDAIRA and KIDO shared KONOYE's concern and pledged with KONOYE that they would never miss the opportunity to terminate the war.

31069

* On 30 March 1943, at an audience with the Emperor, the Emperor expressed concern over the war situation and told KIDO about the necessity for terminating the war without delay. KIDO in reply stated his views on the basis of the talks he had had with KONOYE and MATSUDAIRA. On 20 April 1943, TOJO called on KIDO, telling him he had decided to reconstruct his Cabinet. As a result, SHIGEMITSU was appointed Foreign Minister. In SHIGEMITSU, KIDO found a partner to talk to about his peace moves and from then until the surrender he worked closely with SHIGEMITSU for ending the war.

31070

* SHIGEMITSU questioned Ambassador Stahmer on the status quo of Germany after Germany's submarine warfare began to lose its power. At this meeting KIDO confided in SHIGEMITSU his idea of peace moves, one part of which was army control through a Prince of the blood. On 14 May KIDO told Prince TAKAMATSU that in case there was a situation requiring peace moves, it would be most difficult to adjust the fighting services' demands and in such a contingency the Prince would be requested to double his efforts. He told TAKAMATSU that no solution would be * forthcoming unless a Prince of the blood intervened for the hardest task would be to reconcile the demands of the military with the peace terms. The turn of the year warranted no optimism and KIDO wrote a memorandum on the outlook of the war and a peace plan. On 6

31071

31072

January 1944, he expressed to Chief Secretary MATSUDAIRA (Exhibit 1276) * that Japan should act on her own judgment in case Germany surrendered unconditionally, that if the so-called ABCD encirclement line was broken, Japan's war aim would have been fulfilled and therefore the Pacific War would be terminated by

The area under Japanese occupation should be demilitarized and the smaller Pacific nations be neutralized permanently, and the economic policy be based on liberalism and equal opportunity. KIDO also stated that Japan should devote the coming century to fostering her national resources at home and during this period she should cooperate with the Soviet and China to provide against a general attack (Summarizer's Note: Exhibit 1276 says Japan should cooperate with the Soviet and China against Britain and the U.S.) In other words, Japan should build up a defense to meet the changing circumstances. KIDO therefore arranged all his views and told them to MATSUDAIRA whom he asked to sound various circles about it. When he told the plan to SHIGEMITSU, his opinion was more pessimistic * and he said that unconditional surrender would be unavoidable. As a result, KIDO was silent on this particular plan to government circles.

31074 * The failure in Saipan in June 1944 made KIDO think it extremely dangerous to be led by wishful observations. On June 26, KIDO talked to SHIGEMITSU about the outlook on the war and Japan's foreign policy. SHIGEMITSU and KIDO reached the conclusion that the government had no intention to take action while the fighting services were recklessly pushing the war and there would be almost no chance of success if peace moves were taken on these quarters. If the secret leaked out it would defeat the purpose and the fighting services would stiffen their attitude. *

31075 SHIGEMITSU suggested that the senior statesmen be made to serve the Emperor to strengthen the Court. KIDO replied it would be problematical whether senior statesmen would be able to render such services for they might further stimulate the public who might regard them as Japanese Badoglios. SHIGEMITSU and KIDO reached an agreement that there was no other course but to take action on the strength of Imperial decision, assuming full responsibility for the Imperial Court and Government.

31076 * On June 29, KIDO talked with Chief Secretary MATSUDAIRA and MATSUDAIRA, Tsuneo. At that time, KIDO

Page thought of peace moves the same as which he later took, aimed at negotiating directly with America by obtaining the Emperor's personal message. Senior statesmen became more active, but on the other hand the meeting of eight generals and admirals was reported. KIDO received visits in July from SHIGEMITSU, KONOYE, State Minister KISHI, and Home Minister ANDO, and he was aware of the strong indications of an imminent political change.

31077

* On July 3, Chief Secretary MATSUDAIRA told him that OKADA had called on HIRANUMA about the war's outlook. OKADA contended it would be necessary to change the Cabinet, while HIRANUMA held that a memorial be filed by the senior statesmen with the Throne in this connection. The situation became so bad that TOJO decided to reorganize his Cabinet again and he submitted his proposals to KIDO on 17 July. (Exhibit 1277)

31078

* KIDO made no comment about the policies of the Cabinet, the establishment of the High Command, changing the Navy Minister and strengthening the Liaison Conference. The same day the senior statesmen met and OKADA called on KIDO, reporting the agreement of views reached by them. (Exhibit 1277) * The informal decision of the statesmen was that to find their way through the difficult situation, the popular mind must be renewed and all cooperate to build a powerful national Cabinet. Partial reorganization would not be of any use.

31079

TOJO failed to enlist the services of ABE and YONAI as Cabinet members, while State Minister KISHI contended that since the Cabinet failed to re-construct itself through the services of senior statesmen, it should resign.

31080

On 18 July, TOJO told KIDO he had made up his mind to carry out a Cabinet resignation en bloc. This surprised KIDO as it was so sudden, but KIDO refrained from comment as he thought a Cabinet change would be desirable * but he asked TOJO about his idea on a succeeding Premier. TOJO, apparently dissatisfied over the senior statesmen's attitude, replied that he thought their responsibility for the present change was heavy. They may have already formulated their own plan and therefore he did not express his views.

After the TOJO Cabinet's resignation, the senior statesmen met the afternoon of 18 July to select a succeeding Premier. At the meeting it was thought necessary to modify the TOJO Cabinet's policy of strong economic policy on one hand and on the other exercise sufficient political ability to grasp the trend of popular sentiments. It might have been suggested to select a Premier from among the civil services but no suitable candidate was found. Since the war was at its bitterest stage, the statesmen agreed to choose a new Premier from among the fighting services * and the choice was to be limited to one in active service. It was agreed that TERAUCHI and KOISO be chosen as the first and second candidates. Both YONAI and HIRANUMA recommended KOISO.

(Exh. 1278. The diary entry of 18 July 1944, which set forth the Senior Statesmen's Conference, was re-read into the record. This is in evidence at Page 11377.)

* KOISO, who was in Korea, was summoned and arrived in Tokyo on 20 July 1944. The day before, SUZUKI told KIDO about the political responsibility created by the recommendation of KOISO but KIDO did not retain an exact memory of this talk. (Exh. 1279)

31104

However, he referred * to a considerable fear entertained as to whether it was possible for KOISO to meet the situation successfully. KOISO's recommendation made on the Senior Statesmen's recommendation, aroused fear in political circles as to the possibility of his tiding over the difficult situation. KONOYE was of the opinion that after YONAI joined the Cabinet, he might not only help toward solving the problem of unifying the Supreme Command between the Army and Navy, but also make it possible to establish the national united front. KONOYE told KIDO that HIRANUMA approved his idea. KIDO also approved and requested Chief Secretary MATSUDAIRA to find out the views of the other statesmen and on 20 July MATSUDAIRA reported.

31105

ABE was the only one who disagreed to a KOISO-YONAI coalition cabinet. When KIDO reported to the Emperor, he approved of the coalition. * Later, the senior statesmen reconvened and KIDO explained the development regarding the coalition, Page and all concurred. KIDO later explained the situation to KOISO and KOISO and YONAI received the mandate as Premier and Deputy Premier respectively.

31106 * In addition to the conversation mentioned with SHIGEMITSU on June 26 about peace plans, KIDO had others in July. SHIGEMITSU's retention of the Foreign Affairs' portfolio in the KOISO Cabinet made KIDO reassured. SHIGEMITSU gave serious and earnest thought to mediation between Germany and the Soviet and the sending of envoys. As in 1943, however, Germany refused to pay attention to the question of peace with the Soviet, nor did the Soviet pay attention to it. KIDO remembered hearing from SHIGEMITSU that the Foreign Office received allied protest * concerning treatment of POWs through the Swiss Legation. SHIGEMITSU later assured KIDO that the Foreign Office immediately communicated with the Army, who reported either that the reports were untrue or that efforts were being made to ameliorate the situation. KIDO took it for granted that efforts were really being made. SHIGEMITSU advised that the military were not easy to deal with in regard to this and many other matters and it was necessary to use great tact and diplomacy. It was at the Tribunal that KIDO first heard detailed reports.

31110 * Early in 1944, when the war situation developed against Japan, many of the intellectuals felt deep concern and KONOYE, HIRANUMA, WAKATSUKI, and OKADA usually met once a month, mainly to exchange views on how to terminate hostilities. OKADA would tell Chief Secretary MATSUDAIRA about the meeting and MATSUDAIRA and KONOYE told KIDO about it.

31111 In January 1945 the war situation in the Philippines became very grave and the Emperor asked KIDO if it was not necessary to seek the Senior Statesmen's views, and KIDO advised him that he should consult the Chiefs of the Army and Navy General Staffs, then members of the Cabinet, and then * an Imperial Council of Senior Statesmen, and the Cabinet should be convened. He told the Emperor that he wished he would observe the transition of the war situation for a few days at any rate.

* On January 13th the Emperor again referred to a meeting with the Senior Statesmen after observing the situation in the Philippines and FIC. KIDO advised him that he would study these matters. He had been giving the question of how the Emperor could obtain the Senior Statesmen's opinion serious thought for a meeting with them at this time was fraught with danger if the military found out about it.

31113

* Since the Senior Statesmen shared the Emperor's solicitude, KIDO could not look on with folded arms and had to do something. After consulting Imperial Household Minister, MATSUDAIRA, he made arrangements that the Senior Statesmen be received in audience separately to submit their views to prevent military suspicion.

31114

* Thereafter, in February, HIRANUMA, HIROTA, KONOYE, WAKATSUKI, OKADA, TOJO and also MAKINO, had audiences with the Emperor to express their views. KIDO had a further talk with SHIGEMITSU about the prospects of the war.

Meanwhile, the KOISO Cabinet was taking moves on Chungking for settling the China Affair, planning to open negotiations directly with Chiang Kai-shek. In early September 1944, the plan was referred to the Supreme Council for Direction of War, which decided on the guiding principle for the purpose, but no tangible result was produced. In March 1945, Premier KOISO sent Colonel YAMAGAYA to China to invite Liao Pin to Japan to open direct negotiations with Chiang. The adverse war situation in the Philippines must have been fully known to Chungking. It was beyond conception that China would make peace separately with Japan without consulting America and Britain. Further, Liao Pin was said not to be fully reliable. In consequence, SHIGEMITSU, SUGIYAMA, YONAI and Chief of Staff UMEZU were opposed to the projected peace moves toward Chungking, but KOISO was very enthusiastic and on April 2, reported to the Throne his plan for peace negotiations with Chungking through Liao Pin. *

The Emperor referred the matter to the War, Navy and Foreign Affairs Ministers, as a result of which

Page it was ascertained that the opportunity was not yet ripe and the matter was dropped. To cope with a sudden deterioration of the war situation, KOISO sought his reinstatement in active service and concurrent appointment as War Minister for redoubling his efforts for prosecuting the war, but the plan failed due to Army opposition. This and other reasons were responsible for the collapse of the KOISO Cabinet.

- 31118 * On 4 April 1945, KOISO told KIDO he intended to resign and explained his reasons (Exhibit 1281). At that time, feeling the necessity of taking immediate steps to end the war, KIDO considered this a golden opportunity. He had previously made known to the Chief Aide-de-Camp his intentions in the event of a Cabinet change and to meet with the two Chiefs of Staff and the War and Navy Ministers to find out what the Supreme Command was thinking. When KOISO mentioned he thought an Imperial Headquarters Cabinet should be formed, KIDO seized the opportunity to request permission from the Emperor that he would like to see the Ministers and Staff Chiefs prior to the Senior Statesmen's Conference. (Exhibit 1281)
- 31119 By an Imperial Headquarters Cabinet was meant a Cabinet in which the Premier assumed the power * of the Chiefs of Staff to direct the conduct of the war. KOISO resigned on April 4 and KIDO conferred with Chief of Staff UMEZU, Navy Minister YONAI, War Minister SUGIYAMA, and Navy Chief of Staff OIKAWA (Exhibit 1282).

- 31120 UMEZU did not stress the "need of a special cabinet" but doubted the practicability of a special cabinet. KIDO expressed no opinion. As a result of the conversations, KIDO ascertained that all of them generally opposed a change of the cabinet's character, holding that a clear line of demarcation be drawn between the High Command and the conduct of State affairs by the Government as done in the past. * It was highly problematical whether the adverse war situation would be retrieved even if a new Cabinet was formed under KOISO's conception. Judging by the home situation, the country could not afford to make such a trial. The necessity for a drastic reorientation was driven home to KIDO so he thought it dangerous to practice KOISO's idea. KIDO asked YONAI's opinion about a new Premier and he KIDO attended the Conference of Senior Statesmen that day, and they too opposed an Imperial Headquarters Cabinet and it was contended that a man free from any past commitment or a man capable of taking a long range view be selected and that the choice be not necessarily limited to an active general or admiral.

- 31121 * TOJO was the only exception, contending that HATA be chosen on the ground that the war situation had entered a state in which a decisive battle would have to be fought in the Japanese mainland and that the next Premier must be an active general or admiral. KIDO stated that if a decisive battle was to be fought in the mainland, it would be political power behind the gun that counted. Pointing out the Army's extreme unpopularity among the people, he said it would be better to choose a non-Army man, but TOJO would not yield, saying that if this was done, the Army might look the other way (meaning a coup d'etat). KIDO retorted that the nation would look the other way if an Army man was chosen. No conferee touched upon peace moves explicitly, fearing that in view of TOJO's presence, any tactless remark might stimulate the Army to an unscrupulous counter-measure. But all except TOJO had a tacit understanding o. this point. * SUZUKI said he would like to decline the offer as Premier as he had never taken part in politics.

Exhibit 1282 (admitted but not previously read) gave the full proceedings of the Senior Statesmen's Conference on April 5, 1945, attended by KONOYE, HIRANUMA, SUZUKI, HIROTA, KIDO, WAKATSUKI, OKADA and TOJO. After KIDO explained the political change and after passing KOISO's resignation around, TOJO said that the resignation stated that both the state affairs and supreme command required supervision. He asked what the meaning of this statement was, but KIDO said there was no explanation given by KOISO.

31123

* TOJO said that frequent changing of Cabinets in war time was deplorable. The next Cabinet should be the final one. There was on one hand the opinion

Page they should fight to the last, and on the other an opinion to accept unconditional surrender. TOJO thought it necessary to decide on this first.

31124

OKADA said the new Cabinet should shoulder the destiny of the country and solidly combine the country's total power. War or peace could be determined only at a later stage. HIRANUMA said there was no way out but to fight to the end and that * problem was simple. He was bewildered by the sudden political change. He wished they could have heard the opinions of KOISO and YONAI, but it was too late and he suggested that they carefully discuss the problems presented. KIDO agreed and said it appeared for a time that a total resignation would occur but he had thereafter heard it was changed to a reorganizing policy, and both SUGIYAMA and HATA were to be transferred to C-in-C of General Defense Command and it became necessary to change the War Minister and ANAMI was offered the post.

31125

* KIDO said that to effect reorganization and then execute a total resignation later would betray the Army and that was why he made up his mind suddenly. OKADA asked how about discussing the total power of concentration and powerful cabinet. HIRANUMA said that formerly the Premier was first decided and that the Premier then recommended the Ministers to the Throne, but this time if the principal Ministers were not decided, the Cabinet would not be powerful.

TOJO said that if they decided on the Cabinet Ministers, would it not mean that the Emperor would bear the responsibilities after the formation. HIRANUMA replied it would not be right for the Emperor to give orders directly and TOJO said they should avoid having the good and bad of cabinet formation falling back on the Emperor. HIRANUMA said that what he meant to say was that how about deciding it after soliciting opinions a little more. * HIROTA stated they must win by any means. All countries have at one time been on the verge of defeat and have rallied. The next Cabinet should fight through to win the war and he thought KIDO's action in interviewing Army and Navy authorities was appropriate, but perhaps their intentions should be ascertained a little more. KIDO said he had asked them considerably but there were no special opinions expressed.

31127 HIRANUMA said that KOISO's Cabinet Formation was a failure and he should have consulted them a little more. KIDO agreed and said that in the case of the Lord Keeper, after making a recommendation, he was to keep his mouth shut regarding cabinet formation. * When it did not go well, he was criticized on his responsibility for recommending, and he believed the system ought to be corrected. (The translation of KIDO's last remarks is different in the Exhibit than in the Affidavit.) HIRANUMA said he thought it was unreasonable that the responsibility should be taken by the Lord Keeper alone.

31128 OKADA stated that some said that considerable surplus power still existed, but before amassing the total power,* unity among the leaders was desired, and it was necessary to study whether the previous procedure was right or wrong.

HIRANUMA noted that after a decision was made by them and the Lord Keeper informally reported to the Throne, a situation would develop where he could not interfere.

KONOYE said that although HIRANUMA was right, the problem was not what form it should be carried out, and KIDO said there were many who desired firmer unity among the leaders.

HIRANUMA thought it was better to have closer contact in the organization of the Cabinet and OKADA agreed. SUZUKI thought there was no necessity to limit the scope of the Emperor's summons and he would like to ask the Lord Keeper's opinion. He remembered that SAIONJI sought the advice of Count YAMAMOTO and Admiral TOGO, and asked if after obtaining the Emperor's consent, if they should solicit the views of MAKINO.

* KIDO said that SUZUKI was right, but the procedure was different now and had been decided upon in accordance with the Emperor's desire, that the conference membership would consist of those enjoying full confidence of the Emperor and it would be impossible to request MAKINO's participation now.

HIROTA said that unification in the upper classes was necessary and he thought it would be better

Page to have such a person as MAKINO participate. He asked that if in the case of Cabinet changes, would the Supreme War Guidance Council continue, and was the Premier's attending Imperial Headquarters permitted only to KOISO or would this continue.

31130 KIDO said that there were opinions that since the Premier attended Imperial Headquarters, the Council was unnecessary. * He thought hereafter the Premier would be able to attend Headquarters. TOJO said the Premier would attend as a participator in the War Council and would witness the manipulation of troops.

31131 * SUZUKI said that although he could understand the case of MAKINO, he would say that only when they included him, the scope would not become obscure.

WAKATSUKI did not understand the purport of the resignation and KONOME said that since the case was so sudden, he had no idea to explain the character of the new cabinet. In regard to TOJO's opinion, it could not be decided while the Supreme Command was not represented. He asked how about limiting the field to military circles and whether it would be from the Army or Navy. TOJO said he did not mean that Premiers should be decided at the meeting but meant it should be submitted to the Emperor for preparation.

WAKATSUKI said the report of the Imperial summons was to have them choose a new Premier and he believed it was against the Imperial will to discuss things which TOJO had mentioned. To discuss whether they should fight to the last or seek peace was not the question for it went too far.

31132 * SUZUKI said that according to WAKATSUKI's opinion, they must fight the war to the end. He, too, thought this problem must be settled first and if the leader of the new cabinet did not possess this will, he thought he was unsuitable. WAKATSUKI said he thought he was requested to state his opinion regarding this but TOJO said it was not so, but was meant to be merely an assumption.

KIDO said that when the situation was that the homeland was about to be a battle field, there was grave concern for the public did not always cooperate with government measures. The incoming cabinet must place confidence in the people. Lately, anti-militarism tendencies had appeared, and he thought this must be given careful consideration. HIRANUMA said that the basic idea was that imminent subjects should be responsible to the Throne.

* WAKATSUKI pointed out that twenty years had elapsed since he had been Premier and while he was willing to take responsibilities, he believed he was unsuitable. If HIRANUMA's opinion should be adopted (selecting principal cabinet members beforehand) no one would accept the Premiership for it would thoroughly restrict his activities.

31134

KONOYE said that on the previous occasion, the matter of state affairs and supreme command was also the focus of consideration and for this purpose a military man was thought to be most appropriate. He asked if it would not be better to use the same process. WAKATSUKI noted that he was the one who had before suggested it but the purport of the resignation was different.* KIDO said that KOISO's resignation was but an expression of his opinion and it did not necessarily mean they should stick to it.

HIROTA declared it was better to have either the War or Navy Minister as Chief of the new Cabinet. HIRANUMA said that they must have a person who would fight it out and they could not recommend any peace advocator. He could not voice any opinion if it meant that all they had to do was to appoint a Premier and leave the rest to him. He was strongly opposed for peace and cessation of hostilities.

In the manifestation of whole national strength, influential civilians must be employed.

KIDO said they must have a system whereby the people would follow them.

* HIRANUMA asked if KIDO meant the Premier must be an active soldier. HIROTA said that difficult situations might arise if the Premier was not a soldier on active service, but that was not always necessary if he was authorized to present himself at Imperial Headquarters.

HIRANUMA said that at least he must be in the first or second reserve, but SUZUKI said the Premier need not always be a soldier. HIRANUMA said that unless the Premier was a soldier, he did not understand war. The premise was that if it was to be fought, it must be fought out.

OKADA said that it seemed that the character of the Premier was distinctive. KONOYE said they could conclude that he must be a soldier in the first or second reserve who would fight it out.

* HIRANUMA hoped no one would say it was improper as WAKATSUKI had said.

WAKATSUKI said he feared he might say something thoughtless. The question was not of the man who would fight it out to final victory. If they proposed peace, it would lead to unconditional surrender. HIRANUMA thought they needed an Army or Navy man but not necessarily one in active service.

WAKATSUKI said the fundamental principle had been clarified but how about its application, and HIRANUMA asked for KONOYE's opinion. KONOYE said a person that had no connection hitherto should be recommended and HIRANUMA added that he must also be one who could be relied upon by the people.

WAKATSUKI noted that on the previous occasion it was decided to name a man from the Army. Today it could be either from the Army or Navy and he asked OKADA's opinion. OKADA merely said that a competent man could be selected.

* When WAKATSUKI asked if KIDO approved this measure, KIDO said yes. He wanted all to state their unreserved opinions.

* SUZUKI asked how it would be if the previous Senior Statesmen made an effort. The resolution to die fighting for the Emperor was necessary. Since the Premier must be physically strong, he suggested KONOYE. After that, all would try, and how about the four trying first. He had heard that HARA had also made this suggestion. KONOYE said that it differed from the aforementioned fundamental principle. HIRANUMA said the candidate should be a military man and he agreed with KONOYE that the new Premier should be one with no previous connections. With the purport of winning the people's confidence, he wished to have Admiral SUZUKI accept the Premiership, and asked if they should appoint him after consulting them. He thought it was proper to have him appointed by submitting the Ministerial Scroll to the Emperor without consulting him, and KONOYE and WAKATSUKI agreed. *

SUZUKI said that he believed that for soldiers to meddle in politics was to ruin the country. As a matter of principle, he was prevented from entering politics. Moreover, his hearing was bad and he begged to decline. HIRANUMA said that a man without involvement was desirable, and that while SUZUKI was a soldier, he enjoyed the Emperor's deepest trust as a civil official. The nation believed he had no involvements and he was a man of loyalty.

TOJO said that SUZUKI's attitude was fine. The enemy was getting bold and was likely to attempt a landing and home defense would become vital. Here the Army must be considered as the principal body, and they must have an active soldier, and he believed HATA would be suitable.

HIROTA thought a central figure in the armed services should take the post. That had been his wish always. Anyone who could control both the Army and Navy would do.

After KIDO asked OKADA's views, OKADA said he could not state it, because he knew nobody. HIROTA said that at this grave time, State Ministers should be appointed by Imperial order, meaning designation by name. He doubted if it was a procedure suited to Page the consent and believed it proper for the Emperor to make direct appointments without consultation with the persons concerned.

31141 * There was no need of having the consent of the person. WAKATSUKI asked if he meant they shouldn't accept their private consent, and HIROTA replied he didn't mean they must not accept.

KIDO said that since Japanese soil was on the verge of becoming a battle field, strengthening the government had become more necessary and a Cabinet with the people's confidence must be established. He thought TOJO's opinion was plausible and personally hoped to have SUZUKI rise to the occasion.

31142 TOJO said that at present when the land was about to be a battle field, they must take special care or else there was a fear that the Army might take an aloof standing. If the Army took an aloof standing, the Cabinet would collapse. KIDO said it would be grave if the Army took an aloof standing and asked if there was any omen or premonition of it. * TOJO said he could not say there was none.

KIDO repeated that anti-militaristic sentiments were quite strong and there were possibilities of having the people take an aloof standing.

OKADA asked what was meant by an "aloof standing" to a person who received the Imperial Command. He wondered whose responsibility was national defense, was it not the Army and Navy. TOJO said that because of that apprehension he had said take care.

WAKATSUKI said if there was such apprehension, it was a serious matter, and believed that so far as the people were concerned, there wasn't any such thing. The Emperor did not attend the meeting outlined in Exhibit 1282. Because SUZUKI had stated he would like to decline the offer, KIDO invited him to the audience chamber, entreating him to accept if he was commanded by the Emperor. KIDO dwelt on the gravity of the war situation,

Page alluding to the necessity of a volte-face in policy. SUZUKI said he fully understood and said if he was commanded by the Emperor, nothing else would be his mission. KIDO was greatly reassured. SUZUKI accepted the Imperial Mandate after KIDO explained the meeting of the Senior Statesmen to His Majesty and had recommended SUZUKI.

31144 Within a month of the formation of the SUZUKI Cabinet, Germany surrendered. Up to this time, it was thought it would be open to criticism from the point of view of international faith to make peace proposals on the Emperor's part * since Japan had concluded a non-separate-peace treaty with Germany. Now that Germany was gone, KIDO believed it would be desirable for the Emperor to make his mind up at this junction.

31145 * The critical war situation in Okinawa and the bombing attacks in the Japanese Mainland caused great concern to the Emperor, and he asked KIDO if there was any way to retrieve the situation, and KIDO understood that the Emperor also asked SUZUKI the same question. However, the Cabinet took no special measure but events took their own course. On April 21, when the new Foreign Minister TOGO called on him, KIDO had the first of a number of discussions on the peace question, and many called on KIDO to express their views.

31146 * The SUZUKI Cabinet decided to open the Diet early in June. In view of the fact that a strong war sentiment used to be the keynote of previous Diet speeches, KIDO did not think the Diet held at that juncture would have a desirable effect on the outside world as it would hamper peace moves. Prior to the Diet's opening, however, the military petitioned the Emperor for an Imperial Conference in connection with the future direction of war. The military did not mean to terminate hostilities but instead wanted to continue war-like operations to make a bid for a decisive battle on the mainland while admitting difficulty in prosecuting the war. The Imperial Conference was held on June 8 and on that date, KIDO made up his mind and drafted a tentative peace plan to save the situation.

31147 * This draft concluded that it was apparent that the fighting at Okinawa would end adversely to Japan in the very near future. Statistics for national

Page power revealed that after the latter half of the year they would practically completely lose power to prosecute war. He was not in a position to judge the enemy's future strategy, but judging by the formidable air power displayed, it would not be difficult to make a holocaust throughout the country.

31148 * If his assumption was not grossly mistaken, a keen shortage of food and clothes would appear after the latter half of the year, causing social unrest which might get out of control. He thought Japan was called upon to take a resolute move for restoring peace. It was most certain that it was the enemy's major object to overthrow the so-called gumbatsu or militarists.

31149 * He believed that the orthodox way of opening negotiations would be to propose peace on the part of the fighting services, and then decide on a peace plan and open the negotiation on the part of the government. But it would be almost impossible to do so at this juncture. If they waited for an opportunity to become ripe, it might become possible too late and Japan might share Germany's fate. He believed there would be no other course but to petition for Imperial intervention and take peace moves by ending hostilities in accordance with the following policy.

31150 * Negotiation would be started with the intermediary power in pursuance of the Emperor's personal message. It might be a good idea to open negotiations direct with America and Britain if possible, but more advisable to ask the Soviet to mediate.

The keynote of the Emperor's message would follow that of the Imperial Rescript on the Declaration of War, emphasizing the Emperor's constant concern for peace, etc. If guarantee was obtained that the Pacific be made true to its name, in view of the object of Japan's Declaration of War, Japan would renounce her right of occupation and claim of leadership for the occupied area if only those nations and peoples attained their independence. The armed forces in those areas would be withdrawn at Japan's own initiative.

* Japan must be prepared to make a pretty heavy armaments reduction. There would be no alternative but to be content with a minimum armament for national defense. He showed this tentative peace plan to Chief Secretary MATSUDAIRA on June 9 and previously had been secretly in touch with KASE of the Foreign Office and MATSUTANI of the War Ministry in connection with peace moves. It was necessary, therefore, to seek their views. The same day he had an audience with the Emperor * reporting on a tentative peace plan and obtained sanction to consult the Premier and War, Navy and Foreign Affairs Minister. The Emperor was greatly satisfied with KIDO's plan and commanded him to set his hand to the plan immediately.

The Diet was in session, so that the Premier and other Cabinet Ministers were very busy, so he refrained from approaching them. The Diet closed on 13 June 1945 * and he talked with Premier SUZUKI and Navy Minister YONAI. He stressed to YONAI that a survey of the war situation showed no time was to be lost. YONAI entirely agreed but complained that the Premier's real intentions were not yet fully known and therefore he could not launch a peace movement while he was a Cabinet Minister. Pointing out that he had an appointment with Premier SUZUKI later, he assured YONAI he would ascertain the Premier's real intentions and pledged with YONAI to be in closer touch henceforth.

* He saw SUZUKI that afternoon and asked him how long he thought Japan's fighting power would last. SUZUKI replied that August would see a sharp drop in Japan's fighting potential. Thereupon, KIDO told SUZUKI his idea and the details of his report to the Throne which was approved by the Emperor. KIDO's appeal struck a sympathetic note in SUZUKI who pledged to do his bit. KIDO told him about the interview with YONAI and said YONAI was afraid the Emperor might be vigorous in his sentiment. SUZUKI said he had thought the same of YONAI.

31155

* On June 15, YONAI told KIDO that he had advised SUZUKI to strengthen his determination and KIDO told YONAI of his own interview with the Premier.

He also interviewed TOGO and asked him to formulate a definite plan and told him of his own plan which was approved by the Emperor.

31156 In principle, TOGO was not opposed to the plan * but pointed out the vigorous war decision recently adopted at the Imperial Conference, he wondered how to adjust the peace plan without fearing that the Foreign Office would be in a difficult position. KIDO was unaware of the Imperial Conference decision but this impelled him to an extraordinary determination. Assuring TOGO he would do his best to facilitate the Foreign Minister's work, he requested him to formulate a definite peace plan without delay.

31157 On June 18, KIDO asked War Minister ANAMI's approval of the plan. * ANAMI agreed as to the outcome of the Okinawa campaign and the war's outlook, but argued it would be better to take peace moves after dealing the enemy a telling blow in case he undertook landing operations on the mainland.

KIDO replied that the enemy would not hurry to undertake landing operations, but prior to doing so, would make a holocaust, demoralizing the Japanese. When American deployment was completed preliminary to landing operations, their terms would not be easy and Japan would have no other course but to fight to the bitter end, and in such eventuality there would be little hope of safeguarding national polity.

31158 It was with difficulty that KIDO persuaded ANAMI to approve. Although he tried to keep his efforts for peace secret, the Army suspected what he was doing and there was talk that they wanted to * oust KIDO as Lord Keeper, and on June 18, ANAMI spoke to him about this.

31159 * That same day SUZUKI called a meeting of the Supreme Council for Direction of War to discuss terminating hostilities, and SUZUKI told KIDO about the meeting on June 20. The War Minister and Army and Navy Chiefs of Staff expected much of the imminent 31160 battle on the mainland, arguing it would be better * to start peace negotiations on top of military achievements. It was understood, however, that all agreed that efforts be put forth to seize an opportunity for restoring peace. KIDO reported to the Emperor on Page what SUZUKI had told him. He suggested the Emperor to summon a Supreme Council for Direction of War and command them to end the war, especially since TOGO felt so apprehensive about the recent decision of the Imperial Conference.

31161 * On June 21, after talking with KONOYE on the necessity for an early peace, he also talked to the Emperor, advising him he should state that the previous decision of June 8 should not hamper peace efforts. On June 22, he arranged to call the Council 31162 * and they were summoned when the Imperial wishes for terminating the war were conveyed to them.

The same day the Emperor spoke to KIDO on the meeting of the Supreme War Directing Council, saying the basic policy for directing the war had been decided on at a previous council. It was decided that they should study concrete means, unhampered by tradition.

When the Emperor asked for the Premier's opinion, he replied that measures would be taken as the Emperor desired. YONAI said he had the subject in mind at the previous council but that the time was now pressing for its quick realization, and TOGO endorsed YONAI's statement. The Emperor asked Chief of Staff UMEZU his opinion and UMEZU answered that though he had no objection to the plan, great caution must be used to carry it out. Thereupon the Emperor asked if in being too cautious, they might miss the chance. UMEZU answered that they needed promptness.

31164 * On June 25, KIDO obtained HIRANUMA's approval of a tentative peace plan. Prior to this, at GOGO's instance, the government opened secret negotiations with the Soviet Ambassador through HIROTA, but no progress was made. The Supreme Council for Direction of War had been studying peace terms but no agreement was reached. KIDO urged SUZUKI and TOGO to hurry up.

On July 3, KIDO asked the Grand Chamberlain to submit his views to the Emperor that it would be proper for the Emperor to urge the Premier to hurry up.

* On July 7, SUZUKI reported to KIDO that he had just been summoned by the Emperor, who asked him how the negotiation with the Soviet was getting along. The Emperor said it would not do to miss the opportunity of sounding the Soviet's real intentions and asked how about asking her for her mediation and sending a special envoy. It could be seen that the Government was too much engrossed in sounding the Soviet's real intentions with result that the peace negotiation made no progress, but with the Imperial reminder to SUZUKI, the negotiation apparently got underway.

31166

* The Government referred the question of sending a special envoy to the Soviet Union to the Supreme Council, which decided that KONOYE be sent.

On July 12, after SUZUKI had told KIDO about his audience with the Emperor, regarding sending an envoy to the Soviet, KIDO had another audience with the Emperor, submitting his views on the question as to who should be present at the audience to be granted to KONOYE.

* Later, the Emperor told KIDO about his audience with KONOYE. The same day, earlier, SUZUKI called on KIDO, telling him that he had talks with the Foreign Minister TOGO about the special envoy to be sent to the Soviet, but he should like to enlist KONOYE's services.

31168

It would be better for the Emperor to command or ask KONOYE * directly to accept the special mission than to waste time in persuading KONOYE to accept. KIDO told SUZUKI that the Emperor was now so enthusiastic over the matter that he had made up his mind to send his personal message. KIDO had approved this proposal.

31169

When KIDO reported to the Emperor on the matter in advance, the Emperor approved it and decided to summon KONOYE that afternoon and later KIDO suggested that KONOYE be received without anyone being present * but the Emperor remarked that it was formerly established that audiences be granted to those other than State Ministers in the presence of somebody else. In the case of KONOYE, therefore, there would be no necessity for it, and the Emperor took his suggestion.

Later in the morning, SUZUKI told KIDO about the cable to Ambassador SATO in Moscow regarding dispatch of a special envoy. It was suggested by SHIDEHARA and others to defer the communication of the name of the special envoy and the Imperial message. The Premier expressed a desire that the Emperor seek KONOYE's views on ending the war and asked him to accept the possible offer in the event of a special envoy being sent, thereby reserving some latitude for his choice.

31171 Later in the day, KIDO informed KONOYE of the progress of affairs, and prior to KONOYE's audience with the Emperor KIDO proceeded to the Throne, reporting on the matter of which SUZUKI had spoke that morning. After KONOYE's audience with the Emperor, he told KIDO that he had said to the Emperor that he had recently heard explanations from Army personnel on the possibility of the execution of the war. The explanations might not be wholly groundless, but Navy explanations suggested the untrustworthiness of Army figures. The public's morale was not high, and the only remaining hope was that the Emperor do something. * Moreover, there were signs showing resentment toward the Emperor, and KONOYE believed it imperative to end the war as early as possible. The Emperor then remarked that he had the intention to send KONOYE to the Soviet as a special envoy, and KONOYE accepted.

After this KIDO saw the Emperor, who told him he had disclosed his opinion to KONOYE, and KONOYE had replied it was necessary to end the war. When the Emperor asked KONOYE if he would go to the Soviet, KONOYE had replied he would do so.

31172 One day before the departure of Stalin and Molotov for the Potsdam conference, the government's instructions reached the Japanese Embassy in Moscow. * No definite reply was received from the Soviet that it would give its reply after Stalin and Molotov's return from Potsdam. Thus, prior to the Soviet reply, the Potsdam Declaration was issued, and KIDO foresaw the peace problem would be difficult.

31173 On August 6 the atomic bomb was dropped at Hiroshima. Japan had been on ti-toe, expecting a Soviet reply, but this was nullified and the Soviet declared war on August 9. That morning KIDO advised the Emperor there was no alternative but to accept the Potsdam Declaration and end the war. * The Emperor commanded KIDO to talk with Premier SUZUKI.

31174 * To SUZUKI, KIDO stressed the necessity for making peace by taking advantage of the Potsdam Declaration, asking him to explain to the Senior Statesmen the situation in advance, for the Emperor wanted to seek their views. SUZUKI left, saying they would like to decide Japan's attitude by holding a meeting of the Supreme Council for Direction of War.

* Later in the day SUZUKI reported that the Supreme Council discussed acceptance of the Potsdam Declaration on four conditions: 1, Preservation of the Imperial House; 2, Withdrawal of Japanese troops on Japan's own initiative; 3, Those responsible for the war to be dealt with by the Japanese Government; 4, No guaranteed occupation to be carried out. (Exhibit 1283).

* Later, TAKAMATSU expressed fear that a conditional acceptance might be regarded as a refusal, and KIDO reported TAKAMATSU's apprehension to the Emperor. The same afternoon SHIGEMITSU urged KIDO to act tactfully, contending the peace negotiation was sure to break down if Japan submitted the four conditions. That evening KIDO had further audiences with the Emperor. At this time the Cabinet, being unable to arrive at a decision to accept the Potsdam Declaration on the sole condition of preservation of the Imperial House, decided to submit it to the Emperor for decision.

31177

* Premier SUZUKI told the Emperor to hold an Imperial Conference and permit Privy Council President HIRANUMA to attend. This Council was held from 11.50 p.m. August 9 to 2.20 a. m. August 10, when it was decided to accept the Potsdam Declaration on the sole condition of re-affirmation of the Emperor's sovereignty and the Imperial House, the draft plan prepared by Foreign Minister TOGO.

31178

* At the close of the Imperial Conference, KIDO heard from the Emperor the Imperial decision, which stated that the Army vigorously advocated the necessity for a decisive battle on the homeland, but beach fortifications were not completed nor army equipment complete, nor was aircraft production going on smoothly. Such being the case, how could they win the war?

31179

The Emperor could not bear the sight of their loyal troops being disarmed, or those responsible for the war being punished, but he did think it was time to bear the unbearable, * and approved the draft plan. In the afternoon the Senior Statesmen, HIRANUMA, WAKATSUKI, OKADA, KONOYE, HIROTA, TOJO, and KOISO, were received in audience by the Emperor, and KIDO also attended. * That evening KONOYE told KIDO he was disturbed by the proclamation of War Minister ANAMI.

31181 On August 10, atomic bombs were dropped on Nagasaki. This, together with the Soviet entry into the war, shocked the nation and imparted a powerful stimulus to moves and counter moves between the peace and war parties. KIDO foresaw the difficulties, and thought there was no course but to broadcast an Imperial Rescript terminating the war, and consulted Imperial Household Minister ISHIWATA, who approved the proposal. * KIDO then petitioned the Emperor to approve the proposal, and the Emperor assured him he would broadcast the message in time.

31182 On the afternoon of August 10, KIDO again called on ISHIWATA and discussed preparations for the broadcast. No reply was received from the Allies on August 11. Meanwhile, Marquis TOKUGAWA sent KIDO a letter emphasizing the country could not be saved except by a revolution carried out with the Imperial standard unfurled. * In the afternoon KIDO called ISHIWATA, suggesting that the Emperor broadcast the Imperial Rescript terminating the War, and he also submitted his views to the Emperor. Later, KIDO again called on ISHIWATA, telling him the Emperor would be ready to broadcast his message at any time. * Afterwards, the Chief of the Metropolitan Police and Premier SUZUKI talked with KIDO.

31184 On August 12, the Allied reply was received, and Foreign Minister TOGO submitted it to the Throne. After the audience, TOGO anxiously told KIDO that opposition to a reference in the Allied reply as to the free will of the people might raise its head on Japanese anxious to guard the national polity. KIDO asked TOGO the Foreign Office's interpretation of the paragraph, and TOGO said they saw nothing objectionable. KIDO thought it would not do to let their moves be swayed by the opinions of individuals, and they must abide by the interpretation of the responsible authorities. Not only the paragraph in question became a serious issue, but also the military stiffened since the Allied reply was received. On the afternoon of August 12, HIRANUMA expressed his opposition to the paragraph, * and KIDO replied that it would be better to trust the Foreign Office authorities. At 6.30 p.m. TOGO again called on KIDO and KIDO was surprised to learn that SUZUKI, too, approved HIRANUMA's opinion and felt uneasy about concluding the peace negotiation. Should the negotiation break down, KIDO thought Japan would have to face a situation far worse than if she had gone on fighting to the end. He felt called upon to do everything to make the government proceed toward the peace goal.

Page 31186 At 9.30 p. m. SUZUKI told KIDO of the consultations he had had and seemed much annoyed by those jealous * of safeguarding national polity. On the basis of his careful study, TOGO assured that there was nothing objectionable in the paragraph in question. SUZUKI therefore thought that there would be no alternative but to trust their interpretation. Should the Potsdam Declaration be refused and the war continued, there would be further sacrifices. Even if a disturbance occurred through acceptance of the declaration, they should have only to throw away their lives. Without hesitation, SUZUKI said, they should carry out the policy to accept the Potsdam Declaration.

31187 KIDO was greatly reassured at SUZUKI's reply. The High Command began to stiffen its attitude, and difficulty was experienced in opening a meeting of the Supreme Council for Direction of War. * The same afternoon the Emperor summoned the princes of the blood, asking them to unite solidly and assist him, and they agreed to do so.

31188 * Early on the morning of August 13, War Minister ANAMA called on KIDO, contending that paragraph 4 of the Allied reply could not be accepted as it was, or Japan would be ruined, and safeguarding the national polity would be impossible. KIDO replied that according to the Foreign Office interpretation, there was nothing objectionable in the paragraph, and as for the other parts of the Allied reply they were inevitable in view of the circumstances. If Japan refused to accept, there would be no valid reason for her doing so and the Allies would find it impossible to understand why Japan changed her attitude. Not only the Allies, but the whole world would criticize the Emperor. They must act in pursuance of the Imperial decision and accept the Allied reply.

31190 On the morning of August 14, KIDO learned that aircraft were dropping handbills containing the Allied reply throughout the country. He saw that if Japanese troops saw the handbills they would feel indignant. Therefore, KIDO went to the Emperor and submitted his views, urging him to command the government to go through formalities * for ending the war. The Emperor had identical views.

Page

KIDO asked Premier SUZUKI the progress of the peace plan, and was told that the High Command did not yet approve of the convocation of the Supreme Council. The Army contended that it be convoked after 1 p. m., but the Navy did not even manifest its attitude on the question. KIDO stressed to SUZUKI that there was no alternative but to petition the Emperor not only to convoke a joint Imperial Conference of the Cabinet Ministers and Members of the Supreme Council, but to command the termination of the war and drafting an Imperial Rescript ending it. SUZUKI approved KIDO's proposals, and KIDO jointly petitioned for an Imperial audience with SUZUKI. * At the audience, SUZUKI reported on the day's happenings, and petitioned him to convoke an Imperial Conference. It was convoked for 10.30 a. m., but not under way about 11 a. m., when it was finally decided to terminate the Pacific War.

31191

Following the joint conference, the government pushed preparations for ending the war, which were submitted by the Premier to the Emperor at 8.30 p. m., and obtained Imperial sanction. Then, preliminary to the broadcast of the Rescript, the Emperor had the message recorded on a phonograph disc.

31191

The policy of terminating the war was thus decided upon, but whether it would be carried out without hitch caused apprehension, for the Army's attitude was the most important factor. KIDO conferred with the Grand Chamberlain and the Chief Aide-de-Camp, and it was decided, if necessary, to petition the Emperor to issue a precept to the Army and Navy, and KIDO requested the Chief Aide to ascertain the attitude of the fighting services ministers. In reply, the Aide said the ministers did not see any necessity for such a step.

31194

* On the evening of August 14, KONOYE reported that he heard the Imperial Guard Division was rebellious, but KIDO doubted this. When KIDO later met SUZUKI, SUZUKI replied that he did not hear such a rumor.

31195

* During the night, KIDO found that the rumor about the rebellion in the Guard Division was true, and that the Division had cut off the communications of the Imperial Household Department, and that the Imperial library was surrounded. KIDO sensed it was a very serious situation, and took refuge in an underground vault with the Imperial Household Minister. Although the Household Department was completely isolated from the outside world, it later transpired * that the only direct telephone circuit between the office of the Naval Aide and the Navy Office was left intact, so that communication was maintained and arrangements made.

As a result, Commander of the Eastern Army TANAKA, Seiichi, came to the Household Department to control the rebels, and all returned to their barracks in obedience to his commands. That morning, KIDO learned that the rebels had searched his office for him a half dozen times after he took refuge in the underground vault, and intimidated an official of the Office of Lord Keeper to force him to confess KIDO's whereabouts.

The object of the rebel force was to seize the phonograph record of the Emperor's Rescript terminating the war. * but the record was safe, so that at noon an Imperial Rescript was broadcast to the people.

At 4.30 that same morning KIDO's home at Akasaka was raided, and they searched for him. SUZUKI thought he had fulfilled his mission when the Rescript was broadcast, and therefore tendered his resignation. In the afternoon the Emperor commanded KIDO to select a succeeding Premier, and in reply KIDO said he would do this after consulting HIRANUMA, without calling a conference of Senior Statesmen. HIRANUMA and KIDO agreed that there would be no subject capable of tiding over the critical situation, and especially in view of the future attitude of the army and navy agreed that Prince HIGASHIKUNI be petitioned as the new Premier, with KONOYE assisting him. This was reported to the Emperor, who gave his sanction.

* The same gang which had raided KIDO's burnt home at Akasaka went to the residence of WADA the next morning, asking for an interview with KIDO, for KIDO had been staying there. Their plan seemed to advise KIDO to commit harakiri, and to kill him if he rejected their advice.

31203

The morning of August 16, HIGASHIKUNI was commanded to form a new Cabinet. KONOYE accepted HIGASHIKUNI's request to become his adviser. * The morning of August 17, HIGASHIKUNI submitted a list of his Cabinet personnel to the Emperor, who approved it, and that day the HIGASHIKUNI Cabinet took the first step toward peace. Thus, the war was brought to a termination, together with KIDO's fight against the militarists. It was unprecedented in history that a power engaged in a conflict of such a scale should make an unconditional surrender without remarkable confusion in its wake.

* When the adverse turn of the war became known to the people, opinion gained strength among intellectuals that those close to the Throne be strengthened, or the office of Lord Keeper, and some called on KIDO urging its necessity. KIDO understood their deep concern that the Emperor be advised to act wisely, but did not follow their advice, believing that in the worst eventuality Japan would not be saved except by Imperial intervention. To facilitate this, he was convinced it would defeat the purpose if Senior Statesmen were assigned close to the Throne, because Imperial intervention would be misunderstood as machinations of those close to the Throne, and there would be every probability of internal strife being let loose. Therefore, KIDO did not reveal his real intentions except to a very few, and kept his silence. This accounted for various criticisms heaped upon him, but all his trouble * must be regarded as amply rewarded, as there occurred no remarkable confusion after the war.

In dealing with the delicate situation which he was called upon by his official duty to handle, he was able to do his bit for humanity, as well as for Japan. It was his inward satisfaction that he was instrumental in saving millions from war ravages and sparing the Americans thousands of casualties which would have been caused if Japan had gone on fighting to the bitter end.

31206

He had tried to answer all the evidence which had involved him without any intentional avoidance. With respect to the acts of aggression and conspiracies alleged in the indictment, he was never at any meeting where war plans were formulated. * He never approved or acquiesced in any such events, made no speeches in favor of militarism, signed no laws approving aggression, supported no war preparations nor was a member of any organization favoring it, had nothing to do with the treatment of POWs or civilian prisoners; never participated in or created any political, police, or military organization having for their purposes the alleged crimes charged in the indictment; had no connection with the Kempeitai; never voted for initiating nor continuing the war; had no participation in any premeditated plan for aggressive war; never promoted war propaganda, never fostered or encouraged school military training; had nothing to do with the construction of armaments for war; never advised a single person nor acted as the agent of anyone to accomplish initiation, commencement or waging of warfare. The advice he gave had as its primary object the discouragement of war efforts and the solution of problems by peaceful methods.

* At no time did he ever converse with any of the other accused or anyone else involving the planning, scheming, and conspiring, as alleged. He met the accused YIMURA, MUTO, DOIHARA, HASHIMOTO, OSHIMA and OKA for the first time in Sugamo. To the best of his recollection, he met HOSHINO in 1941, SHIMADA in October 1941, MINAMI in 1939, TOJO, ARAKI, HATA, ITAGAKI, MATSUI, SATO, and UMEZU in 1938, HIROTA and TOGO in 1936, HIRANUMA in 1934, KOISO and SHIGEMITSU in 1932, SHIRATORI and SUZUKI in 1931, and KAYA in 1925.

KIDO's assumption of office as Chief Secretary to the Lord Keeper in 1930 coincided with the start of a period of upheaval of unprecedented magnitude, which was featured by an advance of army men on the political field and punctuated by a dozen bloody incidents. Believing it would lead Japan to a catastrophic end, he exerted himself to reroute politics into normal channels. During this * period he served close to the Throne, first as Chief Secretary and then as Lord Keeper, except for two years when he was Minister of State. His official duty had nothing to do with politics, but cautioned him against meddling with them. He was not in a position to give free expression to his idea, but did his best to be true to it within the limits of his official duty. His idea was outlined in his advice to the then Lord Keeper, MAKINO, the day after the May 15 Incident. He had been consistent in that idea for the past fifteen years. He risked his life during the February 26 Incident, before, during, and after the resignation of the Third KONOYE Cabinet and during the termination of the war.

The China Affair broke out when he was President of the Bureau of Peerage, and he knew nothing of the circumstances leading up to it. * Four months after it, KONOYE asked him to join his Cabinet, and KIDO accepted, at his request that he would work hard to terminate the China Affair as soon as possible. KIDO worked hard for this, but the war situation expanded and it became impossible to have any clear outlook on the future. The force of circumstances gathered momentum, threatening to plunge Japan into a Pacific war. KIDO could not bring himself to support the new war and was opposed to it from beginning to end, and never supported it in any positive way and trying hard to seize every opportunity to avert it, but the U. S. note of November 26 made him helpless, depriving him of all possible means to save the situation. Subsequent events resulted in the war dogs being unleashed.

It was to be regretted that developments falsified all anticipations and Japan had to surrender unconditionally. It was his sole consolation that at the war's close he was able to give full play to his bold activity and succeed in preventing the homeland from becoming a battleground and saving the lives of hundreds of thousands.

31211 * KIDO stated, on further examination, that in his diary entry of 9 March, 1932, concerning the October Incident where he had mentioned HASHIMOTO, SATO, and CHO, it was not the accused SATO.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. FURNESS.

31216 * Regarding the planned conference between KONOYE and Roosevelt in 1941, KIDO stated he knew that it was proposed that a Foreign Office member of ambassador rank accompany KONOYE. At that time KONOYE told KIDO that probably SHIGEMITSU would accompany him.

31217 Regarding the diary entry of 25 September, 1941, which said that SHIGEMITSU talked to KIDO about the progress of negotiations in Washington, KIDO was asked what SHIGEMITSU said on this occasion. * The accused replied that only a short time had elapsed since SHIGEMITSU had returned from London, and he told KIDO of Britain and America's firm determination, and earnestly pleaded that Japan should settle outstanding problems with America and diplomatic relations be adjusted.

31218 KIDO recalled that Foreign Minister TOYODA told him that he desired to send SHIGEMITSU to America, and this was prior to TOJO's becoming Premier. * When shown the diary entry of 23 July, 1941, KIDO agreed that it said that SHIGEMITSU reported to the Emperor, and KIDO was deeply impressed by the high spirit of Prime Minister Churchill. This was the time when SHIGEMITSU, having just returned from England, was making his report to the Emperor. SHIGEMITSU said that although England was then in a difficult situation, Churchill was leading the people on, and that the British spirit was truly remarkable in their determination to win. * On that occasion SHIGEMITSU did not say anything to the Emperor regarding the advisability of Japan entering the war.

NARRATIVE SUMMARY OF THE RECORD
October 16, 1947
DEFENSE - KIDO - Direct

Para Reference was made to the affidavit where he testified that in February, 1942, after initial Japanese victories, he expressed an opinion regarding the enemy's fighting will, saying despite these victories efforts should be made to make peace as soon as possible. He was asked if he based these expressions on any information received from SHIGEMITSU. * He replied that one of the bases for his opinion was that on hearing SHIGEMITSU report to the Emperor, he was reminded of the tenacious British character, and also became aware of America's fighting will, and in view of their national strength felt they should try to make peace as quickly as possible.

31223

When asked if SHIGEMITSU continued to express the opinion that substantially unconditional surrender would be unavoidable, KIDO replied that ever since the * occasion mentioned in the affidavit, the war situation developed unfavorably, and every time he met SHIGEMITSU he continued to tell him that in the final analysis they would have to go as far as unconditional surrender.

31224

Reference was made to the affidavit regarding an agreement of views with SHIGEMITSU under which the Lord Keeper would assume full responsibility for the Imperial Court, and the Foreign Minister would assume responsibility for the Government. Also, where he testified that prior to 9 June, 1945, he had been secretly in touch with KASE of the Foreign Office * and MATSUTANI of the War Ministry, in connection with peace feelers. Asked why it was necessary to work with these younger men, he replied that his purpose was that he wished to know through them the ideas and atmosphere in the various offices to which they belonged.

31225

* He did this after consulting with SHIGEMITSU, for KASE was his private secretary. MATSUTANI was the private secretary to the War Minister. He worked secretly, because in view of the situation, the time was not yet ripe for conducting such movements openly.

31226

* It was KIDO's understanding that SHIGEMITSU continue to advocate such policies after he became Foreign Minister.

31231 The accused stated that SHIGEMITSU said a number of times before December 1941 that from his experience in Europe, Japan absolutely should 31232 not be involved in the European war. * In regard to the new China policy advocated by SHIGEMITSU, the fundamental idea underlying his views was that matters relating to China should be settled there. SHIGEMITSU's views were that in carrying out the new policy vis-a-vis China, peace there should be brought about through internal communication or discussions between the Chinese.

31235 * DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. OKAMOTO
COUNSEL FOR MINAMI

31236 Reference was made to the affidavit of the accused where he stated that on 9 March 1932 he invited Colonel NAGATA to his house and heard his explanation of the March and October Incidents (T. 30,770). Asked if NAGATA was connected with those incidents, KIDO replied that he thought he was opposed to them. He placed confidence in NAGATA's explanations. Reference was made to the frequent use of the words "machinations of militarists and plots", and the accused was asked if he obtained information in 1931 that * MINAMI participated in them. KIDO replied that MINAMI did not and never, after 1931, received information that MINAMI participated in machinations or plots either as an army officer or as a civilian.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. LAZARUS
COUNSEL FOR HATA

The accused stated that when he referred to this fact in his affidavit that he consistently opposed the militarists, he did not include HATA in this category.

31237 * DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. ROBERTS
COUNSEL FOR OKA

Reference was made to the affidavit where he referred to information received from Chief Secretary MATSUDAIRA (T. 30,935), and that exhibit 1115, the 15 July 1941 diary entry, stated that there still remained vagueness about Foreign Minister MATSUOKA's attitude towards the proposed formula for a Japan-American understanding. Up to the day before, the Premier believed that if MATSUDAIRA agreed to the formula prepared by the directors of military and naval affairs, with a few alterations, he would push the policy as it was. Asked if he was referring to the original formula for the negotiations, the accused replied he had no connection with the matter, did not know the details, but it was his understanding that some revisions were contemplated on the original formula, the negotiations for which commenced in April 1941.

* The Foreign Office drafted the original formula and the reference in the diary was to alterations in it. The Director of Naval Affairs Bureau was an assistant at the time the original formula was drawn up, but he did not think he took a leading part in drafting it. The Naval Affairs Bureau Director was under the supervision of the Navy Minister.

31239 * DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. SAKUMA
COUNSEL FOR SHIRATORI

31240 Reference was made to the affidavit of the accused, for it stated * that the negotiations for the Tripartite Pact by MATSUOKA were conducted so secretly that even Foreign Office divisional chiefs were not aware of it, with the exception of his diplomatic advisers (T. 30,907). The accused stated he heard this from KONOYE, and asked if KONOYE mentioned SHIRATORI's name as being one of the diplomatic advisers. KIDO replied he did not particularly mention any names.

31242 * DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. BROOKS
COUNSEL FC., KOISO

Reference was made to exhibit 179-F, the diary excerpt of 7 August 1931 from which was quoted that immediately upon arriving at Tokyo, KIDO called on HARADA, learning the facts concerning the latest political conditions and the plot to be carried out by military circles during the middle of last March. It was regrettable that it became very noticeable recently that the army made certain types of plots. The accused stated that these matters were learned from HARADA on that date, but he did not know where HARADA received the information, nor whether it was rumor or hearsay.

31243 Reference was made to the affidavit where HIRANUMA, at a Senior Statesmen's meeting, said there were two phases of the opinion at home in regard to the conclusion of the war, and at that time they must have a person who would fight it out, *and they could not recommend any peace advocator who favored cessation of hostilities (T. 31,134).

31245 The accused stated he did not think HIRANUMA was talking of KOISO then, although KOISO was not particularly considered as a peace advocate. * Reference was made to the affidavit where KIDO said that certain parties were opposed to the projected peace moves toward Chungking (T. 31,115). When asked why they were opposed, he replied that the government or members of High Command opposed the project because there were no prospects of it ever * coming to fruition in the light of the existing situation, and because full confidence and trust could not be placed in the one who was to act as mediator. He should have used the words "a part or section of the Government" instead of the word "Government" in this regard.

Where he said in his affidavit that Premier KOISO was very enthusiastic and proceeded to the Palace to report on his plan for direct peace negotiations with China (T. 31,115), the accused, KIDO, was not present but he learned of it later from the Emperor. Asked why KOISO was making direct peace negotiations rather than going through the Foreign Minister, and if it was because he was being opposed, KIDO said he was unfamiliar with such internal matters of government.

- 31247 * KOISO was not reprimanded by the Emperor for taking a direct negotiation to Chungking as far as KIDO knew. Asked if, following the meeting, the Emperor was in favor of it, he replied that the question had
- 31248 not progressed that far, and did not go further because KOISO withdrew the matter and turned in his resignation.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. USAMI
COUNSEL FOR HIRANUMA

- 31250 * The diary entry of 31 May 1937 was read to the accused, this stating that in the evening the Lord Keeper telephoned KIDO saying he wanted to have a talk with him and that he would proceed to the Palace. KIDO proceeded to the Palace and was informed of the Lord Keeper's interview with Privy Council HIRANUMA. * HIRANUMA wished KONOYE to form his cabinet at any cost and said he would like to urge upon him the necessity of doing so. As for War Minister SUGIYAMA, he thought it would be too much for him. It would be preferable to have Imperial Household Minister MATSUDAIRA as premier because of the international aspect. HIRANUMA also said that it was desirable to appoint MATSUDAIRA as Foreign Minister of the KONOYE cabinet and let him succeed to the premiership should KONOYE become unable to discharge his duty due to ill health. The accused identified the above as an exact description of what happened on 31 May 1937.
- 31251

- 31252 * CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. CUNNINGHAM
COUNSEL FOR OSHIMA

- 31253 Reference was made to the affidavit which set forth the diary entry of 17 December 1938 (T. 30,866). The accused stated that * either UGAKI or KONOYE was Foreign Minister when OSHIMA was appointed for the first time in October 1938, but he did not know for sure. * At the
- 31254 time he made the diary entry, he did not have any exact knowledge that

KONOYE was Foreign Minister when OSHIMA was appointed ambassador to Germany, and that it was KONOYE that appointed him. He did not ask KONOYE who appointed OSHIMA or make any additional inquiry of him.

31255 He had not seen the telegrams sent to OSHIMA concerning the negotiations up to 17 December 1938, and was unfamiliar with the internal workings going on concerning the negotiations. * When he made the diary entry he had no knowledge that negotiations were in progress in Berlin, because no instructions were sent to OSHIMA since the beginning of November. Asked if he knew KONOYE in his memoirs stated that the telegrams sent by the army and Foreign Minister UGAKI were misleading, and OSHIMA acted on the strength of them, KIDO said he had not seen anything like that in the memoirs.

31256 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that OSHIMA and others intended to conclude an agreement (T. 30,866). Asked if he was aware that the final decision of the international agreement rested with the cabinet, subject to the approval of the Emperor, after the advice of the Privy Council, and never with the Ambassador, the accused stated that as far as procedure was concerned that was so. Asked if when he made the diary entry that they intended to make an agreement, he had these preliminary steps in mind if necessary, * he replied that in making the entry he laid emphasis not on the procedure but the actual political situation. He was aware that protracted negotiations were ended * in August 1939 with no agreement having been entered into. He knew that OSHIMA had been appointed only two months prior to the time he made the diary entry.

31258 * CROSS-EXAMINATION BY DOCTOR KIYOSE

31259 Reference was made to the affidavit where KIDO mentioned he fought against the militarists, and some persons were not included among the militarists mentioned. He was asked whether he had any standards by which he included or excluded persons, and he replied that he was speaking of political conditions as they prevailed and was not attempting to make any definition. When he stated in his affidavit that he struggled with the militarists, this was when the militarists forgot their proper duties and interfered in political affairs (T. 31,207-8). If a person not in the armed forces interefered in politics or if militarists were concerned with matters proper to their province there was no struggle. He did not struggle against persons making efforts to control the young officers. Asked if he struggled against the War Minister or persons assisting him when they carried out government policies, he replied that there was no need to fight against any recommendation founded on an established state policy. Reminded that he had entered the first KONOYE cabinet to assist KONOYE at KONOYE's request in bringing the China Incident to a conclusion in 1937, with reference to the conclusion of the Incident, he remembered that the government issued a statement on 3 November 1938, after a cabinet decision. The accused was handed a document and from it was quoted to him a statement that the establishment of a new order in East Asia was in complete conformity with the spirit in which the Empire was founded, and to achieve this task was an exalted responsibility with which the present generation was entrusted. The carrying out of necessary internal reforms was necessary and with a full development of national strength, it should be fulfilled at all costs. Asked if he participated in the issuance of this statement, he said that this was decided by the cabinet and that he was present.

31261 Asked if this was the first instance in which the construction of a new order was first mentioned in an official document, * he replied 31262 that the question was not clear. The underlying concept at that time was to bring about unity among Japan, Manchukuo, and China. * He did not consider that the participation of the war and navy ministers in carrying out this policy was meddling in politics. When various departments discharged their assigned duties, the carrying out of these could not be considered participating in politics. The war and navy ministers were permitted to participate in the decision of state policies. If the war and navy ministers made efforts for establishing a new order as state ministers, they would not be outside their jurisdiction.

31263 * In 1940 KIDO approved the emergence of KONOYE as premier in his second cabinet. Regarding the decisions of that cabinet, concerning the outline of Japan's basic national policy and of the policy concerning the change in the international situation, in July 1940 he heard that 31264 these policies were decided, but had not heard their contents. * Decisions concerning policies made at the liaison conference were not transmitted to the Lord Keeper every time. He did not collect all information concerning cabinet decisions as well as the liaison conference decision when he was Chief Secretary to the Lord Keeper. He did not recall the outline of Japan's basic policy, the decision of the KONOYE cabinet, although at that time he was Lord Keeper. Asked if as Lord Keeper it was his responsibility to the Throne to be aware of this most important 31265 policy, * he thought he knew of it at the time but had no present recollection.

31266 * It was part of the duty of responsible state ministers to carry out these policies. Reference was made to the affidavit where he referred to a letter sent to Lord Keeper MAKINO the day after the May 15 incident in which he submitted measures to deal with the incident (T. 30,780). Asked how the Lord Keeper was in a position to carry out

Page such political measures, the accused replied that this was a time when an unusual incident broke out and the cabinet collapsed, and this was submitted as advice with reference to the policies the next cabinet should undertake. This was within the Lord Keeper's authority.

31266 * Asked if it was not true that in decisions concerning the cabinet formation that SAIONJI rather than the Lord Keeper was consulted, he replied that the inquiry was addressed to SAIONJI but also was 31267 addressed by the Throne to the Lord Keeper, whereupon the Lord Keeper would request that the inquiry be referred to SAIONJI. The Lord Keeper consulted SAIONJI and thus had opportunity to give advice in connection with the existing situation. KIDO's collection of information was in preparation for this and he gave due attention to political developments at all times. Asked why it was necessary to do so, he said because it 31268 was necessary * for the Lord Keeper to be well informed. KIDO as Chief Secretary had no staff nor did the Lord Keeper.

31269 * Reference was made to the affidavit which reported a request made by TOJO that he should be appointed a full general (T. 31,026-7), and the accused was asked whether Prince KANIN was asked merely to tender a memorial to the Throne. KIDO stated that TOJO requested KANIN to submit a memorial.

31271 * Reference was made to the affidavit on the subject of the resignation of the KOISO cabinet, and a senior statesmen's meeting concerning the next premier. In it TOJO was quoted as saying, at the present when Japan was about to become a battlefield, they must take special care or there was a fear that the army might take an aloof standing.

31272 * There were possibilities of the people taking an aloof standing and OKADA asked what was meant by "taking an aloof standing" to a person who had received the Imperial Command, (T 31,141).

31273 Asked if the words "aloof standing" have included the meaning "coup d'etat", he replied that there was no such meaning, he did not know in what sense OKADA used the words. Reference was made to the affidavit where he stated that the Kwantung Army might look the other way, meaning coup d'etat. Asked if that was the correct interpretation of the word "soppo" or "take an aloof standing", he replied that it reflected his feeling at the time. What he meant there was "looking the other way", or as translated "taking an aloof standing", and what he meant was that those taking an aloof standing included elements which might possibly undertake a coup d'etat. He made that interpretation because of the current circumstances.

* DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. YAMADA
Counsel for ITAGAKI

Asked if he included among the militarists who consistently suggled ITAGAKI, the accused replied that it was his impression at the time of the Manchurian Incident that the term militarists included ITAGAKI and others concerned with the incident. Asked if he included ITAGAKI among the militarists at present, he replied that the war was over and he had not specially thought of it at all. Asked if he meant to say that he thought so at the time of the Manchurian Incident, he stated that when he and others of like mind spoke of militarists or military cliques, they were not specifying particular individuals but speaking of certain moving influences.

31277 Reference was made to the affidavit where he stated that on 23 June 1931 HARADA conveyed information to him about a plot on the part of military officers in Manchuria, * and that he learned, as his diary stated, from HARADA deplorable information concerning a serious scheme in Manchuria on the part of some military officers (T. 30728). The accused stated he did not know where HARADA obtained the information and it might have been information he heard from somewhere else. Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated that KIDO related the information to the Lord Keeper as shown in his diary of 26 June 1931 (T. 30728).
It was pointed out that in his diary entry he said he called on the Lord Keeper reporting to him the information on a conspiracy in China contrived by the military in with adventurers.

31278 * In reference to this information KIDO said he had no recollection if included in it was any reference to the Kwantung Army or ITAGAKI and did not know whether that was done. Reference was made to the affidavit where he stated that, as shown in his diary for 23 September 1931, that he asked HAYASHI to explain the incident and when HAYASHI did not clarify the truth about the railway blowups, KIDO deplored his attitude (T. 30733-4). When he said HAYASHI failed to explain how the incident occurred, he meant HAYASHI did not give a satisfactory explanation.

31279 * He learned later that Colonel ANDO had gone to Mukden to carry out an investigation. The accused was reminded of the testimony of the witness, OYAMA, that he carried out the investigation on the 24th.
Asked if that might not be the reason for HAYASHI's insufficient explanation, KIDO replied that that might have been the case. Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that there was an idea developing among the militarists to establish a new regime in Manchuria, and that when he heard this from HAYASHI he thought it regrettable (T. 30738-9).
He thought the HAYASHI referred to was Major General HAYASHI, Chief of the Bureau of Maintenance.

31280. * When he referred to the idea developing to establish a new regime, he thought that the opinion was growing that Chang Hsueh-liang's administration was a bad one, was included, but this did not come from a very clear knowledge of KIDO's. Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated that KIDO seeing the condition of the Manchurian Army, he would like to suggest that under the circumstances in which staff officers, such as ITAGAKI and ISHIHARA, were exercising full power and carrying out maneuvers worked out by them, it was necessary to send a Foreign Office official like SHIRATORI, and have him negotiate with them, apart from their respective official positions connected with the war and try to come to a mutual understanding.
- 31281 * It was important to have reasonable restrictions placed on military activities (T. 30,746). Asked where this information came from, he replied that then he received information from various sources such as HARADA, KONOYE, and news reporters.
- 31282 * When he saw HONJO, he did not hear anything especially in the nature of ITAGAKI and ISHIHARA exercising full powers, but HONJO did say that ITAGAKI had loyally helped him in the performance of his duties, and there was no special reference to insubordination.
- 31283 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated that having been saddled with the Manchurian Incident, the government, early in 1932, was faced with the problem of further army intrigues and establishing some form of government in Manchuria. KIDO was opposed to this plan and when ITAGAKI delivered a lecture on the new state, KIDO was astonished to find such a wide difference between his ideas and theirs. Concerning the establishment of an independent government in Manchuria, KIDO obtained this information from ITAGAKI's lecture. He thought ITAGAKI reported on
- 31284 the true situation * concerning the new state and General HONJO's views and opinions. Asked what he meant by his statement that he was astonished to find such a difference between their ideas and his, he stated that he was very astonished to hear that a new state was going to be created and Japanese were going to be naturalized citizens of the new state.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated that on the morning of 30 May 1935 he was shocked to read in the newspaper that Japanese forces in North China had made an important proposal to the Chinese and that fortunately the incident did not later develop and was settled by the efforts of UMEZU (T. 30,800).

31285 The accused stated that at this time UMEZU was Commander of the forces in North China, * but was not under the command of the Kwantung Army, for the North China Garrison and the Kwantung Army were independent. The accused was read a part of his affidavit that he feared that certain groups of rightists, extremists, and army officers opposed to settling the incident would create disturbances if peace was established with China (T. 30,856). The accused stated that he knew ITAGAKI had no connection with these groups opposed to the settlement of the incident. Reference was made to the affidavit wherein it was stated that opinion was gaining even in a section of the General Staff that the China Affair should be terminated even by negotiating with Chiang Kai-shek, if necessary (T. 30,858).
31286 Asked if he was aware that ITAGAKI from the first * was in favor of negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek, KIDO replied that he had mentioned in his diary that ITAGAKI had at first hesitated but in the end agreed.

Reference was made to the affidavit wherein it was stated that the HIRANUMA cabinet referred the question to the Five-Minister Conference, which, after meeting seventy times, failed to reach an identity of views, due to the navy's stout opposition to the projected alliance with Germany, which the army zealously advocated (T. 30,871).

31287 Asked if the deadlock was due to the fact that Germany would not make any compromise, and if the difference between the army and navy were not in existence before instructions were sent to the ambassadors in the field, KIDO replied he was not familiar with such details * as he did not attend the Prime Minister's Conference and he did not know what kind of things occurred or how things developed.

31288 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that a cabinet council was held at 10:30, after which KIDO consulted with ITAGAKI on this matter and they agreed to exert their efforts to tide over the situation, (T. 30,874). The accused was reminded that he had written he feared a coup d' etat should the army and navy come into direct opposition. The accused stated that in the passage just read he was referring to this problem. As to efforts to tide over the situation, the army became irritated because the problem did not resolve itself, and the Superintendent of the Metropolitan Police reported on the matter to KIDO. Thereupon KIDO met War Minister ITAGAKI and prevailed upon him to bring about cooperation between the army and navy to prevent any undesirable 31289 influence * on the preservation of law and order within Japan, and ITAGAKI also made efforts to prevent the occurrence of such a question.

Page

To the accused was quoted a part of his affidavit where he stated that on 22 July 1939 the cabinet adopted a statement for submission to the Japanese-British Conference, which was expected to lead to the settlement of the China Affair, so far as Britain was concerned, and this opposed by the army, which was also spreading propaganda in its efforts to obtain public support for the Tripartite Pact.

31290

* Asked if it was not as a result of ITAGAKI's approval and support that the Japanese-British Conference came to be held in Tokyo, KIDO replied yes, but added that ITAGAKI approved the conference, but the conference was held as a result of a request by the Foreign Minister. When he said this was opposed by the army, he was not saying that ITAGAKI was the army or that he was opposing it. At that time there were various oppositions from various army sections.

31291

* Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated in the diary entry of 4 August 1939 that it was rumored that the army and navy still disagreed on the problem of the German alliance and the army became impatient and planned to lead the cabinet to resignation en bloc by having the War Minister resign, proclaim martial law, and establish a military government (T. 30,881).

Asked if ITAGAKI was told of this rumor, KIDO replied that he had spoken to him about it, but ITAGAKI stressed that the rumors were without foundation, but no talk was conducted with regard to control measures. ITAGAKI did say something to the effect that there would be no untoward incident and KIDO should set his mind at rest.

31293

The accused stated he had knowledge of the English language but it was insufficient, but was able to converse in English outside of court proceedings. He had no confidence of his being able to compare an English translation with the Japanese original to determine accuracy of expression. In the criticisms of the correctness of the translations, he had received the assistance of both * Japanese and American counsel. From early boyhood he had a standing friendship with KONOYE, and HARAHI.

* Up until 1930 the accused stated that he had been in government service and had no connection with political matters, but he had made a study of political science at college and was very interested in the government. In late October 1930 he was appointed Chief Secretary to the Lord Keeper but was not necessarily due to the position of his family for he was recommended by KONOYE and others, in which job as Chief Secretary he was required to assemble information and report it to the Lord Keeper, MAKINO, who himself did not meet very many people. It could not be said that KIDO was necessarily the chief source for information. In October 1931 KIDO was concurrently secretary to the Imperial Household Ministry and he was engaged * in that work and was a mere novice at matters political when he became Chief Secretary.

31297 Asked that if within two years' time he was giving advice as to whether the Genro should come to Tokyo at a crisis in Japan's history, on 22 September 1931, he replied that he had had consultations on that matter and had occasion to report the results to the Lord Keeper. He had consultations and merely talked the matter over with the Lord Keeper but what he did after that, the accused did not hear. * Although he had occasion to have consultations with reference to the Manchurian incident about 22 September 1931, and remembered that he went to HARADA's on the night of that date, meeting with KONOYE, SAKAI, OKABE, and TAKAGI (Exh. 179 I). The KONOYE mentioned was Prince KONOYE and KIDO thought at that time he was vice-president of the House of Peers, which position did not carry very heavy duties in the political world. The SAKAI mentioned was Count SAKAI who had no connection with the government and the OKABE was Vicount OKABE. By TAKAGI, he referred to Baron TAKAGI, and he and OKADA were both members of the House of Peers. KIDO stated he discussed and studied various things with them.

31299 Reference was made to the diary entry that the army was so determined in its positive policy toward Manchuria that orders given by the central authorities might not be carried out. The accused said he thought he got that information from HARADA. KONOYE at that time had no part in government except as a member of the House of Peers. * Asked if he meant by the statement that the army was strongly determined that the central authorities' orders might not be carried out, that mutiny was in the offing, he said not so, that the reference was made to the Kwantung Army and the fear was entertained that central authorities' orders may not be carried out thoroughly by them. When it was pointed out that he didn't use the word "thoroughly" in the diary, he replied that he didn't remember the exact words used but was now stating his feelings in his own words.

The accused was reminded that shortly before when he was asked if he included ITAGAKI among the rightists or militarists against whom he fought, he had replied that it was his impression at the time of the Manchurian incident that the militarists included ITAGAKI and others concerned with the incident, and that when asked if he felt the same today he had answered that today the war was over and he had not especially

- 31300 thought of that at all (T. 31,276). The accused stated that when he had testified that he hadn't thought much about these things after the war, * he meant what he said. Asked if he thought his memory of events was more or less active at the time of the entry, or if he could give a more accurate story of those events now, he replied he should think his memory at the time of making the entries was accurate.
- 31301 * The accused stated he recalled the question asked whether ITAGAKI was among the rightists or militarists against whom KIDO fought consistently and his answer that it was his impression of the Manchurian Incident that the militarists included the accused ITAGAKI. As to the question following that where it was asked if he had the same view today as he had at the time of the Manchurian affair about ITAGAKI, he stated that if such were the purport of the question there might have been some misapprehension on his part. His understanding on the question was what was ITAGAKI thinking now, to which he replied he didn't know what was in his mind now. He thought the question was what kind of ideas would ITAGAKI entertain now.
- 31302 * The accused recalled his diary entry of 22 September 1931 (Exh. 179-I) that in it the meeting with HARADA, KONOYE, SAKAI, OKABE, and TAKAGI, he had also written that the army was reported to have construed to be indignant that the Emperor's opinion had been induced by his personal attendants, and that in view of such circumstances it was decided among those gathered that the Emperor had better not say anything further about the Manchurian policy, unless he was necessitated to do so.
- 31303 * Asked if it was not true that within ten months of the period he became Chief Secretary he was joining in giving the Emperor advice as to the policy he was to take on one of the most important matters in Japanese history, the accused replied not necessarily so. The gathering was purely private and the discussions did not involve important questions such as submitting advice to the Emperor, and he merely told the Lord Keeper that those who had gathered there entertained such ideas and this information was sent to the Lord Keeper for his information.
- Asked if the reason was that the army was opposing the government policy of restricting the invasion of Manchuria to the personal advisers of the Emperor, that is curbing the army's aggressiveness, was it not true that feeling it was dangerous for those around the Emperor he felt it would be wise for the Emperor to keep out of the Manchurian situation to save their own skins, the accused replied such an atmosphere seemed to exist in the army and if left not dealt with it might be a disturbing incident in Tokyo, and in handling such a situation tact was necessary.

31305 * Asked if he was dealing with a rather rough crowd, he stated he was not dealing with them directly, but it appeared from time to time they were coming around the fringes of the Lord Keeper and nobility. Asked if they came near enough that in that conference they decided it wasn't safe for the Genro to come to Tokyo, he replied that SAIONJI's life was in danger, their decision was that he should not come to Tokyo unless it was vitally important. His life was in danger from the people who employed force.

31306 Asked if he had described about that time that the Emperor him-31307 self was in danger, he stated he had not used such phraseology in his affidavit. *They didn't think the Emperor himself was exposed to danger. * He would see that the Lord Keeper got the advice from these unofficial advisors, that the Emperor should keep out of the Manchurian situation, or say anything further about it. He had no recollection as to any such idea on that point.

31308 The Premier was the most important figure in the government aside from the Emperor and if there was a small epidemic of assassinations or murders on the way and it reached to the Premier, it was as serious a situation as the country could face in a constitutional way. Asked if the Emperor could have done anything about it, he replied that at that time * the best means was to encourage the Premier and bolster his morale.

He had written in his affidavit that he was indignant because Premier WAKATSUKI talked with HARADA about the danger of the situation and KIDO criticized him, saying he was most indignant at WAKATSUKI's unreliable attitude. This was in the diary entry of 19 September 1931 when WAKATSUKI called on HARADA in fear of the strong army attitude and they discussed the impossibility of making the government's principles perfectly understood among the outpost military forces.

31309 * He had agreed that he had testified shortly before that the wisest course to meet this offensive conduct was to uphold the Premier's hand and bolster him. Asked if it was not plain that WAKATSUKI was not seeking help from those around the Emperor and possibly the Emperor himself in making the trip to HARADA, KIDO replied he did not go so far as to solicit the Emperor's help but asked those close to the Emperor if they had any good advice. Asked if that made him indignant, he replied that this was on the day following the outbreak of the incident

31310 and there were no indications that the government or cabinet held any prolonged session. KIDO resented very much the fact that WAKATSUKI would ask for help immediately * without having threshed out the matter with the cabinet. WAKATSUKI, being president of the Minseito political party, it was KIDO's fear that constitutional government would fall unless the Premier himself took a firm stand when confusion arose and that was why he was indignant.

Asked if it was not apparent that if the Premier didn't watch out, not alone would the cabinet fall, but he himself would fall by an assassin's bullet if he didn't get some strong help, the accused replied he didn't know whether or not he felt that way but KIDO was indignant over the fact that the political parties were weak and powerless. It was not true that he was not indignant that someone was trying to get the Emperor to help on the side of law and order in Japan, and the accused was asked if it was not a fact that from the beginning of his political career until Japan's surrender he consistently opposed any movement by the Emperor in a practical way to bring about law and order and stop lawlessness and violence, he replied yes.

31311 *Asked if he consistently opposed the Emperor exerting force directly to stop this lawlessness, he replied he was not opposed to that.

* The accused referred to the fact that in response to the question as to whether there was some threat to the safety of the Emperor, he had said that he did not say so. But he wished to correct his answer.

31316

In his affidavit, he had used the word "the safety" of the Emperor. The word "antai" used in the affidavit had been interpreted into "safety" but the Japanese word "goantai" had a broader meaning. His feeling at that time was that those close to the Emperor might be removed and their position taken over by those * advocating positive ideas, thus creating an uneasy situation for the Emperor. For that reason he was incorrect in his reply to the question because it pertained to the threat to the person of the Emperor.

31317

Asked if at that time he had apprehension about the physical safety of the Emperor, he stated he did not think of the Army causing direct danger to the person of the Emperor, but his first concern was that if the coup d'etat took place and those close to the Emperor were removed from office and replaced by those activist elements who were advocating positive action, if those men became close to the Emperor, it would repress the Emperor and place him in a difficult position. By repressing the Emperor and placing him in a difficult position, he meant he was extremely anxious lest activist elements * take control and suppress the Emperor. Asked what would be the mechanics of suppressing the Emperor, he stated he meant a person of very positive ideas would take the position of Lord Keeper, giving advice to the Emperor, reflecting positive ideas so that the atmosphere around the Throne would be controlled by those in high office, not only of the Lord Keeper but of the Government itself, so that the Emperor would be prevented from rejecting the advice of those around him.

31318

* One illustration of repression of the Emperor would be having the wrong man for Lord Keeper, and even the Government itself would be constituted of men with positivist ideas. By activist, he meant elements who would positively carry out certain measures and by positivist, he meant persons entertaining very strong ideas. By rightists, he meant men with very strong ideas who were also of nationalistic leanings. * By strong ideas he meant ideas of those who advocated reforms and at that time the atmosphere toward internal reforms was extremely strong. They were not confined merely to advocates of aggression but those elements would be included, and force and aggression would be included among the policies of all of them in different degrees.

31319

31320

OKAWA, Shumei was an example of a prominent leader in the rightist movement. *

He agreed that the term "coup d'etat" was well understood in all nations and had given it its ordinary meaning which meant

Page overthrowing the government. A coup d'etat in Japan did not mean overthrowing the Emperor.

31321 * Incidents such as the March Incident or October Incident did not aim at that at all, nor did the Feb. 26 Incident. In 1877 there was an Incident where SAIGO intended to eliminate those close to the Throne and various incidents thereafter were not to do anything about the Emperor but remove disloyal subjects close to the Throne. Those who were made objects of such Incidents were the Grand Chamberlain, the Lord Keeper and the Imperial Household Minister as examples. The Grand Chamberlain had nothing to do with politics * but Grand Chamberlain Suzuki at that time was looked upon as having had connections with the London Naval Conference and during Feb. 26 Incident he was attacked and seriously wounded as a result. The Imperial Household Minister had nothing to do with politics. The Lord Keeper and, during his lifetime, the Genro, could be said to have been concerned with politics in that they gave advice officially to the Emperor. The term "coup d'etat" as he used it had to do merely with doing away with the Lord Keeper and the Genro, but not with the Emperor. * The powers and duty of the Emperor are provided for in the Constitution of Japan, and KIDO's grandfather was one of three who had largely to do with that Constitution. It was one of KIDO's studies at school, as well as law. His predecessor, YUASA, was a profound student of the Constitution but was an official who came from the Home Affairs Ministry.

31324 The Constitution was a compact instrument of 7 chapters and it became effective about the time KIDO was born. * It was a modern instrument with such changes as had occurred during KIDO's life time, but he did not think there was any special change made in the Constitution through tradition. This was the first written Constitution in Japan. There had been various arguments from the outset as to the Constitution's interpretation as to whether it meant what it said.

31327 * To the accused was quoted a part of Article 4 of the Constitution, which declared that the Emperor was head of the empire, combining in himself the rights of sovereignty and exercising them according to the provisions of the Constitution, and Article 8, which provided that the Emperor in consequence of urgent necessity to maintain public safety or avert public calamities issued ordinances in the place of law when the Imperial Diet was not sitting.

31328 * (Exhibit 68) The accused was asked if regardless of the general powers, there was any question but that the Emperor had and was expected to exercise the powers set forth in Article 8. He answered that Article 8 referred to a time when the Diet was not in session and stipulated that the government might promulgate emergency ordinances when necessary but it did not mean that the Page Emperor was authorized to do anything. The Emperor might tell the government how about doing this or that, and the government on receiving such a message studied the matter, drafted it, and it became law as Imperial sanction was given.

Imperial power was restricted in the sense that the Emperor administered governmental affairs with the assistance and advice of State Minister. The wishes or will of the state became complete only with their advice and assistance.

31330 So far as the Emperor was concerned, he might give advice and caution the government, but once the government decided * on a certain policy, it had been consistent for the Emperors since the Meiji Era not to veto any measure. This was the custom which developed after the actual operation and effectuation of the Constitution. If the Cabinet agreed upon war, the Emperor had no power to prevent it. 31331 Asked if * the signing of the Rescript was a mere gesture and intended to cause the people to believe it was the real will of the Emperor and a war which he authorized and believed to be in the best interests of his people, * he replied that at the time of the Pearl Harbor attack, the Government's explanation was that there was no alternative but to rise in arms for the defense of the Empire which was placed in such circumstances where war was unavoidable. 31332

The matter of Imperial Rescript came together and was parallel with the decision for war and was a natural act. These were KIDO's observations at that time and his view and judgment. He was not in favor of the Pacific War; however, inasmuch as the decision had already been made by the government, whatever may 31333 have been his * personal opinions, he had no authority to oppose.

Asked if it was not true that the Emperor had actual power and the duty of becoming informed and acting upon his own judgment in the selection of a Premier, the accused replied that this too was a custom of long standing and in the early days inquiry of the Throne upon such questions was addressed to the Genro and later to the Lord Keeper. When such questions arose, the Lord Keeper consulted the Senior Statesmen and then reported to the Throne and the Emperor used such information as necessary and acted on the basis of it.

31334 * When asked if the Emperor was dependent upon the information he would get chiefly from the Lord Keeper in making his selection of Premier, KIDO replied that the Emperor's instructions to the Lord Keeper was to consult the Senior Statesmen on the selection of a suitable Premier and to recommend a suitable person for the position.

- 31335 * To the accused was quoted a part of Exhibit 2272, the diary entry of 28 August 1939, which stated that according to KCNOYE, he was visited by General ABE, who told him he had been ordered to organize a new Cabinet, and the Emperor instructed him that (1) either UMEZU or HATA should be appointed War Minister, (2) Diplomatic policy should follow the line of cooperation with Britain and the U.S., (3) discretion must be used in choosing the Justice Ministers as the maintenance of public order was of supreme importance.
- 31336 After thinking over the matter, KIDO expressed his opinion to KCNOYE and KONOYE agreed * that points 2 and 3 could be disposed of at ABE's discretion, but as for the nomination of the War Minister by the Emperor, there was a danger that if left to its own course, it might bring about a clash with military service, so it was advisable that the Emperor summon the War Minister or let the Chief Aide de Camp convey to the Army the Imperial Order given to ABE as to the selection of the War Minister and let the three Army Chiefs recommend the War Minister.
- 31337 KIDO requested KONOYE to convey his opinion to ABE. * After being shown the diary entry, the accused was asked if he was not advising the Emperor on the manner in which he could bring about the selection of the War Minister to be desired. He answered no, not so. He was not holding any public office at the time and it was after he had tendered his resignation. * However, KONOYE had consulted him on how to handle the problem. He agreed that the statement that he requested KONOYE to convey his opinion to ABE appeared in the diary. He regarded it advisable that the matter be conveyed to ABE. It was nothing more than a word of advice to avoid any clash with the Army with regard to the Emperor's method of choosing a War Minister. The accused was asked if it wasn't true that he described the method by which the Emperor could get the War Minister of his choice and he was giving advice on that subject, asking it to be passed on to ABE. He replied that he was asked his opinion by KONOYE and on the basis of his experience gave his views to him.
- 31338
- 31339 * The Emperor did recommend the appointment of UMEZU or HATA and got HATA, who was at that time Chief Aide de Camp and it was apparent there was a good deal of personal choice involved. HATA was War Minister in two Cabinets and it appeared that he broke up the YONAI Cabinet because that Cabinet collapsed as a result of HATA's tendering his resignation. At that time KIDO was Lord Keeper and his close friend, KONOYE, became Prime Minister for the second time.

* Asked if that was one instance where the Emperor was able to get a specific man for War Minister, he replied it was natural that if the Emperor expressed such a desire, and if there were no objections to a particular man by the Cabinet, such a man would be placed in office.

* Reference was made to the Affidavit where KIDO stated on 17 July 1939 that when KIDO reported to the Emperor, he asked KIDO if he (the Emperor) could give KONOYE some advice and KIDO told him that KONOYE should be especially prudent in the choice of foreign and finance ministers. (T. 30903) Asked if he was stating that when the Emperor wanted to find out whether he could give advice to his Premiers, he asked KIDO first whether he could do so. * He replied that wasn't exactly so. When there was some doubt or when the Emperor was unable to make any decision, at such a time he did call upon KIDO for consultation but such acts were very rare. On that occasion he did not want KIDO's permission but wanted suggestions. When the sentence "when he reported to His Majesty, he asked me if he could give KONOYE some advice" was repeated to the accused, he stated that at that time he wrote the words "if he might give", etc.

* The Emperor did ask him if he could give KONOYE some advice to his incoming Premier. It was not customary for him to ask the accused if he could give advice to his incoming Premier, but such occasions occurred from time to time. Asked if it did not seem strange to him that the Emperor would ask him if he could give advice to his own Premier that he was about to name, he replied that these private talks with the Emperor were not official and consequently he thought it not strange at all to talk with him on various subjects. The Emperor was, however, addressing him in his capacity as Lord Keeper.

31346

* It was not customary for the Emperor to discuss whom he wanted as one of his Ministers as well as Prime Minister. There was hardly any instance of the Emperor saying anything with regard to the selection of State Minister or giving instructions on whom to appoint. In the case where he virtually selected HATA

Page as War Minister, there were two candidates, HATA and UMEZU, but he did not issue any direction as to whom the post should be given to.

31347 With reference to his agreeing that the Emperor could speak to KONOYE regarding the selection of the Foreign and Finance Ministers, the meaning of this advice was that in the light of prevailing conditions, special care and prudence should be exercised * in his selection, but there were no directions as to who should be invested.

The Foreign Minister chosen at that time was the late accused MATSUOKA. Asked if he did not consider it of like importance to advise the Premier to be especially prudent in the choice of War Minister, he replied that he did not consider it especially important. The matter was important but he didn't especially mention it.

31348 * He did not know that the last Cabinet had fallen because of the War Minister's actions. Asked if it wasn't more important that the Premier should be careful in his choice of War Minister than of all the rest of the Cabinet put together, he stated that he considered it important but not more important than all the other ministers put together. There had been a long custom with regard to the selection of War Minister. The War Minister was discussed and recommended by the three Army Chiefs and with that formula which had been in effect for a long time, he did not therefore make any specific mention of War Minister at the time. He knew that regardless of the fact that the Big Three had to agree upon the War Minister, there had been a method of the Emperor successfully getting one of his two choices named only a few months before, in August 1939.

31349. * Asked what difference it made who was Foreign or Finance Minister, the foreign policy was not carried out in accordance with the views of the War Minister who could resign and fail to agree upon a successor, causing the whole Cabinet to fall, the accused answered that such occurrences did happen.

Asked what would happen if the Big Three couldn't agree upon the successor to the War Minister, he stated if this happened, there would be no War Minister, but it was only natural to expect that following a discussion of the Big Three, a candidate would be proposed. Asked if in the event they couldn't agree, if it would be the duty of the Emperor to take a hand, he replied that there was no instance of the Big Three submitting the question to the Emperor.

31351 * The accused stated that he knew that when the Second Konoye Cabinet was chosen in July 1940, that international matters were critical and the appointment of the Premier and War Minister was of grave importance. * The YONAI Cabinet was well known to be a Cabinet devoted to peace, but it had no special platform for peace but did have peaceful tendencies. It was opposed to a military alliance with Germany but the YONAI Cabinet through Foreign Minister ARITA was undertaking talks with Germany. Asked if it was at least against the military alliance, he replied that at that time the question of the military alliance did not loom large. But the YONAI Cabinet did not take an attitude of approving any alliance with Germany. However, * the attitude of the Cabinet did not come out outwardly as opposed, but inwardly KIDO generally knew about it. Toward the end of the YONAI Cabinet, relations with Germany approached a state of rapprochement and there were strong contentions that the conclusion of alliance would be going too far and there was a wide divergence of opinion with the Army who was in favor of a military alliance and wanted YONAI out. The technique employed was for the War Minister to refuse to agree to a successor in the YONAI Cabinet.

31354

* KIDO knew that the Emperor had great confidence in YONAI. Asked if he offered any suggestion to the Emperor as to how to get a new War Minister and still keep the YONAI Cabinet by employing the same technique he had suggested to KONOYE in the preceding August, he replied he had not proposed anything to KONOYE in the previous year. Asked if he proposed to KONOYE that he pass on to ABE the suggestion of how the Emperor could get UMEZU or HATA named War Minister, he replied it was after the question arose. He merely gave him his suggestion as to how the matter might be smoothly carried out. Asked if he made any such suggestion to the Emperor for the preservation of the YONAI Cabinet, by solving the problem of how to get a War Minister to take HATA's place and still retain the YONAI Cabinet, he replied no, he did not give any special advice.

31355

* KONOYE became the succeeding Premier at that time. Already about a month before there were reports and rumors with regard to a political change and not only in political circles but even among political parties and other quarters, voices were heard that the next Premier should be KONOYE. Asked if he expressed in substance the opinion that KONOYE was the ideal man to succeed YONAI, he stated he did not recall using the word "ideal" but the desire of the political world and the popularity of KONOYE in political circles was extremely great, and therefore he conveyed to the Throne the opinion that KONOYE was the most suitable man to the post. *

31361

Asked if he also stated that KONOYE was satisfactory unanimously to the army group, he recalled having spoken to that effect at a gathering of Senior Statesmen. Asked if that was the fact, he said he believed it was because he heard about the attitude and opinion prevailing in Army circles from the Vice Minister of War. At that meeting of the Senior Statesmen, KONOYE's name was proposed by the 31362 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated in the diary entry of 13 October 1941 that the situation was so delicate that the Emperor showed concern in discussing with KIDO a Rescript in case he was required to grant sanction to the opening of war and where KIDO then noted that the Prosecution had only quoted the last paragraph of the entry in its Exhibit 1149. Asked why he pointed out in his affidavit that the whole part of the diary entry was not included in the Exhibit, he replied * that he believed it was necessary to explain the situation described in the last paragraph which was the only part introduced but including the previous portion which had not been. It was pointed out to the accused that the sole subject of Exhibit 1149 referred to a visit from the accused SUZUKI to talk about his political views which must have contributed to the making of a new turn in their political condition, and KIDO expressed his opinion to SUZUKI and stated that their conclusion was that the Premier should make an effort to promote mutual understanding with the War and Navy Ministers. The accused stated that that was his meaning. Asked what he referred to by the expression "mutual understanding with the War and Navy Ministers", he stated that the situation was that the War Minister advocated that following the elapse of the first part of October, the September 6 decision should be carried into effect. The Navy Minister, however, left the matter entirely * 31363 to the discretion of the Premier. However, it became understood as discussions went on that Navy Department leaders were opposed to war between Japan and the U.S. This situation was explained by SUZUKI, the President of the Planning Board, and thereupon, KIDO told him that it would be extremely dangerous unless the Premier himself secured understanding between the War and Navy Ministers.

31365 SUZUKI told him this on the night of 13 October 1941 at about 8 pm. * Asked if this was the first time that the information had been conveyed to him, he stated that on the previous day, Chief Cabinet Secretary TOMITA, reported on what happened at the Ogikubo Conference. Asked if he received notice of the difference between the Army and Navy on the matter of going to war from SUZUKI that night, or whether he knew about it before he stated that it was included in the report received on the 12th on the Ogikubo Conference, he stated he knew that the issue of war or peace and the difference between the Army and Navy existed before SUZUKI saw him on the 13th of October, and he heard of the Conference which took place on the 12th but did not join the Conference. He knew that there had been an Imperial Conference on 6 September 1941 and knew its result. Asked if it was decided then what Japan's action should

Page be with reference to war against the western powers, he stated that the items decided upon at the Sept. 6th Conference included that war preparations should be concluded by the end of October and Japanese-American negotiations should be continued with every effort toward bringing about an amicable settlement. The third point of the decision was that if there was no possibility of an end to the deadlock and hope of settlement of the issues as a result of the negotiations by early October, then a decision for war should be made against the U.S. and Britain.

This was the gist of the decisions of that Conference but he was stating it only from his recollection. It was determined then that Japan would strive to fulfill her demands through diplomacy first and that if no amicable settlement had been arrived at by early October, then a decision for war would be made.

31368 From Exhibit 1135, his diary entry of 6 Sept. 1941, was read a part which stated that he visited the Emperor * who said he would like to ask some questions at the Conference. KIDO advised the Emperor that since Privy Council President HARA would ask questions on the Emperor's behalf, the Emperor should only give a warning in conclusion that the Supreme Command should exert every effort to bring about the diplomatic success inasmuch as the present decision was so important it might lead to a war. Asked if the Emperor was showing anxiety at that time to ask questions on his own, * he stated yes. The Privy Council President had already given KIDO word that he would like to ask the very questions with which the Emperor himself was concerned. Therefore, inasmuch as HARA probably would be asking the questions which the Emperor desired to ask, he advised the Emperor it should be more important for him to counsel the Supreme Command to cooperate with the Government for a peaceful solution. The Accused was reminded that a moment before he stated that he made the suggestion to the Emperor that he not ask questions and that they be asked through HARA because HARA was going to ask those questions anyway. His attention was then called * to his affidavit where he had stated that before being summoned by the Emperor he suggested to HARA that he ask questions at the Imperial Conference, pointing toward emphasis on continuing diplomacy rather than preparing for war. (T 30952).

Asked if he was engaged in mind reading, in anticipating the Emperor's wishes even before he saw him, he stated no. At that time he had an audience on Sept. 5 when the question arose and the Agenda submitted before the Conference first had the item relating to war preparations, and the second item was concerned with negotiations. It was believed there was something strange about the order of the two items and on the 5th the Emperor inquired on this matter

Page to KONOYE. Under such circumstances HARA called KIDO by telephone 31371 on the morning of the 6th, asking him what should be done. * Thereupon, he told HARA that there seemed to be doubt whether or not emphasis was being placed on war preparations or on diplomatic negotiations, and KIDO proposed he might ask questions on this very point. When the Emperor summoned KIDO, he asked KIDO whether he might not ask the very questions which he had already discussed a short while before with HARA. KIDO then told the Emperor that as a matter of fact, he had discussed the very questions with HARA, and inasmuch as HARA would be asking the questions, there would be no need for the Emperor to address them.

A more important point than this, he told the Emperor, was whether the High Command was going to be serious in carrying on negotiations; so his advice to the Throne was that he should like to have the Emperor at the meeting's conclusion issue a warning and rather than ask questions, to take a more positive action by issuing the warning.

* Asked if the questions were answered, he replied he had no direct knowledge because he did not attend the Imperial Conference. He later heard that the question was made by HARA and Navy Minister OIKAWA answered, but there was no reply from the High Command and the Emperor expressed regret that it had said nothing and told them they must exert all strength and energy in cooperating toward the successful conclusion of the negotiations.

31374

* Reference was made to the affidavit where it referred to "mutual understanding with the War and Navy Ministers" (T.30971), and the accused was asked how there could be mutual understanding unless one of two sides gave way. He replied that not being in the government, he would not know the actual particulars. He simply talked with Planning Board President SUZUKI as a basis for recommending all further efforts be made to save the situation.

31375

It was suggested to the witness that the army was taking the war side and the navy the peace side, and it would have to be either war or peace. He replied that it was for that reason that he counselled that further discussions be conducted, * but a simple answer to the question could not possibly be given.

31376

* Reference was made to the affidavit where the accused quoted the remainder of the diary entry for 13 October 1941, and called attention to the fact that exhibit 1149 did not contain all the entry for that day. To him was quoted a part of this entry, in which the Emperor told him that in case war with the U. S. and Britain was decided on, they must study conditions in Europe, especially the truth underlying the peace talks between Britain and Germany, and Germany and Russia. Through diplomacy, they must stop Germany from concluding an individual peace, and must have her assist in the war with the U. S., and they must also make plans as to what to do at the end of the war. It was suggested to KIDO that this part of the diary had no connection with the part quoted in exhibit 1149 of his discussion with SUZUKI, but was inserted deliberately to show * that the Emperor was making decisions and conclusions of his own in an attempt to escape KIDO's own responsibility by transferring it to the Emperor. In explanation, KIDO stated that following the OGIKUBO conference, there was extreme tenseness and confusion, and the situation developed to the point where the Emperor might be forced to decide on war even though his sentiments did not permit him to do so. There was even fear that the

Page Emperor would have to decide on war he did not desire, but if this occurred and a Rescript would have to be 31378 * proclaimed, the Emperor expressed that absolute care be exercised to reflect his innermost feelings. As a result of his anxiety there was discussion reflecting his feelings, and that was why KIDO had entered them in his diary, and had placed it in the affidavit to make clear the imminent sense of war prevailing in government and court circles.

Asked if in order to make clear the Emperor's desire for peace he found it necessary to put in his diary that the Emperor said to him they must through diplomacy, stop Germany from concluding an individual peace and must have her assist in the war with the U. S., he replied that was not his meaning at all. He merely wished to show to what extent the Emperor worried about the situation.

31379 * Asked why he did not say to the Emperor if the Emperor did not want war, that should he refuse his sanction and refuse to sign a rescript, he replied that under the Japanese system a decision by the Cabinet and High Command could not be vetoed by the Emperor. When asked why it could not be vetoed, he stated that as an actual question, nothing arose at that time, but did arise on 8 December, at which time the explanation of the government was that there was no alternative but to take up arms for self defense. To that advice the Emperor was in no position to issue a rejection.

31380 * When asked what there was to stop him, the accused replied that it was not a question of stopping or not stopping, but a custom long prevailing in constitutional practice which dated back to the Russo-Japanese war. At the time of the Russo-Japanese war, Emperor MEIJI hesitated in connection with the decision reached by the Imperial Conference, but gave his approval as it was reached by the Government and High Command. In this instance the Emperor went so far as to return to a carte blanche the conference decision of September 6.

31381 * As a result of re-examination, the incident of December 8 broke out, and inasmuch as the position of the Government and High Command was that it was for self defense, the Emperor could not veto the decision.

Asked by the President where he got that authority, the accused replied that the Emperor's wishes were conveyed to the Premier, and the Cabinet over which the Premier presided subjected the matter to re-examination. Such a measure was not to be found at all, even in the MEIJI Era, and could be considered a rather advanced step.

Page Asked what he meant by the carte blanche move of the Emperor, he stated he meant to start afresh with a clean slate, but he did not necessarily mean he used the word in his affidavit.

31381 * Asked if his advice was not sought in the last hours of the KONOYE Cabinet, he replied that as was customary there were frequent audiences and discussions, but he did not suggest these were ordinary times. The accused stated he joined the First KONOYE Cabinet in 31383 October, 1937, and * both he and KONOYE were strong advocates of peace then and before, including peace toward China.

31384 Asked if it was true that when the KONOYE Cabinet first went into power there was one brigade of approximately 5,000 Japanese troops in China, he replied that he was not a member of the KONOYE Cabinet at the time of its formation, but joined it within three or four months afterwards. He did not have any detailed information at the time, because he was then an official in the Household Department as Director of the Board of Pannage. * When he became Minister of Education in the KONOYE Cabinet in October, 1937, he was a Minister of State, becoming a general minister in accordance with the constitution. The constitutional provision regarding this point was that the Cabinet was constituted by several state ministers appointed to hold their respective portfolios, and the various ministries 31385 * were regulated by regulations governing them. He knew of the constitutional provision that the respective state ministers should give their advice to the Emperor and be responsible for it, and were collectively responsible for what the Cabinet did.

31386 Cabinet meetings were generally held twice a week, and discussions were held, but generally the details * pertaining to any particular ministry were left to the competent minister of that ministry, and his explanations generally passed the Cabinet.

Asked if he knew that troops in China during the First KONOYE Cabinet increased from one brigade of 5,000 to thirty divisions with more than a million, he replied that such matters were never discussed at a cabinet meeting. Asked if he did not discuss with HARADA that there were about 1,600,000 troops in China during the First KONOYE Cabinet, he replied that with regard to the figure he thought there was an entry in his diary in connection with the talk he had with KONOYE, but didn't recall the kind of talk he had with HARADA.

Although he learned of this later, he felt the figure was a bit too high. * From what he learned later, he thought it was under one million. War Minister ITAGAKI spoke of decreasing strength from 700,000 to 600,000, and he felt the figure 1,600,000 was quite a bit too high.
- 31387
- 31388 * A document was handed to the witness, who 31392 identified it as a part of his diary. * Exhibit 3341, the diary entry for 12 December, 1938, having been identified by the accused, stated that KONOYE said that neither army strategy was very reliable, nor the situation in various quarters satisfactory, and the situation was deadlocked. KONOYE consulted KIDO about his intention to resign, and KIDO replied he could not agree to the Premier's opinion immediately, and that the most responsible person was War Minister ITAGAKI, who had sent an army of 1,600,000 overseas, and therefore KONOYE's resignation without complete understanding and consent by ITAGAKI would bring the latter to bay, which would be undesirable. KIDO further told KONOYE that it was reported that Wang Ching-wei would escape from Chungking on the 18th, and for the present it was not good to disclose political unrest.
- 31393 * Wishing to consult ITAGAKI himself, KIDO asked KONOYE to leave the matter to him, and KONOYE consented. When asked if he had any doubt now after hearing this read, that he was reasonably well informed that 1,600,000 troops were sent to China under the War Ministry of ITAGAKI, he replied that at that time he had heard there were about that number in China, but later on he felt it was a mistake in memory on his part. He did not deny having a talk with KONOYE, but was only stating that he later discovered he might have made a mistake.
- 31394 Asked what he meant by stating in exhibit 3341 that he thought KONOYE's resignation would have been undesirable because it would bring the war minister to bay, he explained that KONOYE was saying he was impatient * and desired to resign. As ITAGAKI himself testified, at the time ITAGAKI was invited to become War Minister, KONOYE sent a special emissary to China to request him to serve as War Minister to settle the China Affair. Therefore, KIDO advised KONOYE against taking surprise measures against ITAGAKI and to wait until KIDO had a full talk with him.

31398 * The accused was asked to tell the most notable incidents where he advised or urged the Emperor to lend his personal or official powers toward subduing the militarists. * He replied that during his tenure as Chief Secretary to the Lord Keeper he was not permitted audiences with the Emperor, and in those days his views were presented to the Lord Keeper, and hence he did not know whether such views were actually transmitted to the Emperor. However, on 4 February, 1932, when Finance Minister TAKAHASHI requested the Emperor to use his power to restrain the militarists, he, with HARADA, brought the matter to the Lord Keeper, submitting his views with regard to restraining the political advance of the army. In 1940, as Lord Keeper, he submitted advice to the Throne, requesting the most careful consideration be given in connection with the advance into FIC, * and asked the Emperor to caution the military to this effect.

He made a similar admission again in February, 1941, when the FIC issue came up again. In September, 1940, at the time the Tripartite Pact was concluded, he requested that necessary and due guidance be given in connection with the early settlement of the China Incident.

31403 With reference to the conference of 6 September, 1941, he asked the Emperor to counsel the High Command to give whole-hearted cooperation toward the continuance of diplomatic negotiations with the U. Prior to the formation of the TOJO Cabinet on 17 October, 1941, he requested the * Emperor, * without being bound in any manner by the September 6 decision, to counsel that profound study and re-examination be made, and under the Emperor's orders this desire of the Throne was conveyed to TOJO and OIKAWA.

* In either May or June, 1943, he counselled the Emperor on the advisability of bringing the war to a speedy conclusion, and later conveyed to the Throne various ideas in connection with peace efforts, receiving the Emperor's approval.

31407

* Reference was made to the affidavit where it described matters taking place in September, 1931, in Manchuria as constituting a plot, and the accused was asked if he thought the plot extended to movements of troops into Manchuria in that month. He replied that that was his belief, on the basis of information he received. He was in no position to give approval to such movement of troops.

31408

* A reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that on 23 June, 1931, in KIDO's capacity as Chief Secretary, HARADA gave him information of a plot by military officers in Manchuria which was extremely regrettable, as KIDO opposed the army operations there and in China. (T.30728).

31409

Asked * what this information was that HARADA gave him, he replied that at that time relations with

31410

* China were aggravated, and efforts were made to settle issues through diplomacy, without avail. The Kwantung Army officers in Manchuria were indignant, and information indicated they might take positive action which was divorced from any plans of the central authorities. This was the gist of the conversation with HARADA.

Asked if the plot was on the part of the officers or of the army, he replied the information was to the effect that such movements seemed to be within the Kwantung Army. Asked if he changed his views on the matter later, he stated he acted on the basis of information received at the time. He learned in January the following year of the plans to establish a new state in Manchuria and Mongolia, when ITAGAKI made a talk.

Page Asked if ITAGAKI was one of the Kwantung Army
31412 leaders referred to in reference to the plot in September, 1931. he replied that he then did not know ITAGAKI and was unfamiliar with what he was doing. At the time ITAGAKI was a Senior Staff Officer, and so was directly connected with troop movements.

The accused was asked if he did not learn that there was not alone a new state contemplated, but also for the purpose of unifying three or four Japanese organizations in Manchuria and Mongolia it was also contemplated to establish one organization under a government-general, and he replied he learned about it when MINAMI gave a lecture before the Throne.

KIDO stated he joined the KONOYE Cabinet to lend all aid to settle the China matter, and the War Minister at the time was SUGIYAMA, HIROTA was Foreign Minister, and 31413 RABA * was Home Minister, until his death when SUETSUGU succeeded him around December. Shortly before SUETSUGU became Home Minister he was Cabinet Counsellor, and KIDO knew him from that time.

According to regulations concerning Cabinet counsellors, their main function was as consultant to the Premier in connection with bringing about an early end of the China Incident, and the post was a special one created 31414 for that precise purpose. * The Home Minister, among other things, had charge of agencies preserving law and order. The position was not especially powerful, but had a special position during the time of government by political parties. After this it didn't have special powers, but did have control of the police forces. He had stated that SUETSUGU was an internationally known Fascist, and abided by that statement.

31415 * He was considerably surprised when KONOYE told him that a man of such philosophy had been invited into the Cabinet, but made no remonstrance as it was KONOYE's job to select his ministers. He did not register any objection to sitting in the Cabinet with a man of such political creeds. As far as KIDO knew, SUETSUGU said that the incident should be terminated as soon as possible, but KIDO did not clearly recall as to whether SUETSUGU specified whether it should be terminated by peaceful methods or by exterminating all Chinese who resisted army movements.

31416

* The accused was reminded that he had testified that his chief purpose in joining the KONOYE Cabinet was to bring about an end to the China Affair speedily, and his attention was called to the fact that very shortly SUETSUGU epitomized the terms to be given Chiang Kai-shek in December, 1937. He was asked if he meant to convey that under those circumstances he didn't have frequent conversations with SUETSUGU to find out his views on how he intended to settle the China matter. KIDO replied that SUETSUGU was not taking one side or the other. SUETSUGU's epitomizing the peace terms was not for the purpose of carrying on hostilities, but was to advance peace negotiations.

31417 * Asked whether SUETSUGU wanted stiff or liberal terms, he replied he did not know SUETSUGU well and had hardly any opportunity to discuss such matters with him. KIDO's talks were principally with KONOYE, Overseas Minister OTANI, and ARIMA. He learned of SUETSUGU's ideas for the first time at a cabinet meeting on 17 December.

31418 * It was correct that he didn't get SUETSUGU's views through conversations with him, and the reason was that he didn't have fair opportunity to learn his views. In December, 1937, the matter of opening peace negotiations with Chiang through the German Ambassador came up. To the witness was quoted a part of his affidavit, which stated that in this case there was no proper liaison between the Cabinet and High Command, whose attitude was not fully known to the Cabinet, causing KONOYE deep concern. (T. 30834).

31419 * Asked whose attitude he was talking about when he used the words, he replied that it was the attitude of the High Command with respect to the question of settling the Affair. * It was not the High Command that was going to determine whether the Affair was settled and upon what terms, but since it was fighting in China it had a voice.

31420 * Since there were hostilities going on the voice was strong.

31421 * Asked if it was the truth that Premier KONOYE, in December 1937, was in the position where he had to find out from the High Command what peace terms he could offer Chiang, * KIDO replied that the situation was that negotiations could not be conducted without adequate liaison between the government and High Command.

Pare

Asked if when he used the term "the high Command" whose attitude was not fully known to the Cabinet, he meant he could not fully determine what terms the High Command would agree to, he replied that the attitude of the High Command was known to the Cabinet only through War Minister SUGIYAMA's explanations, which were not clear, and for that reason he received the impression that the question was not clear. He agreed that he had stated in his affidavit that he failed to elicit any definite reply from SUGIYAMA.

31422

* It was not true that he failed to elicit any definite reply to the peace terms that could be given Chiang. Asked what he was trying to find out from the High Command with reference to the negotiations with Chiang if it was not the terms of peace they were to agree to, he replied that was the army attitude toward the Incident. To SUGIYAMA he asked whether the army was serious in trying to end the China Affair or whether it intended to fight it out to the last. SUGIYAMA's reply was somewhat vague, and at that point talk was suspended.

31423

* Asked if it was for the War Minister to determine whether the matter would be fought out or whether it was for the Premier, Foreign Minister, and rest of the Cabinet Ministers to make the decision, he replied it was the Cabinet's duty. It was a fact that he was not able to get an answer to the question he asked SUGIYAMA in December, 1937.

31424

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that peace terms offered China through the German Ambassador had been studied, etc. (T. 30834). He was asked what the peace terms were, but replied he didn't recall the details, * nor had an exact recollection of the main points. At the time there were eleven or twelve items in the peace proposal, and he didn't recall each and every one. Generally, his recollection was that general peace was sought through such terms as the recognition of Manchukuo and of a special area in North China, but he didn't recall particulars. At that time he did know about them as it came up for discussion at the Cabinet. * He was not the competent minister in charge, and at this date he had forgotten details.

31425

It was true that he generally made diary entries about important matters, and had frequent conversations with HARADA. While he had no recollection he thought he discussed such matters with him and also with Prince CHICHIBU. Asked if HARADA was dependable so far as his intent to record the truth of conversations, he replied that HARADA was one of his greatest friends, but unfortunately * he could not place utmost confidence in the accuracy of his recordings.

NARRATIVE SUMMARY OF THE RECORD
October 21, 1947
DEFENSE - KIDO - Cross

The instances he saw of HARADA's recording had among them references to KIDO. He did not know if there were proposals with reference to settlement of the China War made by Vice Chief of Staff TADA. He was asked why he stated in his affidavit that he was not aware what proposals were made by TADA, (T. 30835), and if this was not clearly suggestive that proposals were made but he was unacquainted with what they were, and he replied that is not what he meant, as he did not even know that a proposal had been made by TADA.

31427

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that on 16 December, 1937, he received a message from KONOYE. (T. 30835). * Asked if it was true that even on that date KONOYE could not determine from the High Command what they had agreed to with reference to a settlement, he replied that was not so. KONOYE went so far as to hold a conference of those concerned, and submitted the decision of the Cabinet the following morning. KONOYE entertained the apprehension as to whether the army would seriously carry out the terms, and the attitude of the War Minister himself was ambiguous. Thereupon, KONOYE asked KIDO to question War Minister SUGIYAMA, and KIDO put the question to SUGIYAMA at the Cabinet meeting on the 17th.

31428

* They agreed the term would be splendid for bringing about peace with China, but pointed out that there might be demands by the other side. The question to SUGIYAMA was to what extent was the army willing to compromise in the event of counter proposals, and SUGIYAMA replied, no, that these were minimum terms and if they did not accept these they should continue resolutely with armed action.

31429

As a result of SUGIYAMA's statement the Cabinet was thrown into turmoil and KONOYE was extremely worried, believing that if the terms were rejected by China and China started counter propaganda, in view of Japanese public opinion being very strong it might lead to a civil war within Japan. KONOYE was especially worried because the Diet was about to reopen within a month. * Because of the relationship of the matter to preserving law and order, SUETSUGU's opinion was that at any rate, what was the use of putting forth terms that could not be compromised upon, and to provide flexibility to them he boiled the terms down to four points. Such being the Army's attitude, the Cabinet's attitude was that the four points be proposed and then Japan and China reach closer cooperation through future negotiations.

Page

Since the General Staff had already proposed very strong terms, they decided to present these terms to the Chinese, and the Cabinet adopted them and further decided to entrust the Foreign Minister with full authority with respect to carrying them into execution.

31430

* With regard to the policy, there were no divergencies between the Cabinet and High Command, but great caution was given to handling the matter through diplomatic procedure. Asked if he was in favor of giving concrete terms to China through the German Ambassador, he stated that he felt that if terms were submitted on the condition that the army would be willing to compromise, he thought the terms would be splendid, but in view of SUGIYAMA's reply to his questions he anticipated the negotiations would fail if the terms were presented in that form.

31431

* Asked if he intended to convey his belief that the General Staff was being consulted about the terms when he referred to their attitude as to whether it would be willing to make peace on any terms or what terms would be satisfactory, he replied the terms presented to the Cabinet were discussed and agreed upon by officers concerned. * He asked SUGIYAMA if he would be willing to conduct negotiations on the basis of the terms, but SUGIYAMA replied that the terms were the Army's minimum demands, and if not accepted the Army would continue its positive actions. The accused was very much alarmed and surprised at his reply.

31432

Asked if the terms required amplification or were clear and complete enough to serve as a basis for understanding for peace, he replied he had no exact recollection, but felt the terms were specific and were presented in detail. He regretted very much, but didn't remember the four points. * All he remembered was that the former points were included in the four points. He did not remember what the former terms were, * but at the time he understood them.

31434

* To the witness was quoted a purported conversation with HARADA on 21 December 1937, which stated that the whole matter had been disorderly and he said plenty at the Cabinet meeting. He wondered if General Staff Headquarters had not committed stipulations concretely through the German Military Attache. He felt it dangerous to see the Navy, and especially the Army, or rather Staff Headquarters, so anxious to press the peace solution. If they submitted concrete stipulations and they turned it down, they were only letting them in on what they wanted, and it would be all loss with no gain.

Page

KIDO was worried why they were in such a hurry. At the Cabinet meeting that day he strongly asserted it was necessary that peace stipulations be more abstract and contain something to cover everything, and asked what need there was to force themselves into asking Germany. It was strange that Staff Headquarters was so eager, and he was worried that Germany might put one over on them.

31436 * The accused was asked if he made that statement to HARADA on 12 December, 1937, and he stated he didn't 31447 * recall whether he met HARADA on that day or had such a conversation with him, but on consulting his diary he found 31448 he had dinner with HARADA that day, and it was possible they may have talked on various matters. * Since the conversation took place at a dinner party he hardly thought that he could have talked in such a systematic and organized way. He could not say for certain that he did talk to HARADA in exactly that fashion. In regard to the Cabinet meeting, as he had already stated, after KIDO put his question there was considerable confusion. He had no faith in Germany at the time, and furthermore Germany had sent scores of military advisers to China, and he therefore had considerable doubt as to the intentions of the General Staff in requesting the conditions be made specific and presented in haste. Therefore, he had felt they were being tricked by Germany.

31449 He could not say he had never talked with HARADA along those lines. He was suspicious of the reasons why diplomatic negotiations were not left in the hands of the Foreign Ministry. * Asked if he recalled anything in what was read that sounded very unlikely to have been said by him that would not have reflected his basic ideas, he replied that on the whole it could be said that his ideas were faithfully represented, but he was somewhat surprised at the strong language employed.

31450

* The accused stated that during recess he had consulted his diary for 21 December 1937. He did not recall a conversation he had with HARADA on 14 January 1938 which referred to a talk with Prince CHICHIBU.

31451

To the accused was quoted a purported statement he made to HARADA on 12 January 1938 in which he stated that he had talked to CHICHIBU a few days before and CHICHIBU asked him on what grounds the government * was refraining from concluding present hostilities, and how much longer did they think financial strength would last. KIDO explained the circumstances and in the course of conversation CHICHIBU remarked that the present hostilities differed from those of the Sino-Japanese and the Russo-Japanese wars in that they were not waging war against the Chinese people but against Chiang Kai-shek regime, and therefore why not liquidate the friction and clasp hands? KIDO replied that even if the present situation differed from those wars, it was impossible after Japanese troops had killed 700,000 to 800,000 soldiers * for the army to look grave and say let's shake hands and truly mean it.

31452

Was Japan a victorious nation or a defeated one. Was it for a victorious nation to say they would like to make peace as soon as possible by submitting all kinds of terms, if by doing so they showed their true colors, and should the opponent refuse to respond, they would, in reverse, use this as propaganda, saying that Japan was in straightened circumstances and with the terms had expressed hopes for peace.

The accused stated he had no recollection of saying what had been read to him or believed it reflected his thoughts at the time. He did tell CHICHIBU what happened at the cabinet meeting but did not recall expressing such opinions.

* An additional part of the purported conversation with HARADA was read to the accused in which he stated that if such propaganda should be spread it would result in Japan being at a disadvantage. There would be a slump in the yen exchange and government securities, and loss of confidence in economics and finance, and the nation would not be

Page

31454 able to purchase commodities and prices of goods would soon menacing internal peace. Diplomacy was necessary to conceive a plan for peace, but unless this was delivered in such a way that the settlement was solid, and if things were handled in a manner * General Staff Headquarters desired, he should have no end of worry for the government.

31455 * After this was read to the accused, he stated he still had no recollection concerning the conversation. With reference to the part concerning the killing of 700 or 800,000 Chinese, at that time he had no information of the killing of such a number. As for the fact that because of this they were unable to effect peace, even at the previous cabinet meeting, that thought never entered his head. He did recall he talked to CHICHIBU of what happened at the cabinet meeting and felt the general staff had some behind-the-scenes deal with Germany, and he feared whether negot'ations carried on through Germany would succeed.

He recalled that after talking on various subjects at the end CHICHIBU said the fault really lay with SUGIYAMA because he had not done a good liaison job.

31456 * Asked if he recalled if he held views at the time that would have been dangerous for Japan economically, if negotiations fell through, KIDO replied that his main anxiety was that if Japan presented China with definite terms and they were rejected, China would utilize this for counter propaganda and succeed in creating internal disturbances adversely affecting Japan's economy as well as in other fields.

Asked if that was one of the reasons why he wasn't in favor of giving China concrete terms, and if the terms became known and there was no settlement it would be embarrassing, he replied that that was what he was worried about.

31457 Asked if, as a matter of fact, the terms were not concrete, * he replied that the Foreign Minister conducted negotiations on the basis of the terms which had been summarized in four main points, but the cabinet had already decided the specific terms and left the handling of the matter to the Foreign Minister.

Asked if the terms were passed to China through the German Ambassador with a time limit for their acceptance, he replied that he didn't know the manner in which the Foreign Minister negotiated with the German Ambassador, but remembered that at the cabinet meeting they decided the matter should be settled by the end of the year, whether this could be called a time limit or not he did not know.

31458 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that it was suggested at the cabinet meeting of 18 December 1947 that Chiang Kai-shek's answer should be requested before the end of the year (T. 30,836-7). Asked if this was correct, the accused replied that it was and that in his diary for that date he had used the expression the deadline should be fixed as about the end of this year.

Asked if that didn't occur to him to be rather brief period of time to get an end to a matter with so many ramifications, and which had been fought out so long, he replied that that decision was reached after an explanation by the Foreign Minister and since he was not an expert on such affairs, he didn't give much further thought to it.

31459 * On 14 January, in the middle of a cabinet meeting, the German Ambassador asked to see the Foreign Minister and when the Foreign Minister returned he brought with him the Chinese reply. KIDO did not know the details of the reply but just heard the Foreign Minister make his report and did not know whether it was an official reply from the Chinese. The Foreign Minister's report was at that late date that the 31460 Chinese were still requesting explanations on the terms and * showed no sincerity in wanting peace.

Asked if he had not indicated that the terms were not concrete and that he thought it would be a mistake to make them that way, he replied that what he meant by making the terms general was to bring about a successful conclusion of negotiations. He meant that the negotiations be conducted by epitomizing the peace terms.

31461 * Asked if he did not say in his diary of 18 December 1937 that they decided they would leave it to the Foreign Minister and let the ambassador sound Chiang's views by showing comprehensive conditions of their intention, and refraining from showing details, he replied that this was true.

- 31462 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that KONOYE was anxious to restore peace without a day's loss and agreed to the abstract epitomization of peace terms so as not to obstruct negotiations but make room for a future concession to insure success for the negotiations (T. 30,836).
- Asked if it would not be entirely in the line of reason for Chiang to ask for further details if those cabinet instructions were carried out by the Foreign Minister, the accused replied that since negotiations were left completely in the Foreign Minister's hands, including the Chinese replies, he knew nothing of what transpired later.
- 31463 * The same question was repeated to the accused and he replied that he supposed it was but natural that they should make further inquiries. It was intended by KONOYE that there would be room left in the terms for some concessions to China, and that was told KIDO by him. Asked if it was not true that as a result of the inquiry for further terms, Chiang was told there would be no further dealing with him, he replied that that was so and the Foreign Minister reported to the cabinet that Chiang's regime had shown no sincerity but was still vague, and there was no point in continuing negotiations. Following the Foreign Minister's report the cabinet arrived at its decision.
- 31464 * Asked if he inquired of the Foreign Minister on what grounds he based his conclusion that no bona fides were being shown by Chiang, he replied that he did not recall whether he questioned him.
- 31465 * Reference was made to the affidavit where a diary extract for 21 December 1937 (Exh. 2259) was quoted, this stated that at the cabinet meeting they deliberated on negotiations with China, the draft of the answer to the German Ambassador, and the counter measures for the China Affair, and that KIDO suggested the necessity for creating cultural measures in North China. The affidavit went on to say that, as Exhibit 2259 also showed, they discussed at the cabinet meeting principles for dealing with matters concerning the Affair, and KIDO maintained that policies for cultural movement towards China be established instead of carrying out military activities to no purpose (T. 30,837).

31466 * The accused having been handed the original of his diary of that date was asked if the words, "instead of carrying out military activities to no purpose," were contained in any part of the diary for that date, he replied that the words were used in the affidavit to explain what he said and he did not believe they could be found in his diary.

He believed he did record something about the occurrence in January when Chiang Kai-shek was given notice there would be no further dealings with him. The accused stated he remained in the first KONOYE Cabinet until its resignation, and did receive some consultation from KONOYE on the matter of bringing ITAGAKI from China to Tokyo as War Minister, but that was the extent of his participation. He did not know ITAGAKI before he came there as War Minister, * but had met him only in 1932 when he heard him lecture. He did not talk to him on that occasion, and it could not really be said he knew him until he entered the cabinet.

31467 The accused was asked if he remembered saying about 23 May 1938 to HARADA that the Chief of the Personnel Bureau had gone to China to approach ITAGAKI, and thought there would be a reply from Tientsin the next day or day after, in which case everything would move smoothly. KIDO said that he did not recall that very well but did remember that KONOYE told him that FURUNO had been sent to persuade ITAGAKI. He did not recall that the Chief of the Personnel Bureau ever went, and believed that HARADA must be under misapprehension as to the source of this information, as he was sure he did not actually say that.

31468 Asked if he discussed the matter with KONOYE and if KONOYE said that if SUGIYAMA resigned as War Minister he would like to put up a combination of ITAGAKI and TOJO, the accused stated that he could not remember hearing anything to that effect, and thought it must be wrong. KONOYE expressed his dissatisfaction * that the army had appointed TOJO Vice-Minister before ITAGAKI had been appointed War Minister.

31469 * He had forgotten exactly how many days TOJO had been appointed Vice-Minister before ITAGAKI was appointed War Minister, but believed that it was less than a week.

31470 Asked if he said that if the statement was made that KONOYE said that if SUGIYAMA resigned he would like to put up a combination of ITAGAKI and TOJO that this was something KONOYE never said, the accused replied he didn't say that this statement was a mistake, * but what he did say was that what was alleged that KONOYE told HARADA and what KIDO said KONOYE told him did not agree, and he could not believe KONOYE expressed such opinions to HARADA. He did not know if KONOYE made such a statement.

The accused was asked if he recalled the cabinet meeting of 24 December 1937 in which outlines of measures for the China Incident were made and policy for management of North China, political supervision, economic development, national policy, and policy for establishing a national policy company in North China was decided on. He stated that on looking at his diary he found that such a meeting was held that day.

31472 * He agreed that the exhibit showed it provided for the creation of an inseparable relationship between Japan, Manchuria, and China economically, and they would realize these objects and expand and strengthen the regime, which should be supervised to become the leading power of reconstructed China, and areas to be included in the new North China regime should depend on the development of military operations.

31473 * Asked if he approved of that decision, he stated that he believed that as a cabinet member he agreed to it. This type of policy and measure was reported to the cabinet by the competent ministers and he, as Education Minister, had no such interest in these policies, and his connection was limited to approval after it had been submitted to the cabinet.

The accused was reminded that he had stated his very purpose in entering the KONOYE cabinet was to bring peace with China, and asked if that did not cause him to be exceedingly interested in matters concerning Japanese control over China, he replied, yes, if the measure had been adopted for aggressive purposes he should have been opposed to it, but the explanation at the time was that the occupied areas had expanded and it was not wise to permit an unrestricted influx of Japanese into * those areas, and that a certain amount of guidance was necessary and certain policies had to be laid down. In that sense he agreed with the measures.

When the decision was reached that the extent of North China would depend on military movements, it referred to Japanese army movements. Asked if he would not consider the territory that was politically controlled as a result of successful military movements was controlled by aggression, he replied that he never considered the China Incident an aggressive war but did deplore the hostilities.

31475 * He did not think that troops in China were needed to defend Japan. He didn't recall the exact number of troops in China in 1938 but didn't believe the number reached one million, but were in the neighborhood of three-quarter million. He conceded that they were not over there for training purposes.

31476 Asked if he did not say in his interrogations that he thought the movements in Manchuria were initially defensive but could not be so called after that, he replied that he may have made such a remark, * and as far as the Manchurian Incident was concerned he did so think at the time. He recalled that he said that in the beginning the action of the troops in the Manchurian Incident was taken in exercise of the right of self defense, but thought that things were going too far when the establishment of a new state began to be advocated, and he didn't agree with the action of Japan in relation to Manchuria.

31477 * He recalled the advent of ITAGAKI and TOJO as Minister and Vice-Minister of War, respectively, in the first KONOYE cabinet. Asked if he did not consider the Kwantung Army a dangerous breeding ground for pacifist cabinet members, he replied that the composition of the Kwantung Army at the time of the Manchurian Incident and at the time of the China Incident and at the time of which was now spoken of, was quite different.

31478 * He did not know Major-General IMAMURA, Hitoshi, or Colonel TOMINAGA, Kyoji. When the first KONOYE cabinet formed, ITAGAKI remained as War Minister and KIDO became Home Minister in the succeeding cabinet. He did not favor the military alliance with Germany in 1938 and 1939.

31479 Asked what caused the first KONOYE cabinet to fall, * he replied that KONOYE had been saying he wanted to resign because of his policies ending in deadlock. When he met KIDO on 17 December he told him there was a plan afoot to extend the Anti-Comintern Pact with Germany to include common defense against Britain and France. If this came about, KONOYE felt that nothing he could do would be of any use and therefore he wanted to resign. KIDO was in agreement with what KONOYE said and they started activities with a view to having the cabinet resign.

Asked if it was not true that KONOYE stayed out of the next cabinet but KIDO went on, he replied that KONOYE also entered the HIRANUMA cabinet as a minister without portfolio, but it was true that the accused did stay throughout the HIRANUMA cabinet.

31480 The military alliance between Germany and Italy continued to be discussed at that time. KIDO continued to oppose it, * but the matter was investigated in the Five Ministers conference. In March for the first time he heard from the Foreign Minister the progress of those investigations and KIDO felt that practically speaking it was difficult to oppose the measure, and therefore agreed that if the proposed agreement merely strengthened the Anti-Comintern Pact so as not to aggravate Britain and America, he would not oppose it.

31481 *Exhibit 2269 was read to the accused which stated that he conferred with Premier HIRANUMA on the military alliance and emphasized that if it ended in failure, it would have a dangerous effect upon the domestic situation and would be a decisive disadvantage to settling the China Incident, and he requested HIRANUMA to exert increased efforts.

31482 In explanation KIDO stated that he wrote this with a view, not to give a wrong impression, but the extract is too short. His real feelings were that the pact be concluded so as not to aggravate Britain and America, and he told HIRANUMA that further efforts would be made by him along that line. He would say, failure in getting a military alliance with Germany and Italy would have a dangerous effect on the domestic situation, * and would be a decisive disadvantage in the settlement of the China incident. However, he said that he wanted to explain what he had written, he felt he could explain it, but did feel that what he said was true.

Page

31484 * KIDO, as a cabinet officer attended the Diet sessions 31485 ordinarily, * and upon being shown a document, he did not recall being in the Diet when the statement recorded in the document was made by HIROTA on 16 February 1938. He was asked if he recognized the document as being a statement in English in the Japanese Times and Mail, and he replied that according to the newspaper article, it appeared that the interpretation re-31486 corded there took place * at a Budget Committee meeting. He thought he was present because there was a report in the article of a reply made by him. However, at Budget Committee sessions, state ministers are sometimes in and sometimes out of the meetings and are not always there.

During February, state ministers are extremely busy, and that being the case, he was unable to say whether he attended this particular meeting where a question was raised by OKURA and replied to by HIROTA.

31487 * The attention of KIDO was called to the statement in the document which said OKURA pointed out that in the foreign press were published articles calumniating the Japanese military in the Shanghai-Nanking region, and observed that the sense of superiority of the Japanese had not been impres-sioning foreigners favorably. KIDO stated that in regard to this, he did not recall it at all, but had learned of it for the first time by reading the article.

31488 * He had no recollection of any comment in the Diet or otherwise about the Japanese militarists being calumniated in the Nanking area.

31489 * Even after seeing the article, he could not recall HIROTA making the remarks set forth there, but presumed that inasmuch as HIROTA asked himself a question and he replied, it was probable that immediately after answering the interpellation he left the session.

Attention was called to the remark of HIROTA in the document that during the early stage of the incident, the government followed the policy of trying to settle the affair locally. As negotiations could not be carried on smoothly, it was decided to dispatch a punitive expedition.

31490 * Asked if he did not hear HIROTA make that statement, he replied that he believed he was not present at that session.

Page

Asked if he would not hear things of importance even though not present, he replied that the ministers of state are not familiar with questions and replies at Budget Sessions, and other committee meetings in the Diet, because they are very busy during the Diet session.

31491 * He did not recall at present whether he was in attendance at that particular session. The custom was for ministers to move from one committee meeting to another as soon as replies to interpellations were made. He believed he did not listen to this interpellation and reply and had no recollection of ever hearing the language expressed in the document. This was not a formal statement of the Foreign Minister but was a reply given during a Budget Committee session to a Diet interpellation.

31492 Asked by the President if that would be sufficient to render the statement of no importance, * he replied that it was not a question of the statement's importance, what he meant to say was that he had no opportunity to listen at that particular session.

31493 * Asked if he had never heard about the statement until now, he replied that he had no recollection whatsoever and was reading of it for the first time. Asked if the statement, "As negotiations could not be carried on smoothly, it was decided to dispatch a punitive expedition to China," was true, he replied he had no thought of a punitive force. The article was a summarized newspaper report and not the official transcript of the Diet proceedings. Therefore, he did not know whether HIROTA actually used such a word in the Diet, nor was he in a position to pass judgment on whether he did so.

31494 Asked if the words were not true regardless of whether the statement was made by HIROTA, he replied that he knew of no instance * of a punitive expedition being sent out.

He did not know to what extent the Japanese Time and Mail was reliable, and did not know whether its reputation was that it was reliable.

31495 * He knew of the existence of a newspaper called the Japan Times but did not know its character after it merged with the Mail.

31496 The accused was asked if the statement would not have been properly challenged if it was not true, and he replied he did not see where the challenge would come from in such a case.

31507 * The accused stated that he did not read the statement made by HIROTA on 16 February 1938 before the Diet which was that the government never meant to effect the compromise with the Chiang Regime. He had no recollection of HIROTA's ever making the statement at a meeting to which he was present.

31508 * If that statement had been made, he could not believe that it would have been in accordance with the facts. The accused stated that he knew IDA, Bannon, a member of the House of Peers, and a well known rightist, and recalled on 14 January 1938 IDA severally attacked the Imperial University in the House of Peers. At that time KIDO replied to the interpellation but did not agree with him entirely.

31509 Asked if he recalled that on 15 January 1938 HARADA told him that his reply might create a difficult situation, and that he was worried about the way KIDO was acting, he replied that on that date he did not think he made a reply to HARADA. * But in any event had no recollection of HARADA ever telling him that. He had no recollection of telling HARADA that there were many behind-the-scenes reasons for his answer to HARADA and that the Education Minister must make some reform in the Imperial University.

31510 He did not recall that about 18 January 1938 HARADA warned him he was losing the confidence of the intellectuals if he didn't refrain from getting involved by doing everything according to the wishes of the rightists. Asked if a remark like that from HARADA would have made a deep impression upon him, he stated that he and HARADA conversed frequently on many subjects, but he had no recollection of HARADA's ever saying anything * serious which he should preserve in his recollection.

He did not examine HARADA's diary for 14 January 1938. His answer would not change regardless whether the date was in January or February. He did not recall that shortly after 26 February 1938 he told HARADA much difficulty was being encountered with the National Mobilization and Electric Power Bill.

31511 He did recall there was such legislation on mobilization in late February 1938. He did not recall any attempt by himself to bring it into effect as he was not the competent minister, * and nothing arose in his mind as to his having anything to do with its outcome. He recalled the general nature of the act (Exh. 84) and, asked if it was a decided move in the direction of totalitarian government, he replied that nothing in the nature of totalitarianism was contemplated in connection with the law.

31512 He was not familiar with the terms of its provisions, but did know its outline. Its purpose was to mobilize the total powers of the nation and utilize them. For this purpose various subsidiary * laws were enacted but the National Mobilization Law the basic law. It was created in view of the Incidents in China, providing for production increases where necessary and other vital matters in connection with the Incidents.

31513 With regard to the bill, he gave his approval because it was decided by the cabinet. However, he did register his opposition on the point that there was too much reliance on Imperial Ordinances. This question became a very strong issue in the Diet. Ultimately it was approved on condition that a general mobilization deliberation council be created with members representing the Diet, * permitting them to participate in the deliberations in connection with the law.

31514

* Asked if he recorded his opposition to the bill in any Diet session, he replied he spoke on his opposition at the time the bill was decided on at the Cabinet meeting, but did not in any Diet session or any other place where it was recorded, and did not think he had recorded it in his diary.

31515

* Exhibit 3342, an excerpt from the Japan Times & Mail, being admitted into evidence and shown to the witness, * he was asked if it refreshed his recollection concerning the remark made by Baron OKURA, pointing out that in the foreign press there had been articles calumniating Japanese military in the Shanghai-Nanking region. The accused stated, as he had stated before, he had no recollection and knowledge of it until he read the paper. It did appear in the article that it was in the form of a question addressed to himself, and it showed that he answered.

He could not recall whether the expression used in the article was the one at the time the reply was made, * but in view of the fact that such a report appeared in the newspaper, he must have made such a reply and that he must have heard the question asked by OKURA.

Exhibit 3342-A, an excerpt from the Japan Times & Mail for 18 February, 1938, stated that at the House of Peers Budget Committee Meeting, Baron OKURA interpolated, urging that the Nippon spirit of protecting the weak from the strong be promoted, pointing out that in the foreign press of late were published articles calumniating the Japanese military in the Shanghai-Nanking region. He observed that the sense of superiority of the Japanese had been impressing foreigners none too favorably, and urged that the educational policy be reformed to enhance the Nippon spirit from elementary schools to higher institutions.

* Education Minister KIDO replied that there might be some Japanese who showed a mistaken sense of superiority to the Chinese, and this must be corrected and a reform of the educational system was necessary. * Asked why he did not direct an inquiry to OKURA to ask him to what he referred instead of answering the question, he replied he had no recollection whether or not he asked such a question. When asked if there was anything in the record to bear out such a fact, the accused replied that the news report was not in question and answer form as would be found in a transcript of proceedings, but was a summary of the question and reply.

Page That is why he said he would not know what kind of words were used. Asked if he would not have been interested in any remark slanderous on the conduct of troops at Shanghai and Nanking, he replied that he first became aware of the subject when he read the news report shortly before, and didn't recall the question or answer.

31521 * Asked again, if with his high interest in bringing about peace if he had heard a slanderous remark made, would that have been of such importance to make an inquiry as to what OKURA was talking about, he replied that since he had only read the article for the first time he had no clear recollection, and there might be a mistake on his part. In his recollection, the question raised by OKURA was not with reference to slanderous Japanese remarks against action of the troops, but with respect to the sense of superiority of Japanese in China.

31522 It was suggested to the accused that if he had not known very well what OKURA was talking about, he would have * made a pointed inquiry asking him. The accused replied that at the time he did not know what the army was doing. He only knew that the Japanese were apt to hold a sense of superiority vis-a-vis the Chinese people, regarding them with contempt, and it was to that question he replied.

He knew that Nanking had been taken within a few weeks and occupied. Asked if it were not true that the frightful conduct of the troops involving thousands of innocent Chinese was well known to him at the time and that he and others among the accused had engaged in a conspiracy of silence, refusing to admit their knowledge because of its frightful nature, he replied that was entirely not so, and they had not been at any time informed of such an incident.

31523 * The accused was asked if the language in his explanation where the word "calumniated" was used and his admission that there was a sense of superiority showed that this word had reference to no such thing as merely an exhibition of superiority, he replied he did not say

31524 anything of the kind. * The accused was asked if he would have considered in February, 1938, that a statement that the Japanese military had a superior attitude would have been a matter of calumny, or on the contrary had he not testified and admitted the statement was true that such a superiority feeling had been manifested, he replied that

31525 in the reply to OKURA's question * there were some among the Japanese in China showing a sense of superiority, creating a bad influence.

Page

This tendency should be rectified, but he was not pointing to the army especially, but to the Japanese in general. Asked if it was not clearly apparent that if the word "calumniated" referred to Japanese conduct it was not justifiable in his opinion and that would not be a reasonable interpretation of what the remark referred to, he replied he did not think so. What he said was that OKURA's question was addressed to him as Education Minister. If the question had concerned the army, it naturally would have been addressed to the War Minister.

31526

* He did not know if there was anything in the record that the question was presented to anyone in particular. The accused was asked if on 17 February, 1938, at a Diet session, he stated that at present military training was a regular subject for study at military schools. Instructors were sufficient, but efforts would be made to increase them. A study would be conducted regarding the suggested council of military arts, and endeavors made to realize it. He replied that he had no recollection as to what he said at that time.

* He didn't recall Mr. OTSUKA stating then that by the expression "quantitative promotion" he meant the necessity of promoting the military art among the people. Asked if that was not a part of the remark of OTSUKA to which he replied in the Diet, he stated that he could not recall the questions and answers taking place between OTSUKA and himself.

He didn't recall if he stated to HARADA on 20 April, 1939, that the Emperor was a scientist and liberal as well as a pacifist. Asked if he added that if the Emperor's ideas were not changed there would exist quite a gap between him and the army and rightist groups, he replied that he didn't think he ever made such a statement and had no recollection of it. He respected the character and personality of the Emperor most highly.

The accused was asked if he further stated on that occasion that in the later years of Emperor KOMEI's * reign the Shogunate changed the officials around the Emperor, and perhaps something along that line would occur. In order to lead the army but still make it appear as if they were being led by them, they must also make it appear as if they understood the army a little more. He replied that he had no recollection of this, and it was not consistent with his personal ideas.

Page 31530 Asked if he denied flatly ever making such a statement, he replied that as he had no recollection he was in no position to affirm that. * He had no recollection of saying this to HARADA, but felt that HARADA might have been under a misapprehension when he penned the statement. The accused was told that HARADA also said in his diary that KIDO expressed the same opinion, and during the conversation said the remarks which had previously been quoted to the accused. He was asked if he said now that HARADA might have misunderstood him in recording his remarks, and he replied he had no recollection of the statement and did not know HARADA's intentions when he wrote this.

31531 Asked if it would not be difficult for him to be mistaken about it, the accused replied he did not recognize accuracy in HARADA's writings, and there were many passages in the diary where he penned his entries from memory after a considerable lapse of time. There were some people * who entertained the views expressed in the passages just quoted to him, and perhaps HARADA and he talked on some such subject. The accused was told that the next diary sentence was that when HARADA was told these things by KIDO, it was beyond HARADA's expectations and he was tempted to oppose him, but kept quiet for he thought it would not do any good to argue with him. KIDO was asked if he still said that HARADA had him confused with someone else, and he replied that he probably misunderstood him when he was speaking of someone else having such ideas.

31532 The accused was asked if he stated to HARADA on 22 September, 1939, that the present Emperor had too much of the scientist in him and no sympathy for the ideas of the right wing and it was troubling because he was too orthodox. He replied he had no recollection of this, and thought there was some mistake about it. * To the very last he was one who stood by the Emperor, holding the highest respect for him. Because this particular passage had been so boiled down, there might be some misunderstanding.

31535 * The accused stated that UGAKI was Foreign 31536 Minister in the KONOYE Cabinet up to September, 1938,
* resigning toward the end of that month. Asked if one of the chief reasons for his resignation was his objection to the formation of the China Affairs Board with the War Minister as Vice Chairman taking over from the Foreign Office the handling of China Affairs, he replied he did not know what kind of resignation UGAKI submitted. He had heard from KONOYE that the reason for UGAKI's resignation was not clear.

With regard to the resignation, he was consulted by KONOYE. At that time the question of establishing the China Affairs Board was a controversial issue, and efforts were made by the War, Navy, and Foreign Ministers to put a plan together. UGAKI tendered his resignation at the very moment the plan was drawn up, and KONOYE told KIDO he could not understand why he had resigned. The plan had just been drawn up after consideration by the respective ministries. KONOYE, unable to understand the reason for UGAKI's action, consulted KIDO and asked whether he should not resign for his responsibility in recommending UGAKI as Foreign Minister.

Asked if, after giving in on all other points, UGAKI did not finally resign because the Board was to take over affairs connected with unoccupied as well as occupied China, KIDO replied he had not heard of such * matters and had no recollection of discussing UGAKI's attitude with HARADA. Asked if he stated to HARADA about 22 September, 1938, that UGAKI had selfish motives and the matter was not progressing favorably and UGAKI was ambitious and difficult, he replied he had no recollection of this. At that time the UGAKI faction was active. In his diary entry for 7 September, he pointed out KONOYE's difficulties in this connection.

31539

He had no recollection of telling HARADA on 29 September, 1938, that UGAKI's action was inexcusable and he was very selfish. * From what he had heard quoted from HARADA's writings, it appeared he used extremely strong language, and the way he represented things concerning him were out of line with the things he actually said, for HARADA magnified many times his thoughts and ideas. Such an atmosphere did exist at the time, but KONOYE told KIDO that he could not understand why UGAKI resigned.

31540

* When asked if his friendship toward HARADA waned, he replied it never changed. Asked if HARADA was scholarly, he replied, no, he was very active and had very good political sense. His scholastic standing at school was not good, but his political activity was a very strong trait, and it was that capacity that SAIONJI utilized. The recording of such matters in his diary was done with an extremely poor hand.

31541

Asked if SAIONJI also had a disorganized mind and was a bit of a politician, he replied that SAIONJI was * entirely different and an eminent and erudite statesman. SAIONJI had HARADA as his secretary from about 1929 to his death.

31542 HARADA broke down in health just about the time UGAKI failed to form his Cabinet. After that his political activity waned considerably, and during his convalescence KIDO took his place for about three or four months. Asked if in HARADA's talks to him he displayed the tendency for strong remarks or if it was just when he took pen in hand that those traits exhibited themselves, he replied that such proclivities were not noticeable in the first four or five years, but during the latter part of his life his * health was poor, and while conversing with him there were times when he was unable to know whether HARADA was actually listening to him or not or was dozing off, and on many occasions he had to wake him from his lethargy and ask him if he was listening.

Asked if he thought that this was because he was tired. or tired listening to the things KIDO was saying, he replied he did not think so because he never conducted any long conversations with HARADA.

31543 * When UGAKI resigned from KONOYE's Cabinet, he did not entertain specially unfriendly feelings toward him, but did feel displeased that the reasons for his resignation were unknown, as well as against the various movements conducted by the UGAKI faction. It was not a fact that there was bitter feeling between him and UGAKI then and thereafter.

31544 Asked if he shared the feelings expressed in the questions in which he had said he didn't repl. to HARADA, that UGAKI was selfish and difficult. he stated that the words in the diary were extremely strong, but he may have said that UGAKI was ambitious. That was the feeling he expressed at the moment, * and since then he had never entertained bitter feelings toward him.

31545 Asked if he knew that UGAKI had a favorite expression for one in his circle, "Ginza No Yotamono" (Ginza Gangster), he replied that he had not heard of it. When asked if, when he was in the HIRANUMA Cabinet as Home Minister there was a determined effort to bring about an alliance that ultimately became the Tripartite, he replied that the question was taken up and put under study by the Five Ministers' Conference. * In the early stages he received no information as to that, but toward the end of March the question of preserving law and order came up as the army became impatient. He heard of the situation from the Metropolitan Police Superintendent-General, and subsequently inquired on this of the Premier. Since that time he was consulted by the Premier with regard to preserving law and order.

- Page With respect to the matters discussed by the Five Ministers, he was not informed and was not a member of the Conference and did not attend. There was no special tendency to keep the studies of the Five Ministers and their efforts in the direction of the Tripartite Agreement secret and from other Cabinet members, but he heard nothing of the results of discussions, although he did know they were going on.
- 31546 * He was not curious as to the progress in the matter, because everything was left up to the Five Ministers' Conference, and he was occupied in matters under his charge.
- Asked if he had given up his keen interest to bring about an end to the China War, he replied he had not lost this at all and was just as much interested in the HIRANUMA Cabinet in seeing the invasion peacefully ended as he was before. Asked if he requested HIRANUMA to exert increased efforts toward maintaining the military alliance,
- 31547 * he replied that the matter had been simply noted in his diary and he did not approve of an alliance, but the issue loomed large three months after the Cabinet was formed. As an actual question, he was not in any position to oppose.
- 31548 * Asked if he did not request HIRANUMA to exert increased efforts to bring about the alliance, he replied he did, but was trying to explain this point. There was no choice but to conclude such a treaty, but he counselled HIRANUMA that the utmost care should be given in connection with the treaty so as not to cause unnecessary suspicion on the part of the U. S. and Britain, and requested him to make efforts along the lines suggested. KIDO felt it would be ill-advised if it went more than that, and he expressed his opposition in the diary entry of 2 May in which he recorded his interview with the Navy Minister, stating it was not necessary to exert themselves too much for the purpose of concluding such a treaty.
- 31549 * At first there was no relationship between the domestic situation and the military alliance, but later, as no decision was arrived at by the Five Ministers' Conference, voices became strong among the rightists and a section of the army that the treaty should be put through a mass popular movement. Threatening acts were manifested toward the higher statesmen, who opposed concluding the pact, and as his diary of 14 April pointed out, if there was mis-carriage in handling the question there was every possibility of an incident breaking out such as followed the conclusion of the London Naval Treaty, which resulted in the removal of the Senior Statesmen.

By removal he meant assassination. * When asked if it occurred to him at that time that before straightening out affairs in China and establishing new orders it might be a good thing to get their own house in order so the government could carry out the desires of the people in a constitutional manner, he replied that this was a matter on which he gave constant thought.

31551

The reason for the fall of the HIRANUMA Cabinet was the sudden conclusion of a non-aggression pact between Germany and the USSR. He did not know the accused OSHIMA at that time. * He didn't recall if UGAKI was one of the Senior Statesmen in danger of attack, but that might have been included. The Senior Statesmen in danger of assassination were principally such men as Lord Keeper YUASA, Imperial Household Minister MATSUDAIRA, and former Premier OKADA. At that time YUASA was not about to die from natural causes, but was quite ill. KIDO served under him as Chief Secretary for about three months following his assumption of the office.

31552

* SAIONJI died late in November, and KIDO became Lord Keeper on 1 June, 1940, at which time KONOYE was Privy Council President. One of KONOYE's defects was his weakness of character. He was not sick or ailing, but was not especially robust. * He didn't constantly complain of illness. When any difficult question arose, KONOYE frequently said he wanted to quit, threatening to resign about four times during his first Premiership. KIDO discovered KONOYE's weak character from the time they were children.

31553

Asked if it was his misfortune to be associated with three prominent men, SAIONJI, Baron YUASA, and KONOYE, each of whom was either old and feeble or weak in character, he replied that he didn't think so. SAIONJI was old, but incomparable as a far sighted statesman.

31554

* When he became Chief Secretary in 1930, Count MAKINO was quite elderly. There was some lapse of time before an assassination attempt was made on him in 1936. Asked if he didn't look around to find men either advanced in years or weak characters so that he could exert political power through them, occupying an ostensibly inferior or subordinate position, he stated that such a thing never entered his mind and was completely without foundation.

31555

* At the fall of the YONAI Cabinet the China war was still going on, and he estimated somewhere between 500- to 600,000 troops were in China the middle of 1940. Hitler was apparently successful in the European war, and the army and rightists urged a military alliance with her.

31556 * Asked if the fact that the military alliance had not been effected was the real cause of the YONAI Cabinet's fall, he replied that that question alone was not the reason. He had no recollection whether the question of a military alliance was up then, but had * heard that in concluding some such alliance, the entering of the YONAI Cabinet was not expedient. At that time he had not heard that the military alliance was one of the questions faced by the YONAI Cabinet, but YONAI was strongly opposed to the Alliance when in the HIRANUMA Cabinet and KIDO did not believe he approved of it, but he did not know whether the YONAI Cabinet actually handled the Alliance question as an actual Cabinet issue.

31557 He did not know whether the characterization of stubborn would apply to YONAI, but could say he was a man of strong character and was in no way vacillating. KIDO * had not heard that the army was making strong demands for a "military" alliance, but the army was impatient about bringing about a closer rapprochement with Germany.

31560 * Asked if the army, at the time of the YONAI Cabinet's fall or prior thereto, strongly advocated a military alliance with Germany and Italy; he replied that he did not think they strongly advocated it. These quarters desired closer relations with Germany so they 31561 * might talk over common matters more intimately, and in this case the YONAI Cabinet was insufficient and inconvenient.

It was true in some sections there were advocates of a military alliance. By the term "inconvenient" he meant that in handling questions of that nature the Cabinet was unsuitable by its nature and construction.

31563

* Reference was made to the affidavit where it discussed matters transpiring during the HIRANUMA Cabinet, referring to the military alliance, and where it was stated that if the Army and Navy came into a frontal clash, it was imagined they would stage a coup d'etat, assassinating Senior Statesmen close to the Throne and government leaders (T. 20872). The Accused was asked if he was suggesting that if there was a clash between the Army and Navy, regardless of the position the Senior Statesmen took, they would be assassinated. * He replied that the Navy was opposed to this plan but the Army was in haste to try to consummate it. In view of past incidents, it was foreseeable that attacks against Senior Statesmen in favor of the status quo should arise. His Diary entry of April 14 showed the Army felt the need of haste and that the Rightist elements joined with the Army. Asked if he intended to convey that the Navy was mixed up in the coup d'etat and the assassination business, he replied that some reports he received indicated there was a Navy element favoring violent action but the main element was the Army. * This Navy element worked with the Army instead of having as its sole purpose the breaking of the status quo or simply being in favor of the military alliance.

31564

In the February Incident, the Navy was dependable and in favor of law and order and took a strong attitude in subduing lawless elements and enforcement of law and order. On the whole, it could be said he meant that he realized the Army insisted upon a military alliance with Germany and Italy and that he felt if it did not get its way they might assassinate * someone in the High Court circles. Asked if that was why he advocated HIRANUMA to get on with the signing of the Tripartite Pact, he replied that as a practical measure, he was of the opinion that the problem ought to be settled so it would not cause Britain and America to feel uneasy. Otherwise, he felt it would be difficult to maintain law and order. When he used the term "Senior Statesmen" he did not mean to indicate a definite category but such people as Lord Keeper YUASA, Household Minister MATSUDAIRA and former Premier OKADA, and Count MIKANO, were those who would be the object of such an attack.

31567

* Asked why the attack would not be made upon the Cabinet members who he claimed were the ones who really governed, he replied that Cabinet members also were frequently the object of assassination attacks, especially the Premier, but the characteristic of assassination plots was to regard those close to the Throne with suspicion and try to gain these positions themselves.

KIDO

Kido - Cross

Page He did not recall a conversation with HARATA about 22 April 1939 to the effect that he intended to see that contact was made with Hitler through OSHIMA and not have the Premier do it directly.

31568 * He did not recall saying that if this method did not work the Cabinet would resign and therefore it was necessary to consider the aftermath of a Cabinet change. Ultimately they reached the point where Method B would be used if Method A did not succeed, and this would be done instead of trying to change the ideas of the Emperor or opinions of the Lord Keeper. The foregoing statement was not in his memory at all. His own recollection was that about this time there were indications that the Cabinet might collapse and he told YUASA this, saying that in that case he hoped YUASA would consider steps. Asked if he said that it should be explained to the Emperor that the Cabinet resignation might result if the Emperor did not give his sanction and matters advanced along the former lines * if the other party did not agree, he replied he did not recall any conversation with HARATA along those lines nor did he say to the Lord Keeper that such a threat-like statement to the Emperor was inexcusable. He did recall stating that ITAGAKI was popular with the Chinese people.

31570 Asked if he was aware that about 31 August 1934, as shown by Exhibit 3177-A, * the Special Services Organ of the Kwantung Army reported that the very mention of the names DOIHARA and ITAGAKI was enough to make the people in South China turn pale, he replied he heard this for the first time when that Exhibit was presented to the Tribunal * and he did not know if it came from the official records of the government.

31572 Asked if he recalled about 20 October 1940 that HARATA told him that SAIONJI was suspicious of how he and KONOYE explained the Tripartite Pact to the Emperor and secured his consent when the Emperor had explicitly stressed he would not permit the pact, he replied that he didn't remember this at all and it was contrary to the fact.

The Accused was asked if HARADA had told him on that day, "Why didn't you tell us about the pact?" that HARADA said he would not be saying this if SAIONJI were afflicted with defects. Under present circumstances there was no other issue as serious as this and it was negligible that not a word of the matter was reported to SAIONJI. The Accused replied that he never heard such a statement and did not recall replying to HARADA that he felt too sorry for SAIONJI to report the matter to him nor did he recall HARADA replying to him that this was not a matter in which consideration should be given to private * sentiments, that facts were facts

Page regardless of how great the Prince's opposition might be and regardless of how sorry he might feel for what must be said must be said and that was KIDO's duty. Nor did he recall replying to HARADA that hereafter he would try to inform him about all relevant matters. Furthermore, he never recalled a conversation of such a violent nature with HARADA. At the time he believed the government had approached SAIONJI on the matter and since it was a big political question, did not feel it necessary for him to reply to it. Nor felt it necessary to tell SAIONJI of everything concerned in the question, feeling it more appropriate for the Premier to tell SAIONJI.

31573

Asked if he had not consistently discussed political matters with HARADA for the purpose of his reporting the same to SAIONJI, he replied that that was so every time he had the opportunity * but by that time HARADA was not in good health and the occasions on which he was able to talk with him had decreased greatly. Asked if this might have been one of the occasions when HARADA became sleepy while talking to him, he replied he had no recollection of this conversation but it was true that at that time HARADA's health was deteriorating. At that time HARADA lived at Oiso and didn't come to Tokyo often and there were not many opportunities to talk with him.

31575

Asked if the latter part of October 1940, he still had confidence in HARADA's integrity, he replied that HARADA had a very good sense for politics and in that connection he was always able to talk with him, but when the talk extended over a period of time he sometimes wondered whether HARADA was keeping up his interest in what he was saying. Of course he did trust HARADA's integrity in October 1940, and he showed no signs of going out of his mind. Asked if he contended that HARADA would write such a statement about a conversation with him maliciously, he replied he could scarcely feel that HARADA had malicious thoughts toward him, but neither could he believe HARADA wrote down everything just as he said it. That was why he was always opposed to the matter discussed and had told KONOE and MATSUOKA of this. The reasons he opposed the alliance were given in his affidavit, but the feeling of opposition he had * did not appear in the purported conversation and the fact that the conversation read as if he was completely in favor of the alliance made him feel that HARADA must have left out a great deal. He did discuss the matter of the Tripartite Pact with the Emperor before it was executed.

* Asked if it was permissible for the Emperor to instruct the administration as to the outline of foreign policy, he replied that of course it was possible for the Emperor to give his opinions.

31577 The Accused was asked if he said to HARADA about 5 September 1940 that it was permissible for the Emperor to instruct the administration as to the outline of foreign policy, but it was not desirable that criticisms of personalities be made, he replied that that was not in his recollection. He did not recall ever advising the Emperor on the question of personnel. * It was permissible for the Emperor to instruct on the outline of foreign policy. Not Kido, but the government, informed the Emperor of the terms of the Tripartite Pact and reasons in favor of its adoption.

About 12 September, KIDO heard of this for the first time and he believed that on that date KONOYE reported to the Emperor on the matter. Asked why his memory was so acute on such matters and why he was unable to remember other matters, such as the four points of the terms offered Chiang Kai-shek in December 1937, he replied that was because whatever was written in his diary he had kept the main points at hand * and in anticipation of being examined he had consulted these points, but the four points of the peace terms he did not keep at hand and he was sorry he was unable to recall them. Asked if it was true that he had great difficulty in recalling things that were unpleasant to bring to mind, he replied this was not so. He only wished to say that what he had written in his diary he had kept at hand and could remember very well.

Asked if he recalled that the Pact containing the secret provision that the treaty would only apply to the Soviet alone was taken up with the Emperor, he replied he could not say because he did not know the provisions.

* To the Accused was quoted a purported conversation with HARADA about 20 April 1939, in which KIDO stated that although the main part of the Anti-Comintern Pact had already received Imperial sanction, the Army wanted to omit the part of the secret treaty which said the treaty was only applicable to the Comintern, i.e., Soviet Russia. However, the Emperor would not hear of it. Therefore, with the applicability of the treaty, the Army should arrange so they would not be involved in case Germany and Italy ever fought England or France or other nations. KIDO replied that was not in his recollection. At the time the Second KONOYE Cabinet was formed, he was Lord Keeper.

31580

* Asked if he learned as early as May that there probably would be a Cabinet change and a new Premier chosen, he replied that rumors of a change were very strong. Asked if he advised KONOYE as to whether he should resign as Privy Council

Page President, he replied he had no recollection. His recollection 31581 was that he advised him not to resign * but in spite of his advice, KONOYE said that to establish a new political structure it was most inconvenient for him to continue as Privy Council President, and therefore he would resign.

This new political structure was the IRAA, but the ultimate organization was slightly different from KONOYE's original purpose. He urged the appointment of KONOYE as Premier for his Second Cabinet, but at the Council of Senior Statesmen all of them were equally strong to urge him. At that time many important and critical matters were arising. Asked if he did not consider it important to put a man of strong character in as Premier at that critical time, he replied that in view of the circumstances the most desirable choice would have been one with a strong character who was in such a position as KONOYE but such a man was difficult to find. Although he did say that KONOYE had a weak character, that was a matter of comparison. KONOYE did have keen political insight which no other possessed and was able to embrace a wide sphere of people. That was why KONOYE's appointment was widely urged and people felt that by his appointment a new world might be hoped for.

31583 * It was suggested to the Accused that the real reason it would be convenient for him behind the scenes to discuss government policies in the way he saw fit and he replied that was utterly fantastic. The Lord Keeper does not have power to conduct politics behind the scenes. Asked if the position of War Minister was of diminishing or increasing importance, he replied he did not notice any particular change. It was his understanding that the Army recommended TOJO as War Minister through the Three Big Chiefs.

31584 * In regard to the negotiations in 1941 with America on their broad outlines, he heard from the Premier but did not see specific details. About 15 October he was first apprised that an impasse had occurred requiring the resignation of the Third KONOYE Cabinet. When the Second KONOYE Cabinet changed to the Third, besides the change of Foreign Minister from MATSUOKA to TOYODA, he believed a few other Ministers were also changed.

31585 * Asked if the reason MATSUOKA left the Cabinet was that he advocated a very positive war policy toward the western powers, he replied he did not know MATSUOKA's thoughts toward that. The immediate cause of the Cabinet collapse was the difference of opinion between MATSUOKA and KONOYE over the handling of the American negotiations.

31586

* It was not true that this difference of opinion had to do with MATSUOKA favoring a sterner policy and KONOYE suggesting a compromise. The immediate cause was the Hull oral statement and a collision occurred in regard to the steps to be taken in replying to this statement. KONOYE wanted to get rid of MATSUOKA but he had quite a hard time doing so. Asked if KONOYE could have gotten rid of TOJO too at the time if he wanted to, KIDO replied that at that time no problem existed between KONOYE and TOJO. Asked if TOJO's views were not firm toward favoring war if Japan did not get its way, he replied that his understanding was that in July the negotiations had not progressed to such a stage. * At that time various drafts were being considered and notes exchanged. Since no conclusion had been reached the Army's attitude was not so positive as it became later. In August, KONOYE advanced a proposal to meet and talk with Roosevelt. Both the Army and Navy agreed and KIDO believed there was no problem involving the Army in July.

31587

Asked if it was not well known at the time that TOJO had very aggressive views, he replied that the circumstances were as he had just stated, and the Army also had no special opposition toward trying to solve the China Incident through American help. He did finally learn that TOJO possessed very positive views about the course to be taken in the U.S. negotiations.

31588

* Asked if TOJO's position was so strong and he differed so with KONOYE that he was not able to remain on speaking terms with KONOYE, KIDO replied that KONOYE did tell him something of that sort about the very day on which the Cabinet resigned.

At that time the Navy attitude was rather vague but its leaders expressed the hope that war would be avoided as far as possible. Asked if it could not be said that the Army insisted on war and the Navy did not want it, he replied that the Navy attitude was rather vague, but on the whole this was true. Asked if the situation was not like the one on 9 August 1938, when the Army was strong in favor and the Navy equally opposed to the German alliance (T. 30855) he replied there were a few points * on which the situation differed. There was a segment of younger naval officers not opposed to war and the Naval General Staff also favored war in certain respects. * Because of that situation, the Navy attitude was not expressed clearly. Asked if he did not go to KONOYE and tell him that he should obtain the fullest cooperation and get the Navy to hold out against the military alliance, as he had testified in his affidavit, he replied he did so testify, but he just added that the actual situation in the latter case somewhat differed. Asked if there couldn't be war between Japan

Page and the U.S. if the Navy Minister voted against it, he replied that if the Navy clearly indicated its opposition the Army itself would not have been able to start war. They might have assassinated a few, but could not have had the war without the Navy agreeing. * Asked if he might have been one of the intended victims, if he encouraged the Navy or Navy Minister to hold out for peace, he replied he couldn't say anything about that. Asked if that influenced his conduct in recommending the Premier to replace KONOYE to the Emperor, he replied he was not influenced by such consideration and whatever action he took he was not pleading duress.

Asked if he knew on 15 October 1941 that TOJO had decided to employ all his power and influence to go to war with the U.S., Britain and Netherlands unless the terms he insisted on were included in an agreement to be reached with the western powers, he replied that at that time TOJO advocated the execution of the September 6 decision and the issue of war and peace was immediately at hand on that date.

31592

* Asked if the Emperor could have appointed Navy Minister OIKAWA as Premier, he replied maybe he could have but at the Senior Statesmen's meeting to recommend the succeeding Premier, OIKAWA encountered strong opposition by Senior Statesmen from the Navy, namely, YONAI and OKADA. He did not think there would have been a much better chance for preserving peace by choosing OIKAWA. Asked if he could not have found a more belligerent individual in the Japanese Empire than TOJO on 15 October 1941, he replied he did not think that criticism was just.

31593

* He hoped TOJO would change his views if the Emperor indicated he so desired. The real reason why TOJO was eager to go to war was to carry out the Imperial decision of 6 September as the date set in that decision in early October had already elapsed the Army was anxious to carry out the decision. Both TOJO and KIDO talked with KONOYE on the 16th and the impression he and KONOYE gained from the talk with TOJO was that the Army attitude was that if the Navy definitely opposed war, it could not be fought but the Army believed the Sept. 6 decision should be carried out. By the Army it could be said he meant TOJO.

31594

* Asked if he did not know at that time that the Conference of 6 Sept. was brought about mainly at TOJO's insistence, he replied he had heard nothing about that and did not know it even now. The Conference was decided on very suddenly and he reproached KONOYE about this. He knew of the three main points of the question being discussed on 15 October. * What was decided was that the negotiations should be vigorously continued but if

NARRATIVE SUMMARY OF THE RECORD

Page by October 15 a successful conclusion was not reached, war would begin. Asked if the Emperor had anything to do with the decision, he replied the Emperor thought it a very bad thing when KONOYE told him of it. Asked if the decision was in reality the Emperor's decision, or merely a formal acquiescence to something decided by others, he replied that as he had said before, the Emperor was in no position to refuse any policy decided on by the Government and High Command and could do nothing but approve. It was a decision formally made in his name but actually made by others. *

31596

Asked if he was stating that he believed TOJO on Oct. 15th would change his mind because he was so intent upon carrying out the wishes of the Emperor, but if the Emperor came to another conclusion he would be equally amenable to instructions, he replied that what he felt in regard to TOJO was that if the Emperor told him to do something, he would faithfully obey. Once TOJO became Premier, when the Emperor stated his desires, these would be taken up by the Cabinet, studied there, and TOJO would report the results to the Throne, not on a * personal basis but speaking as a representative of the Government.

31597

It was not true that he realized when he helped TOJO reach the Premiership in mid-October 1941 he was placing in his hands the decision as to whether there would be war or peace. When asked if he meant when he said that the Emperor could instruct his Ministers on the outline of foreign policy, questions of peace and war, he replied that this was included. He meant to say that the Emperor would give his opinion to the Cabinet and the Cabinet on its own responsibility would undertake study and investigation.

* One reason why TOJO was selected as Premier was so that he could be sure to have the Army under firm control. Asked if TOJO could not control the Army as well as War Minister as he could as Premier, he replied that at that time the situation was that the Sept. 6th decision was a kind of cancer. It was not even reported to the world that the Conference was held. If someone were appointed Premier who knew nothing about that Conference and decision, it would be difficult for him to change that decision. Since the field grade and junior grade officers knew of it, if the decision were disregarded there would be a disturbance. * Thus it was impossible to choose the Premier from among a wide range of prospects.

KIDO worried much over this problem, consulting KONOYE about it, and as a result they arrived at the conclusion that the Sept. 6th decision had to be set aside and that the succeeding Premier must be either OIKAWA or TOJO.

31600

Asked again whether TOJO as War Minister could not have controlled the Army as well as he could as Premier, he replied that TOJO would control the Army as War Minister. At that time it was KIDO's belief that a war with the western powers would be catastrophic, which meant disaster and the end. Asked if he was maintaining that it was his firm belief that there was a better chance to keep Japan from entering into a war authorized by the Cabinet * by the selection of TOJO rather than OIKAWA as Premier, he replied that he had had a very difficult time deciding which of the two would be better but his greatest fear was that the most important question was control of the Army. If the Army got out of control, war would be bound to result, whatever other policies might be decided upon. That was because the focus of the problem lay upon the decision to rehash the Sept. 6th decision.

31601

When he attended the Senior Statesmen's Council he had not made up his mind and in that council opinions were voiced that TOJO had disagreed with the outgoing Premier, KONOYE, and therefore KIDO said that theoretically OIKAWA would be better fitted as the next Premier. To this opinion the two Navy Senior Statesmen voiced strong opposition and under these circumstances * they had no alternative but to choose TOJO as Premier. Asked if he believed that if the Emperor just before TOJO was named Premier had called in TOJO, SUGIYAMA, UMEZU, HATA and TERAUCHI, and told them he did not want war under any circumstances and wanted them to control the army to see there was no outbreak, if he believed these men would have been able to control all factions and prevent rebellion, he replied that the question was hypothetical and difficult to answer.

31604

* He had already stated there was no other course than the one he had taken.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that on 8 December 1941, KIDO received a call from Foreign Minister TOJO at 12:40 am, saying that Ambassador Grew had brought a personal telegram from Roosevelt to the Emperor and asked KIDO's advice about handling it, KIDO advised TOGO to discuss the matter with Premier TOJO and that an audience with the Emperor could be granted even at midnight. At 1:30 am, Imperial Household Minister, MATSUDAIRA, telephoned on the same matter. KIDO was then notified that TOGO had proceeded to the Palace and KIDO himself proceeded there at 2:40 a.m., talked with TOGO there, and returned home at 3:30 a.m.

Concerning these events the Accused was asked if he found out what was in the telegram and he replied that when he was talking with TOGO he was told that the Emperor had already come out; therefore,

Page TOGO immediately left to be received in audience and KIDO had no further opportunity to talk to TOGO and was unable to learn anything from him. He did speak to him about what was in the telegram and was about to ask him, trying to get the details. TOGO was about to tell him when TOGO was called into audience.

31606 * Asked why he went to the Imperial Palace, he replied that since the problem was of a critical nature, he thought he should be there in the event there should be any inquiries from the Emperor. He believed that TOGO brought the telegram in to the Emperor but did not know whether he actually had the telegram in his possession or not.

Reference was made to Exhibit 1239, his diary entry for December 8, in which he stated that he proceeded to the Palace at 2:40 a.m. He believed that 2:40 a.m. was the time he arrived at the Palace and he went there by automobile, a drive of about ten minutes. Asked if TOGO was there when he arrived, he replied he did not remember clearly but believed TOGO came after he arrived.

31607 * He stayed at the Palace about ten or fifteen minutes. Asked if he would have been there almost 40 minutes, if he got there at 2:40 and arrived home at 3:30 and it took ten minutes to drive home, he replied he didn't know that he stayed that long but believed he wrote in his diary that he arrived home at 3:30 and he went directly home. He talked to TOGO only a minute or two as the Emperor was practically waiting for TOGO to arrive.

31608 * Asked if he did not want to be present at that very important moment, he replied he was not allowed to be present at such audiences. He supposed this would be called a very special occasion but he did not particularly request the Emperor's permission to attend. The matter was such that it should be handled by the Foreign Minister and therefore he did not especially request permission to attend.

The Accused was asked if he was sure the telegram was of a nature that it should be handled by the Foreign Minister, if he didn't know the contents. He stated that there had never been a time when he had been received in audience with any State Minister reporting to the Emperor on matters under their jurisdiction; therefore he did not do so at this particular time, although he agreed that there never was an instance like it before in modern Japanese history. * He knew the matter was very important and that was why he went to the Palace to await any inquiries from the Emperor. It was very unusual for an audience to be arranged at midnight. Asked if he did not at least strongly suspect that the message had to do with some strong or

Page desperate measure to preserve peace, he replied of course he was 31610 much concerned in what it was all about and felt * it was very important. Asked if he did not suspect it was a desperate effort to prevent war and if he was not, as an active champion of peace, much interested in aiding such commendable effort, he replied yes, he was quite concerned about it. Asked why he did not wait until TOGO got through talking to the Emperor and talk it over with TOGO to see if he could help, he replied that since he was in his own room he was unaware that TOGO had retired from the Imperial presence and gone home. Therefore, KIDO waited a while, expecting instructions from the Emperor but learned that the Emperor had also retired and therefore he went home. Asked if he was not figuratively left out in the cold, he replied that it was just that he had failed to grasp the opportunity to do so.

31611 It was suggested to the Accused that he was certainly in bad luck that morning because he had just missed the few minutes necessary to be informed * by TOGO about the telegram's contents, just missing TOGO on his way up, and the Accused replied that he supposed that was so. Asked if it occurred to him to telephone TOGO after he got home to find out what the news was, he replied he did not do so.

Asked if his whole story was not absurd and a deliberate falsehood, and if he didn't know all about the contents of the telegram even before he got to the Palace, he replied he did not know of the contents. Asked if he wasn't curious enough to bother to telephone TOGO when he got home to find out what the score was, even though it concerned peace or war, he replied that it was a fact he did not telephone TOGO. Asked if it was a fact because he did not purposely telephone him or it didn't occur to him, he replied it did not occur to him to do so.

31612 The Accused was asked if he knew what was going on in the Hawaiian Area at the time he was in the Palace between 2:40 and 3:30 a.m. on 8 December, * and he replied he did not know.
Asked if he knew now that the attack on Pearl Harbor took place at approximately 3:30 a.m. that morning, he replied he did know so at present. It was suggested to the Accused that there was a little gathering at the Palace to find out how the attack on Pearl Harbor was going, and he replied he knew nothing at all about that.

COUNCIL FOR HATA

The Accused was asked to clarify his testimony where he had said that it appeared that the resignation of HATA broke up the YONAI Cabinet, and he stated that he meant to say that at that time, War Minister HATA did not resign of his own volition.

31614

Reference was made to the Affidavit where the Senior Statesmen's Conference of 17 Oct. was discussed in regard to the recommendation for a successor to the Third Konoye Cabinet, and KIDO stated that the attitude taken by War Minister TOJO in the present political change was different from that taken by HATA under the YONAI Cabinet. Asked to what difference he referred, the Accused replied that in the case of the YONAI Cabinet, HATA presented his resignation to the Cabinet and stated the Army could not offer a new man and there was no successor for the post, therefore the YONAI Cabinet fell. The case in the Third KONOYE Cabinet was that a difference of views * arose, centering around the Imperial Conference decision and TOJO had not yet tendered his resignation. This was the only difference he meant to mention.

31638

* Exhibit 3344, the Affidavit of KISHI, Michizo, stated that the affiant was secretary to KONOYE in KONOYE's First Cabinet from June 1937 to January 1939. At the request of KONOYE on the evening of 16 Dec. 1937, the affiant interviewed Education Minister KIDO. KONOYE had told the Affiant to convey a message to KIDO.

31639

* This message was that the peace terms with China, to be concluded through the intermediary of German Ambassador Trautman, had been decided by the Liaison Conference. KONOYE was anxious to make peace with China under those terms but the Army attitude was not definitely known.

When the peace terms were to be submitted at the Cabinet meeting the next day, KONOYE requested KIDO to ask War Minister SUGIYAMA about this point, and found out the Army's real intentions for KONOYE. The Affiant conveyed this message and recalled that KIDO said it was a very troublesome question but he would think it over as the China Affair must be settled at that juncture. The Affiant reported the interview to KONOYE and the Affiant remembered that KONOYE told him that KIDO at the Cabinet meeting of Dec. 17 spoke as requested by KONOYE.

31640 * Exhibit 3345, the Affidavit of TAKAGI, Yasaka, stated that 31641 he had been a lecturer at Tokyo Imperial University * and had studied in America, devoting himself to American History, politics, and institutions. In the Peers School in 1905, KIDO and his brother, Dr.
Wada, were among the Affiant's best friends and when KIDO became Education Minister in 1937 the Affiant frequently discussed University questions with him.

31642 The Affiant knew no acts of KIDO which had any totalitarian or Fascist tendencies. * At that time Tokyo Imperial University was confronted with difficult questions caused by a tense situation. KIDO fully respected University autonomy, and closely cooperated with the University President, Dr. NAGAYO. The Affiant found that KIDO had common ideas with the University authorities about University autonomy, and never tried to bring pressure to bear. In dealing with the question of Professor YANAIBARA, KIDO stated he refused to interfere, leaving the problem to University authorities. The Affiant was a University Councillor and knew KIDO did not interfere nor exert pressure in connection with YANAIBARA's resignation.

31643 On 3 August 1945 the Affiant met KIDO and told him it would be better to broach peace talks directly to the U.S. In reply, KIDO explained that the reason Japan proposed peace through the Soviet was due to her respect to the Soviet's neutral position. He expressed himself in favor of keeping two routes open to peace talks * without dropping negotiations with the Soviet. He said Japan must seize the best opportunity to terminate the war and the opportunity was ripe, and that he would place confidence in the determination of Premier SUZUKI. On that occasion, the Affiant obtained an indelible impression that he was determined to work for peace regardless of the consequences to his own personal safety.

31654 * Exhibit 3346, the affidavit of Alfred F. Kretschmer stated that the affiant wished to explain exhibit 1272 in which Ambassador Ott stated that KIMURA, while Chief of the General Staff of the Kwantung Army, from October 1939 to October 1940, especially worked in behalf of Germany and was one of the principal advocates of German-Japanese military cooperation.

31655 * The affiant stated that he did not word this part of the telegram but Ott's word was based, without doubt, on the affiant's proposition and its dates, which he now saw were incorrect.

31656 * As to the wording KIMURA had especially worked in behalf of Germany, the affiant was sure it referred to the fact that before the German-Soviet Russian war, tungsten, rubber, etc. were sent to Germany via Manchuria and the U.S.S.R. The shipments were often delayed by Japanese railroad authorities in Manchuria, and in such cases the German Mission had to ask for the help of the Kwantung Army Headquarters in Hsingking. But the affiant was not sure whether such cases occurred while KIMURA was Chief of Staff.

While KIMURA was Vice War Minister, KIMURA neither asked the affiant to his office nor did he go to his office to talk on official business, for his official business reached no higher than the political department, and he even met Major General SATO seldom officially.

31657 In exhibit 1272, Ott had remarked that KIMURA closely cooperated with War Minister and Prime Minister TOJO, as well as * his primary preoccupation in his position as premier had enhanced his influence on the leadership of the War Ministry, as well as his position in regard to other vice ministers.

The affiant stated that he observed nothing that indicated this statement of Ott's was true.

31658 Exhibit 3347, the curriculum vitae of KIMURA was received into evidence and showed he was appointed Chief of Staff of the Kwantung Army on 22 October 1940. Attention was called to exhibit 3031 to show that the Vice War Minister was on an equal footing with the * Parliamentary Vice Minister and the Parliamentary Vice Councillor.

- 31669 * Exhibit 3350, regulations of the Kempei dated 2) November 1898, provided that the Kempei should be under the war minister's jurisdiction and should control the military policies and the administrative and judicial policies. In the execution of his duties, the Kempei shall take orders from the war and navy ministers regarding military police matters, and from the justice minister regarding judicial police matters.
- 31671 * Exhibit 3351, affidavit of SAWAMOTO stated that the affiant was vice minister of the navy from April 1941 to July 1944. As KIMURA's vice war minister from April 1941 to March 1943, the affiant had official relations with him during that time, but other than that had no connection. During the time the affiant was vice minister, regulations concerning the duties and responsibilities of that office were construed and practiced, as follows: the vice minister was to assist the minister in the latter's capacity as chief administrative official, and there was no stipulation by which the vice minister was to help the minister in his character as minister of state.
- 31672 Before the vice minister could be proxy for the minister, the cabinet must grant such permission and the minister had no such authority. Only the minister * had a right of direction and command, authority over personnel matters, and power to punish. The vice minister could do no more than help by expressing his opinion to the minister, with the exception of persons who were in service by order of the vice minister.
- 31673 Bureau and division chiefs were directly responsible to the minister. According to regulations, the vice minister helped the minister adjust departmental affairs, and supervised the bureaus and divisions. Adjustment of departmental affairs had as its main object the coordination of the bureaus and divisions. The vice minister also attended to matters entrusted to him, and various functions not * belonging to any other bureau or division, and other miscellaneous matters.

Supervision of business meant that to be carried out by the vice minister in the sense of helping the minister. since bureau and division chiefs dealt with matters for which they were responsible. Accordingly, the vice minister had no authority to direct, command, or cancel business assigned to bureaus and divisions. In cases necessitating such action, he could only express his opinion to the minister and await his instructions. The vice minister had authority to decide matters only assigned to him and no right to command outside of his jurisdiction. As to matters other than those assigned him, even though the vice minister's approval was lacking, it was not unlawful so long as the minister approved. In the navy ministry, the vice minister did not take part in the nomination and appointment of personnel.

* In establishing regulations or giving orders in general, they were issued in the minister's name, and there were cases, though it was actually the minister's orders, in which the minister's name was not used, but instead notifications by order in the name of the vice minister were usually issued.

The vice minister's notification by order was nothing more than a communication in writing made in the vice minister's name of what had been decided by the minister. The vice minister's notification, which was different from the vice minister's notification by order of the minister, was issued in connection with matters assigned to the vice minister. When there was a cabinet change, no member of the navy ministry was affected, except the navy minister, and there was no case in which the vice minister was changed.

* The affiant, the same as other vice ministers, was requested to be a committee man or councillor of various committees, but it was only nominal and he did not attend those committee meetings. In the rare occasions in which he did attend, they were called nominally and proceedings had already been deliberated beforehand. He did no more than simply hear reports.

The affiant was also councillor of the Total War Research Institute, as were other vice ministers. The only part he took in the proceedings was to attend once a year, together with his colleagues from other ministries, to hear the report of the studies.

* Exhibit 3352, excerpts from the military court-martial law dated 26 April 1921, and revised in 1941 and 1942, providing that the court martial had the right * to try the following for alleged crimes: Those mentioned in certain named parts in the criminal code; the crew of army transports, those belonging to and accompanying the army, other than those before mentioned; and POWs.

31678 The court martial also had the right to try those before mentioned for crimes committed prior to the time their status was acquired, and also had the right to try them, although they were no longer in one of the above categories, if arrested, imprisoned, detained, or reported for search, while still retaining their status. The court martial also had the right to try those mentioned and * which pass under article 8 of the Army Criminal Code.

Court martials to be established were the general army division, encircled locality, and temporary court martial. The general army and division court martial should be permanent, and the encircled locality court martial should also be established where a military administration was proclaimed. The temporary court martial should be especially established as needed. The war minister shall be the chief of the general court martial, and the army commander chief of the division court martial.

31679 * A unit or area commander should be chief of the especially established court martial. The temporary court martial had jurisdiction over cases against those under the command or control of the unit commander establishing this court martial, except when the court martial was established in units under his jurisdiction, and those under the command or control of these units should not be included.

Cases against those in areas of operations or defense in units in whose area the temporary court martial was established, or those committing crimes there, should be limited to cases where the units of the accused did not have a court martial in those areas.

Cases against those stationed in areas of operations, control or defense of the unit where temporary court martial was established, should be under its jurisdiction.

31680 Trials shall be carried out by a council of five judges, with a senior judge as president. In these especially established court martial cases, the judges would be reduced by two and the same will be true in the case of a permanent court martial, except higher ones, in case of emergency. With the exception of higher court's martial, the bench should consist of one field officer, and three company officers, or two

- field and three company officers, where the accused is a private or noncommissioned officer, two field or two company officers, where the accused was a company or warrant officer.
- 31681 One general and three field officers, * or two generals and two field officers where the accused was a field officer, and 4 generals where the accused was a general. Where the court martial was located in an area cut off from communication, judges might be selected from judges higher or equal to the accused, but otherwise should not be lower in rank.
- 31682 * Decision to dismiss the accusation is cancelled when the accused is dead, or when the case shall not be tried under articles 24 or 25.
- 31683 When the decision is given to dismiss the accusation by reason of cancellation, no one shall institute an accusation nor demand a preliminary trial again. Where the accused is found not guilty, or there is no evidence, the verdict shall be not guilty, the decision to dismiss the case shall be given when final judgment has been rendered; when punishment is abolished in accordance with law enacted after the crime was committed; when he should be exempt from punishment; when an amnesty is proclaimed; or when the case is barred by limitation.
- When the accused is found not guilty, acquitted, placed on probation, or the prosecution is dismissed not within the jurisdiction, or the accused is fined, the accused shall be released.
- 31684 When the court martial declares dismissal or nonjurisdiction, * it may preserve the warrant of detention or issue a new one. * When the prosecutor fails within three days to institute an accusation on the case for which he preserves or issues a new warrant of detention, or send the case to the competent court martial, he shall at once release the accused, and this also holds good when the prosecution fails to institute an accusation within five days.
- This law has been in force since 1 April 1942.
- 31685 Exhibit 3353, excerpts from the military criminal code, of April 10, 1908, provided that army personnel included persons on the active list, except those who have not yet entered barracks or on leave; reservists under orders for calling out;

31693 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3354 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that the law pertaining to the punishment of POWs on 9 March 1943 was revised because as to crimes committed by POWs in the past, laws of 25 October 1904 and 28 February 1905 existed at the time of the Russo-Japanese war. Later on, as the criminal code was revised and the penal system formed, it was necessary to revise the names of the punishments and the law pertaining to the punishment of POWs to conform to those in the criminal code.

31694 Also since the outbreak of the Pacific war, POWs increased and it became necessary to take steps to surpress possible * uprisings. In view of the upscaling of penalties for crimes committed against superiors and by military groups, it was necessary to raise the penalty.

In the winter of 1942 the bill for altering the POW law was taken up as one being under the jurisdiction of the War Minister to be presented at the next Diet session. After consultation within the war ministry and with the bureau of legal affairs, the final draft was drawn, approved by the minister, and the cabinet, and presented to the Diet.

31695 * After publication it became law and was promulgated as law No. 41 of 1943 (Exh. 1965A). When asked if the legal affairs bureau was consulted by the war ministry concerning the legality of the revision, the witness replied that they were consulted concerning this point, and further consultation was made with the legislative bureau and with other concerned authorities. They were informed that the revision was legal.

Asked if he gave them that information himself, the witness replied that persons in charge of the offices gave the information. The witness was in charge of the bureau of legal affairs himself, * but was not consulted directly. He had been a legal officer for many years. He did not give his subordinates any indication that the bill was legal as it was a part of their duty to study its legality and he himself did not consider it.

He was directed to consider it himself directly by the War Minister. Concerning points of this sort, the bureaus and divisions studied the question in concert with the offices in charge of the matter, which sent representatives to the legislative bureau where it was studied and the draft decided upon. After approval of the draft by the War Minister, it was presented to the Diet.

* Asked if Vice Minister of War, KIMURA, had anything to do with the preparation of this matter, he replied that the Vice Minister had no connection in facilitating the matter.

The witness identified and verified exhibit No. 3355 as his affidavit.

* The affidavit stated that the witness was in the engineering administration section of the maintenance bureau of the war ministry from March 1939 to October 1942, and in the service of the general bureau of aerial ordinance of the munitions ministry from March 1944 to the end of the war.

The case of the employment of POWs, relating to exhibit 1970-A, "Inquiry about the utilization of the Manchurian Machine Tool Company for the purpose of urgent aerial maintenance," occurred when the witness was in the maintenance bureau and was directly in his charge.

The note concerning the employment of POWs in the Manchurian Machine Tool Company was issued in the Vice Minister's name as entrusted according to the "Note Concerning the Disposal of POW's at the Present," (Exh. 1965-A) decided by the War Minister on 2 May 1942.

* Owing to the extreme manpower shortage, all were obliged to work according to their talent and specialty, without distinction of age and sex, and the minister's policy was to engage POWs to the extent of labor permissible by international law.

Productivity of machine tools at that time was about 40,000 pieces per year, while the amount paid was 250,000 pieces. Owing to the scarcity of building materials, it was so difficult to build a new factory, there was no alternative but to use existing facilities, and they learned to use the tools from the Manchurian Machine Tool Company, which had many idle facilities.

While manpower was more scarce in Manchuria than in Japan, Japan could not accept so many of the Manchurians who were not skilled and were irregular in attendance, and it was difficult for Japanese workers to move to Manchuria.

31702 * Eventually they planned to employ POWs with mechanical skill and experience. The army had no intention of engaging the company in the production of arms and it remained in the position of assisting the company as a requisitioner of machine tools. The company was kept distinct from the munitions industry and was under the jurisdiction of the engineering agency of the Manchurian Economic Department. The POWs participated in the production of lathes.

The wording of "urgent serial maintenance" in the "Note of Utilizing the Manchurian Machine Tool Company for the Purpose of Urgent Aerial Maintenance," (Exh. 1970), drafted by the witness, was used with the intention of engaging the company in production of machine tools to contribute to aircraft production. They did not carry out direct production of arms and ammunition.

31703 * CROSS-EXAMINATION BY COLONEL MORNANE

The witness stated that he drafted exhibit 1970-A himself and it was subsequently submitted to the Vice Minister. Reference was made to the affidavit where he said the note was issued under the Vice Minister's name, as entrusted according to the "Note Concerning the Disposal of Prisoners of War at the Present," (Exh. 1965-A).

Asked what he meant, "as entrusted," etc., he replied that in so far as it was not in violation of international law, it was the policy to use POWs in important industries.

31704 Asked what he knew about international law, * the witness replied that the use of POWs in the direct manufacture of munitions and ammunition or at the front is prohibited by international law.

31707 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that the minister's policy was to engage POWs to the extent permissible by international law and where reference was made to exhibit 1965-A. To the witness was quoted a paragraph from exhibit 1965-A which stated that white POWs should be imprisoned in Chosen, Taiwan, Manchuria, and China to be employed in the expansion of production and on work connected with military affairs.

31708 Asked if he regarded that statement as what was permissible under international law, he replied that in his understanding he did not think it violated international law, and that was the basis for his statement in the affidavit.

Asked if exhibit 1970-A, which he drafted, was subsequently approved by KIMURA, he replied that the drafting took place following the issuance of a notification by the Vice Minister of war reporting the minister's approval. Those engaged in such activities applied the principles of the notification sent by the minister as it related to the work with which they were charged, and their duty was to materialize the notification sent.

The policy was approved by the war minister and its function was the concrete materialization of the matters therein contained. Since these matters were entrusted to the Vice Minister, the results of the work were reported by the Vice Minister to the War Minister.

31709 * Since the work was carried out in accordance with the War Minister's policy and intention, and since the matter was entrusted to the Vice Minister, the responsibility for the work rested with the War Minister and not the Vice Minister. It was true the Vice Minister approved the document.

31710 * REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. HOWARD

The witness stated that he believed the work was in conformity with international law because belligerent states had the right to engage POWs in labor, with the exception of officers, and those qualified to receive officer treatment.

In response to a question by the president, the witness stated that KIMURA approved both the form and substance of the rule on the basis of his belief that it was not in violation of international law.

31713 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3356 as his affidavit. * The witness stated that from March 1942 to March 1944 he had charge of administration matters concerning POWs as staff officer in the Tobu Army.

The Tobu Army document dated 2 October 1942 entitled "Matters Concerning the Employment of POW" (Exh. 1967) was issued when the witness was a staff officer in the Tobu Army, and was made on the basis of two documents, one being "Matters Concerning the Treatment of POW" (Exh. 1965-A), decided by the War Minister, and the other being "POW Employment Regulations" (Exh. 3050), which had already been enforced.

31714 Exhibit 1967 had no plan of employing POWs in labor directly connected with military operations. * At no time were POWs employed in such labor.

In so far as the medical affairs bureau was concerned, business delegated to the vice minister was of minor importance, such as examination of medical supplies. The witness observed that the vice minister's primary duties were to strive for harmony and smooth operation within the ministry, and assist the minister.

31717 TOJO, while premier and war minister, carried out his duties with accuracy and decision and was an example of effective leadership. Bureau chief conferences were presided over by TOJO and * at them each chief reported and the minister gave his views and directions. Vice Minister KIMURA spoke very rarely and confined his statements mostly to ministry business.

At the bureau chiefs' conferences, the witness heard no report on protests against maltreatment of POWs during vice minister KIMURA's tenure. The war minister's orders were usually stipulated as departmental orders, modifications, etc., and the only time the minister's name was used was when orders were issued. On other occasions, the vice minister's notification by order was issued and the minister's name not used.

31718 This latter method was employed when orders approved by the minister were indicated in writing. Power to command, appoint, dismiss, and punish bureau chiefs was held by the minister and not the vice minister; except on less important matters the chief minister had no power of decision * and no power of command outside of the ministry, although it was his responsibility to assist the minister, he was not in a position to assist the minister in external matters.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY COLONEL MORNANE

31719 When asked if the vice minister was actually, after the war minister, the senior ranking minister in the war ministry, he replied, "yes". When asked if before important matters could be formulated, bureau chiefs had to get authority or consent of either the minister or vice minister, he replied that the war minister's approval was always necessary, * but that of the vice minister was not. It was suggested to the witness that in important matters, they had to get the approval either of the minister, or if they didn't get his approval, the vice minister's approval was sufficient, and he replied that it was possible to carry out any important matter without the approval of the war minister.

The affairs of the war minister were conducted in accordance with general affairs regulations.

31720 * The witness was shown article 30 of exhibit 3348 which was read to him. This stated that among matters formulated by each section as to those important, the bureau chief concerned at the beginning of the formulation, or at any other appropriate time, should express his view directly to the minister or vice minister to get his private consent.

The witness was asked that if under that article if under that article it was not true that the consent of either the minister or vice minister was required for certain matters, he replied that of course it was desirable to obtain the approval of both, but it was not a violation of regulation to carry out any matters without direct approval of the war minister without the approval of the vice minister.

It was the witness's belief that when the war minister decided a policy, the policy need not be approved by the vice minister.

On May 28, 1945, the witness met KIMURA at Moulmein. Then he urged the necessity of enforcing strict discipline and being good to the inhabitants, telling the witness to treat them with warmth because the Burmese would help the Japanese Army out of difficulties and military operations could not be carried out without their cooperation.

31724 * Later the witness was in charge of the defense of the district south of the Salween River. Guerrilla unit leaders, backed by British-Indian parachute units, frequently landed threatening the rear.

Near Kalagon Village, a parachute corps was based, and in concert with the insurgent Burmese Army disturbed the district. The British-Indian Army held over the natives by dropping arms and provisions for the guerrilla corps and also necessities for the people so that the power of the guerrilla corps increased. In mid June 1945 the witness ordered the 215th Infantry Regimental Commander TSUKADA to suppress the guerrillas 31725 He had TSUKADA take clothes and provisions to the people for their pacification. But the Kalagon Incident broke out because of the abnormal action of the Battalion Commander, which attacked the village. The witness had always been careful about his subordinates' treatment of the natives, but never knew about the Kalagon Incident until his * battalion commander, company commander, and others were summoned by the British Army after the end of the war.

Even when he met his Regimental Commander after the war he did not give any report about the event and consequently the witness did not report to KIMURA concerning the event either when he went to Moulmein on August 15, or when he met KIMURA in Bangkok after the end of the war. This was because the witness himself was ignorant of the Kalagon Incident. As the commanding officer concerned, he was put in prison as a war suspect on January 22, 1946. He had neither given any order for such act of atrocity nor had received any report on it.

Since the Regiment Commander stated at the War Tribunal at Rangoon that he did not report this case to the witness, it was made clear that he had no connection and was released. 31726*The case was dropped not only for the witness but also for the Regiment Commander and only the battalion commander and personnel ranking below him were punished.

On 6 February 1946 the witness reported the Kalagon case to the Area Army Commander. When the witness was temporarily released on bail from the Moulmein Prison and went to Camp Insen to attend the meeting of the Anglo-Japanese War Research Society, he met KIMURA and reported the matter to him.

KIMURA was very surprised and repeatedly said he felt exceedingly sorry. According to information picked up while the witness was in prison, it seemed there were one or two more illegal acts besides the Kalagon case, and two officers who were under the witness's command were arrested and brought to Burma after the demobilization.

During the war he had never known of such a case, or given any order in connection therewith, nor did he undergo any investigation, since he was not involved. Therefore he did not report such cases to Headquarters of Area Army, nor did he receive any order about such matters from army headquarters.

* The witness identified and verified exhibit 3359 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was a former lieutenant-general, and after various posts was appointed commander of the 33rd Unit under the Burma Area Army in April, 1944, holding the post until the surrender.

When KIMURA arrived at his post in mid-September 1944, the 33rd Unit was engaged in operations near Tung-Ting parallel with an advance on the Unnan Expeditionary Army. Owing to the unfavorable progress, they retreated and took part in combat at the battle of the Irrawaddy River near Meiklila, and afterwards marched south along the eastern side of the Sittang River.

* From mid-May, 1945, having assembled in the vicinity of Sittang, the unit defended the Tenasserim Region, to check the advance of the Anglo-Indian Army.

He had read exhibits 1537-A and 1549 to 1553-A concerning alleged atrocities in Burma. No orders were ever given by the witness concerning these matters, and he knew nothing of them, notwithstanding they appeared to have happened in the operational zone under his charge. He learned for the first time some of the facts in the exhibits when war criminal suspects were on trial in Burma after the war. No reports were made by the unit to Area Army Headquarters, and no orders were received by the unit concerning these matters.

* The witness was confident that they maintained discipline and could render services in the cause of good understanding between the Japanese and Burmese by efforts in compliance with the spirit and intentions of Area Commander KIMURA, though they were in miserable conditions and hard pressed and continually retreating after September 1944. The witness was rather surprised to hear of the atrocities.

KIMURA showed his manner of command through his address after arriving as Area Army Commander and in several meetings and through private correspondence and personal meetings, he understood KIMURA's manner of command. At all times he emphasized strict discipline, maintenance of morale, and proper reward and punishment. He told them to treat the Burmese with precaution and sympathy, win their hearts and enhance the support of the army.

31733 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 3360 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that his 31734 * former affidavit was 3089, and he was a former Major-General in Burma under KIMURA, and had been Chief of Staff and Acting Chief of Staff. Concerning exhibit 1539, which mentioned 27 Burmese as missing in July 1945, after the surrender he talked to Gendarmerie Commander KUME southeast of Moulmein. Burma Army Headquarters was then at this place, and KUME told the witness about the so-called Moulmein Incident for the first time.

31735 * KUME said that Burmese in custody at Moulmein had been handled by the chief of the detachment of the Moulmein M.P., at the chief's own discretion. Later, after ranking officers of the Burma Army had been moved to the Rangoon POW camp at the end of October, 1945, the witness informed KIMURA of the Moulmein case, and KIMURA told him that this was the first time he had heard of it. Army Headquarters had not issued orders nor received information regarding the matter before the end of the war.

He had read the exhibits concerning Burma atrocities. Reports on these matters would come to him, and he in turn would have transmitted them to KIMURA. No such reports were received, and consequently none went to KIMURA.

31736 * The witness identified exhibit 3361 as his affidavit and verified it. The affidavit stated that Army Commander KIMURA regarded discipline as one of the most important items for command, and took every opportunity for its materialization. As an example, immediately after he was appointed he advanced the command post to Maymyo, conducting operations himself, and invited the Commander 31737 and Chief of Staff * of the 15th and 33rd Army, to give them strict direction concerning military discipline. At that time he also inspected discipline of units at Maymyo.

In early February, 1945, he inspected 28th Army Headquarters at Taigii, encouraging discipline, and reviewed discipline there. Thereafter, he instructed the 33rd Army

31738 Even after Headquarters withdrew to Moulmein at the end of April, 1945, KIMURA went to the front, visiting headquarters of the 31st, 33rd, 49th, and 18th divisions and 33rd Army to maintain discipline, and also summoned the commanders of the 15th Army, 31st, 33rd and 49th Divisions, 101st and 24th Mixed Brigades, and instructed that they should put top priority on the maintenance of discipline and winning the popularity of the natives. He * repeated these instructions again and again to make them permeate the whole army, and sent personnel of headquarters to the front to inspect on discipline.

This inspection showed that all bad conditions, such as disorder after defeat and interruption of transportation and communication facilities accumulated to make some of each corps slip from the commanders' hands, and they made every effort to pick them up. Also, they inspected battlefield discipline, and found it was maintained strictly.

31739 KIMURA severely punished those breaking discipline, and punished several officers for careless treatment of secret army documents, for lack of control of subordinates, * and he punished the head of a prison where Japanese soldiers were interned for his bad management.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY COL. MORNANE.

31740 * The witness stated that in his affidavit, where he had said that KIMURA punished the chief of guards of the Area Army for lack of control of subordinates, he meant the chief of guards of the Area Army. These guards had no connection with prison camps, but their duty was to guard army headquarters. The prison where Japanese soldiers were interned was at Insein, and the place where Allied POWs were held was six or seven miles apart.

31741 * The head of the prison where the Japanese soldiers were interned was punished for poor control of the affairs of the prison following desertions which took place after KIMURA arrived. When asked if he caused any investigation to be made as to the condition of POWs at Rangoon as a result, of finding of bad conditions at the Japanese prison, he replied that the Japanese soldiers did not desert because of bad management.

* It was suggested to the witness that KIMURA found bad management in the Japanese prison, as a result of which prisoners were allowed to escape, and finding that it would be logical for him to insure that there was no danger of escape at Rangoon POW Camp, and the witness was asked if KIMURA caused any investigation to be made there. He replied that because the POW Camp in Rangoon was outside his duties he did not know whether KIMURA directed his staff officer to look after that.

* Exhibit 3362, the affidavit of TAKAGI, Hidezo, stated that he was appointed a staff officer to the Burma Area Army in January, 1945, remaining so until the surrender.

* He had read the exhibits concerning illegal acts in Burma. During his tenure in the Burma Army, Headquarters had no knowledge of them, and KIMURA did not order them. KIMURA stuck to the maintenance of discipline and the holding of popularity as a fundamental principle, and endeavoured to the last to have this principle realized.

31749 * The witness identified and verified exhibit
31752 3364 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was Adjutant-General of the War Ministry from August 1939 to February 1943. Vice War Minister KIMURA worked with the witness under TOJO, during the greater part of his tenure.

The witness managed the Minister's Secretariat and his principal business was to take charge of the official seals of the Minister and Ministry, inspect, receive, and send correspondence, including telegrams.
and inspect finished documents, receive foreign officers and conduct general affairs.

31753 KIMURA was a typical soldier, and concentrated his energy chiefly on administration regarding ordinance, and also established harmony in the Ministry. He helped the Minister passively compared with the acute and positive man, TOJO. * Even after TOJO became Premier and War Minister concurrently, TOJO managed all affairs of the War Ministry for himself, so that the powers of the Vice Minister and the matters under his charge were the same and not extended; nor was he ordered to act for the Minister, TOJO.

KIMURA never attended the Liaison Conference or Imperial Conferences, nor was he present at the Information Conferences of Imperial Headquarters, nor the Information Conferences of Department Chiefs, nor the Commissary Information Conferences. The Bureau Chief Information Conferences were to establish close contact between Minister, Vice-Minister, and Department and Bureau Chiefs, and was not a means by which to decide matters. The War Minister presided over both, in name and reality.

31754 The contents of the Vice Minister's Note by order reported directly to the Minister by Chief of the POW Control Bureau, UEMURA, at the Bureau Chief's Information

The witness did not recall any protest concerning the maltreatment of POWs discussed at the Information Conference

War Ministry affairs were managed in accordance with regulations of the government and special regulations of the War Ministry. All other important matters needed the War Minister's decision, either by his direct order or in accordance with his intention. A policy or plan important to the Army was formed by the competent Bureau and Department, deliberated by the ones concerned, and became a definite plan through the Minister's final decision. It was a most important principle of obedience, that even if soldiers were divided in opinion, they should efface themselves once the Minister gave his decision and should make efforts to fulfill their superior's intention. No liberty was given of resigning because of different opinions.

* Matters determined through this process were announced by public documents, including telegrams. There were three forms of notification, which changed with the form of the contents, but substantially public documents of the Ministry were sent on the War Minister's responsibility. General matters, such as Ministry orders, instructions, public notes, orders, and directions, were issued in the name of the Minister. Individual matters, or those of secondary importance, in the name of the Vice Minister; less important matters in the name of the Adjutant-General. All were notified on the War Minister's responsibility, and the senders were not responsible for their contents, and there was no exception. Among them were the public documents, such as Vice-Minister's note by order, Vice-Minister's note, Vice-Minister's inquiry and answer issued in the Vice-Minister's name, and Adjutant-General's note issued in the Adjutant-General's name. These were classified

* by their relative importance.

Classification determined the names of senders, and were classified by the competent Bureau and inspected by the Secretariat. Documents issued in the name of the Bureau or Department Chief were not recognized as official documents of the War Ministry, and were not allowed to go beyond the purview of preliminary and liaison negotiations with offices other than the Ministries.

The fact that a man's name was placed on official correspondence or order did not necessarily mean he was responsible for the subject matter. The "note sent by order" was preceded by an introductory remark, "as the Minister has decided so I sent this note by order".

All Vice-Minister's notes that were not by order, such as answers to inquiries, not only included matters under his charge, but often matters decided by the War Minister or under the charge of Bureau Chiefs. The War Ministry usually sent 4,000 official documents a day, and although most dealt with matters under the charge of Bureau Chiefs, they were sometimes * sent in the name of the Senior Adjutant.

As to communications between the War Ministry and Area Armies and Divisions, it was customary to use as sender or addressee either the Chief of Staff or Vice-Minister, and the name of the Minister and Divisional Commander was not mentioned in most cases. As examples, of "Notification of Vice-Minister by Order" were "Disposal of POWs" (Ex. 1965-a), and "Matters concerning the treatment of crews of enemy aircraft captured in air raiding the Imperial territory, Manchukuo, or operational areas" (Ex. 1992).

An example of an answer of a Vice Minister is "Reply from Vice-Minister of War to Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs" (Ex. 1958), and as examples of documents issued or received in the name of the Vice Minister and Chief of Staff were "Inquiry Concerning the Question of Making Available the Manchurian Machine Tool Co. for a Rapid Increase in Aircraft Production" (Ex. 1970-A), "Matters concerning Internment of POWs in Korea" (Ex. 1973), and "Matters of the Presenting of Report Concerning the Reaction Among the General Public following internment of British POWs (Ex. 1975-A).

Official correspondence to be sent by the War Ministry, as well as that addressed to the Ministry, were first brought to the Adjutant Department, which forwarded the outgoing correspondence, after inspection, and delivered the incoming. Upon receiving important matters requiring directions from the War Ministry, the competent section drafted instructions or orders in conformity with the Minister's idea. Regarding the disposal of unimportant ones, they were offered for the superior's inspection after preparation, and some less important matters entrusted to the section were not inspected by superiors. All those documents were sent in the names of Vice-Ministers, Ministers, or Adjutant-General.

Matters about the investigation of prisoner's conditions and correspondence on them were in charge of the POW Information Bureau, directly under the control of the War Minister and outside the War Ministry. Documents exchanged between this Bureau and the outside directly were not through the Adjutant Department. The Vice-Minister was not entrusted with any matters regarding the business under this Bureau.

Foreign officers visited the Minister to pay formal courtesies, but never came on political and practical business.

31760 * The witness was asked who was considered responsible for decisions expressed in documents drafted by other ministries or the General Staff, and these documents were made rental by the War Ministry. * He replied that in the event decisions were made on the basis of rental only the War Minister carried the responsibility.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY COL. MORNAME.

The witness had no recollection of anyone by the name of KITA being in the War Ministry in his time, but there was a HAMADA, who was in the Inspectorate * General of Military Education for a short while, whose first name was Suyeo. He didn't recall who was the Diet Vice Minister while KIMURA was Vice Minister of War, and he didn't think there was a Parliamentary Vice Minister at the time, but had no definite recollection. His recollection was the same with respect to whether there was a Parliamentary Counsellor.

Asked if the duties normally performed by the Parliamentary Minister and Counsellor were performed by KIMURA, he replied that based on his recollection of the work of the Parliamentary Minister and Counsellor during the tenure of Vice Minister ANAMI, who preceded KIMURA, * he should state that the Parliamentary Vice Minister and

Page Counsellor had hardly anything to do, and their work was conducted only when the Diet was in session. It was their duty to take part in matters concerning negotiations with the Diet, and the Vice Minister had authority to coordinate the work of Bureaus and Divisions, but not authority to supervise their work. Regulations gave him no authority to take part in political affairs, or enter into negotiations with the Diet.

31764 Asked if he knew that KIMURA actually took part in such negotiations on several occasions, the witness replied that only when he was appointed a member of the Government Committee in the Diet, on appointment by the * government. Asked if the War Ministry representative on the Government Committee would usually be the Parliamentary Minister or Counsellor from the War Ministry, he replied no, that members of the Government Committee were not limited to them alone.

31766 * Reference was made to the affidavit where he said that he managed the affairs of the Secretariat by order of the Minister as a senior of the Adjutant Department, * and he agreed that Article 2 of War Ministry Regulations provided that ministry affairs should be divided among the bureaus and the Secretariat, and that unless otherwise provided the Secretariat should take charge of the management of the Ministries. Asked if, in effect, unless specific provision was made, the Secretariat had charge of all affairs of the Ministry, he replied that the actual handling of the business was done by the various bureaus, and afterward final coordination was done by the Secretariat.

31768 * Asked if, in addition, the bureaus only handled matters specifically allotted them, he replied each Bureau carried out its duties as defined in regulations. When shown exhibit 3348, the witness agreed that it was excerpts of regulations to which he referred.

31769 When handed a document, he acknowledged that it consisted of Tables 1 to 10 referred to in Article 27 of the Regulations. * Exhibit 3365, the document identified by the witness, was received into evidence. Asked if, under these tables certain matters were given specifically to various bureaus, he replied that that was true, the various duties given to the Bureaus under organizational regulations were set out.

* Asked if under Article 2 of exhibit 3348, those matters not provided there fell under his management as Senior Adjutant in charge of the Secretariat, he replied that was not so. When asked to read Article 2 of that exhibit, he read that the ministry's affairs shall be divided among the bureaus and the Secretariat should take charge of the management of affairs thereof, unless otherwise provided.

* Asked where else any provision was made except in those regulations, he replied that at the end of Article 2 were the words "unless it is otherwise provided". Actually, there was no other provision. Also, Article 2 provided that the affairs of the Ministry shall be divided among the bureaus and Secretariat. All outgoing matters were handled by the Secretariat, but within the Ministry affairs were divided among the bureaus and Secretariat, but not in accordance with Tables 1 to 10. Those tables, other than organizational regulations, provided only for matters to be handled by the Minister as delegated to bureaus, and only a portion of the Ministry's business was set forth in the tables.

31772

When asked if the affairs set forth in tables 1 to 10 included also a portion of the Vice-Minister's duties, he replied yes. * Under article 11 of the exhibit the witness was required to take charge of the affairs of the Secretariat in compliance with the orders of the Minister and Vice-Minister. It also provides that the Senior Adjutant should have charge of the Ministry's general management, pursuant to the orders of the Minister and Vice-Minister, and also provides that the competent Adjutant shall deliver documents to the Senior Adjutant if regarded sufficiently important to require prompt inspection by the Minister, Parliamentary Vice-Minister or Counsellor.

Asked if under Article 25 there was no doubt as to which sections matters should be referred to, he was required to nominate the section after receiving the Vice-Minister's instructions, he replied yes, but as a matter of fact such things did not exist. * He knew where to send them without further advice. When asked if under Article 30 important matters cannot be started by bureau chiefs without the consent of the Minister or Vice-Minister, he replied this did not mean that matters could not be executed without their private consent.

Asked if it meant that important matters could not be executed without their consent, he replied that the part should not really read "to the Minister or to the Vice-Minister", but should be "to the Minister and Vice-Minister", and in some cases they might get consent only of the Minister and it was not necessary to get the consent of the Vice-Minister.

Asked if he suggested a mistranslation, he replied there was nothing wrong in the regulations themselves, and was correctly stated in the Japanese copy. * (The translation was referred to the Language Arbitrator.)

Under Article 40, when consideration of documents had been completed by the section, they must be handed to the Secretariat for review, and he then can carry the matters into effect, after getting the approval of the Minister or Vice-Minister to whom they were submitted. Article 41 provided that in an emergency the Senior Adjutant might act on his own, making an immediate report to the Minister or Vice-Minister, after the matter's execution.

31776

* Article 46 provided that the Director of the Bureau of Personnel Affairs must get the Minister's or Vice-Minister's approval with regard to important secret matters. Reference was made to Article 46 referring to matters concerning personnel affairs, and the following paragraph regarding matters of movement, appointment, and dismissal, and the witness was asked if these matters included the appointment and dismissal of personnel. He replied that the Secretariat had nothing to do with personnel affairs, which were under the Personnel Bureau.

31777

Asked if in accordance with this article he must get, in some cases, approval of the Minister or Vice-Minister, he replied that in the article would be found the words "can be dealt with by the Director of the Bureau of Personnel Affairs". * Reference was made to the first part of the article, which stated that among matters concerning personnel affairs, for those considered secret the Director of the Personnel Affairs Bureau must get approval from the Minister or Vice Minister according to the degree of importance, or the Director can deal with them himself. Asked if that did not suggest that in very important matters the Director must get either the approval of the Minister or Vice-Minister, the witness replied that he did state that important matters concerning personnel must be referred to them.

Page Article 47 provided that with regard to publication 31778 of important matters, the approval of the Minister, Vice-Minister, or Bureau Director must be obtained. * Asked if any document could go out from the Ministry without the approval of the Minister or Vice-Minister or himself, he replied all official outgoing documents must be so handled, and the power to stop any documents was in the hands of the Minister or Vice-Minister.

31779 When shown exhibit 1973, * the witness stated that its subject was "The Internment of POWs in Korea", and the War Minister was shown as approving it and that the witness' seal appeared on it. Asked if that meant that it was approved by the War Minister and approved by himself, the witness replied that the fact that the document had been approved by the War Minister and then executed and was established as an official document, the witness' responsibility was for certifying that the document was prepared and was ready to go out.

31780 When shown exhibit 1967, the witness agreed that it showed a message from the Chief of Staff of the Eastern District Army to the War Minister relating to the employment of POWs. Under the head of "8th working place", munitions factories for expanding production are set out as places of labor. It was a reply to that request dated 2 October, 1942, stating that the application was approved as requested.

31781 Asked if he noticed that the approving authority was the Vice War Minister, and if that meant he approved the document being dispatched, he replied that he did not * say that the Vice Minister sent out the document. The order came from the War Minister. Asked who gave the authority to send it out, he replied it was a matter which the Vice Minister sent out as a matter delegated to him by the Minister. It would not follow that the Vice-Minister approved of it being sent out. Even if he did approve of its going out, if the document fell under the category of a matter to be approved by the Vice-Minister, as delegated 31782 * to him by the War Minister, it would mean that the Vice-Minister's approval had the same effect as the War Minister's. Matters delegated by the Minister meant matters in which he delegated part of his authority to subordinates. Since his powers were extensive and detailed, it was physically impossible for him to execute all of them by himself, and therefore he delegated a portion of his authority to subordinates. It was tantamount to the War Minister saying he would take responsibility for the act, but they must do the actual execution.

Page Therefore, execution of delegated matters were carried out on the War Minister's responsibility. Asked if the nature of the action depended on the Vice-Minister's decision, he replied the Vice-Minister's approval in such * cases was approval based on the War Minister's intentions as understood by the the Vice Minister and did not represent the Vice-Minister's intentions.

When shown a document, the witness agreed it purported to be addressed by the Chief of Staff of the Ha-shu Corps to Vice-Minister KIMURA, and was dated 14 October, 1941. From various seals * on it, it could be identified as a document received by the War Ministry. The witness had no independent recollection of the document.

31784

* Exhibit 3366, the document thus identified by the witness, concerned the murder of a French missionary by the Japanese Navy in Powen, and stated that upon investigation of the case based upon the words of the Catholic Bishop in Haikow, who stated that a French missionary had been killed by the Navy in Powen, then under the punitive operation of the Navy, circumstances showed that when two Catholic missionaries arrived in Powen in early September, they found a brother missionary named Molban had been killed, and reported the matter to their Bishop.

31785

On the 25th and 26th of August, the Navy arrived in the city of Powen, only passing through on the 25th, but on the 26th a detachment arrived with several lorries and * found a dead body of a sailor. Under the assumption that the work had been done by the residents of Powen, the unit burned houses and the church, killing the missionary and 24 of the natives. The murder of the missionary was executed in a native's house; and furthermore, they burned about 5 to 6,000 dollars worth of property, and the same day the unit withdrew to Nan-Meng-Po, and later moved away.

31786

The Catholic Bishop, upon receiving the information, merely telegraphed on the branches of the Church in Peking and Lisbon, that the missionary Molban had succumbed, without giving any further details.

31787

* The witness stated this was the first time he had ever seen the above exhibit.

* The Vice-Minister had nothing to do with matters relating to POWs. A document was handed the witness, and he acknowledged it as a War Ministry document, and referred to a policy not to permit visits by agents of protecting powers, and showed that the Vice-Minister delegated the matter to Bureau Chief UEMURA.

31791

* Exhibit 3367-A, an excerpt from a file of correspondence from the POW Information Bureau re POW Inspection Visits in 1942 and 1943, was received in evidence. Asked if the exhibit showed that the Vice-Minister delegated the matter to Bureau Chief UEMURA, he replied that was not so. It was delegated by the War Minister. The witness agreed that on top of the document was a printed form on which appeared the word "minister" and after that the word "delegated", not part of the printed form. * This meant that the Minister had delegated the matter to the Bureau Chief.

* The word "Vice Minister" was printed on the form and followed by the word "delegated". Asked what was the necessity for putting "delegated" after "Vice-Minister" if the Minister had already delegated the matter to the Chief of the POW Control Bureau, * the witness replied that was a matter of form, and in cases where authority was delegated to the Bureau Chief it was customary to put the word "I", meaning delegated, both after the seal of the Minister and that of the Vice-Minister. Because the word "delegated" was found after the Minister's seal did not mean he delegated authority to the Vice-Minister, who in turn delegated it to the Bureau Chief. If "delegated" was found after the Minister's seal and also after the Vice-Minister's, it meant the matter had been delegated to the bureau chief.

31794

It was a mistake to suggest that what happened was that the Minister delegated it to the Vice-Minister, who in turn delegated it to the bureau chief. The communication originating the file came from the Vice-Foreign Minister to the Vice-War Minister, and the final communication was a draft of the Vice-War Minister's reply to the Vice-Foreign Affairs Minister. * The terms were used as a matter of form, and it was customary that documents sent from one ministry to another were in the name of the Vice-Minister, even though the document was addressed from a Vice-Minister to a Vice-Minister it is erroneous to assume it was addressed only to the Vice-Minister; rather, it should be interpreted as a document sent from one ministry to another.

By Mr. Howard

The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3368 as his affidavit.

31802

* The affidavit stated that the witness had no direct connection, official or otherwise, with KIMURA. He was Vice War Minister from Aug. 1944 to July 1945, and during this time and during the time KIMURA was Vice Minister, regulations were construed and practiced to the effect that the Vice Minister acted as an Assistant to the Minister toward other departments and authorities. He had no authority to represent the Ministry, no right of command, and was in no position to take responsibility for matters outside the Ministry.

31803

* The Vice Minister was an Assistant to the Minister in administrative affairs but not in state affairs. When the Minister wished to order the Vice Minister to act in his place, he first formally appointed the Vice Minister as a Minister of State, otherwise the Minister had no authority to have the Vice Minister act in his place.

The right of command to appoint or dismiss and to punish Bureau and Department Chiefs belonged only to the Minister and the Vice Minister had only the right to supervise business management. This, however, did not imply strong authority as the right to direct and command such management, but merely implied the right to offer guidance and instruct.

* Bureau and Department Chiefs had the right to command, control and punish and keep examination records concerning their staffs. Bureau and Department Chiefs were directly under the Minister, administering their duties by his order and directly responsible to him. Disposition of departmental business, the duty of the Vice Minister, meant that he was to coordinate business between bureaus and departments, decide delegated matters, and transact miscellaneous and routine affairs not belonging to any bureau or department.

Supervision of business meant that the Vice Minister, as the Minister's assistant in regard to affairs for which the Minister was responsible, was to direct the business of bureaus and departments because the Chiefs direct and supervise the Department and Section affairs under their jurisdiction.

The Chief of the POW Control Bureau * superintended affairs concerning the treatment of POWs and other Bureau Chiefs also supervised affairs relating to POWs according to their

The Vice Minister was entrusted with unimportant affairs which were under the jurisdiction of the bureaus and had no right to decide other matters nor give orders to those outside the Ministry. The Vice Minister's notifications by order are those issued in the Vice Minister's name according to the routine practiced where the Minister's orders are to be transmitted in writing. Telegrams, references, etc. were issued or received in the Vice Minister's name, according to procedure, but this did not necessarily mean that the Vice Minister was responsible for such statements. Within the War Ministry it was the rule that the Vice Minister had nothing to do with personnel appointments * 31806 contrary to the practice in other Ministries. Cabinet changes had no connection with the appointment of Vice Ministers which was in the jurisdiction of the War Minister. Vice Ministers were appointed members or counsellors of various committees, but many actually played no important part as such.

KIMURA was never appointed Minister of State and War Ministry officers did not plan or execute military operations. When asked what were the duties and responsibilities of the Vice Minister and Bureau Chiefs in the Military Section of Imperial Headquarters, the witness replied he had no duties different from his ordinary peace-time duties as Vice Minister, even in the Military Section * and no special duties as attending members.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY COL. MORNANE

The witness stated that immediately prior to becoming Vice Minister, he was Supreme Military Advisor to the Chinese Government in Nanking, appointed in April 1943, and immediately prior to that was Commander of the 26th Division from April 1942. Prior to this latter position he was Inspector General of Supply.

31808 * Asked if he could say of his personal knowledge anything of the way KIMURA conducted himself at the War Ministry, as he was in there while KIMURA was in office, the witness replied that since he had been a Vice Minister, on the whole he knew what his predecessors had done.

* DIRECT EXAMINATION OF TANAKA, Tadakatsu
By Mr. Howard

The witness identified and verified Exhibit No. 3369 as his affidavit.

31810

The affidavit stated that the witness had been appointed Adjutant of the War Ministry and concurrently Secretary to the War Minister in Feb. 1941, remaining in those offices until April 1943. During KIMURA's tenure as Vice Minister, the witness assisted him as Secretary. Documents to be read or reviewed by the Vice Minister were handled by the witness except those directly handed KIMURA as KIMURA used to tell the witness a greater part of what he participated in, and since the witness attended KIMURA in almost all dealings, he was familiar with a greater part of KIMURA's activities during his tenure.

Before assuming office as Vice Minister, KIMURA was in the same office with TOJO for about six months as Director of the Ordnance Bureau while TOJO was Vice Minister. * Except for this, KIMURA never served in the same office, school, or army with TOJO and had no political, ideological or individual connection with TOJO. The witness had heard that the reason KIMURA was appointed Vice Minister was to have him help the Minister in regard to the special and technical administration of arms which was his forte and to promote intra-ministry harmony.

KIMURA was from Saitama Prefecture which had not many career soldiers. The witness was not sure whether there was any clique or sectionalism within the Army but if any KIMURA had no connection with it. Until becoming Vice Minister, he was exclusively a genuine soldier chiefly engaged in artillery education, technical administration of arms and army commander, and did his best in the field of ordnance administration. During his tenure, KIMURA could not play his role positively on account of the circumstances. TOJO was well versed in military administration and a man of special industry. TOJO's mottos were "Command at the head of the column" and "Simplification and dispatch of business" and he held power over principal bureau and department chiefs, ordering them to conduct business positively and decisively and they did so faithfully. Under such circumstances, KIMURA naturally used his ability principally in the sphere of ordnance administration and endeavored to facilitate the skilled War Minister TOJO and the bureau and department chiefs to display their abilities.

The witness recalled a part of KIMURA's farewell address in March 1943 when he was transferred from Vice Minister to the Page 31813 Head of the Ordnance Administration Headquarters. In it, KIMURA said * that while he was Vice Minister he thought it proper for him as Minister TOJO's assistant to make every effort for business simplification and dispatch, as well as the unity of the whole ministry to contribute to the realization of TOJO's motto, and also facilitate the chiefs in giving full scope to their abilities. Now that he had been appointed head of the Ordnance Administration Headquarters, he would display his ambition positively.

These words of KIMURA's revealed his frame of mind while he was Vice Minister, and the witness heard KIMURA reveal similar expressions.

As TOJO was extremely pressed with national business, in addition to important state affairs, ceremonial matters and other miscellaneous business were almost exclusively transacted by the Vice Minister and so the Vice Minister was always very busy too.

31815 The bureau chiefs' conference was held twice weekly as a rule, but was not a true conference, but merely a business liaison to make necessary reports to the Minister and Vice Minister * and also exchange information.

The bureau directors' conference was presided over by the War Minister in name and reality, and he was careful in guiding it even in minor matters, although there were cases where the Minister could not attend and the Vice Minister presided but these were few. The conference was often given up because of the Minister's absence. When TOJO was absent, his secretary would record the main points and report to him afterward. The witness never remembered having heard, at bureau directors' conferences or other occasions during his term in the War Ministry, any protest or information regarding ill treatment of POWs. The contents of the communication issued in the name of the Vice Minister by order of the Minister, concerning disposal of POWs (Exhibit 1965-A) were reported by the Chief of the POW Administration Division UEMURA at 31816 obtained direct from the Minister.

The Kempei was a special army directly under the War Ministry, but ordnance and the Vice Minister had no right to control it.

The decision on the purport of "The Vice Minister's communication by order of the War Minister concerning the treatment of the enemy air crew members who entered Japan with the object of raiding its territory" of July 28, 1942 (Exhibit 1992) was made by War Minister TOJO and with his consent was given to the direct command of the Chief of Staff.

The employment of POWs in the construction of the Burma-Siam Railway was decided on through negotiations between the Chief of Staff and War Minister, and the relative construction order was drafted and issued by the General Staff Office.

31817 The Vice Minister had no material connection with the drafting of the bill for revision of the Disciplinary Law for POWs (Exhibit 1965-A) * and it was drafted by the bureaus and sections concerned to meet the requirement, and after consultation with the Legislative Bureau, it was decided at a Cabinet Council and approved by the Diet. KIMURA knew the bill and the reason thereof only a few days before its introduction into the Diet, and he explained the reason before the Diet.

Like Vice Ministers of other Ministries, KIMURA was a member or councillor of various committees, but many were established customarily and most were only nominal. He did not attend most of these meetings, and even if he did, his attendance was only formal or conventional.

31818 KIMURA never attended meetings of the POW Camp Commanders in the Ministry. When the War Minister delivered instructions to the Commander of the Zentsuji Division on 30 May 1942 (Exhibit 1960), KIMURA did not attend this tour of inspection * nor participate in drafting the manuscript of instructions.

The witness had never seen nor read "The Report on the Violent Conducts in Malaya Peninsula", Exhibit 476, nor heard of it from KIMURA and had never heard that KIMURA supported the Military Alliance with Germany. The contact of KIMURA with German military officers was limited to ceremonial occasions, and he never met them on other business.

31820 When asked if he remembered being seen on 25 Sept. by Mr. Monaghan of IPS, the witness said he did, and that he told him something about a document he produced to the witness. Asked if he told Monaghan that the document was a copy of a telegram delivered to the Military Affairs Bureau about 25 April 1942 and brought to KIMURA's attention, the witness said that was a little different from what he actually said. He said it was a document which after passing through the Military Affairs Bureau, was seen by the Vice Minister. When shown the document * the witness stated that it was a copy of the document which had been shown to him previously.

31821 * Exhibit 3370, the document identified by the witness, being a telegram addressed to the Vice War Minister from the Chief of Staff of the China Expeditionary Forces, dated 25 April 1942, of Secret Classification, stated that as they could not allow the American Air Force after inhumanly blind-bombing at the time of the air raids on Japan, to escape to China or hope for safety

The witness stated that from July 1940 to Aug. 1945, he was Chief of the General Affairs Department of Manchukuo and was presently interned in the Soviet. When handed Exhibit 670, the witness stated it was his affidavit, written in his own handwriting, signed by him, that he gave the evidence truthfully and without duress, and the contents were true.

On Oct. 20 *he had made two corrections and prepared an additional affidavit but with those exceptions there were no more corrections.

31827

* In his original affidavit of 26 March 1946, he had stated that the subsidy given to the Manchurian Heavy Industry Development Company between 1937 and 1945 was 500,000,000 yen but the more accurate amount was about 300,000,000. Furthermore, in connection with the addresses he heard by the accused ARAKI, and the accused SUZUKI, * the expression of his thoughts was not necessarily accurate and he had made further additions by way of supplement to make the points clear.

31835

* Exhibit 3371, the document identified as being the additional affidavit of the witness, stated that in addition to the testimony he had given on the interrogation of 26 March 1946, he would make the supplementary statement that on one page of it there was inaccuracy due to error in memory. Where he had spoken of the amount of subsidies to the Manchurian Development Company, he had written the total as about 500,000,000 yen but now recollected it was about 300,000,000. Where he had spoken of the addresses of ARAKI and SUZUKI which he had heard, he wished to make an additional statement concerning them. While he was Governor of Akita Prefecture from 1932 to 1935, he attended the Governors' Conferences. At one, which he remembered taking place in 1933, he heard an address by War Minister ARAKI, the gist of which was that Japan had brought about the Manchurian Incident, established Manchukuo, and her interests clashed with members of the League. In that critical period, ARAKI said it was necessary to strengthen defense, internal conditions and secure continental military bases.

Regarding his activities as chief of the general affairs department of Manchukuo, from 1940 to 1945, the department was directly under the Manchukuo premier and all government ministers were under the control of the department, the ministers with the department forming the government.

Responsibility for administration throughout the whole country shifted to the witness and the department vice chief and all vice ministers in Manchuria were all Japanese and under the witness, and met for conferences once a week.

* Drafts of decisions made at the conferences were submitted to the cabinet meetings. As chief of the general affairs department, the witness was directly under the control of UMEZU, C&C Kwantung Army, and after July 24 under General YAMADA.

The C&C Kwantung Army carried out actual guidance of the Manchukuo government. According to rule, the chief of the department met the C&C each Saturday when the department chief reported to the C&C and received instructions. All basic and important matters and measures undertaken by Manchukuo had to be sanctioned by the Kwantung Army C&C.

Besides the C&C there were usually present at the conferences the chief of staff and his deputy, the fourth section chief, and Lt. General MIYAKE, chief of the central headquarters of the Kuo-Wa-Kai Society. MIYAKE also reported to the C&C on important matters pertaining to the society and received instructions from him. Thus the Kwantung Army C&C directed not only the activities of the Manchukuo government, but also those of the society.

In his previous testimony he had enumerated measures carried out by Manchukuo to create a military base for war against the Soviet. To this he added that detailed instructions concerning the measures enumerated were given by UMEZU.

Concerning the Kan-Toku-En plan, in the summer of 1941 the witness visited TOJO in Tokyo and TOJO told him that in connection with the Kan-Toku-En plan it was necessary for Manchukuo to supply the Kwantung Army with necessities.

31840 * The witness received all instructions concerning the realization of these measures from UMEZU and his chief of staff. The 5th section under Colonel IYEDA was organized in Kwantung Army headquarters in 1941, and was engaged in studying an occupational system for Soviet territories it was planning to occupy, and leading Japanese officials of Manchukuo participated in the study.

Concerning the construction of military objects in Manchuria, it was necessary to point out that this had been carried out even prior to the witness's appointment as chief of the department. His predecessor, as general affairs department chief, was HOSHINO, Naoki, who, as to activities pertaining to the construction of military objects in Manchuria as a base against the USSR, acted according to instructions of the Kwantung Army commander and the chief of staff.

31841 Chiefs of Staff TOJO and ITAGAKI tried to carry out measures against the Soviet * and used Manchukuo resources for that purpose. From 1935 to 1938 the witness stayed in Manchuria as chief of the administrative section and then chief of the Kwantung bureau.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY

31844 * When the previous affidavit of the witness was showed to him (Exh. 670) the witness was asked if he stated in that exhibit that the purpose of the Kwantung Army in Manchuria was for defense and the witness agreed that that was what he said. Asked if that was true, he replied that troops were in Manchuria for defense, but to assume a position of an attack to carry out this purpose. Generally after 1944 the Japanese position in Manchuria became purely defensive.

31847 * The witness stated that the affidavit was in his own handwriting and the wording was all his own and in his own language. Asked if where he stated that the aim of Japan's development of Manchuria was to prepare for attack against USSR, if it could be assumed that he misunderstood the question, he replied he didn't think he misunderstood, he had said the purpose for stationing troops in Manchuria was to carry out defense and in doing this to assure a position necessary for offensive action.

31848 The question put to him was whether Japan's ultimate aim was to prepare a base against the USSR and his answer was that inasmuch as Manchukuo resources were to be used for the defensive purposes of the Kwantung Army, he had replied, "Yes." His reason for so replying * was that the army's defensive strategy laid in defensive action against the USSR and he thought it only natural that for defensive purposes the army should assume a position necessary for objective action.

Asked if in the affidavit when he said it was for attack, if he didn't mean that it was not for aggression but for an attack for whenever or whatever it might become necessary, he replied that was his meaning. He became chief of general affairs in July 1940, selected by UMEZU, with him he had not been closely acquainted but he thought UMEZU did know him.

31849 * Asked how he knew who selected him for the post, he replied at the time he assumed the post, the talk with regard to his assuming that office was brought to him by a representative of UMEZU named YUZAWA, Michio, an official of the home ministry. It was an oral request asking the witness to take over the post and he accepted.

YUZAWA did not tell the witness how UMEZU came to select him. The witness had never worked for UMEZU before that time.

31851 From January 1935 to April 1948 he was in the service of the Kwantung government in Hsinking. The last time he was in Manchuria was in 1938, and from date until July 1940 * he was not in Manchukuo but in Japan as vice president of the cabinet planning board. He held that office between January 1939 to January 1940 and during that time had no personal knowledge of what was taking place in Manchuria.

troop strength had increased considerably. Asked if the people who told him about the plan told him that it was a plan for reinforcing the Kwantung Army, he replied that the war between Germany and the USSR broke out 22 June 1941, and immediately after that the plan began. According to this plan the strength of the Kwantung Army was to be increased, although he did not know to what extent.

31864 When he learned of the principle he was very astonished and had entertained * misgivings that an attack on the USSR was imminent, or that an outbreak of war was close at hand. Even among Kwantung Army officials there was a feeling that war with the USSR was close. However, the plan was directed from Tokyo and even if inquiry was made of the Kwantung Army they did not know wherein its purpose lay.

With UMEZU's permission, the witness flew to Tokyo in August 1941, meeting with members of the war ministry, and also War Minister TOJO. He learned from TOJO and other minister members that no war was near at hand, but he was unable to obtain any explanation as to why the plan was being carried out. With regard to the plan, TOJO requested that every effort be made by the Manchukuo government to assist the Kwantung Army in the plan.

31865 * The witness returned and assembling his subordinates told them there was no fear of war in the near future and work in connection with such possibility was abandoned. Inasmuch as he was unable to obtain any explanation as to the purpose of the plan, he made judgments on his own part in carrying out his work, but there must have been significance in the fact that the Kwantung Army was increasing its forces in the vicinity of the Soviet border.

31866 He meant to say that the Kwantung Army had for its purpose the preparation of operations against the Soviet. * It was his belief that the plan must be something calculated to increase the power of attack vis-a-vis the Soviet.

In view of the world situation, he judged that some attack against the Soviet was coming at an appropriate moment, and that the plan was to prepare for such an attack. This was based on his own estimate and judgment. He said that 31867 he understood from the Kwantung Army C&C staff officers that the plan was nothing more than one of reinforcement. Asked if TOJO told him the same thing, he replied that TOJO * did not add any special explanation.

Asked if TOJO did say that reinforcement had been decided to be necessary and was being carried out under the plan, he replied that the army was going to be reinforced and asked that the Manchukuo government give its assistance.

31868 * All requested of the witness by the Kwantung Army after the establishment of the Kantokuen were such that would indicate reinforcement. Asked if he hadn't previously stated that there were Soviet troops on the other side of the border from Manchuria, he replied that he didn't think he said that. He did speak to the effect that he had formed certain conclusions because the Kwantung Army was being reinforced in Manchuria, which had on the other side of its border the troops of the USSR.

31869 * Outside the border of the area on which the Kwantung Army was stationed, it was his personal estimate that there was a pretty large army of the USSR, but he did not know if it was smaller than the Kwantung Army.

31870 * Asked if the Soviet forces on the other side of the border reinforced the summer of 1941 and after, he replied he thought he heard from someone in the Kwantung Army that the strength of the Soviet forces decreased after the summer of 1941, but he was not certain. This information was given by some staff officer. The witness was not given access to the intelligence files of the Kwantung Army and had no information about what intelligence the Kwantung Army had of the Soviet forces facing the Manchurian border.

31871 * He had no knowledge concerning estimates of the power and intentions of those Soviet forces.

31875 * Asked if the purpose of the National Service Law of 1939 was to raise and train a national Manchukuoan army, he replied that at the time the law was enacted he had not assumed his post and did not become director until * 1940, and so was unfamiliar with the circumstances. The Manchurian Army was under the Kwantung Army Commander. The law was enacted for the conscription of Manchukuoans to increase the strength of the national army. He believed the strength required every year was about 25,000, and the full number in the army around 70- to 80,000. The period of service for conscripts was recalled to be three years, * and in that time the entire army personnel was changed.

The witness did not know if the period of actual service was somewhat shorter than three years. Asked if the law provided for reserve service by conscripts after expiration of the three year term, he replied at the time there was none. Asked if under the law, the supreme command in peace time of the Manchukuoan Army was in the Manchukuoan Emperor, he replied that from what he had heard the Emperor did not have the power of supreme command, but that prerogative belonged to the Kwantung Army Commander. Asked where he heard that, he stated that there was a secret treaty between Manchukuo and Japan, whereby the Manchukuoan Emperor delegated the power of supreme command to the Kwantung Army Commander. * He didn't know the date of the treaty, but believed it was in the early days of the founding of Manchukuo.

31877

31878 He had never seen the original or a copy of the treaty, but had heard about it for the first time just after his appointment as Chief of the General Affairs Board, when he called on YANAI of the Foreign Office. YANAI told him there were a number of secret treaties, and among them was the one mentioned. * The witness gained the impression that it was a separate agreement concluded between Pu-Yi and Kwantung Army Commander HONJO.

31879

* He did not hear anything about whether the treaty provided that the Supreme Command of the Manchukuoan Army was the Emperor in peace time. Asked if after the passage of the law in 1939 numerical strength of the army increased, he replied he was not aware of the circumstances just before and after the passage of the law. Asked if it was not his duty as Chief of General Affairs to enforce the law, he replied that the Manchukuo Government did cooperate in the conscription of recruits.

He knew there was an increase in 1939 and subsequent years, and prices and other things rose in those years too.

Asked if he didn't know that the passage of the law did not contemplate increase in the size of the Manchukuo force, but represented only an effort to consolidate and rationalize pre-existing forces in the country, * he replied that before the law's passage he believed the Manchukuo Army was recruited by voluntary enlistment, but by the passage of the law young men of a certain age were compulsorily conscripted. The law therefore had the purpose of strengthening the army, but he did not know whether or how much the army actually increased since 1940. * The greatest increase was in 1943 or 1944, and around those years a plan for increasing annual strength to 40- or 50,000 was begun. The plan was to conscript that number each year, and in three years the army would be well over 100,000. He believed the actual strength was between 80- and 90,000 by the beginning of 1945.

He did not know how much the Kwantung Army strength had been decreased by that time, nor did he know the strength of forces in Siberia then. Asked if the * purpose of the law was to improve the quality of personnel of the army, he replied he supposed one purpose was to improve the caliber, but this was because a future increase in total strength was envisaged. He was not in Manchukuo in 1939 when the law was passed, so what he said was not the result of his personal knowledge, but from his own observation.

31883

* Asked how he knew what his predecessor and the Kwantung Army Chiefs of Staff were doing during the years he was not in Manchuria, he replied that there were many orders addressed to his predecessors from the Kwantung Army in document form and he was able to learn what he was doing from those. Everything of that nature, he knew, was something learned from documents or hearsay.

31884

The witness became Chief of the General Affairs Board the year after the Nomonhan Incident, and thought he could say that Japan went through a bitter experience there. The year after the Incident he went to Manchukuo to serve under UMEZU, and from UMEZU's attitude and from various talks he made, the witness gathered that while he was prepared to take the offensive, his main position was of defense.

31886 * In 1941, when the Kantokuen, the Kwantung Army special maneuver, was taken, he was afraid war with the Soviet was imminent, and in August that year he met TOJO in Tokyo and was assured war would not break out immediately. He learned of the Kantokuen in July 1941, and went to Tokyo in August. TOJO told him that Manchukuo should cooperate with the Kwantung Army in carrying out the Kantokuen, but did not tell him the Kantokuen's real purpose. Even after his return to Manchukuo, UMEZU did not give any special explanation, and he was forced to arrive at his own conclusions.

31887 Since he was not a military man, he did not know about the operational plans of the Kantokuen, and all he was able to learn was by the demands the Kwantung Army made to Manchukuo in connection with the plan. Since Kwantung Army * strength was increased, new barracks were required, more food must be provided, as well as railways and airfields.

31888 * The activities of the 5th Section of the Kwantung Army were very secret, and he never heard about what was done in the section, but there were younger officials in the Manchukuo Government who were helping in the 5th Section's investigations, and thus he was able to get a general picture of what it was doing. He heard from FURUJI, Vice-Director of the General Affairs Board, that the section was concerned with the administration of occupied areas, problems of banking, etc., in the occupied areas. This was all he knew about the 5th Section. He did not know * whether the section also studied questions of military government for territories other than those of the Soviet. He recalled that the 5th section was organized in 1941, and believed it had been dissolved by 1943, but had not been told why it was dissolved.

- Page Asked if these young officials of the Manchukuo Government were leading officials, he replied that by "leading Japanese officials" he meant outstanding officials who were a little more than young.
- 31890 * General MIYAKE was Chief of the Central Headquarters of the Kyowakai from about the end of 1940. He thought he was selected by the Kwantung Army because that army had previously controlled Japanese officials in the Kyowakai. Asked if he didn't know that MIYAKE was selected by the Manchukuo Premier, who was also President of the Kyowakai, he replied that the Kyowakai President was the Manchukuo Premier, and so far as form went the Chief of Central Headquarters was appointed by the society president, but in actuality Premier Chang had no voice in the selection of officers, and it was natural that the Kwantung Army Commander had the final say in selection.
- 31891 Asked if he did not know as a fact that Premier Chang Ching-hui selected MIYAKE for the position in 1940, he replied that it was Chang who actually appointed headquarters' chief, but in reality it was closer to the truth to say that he was appointed by the Kwantung Army Commander.
- 31892 * Since he was not in Manchukuo at the founding of the Kyowakai, the witness could not tell the society's purpose, but its real, final objective was to implant the so-called Japanese spirit in the hearts of the Manchukuo people.
- 31893 During the entire period of his service, the witness was a member of the Central Headquarters Committee of the Kyowakai. It was stated that there were over four million members of the society, but as a matter of fact he thought its actual membership difficult to ascertain. He believed from reading a Russian newspaper some time before that MIYAKE was in the Soviet, but he had not seen him
- 31894 during the time he was interned in the USSR. * He got this information from an internee, who read Russian to him from the newspaper.
- 31896 * About the time of the Manchurian Incident, the witness thought MIYAKE was Chief of Staff of the Kwantung Army and that he retired from active service and returned to Japan a good many years ago. He didn't think that MIYAKE ever subsequently became a Kwantung Army officer. During the time MIYAKE was Chief of Central Headquarters of the Kyowakai, he was not attached to the Kwantung Army.
- 1897 * The witness did not know whether MIYAKE was dead at present.

Page It was not the purpose of the witness to go to Manchuria to prepare for war against the USSR. He had been to Manchukuo in 1935 and 1940, the first time was as Chief of the Policy Section of the Kwantung Bureau, of which he subsequently became chief, and at that time he was a government official of Japan. The second time he became Director of the General Affairs Board as a Manchukuoan official.

31898 * When he went to Manchukuo the second time, Manchukuo had been established to cooperate with Japan for a new order, and he felt the big purpose was to help Manchukuo become a truly independent nation. Since the Manchurian Incident, Manchukuo was considered Japan's lifeline, and he felt it an important task to defend Manchuria and develop Manchukuo as a sound state, and with that thought he accepted the post.

31899 * Manchukuo was where the Kwantung Army was, which was preparing for operations against the Soviet. Since he felt there was great significance in aiding this task as Chief of the Board, when he was approached by UMEZU to assume the post he accepted. The building up of a sound country in Manchuria required that conditions of the people there be improved, and the witness was of the opinion that conditions improved from year to year.

31900 * The number of those receiving secondary education increased considerably, as well as universities and other institutes of higher learning.

31901 Sanitary conditions improved, the quantity of agricultural products increased, conditions of farmers improved, and social services for improvement of conditions for the poor, etc., were expanded, and medical facilities were greatly improved and expanded. These were one of the witness' objectives. * The witness did admit that during his tenure conditions improved, but had no intention of boasting about his own achievements.

Asked if those purposes were to him more or less important than the purpose of preparing for aggression against the USSR, he replied that preparations for operations vis-a-vis the Soviet and improvement of Manchukuo conditions were both sides of the same medal and could not be separated. Asked if in carrying out these objects he was encouraged by the Kwantung Army C-in-Cs, he replied that he was encouraged and exhorted by the Kwantung Army Commander.

Page The witness stated he was first captured by Soviet forces in Hsinking, was sent to Khabarovsk, and recently had been living on the outskirts of Moscow as a civilian internee, equivalent to POW officers except he received no salary. He had never been tried nor charged with any war crime or offense against the USSR, and did not know of having been under investigation. He had been imprisoned while in Soviet custody from 25 January 1946 to 30 May, 1946. * and during that time his affidavit was taken for use in the trial. The affidavit was dated 26 March, 1946. He became a Soviet prisoner on 27 September 1945, and did not know why he had not been repatriated.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. BLEWETT,
Counsel for TOJO.

Reference was made to the amended affidavit where it referred to a visit to TOJO in the summer of 1941. Asked if he wrote the statement in his own hand, he replied * that he remembered having written the affidavit in his own hand. The conversation took place at the War Ministry, but he forgot the date. He believed that no one else was present in the room at the time of the conversation. The visit was official and not personal. TOJO was not Premier at the time, as the visit took place before October 1941.

Asked if he had opportunity to correct the affidavit after it was prepared, he replied he did not feel any necessity for making corrections. * The witness, after seeing the amended affidavit, agreed that where he used the words "Prime Minister TOJO" in connection with the visit of August, 1941, was a mistake and should be corrected to "War Minister TOJO". The witness had not noticed this when he re-read his affidavit. Asked if he wrote the affidavit or if it was written for him, * he replied that in drawing it up he conferred with Col. Ivanov. The first and second points were written on the witness' desire, and the points subsequent to 3 were his replies to Ivanov's questions. A Russian stenographer took down his replies in Russian and they were translated into Japanese, and that was the final form of the affidavit. Other than the phrase corrected, he believed there were no more inaccuracies. The Japanese affidavit he saw was not in his own handwriting, but the typed copy.

31906

* Asked if TOJO spoke to him regarding administrative matters concerning his specific position as State Minister, he replied that TOJO told him, as Chief of the General Affairs Board representing Manchukuo, that Manchukuo should give all possible aid to furthering Kantokuen plans to reinforce the Kwantung Army.

31909

Page The witness had testified that his main purpose in going to Tokyo was to inquire of TOJO whether there was to be war with the USSR, and TOJO said not so. The witness was asked the basis of his statement in the amended affidavit where he referred to TOJO as Chief of Staff of the Kwantung
Army and that he endeavoured to carry out military measures 31910 against the Soviet. * He replied that when he was in Manchukuo he was General Director of the Kwantung Bureau and that was why he knew about it. It was natural that the Kwantung Army Chief of Staff should exert efforts in connection with operations against the Soviet, and he thought there was no doubt that the Chief of Staff did so.

 Asked if, as he had explained before, these operations were purely defensive, the witness replied that he believed the term "purely defensive" was somewhat insufficient, because the terms always implied that the Kwantung Army was always ready to take the offensive.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY DR. TAKAYANAGI,
Counsel for SUZUKI.

31911 * Reference was made to the amended affidavit where he had stated that at the present time he didn't remember the exact wording of ARAKI's and SUZUKI's statements, as many years had elapsed; and where he stated 31912 the main purport of * ARAKI'S and SUZUKI's statements; also, where it was stated that the gist of ARAKI's address was that Japan had brought about the Manchurian Incident 31913 and established the state of Manchukuo, etc. * Asked if this was not entirely different from the final interpretation of the Japanese Government at the time, he replied that it had been said that Manchukuo's establishment was based on the unanimous will of the thirty million people there; but since it had become clear it was Japan that established Manchukuo the witness adopted this expression, because that was actually what Japan did.

 Asked if therefore what he had written was not the purport of what ARAKI said but his own observation, he replied that he wrote the purport of what ARAKI said without bothering to give specific details, but what he meant when he said he wrote the gist of ARAKI's address 31914 was just that. * He did express ARAKI's thoughts.

- 31915 * Asked if it was not unusual for the Conference of the Prefectural Governors to be held at the auditorium of the Toyoma Military School in Tokyo, he replied he
- 31916 * thought there were other instances of this, and he had attended other conferences held there.

It was a custom that on the day the conference was opened for the Premier to make a speech opening it at the Cabinet, but on the following day sessions were held at the various ministries.

The witness did not know an organization called the Servicemen's Assistance Association. Asked to state the names of a few governors attending the conference who heard ARAKI's and SUZUKI's addresses, he replied there were almost fifty governors, and among them those near him were ISHIGURO, AKAGI, and ISHIWARA.

- 31917 * He didn't recall whether KOSAKA attended. Asked if the statement he alleged to have been made by ARAKI and SUZUKI at the meeting was actually their address at the meeting of the Servicemen's Assistance meeting, he replied that was not so. This was at a session of the Governor's Conference held in the auditorium, half as a secret meeting. There were maps of Manchuria and the Soviet in the auditorium.
- 31918 * The witness stated he did not know why he was imprisoned by the Russians. On 24 January, 1946, the Chief of the Internal Affairs Bureau of Khabarovsk State told him he was to be imprisoned, and the following day he was taken to prison.

31919 The witness agreed that he had previously testified that Japanese troops in Manchuria, to realize defensive aims had to take an offensive position, but after 1944 theirs was merely a purely defensive stand.

31920 Asked if he thus drew a distinction in his first affidavit and in the cross-examination between defense and pure defense, he replied by "defense" he meant that * included offense to a certain extent. The word had a broad meaning and the occupation by Japan of Manchuria was also called defense.

Asked if the term included the occupation of territories of other countries by Japan, he replied that when he said "defense with an offensive attitude" that is what he meant. Asked if the working out of conditions of an occupation regime in Soviet territories was also included in the "defensive stand" of the Kwantung Army of 1941 and 1942, he replied that it was. UMEZU was Kwantung Army Commanding General at the time. He had previously testified that when war broke out between the USSR and Germany, Soviet strength in the far East somewhat decreased, and Kwantung Army strength increased.

31921 * Asked if the situation at the Soviet-German front then had any significance with regard to changes in the strength of Soviet and Kwantung Army troops, and what was the 31922 situation for the Soviet, he replied that * he thought the war situation was very unfavorable for the Soviet in their war with Germany. He did not have sufficient knowledge. He did not have sufficient knowledge of how that affected the relative strengths of the Soviet and Kwantung armies.

31924 * The numerous military objectives constructed were on the Soviet-Manchurian border.

31927 * During the period he was imprisoned he was inter-31928 rogated by the head of the Khabarovsk branch of the Ministry of Internal Affairs of the Soviet Union, and * was not told he was charged with anything nor the reason he was put into prison. He supposed suspicion had been cast upon his activities in Manchuria and he was imprisoned for investigation, which was carried on for quite a long time, but at the end of four months he was released and told all suspicion had been cleared.

31932 After giving his name and age, the witness stated that he was presently a POW of the Soviet army. When shown exhibit 833 he identified it as his signed affidavit, that he made the testimony without duress, and that statements therein were true and correct, except that where * he stated that Major AOSHIMA, Ryoichiro, was senior army staff officer, it should be corrected to Major NAKANISHI, Masujiro.

31933 Asked if the Kwantung army staff engaged in working out an occupation administration's system for Soviet territories, he replied that when he assumed his post in Kwantung army headquarters as chief of the code section in August 1943, Major KOBAYASHI explained that under the Kantokuen plan, the fifth section attached to headquarter's staff, was occupied with investigation of the administration of occupied areas. When the witness assumed his post, the fifth section no longer existed, but there was an officer and a few others

31934 * engaged in disposing of the section's remaining business.

The Kwantung army commander at the time was the accused, UMEZU. (The attention of the tribunal was called to pages 8087-9, 8173-4, 23,276-7 where excerpts from the witness' exhibit 833 were read by the prosecution and defense.)

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENFV

31935 * The witness stated that he had no clear recollection of the date of the Anti-Comintern Pact and the Triple Alliance.

31937 * Asked how he knew that certain Japanese propoganda toward the USRR took place at that time, he replied that he did not think his affidavit referred to specific propoganda. He knew what was in his affidavit and he wrote it himself and signed it on 18 May 1946. He saw a copy immediately after his arrival on 16 October this year. He was not a graduate of the army staff college and not eligible to occupy staff positions.

31939 * He knew of the Kwantung Army planning aggression against the Soviet from 1941 to 1945, because he had been told of it from specific persons.

In this war the Kantokuen plan was an important factor and Kantokuen meant Kwantung army special maneuvers. Asked if he hadn't testified that the Kantokuen also applied to the Manchuria and Korean armies, he replied he didn't believe it applied.

31942 * (A discrepancy on this point between his present testimony and the affidavit was referred to the language section.)

The witness was with the Kwantung army from August 1943 to August 1945, and before that was with the Mongolia Expeditionary army force about two and one-half years, which army 31943 * was under the command of the China expeditionary army. There was no connection in the chain of command with the Kwantung army, and the Korea army was independent and not under the Kwantung army command.

During this period from 1940 to 1945, he was a cipher clerk, first in the Mongolia and then in the Kwantung army, and his duties were only that. The Kantokuen plan did not pass through his hands to be deciphered and he had never seen 31944 it as such things were rather secret * and not confided to every officer by only to those whose duties had some connection.

31945 * All he knew about the Kantokuen is that he had been told by some captains and majors long after it went into effect, but those who told him of it knew of it in their line of duty. These informants said that under the jurisdiction of the Kwantung army two new area armies had been organized under the Kantokuen. Asked if the organization of the two new area armies meant that additional divisions, corps, armies were brought into the Kwantung army, or it meant only a reorganization of existing forces in the Kwantung army, he did not know which it meant.

31946 In detail he did not know whether Kwantung army strength was increased as a result of the plan. The Mongolia stationary army had nothing to do directly with the plan, but, as an army direct connection with the Kwantung army, it increased its strength from 40,000 in 1941 to about 70,000 in 1943.

As to preparations by the Mongolia stationary army, in accordance with the plan to open hostilities against the Soviet, first there was a conference of corps commanders, second the suspension of release of soldiers who had completed their term of duty, third, the conversion of cavalry into mechanized units, and fourth, the investigation of the Feisuantaiku desert.

31947 * The army commander was AMAKASU; 26th division commander, SHIBAYAMA; cavalry commander, BABA, and second independent mixed brigade commander, MANO. The meeting was at 5 July 1941, and there were conferences held later about once a year, but he didn't remember exactly the dates.

Asked why he remembered the date of the earlier one and not the later one, he replied it was held immediately after the outbreak of the German-Soviet war and it left quite an impression on him. He believed there was a meeting held the year before this one and it did not follow that they were planning aggression against the Soviet union every year.

31948 * Asked if he had testified to all the things he spoke of in his affidavits as being preparations by the Mongolia occupation army according to the Kantokuen plan for an attack against the USSR, he replied that * he knew the strength of the Mongolia stationary forces had been increased from July 1941 to December 1941 by the addition of 5,000 new troops, and also knew that staff officer NOTANI of the Kwantung army came to their army in September 1941 as liaison officer, which fact he had failed to testify to before.

31950 He didn't believe that the Kantokuen provided the time for attack on the USSR and had heard nothing concerning this. When he said the Kantokuen was effective during 1942 and 1943, he meant the plan had been carried over to 1942 and 1943 and meant the same plan for aggression contained in the Kantokuen of 1941 continued to be the plan for aggression for 1942 and 1943.

31951 * Asked to tell more about the maneuvers held in accordance with the Kantokuen in Manchuria and Korea in 1941, he replied that he assumed his post in August 1943. From the affidavit was quoted to the witness a part which stated that according to the Kantokuen, large scale maneuvers were practiced in Manchuria by the Kwantung army since August 1941, 31952 and it was so also with the Korean army in Korea. Again asked to tell about the maneuvers he replied that he did not know in detail about maneuvers up to July 1943. He did know that in August 1943 * maneuvers in crossing rivers were conducted near Chamussu. Asked if these were not just routine maneuvers, he replied that they were annual maneuvers to train troops for operations under the Kantokuen after army units had been reorganized under the plan.

Asked if he knew what he meant when he wrote in his affidavit that large scale maneuvers were practiced in Manchuria by the Kwantung army since August 1941, he replied that he did know about it, but this was the explanation given by the chief of the code section KOBAYASHI, and he had written it down just as he had explained it.

31953 * The witness had seen maneuvers in Manchuria in August 1943 which was the river crossing operation mentioned. The whole number of troops was approximately three divisions, but he did not know the number maneuvering in the preceding year.

31954 Asked whether there was anything unusual in the scale of the August 1943 maneuvers, he replied it was so. He never saw maneuvers in Korea and what he knew about them was what he was told to him by a major who would explain the details of maneuvers in Manchuria and Korea as the result of the Kantokuen plan from August 1941. He heard from Captain HATTORI that the plan provided for the Mongolia occupation army advance into Zabaikal or Transbaikal as part of the war plan, but he did not know if that was provided in the Kantokuen plan of 1941. He heard this in a conversation with Captain HATTORI who was in the cipher section of the Kwantung army in*Tokyo in early December 1943.

31955 * HATTORI did not say that the plan for the advance into Transbaikal was part of the Kantokuen plan. HATTORI said that simultaneously with the commencement of the relations under the Kantokuen plan, the Mongolian army would advance to the Baikal through the Republic of Outer Mongolia. The plan was never known to the witness in 1941 when he was with the Mongolian army.

He knew lieutenant colonel SEJIMA who testified for the prosecution that he participated in drawing up army plan for the Japanese general staff.

31957 * In June 1941 he saw orders relating to the principles for preparations of orders but never saw the plans themselves or knew of their contents. * Some of his officer friends told him of them and Major MANAI, an intelligence officer, told him the objective of the Mongolian army in case of attack would be Ulanbator and Zabaikal, and the same army would assume an offensive position. Its mission was to cut the Trans-Siberia Railway. That was all this officer told him, and the officer was in the intelligence section of the Mongolian occupation army.

31959 * Asked if it was necessary for such intelligence officers to know about operations plans, he replied that it could be called unusual. He had never been an intelligence or operations officer and there was some distinction between the two. He thought the principles of preparation for operations had something to do with preparation for war against the USSR.

31960 Regarding this, he was visited by KOTANI, the Kwantung army staff officer, in September 1941, * who came to the Mongolian occupation army for liaison purposes. The witness knew this because he deciphered the message announcing his impending arrival. So he did come and meet with the Mongolian army commander but the witness was not present and did not know what was talked about, and was not even told what they discussed.

Asked if he assumed it had to do with plans for aggression against the USSR, he replied that he gathered that impression from the war situation between Germany and Russia and from the general atmosphere.

31961 * Asked if this was one of the facts from which he concluded that the plans for preparation of operations had to do with commencement for war against the Soviet, he replied it was one of the facts, not the actual commencement of war, but preparation for war.

31962 * That sort of liason mission from the Kwantung army was unusual in the Mongolia occupation army, and he recalled it happened only on that one occasion. The next significant fact upon which he based his conclusion was that he was ordered to have his code books ready and this was evidence to him that aggression was planned.

31965 * Captain TSUBOI who told him about the exploration of the Feisuintaiku Desert was commander of the research party which was under the command of of an intelligence officer. Asked how he determined that an expedition for gathering information was either for aggression or for defense, he replied, 31966 * he gained that impression on the situation of the army.

Asked if an intelligence officer commanded the party, if it suggested to him that the party had any connection with operations plans then in existence, he replied that since the commander was a staff officer in charge of intelligence, he believed he must have had some connection with operations.

Reminded that he had stated shortly before that there was a distinction between intelligence and operations, he replied that as far as actual duties of the respective sections went he supposed there was a difference. He was not suggesting that this exploration party committed any attack on the Soviet.

According to what he had heard from the Code Section Chief, Major KOBAYASHI, the aggression to be carried out in the Kwantung Army in 1943 was connected with the Kantokuen plan.

* The Kantokuen not only provided for large-scale maneuvers, but also constituted an operational plan against the USSR. * His superior officer, Lt. Col. He told the witness that the operations plans for 1945 were for the defense of internal Manchuria, and the duty of the Kwantung Army was the defense of Korea.

31974

* it provided that Japanese units along the Soviet-Manchukuo border, especially those facing the eastern and northern fronts, were gradually to withdraw while resisting. At first, border units, especially those on the eastern and northern fronts, were to conduct holding out operations, and a large-scale repulsive operation west of the railway between Changchun and Dairen believed to be the object of the USSR attack. ONO told the witness this at the end of June, 1945, in an anteroom of the staff department of the Kwantung Army.

31975

* He didn't tell where and how he obtained the information, but the witness believed it only natural he would be able to obtain it as he was a first section staff officer in charge of communications. Asked if the communications staff officer would naturally have communicated to him the part of the plans that concerned him, the witness replied that he could not make any statement as to this. These operational plans were of the highest secrecy classification.

31976

* Asked if it was customary for staff officers to gossip to inferiors about matters that were military secret, he replied they were not permitted to gossip, but although it could not be known in all details, still it was possible to learn of the operations plan so far as it related to a certain officer's duty.

* ONO told him the outlines of the plans for 1945 in his capacity as communications section chief to the witness as code section chief in connection with the handling of code plans. * Asked what there was in his duty in connection with ciphers which required ONO to disclose details of the 1945 plans, the witness replied that in connection with codes, its purpose was carried out only in the way it was handled. To connect codes with operations, it was important to establish the time that they are prepared, when they are handed over to units, and how they are used. The handling of codes cannot be done effectively unless the outlines of the operations plans were known. If not done properly, difficulties would occur. Unless a unit has reserve codes in use when surrounded by the enemy, the repetition of codes would defeat their purpose, and this would affect the entire * operational plan. Thus it was necessary for the code officer to be acquainted with at least the outline of the plan.

He was not told the contents of the 1943 operations plan, because then he was not in charge of the code section, but was a subordinate officer. Asked why he was not told the contents of the 1944 plans, he replied that in August 1944 he became code section chief, and he asked the staff officer in charge as to what the situation was, * but the staff officer told him nothing had been decided yet as to the operations plan. This was in August 1944.

31981

asked if in 1945 it was already decided in June, he replied that the Kwantung Army was in difficult circumstances, because from February, 1944, many army units were transferred to the southern areas. He had absolutely no knowledge as to whether there was an operations plan for 1944.

* ONO regularly attended staff conferences relating to operations plans, but the cipher section chief * never attended and was never in the operations room where the plan was kept. All the witness knew about these plans was what he was told by various people. He was never told anything about the contents of the plans by the Kwantung Army Commander, Chief of Staff, or Vice-Chief. Asked if his predecessor, KOBAYASHI, who told him about the Kantokuen plan, knew any more than he did, he replied he did not know the extent of KOBAYASHI's knowledge.

- * KOBAYASHI's position, rank, and background were the same as the witness' when he was section chief.
- 31984 * When the witness was in the Kwantung Army, he thought there was a plan for commencing aggression against the Soviet about the beginning of the winter of 1943, and he
- 31985 * got this information from Lt. Col. TOMURA, who told him all about Imperial Headquarters directives on that matter, but even he did not undertake to tell him when the operations would start, nor did he explain why a lieutenant-colonel who was a liaison officer with the Kwantung Army knew the directives of Imperial Headquarters.

- The strength of the Kwantung Army at the beginning of the winter of 1943 was on the whole about the same as that of the year before, and no divisions had been
- 31986 * withdrawn at the end of 1943, nor tanks. As to aircraft the witness had little knowledge. At the beginning of the winter the Kwantung Army had approximately twenty divisions, two tank divisions, one tank brigade, and an air force, but he didn't recall total manpower. He got these figures officially in line of duty.

- 31988 * The witness had no knowledge as to the strength of Soviet Far East Forces in the beginning of the winter in 1943.

- 31991 * The witness stated that he was an ordinary POW, had never been tried for any war crimes against the USSR, nor charged with any. He was taken prisoner on 5 September 1945, remaining a prisoner ever since, and did not know why he had not been repatriated. He had been told he would be returned to Siberia after testifying.

- 31992 * He had been interrogated about ten times since he had been a prisoner, but had never been imprisoned during his captivity.

- 31994 * The witness stated that he was code officer with Mongolian Stationary Army Headquarters from March 1941 to July 1943, and with Kwantung Army Headquarters from August 1943 to August 1945.

* Asked from whom he heard the secret information about which he spoke in his affidavit and what were the positions of these persons, he replied that he heard from ISSHIKI, Chief Signal Officer of the Mongolian Army in 1941; TOMURA, Chief Signal Officer of the Kwantung Army, and KOBAYASHI, Chief of the Kwantung Army Code Section. With regard to the Kantokuen in 1941, he heard from HATTORI, a Code Section officer of the Kwantung Army.

31996 * The witness gave his name and age, and stated that he was a lieutenant-general of the 3rd Army prior to 31997 the surrender, and was presently a POW. * When shown exhibit 722, he identified it as his signed affidavit, and acknowledged that its contents were true and correct,
and he wrote it voluntarily from his own conscience.

31998 From exhibit 722 was read a question and answer not previously read into the transcript. In the exhibit, the witness was asked the tasks of the Research Institute of Total Mobilization in 1943, and he replied that they were interested in maximum increase of aircraft production and factories, * and set themselves to produce 40,000 aircraft a year. They were also occupied with the problem of increasing vessels, and their goal was a total tonnage of 1,500,000 tons a year.

They were also interested in exports of products from Manchuria, Korea, and from the southern regions of Japan, as there was a shortage of 1,500,000 tons of rice yearly. The question of dispersion of the population and industry in case of air raids was studied, and in the sphere of foreign policy they had the task of studying the problems of consolidation of East Asia countries under Japanese hegemony.

31999 After this question and answer from the affidavit was read the witness was asked if he was Director of the Research Institute of Total War in 1943, and he replied in the affirmative. * When shown a document, he identified it as his signed affidavit written in his own handwriting, and acknowledged that the contents were true and correct.

32008 * Exhibit 3372, the affidavit of the witness, stated that from 8 March 1943 to 20 December, 1943, he was Director of the Research Institute of Total War in Tokyo, which was established by ordinance in the autumn of 1940, and was a government organ for research into the basic problems of total warfare and for training necessary personnel in the ministries for conducting it. The Institute director was under the direct control of the Premier.

Page On the day of his appointment he was received by Premier TOJO, who gave him his written appointment and told him that at present the Institute should make efforts in the study of the national ideology of the Japanese Empire, and to secure ultimate victory it was necessary for Institute students to be imbued with that ideology. In connection with this, YAMADA, Director of Jingu Kogakukan, HIRAIZUMI, * a Tokyo Imperial University professor, and TERAMOTO, a professor of the Naval College, were invited to the Institute.

32009

The Institute received secret materials to carry on research in the problems of total war from all ministries, and students constantly received secret data from their ministries for their researches. The Institute sometimes got definite problems on total warfare from TOJO, but usually itself selected problems. The witness' predecessor as director, Vice-Admiral ENDO, told him in March 1943 that the research in administration of occupied areas of Greater East Asia was personally entrusted by TOJO. This secret research had been completed before the witness assumed the post, and he read it through. Besides this, he read the draft for the establishment of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere, * drawn up by the Institute. This provided for the establishment of a central area, including Manchuria, Soviet Maritime Province, and North China, which would be united by Japan, and a Smaller Co-Prosperity Sphere, including in addition to the above Eastern Siberia, China and Indo-China; and a Greater Co-Prosperity Sphere, which would include besides the Smaller Sphere Australia, India, and Pacific Islands.

Problems of the conduct of the war in the period from 1943 to 1944 were investigated by the Institute under the witness' direction. In his interrogation on 28 March 1946, he had stated the Institute's plans with regard to the increase in aircraft output to 40,000 planes a year, increase in vessels to 1,500,000 tons a year, and other matters.

Draft plans were sent to the Premier and ministries concerned to have them carried into practice. The * War and Navy Ministries were most closely connected with the Institute, and that was why it was headed alternately by a general or an admiral.

When the witness was a director there were about forty students consisting of responsible officials of the ministries of a rank usually equal to major or lieutenant-colonel, and some representatives of banks and companies. At the opening ceremony in April 1943, there were present the accused SUZUKI, Minister of State without portfolio and Planning Board President; Education Minister HASHIDA; and Chief Cabinet Secretary HOSHINO, who participated in the establishment of the Institute in 1940. Department and section chiefs gave lectures.

When the witness was director, theoretical researches and maneuvers were conducted to render practical assistance and data to the Cabinet and ministries. When carrying out these researches and maneuvers, the actual * international and internal situation was strictly considered, and they were based on the real strength and resources of the state.

In the summer of 1943, at a conference of Institute advisors, matters concerning students to be accepted from the ministries in 1944 were discussed and decided on. The accused HOSHINO, as Chief Cabinet Secretary, and vice ministers were present. At the graduation ceremony in December, 1943, TOJO, HOSHINO, and SUZUKI were present, and in his speech TOJO stated that the Pacific War had entered into a decisive phase, and personnel of all ministries must make intense efforts. As regards research this term, it was only a short term and they should not be satisfied with what they had achieved. Although the students were given a firm foundation in national ideology, it should be thoroughly grasped by them. TOJO further stressed that they should endeavour to accomplish the war, firmly believing that Japan would win.

* Due to the personnel shortage, the number was cut by half in 1944, and in that year the Institute was ordered to conduct only researches considered most important by the Cabinet. The Institute closed after TOJO resigned as Premier in 1944.

When shown exhibit 690 and exhibit 638, the witness stated that he had seen them when he was director of the Institute.

32017 The witness stated that during spring, summer, and autumn of 1941 he was on the front lines west of Hankow, Central China, but in September he returned to Japan. The remainder of that year he was at first attached to the army school of military science and technique as its principal from 26 September 1941.

32018 During 1941 he did not attend cabinet meetings nor was he attached to the war ministry or the foreign ministry. * He did not attend the liaison conferences the summer and autumn of 1941. Asked how he knew so much then about Japanese-American diplomatic questions, he replied he was informed by NISHIMURA of the total war research institute in the spring of 1943 when the witness was institute director. NISHIMURA came from the foreign office and told the witness on 17 April 1941 that a reply had come from the United States that if Japan would 32019 * withdraw her troops from China, the United States would recognize Manchukuo's independence, approve of its economic development, and use its good offices in prevailing upon Chiang Kai-shek to bring about a settlement with China.

This information was imparted at a meeting of research students, which was a sort of lecture. His informant, before coming to the institute, was with the treaty bureau of the foreign office, and he thought he was officially connected with the Japanese-American negotiations.

32020 Asked what the provisions of Article 95 of the criminal code of the R.S.F.S.R. were * he replied he thought they corresponded with what was known in Japan as perjury. Asked what he was told by the Russian interrogator about penalties for making a false statement, he replied there was nothing said in particular, * but he believed it was common among all nations that there was no penalty and he was testifying what he believed to be the truth without any concern with penalties whatsoever.

32022 * Nothing in particular had occurred since he became a POW to affect his mind or memory and his health had been good. He heard that in 1942 there was a plan of attack on the Soviet Union from Manchuria when he took over his post as commander 32023 of the third army * but he did not hear it previously.

His predecessor was General NEMOTO. From the fall of 1944 the duty of the third army was purely defensive, but previously it was to take the offensive in the direction of Page Voroshilov, and that was all he learned. The plan up to 1944, including that for 1943, was offensive.

- 32024 * He did not know what the 1943 plan provided. Asked if he meant that his predecessor told him of the 1942 plan and not the 1943 plan, he replied no. What he meant to say was the plan changed from the offensive to the defensive in 1944, and up to that year the offensive plan continued throughout several years. He knew that operations plans were drawn annually so far as demands were concerned, but he was trying to say that the general offensive policy continued through those years. Reference was made to his affidavit where it was stated that he knew in 1942 there was a plan for an attack on the Soviet from Manchuria. Asked if that was not a plan rather than a policy, he
- 32025 replied it was an offensive plan, but the year 1942 * merely cited the general standard when the plan was in effect, but didn't mean that an offensive plan was confined only to 1942.
- 32027 * He thought the 1942 plan for an attack was a routine operations plan and the routine plan for 1943 similarly contemplated a plan for attack, which the third army planning an attack in the direction of Voroshilov, in accordance with the 1943 plan.
- 32028 * Aside from the third army, he heard nothing about what other armies were to do under the plan. He did not think there was any time set for the attack and had never heard under any plan of a time being set, for the plan was that if hostilities broke out within the year, the plan was to go into operation and there could not possibly be a plan as to attack or not to in a certain year. The understanding and instructions were that these plans were the annual plan to go into effect in the event of hostilities for whatever cause.
- 32029 * The increase in the strength of the Kwantung army took place from summer to fall of 1941. Asked how he knew of it, he replied that he did not directly participate in this plan. But while commander of the third army he inspected his area and heard explanations to that effect. He thought the Kwantung army
- 32030 was reinforced in 1941 to 700,000, * but did not know how many more were added at the time of reinforcement to bring it up to that total. Asked if this increase in strength gave the numerical superiority to the far east Soviet force, he replied he thought the Kwantung army's forces were inferior but did not know how much so.

32031 According to rumours at least, the strength of the Soviet forces in the far east was at least 800,000. * After the reinforcement there were around 13 or 15 divisions in the Kwantung army. After he took command of the third army in 1944, Kwantung army strength steadily decreased in quality and quantity, and consequently there was no chance to take the defensive and they were compelled to assume the defensive. This decrease commenced from around February 1944.

32032 * This 1941 reinforcement was the so-called Kantokuen, but he did not know if the Kantokuen resembled a war plan. The witness stated that he was a military general but had never participated in an operational plan. He was not a rather well-known author on military subjects, having only written a book on the principles of warfare entitled "Senso Yoron," quite a long time before. Asked if he wrote a book known as "Tosui Sankosho," he replied this was work * undertaken at the war college while he was there. It was not written by him but compiled on the basis of studies made by instructors under his supervision, and was not published under his name as author.

32034 Asked if he had been a specialist on Russian matters throughout his army service, he replied that he had not once gone to the second division of the general staff headquarters in connection with a study of Russian problems, and was not a specialist but could read and speak Russian. * When he was an instructor in military schools, he did not teach subjects connected with Russia, but only taught the history of war and tactics.

32035 * He had not taught Russian military tactics as such, but when he taught Japanese tactics he used Russian tactics as illustration in the military staff college for example. Asked if he meant to suggest that in the staff college instruction was not given in military history and tactics of other nations, as well as Russia's, he replied that he taught principally Russian tactics vis-a-vis the Russian army, especially in connection with the history of the Russo-Japanese war as well as the military history of Germany and Austria.

Asked if it was not a fact that instruction was given in military history and tactics of other nations, as well as 32036 Russia, he replied, yes * that German, Austrian, and French military history, among others, was taught. He had never given lectures on the subject of Russian questions. Asked if it was to be understood from his affidavit that his teachings were that Japan must engage in an aggression to conquer territories in future wars, he replied that that was not his meaning, what he meant to say was that fundamentally the Japanese are a peaceful people, but they could not long exist in the narrow confines of these small islands, and it was necessary that they expand overseas, particularly on the Asia continent.

32037 When influences obstructed this expansion, war broke out because of these reasons. * Furthermore, to carry on warfare, natural resources are essential and must be utilized, as shown by the late war. It was necessary to bring from the continent large quantities of iron, coal and cereals, and as far as Japan was concerned, it was necessary that she have a strong foothold on the continent politically, economically, and militarily. Therefore Japan strategically must always point to the offensive and that was what the cold facts testified that it was on this basis he taught the history of the war.

32038 Asked if it was to be understood from his answer that his teaching was not that Japan must engage in aggression to conquer territories, he replied that as he said before, overseas expansion was necessary and, while undertaking it, war might possibly occur, if it did Japan must take the offensive and gain control of said strategical and vital areas. * This is what he taught his classes.

32039 The Japanese army regarded the Red army as a future enemy. There were no other land powers with modern and efficient armies so placed that they might offer the prospect of land warfare with Japan. The "Red Book" testified to was an infantry manual for combat against the Soviet. He did not have an exact recollection as to its title, but thought it was, "Method of Combat vis-a-vis the Soviet Army." * He had forgotten the details of the contents of the book, * but the instructions on tactics in it were applicable both to the offense and defense. He thought it was published in 1933.

Asked if he hadn't had in his affidavit that it was founded on Soviet battle service regulations of 1936, he replied that that meant that Soviet publications were used as reference when the book was revised in 1937 or 1938.

32041 MUTO was inspector general up to September 1932. Asked if he hadn't said in his affidavit that the book was issued when he was inspector general, he replied that he did not say it was published, but that during MUTO's time the book had been prepared, publication was some time after. *The book was published during the tenure of MUTO's successor as inspector general of military training. He had stated in his affidavit, in regard to the total war research institute, that he received instructions by TOJO, when he was appointed director he carried out these instructions.

32042 * The witness' chief interest was in spiritual training and education, and among the lecturers, was the director of the Shinto institute and a well-known Shinto scholar. He did not mean that the institute dealt with Shintoism and Buddhism, but to understand the fundamental character of the Japanese state, it was necessary that the subject be studied from a broad angle and therefore authorities on Shintoism and Buddhism were * invited to contribute their knowledge. All the lecturers named in the affidavit came to him and lectured by request of the institute, * and the various state ministers mentioned came at the express request of the institute, or himself as director, and only attended on ceremonial occasions on invitation by the institute.

There were several students from various civilian organizations among the student body, commencing in April 1943. Generally they pursued the same course as the others, but they handled different subjects in accordance with their respective specialties, and this was true of all students.

32045 * Materials were accessible to them in accordance with their personal desires. Among the students from civilian organizations were at least two from newspapers, and they also had access to the materials, secret or otherwise, of the institute. There were three students in that class from the army. One, a medical officer, and one an intendance officer.

32046 *It could not be said they had no connection with operations.

Asked if these officers had some special function bringing them in contact with operational matters, he replied that as a question of principle, the institute did not study operational matters, but a study of various problems in connection with operations was made, and medical and in'dendance officers were necessary in these studies.

32047 ARISUE, who came as a lecturer at the request of the institute, was chief of the intelligence section of the general staff, * and his lectures were on general information on the current war situation. Colonel NISHIURA, chief of the military affairs bureau, did not speak about this military situation but the war as viewed from the standpoint of military administration.

32048 The witness stated that he was captured by the Soviet forces in August 1945, and asked he had been a POW since, he replied that the Japanese government says he is not a POW but he was receiving treatment as one. He had not been tried for any crime or offense against the USSR or charged with the commission of such. * He had not been informed he was under investigation on suspicion or committing war crimes against the USSR, and he knew of no reason why he had not been repatriated.

Asked whether this document was ever presented to the government, he replied it was dated prior to his tenure as director and he could not say, but customarily such drafts would be presented to the cabinet and government departments concerned.

He could not say whether the government took action on this document inasmuch as he was not there at the time. Asked whether from his experience he could state whether the document was prepared for the use of the students, he replied, "No, this was a result of the study made by the 32051 * students and later on were used as reference for future studies and as reference for organs which would carry out the matters contained in the study. The institute had no responsibility in formulating national policies but its purpose was only study and education. Whether any studies were adopted by the government depended on the government's discretion.

32052 Asked how this study came to reach the cabinet as the certificate of source and authenticity showed, he replied that such documents were not only kept in institute files, but also circulated to cabinet and government departments concerned. In the last of such documents, he believed this document too was sent to the cabinet * and other government agencies. The witness stated he was appointed to the institute of total mobilization and warfare by the emperor.

This institute and the research institute of total war were identical. Asked if there was a different organization formed after December 1941, he replied that as far as war guidance was concerned, the total war research institute was established to make studies relating to this subject, but as to other aspects of war, he believed other organizations studied these special subjects.

32053 * Asked if the institute practically ceased its functions before December 1941, he replied the institute was 32054 reorganized in 1943 and abolished in 1944. * Asked if he noticed that there were three periods of study through 1940-41 when he took over his duties in 1943, he replied yes that the first period ended in 1941, the second 1942, and the third 1943, which was the last class.

32055 Asked if a practically new organization was set up after the war to aid with that war, he replied that that probably was the supreme council for the direction of war that was referred to. Asked if the institute in 1943 and 1944 was primarily interested in studies * pertaining to the Pacific war, he replied it dealt primarily with the fundamental character of the state and the resolute prosecution of the war.

He never heard that after the abolition of the institution, its documents were sent to the Cabinet archives, but he imagined that would be the case.

32056 * When shown exhibits 690-A and 688-A, the witness was asked to state whether those studies were made under TOJO's direction. He replied that what TOJO requested was this document, and his request was that a general study be made as to the administration of occupied areas.

32057 * He thought defense counsel had not questioned him regarding the document worked out in accordance with instructions by TOJO. Asked what part was played by lectures on spiritual education and what part was played by the research work carried out under his guidance, he replied that there was the question of proportion between spirit and matter, and the question of the national concept of the state was taken as a spiritual study, but from the point of view of quantity, more work was done.

October 30, 1947

32060 * During his tenure, research on a northern problem was not conducted, but he knew that researches regarding the administration of areas to be occupied in Siberia were carried out before he assumed his post.

32061 * Main subjects of research were sent to the Cabinet and principal government offices, and their main results were also sent there, numbering about fifteen. He believed copies were sent to the Cabinet and the offices, and not returned.

Asked if the government had any measures in connection with drafts and plans drawn up under his supervision by the Institute in 1943, he replied he had heard that plans to increase aircraft production were taken up by the government, and that in the spring of 1944 the government realized their policies to adapt national livelihood to stringent conditions.

32062 * Among the banks which sent representatives was the Bank of Japan, and among the companies were coal companies and chemical industries in Korea. The purpose was to utilize the experience gained in the course of their operations and to enable them to cooperate with the government after they left the Institute. He had mentioned two officers previously as being among the students, and the third was NAKAMURA, of the Military Affairs Section. 32063 Asked if the students had access to secret files of any ministry inside the ministry building, he replied * all material necessary to conduct researches obtained by the Institute from the secret files of various offices was available to the students.

32064 When he had testified previously that the Kwantung Army consisted of 700,000 men at the end of 1941, that number did not include the Manchurian National Army nor the Army in Korea. * The Korean Army numbered over 50,000, and the Manchurian National Army something under 100,000. There were Japanese ex-servicemen in these areas, and if they were mobilized total strength would be increased. He believed there must have been over 150,000 reservists. If these various forces were added to the strength of the Kwantung Army, it would come to about one million.

32065 * Asked if there were any changes in Soviet strength in the Far East in 1941, he replied that after the outbreak of the Soviet-German war, crack Soviet units were sent to the Western front, and they heard that to replace these some new soldiers were mobilized but that their quality was quite below par. Asked if the reserve corps was prepared to reinforce Kwantung Army strength with an additional number of men in the shortest possible time, he stated he had never heard of that officially, but as a matter of common knowledge he thought they were so prepared.

32066 Asked if the proportion of armed forces in 1941 changed in favor of Japan, he replied he could not say * whether Japanese numerical strength was absolutely superior, but knew it was far more favorable to Japan than before the outbreak of the Soviet-German war.

 Asked if he was the author of "Senso Yoron" (The Theory of War), published in 1925, he replied that it was published by the Military Staff College, and pertained to research he made by order of the school director.

RECROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY.

32067 * Asked if the estimates he had given before on the strength of Soviet forces in the Far East included reserves, he replied he did not know whether reservists were included. He learned this figure from research materials assembled by the General Staff Department. He had heard that Soviet forces were still superior in aircraft and mechanized units, but did not remember the extent of superiority.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF BATARSHIN, Gilfan A.
by Colonel Smirnov.

32070 The witness stated his name, and that he was a major, and Hero of the Soviet Union, and was an officer of the Border Guard Corps. He had served in the 59th Border Guard Unit, guarding a sector in the border of the Lake Khasan area. * He received his decoration of Hero of the Soviet Union for participation in military operations in the Lake Khasan area.

32071 When shown exhibit 756, the witness identified it as his signed affidavit and stated that its contents were true and correct. A part of the exhibit not previously read into the transcript stated that from 1936 to 1938, the * witness was Section Commander of the 59th Frontier Detachment, guarding the Manchurian frontier, including the Lake Khasan area.

On July 15, 1938, while on patrol on Zaozernaya Hill, he observed Japanese troops concentrating in the vicinity of the hill. Within ten or twelve days, troops and guns were brought up by truck from the frontier in front of the hill. He estimated about 6- 700 Japanese soldiers were concentrated there, and that two batteries were mounted on two hills. To the hills shells were carried daily, being passed hand to hand. At that time there were only thirty frontier guards on Zaozernaya Hill, and no other Soviet troops in the vicinity.

32072 The Japanese forces had the object of attacking Soviet territory. Not only was the concentration of * troops and artillery a proof of this, but also direct declarations of the Japanese command made through their emissaries. Twice during this period local Manchurians were sent to the Russian frontier guard detachment with letters from the Japanese commander, in which immediate withdrawal of Soviet guards from the hill was demanded. In the letters it was pointed out that the hill was to be occupied by the Japanese, and had a threat of military operations in case Soviet troops did not withdraw. No reply was given by the guards.

32073 * On 29 July, 1938, at 16 hours, Japanese troops suddenly attacked a neighboring guard of eleven men. About 100 Japanese with rifles, medium and light machine guns, opened fire after the attack, at about 700 meters from the witness' detachment.

The commander of the witness' outpost sent the witness with four guards to help. The witness approached the scene of battle and saw all Soviet guards lying wounded, unable to resist, whereas the Japanese slashed the wounded and tried to drag some away to their territory. With a light machine gun, the witness opened fire and the Japanese ran toward their territory, leaving the dead and wounded. The witness found five corpses slashed from head to foot, and six badly wounded with slashed wounds.

* On the night of 31 July, 1938, about midnight, a large Japanese force attacked Zaozernaya Hill. The Soviet guards had given no reasons for an armed conflict in either of these attacks. The witness, in general, did not know of a single case of trespassing the border by Soviet guards during his service with the frontier guard.

According to his observations, the hill was attacked by about one infantry regiment with a simultaneous use of artillery and mortar fire. At the moment of the attack there were about 30 frontier guards and a platoon of field forces of 30 men. Until dawn they held the hill, suffering 15 to 20 killed and the rest wounded, and the witness himself was slightly wounded. They left the hill at six the next morning when the witness saw Japanese * soldiers come to the crest of the hill and wave blades. The following days they built fortifications on Soviet territory.

From 6 August, 1938, Soviet units launched an offensive, and by August 12 had driven Japanese off Soviet territory and stopped on the former state frontier. Of the frontier guards who defended the hill with the witness, he remembered Major Chernopjatko and Chief of the Guard Outpost Tereshkin.

In the period when the Japanese concentrated their forces toward the hill, he observed that they turned the inhabitants out of the village of Hamoka at the foot of the hill, stationing their troops there. This was approximately between July 20-25, 1938.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. FURNESS.

* From 1 to 31 July, he was in command of a section of the Soviet frontier, and the section had seven men. His rank at the time was section commander. He was not under Chernopyatko, but was under platoon commander Dubovoi. He was under the general command of Tereshkin.

 32078 * This border guard outpost was a part of the Posiet Border Guard Detachment. The frontier outpost was located near Podgornaya, and headquarters of the detachment was at Posiet, about 20 or 25 kilometers from Zaozernaya Hill. Tereshkin had no headquarters. The 32079 * outpost near Podgornaya was about one kilometer from the town.
- The Border Guard Corps was not a part of the police organization, but an independent corps under the Ministry of Home Affairs. It was not a civil organization, but military, and a part of the N.K.V.D., formerly the 32080 G.P.U. * The Border Guard Outpost usually had rifles and light machine guns, but the Outpost Podgornaya under Tereshkin also had heavy machine guns, and there was no larger armament.
- 32081 * He saw the forces on the other side of the border and knew they were Japanese regulars. Prior to 32082 * July, 1938, he did not see the Japanese border guards there. Prior to the fighting in and around Lake Khasan, he was in this sector approximately 17 or 18 days and had 32083 served there as a frontier guard prior to this at Posiet in the reserve groups. * From 1936 through 1938 he repeatedly was in the vicinity of Zaozernaya Hill, carrying out duties there, and as a border guard he was familiar with that sector. There were hills between the first border mark on the Tumen River and south of Lake Khasan.
- 32084 * When shown exhibit 2175, a map of the vicinity, the witness was asked if it was an accurate representation of the border country around Lake Khasan and Lake Zaozernaya, 32085 * and he replied that approximately, it was the same. The witness marked the border between the Soviet and Manchuria on the map.
- Exhibit 3375, a photostatic copy of an original tracing of the map, exhibit 2175, was received into evidence.
- 32088 * Exhibit 3373-A, an original tracing of a map, (Exhibit 2175), was received in evidence. The witness 32089 marked on the map Zaozernaya Hill and Bezjinjannaya Hill, * and the village of Podgornaya.
- 32092 * The witness stated he noticed where he had marked the border, and when asked if the border marks were quite far apart, he replied he remembered that the border mark was not far from the border guard outpost on the bank of the Tumen River.

The next border mark was further to the north, about 7 or 8 kilometers. There were a few border marks in rough hilly country, but they showed clearly enough to state border line.

32093 * Asked if there were flat places between the hills, he replied that the border line passed along the crest of Zaozernaya Hill, then west of Benzimjannaya Hill, and then to the flat country, and then to the big hills to the north. There was a whole range of unnamed hills along the crest of the border line. Between the two named hills and south or southeast to the border mark there were rivers, but no flat places. The flat places were only near Lake Khasan, northeast of Zaozernaya Hill. * There was no flat top on Zaozernaya Hill. The crest was approximately 200 meters, and there were no peaks. The state border line passed along the crest of the hill.

32095 * For a border guard there was no difficulty at all on which side of the border he was, for studying the country after they arrived at the outpost they could tell on that basis, and he could tell without difficulty where the border line passed.

32096 * During July and August in the vicinity of the hill there were no dense fogs. Prior to July 31 there were no Red Army field troops in the area of the hill, and from mid-July there were only 30 border guards armed with rifles, three light machine guns and one heavy machine gun.

32097 He did not know if the inhabitants of the region west of Lake Khasan and the Hill were chiefly Korean. He did not speak Korean, nor read nor write it. * He did not know whether Lake Khasan meant "border lake" in Manchurian.

There was a railway in Korean or Manchurian territory over the Tumen-Tula River. He could not say exactly, but he thought it passed from Manchuria into Korean territory. He did not know whether the territory across the Tumen-Tula River from Zaozernaya Hill was Korean or Manchurian.

32098 * "Bezjimjannaya" Hill means "no name" in Russian. Asked if there were many hills in the region with no name called Bezjimjannaya Hill, he replied the hill which had more sharp contour than the others was called that name, and it was not a general term.

- Page Reference was made to his affidavit where he testified that from July 15 on he observed Japanese concentrations in the vicinity of the hill and he estimated there were 600 or 700 there, with Japanese batteries on some of the hills. Asked if he reported this to his superior officers, he replied * that his superior officer saw what was going on, and he supposed this officer had to report that, but he did not know what he reported. The witness saw this concentration with his own eyes.
- 32099
- Asked if there were Soviet spies in Manchurian territory, he replied as a soldier he did not know about such things. He supposed the caliber of the Japanese batteries was 75 or 100 millimeters. * Their caliber was not 37.5 mm. Asked who told him that, he replied he felt it on his own skin on the night of July 31.
- 32100
- Asked what he observed in the ten or twelve days after July 15, 1938, he replied that at that time he saw from the hill, Japanese forces crossing the River Tumen-Tuly, and these were not short-range guns. He saw this on the eastern slopes of the hill. * The crest had western and eastern sides. He was on the eastern side, and saw it from the observation post with a periscope. At different times the distance from the crest varied, but sometimes was two meters away.
- 32101
- Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that during this period he observed the Japanese turn the inhabitants of Hamoka village out. He observed this not far from the summit of Zaozernaya Hill. The village was at the foot of the hill, about 300 meters * from the summit. He saw what was going on in the field, and at night heard very clearly what was going on. The next morning he found that the inhabitants had been moved out and Japanese troops moved in.
- 32102
- Reference was made to the affidavit where it appeared that the Posiet Detachment reported that the inhabitants staged a demonstration. The witness stated he had not observed that. * He reported the evacuation of the village to his immediate superior.
- 32103
- When asked if the building of these entrenchments and evacuation of civilians was all within the borders of Manchuria, he replied that they were concentrating in Hamoka village, and to the northwest of the village there was a hill on Manchurian territory where the Japanese mounted guns and artillery batteries, from which they later fired upon them.

- 32105 * This long range artillery was west of the Tumen River. From the western bank of the River during the fighting of July 31, long range batteries of heavy caliber were fired and one battery on an armored train opened fire several times. This was on the night from
- 32106 July 30 to the morning of the 31st. * Asked if the building of trenches and barbed wire and evacuation of civilians between the river and hill was done because fighting was expected, he replied that the Japanese apparently constructed these fortifications and mounted guns on the hill for the purpose of starting the offensive. His conclusion was that the Japanese would open an offensive and later experience showed he was right for they did start one on the night of July 31.
- 32107 Asked if there was any Soviet firing on Japanese before 29 July, * he replied that there were no Soviet forces in the area of Zaozernaya Hill, only border guard units.
- 32108 About July 15 or 16 there was a case when border guards killed or shot one of the local population who violated the border south of the hill. He penetrated 30 meters into the Soviet territory, began to take pictures and make notes. After this took place, Commander Teroshkin sent two border guards to detain him. The witness heard them cry "halt" but he started running toward Manchurian territory. * Because he did not stop, they shot and killed him on Soviet territory. His body was taken to the foot of the hill and the witness saw the corpse and the camera and notebook with notes made by him. In no other case did guards open fire on the local
- 32109 population. * This took place about 300 meters south of Zaozernaya Hill and he penetrated almost to the bank of Lake Khasan. He did not know whether the man's name was MATSUSHIMA nor whether he was a gendarme.
- 32110 The witness was reminded that in Exhibit 753, there was a report from the Soviet attachment that early in the morning of the 23rd, Section Leader Zhavgorodnin located four Japanese and Manchurian soldiers and fired on them with a machine gun. The witness stated he knew nothing about this report. At the time the man was shot to which he had testified, the witness was on the hill. The witness stated that he knew Capt. Magalov mentioned in Exhibit 753. * Magalov was a border guard, commander of the reserve unit, and during the fighting of July 29 to 31, he was in Soviet and participated.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that regarding the delivery of letters from the Commander of the Japanese Detachment demanding withdrawal of frontier guards from Page Zaozernaya, the witness was told that Exhibit 753 stated that Magalov was sent forward as a result of seeing four Japanese-Manchurian soldiers who escaped, but found a letter at the place where they had been seen, which stated * that on July 16, a letter was sent in the district of the long island. It was ordered that this letter be immediately answered and that they immediately withdraw from Japanese territory in the Lake Khasan area, and if not the situation would become grave.

32111

They were always ready to start negotiations and wanted to know the opinion of the others. Asked if this was the same letter to which he referred in his affidavit, he replied that he personally did not see at what place those four from the local population carrying the letter were detained * but he personally heard from the unit commander that some of the local population were held up and that they carried the letter in which the Japanese were threatening. The witness was reminded that it appeared from the report that they were not local population but four Japanese and Manchurian soldiers, but he stated that he heard they were from the local population from Commander Tereshkin. The contents of the letter about which he had heard was on the same line as the contents of the letter read from Exhibit 753, but he couldn't say positively that the gist was the same. Asked what was done with those who carried the letters, he replied that he didn't see the trespassers himself and couldn't state positively who they were. Told that the * report would indicate they carried a white flag and asked if he knew anything about that, he replied he did not personally observe the occasion.

Asked if the Soviet troops dug entrenchments prior to July 29, he replied they did not make trenches or any constructions in the area of Zaozernaya Hill, nor barbed wire, because there was no necessity for the latter. All the time through July 31, there were only 30 border guards on the hill.

32114 * Asked if it was correct that even after messages had been sent back outlining a concentration of 600 to 800 Japanese troops, building of fortifications, evacuation of civilian population, receipt of threatening messages, there remained only 30 civilian troops without fortifications, barbed wire, and armed only with rifles, light machine guns and one heavy gun, the witness stated that there were no troops in the area except border guards and on the hill only 30. From the standpoint of this border guard duty, 32115 * that was quite a considerable unit which could detain a large number of the enemy.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that on 29 July 1938 at 4 p.m. a clash involving a hundred Japanese soldiers occurred, and that the witness came up with reinforcements.

NARRATIVE SUMMARY OF THE RECORD

30 October 1947

SOVIET RELATIONS

BATARSHIN -- Cross

Page The witness stated that on 29 July he was on Zaozernaya Island * 32116 and more than a hundred Japanese attacked the hill.

32117 * The clash began in Soviet territory on the Bezimiannaya 32118 Hill where only 11 border guards were stationed. * Prior to July 32119 29, there were no clashes in the area * and on July 29 there was only one clash at about 4:00 p.m., and not two.

The witness was told that Exhibit 753 reported a clash at 4:00 p.m. on July 29 on a no-name hill on the frontier two kilometers north of Zaozernaya Hill, and a further clash on a no-name hill 1,000 meters northwest of Zaozernaya Hill. Asked if that report was correct, he replied he did not know to what report the question referred to, but as an eye witness he could say that on 29 July at 4:00 p.m. there was one clash on Bezimiannaya which was the same as no-name hill. He thought this was about 700 32120 to 800 meters from the top of Zaozernaya. * When it started the witness was on the eastern slope of the hill and from there could see the summit of no-name hill. He saw how the Japanese concentrated their forces across the border-line, using the ravines close to the line. That day there was a slight drizzle, but the hill was clearly seen. There was no dense fog. He clearly saw the movements of the soldiers and how they waved the blades of their 32121 sabers and cut Soviet guards. * He could not say there was a fog.
There was a slight drizzle and the Japanese did not move under cover of fog but used the ravines, allowing them to approach closer to no-name hill.

Asked who ordered him to come up with reinforcements, he replied that he and four guards were dispatched by Tereshkin to Bezimiannaya Hill to rescue the guards there. About 200 meters from the hill he opened fire. From the site of the Zaozernaya outpost, another group of guards approached and by joint flank movement they repulsed the Japanese from their territory and afterward the witness arrived at the place of the clash and saw 32122 that all 11 of the Soviet guards were stabbed. 5 were dead * and the others heavily wounded. His unit, in connection with the other unit, drove out the Japanese.

32123 * Asked if after the clash, the number of border guards on the hill remained the same, except for the killed, he replied that the number did not increase.

32124 The next clash occurred on the night of July 31, * involving one regiment reinforced by artillery, but he did not know the details nor did he know how many men were in the Japanese Infantry Regiment.

Page Asked if he wanted the Tribunal to believe that 30 guards, of which 15 or 20 were killed at the start of the attack, held the hill for 6 hours, he replied that his group had no casualties on the 29th. After the fighting on the 29th the witness returned to 32125 Zaozernaya Hill * and participated in the fighting for the hill on the night of July 31. On the night of July 31, during the fighting, 30 Soviet regular troops approached and by the moment of the clash, 32126 this platoon * participated. Thus, about 1:00 or 2:00 o'clock at night, besides the 30 border guards, this regular platoon participated in the fighting.

32127 * The witness was reminded that in his affidavit he said that at 6:00 o'clock he saw Japanese soldiers on the crest of the hill. Asked if this was the first time he saw them there, he replied in the morning he saw them on the crest, waving their sabers, but during the night he was engaged in fighting on the eastern slopes of the hill.

The Japanese attacked from the southern slopes, penetrating to the rear of their territory and fighting flared up in the immediate rear of the Soviet sector.

32128 In general, the witness had never seen Japanese soldiers on the hill crest before 6:00 o'clock in the morning. Soviet forces were on the eastern slopes. As the border ran along the crest of the hill, they were not allowed to trespass in accordance with instructions.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that during the whole time of his service in the frontier detachment, there was not a single case of a breach of the frontier by detachment guards.

The witness was informed that the Soviet prosecutor had earlier in the case asked a defense witness if as a military man he understood certainly that during the course of fighting some definite line could have been violated by any of the parties (T. 22731).
32129 The witness was asked his own answer to that. * He replied that border guards were categorically forbidden to trespass the border and during the fighting were forbidden to violate it. They were 32130 forbidden * not only from trespassing but also when compelled to use arms against trespassers, should fire so that bullets would not fall on the neighboring territory. Since fighting was going on on the eastern slopes of the hill, violation of the border by Soviet guards was out of the question. He thought Tereshkin was in action until 5:00 o'clock in the morning since after that hour he could not command since he had been heavily wounded.

- 32131 * Asked if he had at any time discussed his testimony with Tereshkin, he said he had not seen Tereshkin for about two years, had never read his testimony, never spoken to him specifically, but simply made a general outline of what was well known to both. Since both participated, the witness presumed Tereshkin knew as much as he did, and neither could get anything from the other. Both affidavits were taken on the same day but not at the same hour. The witness came to Tokyo with Tereshkin. Asked if during
- 32132 the trip they discussed their testimony, he replied * no, that he didn't think it necessary. There was no need to mention it because the witness knew as much about the battles as he did.
- 32133 * REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY COL. SMIRNOV
- The witness stated that he knew approximately where Manchurian territory started and where Korean territory was. He had shown on the map the border mark where the three border lines of Manchuria, Korea and USSR crossed. Therefore, he hadn't been able to answer precisely how the border line passes farther between Manchuria and Korea. If he had been shown a map, he could show exactly where the territory of the different states was, but not from memory. The territory in front of Zaozernaya Hill was Manchurian.
- 32135 * When shown a map, Exhibit 2175, the witness marked the Soviet border outposts in the area which subsequently became the scene of the fighting. He marked two outposts, one on the eastern slopes of Zaozernaya Hill, and another on Bezjimjannaya Hill. He
- 32136 did not remember when these outposts were established. * He knew they were guarded prior to his arrival in the border detachment and during his tenure he was at them several times guarding the border in that area. He arrived at the Posiet Detachment in 1936. So far as he knew, the border in that area was guarded prior to his arrival.
- 32137 * The witness marked on the map the place where he was prior to the outbreak of the fighting in July, and with an arrow the movement of Japanese troops on 29 July and the scene of the fighting. After doing so, he stated that he could clearly distinguish the state border line. The scene of the clash of
- 32138 July 29 marked by him was to the east of the border line * in Soviet territory. Bezjimjannaya Hill was about 200 or 250 meters from the border line.

* The witness was reminded that in response to the question by the President, he had given a brief answer that he could easily determine where the border ran. Asked to give a more detailed explanation, he replied that if he hadn't known exactly how the line passed, he wouldn't have been able to guard the border. He hadn't been in the area for a considerable time and to a certain extent had forgotten some characteristics of the terrain but still remembered that on certain hills there were extremely characteristic terrain features such as rocks, bush, etc. and by them they knew the exact line and the outpost commander showed them where the line passed, and the witness trained his subordinate guards in these features. The guards made a path east of the border * which was about 8 meters away from the border and in certain places about 20 meters away, and others as close as 3. Along this line they performed their guard duties. While passing along this path they studied where the line passed and a veteran guard could easily spot any changes and violations. The line passed exactly along the watershed, and on Zaozernaya Hill there were large and very peculiar rocks and they could easily determine where the line passed.

The eastern slope of the hill was Soviet territory * and the west slope, Manchurian. They had optical instruments with which to observe neighboring territory and had binoculars and periscopes, and by lifting these sufficiently high could observe what was going on at the foot of the hill without trespassing the border.

32144 * The witness had marked on the map Japanese gun posi-32145 tions which he had observed from Zaozernaya Hill, and also 32146 marked the direction of Japanese penetration * to the hill on July 31, 1938. This offensive began from the flanks. * On that night Japanese, under cover of night, crossed the border south of the hill, reached the rear of the Soviet positions and thereon launched an offensive. In it they used a part of their reinforced regiment concentrated in and around Hamoki Village.

The second group crossed the border north of the hill and also started an offensive. Other small forces attacked the crest of Zaozernaya Hill from the front. From their positions, Soviet border guards engaged in battle. At that time, on the western slopes of the hill, there were only 30 guards. The order of their commander was to hold out to the last and not to leave the hill until the approach of reserve units.

32147 After the fighting started on the two * slopes, a platoon of 30 men of the field troops approached, thus there were at that time on the hill 30 border guards and 30 regular army soldiers. Together they fought until 5:00 a.m.
When almost all were killed or wounded, they withdrew from the hill to the back of Lake Khasan and, as they had no way to retreat by land as those ways were held by the Japanese, the witness together with Tereshkin had to swim across Lake Khasan, and all that could swim did so. The Japanese fired at the swimmers with artillery and trench mortars.

32148 * Bezjimjannaya Hill was not a part of Podgornaya 32149 Outpost but was included into the sector guarded by the Podchikoriya Frontier Outpost. Bezjimjannaya Hill Outpost had no connection with Zaozernaya Hill. * The Red flag was hoisted on Zaozernaya Hill after a regular Red army unit drove the Japanese from the hill on August 6.

32153 * DIRECT EXAMINATION OF CHERNOBYATKO, Ivan D.
 By Colonel Smirnov

The witness stated his name, that his rank was major, that he served in the border guard corps of the ministry of home affairs in USSR. From 1936 to 1939 he served in the Posiet border guard detachment, first as a private, then a noncommissioned, then a platoon commander.

32154 * The title of Hero of the Soviet Union was awarded to him for participating in the fighting in the Lake Khasan area. When shown exhibit 755 he identified it as his affidavit, and stated that the contents were true and correct.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. FURNESS

32155 * The witness stated that during July he served in the Podgornaya outpost and most of the time he was at Zaozernaya Hill, arriving there at the beginning of July 1938 as junior commander of the platoon, a noncommissioned rank. He had about 30 men under him. In general he was attached to the frontier guard outpost at Podgornaya under the command of Tereshkin. This outpost had a permanent post at Zaozernaya Hill.

The Podgornaya Frontier Guard Outpost was about 67 kilometers from the hill, and this was south of the border marked "T" on the map.

32157 * Batarshin was under Dubovoi, a commander of a reserve group of the detachment, and he occupied the same rank as the witness did under Tereshkin. The witness changed his answer that he held to Zaozernaya hill for the first time in July, and explained that when he was graduated from the school for noncoms, he was sent for probation to the Podgornaya Outpost, and from there went to the observation post which separated from Zaozernaya Hill. From the Podgornaya 32158 naya outpost, he served until March *and then went into the reserve unit. In July he was at Zaozernaya hill the second time. Asked if the post was established in July 1938, he replied that the Zaozernaya Hill post was established a long time ago.

With reference to the hill, the Korean border was on the Tumen-Ula River and across the river was a railroad.

Page Asked if the residents in the region of Lake Khasan and Zaozernaya Hill were chiefly Korean, he stated he knew nothing about it.

32159 * Some of the population in this region did speak Korean. On the Soviet side there were some populated places such as the villages of Podgornaya and Gryady. The witness could not speak, read, or write Korean or Japanese.

32160 * From border marked "T" the border ran north along the crest of Dlinnaya Hill and then along the crest of a group of hills situated between Lake Khasan and the Tumen-Ula River, further along the watershed of the Zaozernaya Hill, and thence to the sandy ridge north of that hill. Fighting took place on July 29 on Bezjimjannaya Hill, 300 meters east of the borderline in Soviet territory.

Dlinnaya Hill had its foot near the border marked "T". The general direction of the border was northeast.
 32161* The hill Zaozernaya is a long ridge and the border ran along 32162 the river. * As far back as the beginning of July they observed the arrival of Japanese field troops, and through the middle of the month, observed an increased concentration on this sector.

Asked if they observed an infantry regiment strengthened by artillery mortars and two artillery divisions, he replied he didn't see the regiment marching in columns, but the positions held by the Japanese which were for artillery range and trench mortars spoke for themselves as to the strength of Japanese troops.

32163 * Judging by the numerical strength and the prepared positions, he could say with assurance that in that area was about a regiment of Japanese troops, reinforced by by artillery and trench mortars. A Japanese regiment had about 3000 men.

32164 * When he reported the concentration of artillery, approximately 3 batteries were there on a hill to the south of Hamoka village. Two batteries were to the west of the hill, which was to the northwest of Zaozernaya Hill, and one on the northern slopes of the hill which was to the northwest.

32166 * He reported daily this concentration of troops, stationing of artillery, etc., to his superior officer, and he reported it to the central authorities. The caliber of the guns observed were about 70 or 80 millimeters or 40 millimeters. Asked if all guns in the territory east of the River Tumen were not small caliber, 37.5 or 40 millimeter guns, he replied there were also guns of 70 or 80 millimeters in caliber.

32167 * Asked if guns of over 40 millimeter caliber were not all on the other side of the River Tumen down near the Village Podgornaya, he replied he personally observed no artillery opposite the frontier guard outpost Podgornaya nor saw any artillery in the village in the neighboring territory. Again asked if any gun of over 40 caliber were on territory across the Tumen River from hill Zaozernaya, * he replied that opposite the hill there were guns of 70 and 80 millimeters in caliber. Opposite the river on its western bank, they didn't exactly observe the positions, but saw the movement of transport vehicles.

32168 He had testified in his affidavit to the evacuation from the village of Khamoki. He believed that this was a different spelling of Hamoka, and was the same village referred to by that name and was about seven meters from the summit of Zaozernaya hill.

32169 * The eastern outskirts of the village were about 900 meters from the summit of Zaozernaya hill. He personally observed the concentration of troops and evacuation from the observation post on the hill. He was approximately a meter or a meter and a half to the east of the border line between Manchuria and the USRR.

32170 * He reported the evacuation to his superior who reported it to the headquarters of the Posiet detachment. His commander also observed this personally. He made the observation the first half of July, but the last stage of the evacuation was on July 24 and 25.

Reference was made to exhibit 753 which indicated that the inhabitants staged a demonstration of indignation on the 24th of July.

- 32171 * Asked if he knew anything about that, the witness stated there was no demonstration in the Hamoka village. The evacuation was conducted from Manchurian territory to Korean territory across the Tumen-Ula River, the border line between the two states running on that river. The evacuation and fortifications were all within the territory of Manchukuo.
- 32172 The fortifications were in Manchuria, * but they observed troop movements in Korean territory as well. This evacuation and fortification building was because fighting was expected in the territory.

Asked if he knew anything about the killing of a Japanese gendarme on the southern slope of Mount Zaoazernaya, as reported in exhibit 753, he replied that he knew that the gendarme was shot but did not know if his name was MATSUSHIMA. He did not know if two other Japanese gendarmes were captured, but knew two local residents were detained.

- 32173 * The witness was told that in his affidavit he testified that between the 18th and 20th, at different times, Russian guards captured two local civilians with letters from the Japanese detachment addressed to the chief of the 50th Frontier Detachment demanding withdrawal of Russian forces from Zaozernaya hill.

- 32174 * Parts of the report included in exhibit 753 were then read to the witness. This stated that on July 23, about 5:00 a.m., a patrol of 5 men, under section leader Zhavgorodnin, located on Soviet territory 4 Japanese and Manchurian soldiers with a light machine gun. A cavalry platoon under Captain Magalov was sent forward from the outpost and he discovered 120-150 meters from the frontier line where the transgressors were seen, that one telegraph pole was pulled and 14 meters of wire were carried away. There were footprints leading to the adjacent territory. In this place a white flag and a letter written in Korean were found which stated that on July 16 a letter was sent in the district of the long island, immediately answer this letter, and immediately withdraw from the territory in the Lake Khassan area, or the situation would become grave.

Questions arising between them had become tense, and they were always ready to start negotiations on the frontier line. The opinion of the other side was desired.

32175 * After this was read to the witness he was asked if he knew anything about this incident and he replied that detachment commander Grebennik told him that such an occurrence was somewhat to the north of Zaozernaya hill. Asked if this was the same letter regarding which he had testified in his affidavit, he said this was the second letter, but it was approximately so that the gist of the letter just read was the same as the letter he remembered having been told about by Grebennik.

32176 Asked if Soviet guards dug entrenchments, strung barb wire, or built fortifications in the area prior to July 29, he replied that prior to that time the guards constructed no fortifications there. Originally there were fewer border guards there, but after the 16th there were 30, and * they were the only military forces on the hill.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that on the 29th a clash occurred with the adjacent Soviet guard consisting of 11 men. The witness stated that at this time he was near the summit of Zaozernaya hill. When he observed this fighting, they came down the eastern slope of the Zaozernaya hill somewhat. From exhibit 753 was read to him the part which stated that according to the Posyet detachment report, on July 29, 1938, at 16.00 hours, Japanese and Manchurians launched a two-group offensive against a no-name hill on the frontier line two kilometers north of Zaozernaya hill.

32177 * The first group was of 50 men with a light machine gun, and the second consisted of nearly a company, attacked no-name hill 1000 meters northwest of Zaozernaya hill. The Soviet patrol withdrew. A group from the garrison on the hill marched out to support them. The group advancing from the hill was engaged in a skirmish with a Japanese group. The observation was difficult because of dense fog. Asked if that was an accurate report of the skirmish, as he observed it, he replied no, that it was a somewhat distorted picture picture of the events. The no-name hill was not northwest of Zaozernaya hill but northeast.

32178 * There was a fog in the dell between Zaozernaya hill 32179 * and Bezjimjannaya hill. There was a slight rain. Tereshkin, the commander of the outpost, ordered the detachment to go in support of the men engaged in the skirmish. About 12:00 o'clock the night of 30 July 1938, on a reconnaissance party, the witness heard Japanese speech, but as he did not understand Japanese, he did not know what was being said. Asked how he knew it was Japanese, he replied they were getting letters on behalf of the Japanese commander containing demands that they should withdraw from Zaozernaya hill, * and troops under Japanese officers were opposite them.

Asked if the letters were in Korean he replied the Japanese were bossing the show, both in Manchuria and Korea, and they didn't observe the border line between the two countries. One of the letters was in the Korean language.

After the skirmish on the 29th, there were no reinforcements nor fortifications built on the hill. The witness stated that he was wounded and went out of action on the morning of 31 July. * The fighting began on the night of July 30-31.

32181

* It started at midnight and extended to the 31st. He was wounded and went out of action after six or seven hours and took no part in the fighting after that date.

32185

* The witness was told that the witness Tereshkin testified (S. 7781) that only frontier guards took part in the fighting on Zaozernaya hill, and according to the present witness's affidavit the guards numbered 30. Asked if even after the fighting on the 29th, no reinforcements were brought to defend the hill, the witness stated that was not correct. * During the night one platoon of field troops came up and also participated in the battle.

* It consisted of 30 men. Asked if 11 men were killed or wounded in the fighting on the 29th, 15 to 20 killed on the night of the 30th and 31st if that left approximately 20 on the hill, he replied that was not correct because the frontier patrol on Bezjimjannaya hill was not a part of the patrol on Zaozernaya hill. They were two separate patrols. On Bezjimjannaya hill there was a patrol from the Podchikoriya border outpost and on Zaozernaya hill there was a patrol from Podgornaya border outpost. Thus there were 60 men on Zaozernaya hill.

32189 Before or during the time he gave testimony in this affidavit, he did not talk with either Tereshkin or Batarshin. * He did not discuss with Batarshin his testimony. They came from Russia together and while coming had no discussions on the testimony but did discuss the matter in general terms. The witness asked Batarshin how the examination went, and he told him all that happened. There was no use to discuss the subject in detail as they saw the same things themselves.

32190 * REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY COLONEL SMIRNOV

Regarding the demonstration in the village northwest of Zaozernaya hill, 4 men arrived at the village with movie cameras. Probably according with their orders, 30 men gathered from Hamoka village at a square clearly seen from the hill. One of the men of the village began to deliver a speech, waving his hands and pointing in the direction of the hill. A film was made of this, then the gathered men were ordered to march past the movie camera.

32191 * One of the men who came to the village told them how they should walk and shout and the men obediently did it. Asked if it was known to him when Soviet troops were brought into action on the hill, he replied that one platoon was brought into action on the night of 30th of July to 31st of July. But he didn't think they could be called field troops. Regular army units were brought in later but he didn't know when. On the way to the hospital in Vladivostok he met columns of army units marching to the place of the clash in the area of Zaozernaya hill * in the afternoon of 31 July. He could not tell exactly when the post on the hill was established.

In the beginning of 1937 there was a post already there and veteran guards had told him that it had been established there a long time before. The witness stated that he was on the hill 11 July 1938.

32197 * The first clash occurred on 29 July on Bezjimjannaya hill, which is 300 meters to the east of the border line. No clashes occurred prior to 29 July neither in the area of Bezjimjannaya nor Zaozernaya hill. (Defense counsel called the attention of the tribunal to testimony beginning at pages 22,879; 22,713; 22,740; and 22,943.)

by Mr. Brooks.

32202 * The accused identified exhibit 3375 as his 32205 affidavit, and after corrections verified it. * The affidavit stated that he was born in 1880, and was appointed Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau in August, 1930, promoted to lieutenant-general August, 1931, was Commander of the Korean Army from 2 December 1935 to 15 July, 1938; promoted to full general November, 1937, attached to the General Staff on 15 July, 1938, and in the same month placed on the reserve list.

After retiring from the army, he had no further connections with military affairs, and his political activities were limited to the time and duty of offices to which he was appointed and which he accepted only as a duty to his country and not upon his own request.

32206 After World War One, military armaments became obsolete. As there were movements for their reduction, improvement was not satisfactory for the nation to wage * war, and armament conditions grew alarming from the standpoint of national defense. To readjust equipment, the mobilizable strength of 32 divisions was reduced to 28 after April, 1931. About the time of the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident, it was considered to reduce peacetime strength further of 17 divisions, by changing the Imperial Guard Division to simply Imperial Bodyguards and abolishing the two divisions. This was the state of the army strength, which he learned through performing duties in the Military Affairs Bureau and the Military Equipment Bureau.

32207 After assuming the post of Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau, he heard of frequent acts in China and Manchuria committed by Chinese arising from anti-Japanese sentiment, of the infringement of Japan's vested interests and interference with the Japanese right of residence and business, and acts endangering their lives and property.
* As a result, feeling between Japanese and Chinese in Manchuria became more strained. In view of the situation, the accused presented his view to the War and Vice Ministers on how to avoid war, by adhering to a policy of patience.
Both ministers agreed, and the accused expressed this view to the Vice Chief of the General Staff, who entertained the same opinion.

- Page The accused also heard that because of the condition of the military forces, Chief of Staff KANAYA sent Major-General TATEKAWA to Manchuria in mid-September, 1931, to transmit to the Kwantung Army Commander the central army authorities' intention of adhering to a policy of patience and forbearance, regardless of developments.
- 32208 * Young officers became indignant over armament conditions, and because they thought internal politics were disregarding the nation's interests, some planned to effect administrative reforms with certain civilians, and some did so. Instances of this were the March and October Incidents, which were successfully nipped in the bud, and the May 15 and February 26 Incidents. Active army and navy officers had been prohibited as a policy from engaging in politics in such a way.
- 32209 OKAWA and his followers resented corrupt party politics and wanted to reform the system with a Cabinet under the Premiership of the then War Minister UGAKI. OKAWA wanted UGAKI to take an active post, but their plan was reckless and it met with UGAKI's refusal, and they had to abandon it. This was the March Incident, and had no relation to the Manchurian Incident.
- In relation to this, the accused was requested by OKAWA, whom he met for the first time, to make arrangements for him to see UGAKI about the plan. After asking the nature of the plan, KOISO voiced disapproval and advised OKAWA to abandon it. The accused recalled that Chief of the Appointment Section OKAMURA was present at the discussion. OKAWA refused to listen to KOISO's advice and persisted that he see UGAKI.
- 32210 * The accused told him he could report it to UGAKI if OKAWA handed him the plan in writing. On reading the document, UGAKI flatly rejected it, and the accused informed OKAWA of this. Prior to this, when KOISO asked OKAWA for the plan in writing and he answered he would submit it after consulting with others, KOISO inquired who the others were. He did not reveal their names, but this was when KOISO learned they were young general staff officers.
- By virtue of his office as Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau, he was in position to discourage officers from such action, and he advised OKAWA to abandon the plan and sever connections with the young officers concerned with it, as they were prohibited from political activity.

Page 32210 Besides reporting to higher officials, KOISO also informed the Vice Chief of the General Staff, suggesting he warn the young officers not to associate with OKAWA. At this time, the Vice-Chief told him that there were * indications that Army firecrackers had been delivered to OKAWA's faction by young officers. KOISO called his attention to the necessity for their being returned immediately to avert trouble and protect army prestige. Later he heard OKAWA was still intending to put his plan into practice and because they would be in a bad position regarding the national interest, he proposed to young officers connected with OKAWA, KOISO requested Marquis TOKUGAWA, in whom OKAWA was said to have confidence, to persuade OKAWA to abandon the plan and return the firecrackers. As a result, TOKUGAWA succeeded in having OKAWA abandon the plan. However, KOISO received information that despite the request of General Staff officers, the firecrackers remained in the possession of the OKAWA faction. KOISO personally and the War Ministry had nothing to do with these articles, but since the effort of General Staff officers to recover them was insufficient, KOISO feared trouble might crop up in the future if the matter were left alone, * so he requested OKAWA to return the firecrackers. Although OKAWA said he would do so, he took no immediate steps to keep his promise.

To hasten the matter, OKAWA again requested TOKUGAWA to persuade OKAWA. Through TOKUGAWA's efforts, final arrangements were made to return the firecrackers, and KOISO so informed the General Staff. Later, he received information that General Staff officers received from OKAWA's faction the firecrackers, and thus the March Incident ended.

Prosecution witnesses UGAKI, (T. 1608 and 1627), TOKUGAWA, (T. 1441-1446), and SHIMIZU, (1402-1404, 1406-08, 1410-11), made misstatements in their testimony, but these were cleared up in cross-examination, and KOISO believed his own statements were found to be true.

Page 32213 * With regard to the October Incident, the accused HASHIMOTO made a statement that would lead the Court to misunderstand and think KOISO participated. (T. 15676-7). This was a mistake, and he had no connection. From what he learned as a part of his official duty, it was the plan in October, 1931, of some young General Staff officers to renovate the domestic organization. Before the plan took concrete shape, modern elements in the group secretly informed Second Section Chief IMAMURA of the attempt.

The information was conveyed by him to the Chief of the Military Affairs Section NAGATA, and by him to KOISO. KOISO at once reported to the War and Vice Minister. The minister requested Gendarmerie Commander TOYOMA to * confine and hold incommunicado the young officers who were then confronted with their improper activities and severely reprimanded and told to disband and discontinue such activity. This ended the Incident.

The truths of the March and October Incidents were as he stated, and exhibit 179F and 2177-A were a mistake, and also he had no connection with the May 15 Incident, as mentioned in exhibit 2178-A.

In OKAWA's interrogatory concerning the May 15 Incident, he mentioned the March Incident, making it appear as if in deciding upon his actions he took into consideration the future of Manchuria. However, when OKAWA called on KOISO in connection with the March Incident, his explanation included no mention of policies toward Manchuria.

Regarding exhibit 2202-A, the War Ministry invitation to Manchurian railway Company officials on 30 June 1931, this was a courtesy banquet of the War Ministry * by way of a return invitation, and there was no discussion of politics pertaining to Manchuria or Mongolia. The outbreak of the Manchurian Incident was not due to any plan or intrigue by any Cabinet member or officials of KOISO's acquaintance as far as he knew, and he never saw nor heard any plans for aggression, nor conspired with anyone to do any of the acts charged in the Indictment.

On the night of 18 September, 1931, when the Mukden Incident broke out, KOISO was home asleep. Between 2 and 3 a.m. on the 19th, the War Ministry telephoned him, and he was informed for the first time that about 10.30 p.m. on the 18th, Chinese soldiers had blown up the railway lines near Liutiakou, and that fighting had ensued. Summoned by the War Minister, he found that Vice-Minister SUGIYAMA was ill and unable to come, and pursuant to the War Minister's order, the accused requested a * secretary to call government offices concerned and request the Premier to convene an emergency Cabinet meeting. Both the War Minister and KOISO agreed that the situation should be handled so as to localize the Incident and restore peace.

32217 Since a summons came from the Vice-Chief to the Vice-Minister for consultation and as the Vice-Minister was ill, War Minister MINAMI sent KOISO in his stead. He met Vice-Chief NINOMIYA, and they deliberated on the following points, which they suggested to the government: The best measure was a policy of localization to settle and stabilize the Incident; although the Chinese might be responsible, their position should be defensive; conditions for settlement should not be determined by the army alone; If the Chinese acts were based on an anti-Japanese policy, this might cause another Incident, and the Kwantung Army * would have to face more provocation; therefore, a proposition should be made to the Chang Hsueh-liang regime requesting observation of existing treaties and rights.

KOISO recalled that Second Section Head IMAMURA was present at the conference also. When War Minister MINAMI notified the accused that the Cabinet had decided on a policy of localization, KOISO reported this to Vice-Chief NINOMIYA. MINAMI then sent a telegram drafted by the Military Affairs Bureau, to the Kwantung Army Commander, stating that Japan wished to exert its utmost to localize the Incident, and they desired the Kwantung Army to keep this in mind.

32218 The same day a report was received from C-in-C of the Korean Army, that he was preparing to send a mixed brigade to Manchuria. MINAMI requested the Chief of Staff to wire that this measure should be suspended, and he did so. * However, on September 21 they found that the brigade had already crossed the border on its own initiative, despite the instructions, and this matter was discussed at the September 22 Cabinet meeting. The Cabinet finally gave ex-post facto approval. Since Imperial sanction had been obtained, army expenses were paid out of second reserve funds.

At the end of September it was decided that since Kwantung Army main strength was concentrated along the railway zone and since the lives and properties to be protected extended over such a vast area, MINAMI, after consultation with the Chief of Staff, indicated to the Kwantung Army Commander that although it was necessary to station detachments along the line connecting Kirin, Changchun and Chengshiatun and along the line of the Taliaho, troops should not advance north or west of these lines. At the same time, units close to Chinchow should be withdrawn within the lines.

32219

* On 26 November, a disturbance broke out in Tientsin. The North China Army Commander requested the Kwantung Army Commander to send reinforcements for the protection of the Japanese community and maintenance of peace and order in foreign settlements. On the 27th, the Kwantung Army Commander dispatched a unit as far as Koupangtzu to reconnoiter the Chinchow area in preparation for troop transportation. However, MINAMI requested strict observance of the lines in accordance with the Cabinet policy, and the Chief of Staff, in compliance with this desire, ordered the Kwantung Army Commander to withdraw the unit east of the Taliho River.

32220

* On 10 December, 1931, the WAKATSUKI Cabinet resigned and a new Cabinet was organized on the 13th under INUKAI, with ARAKI as War Minister. Prior to this, negotiations had been started to prevent further clashes near Chinchow. Settlement had not been reached by December 1931, and on the 23rd a battle took place between Kwantung Army units and those of the regular Chinese Army, because the latter advanced from Chinchow and attacked the units engaged in the suppression of soldier bandits near Tien-chuangtai. The Chinese evacuated Chinchow, and the Kwantung Army made a bloodless entry into the city on January 3, taking charge of maintaining public peace and order.

32221

In January, 1932, Japanese and Korean residents in Harbin and some Chinese officials and civilians repeatedly asked the Kwantung Army for the dispatch of rescue forces, and the army reported they would like to comply but the central authorities had withheld approval with respect to * the necessity of rescuing Harbin; but the confused situation of the city made central authorities believe such action was necessary, and they finally approved the request of the Kwantung Army Commander, whereupon he dispatched troops and on 5 February drove back the soldier bandits in Harbin.

After the outbreak of the Shanghai Incident the end of January 1932, the troops were sent, but later, on 5 May, a truce was concluded and army units were transferred.

War Ministry personnel, including the accused, endeavoured at all times under the War Minister, to check the aggravation of the situation on the basis of a policy of non-aggravation. Unfortunately, the Incident developed as it did, which was unavoidable, and those concerned did their best to meet the situation according to the above policy.

* Concerning the army budget, exhibit 74 refers to the period after the official organization was revised. By virtue of this revision, the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau would assist the War Minister in control of the budget, but before the revision the Chief of the Intendance Bureau was responsible, and the Military Affairs Bureau Chief had neither authority nor control or responsibility, and this was the case during the time the accused held office.

The independence of Manchukuo was declared in March, 1932. The new regime made requests of Japan, which was pressed by the necessity of examining its policies to meet these requests economically and politically. Though the policy to support and uphold Manchuria's development was roughly established, KOISO recalled that up to the time when he left his position in the War Ministry in August 1932, most of the concrete measures had not yet been decided.

* In exhibit 227, KOISO, as Vice-Minister, received an advice from the Kwantung Army Chief of Staff dated 4 June, 1932, with respect to taking over the Dairen customs, and he reported this to the War Minister. At this time the policy concerning customs had not been decided, and as it was a matter which could not be carried out by the army alone, no action was taken.

Regarding the funds mentioned in exhibit 2210, the 20,000 yen turned over to him on 4 July was handled under his supervision by the Senior Adjutant and Secretariat Paymaster, and was used to defray expenses for social occasions in the Ministry and for incidental expenses of the Ministry and to pay temporary employees.

KOISO was transferred to Chief of Staff of the Kwantung Army on 8 August, 1932, and returned the 18,500 yen given to him as Vice-Minister to his successor, YANAGAWA, and he did not know how it was used. (Exhibit 2211).

* The 1,970,000 yen turned over to him under his name when he was Kwantung Army Chief of Staff on 27 December 1933 (exhibit 2213), was handled by the Senior Adjutant and the Paymaster of the Intendance Bureau under the Vice-Chief of Staff, in accordance with the order of the Kwantung Army Commander. KOISO merely was to supervise its use.

Expenditures during the two months up to his departure from the Kwantung Army was appropriated to incidental expenses at the Commander's official residence and for various army units, gendarmerie and special service organizations, but the largest amount was retained by headquarters.

While Chief of Staff, the sum allotted to units and special organizations was spent for obtaining information, and especially for paying for collected weapons from potential and de facto bandits. The amount for use for this included sums due but not paid. This was the use * made of these funds while he was Vice Minister and Chief of Staff, and he could only say that the way the Army paid out secret funds was such that no individual use could be made of it.

He was appointed Kwantung Army Chief of Staff on August 8, and arrived at Mukden on the 26th, accompanying the new Kwantung Army Commander, MUTO, Nobuyoshi, who was concurrently Ambassador Plenipotentiary. MUTO signed the Japan-Manchukuo Protocol on 15 September, 1932, whereby Japan recognized Manchukuo, and the duty of joint defense was assigned to the Kwantung Army.

In its declaration of independence on 1 March, 1932, Manchukuo announced that the four northeastern provinces under Chang Hsueh-liang were within its territory. Therefore it was necessary for the Kwantung Army, in cooperation with Manchukuo, to make efforts for restoration of law and order in Jehol Province, but it was more urgent to restore peace and order east of the Taliho River, * especially along the SMR where multitudes of Japanese and Manchurians settled. Therefore the Commander continued to drive out remnants of the Ting Chao, Li Tu, and Ma Chan-shan armies, to restore law and order, with the cooperation of the Manchukuoan Army and the local self-government and police organizations, and also carried out the "Pao Chiao" system, since it subsequently insured law and order.

Bandits or potential bandits surrendering weapons received compensation, and measures were taken to give employment to those among them without employment or farms to return to, and many were employed as laborers by the National Road Bureau of Manchukuo. Ting Chao visited the Kwantung Army Commander at Changchun, expressing gratitude for the treatment accorded him and his army, and swore to do his utmost for Manchukuo in the future, and KOISO understood he was later given important work by Manchukuo.

* At the end of 1932 Su Ping-wen, who was given a military post at Kulumbair after Manchukuo was formed, rebelled, and many Japanese in the district were killed or imprisoned. The Kwantung Army was faced with the necessity of using force for the protection of the residents. Fearing that rash action might bring further harm, the Kwantung Army asked the Soviet to rescue the residents, and through the good offices of Russian authorities Japanese residents were accommodated into Soviet territory, transported to Vladivostok, and from there sent safely to Japan. Later, the Kwantung Army Commander sent a unit to the district, and peace and order was restored after defeating Su's forces.

Part of Chang Hsueh-liang's troops who left Chinchow and Tungliao were received by Governor Tang Yu ling of Jehol Province, and joining the powerful bandits of the area, established a base there from which to carry out insidious activities in South Manchukuo. * So the Kwantung Army Commander advised Hsieh Lu Sheng, a Jehol Province representative and secretary of Tang Yu-ling, that the army's policy was to restore peace and order as peacefully as possible, and it was necessary for the governor to provide for the peaceful participation of the province with Manchukuo in maintaining peace, and suggested that he so advise Tang. Tang did not accept this advice, and started a campaign to disturb Manchukuo's peace in collusion with bandits, and therefore Japanese and Manchukuoan troops had to take action.

32229

After peace was restored in Jehol, the Kwantung Army Commander ordered all units to defend the line of the Great Wall and borders, but not to penetrate into North China and Chahar. Every time they were attacked, all units drove back the Chinese from their line of defense by way of defense. Chinese groups increased their strength * by the end of April, and their attacks became persistent. Some army units, driving away the enemy, pursued them into North China. However, they withdrew to the Great Wall in accordance with the Kwantung Army Commander's order.

The Chinese Army further increased in strength and repeated attacks against the line of the Great Wall after the Kwantung Army withdrew toward that line. At this juncture army units counter-attacked and pursued the Chinese as far as the Chi-Ho River in early May. The Kwantung Army commander strictly ordered all units to stop east of the line of the Chi-Ho River, considering that the entry into the Peiping-Tientsin Area might aggravate the situation.

Page The Chinese proposed a truce on 25 May, and the Kwantung Army Commander accepted, and thus the TANGU truce ending the Manchurian Incident was concluded on 21 May, 1933.

32230 * KOISO was relieved as Chief of Staff of the Kwantung Army on 5 March, 1934, and his duties in Manchuria for twenty months were associated with staff work under the Commander's direction. During this time he was not in command of troops, and had no power to command any, because he was only responsible for administrative matters.

It was stated in exhibit 230, (T. 2902), that he sent a communication to the Vice-Minister concerning "The Program of Guidance for Manchukuo", dated 3 November 1932. The document was the commander's opinion and prepared by his order in reply to an inquiry from the War Vice-Minister and made according to the draft plan of the General Staff Second Division. It was written by order of the Army Commander, expressing his opinion, and not made on KOISO's own initiative and not his own opinion.

32231 Assistance to Manchukuo from the Kwantung Army while he was Chief of Staff was carried out under orders * issued in accordance with the Japan-Manchukuo Protocol, (exhibit 440, T. 5035), and its annexed documents for restoring and maintaining peace and order, protection of transportation, communications, etc., in view of the promotion of the happiness of the Manchurians, these activities were carried out at the initiative and request and with the cooperation of the government organizations of Manchukuo.

32232 After he left his duties in Manchukuo on 5 April, 1934, he served in no official or private capacity, having no direct connection with the Manchurian or Chinese problems. However, he felt that the outbreak and continuation of the China Incident was most regrettable, and he advanced the view privately that the most appropriate measure would be to ask Britain and the U. S. to mediate a Sino-Japanese peace, but little attention was paid to his view. From April to August, 1939, and from January to July, 1940, he was Minister of Overseas Affairs, but had no connection with any work relating to the Incident. The capture of Changsha occurred while he was still Governor-General in Korea, and he had no connection with it. The battles of Hengyang, Kewilin and Liuchow were actions taken as tactical operations, and were outside his responsibility. From December 1931 until 15 July, 1938, he commanded the Korean Army.

32233 With regard to the Lake Khasan Incident, (T. 22742, 22751), TANAKA, Ryukichi, testified in relation to the concentration of the 19th Division, but this was his imagination, and differed from the facts. The actual situation was that in view of the movement of Soviet troops in the vicinity of Changkufeng, the 19th Division Commander had taken precautions by stationing on the bank of the Tumen River a part of the division's strength, and to enable the taking of appropriate defensive measures in the face of possible future changes requested KOISO's * permission on 14 July 1938 to concentrate the division's main strength on the bank of the Tumen River. Before giving any order, KOISO wired the Chief of the General Staff and War Minister for instructions. Before receiving any reply, he received orders the next day, 15 July, transferring him to Tokyo.

The telegram from the Chief of Staff in reply to his inquiry arrived on 16 July, and was delivered to his successor as commander of the Korean Army, General NAKAMURA. He thought NAKAMURA disposed of the matter on the basis of these instructions, as the order for concentration was not issued by the accused.

At the time of the Khalkin-Gol Incident he was Overseas Minister, and his duties had no connection with such matters in Manchuria, and he did not participate in discussions concerning problems related to the USSR or Outer Mongolia.

* According to exhibit 2214 with regard to the Tripartite Pact, it was alleged that ITAGAKI, on 8 May, 1939, and KOISO on the 9, gave an interview to a Domei News Agency Reporter. Part of the statement in the exhibit relating to himself was a mistake. Foreign Minister ARITA may have made the statement, but the accused did not. It was common for the Overseas and Foreign Affairs Minister to be confused. He did not recall having given this interview, but assuming he did give it, he certainly would not have given such a statement as alleged in the exhibit, for from the nature of his duties as Overseas Minister he had no authority or responsibility with regard to diplomatic or military matters, and was not allowed to make any public statement in such form.

While he was Overseas Minister in the HIRANUMA Cabinet, he only knew vaguely that the problem of the Tripartite Pact was discussed at a five Ministers' conference composed of the Premier and War, Navy, Foreign, and Finance Ministers.

* While he was Overseas Minister in the HIRANUMA Cabinet, his views on this subject were never requested nor expressed at any Cabinet meetings when he was present, or on any occasion that he could recall, except when in May, 1939, he received a request from Vice-Minister YAMAWAKI, asking him to help restore friendly relations between the War and Navy Ministers, who had opposite views concerning the alliance. To this request, KOISO replied in a note that although he was an outsider, he believed it best for Japan to put off the conclusion of an alliance with Germany and Italy. He also expressed his anti-alliance view to HIRANUMA, and thereafter never entered into discussions thereon.

Exhibit 523, (T. 6174), a telegram to Berlin sent by Ambassador Ott concerning the results of a discussion had with KOISO, was full of false statements. It was * true that on 20 June 1940, in response to a request made by TOKUGAWA, Yoshitomo, KOISO talked with Ott for about half an hour, with TOKUGAWA as interpreter. He did not invite Ott to call on him, and this meeting had no connection with the accused MUTO, whose name was not even mentioned, and at the short interview Ott did most of the talking and explained his views, that the conclusion of an alliance and a non-aggression pact between Japan and the USSR would benefit the economic development of Japan in the southwestern Pacific, and suggested the economic value of FIC and NEI.

It was contrary to the fact to say that KOISO put to him a question concerning the attitude of Germany in case Japan started military actions in these regions, or that KOISO would promote the idea of Ott to have Japan attack the Philippines and Hawaiian Islands and hold the U. S. in check in the Pacific. This would call for an important utterance concerning a matter about which he, as Overseas Minister, had no authority or concern, and of * which he was not authorized to express his attitude. He could not think of speaking even his private opinion to a foreign ambassador whom he had met then for the first time. Ott's telegram to the effect that KOISO stated there was a possibility of a non-aggression pact between Japan and the Soviet further proved that Ott made the false statement to realize his own view to make Japan follow the course he had planned and was not aware and was confused as to the functions of the Overseas and Foreign Ministries. Ott's observation that KOISO belonged to the KONOYE faction was wrong, because he then knew KONOYE only by name. This could be seen from exhibit 1278 of the KIDO Diary, in which KONOYE stated he did not know the accused.

- 32243 * In relation to his answer to the question on southern expansion raised by House of Representatives Member FUKUDA on 17 March 1940 (Exhibit 2215-A), the reply KOISO made at the outset that he agreed with FUKUDA did not mean he approved of the method proposed by him but only that he agreed it was necessary to pay attention to economic movement in the south. The fact that KOISO held the opinion that the southern regions were not suitable for large scale Japanese immigration because of climate and customs * 32244 was clear from the reply. There was no military significance to the discussion.

According to Exhibit 1509, the arrangement of sending Ambassador SAWADA to NEI as the Economic Envoy in July 1940, was dropped because of KOISO. However, KOISO did not know that SAWADA had been intended to be the envoy nor did he know that the plan was later changed. KOISO declined the offer of the Premier and Foreign Minister to become Economic Envoy because he was not suited for it. KOISO stated he was Premier from 22 July 1940 to 7 April 1945.

- 32245 Matters mentioned in Exhibit 662 were decided by the Supreme Council on 1 February 1945. In view that some measures need to be taken to defend NEI in the face of the situation whereby the U.S. forces had already landed in the Philippines * and their planes were raiding NEI and there existed the possibility of a U.S. landing there coupled with the attitude of FIC forces which became non-cooperative with the Japanese, it had been decided at the Supreme Council for the Direction of War that measures be taken to have the armed forces and a constabulary in FIC re-organized under the control of a Japanese Commander but to leave the date and execution of this decision of the Commander and diplomatic representatives on the spot who should obtain the consent of the Governor General of FIC to the Japanese request and to make efforts to arrange to put it into execution peacefully. These measures were taken by the authorities on the spot on 9 March 1945, but KOISO had no connection or responsibility as its execution was within the competence of the Supreme Command.

- 32246 * Responsibility for the treatment of POWs and internees rested with the Central Command and the Premier could not participate according to constitutional stipulations. He was allowed to attend Imperial Headquarters on 16 March 1945, only three weeks before his resignation. This privilege was confined to listening to reports on the progress of war operations and was not extended to allow his participation directly in the Supreme Command. Thus,

Page he had no responsibility for the treatment of POWs and during three or four meetings of Headquarters staff officers, he was allowed to attend, he was not informed about mistreatment of POWs nor was there such a discussion.

32247 The prosecution had alleged that the atrocities and mistreatment of POWs were well known before he was appointed Premier, * but there was no public knowledge about such matters. He knew nothing about them since he was in Korea from May 1942 to July 1944 and he believed only those directly in charge of POWs knew about the existence of such problems. The possession of short-wave radios was prohibited both to civilians and officials and the accused did not possess such a radio, hear the Eden broadcasts, nor was any report ever made to him about such matters. Censorship might also count for the lack of public knowledge. Furthermore, the notification to be issued by the Vice War Minister on the treatment of POWs, according to Exhibits 2012 to 14, was outside the Premier's duties and did not require being reported to him. The dates cited by the Prosecution of almost all the protests or inquiries from foreign countries regarding the treatment of POWs, sea victims and internees * were at the time when he was not Premier and even if a few did come during his tenure, he received no reports about them from the Foreign Minister. Therefore, he knew nothing about them and did not investigate. He firmly believed that POWs were being treated properly and the cases described in Court of cruel and inhuman acts were beyond his imagination and it never occurred to him to suggest any investigation while he was Premier.

32248 In Dec. 1941 he was invited to a party by an acquaintance YAMANAKA and there he expressed his view opposing the opening of hostilities, saying he desired to avert the opening of war and stating his reasons.

32249 * On receiving word he was to stand trial, KOISO went voluntarily to SUGAMO on 23 Nov. 1945 and at that time carried with him a letter from Mrs. Yamanaka to his wife which stated that she recalled what KOISO had said, and that he was far-sighted.

When KOISO's belongings were examined, he made a plea that he wanted to keep the letter since it was a part of his personal evidence, but it was taken from him and he was told it would be returned when necessary. He had approached the prison authorities, asking for the return of the letter but had been unable to get it back as he was told it had been lost.

32250 * KOISO consistently maintained a view opposing war with America and Britain; this could be shown in a statement of Major General Piggot, the British Military Attache, which showed that

Page Figgot visited KOISO in 1939 and KOISO expressed the opinion that relations with America and Britain must be improved and they must avoid resorting to arms.

Exhibit 277 stated that in the administrative policy speech delivered to the Diet on 7 Sept. 1944 as Premier, KOISO declared that the independence of NEI would be recognized.

32251 * The facts were that according to military administration reports, natives had long wished for independence and had been wholeheartedly cooperating with the military and their national consciousness had increased. On consultation, the Supreme Council agreed that it was necessary to take steps to recognize their independence and KOISO submitted the matter to the Cabinet Conference, obtained its approval, and made a statement of the policy to the Diet, and steps were taken to prepare for its effectuation. In this speech it was stated that, concentrating all efforts, KOISO wished to gather national strength together with national unity to achieve the war's end in accordance with the expected operation of the armed forces which would soon be realized to destroy America and Britain.

32252 The accused submitted that this was a speech any Premier would make under the circumstances for they were on the defensive and the allies threatened to destroy Japan. * His real intention behind the statement was that they could no longer hope for final victory so now that the Army and Navy were anticipating a decisive battle in the near future, if they would destroy temporarily the advance of the enemy, it might be that by taking advantage of such opportunity they might plan to bring about the end of the war and arrange for negotiated peace. This idea was also maintained by members of the Supreme Council for Direction of War and Cabinet members.

32253 * The Supreme Council also devised two schemes for peace which proved it also had the will to end the war. One of these measures was through the good offices of the Chungking administration and the other through the Soviet. It was KOISO's plan that if both measures bid fair to be successful, the one through Chungking would be limited to peace between Japan and China, while the peace in the Pacific War would be primarily through the mediation of the USSR. For this purpose they hastened a direct communication route with Chungking and tried to despatch proper representatives to the Soviet in addition to the ambassador there. However, the project of the Army and Navy which was to destroy the advance of the enemy ended in a failure in the Philippines and adjacent areas and all measures for terminating the war confronted various obstacles.

* During this time the war situation became increasingly unfavorable and KOISO devised to bring about further adjustment and harmonization of state policy and the Supreme Command and also increase production, thereby they would be enabled to have an accurate idea as to the substance of their war potential and it was his desire to make a prompt decision on future policy. As to harmonization of policy and Supreme Command, he obtained Imperial sanction to create the Supreme War Directing Council to be a more simplified and powerful organ concerned with the Liaison Council of the government and Supreme Command.

32255

With regard to increased production, all efforts were concentrated to achieve this. However, the Supreme Council did not come up to his expectations and was ineffective and the Supreme Command was prone to develop in unexpected directions without the Premier's knowledge. * Reduction of war potential accelerated owing to increasing bombing damages. To eliminate defective points, KOISO was authorized to attend the Headquarters Conferences by order of the Imperial Command, but being bound by the constitutional provisions, had no opportunity to take active part in matters pertaining to operations and tactics. To improve defects in production, efforts were made to remove manufacturing establishments to places of safety. Because of difficulties, they were hardly able to obtain expected results. A War Minister being engaged in affairs relating both to state policy and the Supreme Command could not only be well informed of war potential but also be aware of even secret plans with regard to operations and tactics. On the other hand, he was authorized in the scope of military operation * to apply military force, equipment, etc. to fields most necessary to strengthen war potential. KOISO asked for Imperial sanction to return to the active list so he could hold the additional post of War Minister. He, as Premier, was resolved to extirpate the two big defects and thus to prosecute his policy.

32256

On 3 April 1945 he suggested to War Minister SUGIYAMA the plan of the Premier holding the additional post of War Minister, but met SUGIYAMA's opposition. Upon consultation with YONAI, cooperator in the joint cabinet, KOISO applied for resigning from the Premiership, wishing for the realization of a new and more powerful cabinet.

32257

On 5 April 1945 he resigned as Premier and permanently withdrew from public life. At no time did he have conversation with any of the accused or anyone else involving the planning, scheming, and conspiring as alleged in the indictment. * He had no official or personal relations with DOIHARA, HASHIMOTO, HOSHINO, KAYA, KIMURA, MUTO, OKA, OSHIMA, SHIMADA, TOGO and TOJO. He did not become 32258 On further oral examination, the accused was asked about the reliability of Miao Pin. He stated that he had occasion to meet him twice in 1939 * and learned that Miao Pin was a staunch advocate of Japanese-Chinese friendship and was also a very close friend of Ho Ying-chin, a leader in the Chungking Government.

Although Miao Pin was nominated president of the Nanking Legislative Yuan under Wang Chingwei, he was demoted to the post of Vice Chief of the Examination Board because of intercourse with the Chungking Regime. He constantly kept contact with Chungking by wireless, and people were sent him from Chungking for liaison. Upon Miao's arrival in Tokyo, he showed KOISO a telegram from Chungking, stating that that regime approved of his trip but that he should not go beyond the scope of the peace terms stipulated by Chungking.

32259 The points in the peace terms said to have been set forth by the Chungking Government were * (1) with regard to the Manchurian question, a separate agreement should be made; (2) Japan would completely withdraw her forces from China; (3) Japan should detain all leaders of the Wang Chingwei Regime in Nanking, in Japan; (4) The Chungking Regime would establish in Nanking for the time being a government in absentia and place in that government* leaders of the Chungking Regime; (5) The Chungking Government would return to Nanking within 3 months; and (6) Japan should make peace with the US and Britain.

32260 * KOISO endeavored to establish a direct line of communication with Chungking by using the services of Miao Pin. Asked if his projected peace moves were opposed he replied that he invited Miao to Japan with the approval of the Minister of War and Navy and Foreign Affairs. However, when these ministers were received in audience by the Emperor they expressed disapproval of the idea in early April 1945. Asked if that was before the report was made to the Throne on his plan for direct peace negotiations, he replied he thought it was on March 27 that he first reported to the Throne in connection with the Miao Pin matter. At that time the Emperor did not express * approval or disapproval but asked whether KOISO intended to continue peace efforts through Miao Pin, and KOISO answered that that was his intention.

He thought it was on April 2 that he was given an audience by the Emperor and on that occasion the Emperor said that the Page War, Navy and Foreign Ministers had expressed disagreement and disapproval of the idea. The Emperor then instructed KOISO to return Miao Pin immediately to China but did not rebuke him.

Asked what other peace plans he tried as to U.S. and Britain, he replied that he made efforts to send special envoy to Moscow in addition to the ambassador there to make preparations for peace moves vis a vis the U.S. and Britain. He had Ambassador SATO in Moscow take this up with the People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs but this meant refusal on the part of Soviet authorities.

* Asked why he sought reinstatement into active service and if it was for the purpose of redoubling his efforts for the prosecution of war as testified by KIDO (T. 31248), he replied that KIDO's testimony was wrong. His idea in connection with this had already been set forth in his affidavit. By holding the office of War Minister concurrently, his intention was to bring about increased war production and thereby, from the standpoint of the High Command, get an overall picture of national strength, and on the basis of this, wished to decide whether it would be preferable immediately to bring an end to the war, or if the Army advocated holding the final and decisive battle on the mainland and then bring about an end to the war.

Asked if he would have had a means of knowing secret plans as War Minister that he did not have as Premier, he replied that the War and Navy Ministers, because they handle matters of state and matters of the High Command, * to bring about harmony between the two, they were able to know in advance military plans and operations and tactics before any decision was reached on such plans. It was necessary to understand and fully grasp the relationship of war and the termination of war to have more control if he was working out peace plans. Following this opposition, he resigned on 5 April 1945.

The witness stated that with regard to his holding the post of War Minister concurrently, he had talks with War Minister SUGIYAMA because if that was not possible, there was no need for his applying for reinstatement into active service. Therefore, he did not apply. Asked if he did not seek it from SUGIYAMA without making actual application, he replied that expression of the desire to hold the post of War Minister amounted to asking for reinstatement into active service. * At that time the war situation was deteriorating and he was eager to increase war production.

32268 Asked if he was convinced of Miao Pin's authority to act as a liaison for the Chungking Government, he replied that because he was unable to trust him one hundred per cent, he made efforts to ascertain whether he was actually trustworthy. Asked if it was not true that one of the matters he wanted Miao Pin to confirm was his authority from Chungking, and if it was not true that the only way he could check this was to get into radio communication with Chungking, he replied that this was generally so. As he had said before, Miao Pin was for the most part originally related to the Chungking regime. At first it was KOISO's idea that Miao Pin did not have qualifications to act as China's representative in connection with peace.

32269 * Utilization of Miao Pin was only to the extent of establishing direct communication with Chungking. If such contact would be established, it was KOISO's intention to present the matter before the Supreme Council to study and discuss peace terms. Unless the Chungking government sent a bona fide representative, it was not Japan's intention to enter into peace talks. Neither he nor the government considered Miao Pin a Chungking representative in connection with peace with China.

32270 * Their only intention was to utilize him for direct communication with Chungking.

32271 KOISO entertained doubts that Miao Pin had any form of contact with Chungking, as he claimed,* to do with wireless apparatus, and so KOISO arranged to have Miao Pin bring his wireless apparatus to Tokyo with him as well as his operator. They had Miao Pin actually communicate through this apparatus with Chungking and at that time intercepted the message to find out whether everything was bona fide. Asked if it was not a fact that Miao Pin came to Tokyo without his radio apparatus and that the Japanese refused to fly it from Shanghai, he stated that in his affidavit there were various impediments in the way.

32272 * It was scheduled that Miao Pin was to bring the apparatus to Tokyo as well as the operator and representative from Chungking, but because he came alone further steps were taken to bring the apparatus and operating personnel later on. Asked if he didn't previously testify that Miao Pin brought the apparatus and by means of it was able to communicate with Chungking, he replied that Miao Pin said that he was able to communicate with Chungking by his wireless. But unless it was actually tested, it was impossible for him to ascertain whether he was actually in a position to do so, and since they could not test it, they were unable to ascertain that. They got information that there was a person with a wireless in Peking who was in communication with Chungking, so they made efforts to bring from Peking to Tokyo this personnel and apparatus there.

32273 * The accused stated he had no recollection of ever being named director of the Kokuhonsha Society, nor did he hold any office in that society. At the time he was a regimental commander he became a member out of a desire to read a publication of the organization. He thought he became a member in 1924 and continued in its membership until the society disappeared. 32274 * He attended one meeting of the organization but not the one to which the accused MINAMI was a speaker in July 1931. He had no recollection at the meeting he attended whether MINAMI was present. HIRANUMA was present but he did not know whether ARAKI was.

32275 He had no positive recollection that HIRANUMA was a director but knew the accused HIRANUMA was president. Asked if the purposes of the Kokuhonsha were mainly to foster nationalism, bolster * the state foundations, and exalt national spirit, he replied that nobody ever explained to him its real nature, but from what he had read in the publication of the organization his understanding was that its purpose was to support a true understanding of Japan's true nature and spirit.

32276 * Asked if that interested him as a regimental officer to the point he joined, he replied that at that time the domestic situation was confusing and Japan's fundamental character not fully clarified, and he thought it a good thing to secure an understanding of their true character and spirit through the magazine of the organization and that lead to his membership. It was his understanding that it was absolutely not the case that the organization hoped to accomplish its aims in part by political measures. He did not recall becoming interested in May 1932 in advocating HIRANUMA as premier, but when asked whom he thought would be good as the next premier, he might have replied that HIRANUMA might have been the best man. 32277 *He did not recall making such a statement to KIDO, nor whom he made the statement to. At the time he made the statement he did not recall whether he was Vice War Minister.

- 32278 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that KOISO first met KIDO in April 1932. It appeared that KIDO, in his diary in May 1932, recorded that KOISO seemed to be in favor of HIRANUMA for premier. The accused was asked to state the circumstances under which he met KIDO and their conversation at that time. He replied that Parliamentary Vice-Minister of War DOKI told him that members of the House of Peers were meeting at the Kazanhan and invited KOISO there with him. There he met KIDO, but in his recollection, the first time he ever talked with him was in 1939 * when they were both in the HIRANUMA cabinet.
- 32279
- 32280 The premiership of Japan was a political office. * Asked if the rule prohibiting officers from engaging in political activities applied to the Vice War Minister at the time he held that office, he replied that the war and navy vice ministers were considered civil officials according to regulations, although an active officer could not resign his post at his personal request, the service vice ministers might, at times of cabinet changes, be relieved of their duties at their own request. In the war and navy departments, when appointments were made as officers, the term "hosu" or "assignment" was used, but in the case of vice ministers the word "ninzu" or "appointment" was used.
- 32281 "The accused stated he was at no time a member of the Sakurakai. Asked if in early January 1931 he was a party to discussions for measures reforming Japan to which UGAKI, SUGIYAMA, NINOMIYA, HASHIMOTO and others were present, he replied that an excerpt from the KIDO diary, which he recalled was exhibit 179-F, was probably referred to, but there was completely no foundation. He had never attended such a meeting. There was no movement within the war ministry to foster the political activities of UGAKI in early 1931. At that time he
- 32282 was not acquainted with the accused HASHIMOTO, but had been acquainted with TATEKAWA since August 1931. He knew him before that but was not intimate.

There was no such thing as a group in the War Department while he was chief in the military affairs bureau in 1931 that favored military force in connection with UGAKI's appearance on the political field. Reference was made to the affidavit where it described a plan OKAWA proposed KOISO take up with UGAKI. The accused was asked, if, in a voluntary statement, he had not given OKAWA's plan to be one to confuse 32283 the Diet by hurling bombs at it; attack the Metropolitan Police force, and bring about a situation whereby public peace could not be maintained except by military force: then to guide the situation to where martial law would be necessitated; * to make the cabinet responsible for it and resign en bloc; let UGAKI offer to save the situation; take measures to make it possible that the Imperial Order would be given to organize the next cabinet. As for measures to save the situation, it was enough that they were to be planned after Imperial Order was given.

Asked if he got that statement from OKAWA in March 1931 when he visited the accused in the War Ministry, he replied that this probably took place the end of February and a visit was made to his own house. At that time OKAWA expressed such ideas. It had already been made clear to the tribunal that the bomb used was a sort of paper bomb used in maneuvers, and not real bombs. Asked if when he spoke of firecrackers in his affidavit if he really meant bombs he replied that when OKAWA came to see him in February 1931, he used the word "bombs."

32284 * Asked if, as a matter of fact, the army in 1931 was not using firecrackers in artillery practice. he replied, 32285 "Yes, . . . these firecrackers were used." He referred to this article as dummy or blank shells, and at that time did not know through whose hands they were delivered to OKAWA and his group. Asked if he later found out that Major-General TATEKAWA of the General Staff office had released the bombs and that they were delivered by HASHIMOTO, or under his direction, he replied that when he went to the vice chief of staff to warn that it was improper to have general staff officers 32286 approach such * a person as OKAWA, the vice chief reported that the dummy shells were delivered from TATEKAWA to OKAWA's group. Since then he did not know by whose hand they were delivered and it was in the Tribunal that he heard for the first time that HASHIMOTO was one of those responsible for delivery of the bombs.

32287 * Asked if, after OKAWA outlined the plot to him, he took any action to have him arrested, he replied that he believed that if he succeeded in having OKAWA and his group abandon the reckless plan, he did not think there was any need to arrest them. Asked if he had the same opinion with reference to army officers who participated, he replied that because he believed such plottings highly improper, he went to 32288 the vice chief of staff to warn him it was highly improper. KOISO had no authority to issue any indictment or make charges. Asked if he recommended to anyone who had authority to file charges to do so, he replied that if there was any necessity to file charges, there was no need to await his warning and, inasmuch as he went to the General Staff * with the warning to stop such rash action, he believed the general staff did take appropriate steps. With regard to filing charges, the accused stated he did not do anything.

Asked if he examined the plan that OKAWA brought to him the first time he brought it, he replied that when he heard the plan explained he told OKAWA point blank that it must be immediately abandoned. Colonel NAGATA was under KOISO as chief of the military affairs section.

32289 * Asked if, after he had determined that the plan was reckless, he ordered NAGATA to examine the plan for its consistency, he replied that * he warned OKAWA to abandon the plan but he did not accept his advice. Thereupon he reported to War Minister UGAKI that what OKAWA wanted to submit to him was a matter in which the war minister should not be involved. UGAKI then ordered KOISO to ask OKAWA to submit the plan in writing and so KOISO met OKAWA again.

32291 KOISO tried his best to decipher the document submitted but could not do so and asked OKAWA to read the contents. * KOISO took the explanation down with pencil and brought the original document and his memorandum to the war minister. Although KOISO compared his notes with the document, he could find no consistency in the plan, and so he ordered NAGATA to find out whether there was consistency.

32292 At that time he had already made up his mind that the plan was not workable. Asked if he had nevertheless ordered NAGATA to examine the plan for its consistency after he decided it was an improper plan, he replied that it was not so. The matter had to be reported to the war minister and no explanation could be offered on any plan in which there could not be found consistency. That was why he ordered NAGATA to discover * whether there was consistency so a logical report could be made.

Asked if he thought a plan to blow up the Diet and cause a coup d'etat in the government could be made consistent, he replied because the plan itself was highly inconsistent he warned OKAWA to abandon the idea. Asked if it was correct that he disapproved of the plan himself and then turned it over to his subordinate to try to improve it, he replied any such order to NAGATA was not given by him. After submitting the document to UGAKI, KOISO saw him one or two days later and asked for his reaction. UGAKI condemned the plan, using the explanation, "Could such an absurd thing be adopted?"

32293 * Very apparently UGAKI opposed the plan.

Asked if after he had been given this information by the war minister if it was not a fact that he continued to have NAGATA still work to have the plan made consistent, he replied that was without foundation. He had stated in his affidavit that army prestige would be injured if the bombs had remained outstanding, so he desired to secure their return. Asked if OKAWA or one of his henchmen had the bombs at that time, he replied that he heard later that one of OKAWA's followers had them. That person was SHIMIZU, who appeared as a witness before the tribunal.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated KOISO intervened with TOKUGAWA to secure the return of the bombs and the accused was asked when he first asked TOKUGAWA's help, * he replied that it was around March 27 or 28, 1932 that he asked the return of the bombs through other persons. At that time, not only the return of the bombs was demanded but also it was requested that OKAWA be commanded to abandon the plan entirely and they succeeded in this as a result of TOKUGAWA's efforts.

KOISO did not know whether the dummy bombs were actually returned by OKAWA or transferred from OKAWA to TOKUGAWA, nor did he know whether TOKUGAWA talked to OKAWA about the bombs.

32295 * It was only once that he met TOKUGAWA personally and asked for good offices to bring about a return of the bombs. Asked again how many times he requested OKAWA, SHIMIZU, TOKUGAWA, or anyone else to return the bombs before they were returned, he replied that he asked OKAWA only once. It was not until March 1932 that he got the bombs back to the war department until March 1932 for they were returned around December 1931. It was not so that the bombs were kept that length of time, having in view the incident of October 1931.

32296 * Asked why, if he was so afraid of army prestige what prevented him from sending a army truck out to the place where the bombs were, and seizing them, he replied that the dummy shells were delivered to OKAWA by General Staff officers, and any attempt to have them returned was the business of the General Staff and not the chief of the military affairs bureau. Asked why he was intermeddling in the matter for if it was a matter for the General Staff to secure the bombs back, he replied that this was actually the duty of the General Staff as it involved its officers, but inasmuch as the General Staff's efforts were far from sufficient, and inasmuch as the bombs should not, under any circumstances, be in the possession of civilians, and because the matter reflected upon the army's prestige, KOISO in his capacity, as chief of the military affairs bureau, undertook the job of trying to get the bombs back.

32297 * Asked if he meant to tell the tribunal that he had to virtually beg a civilian to intervene in behalf of the War Ministry to secure the return of these shells which were War Department property, he replied that the shells were not the property of the War Ministry, but of the artillery school.

32298 * The artillery school was under the jurisdiction of the Inspector general of military education. Asked if the artillery school was not also connected with the military affairs bureau, he replied that the school was a training institute under the inspector general.

32299 The army had three distinct branches, the War Ministry, the Inspector * General of Military Education, and the General Staff Headquarters. I did not say the shells were the property of the general staff. The general staff officers made arrangements to have the shells delivered to OKAWA's group but the shells were the property of the organization under the inspector general. He did not know if the inspector general knew that some of his bombs were in the possession of a civilian.

32300 * Asked if he did not know that the matter of disposing and ruling Manchuria and Mongolia was undergoing studies prior to July 1931 in the War Ministry, he replied that he did not know, that such a thing was highly impossible.

32301 * Asked if he knew an officer named SHIMANUKI and if he was a subordinate of the accused in July 1931, he replied he did not know whether it was prior to 1932 but he thought there was a captain by that name who was an army officer in the military administration section. There was a section within the bureau called the military section in 1931. Asked if he recalled the communication that came to the military affairs bureau and was acted upon in the military service section, received from military policy commander MINE in which he submitted an estimate of his requirements in connection with the occupation of Manchuria and Mongolia, KOISO replied that there may have been but he had no recollection.

32302 * When shown a document he was asked to refer to a portion thereof being a letter of 25 July 1931 from the commander of the military policy to the war minister in reference to a study of the reorganization of the military policy forces in Manchuria, the accused acknowledged that the document bore the seal of SHIMANUKI and he admitted the truth of the contents of the document.

32303 Exhibit 3376, the document was identified by the accused being a report to War Minister MINAMI from MINE dated 25 July 1941 with the seal of the Provost Marshal on it and marked "Secret" was entitled "Study on the Organization of MP Force in Manchuria." It stated that they had no need to enlarge on the fact that in the future war, the Empire should secure complete possession of Manchuria and Mongolia from the standpoint of maintaining fighting capability and self sufficiency.

32304 The management and administration of Manchuria and Mongolia was being studied by responsible organs, and with this the necessity of inquiry on the MP in the occupied areas was also evident. The necessity of the MP activities in enforcing military administration had been proved by a * number of wars and was clearly increasing due to the tendency of recent warfare more of a psychological nature.

As to the present situation in Manchuria and Mongolia, pending negotiations between Japan and China were being aggravated, and Japanese MP in Manchuria were greater in activity. He believed it most necessary and timely to consider the changing phases of future military operations, and to study the application, strength, etc., of the MP. The gist of the writer's opinion was that if a complete military occupation of a certain area in Manchuria and Mongolia was planned, a minimum force of about 5,000 MP, with the addition 32305 of some Chinese and Korean MP assistants, besides a part of the occupation garrison, was required to maintain peace and order. However the whole number of MP was * far from sufficient to meet the requirement. To increase this organization the full number of the Kwantung MP should be revised and increased, and exceptions for extraordinary drafting should be provided for. The total number of MP requirements in Manchuria would be about 5,000 with approximately 20,000 Chinese (Korean) auxiliaries.

The basis of the estimation approves on the whole the "Study on the Administration of the Occupied Territories in Manchuria and Mongolia," compiled by Kwantung Army Headquarters. Namely, about 25,000 MP would be placed in the hypothetical administrative area of about 45,000 square "ri" with a population of about 27,000,000, which rate being one MP for a population of about 1100 in an area of 1.8 square "ri."

32307 * Asked if in September 1931 he felt there was a very critical situation in Manchuria, he replied the period could not be confined to the single month of September, but for a period of one or two years previously. Due to pending issues in China and Manchuria, feelings between Japan and China were becoming aggravated. Asked if he asked MINAMI's consent to take the matter up with the general staff to seek a decision as to what should be done with reference to the ultimate dispatch of TATEKAWA to Mukden, he replied he had one conversation with MINAMI in connection with TATEKAWA's dispatch.

32308 Asked if he had a conversation with MINAMI with reference to the critical situation in Manchuria in early September, he replied * that the situation between Japan and China and Manchuria was becoming more critical and in the light of the strength of the Japanese army, he expressed his opinion to the War Minister and Vice Minister that no matter what happened, if trouble broke out, it should be settled peacefully and so must be avoided.

Asked if he got MINAMI's permission to talk the matter over with general staff, he replied he had never received any such permission or order. Asked if he went to the general staff to discuss the question taken up with MINAMI about which KOISO was so fearful, he replied he expressed the same opinion to the vice chief of the general staff.

32309 Asked if he expressed that opinion in a personal or official capacity, he replied he received no instructions from MINAMI, but before becoming chief of the military affairs bureau of the war office, * he was chief of the material mobilization and procurement bureau and was familiar with the situation of the armed forces, as well as the condition of the war production industry, and after becoming military affairs bureau chief, he obtained a far better understanding of the situation between China and Japan. With this background he expressed the opinion in his position as a bureau chief.

When he expressed this opinion only the vice chief of staff NINOMIYA was present. He did not mention TATEKAWA to NINOMIYA as a suitable person to be entrusted with the mission to stop an outbreak in Manchuria and he never mentioned it at any other time with any person connected with the general staff.

32310 * He did not recall the date when he found out that TATEKAWA was selected to go to Manchuria on orders of the general staff, but did recall that a telephone message was sent from the vice chief of staff to the military affairs bureau to that effect before the outbreak of the Mukden incident. Asked if it was not a fact that he received the information several days before the Mukden incident, he stated he had no clear recollection as to dates. He had not had clear recollection as to dates two years before when he gave a written statement to Major Hummel of IPS in connection with this point.

32311 * The accused was asked if it was stated in such statement that it was expected TATEKAWA would arrive at Kwantung army headquarters by September 15 at the latest. He replied this must be a mistake in recollection on the part of the prosecutor. He had not said anything of the kind to Major Hummel. The date "15th" was written on a memo, but if his affidavit was reread it would be understood that after entering Sugamo Prison he had tried to trace his faint recollection to approach as accurate a date as possible. But it was inescapable that he might be mistaken as to dates as well as facts.

32322 * Asked if it was not expected that TATEKAWA would appear at Kwantung army headquarters by at least 15 September

32323 * 1931, he replied that there was some error in notes made on his memorandum sheet. The notes should have been that to his inquiry of the vice chief of staff, whether there was any report from TATEKAWA, the vice chief replied that it was about time for TATEKAWA to arrive in Manchuria, and probably he was holding discussions with the Kwantung army commander, for as yet there was no reply from him. The accused now felt that it was a mistake on his part to have written the 15th on his memo.

Asked if it was also a mistake when he stated in his memorandum that TATEKAWA spent many days discussing the Manchurian situation with the Kwantung army headquarter's staff, and that was why he was delayed in getting to Mukden, KOISO replied that he had absolutely not written such a thing in his memorandum.

32324 * He did not know what kind of instructions TATEKAWA received before he left for Mukden, nor on what day he departed. Asked if he still said that after TATEKAWA departed and he received a message from the general staff that he was on his way, he didn't know what he was going there for, he replied that was not so. He knew his purpose in going to Manchuria but he did not know what the instruction was. Asked if the purpose of TATEKAWA's going was not to prevent the outbreak of an incident, he replied the purpose of the mission was that whatever might be the situation, patience and forbearance must be exercised.

32325 * There was telephone communication at that time between Tokyo, Port Arthur, and Mukden. Asked why such a slow and uncertain method of communicating a simple request or decision of the general staff was adopted, if telegraph communication was available, he replied that in the light of the situation within the army and in order to have the chief of staff and war minister's ideas thoroughly understood, a person carrying such detailed information should be dispatched.

32326 * He did not discuss the purpose of TATEKAWA's trip with him before he left for Mukden. This TATEKAWA was the same person of the general staff who was instrumental in releasing bombs to CKAWA the previous March. TATEKAWA's failure to proceed expeditiously to Mukden and his failure to deliver the orders upon his arrival in Mukden was not because the accused and TATEKAWA had a prearranged plan to permit an incident to occur. He had heard that this was in the HARADA

32327 diary but it was completely without foundation and a falsehood. Asked if while he was chief of the military affairs bureau, the Kwantung army was guiding the intelligence movement in Manchukuo for establishing a regency after the outbreak of the Manchurian incident, * he replied that on 15 November war minister MINAMI sent instructions to the Kwantung Army commander that the army should not under any circumstances participate in political questions centering around Pu-Yi. The accused thought the Kwantung army was not doing anything of the kind in pursuance of this instruction.

32329 Asked if the document forwarded by Kwantung army chief of staff MIYAKI to the war vice minister about 5 December 1931 dealing with the policy of the intelligence movement guidance came to his attention, he replied he had no recollection. When shown this report he was asked whether it passed through his office while he was chief of the military affairs bureau and if he admitted the truth of its contents, he stated that * it was a document upon which he had never cast his eyes. Its contents seemed to be personal opinions and were never adopted. Neither his own seal nor that of the section chief appeared on it and it only bore the seal of one SUZUKI. It did not pass through the military affairs section, * but the

* The accused was asked if it appeared in the document that two copies of the appendix were retained by the Military Administration (Affairs) Section. He replied that he could not find the seal of the Chief of the Military Administration Section, and it was impossible to ascertain how many copies were kept in its custody. When the document apparently came to his bureau, he felt sure that both he and the Section Chief were on duty.

Asked if it was not true that a document of this nature involving an important policy matter would have been brought to his attention by a section sub-chief before it went to the Vice Minister, he replied that if it were of such importance as to be shown to the Vice-Minister, it would first be shown to the Military Affairs Bureau Chief. * On looking over the document, it had come to him that if the seal of someone acting for the section chief appeared, it should also bear the words "by" or "proxy".

32335

The SUZUKI whose name appeared on the document was one of his subordinates and a member of the Military Administration Section. The accused recalled that with such drafts when there was a doubt whether it was worth sending on to be adopted as final policy, lower section members would often send it semi-officially to their section chief, and after studying it if he decided it was worthwhile adopting, it would be sent through official channels in its final form. * He could see no indication that this document was ever adopted by the War Ministry later.

32336

He would not say that Kwantung Army Chief of Staff MIYAKE would send to the War Ministry an untrue document, but since he had no remembrance of ever having seen the document, he could not admit its truth. After * looking through the document, he stated that the Kwantung Army might have conducted studies on this matter, but he never knew of it until he saw it here. He didn't recall

32337

* ever making any study of the document while he was a bureau chief. However, on looking at it, he saw on the margin in red pencil the words "good" or "true" and other criticisms, and therefore it was easy to infer that after reaching the Ministry the document was looked into by someone and commented on. * He did believe that the document was accurately drawn up by the Kwantung Army and sent on.

* Exhibit 3377, an excerpt from exhibit 3028-G, being a letter dated 5 December, 1931, from Chief of Staff MIYAKE to Vice-Minister SUGIYAMA re matters concerning the delivery of documents pertaining to plans for the temporary system now being carried out in the policy toward Manchuria and Mongolia, stated that in the present situation active guidance by a powerful, clear-cut, autocratic organ was necessary. If a huge but weak organ was established, it would aggravate the situation, and not only be unwise but might be destroyed. Furthermore, the secret would leak out, * and it would be unsuitable for establishing rights and interests or for establishing a regime through inner guidance.

The Chinese regimes were dependent solely on the Japanese military, and were already in the midst of various constructions. If a new organ was established separately, there was fear that orders from two sources would overlap and the construction project be destroyed. Particularly, the feeling of confidence was weak toward organs with tendencies leaning toward political parties and factions, or which became corrupt easily in movements to guard rights and interests or which wantonly make speculations in international relations. These organs would be unsuitable to the construction project which must be progressed while displaying power to the Chinese.

32341

The council system of the various organs actually would not be able to bring about the solution to Manchuria and Mongolia affairs. It would be most logical for the * army to newly establish a governing section in the present organ, and for the organs in Manchuria to give it lateral support. If a new government was established, its guidance would be carried out by an advisory body. It was believed advantageous for headquarters and others to merge with the government general described in a separate book.

32342

The accused stated that General TADA was an adviser to the Military Government Department of Manchukuo while he was Kwantung Army Chief of Staff. TADA was not Chief of the Counselling Section of the Army, for the word "attached" meant he was on duty with the army and did not necessarily mean he had no position in general headquarters. * His status was of an officer attached to staff headquarters, and he was under the Kwantung Army Commander's jurisdiction.

32343

* The accused had no connection with the work TADA was doing in Manchuria.

The procedure in submitting his reports was that he submitted them directly to the army commander, although as Chief of Staff KOISO was aware of them. Asked if he knew that TADA was principally engaged in guiding the military government in Manchukuo, he replied that as a counsellor of the Military Government Section, he responded to inquiries of the Military Government Minister of Manchukuo. The Section did not occupy itself with such duties, but its main functions were the organization and training of troops.

TADA was not connected with matters involving the coordination of personnel, finance, and munitions. * TADA was the Chief Adviser of the Military Government Section, and had quite a few subordinates, and the group composed the Advisory Section to the Military Government Section. The subordinates were called advisers, and worked in the section of Manchukuo. The section was not in reality a great network for performing its functions throughout the country. He denied that the system of advisers actually placed the Manchukuoan Army under the direct control of the Japanese.

32345

* In explanation, he stated that his appointment as Chief of Staff came barely half a year after Manchukuo's independence, and its national army was composed of remnants of the old military cliques. TADA gained the approval of the Minister of Military Government and the consent of the Kwantung Army Commander to the limitation of the functions of the national army to preservation of peace and order, and it was also discussed that the total number of the army should be around 60,000. That was why at the time the national army was not organized and no schools existed. Not until he left Manchukuo in 1934 did he hear that schools had been established. It was impossible for TADA and the advisers to engage in any functions other than these.

32346

* The functions described by the prosecutor really belong to the advisers to the Kwantung Army Commander, and whatever TADA might say, he could not and did not engage in such functions. No advisers were sent to the national army. They were Kwantung Army officers, and with TADA as their chief were assigned to the advisory section. The 32347 * section did not play a very important role in the re-establishment of law and order in Jehol. It was not true * that the section was used to control the life pulse of the Manchukuoan Army, and it was not true that the advisers and instructors of that army became the practical rulers of both the local and central government of Manchukuo.

32348

32349

* When shown a document appearing to be a report by TADA to the Kwantung Army Commander dated 4 August 1944, entitled "The Guidance of the Military Government of Manchukuo", he was asked if he knew whether the contents were correct. He stated the document was presented by TADA after he had left his post, and it was the first time he had seen it. * However, he could state it was a report by TADA to Kwantung Army Commander HISHIKARI. Regarding the question a short while before concerning personnel and finance, he took the question to apply to matters of personnel and finance pertaining to Manchukuo as a whole, and that is why he answered as he did, but on looking through this document he found that since TADA was an adviser to the Military Government Department, it was but natural that he was concerned with matters of personnel, intendance, legal affairs, and medicine, so far as they related to his section. Matters concerning practical control of Manchukuo were mentioned in TADA's report as future plans, but he felt quite sure that his view of the state of affairs was mistaken.

32357

* Exhibit 3378-A, the document identified by the accused, stated that TADA, on leaving his post, submitted to C-in-C HISHIKARI a report on conditions * connected with the guidance of the military government of Manchukuo. The annexed booklet was to be handed to his successor. The first chapter of the document was "The Outline of the Guidance of the Military Government from the Time of the Founding of the Empire" and Article One was "Grasp by Force and the Central Control".

32358

At the beginning of the founding of the Manchukuo Empire, troops gradually reverted to the new state forced into submission by the Imperial Army, and were organized into province garrisons, but still assumed the aspect of rival war lords, and the controlling power of the military * government failed to penetrate into them. To make them loyal to the new state and put them under the practical control of the army, either in war or peace, it was necessary to control them first under the government's rule.

32359

In that period they established the policy of gradual organization and drew up "The Essential for Organization of the Manchukuo Army". As the first provisional measure, it was necessary to strive for grasping control of them by force, as well as putting the soldiers' minds at rest, so they sent advisers and instructors, few in number, to key points to assume the responsibility of gripping the Manchukuo Army with the influence of the Imperial Army for a backing.

Page At the same time, perceiving they must include in their grasp money, people, and munitions to control the life pulse of the Manchukuoan Army and put them under direct control, they first exercised general control over accounting, * personnel affairs, and munitions, and later strove for the gradual centralization of these matters.

To grasp control of the Manchukuoan Army, it was essential to form systematic networks and cellularize their veins and branches, and meetings of the advisers and instructors were held, who were scattered and hard to control at first. They strove to make them the pivot of control of the Manchukuo Army by impregnating them with a guiding spirit and gradually employing Japanese personnel, making them the veins and branches of the networks. They tried to establish a horizontal network with connections in all directions. After that they demanded an increased stationing of advisers in actual service, only to be refused, and were obliged to use reserve officers.

32361 * They were fortunate to have the number of officers in actual service doubled in April 1933, and to some extent succeeded in making the networks covering the whole of Manchukuo a desired organic system. They re-named all the officers in actual service advisers, changed their reserve status to that of call-in officers, naming them military instructors, and established a consistent connection even among their subordinates. They firmly established connection among Japanese-Manchukuoan officers in the Manchukuoan forces, government offices, * schools which had contact with the network and were under its control, thus consolidating the networks.

Jehol Province Operations were the greatest worked up and directed by the Advisory Section of the Military Government Department, a force of more than 40,000, with eight million yen spent for them. While * these operations belonged to the past, he would add that these operations carried out by the Manchukuoan Army were presided over by military government advisers and advisers of general headquarters of the former enemy.

Special attention should be accorded to the western boundary (Tolun) operations carried out after the Jehol operations. As a result of the operations, the eastern Chahar garrison, as one of the pro-Manchukuoan self-defense forces, was now stationed in the vicinity of Tolun, ruling over its neighborhood, and the government office of the governor of the Eastern Chahar Special Autonomous Administrative District was established.

Page

32363 The fact that Le Shou-hsin, commander of the Eastern Chahar Garrison, was concurrently commander of the * garrison of Hsingan Hsishen Province and the Military Government was expected to defray 300,000 yen annually for its expenses were also worthy of attention. With the founding of the state, Ma Chan-shan was appointed Vice-Chief of the Department, and carried on the chief's business in his behalf, organizing the department. At the outset, the Kwantung Army charged itself with his guidance, and Captains KOMATSU and SUMITANI, chiefly concerned themselves in this business.

32364

* On April 13, advisers to military administration, provincial guards' headquarters, and military instructors were appointed and placed under TADA's supervision. The * prerogative of Supreme Command was to be controlled by the Emperor, and a form to justify the name of Sovereign State was to be adopted, but the original source to put it in action was under the control of the Kwantung Army C-in-C. The source of Supreme Command was really in his hands.

32365

32366

It was not clear at the outset whether the prerogative of Supreme Command of Manchukuo was independent of her state affairs, but on the enforcement of Imperial (Manchukuo) rule, it was clear it should be independent.

* Considering that the army had made its elements penetrate deep into the Manchukuoan Army and had been controlling it making them grasp the substance of the Supreme Command, it might be proper to deal with supreme command of the Manchukuoan Army through the original system under the Kwantung Army and not through the Board of General Affairs.

Even practically, it would be idle to attempt to carry out matters belonging to the supreme command through civilians. As to the possibility of revolt by the Manchurian Army, if they came to a situation uncontrollable by the present advisory system, they should not be able to prevent the performance of duties pertaining to the supreme command by civilians.

* There was the opinion that there was a danger because the permanency of Manchurian Army Advisers was uncertain, but the withdrawal of advisers was unimaginable to those considering the permanent rule of Manchukuo. Armed troops could be the destructive as well as the mainstay of supreme command power, and they should not be able to loosen their control of a national army composed of a different race. It was obviously self-contradictory that the advocators were voluntarily thinking of taking steps convenient for revolt while recognizing the possibility of revolt by the Manchurian Army.

Page

There was the opinion that the dispatch of advisers should not be continued when it had no lawful foundation. However, from the spirit of the protocol and the articles of military agreement, their dispatch should be interpreted as having a lawful foundation. Customs could always be taken for lawful foundations.

32369 * By its independence they should give the Manchukuoan Army a nucleus and enhance the feeling of a national army. As long as the Kwantung Army had the * substance of a supreme command in its power, there was no danger. What they should be most careful about was that if they made a precedent of a non-independent supreme command it would become a source of calamity for the Imperial Army in the future, though all right for the present.

Although there were doubts within the Army as to the advisability of independence, negotiations were made with the authorities concerned according to the above opinion, and it was made independent as a matter of formality.

32369 * Existing advisers were not employed by the Manchukuo Army, nor did their appointment need its sanction, nor was ex post facto approval necessary. They were simply sent to the Manchukuo Army by the Kwantung Army in accordance with a military order. The advisers were Imperial Army organs, and the systematic networks for controlling the Manchukuoan Army were in reality branch organs of the Imperial Army. Though in the Manchukuoan Army advisers were in service on the standpoint that they were all advisers of the Japanese Army and burned with patriotic spirit, it was certain they would never place the Manchukuoan Army in opposition to the Japanese Army.

32370 * Manchukuoan leaders picked out by the advisers took part in the Military Government Department were naturally under the advisers' control, and as they had never been in this kind of service they could not do anything without the advisers' guidance. The Department held perfect control of the advisers. In provinces, Military Intelligence Bureau Chiefs were generally appointed advisers, as past circumstances naturally caused them to come into power. At the front, the Manchukuoan leaders realized they could obtain facilities in connection with the army through the advisers, and this caused them to make friends with them. The advisers' footing was raised as they thought it wise to rely upon them in negotiations with the department.

The Manchukuoan leaders began to reveal and rely upon the advisers after they knew the advisers' ability in matters concerning subjugation, * and they realized that a word from an adviser to central government authorities would concern their position, and this naturally induced them to be ruled by the advisers. In short, the advisers were practical rulers of both local and central governments.

The pivot of guidance was practical grasp of the Manchukuoan Army. For this, it was essential to establish control attended with real power with strong guiding networks, and control soldiers' minds. Measures and facilities to be established should be based on this.

TADA thought it necessary to consolidate relations between the networks themselves and the Japanese-Manchukuoan officials related to them. They should pay most attention to the establishment of Kempei-tai and the reform of training stations, and exert their utmost in matters affecting the human nature of the Manchukuoans, such as personnel affairs, allowances, etc. As for equipment, they should be satisfied by only fulfilling the minimum necessity and aim at immediate * maintenance of public peace and order. As for the equipment and facilities to be used by the Imperial Army in wartime, they should be completely equipped from a different point of view.

The accused was asked if not the real reason he was relieved as Vice-War Minister and made Kwantung Army Chief of Staff was so he could carry out the conquest of Jehol. He replied his transfer was carried out on the orders of his superiors, and he knew nothing about the reasons. When asked if Kwantung Army operations in Jehol were not accelerated shortly after his arrival as Chief of Staff, he stated that after the signing of the Japan-Manchukuo Protocol on 15 September, the Kwantung Army was given the responsibility of joint defense and peace and * order. The re-establishment of law and order in Jehol was necessary, but a more pressing problem was the re-establishment of peace and order east of the Taliho River. To affect this, they tried to re-establish peace and order in Jehol by peaceful means.

The accused was executive of the Special Service Department as well as Chief of Staff. DOIHARA had nothing to do with that organ while he was Chief of Staff. Asked if the Special Service Organ had charge of opium in Manchukuo, he replied the Manchukuoan Government had complete control of opium matters.

32374

* The Kwantung Army had nothing to do with the opium problem while he was Chief of Staff and Executive of the Organ.

32375

* When shown a document, he stated he didn't recall receiving three million yen from Secret Service funds in January, 1933, while he was Chief of Staff. Asked if he recommended to the War Ministry a customs tariff policy for Manchukuo, he stated he recalled receiving a document from the Kwantung Army Chief of Staff while he was Vice-Minister of War, but didn't recall sending out such a document. He didn't recall, after becoming Chief of Staff, making recommendations to effectuate a customs policy favorable to Japan, nor did he recall making a declaration that no country except Japan could participate unconditionally in Japanese-Manchukuoan conventional tariffs.

When shown a document purporting to be a letter from * himself to Vice-War Minister YANAGAWA dated 29 December, 1932, stating recommendations regarding Manchukuoan customs and tariffs, * he acknowledged that his official seal was set on it. Exhibit 3379-A, an excerpt from this document, stated that KOISO was notifying the Vice-Minister regarding a definite plan, as per separate text concerning Manchurian economic control, that had been obtained as a result of army research.

32378

* The separate text stated that the draft of outline of general measures regarding custom duties in Manchukuo, dated 12 December, 1932, at Kwantung Army Headquarters was to decide on a customs policy to make Japan and Manchukuo one economic unit. For the time being, the policy shall be adopted to have Manchukuo customs based on the statutory tariff in principle, but toward Japan tariff on certain articles shall be decided by agreement. Manchukuo shall be persuaded to keep from making any tariff agreement with other powers, and she shall not unconditionally allow other powers to share in the tariff between her and Japan.

The statutory tariff of Manchukuo shall be decided for the time being through revision, and later the general tariff shall be entirely altered. In revising the tariff, certain articles shall be specified as free, * or those on which duty shall be reduced. To make up for the subsequent decrease of revenue, duties on articles not hindering Japanese-Manchurian trade shall be increased.

In the revision of the tariff, legitimate consideration shall be taken to prevent third powers, especially China and Russia, from making an economic advance toward Manchukuo. A system shall be considered whereby discrimination may be made between exports and imports of countries friendly to Manchukuo and those unfriendly. Consideration shall be taken to devise a system reducing customs duties at the border of Manchuria and Korea. Special treatment shall be given to the duty of special articles necessary for common defense.

* Rights already acquired in accordance with treaties or agreements shall be independent from the statutory and stipulated tariffs. Regarding the abolition of the Manchurian Customs and Tariff Law, close connection between Japanese and Manchurian authorities shall be maintained. The customs system in Kwantung Province shall remain in general as at present.

The accused stated he didn't recall on January 24, 1934, while Kwantung Army Chief of Staff, making any recommendation to the Vice-Minister as to any changes in the proposed Manchukuoan constitution which was then under consideration. Asked if he recalled recommending power be divided between a premier and several department heads so that control by the Kwantung Army could be effectually carried out, he recalled expressing an opinion that the position of the premier should be stronger than that in Japan. In Japan the premier was a state minister and equal with the others.

* He felt that in Manchukuo the premier should be given a stronger position to control and lead his cabinet.

32382

* After examining what appeared to be a letter dated 24 January 1934, containing certain recommendations by the Chiefs of Staff, Kwantung Army, to the Vice War Minister, the accused was asked whether it was a document prepared and sent by him or at his direction. He stated that he thought he must have sent a telegram of that nature.

32383

Exhibit 3380-A, the document so identified by the accused, stated that as to the responsibility for assistance of department chiefs, it was helpful in intensifying the principle of making the General Affairs Board the axis, to have only the Premier assist. However, the selection of the Premier would not always cater to the Army Commander's opinion and a stubborn man might sometimes be selected. There would be a danger of delay of political affairs owing to the attitude of the Premier alone. In such cases, if the Department Chief was responsible for assistance, the Army Commander could carry through his opinion * by controlling one man or the other. Therefore, it was appropriate to divide part of the responsibility for assistance among the Department Chiefs.

KOISO begged the Vice Minister to give consideration so that these opinions might meet with his approval and to reply by the 25th. Asked if he secured approval for his suggestions, he stated that on glancing through the telegram he felt that what was stated there was somewhat different from the thought expressed in his previous answer. He felt there might have been discussion on this point within the Headquarters and there might have been disagreement, but his recollection was not too clear. The telegram showed * it was sent from the Kwantung Army in reply to an inquiry from Central Headquarters. He did not believe the final orders of the Central authorities embodied completely the suggestions in the telegram. Asked if with reference to his suggestion that there be divided control between the Premier and the other department heads in the Manchukuo Government, if the suggestion was complied with, he replied it was not accepted by central authorities in his recollection.

32386

* When handed a document, the accused was asked if it refreshed his memory so that he could now say he did receive 3 million yen on 25 Jan. 1933 from the War Ministry. He stated he had no clear recollection. * It was not a Kwantung Army document but a War Ministry document and was received by the Kwantung Army from the Vice Minister.

32389

* Exhibit 3381-A, the document identified by the accused, relating to the granting of Manchurian Incident Expenditure Secret Service Funds, and being a draft of Notification to the Chief of the Finance Section of the Intendance Bureau, ordered the disbursement

Page of 3 million yen as Secret Service funds and ordered delivery to KOISO. KOISO was notified by the Vice Minister that 3 million yen was being granted for his Army's needs as Secret Service funds.
The accused was asked if the Harbin Special Service Agency was under him when he was Kwantung Army Chief of Staff and concurrently Special Service Chief, and he replied it was under the command of the Kwantung 32391 Army Commander. * Asked who the persons were who worked at that time with the Special Service Agency in Harbin, he replied that they often changed but the one he remembered best was KOMATSUBARA. During his tenure the organs were mainly concerned with maintaining peace and order. The organ was not assigned to work out plans of political measures for preparing war against the USSR. Asked if it had duties to work out measures to be carried out outside Manchukuo - for 32392 instance the Soviet prior to the war with the USSR, he replied * that the organs had no duties to draft plans but its main functions were the assembling of information.

He did not remember if in January 1934 the Special Service Agency in Harbin drew up a document entitled "Outline of Political Measures for the Preparation for a War Against the Soviet Union", stamped "Military Secret." Asked if it was not true that after military action in the North China Provinces had been completed, he was relieved from further service in Manchukuo, he replied that by military operations in North China was meant operations carried on as an extension of the Jehol pacification campaign and those carried on before the Tangku Truce. He was transferred one year after that agreement.

32393 * He had stated in his affidavit that after being relieved as Chief of Staff, he became Commander of the Korean Army. There was a sector of land constituting a frontier between Korea and Soviet 32394 Union at that time. * This line was in the vicinity of the Lake Khassan area and the 19th Infantry Division was a unit under his command. Also the 20th Division. He thought the total strength of the 19th and 20th Divisions, which had no supply units, was around 20,000.
32395 * They had no rear units but there was a heavy artillery unit known as a fortress unit. A unit belonging to the 19th Division was stationed near the Soviet border. When KOISO first arrived as Korean Army Commander, there were various units along the Tumen River, totalling about 2 battalions. After reorganization, units in Chingwangtao in Manchukuo also came under the command of the Korean Army. These units numbered about 2 battalions.

32396 * He believed about the 13th or 14th of July a small force of the 19th Division was sent to strengthen the Heiko garrison on the opposite bank of Lake Khassan. Until his resignation as Korean Army Commander, no additional troops were moving into the Lake Khassan region. The area along the border line south up to the border line "T"

Page fell within the Kwantung Army's garrison area and even before the outbreak of the Incident, scouts had been entering the area frequently.

32398 The witness was reminded of the testimony of TANAKA, Ryukichi, that orders concerning the concentration of the 19th Division field units in the Lake Khassan vicinity were given on 11 July 1938 * and that these units had arrived at the border by July 12. The accused stated that this was contrary to the facts. On 6 July 32399 3 Soviet Cavalry men appeared on the crest of Changkufeng * and on 11 July several more Soviet troops appeared there and reports from the front indicated they were engaged in construction work. No reports from the front reached them on July 12. On July 13 the number of Soviet troops on the summit of Changkufeng reached 40 and there were reports of continuing construction work. The accused instructed the 19th Division Commander, who was guarding the spot, to take all precautions but that was all the accused did.

On the 14th the 19th Division Commander requested the accused that since he would be placed in a difficult position if Soviet troops entered Manchukuoan territory, he wished to concentrate his troops along the banks of the Tumen River. At the time the China Incident was in progress and Korea was the only rear line of communications, and the outbreak of an Incident on the Soviet-Manchukuoan or Japanese-Soviet border would be a grave threat.

32400 KOISO was in a position where he would have to be very anxious as to the effect of a concentration along the river banks * and he sent an inquiry to Central Army authorities in Tokyo. The reply arrived in Seoul on July 16, the day after KOISO was transferred from his command, and instructions were handed to his successor and he did not know what further orders or actions were taken. He never issued the order to the 19th Division cancelling its orders concerning the concentration of troops in the Lake Khassan vicinity and there was no such order to cancel.

Asked if he had a memorandum of dates and events or if he was testifying from memory, he replied he was testifying from memory. He did not recall HIRANUMA's policies while he was Overseas Minister in that Cabinet.

32401 * Asked if he did not know that HIRANUMA had determined to strengthen the Anti-Comintern Pact to secure closer cooperation between Japan, Germany and Italy, he replied he did hear vaguely that the problem of relations between the three countries was being discussed and studied in the Five-Ministers' Conference. While he was a member of the Cabinet he did not know of the HIRANUMA Declaration of about 4 May 1939. Asked if he meant to say that he did not know that HIRANUMA had stated that Japan was firmly resolved to stand at Page the side of Germany and Italy, he replied he supposed the matter was studied in the Five Ministers' Conference but Cabinet members were not told of that.

32402 * He did not know at the time that HIRANUMA praised Hitler's wisdom and iron will and sent Hitler a message that he greatly admired the noble task of reconstruction on which he was engaged. Several days after, however, he did hear this from HARADA. Asked if he wanted the Tribunal to believe that he kept such an important matter secret from the Cabinet, he replied he was telling the honest truth and they really did not hear about it. He knew Baron HARADA in 1939, but in a conversation with HARADA about 24 April 1939, he did not complain to him about lack of unity in the Army and that this was a hindrance to the successful conclusion of the Tri-Partite

32405 * Asked what motive he thought HARADA might have to make an entry in his diary if such views of his were recorded, he replied

32406 * that he had discovered that several times HARADA had twisted what he said and told lies. He believed he must have fallen into this practice because of his own subjective view that the accused was an advocate of the Tri-Partite Pact. That was why he denied this portion of the HARADA Diary. Since HARADA had spoken ill of the accused in various parts of the Diary, he could hardly think he entertained friendly feelings toward him. He did not know where HARADA got this false idea of what he had said. On one occasion the accused asked HARADA what Prince SAIONJI thought of the Tri-Partite Alliance, and HARADA replied that SAIONJI was not a man who easily voiced his own opinion. Later, on reading the diary, KOISO found that he was represented to have asked him what the Lord Keeper thought of the Tri-Partite Alliance. From this, the accused judged that HARADA often wrote contrary to actual conversation.

32408 * Asked if he did not visit the Navy Minister in early May 1939, in connection with a possible overthrow of the Cabinet due to Navy opposition to rightists and their German-Italian attitude, he replied he may have asked such a question but didn't recall the details. He may have visited the Navy Minister in early 1939 but he had never conversed with the Navy Minister in connection with the possible overthrow of the Cabinet due to Navy opposition to the rightists in their German-Italian attitude.

In early May he received a request from the War Vice Minister for his services and as he did not know what was going on Page in regard to the proposed Tri-Partite Pact, he might have visited the Navy Minister on this question, but his recollection was that it was the Foreign Minister. * Since he had to reply to the Vice Minister, he wanted to ask in what way their thoughts regarding the Alliance were changing. It was not true that the main reason he went to the Navy Minister was to try to convince him to get Navy support for the Alliance.

32409

Reference was made to the Affidavit where it was stated that while he was Overseas Minister in 1940, Ambassador Ott told him that a German-Japanese Alliance would benefit Japan in the Southwest Pacific's economic development. When asked what he replied to Ott's suggestion, he stated he didn't say whether he was for or against it. Asked what would have been the reason that Japan required an ally such as Germany, if Japan was only seeking fair trade in the South Pacific, he replied he had never advocated that Japan must have Germany as an ally.

* Asked if it was not true that it was intended by Japan that she would get what she needed out of the South Pacific by force if necessary, and if that was not the reason for a discussion of an alliance with Germany, he replied he didn't believe a single important government leader at the time had such thoughts. Asked what he told Ott after he gave the accused his strong sales talk on the advantage of a German alliance, he replied on that occasion he expressed neither approval nor disapproval.

The accused was reminded of testimony to the effect that after the interview, OTT notified Germany that KOISO asked him what Germany's views would be if Japan made military advances in the South Pacific. The accused was asked if he thought OTT just imagined that he said this, and replied that OTT's report was written in such language as to indicate that the accused had said what actually OTT had been telling him.

* At the time he knew that the Foreign Office was announcing its view that the status quo of NEI would be preserved. Asked if it was not true that economic demands made on NEI, if accepted, would have disturbed the status quo and seriously interfered with the sovereignty of NEI, he replied he had no knowledge of what demands were made on NEI during the YONAI Cabinet. Asked if he as Overseas Minister learned of the decisions of the 12th and 16th of July 1940 of the Army, Navy and Foreign Office authorities under which Japan was to dominate the southern areas, he replied he knew nothing about this and doubted if these things actually occurred.

Page demonstrations occurred elsewhere in the country. Asked if he attended a dinner party on 12 July 1939 given for MATSUOKA by IKEDA, at which General MATSUI and Admiral NOMURA were present, he replied there may have been such a banquet but he didn't recall for sure. He didn't remember a dinner party about that time at which Anti-British demonstrations was one of the topics discussed.

32415 Asked if he recalled discussing with KIDO in early July * 1939 the Anti-British propoganda and speeches made in Anti-British demonstrations, he replied he recalled he met KIDO on his way to a Privy Council Meeting. As KIDO was Home Minister then, he suggested to him that measures be taken to stop the demonstration in the city and pave the way for peaceful negotiations. KIDO then was not head of the Kempei and he didn't remember who was. KIDO did not think that it could have occurred that the Kempei was leading these demonstrations. It was utterly impossible that the Army was financing them. He had no recollection while he was Overseas Minister in the HIRANUMA Cabinet of sending the Kempei to China and Manchuria disguised as laborers * because the Overseas Minister was in no position to do such a thing. He had no recollection of making a speech to the Diet Committee on the destiny of Japan while he was Overseas Minister on 17 February 1940. Asked if he recalled that in the course of the speech to the Diet Budget Committee on that date, he said that Japan had a destiny to advance in all directions, he stated he did recall now.

32417 * Asked if he did not also express the view that the religious beliefs of the Buddhists, Confucianists and Christians in China would have to conform to Japan's spirit and culture, he explained that among the Japanese, there were many who advocated advance in various directions and questions based on these views were often voiced in the Diet. If the transcript of the Diet proceedings were looked at, it would be found that he replied that Japan could advance in any direction peacefully. Asked if he did not urge that the Japanese spirit and culture should be spread throughout the world, he replied he had always held the view that Japan's traditional culture embraced all ideologies and * and was able to merge with them all and he was of the belief that he made replies based on such views. Asked how he expected to convert those unwilling to be converted, he replied that if they advanced with an all-embracing capacity, he could hardly think that any opposition could arise. Asked if he would not overcome the opposition by force if it existed, he replied that the main purpose of force is defense and if force is used to quell opposition, he thought it was proof that any person using it was without culture.

32419 * When shown a document, the accused was asked whether it was a speech he gave before the Diet Budget Committee on 17 Feb.

32422 * Exhibit 3382, the document so identified by the accused, showed that KOISO stated that in SHINOHARA's speech, which had just been heard, he presented the problem as to whether they should advance northward or southward. What KOISO was going to say might be said to be somewhat a departure from reality or he might be told not to speak so fanatically. However, he did not make this departure. As the original policy of Japan they had been handed down from generation to generation, the mission handed down to the Emperors by the Goddess Amatera, of making the universe the Emperor's capitol. * This meant world wide expansion with the magnificent spirit and culture of Japan. Emperor MEIJI's statement that he had given all subjects freedom from care and he would finally cross the seas and spread national glory throughout the world, and KOISO believed this sentence placed its underlying note on this belief. This meant that in national policy, advancement in any one direction was not considered in their advance to the north, south, east or west. Japan's destiny was to advance in all four directions. The question as to which direction should be emphasized was the problem of this generation. KOISO said he might be somewhat dogmatic, but the Japanese race was surely divine. The YAMATO race, which had controlled and unified several races, had the quality * to advance in any direction and grasp and assimilate any culture, and could endure the hot or cold zone. Because they possessed Indonesian blood, they had the capacity to progress southward. It was the natural tendency to advance toward the north because of the main feature of their racial composition. However, a nation cannot stand without defense, and history proved if they were to obtain quickly economic rights and interests, it would be more convenient to do so by sea rather than by land.

32423 They must proceed toward economic development in the south where resources were thought abundant. * At present they should follow the increased tendency toward the continent and the north with more than ample economic development and also extend economic rights and interests toward the south. The necessary movement of the race was indispensable and they should not emphasize any one direction.

32425 Asked if there were not economic negotiations pending with NEI when he made this speech, he replied he was in the Overseas Ministry but never heard of any such problem. Asked if he meant to say that he didn't know that Japan was making strenuous efforts then to secure oil, tin, etc. through negotiations with NEI, * he replied that maybe negotiators had been sent from the Foreign Ministry to NEI, but he knew very little about them. He did not recall if he found out about them shortly after.

32427 * He did know that he had been tentatively selected as an envoy to conduct the final negotiations considered to be the ultimatum to NEI in August 1940, a few months after the speech. Asked if he did not say then that he would go, provided he was sent, on a battleship, and in case of emergency would have the right to fire and destroy them, he replied this was utterly fantastic. The question of a battleship firing was something that was the prerogative of the Supreme Command. How could he on his own authority order a battleship to fire?

32428 * Asked if the real intention of Japan in engaging in war against the U.S. was not her desire to expel Anglo-American influence from China and the Asiatic-Pacific regions, and to reconstruct a Greater East Asia, he replied that he was of the opinion that Japan should not fight against America and Britain and had no recollection of ever voicing such opinions.

(Reference was made to Exhibit 277, T. 3704) The accused stated he was a member of the Committee for the Establishment of Greater East Asia in April 1942. He had never heard that Japan's intention was to close the door of the Asiatic countries to others except on her own terms. In connection with the speech he made on 7 Sept. 1944, promising future independence to NEI, he was not familiar with the Osamu Army Corps Chief-of-Staff's announcement the same month that there had been no great alterations in the operation and business structure of the military government.

32429 * Asked if he, as Premier, knew of the decision of the Supreme War Leadership Council on 1 Feb. 1945 to place all military and armed police forces of FIC under the joint command of the Japanese Army, subject to army orders, on matters of organization, allotment and movement, he replied he knew of the matters decided 1 Feb. 1945. The main purpose of the decision was to place the armed forces and armed police in FIC under the Japanese forces. There was also a plan to place communications and transportation under Japanese control but this was an auxiliary decision.

He remembered he received through the Greater East Asia Minister a six-hour ultimatum to the Governor General of FIC to bring about the surrender of those agencies such as communications and military forces. Asked if he had any authority to stop such high-handed procedure, he replied he didn't think the order included any such wording as "to take high-handed measures." He believed it had words to the effect that the understanding of the Governor General of FIC should be obtained. Asked if he thought 6 hours a

He did not know if in the winter of 1944, while he was Premier, the Japanese Army thrust into the interior provinces of Kwangsi and Kweichow within immediate reach of China's wartime capital, Chungking.

32431 * Reference was made to the Affidavit which referred to his opposition to the March 31 Incident, tried to prevent the Manchurian Incident, opposed the China Adventure, the Tri-Partite Pact, and the war against the U.S., and he tried to settle the China War as Premier, and in all these matters was frustrated.

Asked why he accepted one important government position after another, becoming a protagonist of the matters he so strenuously objected to, he replied that the way of the way of the Japanese was that no matter what their personal opinions were, once a state policy had been decided, it was their duty to bend all efforts for its prosecution.

* The accused was reminded of previous prosecution questions regarding a conversation with KIDO to the effect that he was supposed to have told KIDO that he was in favor of a HIRANUMA Cabinet in April or May, 1932. * The accused stated he had no recollection of ever saying this directly to KIDO. The accused was reminded that the prosecution in that occasion also referred to a diary entry of KIDO to Col. SUZUKI telling him that KOISO seems to be in favor of a HIRANUMA Cabinet. The accused stated he had no recollection of such a conversation with SUZUKI or someone who might have told him that, but he could not say absolutely he did not say such a thing. In his previous testimony he had stated that the diary entry for August 7, 1931, exhibit 179-F, was completely without foundation.

* Asked if he meant by this that the contents did not properly portray what HARADA told KIDO, or if he meant the information HARADA transferred to KIDO was inaccurate, he replied that exhibit 179-F said that KIOSO, NINOMIYA and TATEKAWA held a meeting, and using HASHIMOTO, Shigeto, as a tool and inviting the services of OKAWA, were planning to utilize the Social Masses Party to carry out a political change. He did not know the source of this, but denied the facts. He could not deny the fact, however, of this having come from HARADA to KIDO.

32438

* Asked if when he was Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau there was another by the name of SUZUKI besides the defendant in the Military Administration Section of the Bureau, he replied that after his previous testimony on this point, he discovered that there was another SUZUKI.

32439

With regard to the stamp or seal on exhibit 3377, the accused was asked if it was not unclear whether the seal was the defendant SUZUKI's or not. He replied that yesterday he said the seal was that of the accused, but this was a careless and hasty remark. In the Military Administration Section, the accused SUZUKI was in charge of Manchurian problems, but questions of military organization were in * the hands of SUZUKI, Sosaku, and he thought therefore that the seal must have been the latter's.

Counsel for SHIGEMITSU.

The accused stated that he became Commander of the Korean Army on 2 December, 1935. Regarding his testimony that the total strength of the Korean Army at the time he took command was about 20,000, he was asked if the strength increased prior to the Changkufeng Incident. He replied that about one year prior to the outbreak of the Incident, strength very greatly decreased. With the outbreak of the China Incident the 20th Division was brought under the command of the China Garrison Forces, and the unit in Korea became a unit in absentia. He thought the decrease was by some 5-6,000.

32440 * After the reduction, a reorganization of border guards was carried out, and he thought there was an increase after that decrease of from 5-600. Two battalions were eliminated and three new ones were created, so there was a net increase of one. This may have been done in 1936 or 1937.

Regarding his testimony that on July 3 Soviet cavalrymen were seen on the crest of Changkufeng hill, that they were increased on the 11th, and by the 13th 40 were observed, he was asked if any Soviet troops were reported in the area prior to July, 1938, and he replied that prior to that there had never been any stationary Soviet troops in that vicinity.

32441 Regarding his testimony that he received reports that Soviet troops were engaged in construction work on the 11th and 13th of July, 1938, he was asked what sort of construction was reported * and he replied that in his recollection it was that they were digging trenches on the western slope of Changkufeng hill in Manchurian territory.

32442 Asked if concerning the actions toward FIC, he as premier was aware that DeGaulle, the Head of the French Provisional Government, which had been recognized by the Allies, had announced over Radio France on 29 August, 1944, that France had been at war with Japan since 8 December, 1941, he replied that he didn't know anything about the broadcast. Asked if he had been advised as Premier that * the Provisional Government of France had declared that France was at war, he stated that at the Supreme Council for the Direction of War, Foreign Minister SHIGEMITSU explained that while the DeGaulle regime was still in Africa it had declared war against Japan, and after its return to France the situation had not changed.

32443 * While he was in the War Ministry as Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau or as Vice-Minister, he had never seen the Ministry's so-called secret diaries, as compiled. Asked if there was any sign or seal on the documents filed in the secret diaries to show whether he or his superiors ever had a look at them, he replied that distinctions could be made on any document, and it could be noticed whether there were any notations or markings

32444 * indicating whether a particular person had seen it or not, such as a seal or signature. This was routine procedure for documents examined by any War Ministry member.

Asked if there were not documents filed in the secret diaries which were not brought to the notice of himself or his superiors, he replied that two documents he had seen during his cross-examination did not indicate that he nor the Vice or War Minister had seen them if there was no signature nor seal on them showing they had been submitted after examination.

32445 Asked if he knew any reason why such documents were not shown to him, he replied that there are various reasons, but in most cases if any matter is not adopted in * lower levels and the matter was abandoned there, it was finished after an oral report, and was not submitted to higher levels.

When shown exhibit 3376, the accused was asked if he found in it a sentence that "The basis of determination on the number of MP force in Manchuria on the peace time footing will be as follows".

32448 * Exhibit 3383, an excerpt from 3038-B, a study on the Organization of the MP Force in Manchuria, being the document referred to, stated that the basis of determining the number of the MP force in Manchuria on the peace time footing would be as follows: To satisfy the wartime requirement of men; cause no hindrance to the peacetime business of MP; maintain harmony between the peacetime and wartime organization. For this purpose, they had prepared a plan of organization. Headquarters of the MP in Manchuria. In the Kwantung were named, and included about 200 men.

32449 The Mukden units' 5 headquarters included about 300 men, the Chanchun units' 4 headquarters included 400 men, and the Independent Battalion at Mukden consisted of about 400 men.

Page 5202

As to the Independent MP Battalion, the men would be first enlisted in other branch services for about six months and then join in the MP service for about a year. A bilateral system of conscription and volunteering would be adopted. After a year and a half of enlistment a number would be posted as corporals in the section. The battalion would thus become an educational organ of the MP. Units other than the Independent Battalion would be active service organs.

32450

According to the plan of organization, they should be able to command active MPs of about 400 men and educated MPs of about 400 men, the total supplying 1100 annually. * The number released annually from each unit would be recruited from the Independent Battalion, while the latter would release those not sent to each unit as recruits, thereby acquiring 400 on reserve annually. After about ten years about 4700 would be supplied. The 11th year about 5,000 would be secured. Supposing that the men released from the Independent Battalion got the same number of service years as ordinary conscripts, they could supply 7,000 at all times for 14 or 15 years. Considering the rate of decrease as 15% ann. the addition of NCOs after the maturity of the second reserve service, the total would not exceed 6,000.

32451

Thus, ten or more years were required to supply 5,000 MPs, and in order to supplement the force until then they must fill the number of 1100 active service MPs by amending the organization and adopt a system of temporary transfer. For such purpose and in case of need, temporary * regulations should be issued to cover the deficiency. In this they arrived at a plan of organization in peacetime by discussing the number of men required in wartime. Many aspects of the present condition of MPs may not meet future demands, and they must make further study and prepare a satisfactory solution for harmony between the peacetime and wartime organizations

The accused was asked if he had any further explanations of these documents, and he stated that as the seal on the document indicated, he did not see it at the time, but recalled that Chief of the Military Affairs Section ANDO gave an oral report on the plan's outline. * ANDO reported that MP Commander MINE had submitted his personal views to bring about an expansion of the Kempeitai. This was MINE's own idea and a highly fantastic one, ANDO said. Such being the case, ANDO said he would not submit the matter to the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau. This draft was not carried into action, and was completely shelved and abandoned.

* The accused was shown exhibit 3377, and stated that it appeared to be from the Kwantung Army Chief of Staff MIYAKE to Vice-Minister SUGIYAMA, and the certificate stated it referred to matters of sending documents in regard to the draft plan for the transitory organization in regard to policy toward Manchuria and Mongolia. The date of its receipt was December 9, 1931. The accused stated this was just one day prior to the resignation of the WAKATSUKI Cabinet, and War Minister MINAMI resigned on 10 December.

* This document was certainly prepared by the Kwantung Army, but there was no indication that the War Minister, Vice-Minister, or Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau saw it. As far as the War Ministry authorities were concerned, no directives putting the drafting into action were issued, but he did not know whether the Kwantung Army took the steps set forth in the plan.

32456

When shown exhibit 3378-A, the accused was asked what control, if any, he could point out of civil administration, as set out in the document. He replied that the document pertained to a military administration department which was identical with what was in Japan, the Ministries of War and Navy. Therefore, such an agency was not permitted to engage in civil administration, and it was natural that nothing pertaining to it should be included.

32458

* When shown exhibit 3379-A, a draft of an outline of general measures regarding customs duties in Manchukuo dated 12 December, 1932, the accused was asked

* if it represented his opinion or was sent as part of his administrative duties. He stated it was the opinion of a financial and economic adviser attached to Kwantung Army Headquarters named SUZUKI, Roku, and submitted to the Kwantung Army Commander. The plan adopted by the latter and sent in KOISO's name to central army authorities.

Asked if there had been any previous study by central authorities on the matter and if they requested the observations of the Kwantung Army, he replied that with regard to the customs question of Manchukuo, nothing had been decided by the central authorities when the accused became Kwantung Army Chief of Staff in August 1932. The reason was that relations with Third Powers were very delicate. He didn't recall any requests made by the authorities in connection with this after he came to the Kwantung Army.

* Regarding the words in the document "No in study", he explained that the Third Power relations in connection with customs was delicate, and if the Kwantung Army Commander accepted opinions submitted by the adviser and formulated a plan of this sort, even then there was considerable room for study because the plan may not be put into immediate practice. He didn't recall whether the plan was ever put in practice.

* When shown exhibit 3381-A, he stated that this document was in the form of a reply to an inquiry made by central authorities of the Kwantung Army in connection with laws and regulations and was supposed to be made by the Kwantung Army Commander, and was sent in the name of the Chief of Staff, as was customary procedure. It was also customary procedure to send a communication direct from the commanding general, depending upon its importance.

32462

* Exhibit 3381 was handed to the accused, and he stated it related to funds for the use of the army. Asked if they were handled in the same manner as he had testified in relation to other funds sent on another occasion, he replied that such procedures were taken by central authorities when funds of this kind were sent to the Kwantung Army. The funds were used for the same

32463

32464

* The accused was handed exhibit 3382. Concerning it, there was no consideration in drafting it for economic development between the nations alone. The meaning was primarily peaceful development, and the population problem was secondary. Economic development was related to the * population question, for Japan could not by the produce of her own land maintain self-sufficiency. The principal method for Japan to survive was to import raw materials, process them and increase their manufacturing capacity, and by exporting them to procure necessities by trade. At that time she could import such materials without restrictions.

32465

32466

Asked if there were any countries at the time with which she could not do business, he replied that at the time of the HIRANUMA Cabinet he recalled that restrictions were placed on trade by the U. S. Among the raw materials of which there was a severe shortage and which were required for defense was oil, which was not for * military purposes alone. He thought that in the Navy there was a considerable need for oil.

32467 Asked if at that time there was much discussion among the State Ministers and representatives on how to meet the problem, he replied that the members of Parliament made many demands on the government to bend more efforts to enable Japan to secure necessary raw materials, chiefly petroleum, from the South Pacific, through trade. Asked * if a decision was reached at this time on the problem, he replied that there were no special steps taken by the YONAI Cabinet, but in his recollection consul generals were conducting negotiations with competent foreign authorities.

32468 Reference was made to the affidavit of the accused relating to the Lake Khasan Incident and to the testimony of TANAKA, Ryukichi at T.22751. In that testimony, TANAKA was asked what army commanding general issued the order about the concentration of troops. TANAKA answered * that he did not see any of these documents directly at headquarters, but judging from common military knowledge he would say that the order for concentration was naturally given by Army Commander KOISO, and not NAKAMURA, who succeeded him on 15 July 1938. This was not an order for attack, but to concentrate. This TANAKA was the TANAKA he had referred to in his affidavit.

32469 Asked if he knew whether Ott knew of his opposition in the past to the Tripartite Pact, he stated he did not know whether Ott actually knew that he was opposed, but since Ott had frequent social contact with army officers, he was of the opinion that he might be informed by them of his opposition. Asked if there was any action or statement * by Ott to lead him to think that Ott might be trying to influence his future decisions, he replied that at this interview with Ott he considered that Ott, being an ambassador, would know the real nature of the Ministry of Overseas Affairs. Perhaps Ott addressed questions to him which should have been asked the Foreign Minister, not understanding the true connotation of the name of the Overseas Affairs Ministry.

32470 * According to Ott's telegram it was represented that KOISO invited him, but the fact was the other way around. At the time of the interview with Ott, KOISO entertained doubts as to the purpose of the meeting, but there was a telegram in evidence sent by Ribbentrop to Ott, that various moves should be taken in Japan to build up a political atmosphere and create the desire among the Japanese to enter into an alliance with Germany. It occurred to KOISO that perhaps the telegraphic instructions to Ott included himself as a target to be utilized.

* Asked if the action taken in relation to FIC was taken after approval from the French authorities under an agreement with the Vichy Government, he replied that the pact of common defense was entered into with FIC, which was represented by De Coux acting under directions of the Vichy Government. When KOISO became premier it appeared that De Coux had entered into DeGaulle's camp, and in connection with the effectuation of the pact for common defense, FIC authorities were showing a non-cooperative attitude. KOISO knew that this was the situation when he became the premier, and in light of the changing military situation the decision of the Supreme Council of February 1 was taken.

Being a composite member of the Supreme Council for the consideration of war, he considered that he would * be one of those responsible for any of its decisions. 32473

Regarding the dummy bombs of the March Incident, he had never heard how large the package was, but he had heard the amount was such it could be carried in one suitcase. * The previous testimony describing the package as one which could be easily carried and containing 300 bombs was true.

August 1933 and August 1935 he was paymaster of the administrative department of Kwantung Army headquarters, in charge of the accounts of the army's secret service funds by order of the vice chief of staff and senior adjutant under the supervision of the chief of staff. Therefore, he knew well how they spent the funds amounting to 1,970,000 yen sent from the vice minister to the chief of staff of the Kwantung Army on 27 December 1933.

At that time peace and order in Manchuria had not been completely attained so the Kwantung Army made efforts to establish it in accordance with the Japan Manchukuo protocol.
32490 The fund was spent for * gathering information, propaganda, purchasing weapons from Chinese Bandits, and entertaining and paying wages in the execution of general business. It was expended by headquarters, the division, the brigade, independent garrison, Kempeitai, and the special service office, who were all carrying out their duty of establishing peace and order.

32491 * As to the procedure for application concerning these expenditures, each section of the staff department applied in tions were assessed by the vice chief and chief, then the ad-their apportioned sums, were able to use them on the respon-after examining them Kwantung Army headquarters then reported

After two years there he returned and served as a member of general staff headquarters and was junior secretary in the Manchurian affairs bureau.

32504 On 1 August 1929 KOISO assumed his office as chief of the maintenance bureau and the witness served * as his subordinate then and while KOISO was chief of staff of the Kwantung Army. As chief of the maintenance bureau from August 1929 to August 1930 KOISO was greatly distressed about the army's ill equipment and the munition industry, and repeated that it was necessary for Japan to avoid war by all means. When KOISO was transferred to the bureau of military affairs as its chief in August 1930, he was confronted with the dispute with China and the strained situation in connection with Manchuria.

32505 When the witness was appointed on the staff of the

These provided for the restoration of public peace and order: maintenance of transport and communication; and development of industry. The association of harmony had been organized in Manchukuo which, however, lapsed into a polit-

MUTO's instructions, KOISO advised the president of general

32511 The witness identified exhibit 3388 and, as corrected, verified it. * The affidavit stated that the witness was chief of staff of the Korean army from early March 1938 to September 1939. The commander of the army at that time was KOISO until 15 July 1938 when he was succeeded by NAKAMURA. The Korean army commander in 1938 had no operational duties but was only charged with defending Korea. He was not invested with any wartime duties. As regards the two divisions in Korea, the command was confined to the defense of Korea and the chief of staff was directly in charge of wartime operations.

32512 At the time of the Changkufeng incident, the only division in Korea was the 19th. * Troops under its command were constantly required to absolutely keep from exciting the Soviet army, since the China incident was in progress. They were warned to be extremely cautious as any dispute with the Soviet would be an obstacle in carrying out the policy of the central authorities towards China.

Inspections or observations were done at the spot of watch-post line or unit headquarters, and were never made close to the frontier line. It was the principle for all troops to do their utmost not to excite the Soviet as an attempt to invade Soviet territory was out of the question and impossible.

32513 The witness remembered that he presented the telegraphic instructions from the central authorities * to the succeeding commander NAKAMURA, who arrived at Seoul on July 17 and asked for necessary instructions. Korean army orders to units of the 19th division relative to the Soviet-Manchurian dispute were given by NAKAMURA, the new commander, and had nothing to do with KOISO.

There was no cross-examination of the witness.

32514 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3389 as 32515 his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was on the special staff of the overseas ministry from April 1939 to August 1939, and from January 1940 until the following July.

32516 * Regarding the conversation between KOISO and Ambasador Ott, one of the witness's acquaintances at the embassies and legations was Ott, and he remembered that in the middle of June Ott requested an appointment to see overseas minister KOISO. The witness conveyed the request to KOISO but he answered that he was not interested in an interview with Ott, but if the latter wished to see him he would comply. Their conversation was very short. Only about thirty minutes.

32517 * The witness was an interpreter between them, and the ambassador explained his opinion to KOISO that the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact would be advantageous to Japan and that Japan would be able to gain economic advantages in FIC and NEI as the result of the conclusion of the pact.
KOISO for the most part listened in silence, neither acknowledging nor denying and asked only a few questions.

There was no cross-examination of the witness.

32518 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3390 as his affidavit.

32528 *The affidavit stated that the witness, after posts as secretary of the government-general of Korea and director of the police affairs bureau of the government-general, retired from this service in September 1936 and then was appointed 32529 * overseas vice minister in April 1939, resigning in October 1940. He was appointed the civil governor of Korea in May 1942, resigning in July 1944, then secretary-general to the cabinet.

The witness was acquainted with KOISO since August 1932 and his political connection began in April 1939 when KOISO was appointed overseas minister in the HIRANUMA cabinet. The witness served as vice minister under him.

32530 When KOISO was overseas minister between 1939 and 1940, economic expansion to the south became a subject of much discussion. * The question of determining the attitude toward the Tripartite alliance as well as that of southward expansion were befalling the HIRANUMA government. The government's attitude toward these questions was so serious that every single nation was watching the movements of Japan. The cabinet at that time made it a rule to hold Five Minister's conference: attended by the premier and the war, navy, foreign affairs, and finance ministers besides cabinet meetings to talk over important matters.

32531 The Tripartite alliance was discussed in the conference but the overseas minister was not a member of it and was never consulted about any matter as a member of the cabinet. KOISO's private opinion was that in view of the international situation, foreign policy was not so simple as to be necessarily pro-Italo-German, if not pro-Anglo-American, or essentially * pro-Anglo-American, if not pro-Italo-German. Foreign policy should not be either right or left. Steps should be taken lest they be remorseful for erroneously directing the course of the state by rash actions. KOISO expressed that it was advisable to give up concluding the alliance to avoid producing unfavorable results being vainly made use of by Germany. On one occasion he stated this view opposing the foreign alliance privately to the premier and the foreign minister. As regards the southward economic expansion, his opinion that the aimless advocacy of it was liable to make foreign nations mistake their intention for expansion with territorial ambitions, and if so it would be greatly different from their true intention. The necessity of economic expansion must be explained to convince everyone of the necessity for reasonable expansion and dogged advocacy would not do.

32532 * As long as expansion was reasonable and economic, for the sake of self-support, expansion either north or south would do and was not always necessary to emphasize a one-sided view. Regarding population problems, KOISO believed it would be difficult to encourage a large population to immigrate to the southern areas because of unsuitable climate.

32533 On 18 July 1944 KOISO was ordered to form a new cabinet. At that time, at his post as Korean governor general he was informed of nothing about the war situation except from official announcements. Information, however, made them feel that the fact was that the situation was more unfavorable than was announced, and that the naval power had sustained heavy losses and at this juncture the fall of Saipan was announced. They were impressed that the war situation was really unfavorable and also felt that most of the gloomy news in the * past should have been true.

The public, who up until then half believed and half doubted rumors, began to be pessimistic about the prospects of war. Such a state of things was both in Korea and at home. Under these circumstances KOISO accepted the command to form a new cabinet. When he first received the call about the imperial summons, KOISO said that if the emperor would order him to form a new cabinet, he had to give serious consideration to what sort of resolution he ought to make. Therefore, after careful consideration, he decided on the principles on which he had formed it.

The outline of these was that at present the war situation was very unfavorable. They were now defeated and in retreat and war prospects were serious. They had an eager desire to survive by exhausting every means. but it would be 32534 most difficult * because of present circumstances. Farsighted policy required them not only to hold in check the enemy's forces, but also to take a cool view of how to bring the war to a conclusion. For though it was of greatest urgency to win the hearts of the people, it was feared that whatever attempt the government might make, it could have no influence on authority over the people. KOISO felt confident of the necessity of bracing up the people to increase a productive power by smashing the enemy's scheme for invasion and gaining time to take steps to negotiate peace through third powers and proceed with a prompt peace move towards China.

32535 To accomplish this, KOISO stated that the premier on assuming the * office must effect a strong adjustment and combination of both political and military tactics. Accordingly the cabinet head ought to be placed in a position enabling him to perform such function. After an imperial audience, he was ordered to form a new cabinet with YONAI, and acted up to his original principle. He intended to assign the portfolio of navy to YONAI and hoped to secure a war minister to carry out the program to establish peace.

32536 He also expressed his resolution that he wished to decide whether he would comply with the imperial command to form a cabinet on condition that the ordinance should be revised to qualify the premier for attending imperial headquarters meetings, or else that a strong and simple organ of directing affairs should be established. * He received a promise that a definite answer might be given.

After a three chiefs conference, the army replied that the war should be carried out, that field marshal SUGIYAMA would be recommended for the army portfolio, and that would meet KOISO's desire as to the creation of the war direction council. The navy replied that the post of navy minister should be assigned to YONAI and they had no objection to the said council. KOISO, after consulting YONAI, decided to approve of them and completed the formation of the cabinet.

32537 *Members of the supreme war direction council were the chiefs of the army and navy general staffs, the premier, the foreign war and navy ministers, and the secretaries or cabinet secretary general, the directors of the military affairs bureau and of the naval affairs bureau. Besides them, both general staff vice chiefs might attend on proper occasions and cabinet members concerned were to attend. It was decided that when the war situation was reported, every cabinet member and the directors of the legislation and planning bureaus were to attend. Many matters to be discussed in council related to the administration and adjustment between the supreme command and state affairs. There was no chairman, but the premier was charged with expediting proceedings.

As for secrets of operations and tactics, the premier was not able to touch * them but was a total outsider. Since KOISO happened to be a general, he sometimes questioned and expressed his views about details of operations. But generally the attitude was that the premier was not desired to meddle with tactical affairs, and this attitude was found among army and navy officers, including council members. They challenged him when he wished to touch their secrets, and concerning front line operations, he only heard of the general war situation when it was reported.

The premier had a great expectation at the outset for the council, but the actual circumstances were against his expectation. Since it was impossible to materialize the primary principle when he formed his cabinet, KOISO finally asked the throne to issue an order authorizing the premier to attend headquarters' conferences.

As for his attending these conferences, his authority was confined to being informed of the condition of operations and * tactics and he was not vested with authority to set forth his views and have a share in the discussions. He was not placed in a position to have his views reflected in the direction of the front line. KOISO discussed the idea that it would be impossible to carry forward his ideas for ending the war unless he would return to actual service and hold the additional portfolio of war minister to perfect the adjustment of the supreme command to the state affairs.

32540

He took steps to get this power but could not obtain necessary approval from the three army chiefs. KOISO took pains in the supreme war direction council for making moves toward the Soviet and China relative to concluding the war. His view on the China affair was originally speaking, Japan ought not rashly * meddle in China, for once she was involved in China it would be the same as stepping into a swamp. They ought to be most cautious against being pushed against such a sad plight. The war was so deplorable that they must lose no time in recovering peace and true cooperation. He could not manifest this view concretely until he assumed the premiership when he firmly urged this view. While premier he left nothing undone to try to succeed in a peace move toward the Chungking government. In the supreme war direction council, he repeated deliberation on this matter, but failed.

32541 The witness thought that the Miao Pin issue proved how KOISO was intent on realizing peace, apart from the questions whether he dealt with the issue adroitly and what its outcome was. * Miao Pin had once served as vice president of the nation association of North China and was later president of the legislative yuan of the Nanking government and then relegated to vice president of the examination yuan. As he had been a military academy instructor, he had considerable acquaintance with the army men around Chiang Kia-shek.

He visited Japan in 1939, while vice president of the new nation association, and KOISO met him by the witness's introduction. Miao explained the reason for the necessity of cooperation between Japan and China and there was much sympathy between the two men. Every since they had no particular connection with each other. After KOISO became premier he was urged by state minister OGATA to send for Miao Pin to hear his opinion about the peace question.

32542 On KOISO's part, it happened that as diplomatic operations toward Chungking came to all but a deadlock, he was very worried and was desirous of breaking the deadlock by some means. * He thought that, although it was uncertain how much influence Miao Pin should have on Chungking, it would be fortunate if he would be of use in settling the peace question, and if a step was taken further and a direct connection established with Chungking, it would be more favorable. With such an idea he took OGATA's advice and tried first to bring him to Japan to hear his opinion and then to decide their attitude and policy whether use should be made of him.

As a result of opposition of both army and domestic circles, everything deadlocked and failed except bringing Miao Pin to Japan. In consequence he returned to Nanking in vain.

32543 KOISO also took great pains to bring about peace through the medium of the Soviet and negotiations were entered into but ended in failure. * As to the diplomatic moves to realize peace with China, sometimes his opinion on procedure did not agree with that of the foreign minister and others. That he dared to try to realize what he believed good was because he was confident it would serve the state to materialize his primary intention that he had cherished when he formed the cabinet.

When the cabinet was formed, the 85th session was at hand and KOISO delivered a speech on policy at the beginning of the session. The contents of the speech were nothing but a concrete expression of determination with regard to forming the cabinet. He required the hundred million people to brace themselves in unison and declare Indonesians' independence to be justifiable, because every race was entitled to independence and a proper position among nations and he also proclaimed that the Korean and Formosan people should quickly be vested with suffrage.

32544 As for the treatment of POWs, the supreme command and war and navy ministers took * charge and the premier had neither authority nor responsibility. The cabinet at no time dealt with affairs relating to POW treatment. According to the witness's memory, no one ever gave reports about POW matters at the cabinet council.

There was no cross-examination of the witness.

32546 * Exhibit 3391, the affidavit of Piggott, F.S.G., major general, military attache to the British Embassy in Tokyo from 1921 to 1926, and from 1936 to 1939, stated that the affiant met KOISO in Tokyo in 1939. Because of the possibility that he might be a dark horse for the premiership, the affiant sought his acquaintance. He found KOISO receptive to the idea of improving Anglo-Japanese relations, which, he stated, * were important for the country and that the idea of solving disagreements between Britain and the United States by war was repugnant, and it was essential to probe and find a peaceful solution.

He said he would continue to study outstanding problems between the countries and was certain freindship could be restored to mutual advantage.

Boris Alexandrovich
By General Vasiliev

The witness stated his name and that he was first mate of the ship Perekop,perished. When handed exhibit 822 he verified it as his affidavit.

32571 * EXAMINATION BY THE TRIBUNAL

32572 When asked where identification signs of the Perekop were located, he replied they were on both boards of the ship. The flags had the state flag of the USSR with hammer and sickle in the left-hand upper corner. * They were on the holds and the boards of the ship and were two meters twenty centimeters long and one meter twenty-five centimeters wide.

32573 * All identification signs on the ship were made at the outbreak of the war between Germany and the USSR. The distance at which the signs could be distinguished depended on the quality of instruments used. But if none was used, they could be distinguished with the naked eye at 200 to 250 meters in conditions of good visibility. When he had said that he hung out identification flags, he meant that when a ship wanted to show its nationality in addition to the identification signs on boards and holds, they hung out nationality colors consisting of four flags with the letters "USSR" on them. On the day of the attack he saw no other vessels but did prior.

32574 * The witness could distinguish a bomber from a fighter and knew that bombers dropped bombs. The first plane which flew over was a bi-plane, and all others which bombed were monoplanes. He couldn't tell exactly whether the planes were land or sea planes. Identification signs on the planes that bombed were red circles on the planes and fuselage of about three-quarters of a meter in size. The distance at which the planes flew was sometimes 100, sometimes 200 meters, sometimes even less than 50.

32575 * Asked how he knew at the moment of the attack on December 17 there were no hostilities between the USSR and 32576 Japan, he replied that he remembered that on that day they received a radio broadcast and learned that there was no war with Japan. Asked why two hours were needed for the big group of planes to sink an unarmed ship, he replied that he believed it was two hours or probably less that the planes dropped bombs. It was his personal opinion that one of the planes photographed the ship while it was sinking. He observed that this plane did not bomb the vessel* nor machine-gun it. It was flying at a very low height and he supposed they were photographing the vessel at the moment when it was sinking to see how the sailors were being drowned.

32577 At the moment of the attack there were no clouds, the visibility was very good. The ship's cargo was about 5,000 tons. Asked how they made themselves understood by the Japanese when they were wandering, he replied that they used English. The statement in his affidavit that the Japanese were acting according to government instructions was his personal opinion. If there was one plane bombing the vessel, he didn't think he would have thought that, but when he saw there was a big group of planes, then the possibility of a mistake was excluded, * and that is how he came to the conclusion that they were acting on government instructions. Eight men of the crew perished.

32589 On 9 November 1937, when they were attacking Nanshi, he was ordered to scout the settlement boundaries so that these zones might be absolutely safe from fire. The results of the scouting were sent * to every company on the spot, and so far as he knew, they caused no damage to the settlement area during the attack on Nanshi.

After the Nanshi campaign, his unit assembled and started for Nanking about December 2. There was no fighting on the way to Nanking and he never saw a totally destroyed village between Taitsang and Nanking, but did see a few houses partially destroyed or burnt, but never saw nor heard of any houses destroyed by Japanese soldiers.

On the way to Nanking he saw a pile of rice burnt and abandoned. Upon inquiry it was explained by the villagers that it had been burnt by retreating Chinese soldiers who did not want it taken by the Japanese. After this observed the destroyed houses more carefully and found that most were storehouses and other provision depots.

32590 About 11 December 1937 he was ordered to scout for the line of advance and suitable places for army positions. He left his unit at Chiyun and went alone to the south side of Nanking. * On the evening of the 13th he entered the walls of Nanking through the south gate of the town. There were many scattered fires and Japanese dead. Among them he saw the body of a Japanese soldier tied to a tree with several bullets in his body. He knew at a glance he had been captured and slaughtered by the Chinese soldiers. Around the city walls there were many dead bodies of Chinese soldiers but no civilians.

32591 He went within the walls about a kilometre from the city gate and saw Kempei guards posted at banks and government offices with signs of off limits to Japanese soldiers. He noticed very few residents damaged and he could see that as a whole Nanking preserved its old position and no traces of fire were found there. Toward the end of the battle of Shanghai, they repeatedly received instructions which the witness enforced among his men: to observe strictly military and moral discipline: *treat the Chinese people kindly; observe international laws; do not cause international complications; and, be prudent in behavior keeping in mind that they were under observation by the powers.

On 13 November he joined his unit at Tangshuichen and led them to Tushanchen south of Nanking. At this time, on instructions of the higher command, he strictly forbade his soldiers to go out on passes. Even when they went out on official business they were ordered not to enter the southwest quarters of Nanking as they were set aside as refugee quarters. At that time he heard that this prohibition was due to the danger of the armed defeated enemy soldiers in civilian clothes who had sought refuge there.

32592 As the witness had had dangerous experiences from the Chinese plain-clothes soldiers in the battle of Shanghai, he had his men take special caution never to approach any place where defeated Chinese soldiers were likely to be in hiding. His unit eventually marched west without entering the walls. While he was in the Nanking vicinity, he never heard stories of unlawful acts and massacres of Chinese people frequently said to be committed by * the Japanese soldiers.

At the beginning of 1938 his unit was stationed near Chinking. One day he visited a famous temple near by and in it was a great collection of books sealed by the Kempei with notes that taking any of them was strictly forbidden, and offenders, including Japanese soldiers, would be duly punished. When a soldier of an adjacent company was arrested by the Kempei, the witness accompanied the commander to take him over. The detachment commander of the Kempei, however, told them that the soldier had committed rape and refused to hand him over because of the order of C-in-C MATSUI to maintain military discipline and severely punish any offenders. There greatest trouble was the Chinese plain-clothes soldiers who, when pressed hard hid their appearance and pretended to be civilians, but the moment they were unnoticed they challenged the Japanese. As it was impossible to tell them from 32593 real civilians when they were without arms, they at least resorted occasionally * to the method of gathering all the village people and keeping surveillance over them. As soon as the plain-clothes soldiers surrendered themselves, public order was regained. They set the common people free and turned the surrendered soldiers over to the Kempei.

There was no cross-examination of the witness.

32595 * Exhibit 3394, the affidavit of OUCHI, Yoshihide, stated that since the landing at Woosung at the end of September, 1937, the affiant had taken part in the battles between Shanghai and Nanking areas as acting commander of the 7th battery of the 9th mountain artillery regiment, 9th division in the expeditionary force to Shanghai as a 2nd lieutenant.

32596 His regiment assembled near the air field west of Shanghai after crossing the Soochow River about 3 November. This area was rather devastated by cannonade. The regiment was still in battle position and it was maintained with strictness. At that rendezvous, they were instructed by the chief of staff that as the regiment would be sent presently to a zone where various foreign rights and interests existed, each commander ought * to have his men strictly at his command for the maintenance of discipline.

The affiant then cautioned his men that this instruction must be thoroughly understood and there was no one under his command who violated discipline at the rendezvous and vicinity. There were several women in a village near the rendezvous, but stepping into this area was strictly forbidden.

One night signal shells shot up from the village and afterward a shower of enemy shells was poured on unit quarters. They seized the village the next morning but could not find a single man, and thereafter it was necessary to take strict precautions against women. About 14 November the unit advanced to Soochow and they scarcely met enemy resistance until they got there. Some villages along the road were mostly reduced to ashes and there were no inhabitants to be seen.

32597 * As their unit advanced at the head they never could have done such violence and he knew it was done by Chinese troops in their retreat. The affiant strictly prohibited incineration of houses and looting both for the Chinese people and the Japanese troops coming after, and perhaps owing to this order there were satisfactory results.

They entered Soochow with no resistance and the streets were not destroyed except for slight damage by bombing. In Soochow the removal of goods by individual soldiers was prohibited and the preparation for requisition was conducted by intendant officers, but as the unit was ordered to advance west about 17 November, the requisition was not executed and the soldiers marched with their rationed food cooked in their messstins.

32598 They encountered a fierce resistance of the enemy in the mountaineous zone around 30 kilometres east of Nanking and the zone was well prepared and defended by the Chinese so their resistance was fierce. * The affiant's unit advanced again at the head and all troops were obliged to bivouac as all houses had been burned by advance troops. They then received an oral order that the aim for the advance was the wall of Nanking and as regarding the entry into the city they would have another order.

They marched into the air defence school outside Kwanghuamen at dawn 9 December after desparate fighting, and found that many houses had been destroyed and devastated. Especially the houses in the vicinity of the air field were burnt down. This destruction was surely made by the Chinese troops as there were no Japanese troops ahead.

32599 On 9 December they received an order that if the enemy would not surrender at noon the following day, they should attack Nanking. At the time they cautioned that as Nanking was the capital of * China, they should take care not to send shells so far as to fall within the city, although it was allowed to bombard the enemy on the wall. They were to take particular care not to drop shells upon foreign rights and interests and the refugee quarters.

32600 At this order the affiant racked his brain from the technical point of view of firing but fortunately attained the purpose mentioned in the order. The attack on Nanking was launched about 2:00 on 10 December and they captured the Kwanghuamen wall. But it was not permitted to enter the city and only MPs, as well as small units, entered. On that day near the wall was a burnt body of unknown nationality. On seeing this his battalion commander was enraged and gave a strict order to find the offender, and the affiant stopped the preparation for fighting, assembled his men, gave a warning, * and investigated the criminal, but there was no offender among the men under his command.

The surgeon who inspected the corpse decided that it must have been committed at least ten hours prior to the Japanese entry into the city, and that a Japanese soldier must have been captured by Chinese troops who burnt him to death. The affiant's unit turned back to Tangsuichen that night. They entered Nanking on 15 December and lodged several days at the Chinese barracks where each unit mounted guard and all soldiers were prohibited to go out except officers on official duty. This was so with all division units. There was not a single criminal charged with illegal action.

32601 An officer friend of the affiant told him that there seemed to be many refugees in the refugee quarters but it was guarded by MPs. So even an officer was not permitted to enter there. The affiant saw a great deal of Chinese army equipment thrown away. It was when he went there on official duty, but found no fire * disaster except ruins of small fires, and the streets were almost safe from destruction.

He saw a few Chinese soldiers' corpses along the Yangtze River, but never found a corpse which had been massacred. They turned eastward on 20 December.

32603 * Exhibit 3395, the affidavit of WAKIZAKA, Jiro, stated that in September 1937 he commanded the 36th regiment, 9th division as a colonel. His regiment was ordered mobilized about 20 September and he took part in engagements in the Shanghai and Nanking areas under the expeditionary force to Shanghai. Upon arrival at Shanghai, MATSUI's instructions were often passed to the affiant through his senior. MATSUI on every possible occasion delivered instructions that discipline should be strictly maintained, innocent people pacified and protected and foreign interests be safeguarded. The affiant made efforts to have these instructions thoroughly understood by his officers and men and warned them so misdeeds might not occur.

32604 While the Japanese force was advancing toward Nanking from Shanghai, his units always took the lead, and noticed that not a few houses along * the route had been burnt down, destroyed, or looted. Chinese natives said that this was due to the destruction caused by the so-called field clearing tactics, customarily taken by Chinese forces when about to retreat to check the advance of the Japanese. They said that both Chinese soldiers and people looted the houses, as was the case in war time. They endeavored to preserve houses and other facilities to pacify and protect the Chinese and for the convenience of the following units, and did not undertake to burn up and destroy them as this was common sense.

32605 As soon as his units captured Shunwachen, 40 kilometers southeast of Nanking, at about 4 p.m. 8 December, they immediately pressed hard on the enemy, hurriedly marched all night, and reached Shanctfanctchen, south of Kwanchthuamen, at dawn on the 9th. It was pitch dark that night, and before they could ascertain in which direction Nanking was, two pillars of flames rose high in the north. The affiant guessed that armies in the direction of * Nanking had started the flames. He made them a target for advancement and his guess turned out right.

For a few days before they captured Nanking they could see flames within the walls day and night. At that time Japanese bombing was not so intense and there was no artillery bombardment. They concluded that either the Chinese field clearing tactics or accidental fires were presumably responsible. Hitherto the Japanese forces were strictly warned against accidental fires. Soon after the capture of Nanking his units were engaged in extinguishing the first of the burning houses. There were no cases of incendiary by the Japanese and his units never caused accidental fires.

32606 They captured Kwanchthusmen in the early morning of December 13. Furious fighting went on at the gate and a large number of killed and wounded were reported from both sides. Immediately after the capture, his unit took care of the killed and wounded. They gathered up both the Japanese and Chinese corpses at the same place, half way between Kwanchthuamen and Tuncttsimen, and erected a grave post * and formal ceremonies were held.

When he inspected within the walls of Nanking on 15 December, he wanted to see the real state of those in the refugee section, but the foot armies refused his request saying that without special permission, even a commander was prohibited from entering. On that occasion and later he never heard of any illegal behaviors by the Japanese inside the section. A certain house was examined to accommodate regimental headquarters. When an officer entered the house to examine an air raid shelter attached to it, he was fired on from the inside. He accepted the challenge and shot and killed two Chinese soldiers. The affiant at once instructed units entered Nanking, a certain officer found a Chinese lady's shoe while he was on the discharge of official business and brought the shoe back to his quarters. A gendarme discovered this and submitted a document to the court martial on suspicion of plunderage. The officer asserted his innocence to the affiant and the affiant believed him and reported to his superior to that effect.

The supervision of Japanese gendarmes in Nanking was extremely strict and no consideration was shown even to minor offenses. MATSUI, immediately after a memorial service for the dead on 18 December, admonished the senior officers that military discipline should be more strictly maintained and the prestige of the army raised, and efforts made to realize friendly relations with China without delay.

32608 * After the various battles to capture Nanking, the affiant was struck with MATSUI's righteous and benevolent manner and always endeavored to exalt this spirit. The affiant was in Nanking until the morning of 24 December. No criminal was found in his command and the natives entertained no fear toward Japanese soldiers. He never heard any shot inside or outside of the walls after Nanking's fall.

32609 After the hostilities in Nanking were over, his units took over the responsibility of defending Kiating, and one night a guard of the battalion headquarters poured oil into a lamp, it caught fire and the quarters burned down. * Because of this accidental fire, the affiant was reprimanded in accordance with army disciplinary law. The battalion commander was put on good behavior and the guard commander was imprisoned.

By MATSUI's orders, military discipline was maintained in such a manner and even a small unlawful act was never overlooked. Besides this, the witness did not remember any unlawful act in his units.

* Exhibit 3396, the affidavit of NISHIJIMA, Takeshi, stated that in mid-September, 1937, the affiant joined the Shanghai Expeditionary Army as Battalion Commander in the 19th Regiment, and participated in the siege of Nanking as a major. Toward the end of September they landed near Woosung, Shanghai, and participated in the battle. In mid-November they were ordered to pursue the enemy toward Soochow, with strict instructions not to destroy or burn houses unless absolutely unavoidable for operations. The affiant instructed his subordinates of this.

Aside from the railway station and vicinity being destroyed, Soochow was left intact. A native told the affiant that the city was saved from destruction because the inhabitants pleaded to the Chinese army with money to retreat without fighting in the city or destroying and plundering it.

2.5 miles east of Wushin and inside its city limits, Chinese resistance caused a battle which damaged houses nearby. * Upon the affiant's inspection after the battle, he found that some contents of the provision warehouse had been carried off. He posted guards and prohibited further removal of the contents by unauthorized individuals. After reporting the situation to the Intendance Department they turned the place over to them, in accordance with previous orders.

A fierce battle was fought between the Hopan mountain range and Nanking. Almost all houses there had been burned down before Japanese occupation, and marks of plunder were evident, and nothing left to be utilized by the Japanese forces. They camped in tents and made the advance with no other provisions than field rations.

* In the drive against Nanking, movements were strictly controlled and no arbitrary action was allowed even to capitalize on opportune operational chances. More detailed instructions were given by December 8 regarding the attack on Nanking. According to the schedule, the affiant's unit was to begin the attack on Yuhuatai about 10 December, turn to Kwanhwamen on the afternoon of the 12th, and proceed to attack from about the 13th. On receiving the news of Nanking's fall, they only engaged in a clean-up campaign near the gate and then turned back to Tangsuchen. They entered Nanking on the 15th, deployed, and were billeted in houses in the southeast part.

32613 Almost all houses in the city were left undestroyed. There were some small fires around the billeting area, but none were started by his unit. As higher authorities had warned against fire before and after the entry, his command was especially careful. On entry, he prohibited his men to go out into the city except on official errands, and instructed them to protect and respect foreign properties and not inflict harm on the Chinese. * He placed a fire caretaker at every billet, with stern warnings concerning fire prevention.

32614 After his unit's entry into Nanking, they were billeted so as to be able to pursue the enemy at any time in accordance with instructions. Their actions were as follows: December 13, entered Nanking through the Kwanghuamen gate, mopped up remnants of the enemy east of the creek running from south to north west of the Tunktsinmen gate, and pushed on to Tangshuichen that night; December 14, mopped up around Tangshuichen and returned to Nanking about 7 p. m; December 16, the ceremony of reading the Imperial Rescript was held, and all officers and men cleaned up their personal effects with boiling water; On the 17th the triumphant entry of MATSUI, the Commanding General, took place, and they worked on moving camping quarters. On the 18th memorial services for the dead were held, and on the 19th regimental memorial services were held. * On the 20th a guard escort for MATSUI for inspection of battlefield and hospitals; on the 21st and 22nd they cleaned up the battlefield of Yuhuetai and searched for missing persons, and on the 23rd prepared for departure. On the 24th they moved to Kunshan.

In addition to the above daily routines, battle reports, and communication to the bereaved, etc., took up so much time they could not even rest. When at Nanking, going in and out of billets was closely guarded, and the affiant got instructions to train sentinels in questioning people so they might not cause trouble to law-abiding natives. He obeyed this to the letter. No superior ordered plundering or violence, much less Commanding General MATSUI.

32615 On December 19 they were directed by MATSUI, and on the 22nd by regimental commanders, to be kind toward the Chinese so they would trust in the army. * About December 19 the affiant inspected along the road from Chungshanru to Hsiakwan, and found no damage to the houses there. Before the entry into Nanking there were rumors of the awful destruction of Nanking by Japanese bombings, but after witnessing it the affiant confirmed it was untrue.

Page

He found no corpses of Chinese soldiers at Hsiakwan either. On December 24 his unit turned back east, reached Kunshan about January 5, and was ordered to stay there for garrison duty. During this time American pastors and medical men came to inspect churches and hospitals there, and were pleased and expressed gratitude to find those institutions had suffered only small damage and were in good order, and they entrusted them to the affiant's custody. For about a month after that the affiant also did garrison duty at Soochow, where the houses were in the same condition as before, and the streets well arranged with flourishing trade.

32616

* No illegal conduct of the Japanese forces was witnessed, and they were on harmonious terms with the natives, and not one irregularity occurred.

32617

Exhibit 3397, instructions distributed to the Central China Expeditionary Force on 18 December, 1937, by Commander MATSUI, stated that he was deeply moved by the Emperor's words on the occasion of the forces carrying out at one charge the city of Nanking, by dint of the fierce pursuit following the battle of Hutung, and thus had accomplished this historical undertaking. Thanks to * the fighting and exertions of the soldiers, so humble a one as MATSUI could discharge his duty, and he expressed deep gratitude.

32618

It should be borne in mind that their goal was a long way off, and the army's responsibility was all the more heavy and they should not relax their efforts. They should realize the true significance of command, enforce stricter discipline, and concentrate on education and training and strive for the perfection of fighting strength, thereby making preparations for the next operation complete. They should also be on stricter guard against possible attack, keep military secrets, and maintain peace and order, and afford no opportunity for recalcitrants to arise.

* Viewed from the future prosperity of the Orient and in accordance with Japanese traditions, they should be merciful to the Chinese masses and cooperate in pacifying them through guidance and enlightenment. The Army's principle remained the same irrespective of whether fighting was going on or not, and everyone should be careful with regard to conduct and exert utmost efforts to maintain and augment the splendid battle results, enhancing the Army's prestige. These were his instructions.

32619 * The witness identified and verified exhibit

32621 3398 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that the
* witness, from November 1937 to the end of January, 1938, participated in the siege of Nanking as Chief of Staff of the 16th Division, under the Shanghai Expeditionary Force.

32622 While his division was carrying out a pursuit from Chuyung, orders were received to attack Nanking about December 3, and they started their advance. About December
* 8 they were ordered to stop about three or four kilometers from Nanking. They were ordered also, as Nanking was the capital and there were many foreign interests, cultural and historical institutions there, not to destroy them, and at the time of the entry into the city they were to send a select unit to placate and treat the citizens kindly and maintain order. The witness had this point made known thoroughly to his units.

32623 What troubled them most during the attack on Nanking was the battle in the vicinity of Tsuchinshan, where the 33rd Regiment faced the enemy, and the one fought in the vicinity of Chungshan-ling, the division's main front. The division paid a price to capture Nanking without damaging Tsuchinshan and the Hsiaoling of the Ming Dynasty, as specified in the orders. Chinese units in the vicinity of Chungshan-ling were the greatest obstacle, and by firing at the rear and flank of the regiment harassed it to no end. Still the army had to withstand the disad-vantage of refraining from using artillery fire, not to mention the use of heavy infantry weapons. This hindered
* the advance, and they were forced to suffer great loss needlessly, but because of their sacrifice the Chushanling and Hsiaoling were kept intact, and the regiment was given a letter of appreciation from the army commander after the campaign.

The 16th Division, which reached the walls of Nanking at Chungshan-men at dawn December 13, 1937, sent about two battalions into the city, and had them sweep the area embracing Raipingshan, Shanyuan-men, Hsiakwan and Chungshan Road. This continued the next day, and on the 15th the Division Headquarters and a small unit entered the city, but no inhabitants had evacuated the area in charge of the division.

Page On the 23rd troop dispositions were changed, and a part of the division was given a new disposition of guarding the inside and outside of the city, and remained in Nanking until about January 20, 1938.

32624 * The refugee area, after the change in disposition of the 23rd, included the 16th Division garrison district. The area was marked clearly at the time of entry and was guarded strictly, and even officers were not permitted to go in or out of the area without special permission. After the Central China Area Army and the Commander of the Shanghai Expeditionary Army entered the city, instructions were often issued to maintain strict discipline, and he passed these orders to every unit.

32625 At the time of the occupation of Nanking all responsible administrative personnel had fled. Consequently the troops could find no person with whom to negotiate with regard to peace and order. They had no alternative but to take maintenance of order into their own hands, and this was extremely inconvenient. After entry, they found on the highway from Chungshan-men of the city limits of Nanking to Hsiakwan a great deal of discarded uniforms, sabers, * ammunition, rifles, and caps. When they made a sweep inside the city, there were no Chinese to be seen with the exception of the refugee area. Being unable to trust that all in the refugee area were possible citizens, they had to investigate them and a Sino-Japanese joint commission was organized on December 25 to do this. The method of investigation was to interrogate or inspect the Chinese in the presence of both Japanese and Chinese, and judge whether he was a straggler by consultation with Japanese soldiers and the Chinese committees; for the general people, certificates of residence were issued. Those determined to be stragglers were turned over to headquarters. It was indeed not true that they were slaughtered.

32626 As almost all villages outside Nanking were set on fire by Chinese troops in their scorched earth operation as they retreated, Japanese troops had no houses to billet and almost all units were forced to camp out. Common as * such scorched earth operations were, the burning of homes in the battle area was especially numerous. Even inside Nanking there were traces of fire when they first entered, said to be started by Chinese troops as they retreated. Because of the necessity for maintaining billeting facilities in cold weather, headquarters ordered units to be alert against fire. In spite of precautions, there were times when they caught Chinese girls with certificates of residence starting fires.

The affiant did receive reports from the MIA of a few instances of plunder by Japanese soldiers. However, as the residents fled their belongings were carried with them and most of their houses were practically empty. He never heard of any organized or mass plundering. It was absolutely without fact that headquarters ordered or connived or permitted such illegal acts. He was informed by Chinese victims that most plundering and destruction in the battlefields were the common acts of retreating Chinese * troops and those desperate people who took chances to force themselves in the area.

* The protection of foreign interests and cultural institutions was ordered by MATSUI and made known to all units. Chinese, however, were skillful in hiding behind foreign interests, and abused the use of foreign flags by stragglers hiding under their protection. He got such reports many times from the Chinese. It was true that Japanese troops could not at once identify foreign flags as synonymous of foreign interests, and sometimes could not help raiding places that impressed them as dangerous. It was regrettable that these raids gave rise to complications.

There was no organized rape by Japanese soldiers. There were a few scattered offenses but they were all punished in accordance with the law. The places where buried bodies were said to have been found according to prosecution evidence were where Chinese troops had built * positions and defended themselves, as in the area between Chungshan Men and Ma-Gun, or where there were facilities for receiving dead and wounded, as in the case of Taiping-Men Fukueishan and the vicinity. Soldiers of both sides were killed in these areas, but there never was mass butchery there.

When the 16th Division came to guard Nanking and vicinity its efforts were concentrated on maintaining peace and order. Order was soon restored, and the people gradually returned to their homes with confidence in the Japanese troops. MATSUI's order to treat the inhabitants kindly was so thorough-going that as early as the end of the year the Assembly of the Maintenance of Public Order was organized, and thousands of Chinese gathered at the place of ceremony and cheered. It was not true that illegal and violent acts of the Japanese troops were * frightening the inhabitants at that time, for the number of residents was increasing and even peddlers were seen more and more.

* The witness stated that he was Chief of Staff of the 16th Division, which was under the Shanghai Expeditionary Forces at the end of October. At the capture of Nanking it was under MATSUI's command, belonging to the Shanghai Expeditionary forces under him. At the time of the fall of Nanking the Shanghai Expeditionary Forces was under Prince ASAKA, but this force was in turn under MATSUI's command. * The 6th Division was part of the Shanghai Expeditionary Force, and not the 10th Army. Force headquarters was somewhere east of Nanking. At the fall of the city, headquarters were at Tansuichen, and afterwards in the city. Divisional headquarters was set up about 15 December, and Force headquarters was not located within Nanking immediately after the fall. Headquarters entered the city at the time of the formal entry on December 17.

32633

* He didn't recall whether headquarters was actually established in Nanking immediately after the fall of the city, or exactly what the date was. The 10th Army took part in the attack on Nanking, and he didn't think it was a part of the Shanghai Expeditionary Force. He didn't know where 10th Army Headquarters was after the fall of the city, for he had no connection with that army. He believed that the 6th and 114th Divisions formed the 10th Army, but was not sure. He didn't know

32634

* if the 8th Division was part of the 10th Army. The 16th, 9th, and part of the 13th Divisions were in the Expeditionary Force at the capture of Nanking, but as for the others he did not know where they were located. He believed that the 3rd and 11th Divisions were part of the force at that time.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that at the time of the triumphant entry the select unit was sent in. Asked if this was on December 17, he replied that those sent into Nanking immediately after the entry occurred on the 13th and 14th of December. Asked again if when a select unit was sent in at the time of the triumphal entry if this was on 17 December, he * replied that units arrived at the walls of Nanking on the morning of the 13th, and on that and the following day two battalions were sent into the city for mopping up.

- At the time of entry into Nanking on 17 December the units sent in were not limited to the select units.
- 32636 * Asked if at the time of the formal entry the select unit was sent in, he replied that he didn't recall whether units were specially selected when they made the triumphal entry. He did recall that different troops were picked to represent various units on this triumphal occasion. In
- 32637 * his affidavit he had mentioned that the select unit was sent to placate and treat the citizens kindly and maintain order, and he was asked if there had been reports of outrage which caused the dispatch of the special unit. He replied that he believed the meaning of this paragraph was that those units were given orders to do so. The first units that went in were given orders to do so.
- 32638 * He believed the prosecutor was confusing the first units that entered the city with units that entered later to mop up the remnants. At the dawn of December 13 about two battalions were sent in to sweep certain areas. He believed this was confused with the part of the affidavit which had just been cited regarding MATSUI's order to send a select unit into the city.
- 32639 * Reference was made to the affidavit in which it was stated that on 23 December part of the 16th Division substituted for another unit which had entered the city previously. The witness stated that this other unit belonged to the 9th Division. Asked what other divisions were within the city after the fall besides the 9th and 16th, he replied he did not know the names of any other units except the one in front of his own division and those on both sides. The 9th Division was on the left, and there were divisions belonging to the 10th Army on the other side. but he had forgotten which was to the right and which to the left.
- 32640 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that he received reports from the MPs of a few instances of plunder by Japanese soldiers. He stated that this plundering * was inside the city wall. He had forgotten the number of instances, and goods of little value such as food and things of that nature were taken.

The witness was referred to his affidavit in which he stated that sometimes soldiers could not help raiding places that impressed them as dangerous and that those raids gave rise to all kinds of complications. When asked what kind of complications, he stated that the soldiers would see a foreign flag flying but would believe they were

Page used by the Chinese forces under false pretenses. They would go to those places and find that the flags actually represented foreign interests, and the foreigners there would be irritated.

32641 * Where he had stated in his affidavit that there were a few scattered offenses concerning discipline, these were attempts to enter refugee areas, attempts to cohabit with Chinese women, and things of that nature. Asked if he meant the offense of illegal entry and rape, or the attempt to commit such offenses, he replied there were some attempts and he believed that there were some actual cases of rape, but believed they were few in number.

32642 * Where he had referred in the affidavit to evidence presented by the prosecution in speaking about places where bodies were buried, he was referring to a document published by a charitable organization in Nanking. The bodies buried were those of soldiers who fell in the fighting, not merely within the walls of Nanking, for the greater number * were found in the fortified areas immediately outside the walls.

Asked if in the number of dead picked up there were women and children killed outside the wall, as shown by the prosecution evidence, he replied that since he was not testifying that he saw these bodies, he didn't know. When he was speaking of the bodies he was referring to the prosecution evidence, and not bodies he saw himself. Asked if he was trying to explain it away by something of which he had no personal knowledge, he replied that what he wanted to say was that the bodies referred to in the prosecution evidence were found in the battle area and that they were the bodies of soldiers.

32643 * He saw the bodies himself, but didn't recall the number. He didn't mean that he saw the bodies referred to in the prosecution evidence, but only that he did see bodies on the battlefield.

Reference was made to the affidavit where mention was made of an inaugural ceremony on 1 January, 1938, of the Assembly of the Maintenance of Public Order, and that the gathering was in the public square in front of Kulou, and thousands of Chinese cheered. The witness stated that this was the day the Russian Embassy was burned. He saw the burning, but didn't know who started the fire.

By Mr. Mattice.

32648 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3399 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that when the Shanghai Expeditionary Force was organized the witness was appointed Chief of Staff under C-in-C MATSUI and participated in the battles of Shanghai and Nanking. After the force was organized, MATSUI instructed that the battle in the Shanghai vicinity was aimed at subjugating the Chinese Army, and they should therefore protect and patronize Chinese officials and people as far as possible. They should always bear in mind not to involve foreign residents and armies, and maintain close liaison with foreign authorities to avoid misunderstanding.

32649 Officers and men took unusual trouble to carry out this instruction. During the Shanghai battle, Chinese soldiers and civilians were given medical treatment, and medicines were distributed among them. When the Japanese Army took the southern district of Shanghai (Nanshan), front line units took technical pains not to drop shells there. * This instruction was repeated on all occasions, and its execution was strictly supervised even after the battle of Nanking.

After the Shanghai battle, MATSUI interviewed foreign representatives and apologized for the damage on their nationals, clarifying Japan's position and requesting their cooperation to bring the war to a quick conclusion. The witness never received from MATSUI any order to make light of foreign interests, and never saw or heard any in his command perpetrated such deeds.

On 2 December, 1937, the witness was ordered to capture Nanking. MATSUI, as C-in-C of Central China Army Groups, gave detailed instructions concerning its capture. The witness, as Chief of Staff, transmitted to MATSUI's units the order, and admonished them to be tolerant and benevolent towards Chinese soldiers and people.

32650 * On 10 December, the order to attack the Castle of Nanking was issued. Despite the fact that at Nanking's fall nearly all the principal houses outside the city were destroyed or burned, there was no house to quarter the Army, and more troops than expected entered the city. By MATSUI's order, the witness ordered all troops except the 16th Division to retire to far-off eastern districts, and intended to restore order by ordering them to maintain strict discipline and public morals.

He made three inspections on each day of December 16, 20, and 31, but found no corpse in the streets. In the neighborhood of Siakwan he saw scores of soldiers' bodies, but as for the alleged tens of thousands of slaughtered bodies, * he never saw them. He admitted there were small fires, but saw no case of intentional incendiarism, nor received a report about it. Within the castle walls of the city were a few burned houses, but nearly all remained as they had been. He always instructed that the army pay careful attention to fire.

After the entry into Nanking, a few cases of plunder and outrage were reported to MATSUI, and he regretted these acts. He instructed officers to do their best to prevent misdeeds and insisted on severe punishment and consequently such offenders were punished. Afterwards discipline was strictly maintained, and the witness heard that the 16th Division lodged a protest against the Legal Department's procedure.

He was told some troops removed furniture, but they said they did it to facilitate quartering. They said they compensated for the loss, but in most cases managers fled, so they put up a note to guarantee compensation. A few soldiers removed furniture privately, and some removed * furniture belonging to foreigners, but this was settled by returning the articles or by compensation, and the offenders were punished. Headquarters never gave an order for the commission of unlawful acts.

As for the management of the refugee district, the witness ordered the 16th Division to protect the place and admission to and from it was limited to those with certificates, and MPs guarded the place. He believed the place could not have been encroached on by men, collectively, systematically, or continuously. He never saw nor heard the incidents shown by the prosecution, and consequently never made a report of these to MATSUI, who naturally never heard of them. He never knew how many protests had been made by the Nanking Security District Committee, so he never reported it to MATSUI.

* The witness stated that he was a major-general when he was Chief of Staff under MATSUI in 1937. The attack on Nanking was undertaken by the 10th Army and the Shanghai Expeditionary Force. General YANAGAWA commanded the former, and Prince ASAKA the latter.

Almost all the 16th and 9th Divisions, a part of the 3rd and a part of the 13th was supposed to reinforce, but as they were late were not in time to join in the fighting up to the city's fall.

* Asked where Siakwan was, he replied that it was outside the city walls to the west on the banks of the Yangtze. Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that he made inspections on the 16th, 20th, and 31st of December. Asked if he was in the Nanking area throughout that period or if he returned on the later dates of the 20th and 31st, he replied that headquarters was practically outside Nanking, and on the 16th and 20th he went specially to Nanking from headquarters for this inspection. By headquarters, he meant Prince ASAKA's headquarters. He was Chief of Staff to MATSUI up to the beginning of December, and after that was Chief of Staff of ASAKA's army.

The outrages reported to MATSUI after the entry into Nanking were rough actions and at times included rape. Asked what he meant by "rough actions" when it did not include rape, he replied that the words meant such actions as removing furniture for firewood, beating or kicking inhabitants and other actions of such nature, but did not include murder.

32674 Army headquarters was 30 kilometers from Nanking prior to the city's fall and moved into Nanking about 25 Dec., * remaining there until after 10 Feb. the following year.

32675 Exhibit 3400, the affidavit of OGAWA, Sekijiro, stated he was ordered to become Legal Affairs Section Chief of the 10th Army, commanded by Lt. Gen'l. YANAGAWA, about the end of Oct. 1937.

* He landed on the northern coast of Hangchow Bay, took part in the battle of Nanking, and was attached to the Central China Area Army on 4 Jan. 1938 under the direct control of MATSUI. The 10th Army, after landing on the shores of Hangchow Bay, came under the Central China Area Army. MATSUI gave instructions to apply the law strictly to protect law abiding citizens and defend foreign interests and obey strict discipline and public morals.

32676 Before the affiant came to Nanking, he dealt with about 20 cases of offenses on discipline and morals and in the course of this found it difficult to decide whether the cases were fornication or violation, the reason being that it was not rare for Chinese women to take a suggestive attitude toward Japanese soldiers and when they were found as * having committed adultery with Japanese soldiers by their husbands or others, they suddenly changed their attitude, asserting they had been raped. Whether adultery or rape, the affiant punished in accordance with the law. Those who took intimidation steps, he punished severely.

32677 He entered Nanking on 14 Dec., that afternoon inspected the garrison area of the 10th Army in South Nanking. He saw only 6 or 7 corpses of Chinese soldiers. The 10th Army evacuated Nanking on 19 Dec. and switched to the Hangchow operations. While in Nanking, he heard no rumors of illegal conduct nor were there any indictments for them. The Army remained on an operational basis with strict discipline. He never received orders to commit, nor did he ever approve, illegal conduct. The Japanese MP observed strictly MATSUI's orders. Illegal conduct was strictly controlled. * One MP officer protested the affiant's being too lenient in a case.

BY MR. MATTICE

32678 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3341 as his affidavit.

32679 * The affidavit stated that the witness became a staff officer of the Shanghai Expeditionary Force in Aug. 1937 and was ordered to take charge of logistics. Landing at Woosung on 23 Aug., he first had charge of the ammunition supply, but when the Army entered Nanking, he was concerned with transport, and returned to Japan on 23 Jan. 1938. He was well acquainted with the operation plan of MATSUI as he always received orders directly and was consulted by MATSUI at Headquarters. As the expeditionary force was organized suddenly, with no preparations or plan, * it was decided that without waiting for completion of organization, the units which had completed mobilization should be sent one after another to the front in time for rescuing the naval landing party at Shanghai. This detachment consisted of 5000 men of the 3rd Division, 4 infantry battalions and 2 artillery batteries, 5000 men of the 11th Division and 8 guns, but owing to the shortage of preparative ammunition, they could only carry 400 rounds per gun, totaling 3200 rounds.

Strength was small and they fought against heavy odds and MATSUI's landing was delayed about two weeks. Owing to the spread of epidemics, they changed the whole Paoshanchen into a quarantine hospital. Though the epidemics were precided 12 Oct., fighting power sometimes showed a marked decrease and the battle was fought under great difficulty for lack of ammunition and provisions. * The witness thought these difficulties were due to the want of preparation and by the consequences of gradually using forces according to the principle of non-extension. The Expeditionary Force to Shanghai had sometimes requisitioned munitions in the occupied area according to the formalities established in Field Service Regulations. Requisition was always executed by the carrying money chest, a plan being mapped out by the battalion account officer, and a smaller unit or individual was strictly prohibited to do it without permission. It was a matter of course to pay compensation when the requisition was executed. They were embarrassed in doing this in occupied areas between Shanghai and Nanking where neither inhabitants nor administrative authorities remained with whom to negotiate. In these cases they had to use the commodities to be requisitioned without the possessors' personal consent, and they used to put up a poster showing the kind and amount of goods requisitioned so possessors might be informed and come to Headquarters to receive their compensation. * The witness actually

Page saw such process being taken for the Wuhsi rice warehouses. Whenever owners or authorities remained in the occupied area, they negotiated with them and got the requisitioned commodities after paying compensation. Many times the witness acted in this way and remembered that at Painaokiang, the village head remained to take administrative responsibility. He negotiated with him and got provisions. As they paid reasonable compensation and took measures to protect the remaining inhabitants, the village had thanked them and gave them a cordial reception. At Chanshu there were similar cases.

* Furthermore, the witness directed in many places, by means of autographed notice-boards, that the inhabitants be protected and looting prohibited. He took these measures in accordance with MATSUI's instructions. Since no one remained to take administrative responsibility in Nanking, personal negotiation was impossible. It was conjectured that the troops executed requisition according to the measures mentioned. As for requisition from the refugee quarter, he had never heard about it.

Both Chinese and Japanese troops practiced incendiarism in the front as a tactical operation. That of the Chinese troops prior to the retreat caused considerable damage which hindered the advance or the relief and pacification after occupation.

There were fires before they occupied Nanking but no conflagration after. So far as he knew, only a small part of the city was burned. It was clear that the neighborhood of the Confucius Temple and other central places remained as before the battle. He saw that the buildings of the Foreign Affairs Department and the Military and Navy Department were used as a hospital for the wounded and sick Chinese. Medical equipment was insufficient and the reception of patients seemed difficult. There could not have been any massacre there, and they gave them rice and medical supplies, but do what they might, they never recovered, died, as most of them were in serious condition.

32685

They scarcely captured POWs before the entry and he was told that the troops captured approximately 4000 in the Nanking vicinity, one-half of whom were sent to Shanghai and the rest detained. Though he saw several employed for common labor, he never maltreated them and dismissed them when their duties were over. * Decampment and theft were frequently committed by POWs and the witness supposed the latter crime was duly punished according to law, but the former crime he understood was not punished.

In the curriculum vitae of MATSUI "appointed to attach the General Staff Office ..." meant he was installed in the General Staff Office as an official but he had no fixed post. He was then travelling through Europe.

32686 * The witness stated on further oral direct examination that about the time of Nanking's capture, about 10 Dec. 1947, MATSUI's Headquarters was in Soochow, about 140 miles east of Nanking. On 13 Dec. he was there, and on the 15th he advanced to the Tang-Shuichen area. On 17 Dec. he entered Nanking and on the 21st MATSUI went to Shanghai by destroyer. The witness was not with MATSUI when he was at this Soochow headquarters immediately before going to Nanking. MATSUI was not in Nanking when the city fell, but 32687 was in Soochow. The reason MATSUI * was not at Nanking when the city fell was because it was proper at the time to establish the headquarters at Soochow to command appropriately both the Shanghai Expeditionary Force and the 10th Army. Furthermore, on 13 Dec., when the city fell, MATSUI was sick and unable to be at the front.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY BRIG. NOLAN

The witness stated that MATSUI was in Soochow on 13 Dec. and on 15 Dec. at Tangshuichen, about 25 miles from Nanking.

32689 * Exhibit 3402, photograph of a bulletin posted on the wall of the Chinchuan Temple by a staff officer of the Shanghai Expeditionary Force as ordered by Commander MATSUI, warned against setting fire or looting the temple and ordered protection to the priest. It was dated Dec. 1937.

BY MR. ITO

The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3403 as his affidavit.

32690

* The affidavit stated that the witness established the Greater Asia Association with MATSUI in 1933 and was Chief Secretary of the Association's Director until its dissolution in 1941. MATSUI delivered an address at the conference of the establishment of the association which included the following account: * When MATSUI went to Geneva as delegate for the Disarmament Conference in 1931, the Chinese delegate, Wellington Koo, frequently attacked Japan and Japanese delegates replied. Notwithstanding that Japan and China had been brothers from olden times, they quarreled before the eyes of the white race. This was so painful that MATSUI could not keep his eyes open. For this reason, he wished to exert himself to bring about a better feeling between China and Japan after returning home.

32691

32692

The witness organized separately a body of investigation called the Oriental Society for Research and Investigations, but when he listened to MATSUI's opinion, he agreed with him and that was why the witness resolved to establish the Greater Asia Association in cooperation with him. MATSUI attempted to establish it without resigning his post, but this was not welcomed by the military and some went so far as to propose that he check the establishment. * But MATSUI did not discontinue the work of the association, saying that he had been much interested in things concerning China and Japan, had made special studies, and had a firm belief for their reconciliation. The two War Ministers, ARAKI and HAYASHI, came to approve the undertaking on condition that the movement would act purely within the limit of an instruction: movement for thought, namely, no political movement would be started. Thus, its establishment was recognized and the association fulfilled the condition and never took political action but remained a body where genuine thought concerning Sino-Japanese questions were investigated and studied among the members.

32693

* The contents of the association's work were the opening of the meeting for investigation and research and issuing magazines. The contents of the meeting was that when noted persons returned home from various places in the world, a meeting would be held and the state of affairs of foreign countries would be heard. No special research organ was established to conduct systematic and positive investigation. When suitable persons did not come to lecture, the meetings were not held for three or four months. A private school

Page for developing Asia was contemplated but not realized owing to want of funds. Expenditures depended upon private funds and there was never any government or public assistance. The expenditure for establishment came chiefly from 10,000 yen which was the remaining money saved by MATSUI from his travelling expenses to Geneva and it was started with contributions of interested members and persons.

32695 The Greater Asia Association had the object of carrying out Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Greater Asia Principle and was to instruct the people that China and Japan were brothers; Asia would be saved if they cooperated; Asia was the mother of world civilization; its moral civilization would be able to save the world; however, there were very few independent states in Asia, simply because the two countries struggled against each other. The magazine was issued monthly and about 2000 copies were distributed among members only and the people in general could not be instructed by them. The association's ordinary expenditures were from 20,000 to 25,000 * yen per annum, consisting of clerks' salaries and printing expenses. These were managed by subscriptions of members, sales of the magazines, and contributions of members or interested persons.

While and after MATSUI was Commander of the Formosan Army, the association could not be so active because of a shortage of funds and of the dislike of the military. Even after MATSUI became a cabinet member, no positive action could be undertaken. The system for the cabinet councillors aimed at the solution of the China Incident, but according to MATSUI's impression, it was only a conference of listening to the reports and was quite nonsensical as he was not asked to suggest a plan nor were his plans adopted even when suggestions were given to him. The witness remembered that MATSUI accordingly resigned his post before long.

32696 MATSUI visited North China in 1936 and discussed the Greater Asia Principle with interested Chinese there. With this conference as a turning point, the Chinese Greater Asia Association was established in Tientsin in Dec. 1936, by influential men in the political, business and literary circles in North China. Generals Sung Che-yuan, Hsu Fu-chu, and others supported it.* The Chinese Association was not a branch of the Japanese but independent and its object was to realize the Asia for the Asiatics by cooperation between China and Japan.

In his speech at the farewell meeting in his honor when he became Commander of the Expeditionary Forces in Shanghai, MATSUI said he was going to the front to pacify a brother, rather than fight an enemy. He knew China and had had many Chinese friends since his young days. At this time the military authorities had the non-aggravation policy also, and the General Staff gave MATSUI only two divisions.

The witness heard that MATSUI demanded five divisions in order to conclude as quickly as possible, but this was not realized. Foreign magazines looked as if they had discovered Japan's weak-kneed policy, saying that MATSUI * proceeded to Shanghai with certain divisions of old soldiers.

In 1941 the government completely annexed a great number of research and investigation bodies for culture in general, such as oriental religion, morals, etc. and bodies for guiding public opinion concerning oriental questions. They made up one body named the Japanese Asia Development League and attempted to control the Asia Development Movement. The Greater Asia Association was amalgamated into the League. The Association was made to discontinue its publication, records were transferred to the League, and MATSUI was recommended for the staff of the League. Many members of the League and many undertakings were brought together by the League, but as they were a medley of good and bad, their perfect control was impossible. They did nothing but repeat the changes of system. They were unable to be engaged in any significant actions.

* Not long after, MATSUI resigned his post, retired to Atami, where he was keeper of a temple, offering up prayers for the repose of all Chinese and Japanese killed in China. Sometimes, on request, he gave lectures there on the Greater Asia Principle, speaking chiefly to the effect that the key to the solution of the Incident lay in reflection by the Japanese. MATSUI loved China and the Chinese, and said that to serve Asia, China and Japan should rise up hand in hand with each other.

There was no cross-examination of the witness.

The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3404 as his affidavit.

32705

* The affidavit stated that he was a trustee of the Great Asiatic Society from March 1933 to June 1941 and was nominal editor and publisher of "Pan-Asianism", the organ magazine of the society. The annual bulletin of the Society published on April 25, 1940 was edited and published in the witness' name with materials collected by the society's business section. An article entitled "Prospectus for Foundation of the Great Asiatic Society" appearing in the bulletin was originally drafted by the Foundation Committee and published on 1 March 1933. The article entitled "Rules of the Great Asiatic Society" appearing in this bulletin was decided by the Foundation Committee in February 1933.

32706

* The article "General View of the Enterprises of the Greater Asiatic Society in China" appearing in this bulletin was the record made when MATSUI and the witness, during their North China trip, heard of Sung Cheh-yuan and Chin Te-chen' intention of founding the Greater Asiatic Society in China, and conferred with them on liaisoning with the one in Japan.

"The Proclamation of the Great Asiatic Society in China", part of this article, was originally written and published by the Chinese, was delivered to the Society in Japan and printed in the organ and annual bulletin of Pan-Asianism.

* Asked what the attitude of MATSUI in the Society was toward the Three Peoples Principle, the witness replied that during the course of the China Incident, there was strong opposition to the principle in the government and among the people. Even in the Society, there were two opposing thoughts. The witness and a few other Society members, however, believed that the principle as advocated by Sun Yat-sen created a sort of thought system, and that unless the Society approved of the Three Peoples Principle, they would be inconsistent with advocating the Greater Asia Principle. If they were to approve it and make the Greater Asia Principle the basis of the Society, it followed they must also approve the Three Peoples Principle. This contention was supported by MATSUI.

32708

32709

* With the establishment of the Nanking Regime under Wang Ching-wei about Feb. 1940, the Three Peoples Principle again arose as a question. At that time there was in the government in connection

Page called the East Asia Mission, of which MATSUI and the witness were members representing the civilian population or non-governmental groups. In connection with an inquiry addressed by the government to the Commission, pertaining to the ideological basis for settling the Incident, the Commission recommended the acknowledgment of the Three Peoples Principle. Within the government there was some opposition and Director-General of the China Affairs Board YANAGAWA was strongly opposed. The accused SUZUKI, Director of the Political Affairs Bureau of the China Affairs Board, strongly prevailed upon his superior, YANAGAWA, to accept the recommendation of the Commission and the recommendation of the Commission was adopted.

32711 * CROSS-EXAMINATION BY BRIGADIER NOLAN

The witness stated that he was a trustee of the Greater Asiatic Society from 1933 to 1941, and MATSUI was one of the founders. He recalled that MATSUI during 1933 to 1936 was one of a number of advisory councillors of the organization, and after that MATSUI became president. MATSUI resigned from the Society when it merged into the East Asia League, which was an auxiliary organization of the IRAA about August 1941. *

32712

The witness was only nominally, and not actually, editor of the Society's publication "Pan Asianism." Actual publication was by staff members, but he was responsible from 1933 to 1936. After this, he did not participate in the publication. * From time to time the witness contributed treatises or essays, but also wrote signed editorials which did not necessarily reflect the views of the association. There were cases in which only his personal views were expressed and other cases, the views of many members. Frequently the views published were contrary to those entertained by a majority of the members and were printed as personal views. In some cases articles were contributed by non-members.

32713

* When shown a document, the witness identified it as the Oct. 1940 issue of the magazine. * He acknowledged that the first editorial in the issue was written by him, himself. Exhibit 3405-A, the editorial from the magazine taken from the Oct. issue of Pan-Asianism stated that Imperial troops had advanced into FIC and Japanese residents in Shanghai where international tensions were complex were naturally more deeply impressed by this good news than those in the homeland. Both Chinese and Occidentals in the concession must have been shocked as they never before were * since the landing of military Japanese troops in Hang Chow Bay, when they saw the balloon stating that the troops had advanced into FIC. The advance not only opened a new phase in the Sino-Japanese Incident, but also marked a turning point in the situation

32714

32716

NAKATANI - Cross

Page of the whole of East Asia. It might be true that this was planned and executed to dispose of the China Incident but there was no knowing how great the significance and consequences of the advance into FIC might be. Four years had passed since the China Incident started but this was the first time that the Army had ever taken action outside China and had been able to hoist the glorious colors in a European colony. They could not but be extremely satisfied that the Sino-Japanese conflict as a war to emancipate Asia had now at last taken up the real issue.

32717

There was no need to comment on how the French governed in FIC and in what circumstances the poor Annamese were. They could not but be impressed by the greatness of Divine Might when they imagined the joy of the FIC natives, that they had been favored with the Emperor's virtues. The feeling of the FIC people immediately reflected that of the Burmese people. FIC and Burma were within hailing distance. Some day in October, the term of prohibiting aid to Chiang Kai-shek through Burma would expire. Rather than use the more prosaic term it was more elegant and truthful to say that within 50 or 60 days the Burma people would have the opportunity of basking in the august virtue of the Emperor. They felt pity when they considered the motive which drove England and America into trying all possible means to obstruct the advance into FIC. When they realized that the advance was executed in spite of the intrigue, hindrance and intimidation of Britain and America, the historical significance and political merits of the advance became doubly great. Britain displayed an attitude to threaten the southward advance by lending the Singapore Naval Base to America and forming a united military front including America, England and Australia. The fact that the Army triumphantly carried out the stationing of troops in FIC in spite of this had a tremendous psychological effect on the Chinese.

The impression that although Japan could assert authority over China, she could not compete with Britain and especially America, had immeasurably fostered among the Chinese contempt for the Japanese, thus creating an obstacle in establishing the New Order. The Chinese interpreted the numerous disgraceful local events brought about in order not to arouse American nervousness as proof of Japan's inability to stand up against America. It could not be denied that the advance in the face of the objections and threats from America had contributed to straightening out the thinking of the Chinese and to some extent of the Japanese. To Chungking, this shock must have been greater than the loss suffered from the intercepting of transportation of materials. There were indirect influences caused by Imperial troops in FIC upon the movements into FIC, Burma and other countries. The advance meant a few steps more toward the war to liberate Asia.

32721 * Exhibit 3406-A, two excerpts from the book, "Annual Report by the Greater East Asiatic Association", published in April 1940, stated that the Manchurian Incident had caused an epoch-making change and turn in world political circles. The independence of Manchukuo was a great wonder in political history, and yet its appearance was nothing but a prelude to world historic changes to be occasioned successively.

32722 East Asian autonomy must be established next to the independence of Manchuria. The liberty and glory of Asia must be restored in quick succession. Formerly, * Manchuria served as the last defensive fortress in Asia against European conquest. Now Manchuria had been strengthened into one nation, and the construction work of Pan-Asiatic union and reorganization must be started. Asia was clearly one consolidated body with the same destiny from cultural, political, etc. standpoints. The peace, welfare, and development of the Asiatic races could be possible only upon realizing Asiatic unity. The opposition and struggle among the Asiatic nations afforded opportunities for outside interference and accelerated oppression. To root out opportunities for struggles among one another and exclude outside interference and separation, it was necessary to organize Asiatic races into a solid unity. Separation was not only a misfortune of East Asia herself, but of world peace, for they were apt to stimulate * European or American ambition or greed. The establishment of order through the independent endeavour of Asiatics was a prerequisite to the stabilization of world affairs.

32723 The grave responsibility for reconstruction and establishment of order was a task which must be borne by Japan. A quarter of a century before they staked national destiny and brought to naught invasion of Asia by the Russian Empire and saved all Asia from being overthrown and destroyed, thereby affording all colored races an opportunity to raise their heads. Now human history was just at a turning point after the settlement of the Manchurian Incident. It was time that Japan should make one more step toward the reconstruction and consolidation of Asia, enlarging the historical significance of the Russo-Japanese war and pouring all her cultural, political, economical and organizing power. This was the only way of spreading the Empire's fundamental policy all over the Four Seas, * and improve the present international relations where Europe alone was the important character, with Japanese power leading the independence and consolidation of the Asiatic races and to establish a new world order based on human equality and equal possession of world resources.

The forming of the Great East Asia union was a historical duty. Considered from the standpoint of development of international politics, the formation of the Great East Asia union was natural, and it was an inevitable consequence for human society that nations much alike with one another wished to form a political and economical union.

32725

It was unnatural and impossible to step over a racial state to world state, and it was inevitable that the League of Nations, which was organized at an opportune time without any maturity of historical factors, should be changed fundamentally by pan-continentalism and pan-racialism. In spite of efforts, the League was not only powerless to settle international complications, but the * efforts themselves to alleviate struggles gave a spur to them. The reason lay in the fact that there was something fundamentally wrong with the League that, neglecting the development of international politics, took its ground on idealistic cosmopolitanism. Present international politics and economy, and those in the future, were likely to be managed by intricate oppositions and antagonism among pan-continental and pan-racial state groups, such as a European Union, Asiatic Union, American Union, etc. The construction of the new world peace should be based on the condition of coexistence of such various groups.

32726

* Thus, the formation of the Great East Asia union was not only indispensable, but the best way to secure world peace. The reason why they thereby organized the association was that they believed it the best and absolute way to contribute to the progress of human culture and secure world peace. They would dash on undauntedly to materialize the union by serious efforts to investigate culture, politics, etc., and perfect friendly relations with other Asiatic states, and introduce and spread Japanese culture to other nations.

32727

The visit to North China in November 1935 by Councillor MATSUI and Secretary NAKATANI gave rise to the movement among Chinese in both official and civilian * circles toward establishing an association there. A preparatory commission was decided to be formed by influential members of the political, business and literary circles, and a meeting was held in Tientsin on December 1 the same year. Officers were elected and supporters were named, and a future line of policy, liaison with the Tokyo Greater Asiatic Association etc. were discussed on that occasion.

32728 The declaration of the Chinese Association stated that in former times China defended herself by closing her doors to foreigners. Recently, with traffic and communication being opened, numberless countries had been founded, and their intercourse and communication was getting more intense. China could not remain closed to * the outer world any longer, considering her present power, and could not hope for isolated independence. China had hitherto been enabled to stay within her own boundaries, but hereafter she ranks among world powers. Circumstances had changed and there must follow altered national policy to cope with the changed situation. That is why China had recently heroically stood firm and rendered service as a member of the international organization. Nevertheless, during the past sixty years western powers had gradually shifted their influence eastward, bringing storm and stress to Asiatic nations.

32728 These nations were at a loss as to what to do, as they had been trying to help one another, but quarrelled, only to bitterly repent. * Why did they not unbosom themselves to one another and unite in common interest? The day had come when each should be awakened to the situation. Asia was Asia for the Asiatics, and all should pledge to be united for the establishment of a firm and concrete foundations, to stand up and exchange opinions in pursuit of common interests. That is why the Asiatics should at once set to work to study and investigate. Of all Asiatic nations, China was large and Japan was strong, and they bore heavy responsibilities. Progress on the part of China was lagging. Japan had already established the Greater Asiatic Association. Could China rest tranquil? With the sympathy and support of those interested, they had now established the Chinese Greater Association in Tientsin.

32730 * Exhibit 3407, excerpts from "Establishment of Manchuria for Manchurians", written by MATSUI, Iwane and published in the June 1932 issue of "The Great Asia Principle", stated that in MATSUI's opinion they could never hope for true collaboration between Japan and Manchukuo, unless they dealt with the latter with broad-32731 * mindedness to accelerate the voluntary and independent development of Manchukuo. Unless true collaboration was soon realized, administration based on the Greater Asia Principle would come to naught. Collaboration did not mean for arbitrary interference by the Japanese, but meant for the two to cooperate for attaining the common aim with a mutual higher regard for its voluntary independence.

The more they valued its independence, the more strongly united would the two be. The completion of administration, development of industry, etc., must be furthered and accelerated by Japanese people's effort for becoming true members of the new Manchukuo state itself. The means of promoting independent activities by narrowing or gradually removing administrative activities under Japanese direct control and the privileged positions of Japanese who have not become Manchurians, was to be * considered with the exception of military matters provided in the Japan-Manchukuo protocol.

Deep considerations must be given by Japan in regard to strengthening and supporting the idea "Manchurians themselves". Needless to say, this did not mean Manchurians by the former Chinese. They did not point out by the word, Manchurians, only the Manchurian and Mongolian tribes who originally resided, but meant Manchurian subjects who included Japanese, Koreans, and Russians living in that country. The continental development of Japan could be put into effect only after Japanese residents there should devote themselves to Manchukuo as true subjects.

32733

* Exhibit 3408, a lecture delivered by MATSUI which appeared in "Great Asia Doctrine", the organ of the Great Asia Association and entitled "Our Greater Asia Principle", stated that the manuscript represented the gists of lectures MATSUI had made at meetings held at the end of May 1936.

32734

* In a lecture, he stated that on looking back, the present situation in Asia never was more urgent than adjusting problems with China, to see the establishment of the Asiatic union successfully realized. However, the state of affairs between China and Japan was very unfortunate, with repeated struggles and antagonism. The most urgent task for the Asiatic movement was to investigate these causes and carry out drastic improvement.

Because the Greater Asia Principle had often been misunderstood, he considered it necessary to clarify some points regarding their intentions. Westerners had often criticized their movements, saying they were based upon the so-called Oriental Monroe Doctrine, but on the contrary it was an entirely opposite advocacy. It was West and East brotherhood principle, or world co-existence principle.

* Such words as "Japan-Manchukuo Economic Bloc" and "Sino-Japan-Manchukuo Bloc" had frequently been used. The principle had too often been misunderstood as if it were one of these bloc principles. This was never the object of the Greater Asia Principle.

In the present situation, people went by economic bloc principles. In all the big powers, people were competing on the basis of these principles. To meet the present situation, they were obliged to take temporarily the means of bloc economy, but this is not what they aimed at, for the economic policy that they hoped for was the world co-operative economy, or free economy.

The Greater Asia Principle did not necessarily mean the entire expulsion of Europeans and Americans from all places in Asia, and they did not wish for the destruction of their present political and economic state of affairs. All who understood the culture peculiar to Asia * and who would sincerely cooperate for the benefit of Asiatics were true friends. They required Europeans and Americans to gain this understanding, and strongly wished to urge the original Asiatics to bestir themselves and reconsider their resolution to the utmost of their power.

32737

There were some countries which were founded by power, and some by wealth, but this was not true with Japan, which had been in existence solely with justice since the beginning of its foundation. They were aware of the true value of power and wealth for attaining their just objects, and knew that the country founded by power fell of itself, and prosperity obtained by wealth would come to decay in due course. As for Japan, the Land of the Rising Sun ruled by the sun goddess, she constantly * keeps her principle unchanged, improves and prospers, and stands outside the prosperity and decline of the world. This was due to the brilliancy produced by justice.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF OKADA, Takasi.
by Mr. Mattice.

32740

32741

Concerning the witness' duty, MATSUI told him that he had been a faithful follower of the late General KAWAKAMI and of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, and had endeavored for the past few decades for the friendship and coalition of Japan and China for the emancipation and renovation of Asia. * Despite the earnest efforts of himself and friends the unhappy incident had taken place, and MATSUI was filled emotion at being appointed the Expeditionary Force Commander.

The reason for installing an old man like himself out of the reserve list into this important post seemed that instead of aiming at achieving glorious military feats, he, with his knowledge and love for China, hoped to settle the incident on a non-aggravation principle at the least possible sacrifice on either side. It was necessary to demand a responsible attitude from the Chinese authorities who had violated Japanese rights and interest and endangered Japanese lives and property in Shanghai by insolent acts. However, it was a concurrent result of long accumulated causes that had led up to the dispute, and both nations should be responsible. MATSUI was anxious to have his earnest desire thoroughly understood by both nations and open a way for reconciliation with the least possible fighting.

He told the witness that when he landed at Shanghai it would be his first duty to get in touch with as many influential Chinese as possible, and tell them that MATSUI never wanted to fight China, that he would see to the safety of their lives and property during the fighting, and would endeavor for a prompt solution of the incident, with the hope they would render him cooperation and assistance.

MATSUI said that if necessary they could defeat a large enemy with a smaller and more poorly equipped force by skillful tactics, but that would be only a military victory and the result would be disastrous, because forced fighting required great human sacrifice and hostile feelings. It was more desirable to win an immediate victory by sufficient numbers of well-equipped troops and avoid prolongation of fighting. This was the most effective way of making their non-aggravation principle really work for immediate peace.

He had requested the government for at least five divisions, but the War Minister decided three would be sufficient. He regretted the War Minister's lack of knowledge of present Chinese conditions, and could not * help feeling uneasy.

The witness landed in Shanghai at the end of August, when the Incident was at an initial stage. He looked for Chinese acquaintances in the Concessions, to communicate to them MATSUI's intention. He found opportunities to talk with Tang Shao-i, a friend and veteran Chinese statesman, and with Li Tse-i. They discussed and worked in concert for the elimination of the distressful relations.

Accompanying the witness, MATSUI went to his Headquarters on 6 December. On his arrival at Soochow, MATSUI had a note advising the Chinese Army to * surrender immediately, and had bills bearing this note scattered over Nanking from the air on December 9. His purpose was to capture the city without bloodshed and with the least possible destruction, and he took precautions against rash attacks by army units. He issued orders about December 9 for all his units to stop the general attack and stand in positions around the city until further orders. At the same time he instructed that they see to the safe preservation of Sun Yat-sen's tomb and various cultural establishments, as well as foreign rights and interests, and to maintain strict discipline.

The witness was called late at night on December 8 and made to translate a note of the following purport. * The Chinese answer to the Japanese written advice for surrender would be waited for outside the Chungshan Gate at noon December 10. If the Chinese Army sent responsible persons to the appointed place, the Japanese were prepared to negotiate concerning taking over Nanking. If no answer was received, the troops would be compelled to attack.

This note was dropped from the air on December 9. The witness started from Soochow by car that same morning with the Chief of Staff TSUKADA and two staff officers, reached the suburbs of Nanking, and passed the night at certain unit quarters. At 11 a. m. the next day all four went outside Chungshan Gate and waited for the arrival of Chinese representatives until 1 p. m., but they did not appear. The four Japanese left, and immediately after that the order for the attack was given.

* When the witness entered Nanking with Colonel MURAKAMI soon after its fall on December 13, the city seemed rather peaceful, and what attracted their attention most was the enormous quantity of military uniforms and arms left by Chinese soldiers and scattered on the streets. He found people taking refuge, and he had some fifty of them taken to a hotel which was to be the Commander's residence, and had them help the soldiers sweep and clean its interior. Refugees and other peaceful citizens were made to work for the army, received payment, and were given the remnants of the soldiers' meals, so they worked willingly.

32747

After December 17 MATSUI lodged at the Metropolitan Hotel, and the witness was given a room near him. The * morning after a celebration banquet attended by MATSUI, the witness called on him and he looked extremely sad. The witness asked him what was worrying him, and he replied that he had visited Nanking many times before for the purpose of realizing peaceful relations with China, but he now realized that they had unknowingly wrought a most grievous effect on the city. When he considered the feelings of his many Chinese friends who had fled Nanking, and on the future of the two countries he could not but feel depressed, and could not rejoice at the victory.

The witness sympathized with him, knowing that many leading officers had been interested in the study of affairs concerning Europe and America and were apt to despise the study of China, but MATSUI had almost singly devoted himself to Chinese questions since his youth. The * witness knew there was no other army man who had so many friends in China as MATSUI.

On New Year's Day, 1938, in Nanking, MATSUI composed a poem concerning his sadness at the time, and stated that through his travels in China he had ever prayed and worked for peace and the development of Asia, but on reflecting on what he actually had done he was aware of his limitations. Page age, and he would forever strive to accomplish the purpose.
32749 * On December 19, for the purpose of inspecting battlefields, MATSUI visited Chingling Hill and Astronomical Observatory and took a wide view of the city, expressing joy at the perfect condition of Sun Yat-sen's tomb, and said he was sorry for the interruption of Chiang's endeavor for the unification of China. If Chiang had been patient for a few years longer and avoided hostilities, Japan would have understood the disadvantage of trying to solve the issue by the use of arms, so there would not have occurred this tragedy.

32750 On his way back, MATSUI surprised his staff officers by visiting the conditions of the refugees. He asked them about the dangers they had undergone, and he * comforted them by saying that despite his strict orders for the soldiers to be careful not to harm them, they might sometimes find themselves in trouble because of the soldiers' inability to understand their language, but that the days of peace and prosperity would surely come soon.

32751 * MATSUI greatly feared the relaxation of discipline following severe fighting, and warned his Chief of Staff to see to the maintenance of discipline and morale by strict orders and severe punishment. The witness saw officers and soldiers being sent home from Shanghai later as criminals under severe punishment.

32752 In mid-February, MATSUI was ordered home, and told the witness that it was his great regret to be called home in the middle of his tasks, which consisted in stopping armed hostilities at the fall of Nanking and concentrating efforts in reconciliation without extending
* fighting past Nanking.

32753 On December 21, MATSUI left Nanking and returned on the 23rd to Army Headquarters in Shanghai, at which time he told the witness that the war should not be allowed to spread. In consequence of the anti-Japanese education in China since the Manchurian Incident, anti-Japanese feeling had been aggravated among military circles and among students, endangering Japanese rights and interests and lives. Japan had accordingly been obliged to appeal to arms and had by force of circumstance come to this disaster and been forced to capture Nanking, but the issue could,
* never be solved by the sword permanently.

If they didn't clear misunderstandings by peaceful steps, the two would certainly fall into greater misfortunes. He was determined to endeavor for the establishment of permanent peace. His mission as Commander had been primarily the working out of peace, and not in the military operations that he had been engaged in so far. If military operations were the only aim, there would be no reason for picking an aged reservist.

Since the two countries had gotten into a belligerent state, negotiations for peace by military authorities would be more difficult, and it was most desirable that they negotiate through economic or cultural representatives to work out peace. * The witness agreed, and they decided that the fittest Chinese to play this role was Sung Tsu-wen. The witness, on MATSUI's order, called on Li Tso-i in Shanghai and conveyed MATSUI's intention and asked his approval. In late January, Li met MATSUI and agreed that he would convey MATSUI's message to Sung. Disguised as a Chinese, the witness and Li left Shanghai on January 4 and arrived in Hong Kong about the 10th, and the witness stayed in Kowloon to await the results of Li's interview with Sung.

32755

On January 15, Li reported that through repeated interviews with Sung, it was ascertained that Sung was almost of the same opinion as they. He regarded the * unhappy incident as a misfortune not only of Japan and China, but of mankind. If MATSUI held to that view as representing the Japanese side, Sung was ready to act along those lines. The witness requested Li to go farther into the negotiations, but on the following February 16 the KONOYE Declaration that Japan ignored the existence of Chiang Kai-shek's Government was published by the Japanese Consulate General. The day after that the witness was notified that MATSUI was ordered transferred and this finished everything, and their endeavors were brought to naught.

MATSUI left Shanghai on February 23, and a few days before told Li and the witness that it was to his great regret that he had lost his chance to stay on and accomplish peace negotiations, but after returning home * and being discharged of his post he would continue efforts for permanent peace. He said he had no ambition for honor or wealth or political activity, and his only desire was to become Ambassador to China and devote himself to the realization of peace. However, it was doubtful whether the government, especially the military, would wish his activity in that field.

32757 As Commander, he felt responsible that tens of thousands of soldiers had fallen on both sides, but as soon as he got home he wanted to erect a statue to the goddess of mercy and offer prayers for their souls. In * compliance with MATSUI's request for the witness to get a handful of earth where the blood of both Chinese and Japanese had fallen at Tachangchen, the witness went there and obtained it and sent it to MATSUI, who used it in a statue of the goddess of mercy. He had a temple built for the statue, and dedicated it to Chinese and Japanese dead.

32758 MATSUI was a man with a strong sense of justice. When the witness was in Fuchow, a People's Revolutionary Government was organized in Fukien province in opposition to Chiang. At that time MATSUI was Formosan Army Commander. When MATSUI was informed of an attempt among Japanese to support the Revolutionary Government, he declared no Japanese should ever support a government which might hinder unification of China. MATSUI's determination was commun- * icated to Chiang Kai-shek.

Staff officer TSUCHIHASHI of the Formosan Army was sent to the Revolutionary Government in Fukien with MATSUI's advice that since civil war was most disastrous, Revolutionary troops should retreat from fighting the Nationalist Army. In compliance, the Revolutionary Army peacefully retreated to Canton and the Nationalist Army took over Fukien province without bloodshed.

32759 Regarding instances of MATSUI's humaneness. in January 1938, when he was in Shanghai soon after the close of battle, MATSUI presented ten thousand yen to a French missionary who had fought for the establishment of refugee * quarters and was supervising relief work. On another occasion he strictly warned a Japanese school teacher against having his students using phrases showing hatred toward the Chinese.

32760 * The witness corrected his affidavit with reference to the place where he spoke of MATSUI exhibiting a Chinese poem. Instead of the poem being shown to the witness in Nanking, it was shown to him in Shanghai.

32761 * When asked how he came to see the poem, he replied that on New Year's day, 1938, he made a courtesy call on MATSUI. It was customary for him to compose a poem every New Year's day, and so he showed him his poem.

* When asked where MATSUI had his headquarters before the fighting at Nanking, the witness replied that MATSUI and he went to Soochow on 8 December and left Tangshuichen the same day. It was the 13th when the witness left there and returned to Nanking.

Asked about MATSUI's being able to attend his duties between the 8th and 13th, the witness replied that on the 8th MATSUI and he arrived at Soochow, and on the same day the witness proceeded alone to Tangshuichen. It appeared at this time that MATSUI was suffering from a slight cold. He did not know the details of MATSUI's disposition after he left Tangshuichen and went to Nanking on the 13th.

* Exhibit 3411, a statement issued by MATSUI in Shanghai on 8 October, 1937, stated that, having received command, he, with heavy responsibilities, landed some time before south of the Yangtze River. Since then army influence had been increased, and bayonets were on the point of being unsheathed. The army mission was to fulfill its duties of protecting Japanese rights and interests and safeguarding Japanese residents and to chastise the Nanking Government and the outrageous Chinese and to have them throw away their anti-foreign and anti-Japanese policies influenced by communism. He deeply sympathized with the innocent people in the operation areas, although the army did not regard the people in general as its enemy, yet those who resisted or injured the army, irrespective of soldiers or civilians, would be punished without reserve. He could not help sympathizing with the * foreign officials and people exposed to war disasters. 32767 Exhibit 3412, a statement issued by MATSUI to the people of the Chinese Republic, declared that it was a matter of deep regret to the two nations that immediately after the outbreak of the North China Incident, feelings began to burst out. It seemed that a hundred year crisis was to be brought about in East Asia after the battle lines were finally expanded. At this juncture, for the good of the Chinese, he hoped that the Chinese officials and people * would meditate and reflect, recalling the principle of morality for East Asia.

32768 It meant the destruction of international morality and the disturbance of peace in the Orient that acts to undervalue Japan's real power or to endanger their existence because of over-readiness for communistic influence, and for the sake of executing peace restoration movements to utilize anti-Japanese and resistance principles, to unify national opinion and strengthen political power by emphasizing the necessity of advocating these principles. Even in case their principle of "Down with Japan" should by chance be realized, he wondered whether they would still consider that the five Chinese races would be able to lead a happy life by doing this. It was regrettable to MATSUI that the Chinese were placed in such a deplorable situation in which they could not speak out openly. * It must be recalled that Sun Chung-shan had always hoped for and tried to establish peace in the Orient, as well as for the restoration of China.

* What Japan really hoped for was coalition between Japan and China, and he believed firmly that this was the principle which would bring about peace, but if the feelings of the Chinese Government and people toward Japan remained as they were, it would be necessary, to his regret, to uproot anti-Japanese and resistance movements and to eliminate the fundamental cause of the prevalent unhappy events. The sole object of the army rested on this point, and the army should not be easily mobilized, but it was their belief that if it rose in arms it was their real intention to annihilate the enemy completely to obtain the object.

The aim of the attack was solely toward the Nanking Government and its army, but they had no intention to aim at the people in general. The time had come for Chinese officials and people who had hitherto been busily engaged in the firm establishment of the Nanking Military Clan Regime to throw away their former illusions.

He deeply sympathized with the innocent people who suffered from war disaster, and hoped they would keep away from all battlefields and not be misled by rumors. Farmers in operation areas were not taking advantage of ripened grains, and had left their safe houses at harvest time, which was regretted.

32771 Some troops had requisitioned grains left on the farms, but there was no one to deal with directly. Under such unavoidable circumstances, everything had been left unsolved until now. * For compensation, the army would be responsible for payment, and they were simply waiting for an opportunity.

32803 * Exhibit 3413-A, certified to the death of NAKAMURA, Kotaro, on 29 August 1947.

32804 Exhibit 3413, the affidavit of NAKAMURA, Kotaro, stated that in 1931 the affiant worked under war minister MINAMI as chief of the personnel bureau. The WAKATSUKI cabinet at that time was taking up a retrenchment policy and trying to carry out readjustment to reduce the budget. In the latter part of July, finance minister INOUE presented a bill for * revising the pension law and demanded reduction and amendment to military pensions. The problem was carefully deliberated in the war ministry. Reduction of salaries was under the jurisdiction of the military affairs bureau and the accounts bureau, and not under the affiant's, but he heard it was reduced similar to civilian officials.

Expenses for renovation of army systems and materials, etc., could not be supplied by government finance and there was no alternative but to curtail expenses, and using sums for only urgent items. The WAKATSUKI cabinet was organized after the close of the Diet session and, although army reorganization had been planned within the budget of the ex-cabinet, the plan was suspended because of cabinet change. Army equipment was the same as that in the early stages of the first World War and, compared to other powers, was out of date and inferior.

32805 * The council of division commanders convened yearly in Tokyo, and took place on 4 August 1931 for the first time after MINAMI became war minister. In his address there MINAMI stated that as the situation in Manchuria and Mongolia was regrettably getting worse, those in military service should make increased efforts in military education and training. Some newspapers criticized this statement saying it inspired militarism or meant political intervention. However, it was only natural for the war minister to demand division commanders to understand the foreign situation and wish them to try their best in education and training of the army.

32806 The affiant could not help but think that the reason the address brought about great public reaction was that a plot was laid by some political party who, taking advantage of political instability, planned to overthrow the government * by tripping up a cabinet member.

Page

The news of the Mukden incident on 18 September 1931 and of the fighting between the Japanese and the Chinese was brought to the affiant at 8 the following morning. A vital element in combat was assignment of personnel. The fact that the affiant, as chief of the personnel bureau, did not know anything about personnel beforehand, and that there was no preparation, made it obvious that there was no previous plan. Moreover, as it was at a time when the army was taking a re-trenchment policy, and organization and equipment were imperfect, it was not likely Japan did take the initiative in bringing about trouble.

32807 Subsequently a gap took place between the cabinet policy of local settlement of the incident and army movements, and the war minister found himself in a difficult situation. This was because strategic * operations were under the control of the chief of staff and outside the war minister's authority.

32808 * Exhibit 3413, a certificate issued by the first demobilization bureau regarding the reduction in officers' salaries by ordinance dated 27 May 1931 was admitted into evidence but not read. (The attention of the tribunal was called to testimony at pages 19,776 and 19,777, and 32,206.)

32809 Exhibit 3415, the affidavit of SOGO, Shinji, stated that he was a director in the SMR from July 1930 to July 1934. About May 1931 UCHIDA, Yasuya, succeeded SENGOKU as president of the company. It was necessary when a change was made that the incoming president invite separately every minister and his staff, and this would be returned by the minister. The Asahi newspaper report on 1 July 1931 that war minister MINAMI invited UCHIDA and all SMR directors was nothing more than this customary return invitation (Exh. 2202-A).

32810 * Exhibit 3416, an excerpt from the secret diary of the Japanese War Ministry, a report regarding an address of instruction by a commander of the Tokyo MP on 19 August 1931 32811 to MINAMI stated that the attached address * was given by the commander of the MPs to guide young officers in respect to their activities of the present situation. The instruction stated that as the officers were aware, meetings of young officers with the objection of study and discussion of the Manchurian-Mongolian question, and other such problems, tended to overstep the scope of study and turn into concrete activities, which were about to be expressed politically by outsiders and might place the army in an awkward position. It was a breach of military discipline to make any proposition by forming horizontal combinations, and it would be a serious matter should this tendency infect NCOs and men, undermining the foundation of the military constitution. It seemed that the reason why this tendency absorbed the attention of young officers, * lies in the mistaken supposition that their activities were lead by higher army authorities.

Not only was that not a fact, but the war minister was resolved to prohibit all of these activities, and they must cooperate with their superiors in the guidance of young officers and endeavor to stave off ill effects upon discipline and prevent outsiders from political exploitation.

prepared by Kwantung army headquarters on the basis of detailed reports which were drafted by the witness. The document was distributed in March 1932 and he could identify an IPS document as a reproduction of a part of the said document and could identify a defense document as an excerpt from the IPS document. He confirmed that the contents of four telegrams in the defense document were the same as the original text of the telegrams received by headquarters on September 18 and 19, 1931 from the Mukden special service organ and central army authorities.

32824 * Exhibit 3421-A, the defense document referred to in the affidavit, being an excerpt from "The Manchurian Incident," etc., concerning the relations of the dispatch and 32825 withdrawal of the army and navy forces, stated * that on 18 September at 11:46 p.m. the chief of staff of Kwantung army received a telegram from the Mukden Special Service Organ. This stated that a little after 10:00, 18 October, reports were received that Chinese troops destroyed SMR lines west of the north barracks north of Mukden, attacking the guards and clashing with garrison troops.

32826 The second infantry battalion was now on its way to the place of the clash. At 0:28 hours on the 19th, the chief of staff* received another telegram from the Organ which stated that Chinese troops at the north army barracks blew up the Manchurian railway and their forces were three or four companies of infantry. They had subsequently fled.

Since 11:00 o'clock the Hushipai company had been fighting against five or six hundred enemy troops and, although the Japanese had occupied a corner of the north barracks, the enemy was increasing their machine and infantry guns. At 6:00 p.m., 19 September 1931, a telegram was received from war minister MINAMI which stated that referring to the recent clash, the government decided to make every effort to avoid extension of the situation, even though Chinese troops must be blamed for producing its cause. The cabinet requested, therefore, that they act in accordance with this principle.

32827 * At that time another telegram was received from the chief of staff which stated that he believed that the resolutions and measures taken by the Kwantung army commander, since the night of 18 September were appropriate and had enhanced army prestige. In view of the Chinese attitude since the outbreak of the incident, the cabinet had decided not to go beyond what was necessary in dealing with it and the army should conform with this principle. (The attention of the court was called to testimony beginning at pages 18, 890, 18,897-18,901, 19,325-19, 327, 19,414, 19,779, and 32,217.)

32828 The affidavit continued and it stated that the witness from August 1933 to March 1937 was attached to the general staff. * During this period he was ordered to compile a history of the Manchurian incident and for such purpose he collected necessary materials and made copies of original telegrams. All copies of manuscripts thus prepared were under his name. The last manuscript was completed in March 1937 and submitted to the general staff. He heard it was printed but had not received a copy and believed that all prints and manuscripts of the history were burned at the time of the surrender.

32830 In the course of his work, the descriptive parts of the manuscripts were revised frequently on account of various personal opinions, while the text of the telegrams remained constant. Hence he used to cut out from the old draft the parts containing quotations and stuck them on a new draft (the quotations referred to were the telegrams read). Even after he was transferred from his post in the general staff he had in his possession a number of such copies of telegrams, * but all were destroyed or lost except sixteen he found recently.

He identified certain documents as copies of these sixteen telegrams prepared by him while he was chief compiler of the history. To the best of his knowledge and belief, these documents were the only existing authentic copies as regards secret telegraphic correspondence in the early stage of the Manchurian incident.

32830 After the reading of his affidavit, the witness was shown the copies of the telegrams referred to in his affidavit and he identified them.

32833 *Exhibit 3422-A, a telegram dated 19 September 1931 from the commander of the Korean army, stated that as the chief of staff compelled him to suspend dispatch of reinforcements, troops other than air force, were temporarily stopped on the outside of Shingishu awaiting further developments. (The attention of the court was called to testimony at pages 19,413, and 32,217-218.)

32834 * Exhibit 3423, a letter from the chief of the general staff to war minister MINAMI dated 22 September 1931 re delivery of order for dispatch of forces to Manchuria stating that notice was thereby given. Referring to the dispatch of forces to Manchuria, the attached order had been delivered to the authorities concerned. The order stated that certain named units from the Korean army should be dispatched to Manchuria, placed under the Kwantung army commander.

32835 * They should enter the command of the latter on their crossing of the Yalu River. (Attention of the court was called to the testimony at page 19,782.)

32836 Exhibit 3422-B, a telegram dated 20 September 1931 from the vice chief of general staff to the chief of staff of the Kwantung army stated that after taking the general situation into consideration, the general staff agreed to the policy decided at the cabinet meeting of the 19th as to how to dispose of the incident. The Kwantung army chief of staff was to understand that he was not restricted in taking necessary actions for accomplishing his proper duties or for self defense. Although his measures were believed fully appropriate, it was hoped that he would pay particular attention to army prestige by precluding Chinese troops and citizens from violating military orders and making Japanese officers and men observe strict discipline.

As some diplomatic and SMR officials in Manchuria were suspected of sending groundless reports about army actions, the Kwantung army chief of staff was to endeavor to investigate their source and eliminate them. The army should make a declaration of its grave resolution in case unpatriotic schemes were conducted. (The attention of the court was called to testimony at pages 18,934-935.)

32837 * Exhibit 3422-C, a telegram dated 22 September 1931 from war minister MINAMI to Kwantung army commander HONJO stated that in view of the situation, it was not proper for the army to carry out direct military administration itself. No time should be lost in letting Chinese autonomous agencies take charge. The army's task should be confined to negotiation and liaison with such agencies.

- 32839 * Exhibit 3422-D, a telegram dated 22 September 1931 from the chief of general staff to the Kwantung army commander stated that he approved the actions of the Kwantung army up to then. As to further actions, however, he must maintain the present formation and keep a quiet watch with strict fairness, unless the situation took a sudden turn.
- Exhibit 3422-E, a telegram dated 23 September 1931 from the Kwantung army chief of staff to the war vice minister and vice chief of the general staff stated that the present incident had no connection with the Fushun case reported by consul general HAYASHI to the foreign minister (reference was made to testimony beginning at page 18,932-935, 22,140-22,142, and through 22,231-22,235).
- 32840 * Exhibit 3422-F, a telegram dated 23 September 1931 from the chief of the general staff to the Kwantung army commander stated that no dispatch of troops should be made to Harbin even in the event of sudden change in the situation.
- Exhibit 3422-G, a telegram from the war vice minister to the Kwantung army chief of staff dated 23 September 1931 stated that the cabinet had decided that no protection on the spot should be given to the Japanese residents in Harbin, and they should be evacuated if the situation made it inevitable.
- 32841 * Exhibit 3422-H, a telegram dated 24 September 1931 from war minister MINAMI to Kwantung army commander HONJO stated that even if the condition in Chientao became serious, force should not be used, but the aggravation of the situation ought to be avoided by relying on police power (reference was made to testimony beginning at page 18,813, 19,416, and 19,787).
- 32842 * Exhibit 3425, an excerpt from the Manchurian secret great diary, being an instruction given to major general HASHIMOTO by war minister MINAMI on 25 September 1931 and bearing the seal of department chief KOISO, stated that HASHIMOTO was to depart from Manchuria to take charge of liaison between central authorities and Kwantung army headquarters. Detailed instructions would be given by the war vice minister.
- 32843 * The instruction given by vice minister SUGIYAMA bearing the seal of the department chief KOISO and dated 24 September 1931 stated that taking the empire's policy into consideration, these are the actions of the Kwantung army, general HASHIMOTO should endeavor not to let the army act solely on its judgment of the situation, but make it apply for instructions from central authorities. He should make the army conform with their intention with regard to propoganda (reference was made to testimony at page 3091).

32844 * Exhibit 3422-I, a telegram dated 25 September 1931 from war minister MINAMI to Kwantung army commander HONJO stated that, by virtue of the recently proclaimed government declaration, the course of policy had become clear. At the cabinet meeting the 25th, all agreed to make every effort for executing the declaration. Now that the country was facing an emergency, it was necessary that both diplomatic and military authorities on the spot should renounce minor differences and do their duty by mutual cooperation. The foreign minister had instructed diplomatic organs to the same effect.

32845 Such a necessity was felt even more at this time when an end should be put to military action and diplomatic negotiations be commenced. * When handed a document, the witness identified it as the governmental declaration referred to in the telegram but it was rejected as evidence.

32851 * Exhibit 3342-J, a telegram dated 25 September 1931 from war minister MINAMI to Kwantung army commander HONJO stated that it was strictly prohibited to have any connection with the movement for supporting a new regime in Manchuria.

Asked if he had any recollection as to whether War Minister MINAMI sent a telegraphic instruction on 20 Sept. 1931, besides the ones sent Sept. 25, prohibiting participation in the establishment of a new regime, he replied that the telegram sent the 25th of Sept. was the only one.

* Exhibit 3422-K, a telegram dated 29 Sept. 1931, from the Vice Minister of War to the Kwantung Army Chief of Staff, stated that rumor circulated among the Cabinet that the Kwantung Army Commander was connected with the movement for the restoration of Pu-Yi, the Army should be warned to have nothing to do therewith.

(Reference was made to testimony at P. 18974, 19783 and 19785.)

32860

* Exhibit 3428, a telegram dated 1 Oct. 1931 from the Vice Minister to the Kwantung Army Chief of Staff, stated that although it was reported that the Army might intend to enforce municipal administration in Changchung, he was ordered to avoid taking such a step by the Army in compliance with policy.

32861

* Exhibit 3429, a telegram from the Vice Minister to the Chief of Staff, dated 11 Nov. 1931 (Excerpt from Exhibit 3038-G) stated that after hearing that DOIHARA was presumably carrying on activities in Tientsin, they wanted to know what kind of duties he had been assigned and the arrangements between the Kwantung Army Chief of Staff and China Garrison Headquarters with regard to the scope of his work. By way of precaution, they were trusting the Garrison to conduct necessary business in North China from a standpoint of moral cooperation based on mutual respect of duties among arm'ees. They were to be fully informed as to the duties * of any person thereafter sent to North China on important business.

(Reference was made to Exhibit and 299)

Exhibit 3422-L, a telegram from the Chief of the General Staff to the Kwantung Army Commander, dated 16 Nov. 1931, stated that in case the offensive of Ma Chan-shan's army compelled the outbreak of fighting, the Kwantung Army should try to destroy the enemy, even * though they would have to advance temporarily north of Tsitsihar.

32863

In view of the general situation, however, the army should not make use of the C&ER and actions east and west along the railway should be limited to the number necessary for self-defense. Although it might be unavoidable to enter Tsitsihar temporarily, the army was not permitted to occupy it to control North Manchuria, but the main force should be concentrated as soon as possible east of Cheag-chiatun.

32864 The unit left behind must also be withdrawn within about two weeks.

Exhibit 3422-N, a telegram dated 27 Nov. 1931 from the Chief of Staff to the Kwantung Army Commander, ordered that unless a new duty was assigned, his army should not take operational action at their own discretion west of the Liao River, the south of Chenghiatun vicinity and south of Chengchiatun-Tungliao Railway for reinforcement of the China Garrison.

(Reference was made to testimony beginning at 19351 to 417, 19788, 32219 and Exhibit 57.)

32865 * Exhibit 3422-O, a telegram dated 27 Jan. 1932 from Kwantung Army Commander to War Minister ARAKI and the Chief of Staff, stated that following the northern expedition of the Kirin Army, the former Ting Chao Army looted Fuchiatun and fighting broke out around Harbin and an air officer was shot. Harbin was becoming disorderly. Taking these circumstances into consideration, the Kwantung Army wished to protect their residents by sending a unit of not more than 2 battalions as hostilities were likely to extend to Harbin. It was asked that approval be given in advance.

Exhibit 3422-P, dated 28 Jan. 1932, from the Chief of the General Staff to the Kwantung Army Commander, replied to the above telegram and stated that in view of the rampancy of armed bandits in North Manchuria, and to reinforce the forces there, the Chief of Staff approved the dispatch of troops to Harbin.

The copies of telegrams attached were the same as the telegrams handled by him at that time. Incoming telegrams addressed to Commander HONJO or C/S MIYAKO were first handed to the witness by the Code Section and then submitted to the superior after the witness read aloud to him * the gist. Outgoing telegrams from the Commander or C/S to Central authorities were first drafted by him and after the superior approved the draft, it was incoded and then dispatched. 32874

* The affidavit stated that from Dec. 1930 to Aug. 1931 he was Korean Army C/S. On the night of 18 Sept. 1931, as soon as the Korean Army received an urgent request for reinforcement from the Kwantung Army, HAYASHI, the Korean Army Commander, organized a combined brigade under KIMURA and ordered him to proceed * to the Korea-Manchurian border, thereafter reporting the step taken to the Chief of the General Staff and the Kwantung Army.

On 19 Sept. about noon, a telegraphic order was received from the Chief of General Staff that the unit should not cross the border without Imperial sanction. In conformity, HAYASHI had the KIMURA Brigade stop within the border south of Shingishu. This measure was cabled to the Kwantung Army Commander. At that time wireless service of the Korean Army was out of order. Except this communication, no news was received from the General Staff through the State Cable Service and the Korean Army found itself isolated from central authorities.

32876

When shown Exhibit 3422-A, the witness was asked if the contents of the copy of the telegram in the Exhibit was the same as the contents of the telegram of the Korean Army referred to in his affidavit as being sent by the Korean Army reporting that the army unit had stopped short of the border. He stated that the telegrams were identical. The affidavit continued and stated that on 21 Sept., about 10:00 a.m., another telegram was received from the Kwantung Army urging the Korean Army to send reinforcements as not a single soldier remained in Mukden following the dispatch of the second division to Kirin. * HAYASHI judged that the Kwantung Army being so small might have been pressed into a desperate situation and that the lives and properties of Japanese residents might be at stake. He was convinced that reinforcements from Korea were absolutely necessary, making up his mind to carry out crossing the border on his own responsibility.

He ordered the Combined Brigade to proceed to Mukden on the afternoon of 21 Sept., although the act without his superior's approval was based upon his judgment of circumstances and was ratified by Imperial sanction on 22 Sept., it was also true he exceeded his authority. Hence, both HAYASHI and the witness submitted formal inquiries as to whether they should resign. A decision was later 32878 * As the result of the Mukden Incident, there were disturbances in the Chientao District adjacent to North Korea. About 24 Sept. 1931 a telegram was received from War Minister MINAMI that no dispatch of troops should be made there but that peace and order be maintained by the consular police. Toward the end of October, central authorities took notice of the difficult situation and the Chief of the General Staff issued an order dispatching a unit to Kyokushigai in Chientao. After several months it was withdrawn when peace and order were restored.

32879 * When shown Exhibit 3422-H, the witness identified the contents of this telegram as the same as the contents of the telegram of the War Minister referred to in his affidavit.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. WOOLWORTH

32880 Exhibit 3422-A was handed the witness and he was asked what became of the air force referred to in that telegram. * He replied that it did not go into Manchuria directly. When the air force arrived at Shingishu there was inclement weather and a breakdown and the air force withdrew to Shingishu and other bases in the rear. They advanced to Manchuria two or three days later by Imperial sanction; this was after the 22nd of Sept.

32881 * Exhibit 3432 certified that the witness SHIDEHARA, Kijuro was ill. (SHIDEHARA's affidavit was offered in evidence but it was decided that it not be read until cross-examination was taken by Commission.

32885 * Exhibit 3433, the affidavit of Patrick J. Hurley, stated that the affiant was U.S. Secretary of War in 1931 and was in the Far East at the time of the Manchurian Incident. He had read the statement of the accused MINAMI, T. 19884 to 87.

32889 * In regard to this statement, the affiant recalled meeting MINAMI in mid-October 1931 and addressing him on these points, and received in reply substantially those answers. MINAMI advised him that the policy of the WAKATSUKI Cabinet was to remain within the principles of the Nine Power Pact, limiting the effect of the Mukden Incident, and maintaining friendly relations with the League of Nations.

* The affidavit stated that the witness was the senior member of the Second Section (in charge of operations) of the General Staff from Apr. 1929 to Jan. 1932. Referring to the series of telegram copies contained in Exhibits 3422-A to P, he affirmed that B, D, F, L, M and N were correct copies drafted by his section and sent to the Kwantung Army Commander or his C/S under the name of the Chief of General Staff or Vice Chief. The telegram in "E" was received by the General Staff from the Kwantung Army and he remembered reading it at the time. * Although C, G, H, I, J and K dealt with matters not under the jurisdiction of the General Staff, he was acquainted with the fact that they were sent from the War Ministry to the Kwantung Army because of the business contact between the Ministry and General Staff.

When shown Exhibit 3422-A to P, he identified them as true copies of the ones mentioned in his affidavit.

32894

* The affidavit continued and stated that the witness was a staff officer of the Kwantung Army from Aug. 1934 to March 1936 and Chief of the Second Section in charge of Intelligence from Aug. 1935 within that period. Lt. Col. TANAKA, Ryukichi was his subordinate as a staff officer attached to the Second Section.

32895

In Dec. 1934 MINAMI arrived as Commander of the Kwantung Army and Ambassador plenipotentiary to Manchukuo, and gave frequent instructions, the majority of which were dictated by the witness. The two ideas which consistently ran through these instructions were respect for and assistance to independent Manchukuo, and self-reflection and elimination of the vain feeling of Japanese superiority. The witness remembered that whenever these two were contained in the draft of an instruction, he could obtain MINAMI's signature without hitch. * Not only was that the sentiment of MINAMI but all working under him that Manchukuo would secure her international status as an independent country. At that time the Kwantung Army held maintenance of peace and order within Manchukuo as the primary duty under the protocol. Troops were put in extremely dispersed positions and were inadequate for defense against danger from outside Manchukuo and even more inadequate for an offensive against the USSR or China.

32896 In May 1935, War Minister HAYASHI came to Manchuria to inspect army conditions. About that time the UMEZU-Ho Yin-Chin Agreement was concluded in North China. The newspaper reports on these events were full of falsehood. Regarding Exhibit 2206-A, the article to the effect that War Minister HAYASHI reiterated in Mukden that the North China problem * was to be handled by the Kwantung Army, was entirely fabrication. In view of the state systems of command and duties of the Kwantung and North China Armies, HAYASHI would never have made such a statement. The article that MINAMI issued secret instructions to the Kwantung Army to hold themselves ready to pour into China was also false. Such instructions could not be given without a Supreme Command Directive which would surely have been brought to the witness' notice. The article that the Kwantung Army moved 5000 troops from Mukden to Shanhaikwan was also false. That army was in such condition that it was inconceivable to concentrate so many troops at one spot.

32897 The article that the army requested Prince Toh of Inner Mongolia to move his capital to a place 180 miles north of Pailing-miao * was also false.

Besides these items and with regard to matters not directly connected with the Kwantung Army, he found many canards which were totally beyond his experience and knowledge of the Japanese army. While he was a Kwantung Army staff officer, that army never issued anything like an ultimatum to China or brought similar pressure to bear.

32898 Referring to TANAKA's testimony that during MINAMI's tenure as Kwantung Army Commander, two brigades were sent to the demilitarized zone south of the Great Wall (T. 20118 to 119), there was no such fact. As to his testimony that two battalions of cavalry were sent to Chahar (T. 20118) he had no recollection of such a case. * The only incidents he remembered was a small unit moving into the demilitarized zone in the beginning of the summer of 1935. About one or two companies of the 7th Division operating against a strong bandit force near the Jehol frontier crossed into the zone in pursuit but immediately withdrew.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. WOOLWORTH

32899 The witness stated that in 1935 the main strength of the Kwantung Army was composed of one mixed and one mechanized brigade with a total strength of about 30,000 * under Lt. General KAWAGISHI. The witness did not recall if in May 1935 KAWAGISHI moved a part of the brigade consisting of one infantry regiment and one artillery

Page company beyond the Great Wall, and he did not believe such a thing happened and was in a position to know what was going on.

32900 * He did not recall if in early June 1935 the mixed brigade was mobilized at the Great Wall. He knew of a place called Kupeikou but did not recall if the brigade was mobilized there. Asked when they were mobilized if not in June, he replied that he did not recall that the brigade was ever mobilized by the order of the Kwantung Army or if it was ever concentrated there.

32901 * He knew General KAWAGISHI and considered him honest. Asked if KAWAGISHI stated that his brigade was concentrated at Kupeikou in June 1935 on Kwantung Army orders, if he would believe him, he replied that if convincing proof of such orders were given, he would believe it but he presently did not recall such orders ever having been issued.

32903 Reference was made to the statement in the affidavit regarding the newspaper article that HAYASHI stated that the North China Army was to be handled by the Kwantung Army as an entire fabrication. The witness was asked if North China Army were substituted for Kwantung Army, if it would still be a fabrication * and he stated that even if "North China" were substituted it would not be right. He had never heard of instructions given by Japanese Army Commanders without a directive from central supreme command. He knew that the Korean Army was moved into Manchuria without orders from the Supreme Command. He was not mistaken when he stated that articles to the effect that MINAMI issued instructions to the Kwantung Army were false because they could not be given without a directive from the Supreme Command.

32904 * Asked if it were not true that there had been cases of troops being moved without such authority, he stated that the measure taken by the Korean Army Commander at the time of the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident was extremely extraordinary and could be called an exception. The witness believed MINAMI was familiar with the general figures and general disposition of the Kwantung Army troops. If MINAMI stated that there were 60,000 troops in the Army between 1934 and 1936, the witness would believe his statement.

32905 Asked if he read MINAMI's statement that there were 60,000 troops there while he was on his staff, if he would admit he was mistaken when he said 30,000, he replied that when the question was asked in regard to Kwantung Army numerical strength, * he spoke of the number of divisions and other units and the approximate numerical strength such as a number of divisions would represent, speaking from memory; but besides the units mentioned, there were technical units, communication units, etc. and other special units, and if these were counted, it was quite true that the total number would come to more than 30,000.

* The witness was quoted a part of exhibit 2207. the interrogation of MINAMI (T.15785), in which MINAMI stated that he took command of the Kwantung Army in 1934, remaining in command one year and three months, and having about sixty thousand troops under him. * The witness was asked if there were sixty thousand troops in Manchuria, as MINAMI had stated, and if it was not so that the Kwantung Army was not in such condition at the time as it was inconceivable to concentrate so many troops at one spot. The witness explained that when, in his affidavit, he spoke of the difficulty of making any troop concentration, he was not making any comparison of numerical strength. Even though the number of troops under the Kwantung Army commander at that time was sixty thousand, it was under * the circumstances extremely difficult even to concentrate combat troops to the extent of 5,000.

In pursuance of MINAMI's strong desire, troops were dispersed in North and Central Manchuria, and in the light of the circumstances a numerical strength of 5,000, about half a division, was difficult to concentrate quickly in one spot. It was not impossible if a commander made a decisive decision and took unreasonable measures to bring about such a concentration. The Kwantung Army commander could not have done it unless he abandoned the policy he had set forth.

32911

The witness stated he thought the accused UMEZU was in command of the North China garrison during 1935, but toward the end of the year he thought there was a change to General TADA. Asked if he knew what representations UMEZU made to the Chinese authorities prior to the UMEZU-Ho Agreement, he replied he did not know. He had stated that MINAMI gave instructions to his officers and men, particularly in respect to assistance to independent Manchukuo.

32912

* He had testified that MINAMI was against going beyond the Great Wall and gaining further territory in China. Asked if he was familiar with MINAMI's career after he left command of the Kwantung Army and became Governor-General of Korea, he replied only in bare outline. but could not speak with confidence. After MINAMI left the Kwantung Army and the witness was transferred from the Kwantung Army, MINAMI and he lost contact, and his knowledge of MINAMI's activities since were only through newspaper reports. etc.

* The witness identified exhibit 3435 as his affidavit and verified it. * The affidavit stated that on 5 August 1936, he was appointed Director-General for Political Affairs of the Government-General of Korea, holding the post until 29 May 1942, and during his tenure the Governor-General was MINAMI.

The governor-general was merely a civilian, and not entitled to deal with military affairs, which were within the competence of the Commander of the Korea Army, who was directly under the Emperor's control and not under the jurisdiction of the governor-general. POW matters were under the army's jurisdiction, and the government-general never concerned itself with them.

In exhibit 1973, there were words to the effect that the government-general and the army were both strongly desirous of interning POWs in Korea, but there was no such case on the part of the government-general. All the witness remembered was that the Korean Army requested them to find some accommodation for POWs if they were brought to Korea. The government-general had no concern with the purpose of this. * Soon after, in May 1942, MINAMI and the witness resigned and returned to Tokyo, and he did not know whether POWs were interned in Korea or the condition of their treatment.

THERE WAS NO CROSS-EXAMINATION OF THE WITNESS.

Exhibit 3436, the affidavit of MITARAI, Tatsuo, stated * that the affiant had long been connected with various newspapers, especially as a critic of Japanese political circles. He had known MINAMI intimately for twenty years, and was called into constant consultation with him in early March 1945, when he was asked to become President of the Japan Political Society. After his appointment, the witness became his secretary.

The creation of the society was promoted by a committee of influential citizens, who pressed upon MINAMI and the witness the urgent need of its creation. They said that although the IRAA made its appearance advocating a new political structure, its character had been so frequently changed that it became a mere administrative organ of the government.

32923

* The IRAA mainly consisted of members of both houses, and was crippled as a political party because it ignored the method of being in touch with the public. This situation, coupled with unfavorable aspects of the war, brought severe discontent and grave misgivings among people and political circles. Immediate attention had to be given to creating a political party which would act for and be managed by the people. This was the outline of policy which governed the society after MINAMI accepted the presidency.

32924

The distinct features of the Japan Political Society as different from IRAA or IRAPA were that the society never had connection with the government, as it did not cater to the wishes of bureaucrats and militarists and encountered interference from such quarters. In accordance with this policy, the society put its main strength to direct contact with the people. Within three * months after its creation chapters were established in 35 prefectures, with more than 3500 members. The society received no financial aid from the government, all expenses being defrayed by members and contributions. Contrary to the initial plan for the head office to subsidize chapters, not only every one of them dispensed with the proposition, but many offered donations to the head office.

Under these circumstances, it might seem curious that a retired general should be installed as president. However, committee members who approached MINAMI with the offer of the presidency thought the purpose of the society could be carried out only by one whose popularity and ability would enable him to take a clear stand vis-a-vis the government and military authorities. MINAMI, because of his record, was thought the very man. On the other hand, the witness knew MINAMI's pet theory, that no military man should participate in politics, and knew that he declined * the recommendation to the presidency of IRAPA the previous year.

In the case of the Japan Political Society, the committee took every means to persuade MINAMI, notwithstanding his repeated refusals, and they finally succeeded in obtaining his agreement on the strength of the good offices of Privy Council President SUZUKI, Kantaro. Thus, he was nominated president on 30 March, 1945. Four months later, on August 9, MINAMI met SUZUKI, who was then Premier, and advised him to accept the terms of the Potsdam Declaration, and henceforth MINAMI and the Society strove to unite public opinion, and upon the surrender he resigned and the Society dissolved.

32928

The duty of a Gijokan is to confer and agree on the propriety of investiture or divestiture of orders of merit, decorations, etc., in accordance with regulations. The council was conducted under the supervision of the President of the Board of Decorations, by circulating a writing among the councillors whenever a case arose for investing or divesting decorations. * It was therefore outside the scope of their duty to participate in political or military affairs, and they had nothing whatever to do with them. This kind of councillor was appointed by the Emperor, and was entirely different from a "Cabinet Councillor".

When he had been shown IPS Document 0001, he found it said that on 9 February, 1933, MINAMI became a Cabinet Councillor and remained so until 10 December 1934. It seemed that such statements were mistaken, because the records of his Board registers that MINAMI served as a Gijokan from 9 February 1934 to the beginning of 1936. This document also describes MINAMI as having been decorated on 29 April, 1940, for services in China Affairs, but according to the records of his Board no decoration was awarded him on that date, except a pair of silver sake cups.

THERE WAS NO CROSS-EXAMINATION OF THE WITNESS.

32942

* Exhibit 3438, the affidavit of Major-General F. S. G. Piggott, stated * that the affiant first met the accused MUTO in Shanghai in 1938, where he had been sent from Tokyo at the request of the British Ambassador to China, and with the concurrence of Japan he settled certain questions prejudicing good relations between British and Japanese authorities in Shanghai. MUTO was then on the staff of the accused HATA, the C-in-C, and was instrumental under HATA's orders in effecting noticeable improvement in relations.

In the summer of 1939, MUTO headed the Japanese Army delegation from North China which came to Tokyo for the conference to discuss and settle the Tientsin crisis. Although military authorities had been overruled by Premier HIRANUMA in their desire to hold the conference in Tientsin, they accepted the situation and did their best to make the conference a success. MUTO frequently explained to the affiant that the army's business was the security of their troops, and that economic questions at the conference concerned their security. He was anxious to return to his military duties and desired to see a speedy and successful outcome. The affiant reported his attitude to the British Ambassador, and an account of the affiant's farewell interview with MUTO in which he expressed good wishes for the conference's success appeared in the London Times.

The main provisions of the MAB * were the Military Administration Section and the Military Affairs Section, and in addition there was the Press Section. Originally there were six bureaus in the War Ministry, Personnel Affairs, Military Affairs, Ordinance, Intendance, Medical Affairs, and Judicial Affairs, but in 1926 the Equipment Bureau was established. In 1936 the Military Service Bureau was established and made separate. Only the business formerly handled by the Administration Section remained under the MAB, and was divided into the Military Administration Section and the Military Affairs Section. Other matters were transferred to the Military Service Bureau, such as Morale and Discipline, MP duties, etc. These matters were entirely apart from the MAB from that time on.

32949

In 1937 also the Intelligence Division was united with the Information Section under the Supreme Command. As the Bureau of Intelligence of the Cabinet was strengthened, it took over most of the remaining matters * that had formerly been announced by the Ministry; and information matters announced through the latter became very few.

Through these changes the activities of the MAB became smaller. Prior, it had been customary to ask the opinion of the Director of the MAB on personnel matters, but after TOJO became War Minister the practice was discontinued. Under the general rule of the ordinance relating to the organization of ministries, the director of the MAB had the same authority as all other bureau directors.

Directors were not authorized generally to decide principal matters on their own opinion, but their duty was to administer under the minister's direction, and all had equal responsibility. It was completely wrong to say that the director of the MAB had any special authority.

* The verb "rentai-suru" or "to give rental" meant only approving a decision by a competent bureau by affixing one's seal on the understanding that one had no objection so far as matters within his bureau or section's jurisdiction was concerned. It did not mean that one who gave "rental" to a certain plan undertook joint responsibility for its contents beyond his authority as defined in the official organization.

The War Minister and Vice-Minister asked each director's opinion on pertinent matters, and no more importance was attached to the opinion of the director of the MAB than to others. It was not rare when the opinion of that director was disregarded and the opinions of others adopted. It was an army rule that once a superior decided a matter, subordinates must be absolutely obedient. The soldier's demanding release from office if he disagreed with his superior's orders could never be approved in the system and organization of the army.

* The War Minister, Chief of the General Staff, and Inspector-General took over portions of the central business upon themselves. Each bureau took over a share of matters under the control of the War Minister. Those matters under any one bureau were strictly limited and could not extend beyond the Minister's authority, although "organization" was mentioned as a function of the Military Administration Section, which did not mean that army organization could be decided by that section alone. In reality, the right to draft organization plans originally belonged to the General Staff, and as a practical matter the General Staff made plans regarding organization, merely asking for the Minister's counsel.

32952

Most matters mentioned as the War Ministry's responsibility arose from demands of the Chief of Staff. During the China Incident and during the Pacific War these * demands were varied and more numerous, including requests on current problems from the standpoint of home affairs or foreign relations. These requests were first received by the MAB and transmitted to the proper bureau for consideration, and afterwards reply was made by the War Minister's order. Some matters did not go through the MAB at all.

There were frequent disagreements between the War Ministry and the General Staff, and often it was necessary to repeat consultations and negotiations. There were many demands from the General Staff which concerned ministries other than the War Ministry, and in such matters the ministry negotiated with the ministries concerned. For instance, it negotiated with the Finance Ministry through the Intendance Bureau; for materials, with the Planning Board or Munitions Ministry through the Equipment Bureau; and as for foreign affairs, with the Foreign Ministry through the MAB.

As a minister of state, the War Minister was compelled to be aware of political and diplomatic activity * and as an official concerned with army matters he had also to be completely a soldier, but since the Chief of Staff had the highest responsibility concerning the army, it was his highest duty to give consideration to winning victory in war. Thus there was often sharp conflict between the Chief of Staff and the War Minister. It was the duty of the Chief of the MAB to negotiate with the General Staff in such disputes and represent the General Staff in dealing with other agencies in some matters.

Many War Ministry officers also held concurrent offices in connection with Imperial Headquarters. It was decided also that the War Minister, with some of his subordinates, should participate in Imperial Headquarters Conferences, as occasion demanded. However, in reality there was no change in their true relationship. Directors of the MAB and the Personnel Affairs Bureau who did not hold concurrent posts with Imperial Headquarters were simply ordered to be "attendants" of the War Minister at the conferences. Most officials confined themselves to * the work of their own offices in the Ministry, and attended Headquarters Conferences only in urgent circumstances. Though the Director of the MAB, as well as the Vice-Minister and Director of the Personnel Affairs Bureau were attendants of the War Minister, he did not participate in such conferences in any degree, but merely made preliminary arrangements for the Minister and attended to detail work after such conferences as the War Minister attended. With regard to operations, attendants such as the Director of the MAB were given only such information by Headquarters Staff officers as applied to their particular offices.

* Under the Military Administration Section were matters concerning main lines of national defense. It had no power to decide main policies, but rather to harmonize and coordinate matters handled by various bureaus and sections. When consultation between the latter resulted in disagreement, the section had no power to settle the dispute, but merely to arbitrate and counsel. Matters of national defense tactics were the exclusive concern of the Chiefs of the General Staffs, and this was also true in other routine affairs. If plans involved appropriations and material, consultation was had with the War and Navy Ministers. In the case of an agreed plan, each bureau went about its own particular business.

One matter under the charge of the Military Affairs Section was "matters concerning the national defense policy in general". This might be understood to mean that that bureau had authority to make final decision on matters of defense policy, but the contrary was true. Each bureau * transacted its business in accordance with the policies of the Chief of Staff and War Minister. This business often involved matters originally under offices other than the War Minister. If such matters were taken up independently with bureaus concerned, confusion would result and it was thus necessary to have some one office coordinate. This was the business of the Military Affairs Section.

The Military Administration Section had duties in connection with budget matters. It was the duty of the Prymaster's Section of the Intendance Bureau to collect data on the requirements of bureaus and sections to formulate an over-all budget and apportion allowed sums. The duty of the Administration Section was to do its best to adjust the organization and application of budget business of other bureaus and sections to the requirements of national defense as set by the General Staff.

* Failure to handle the appropriation properly within the War Ministry often resulted in failure to meet General Staff demands. The section, however, could never intentionally interrupt a General Staff plan, for the latter was thoroughly familiar with the amount and distribution of appropriations. In such case, decisive power was in the Minister, and never in the Chief of the MAB.

The Chief of the MAB automatically held other posts ex-officio, one such being Chief Secretary of the Supreme War Council. His duties were only secretarial in nature. He had no voice in discussions, nor the right to vote. He did nothing more than keeping minutes.

Another concurrent duty was to act as secretary of Joint Headquarters Government Liaison Conferences. It was agreed that the Chiefs of the MAB in the War and Navy Ministries * and the Cabinet Secretary should act as secretaries. Their only duty was to distribute the necessary papers and deal with documents acted upon. They had no right to participate in discussions. The same situation existed in the case of conferences before the Throne.

The Chief of the MAB also held posts as a member of Cabinet Committees or in committees of other ministries, but this was true of all bureau chiefs and done to bring about close coordination. Resolutions of such committees were not binding on the ministry involved, and as a practical matter those named to the committees were rarely present, and usually represented by proxy.

There was no direct connection between the Privy Council and the MAB. When the War Minister was required to attend, the chief of the MAB or one of his subordinates attended, solely for explaining, if called upon, specific and technical details.

* With regard to attending Diet sessions, usually representatives from all ministries concerned were there. Not only the Parliamentary Vice-Minister and Councillor, but also the Vice-Minister, Chief of the MAB, Chief of the Accounting and Supply Bureau, and sometimes other bureau chiefs were appointed "commissioners" and charged with explaining or answering questions about matters before the Diet. Such duties were not policy-making.

Counsel for SATO.

The witness acknowledged that he had stated in his affidavit he was in the Administrative Section of the MAB continuously with the exception of three years from October 1931 to December 1934. * The witness was reminded that the witness TANAKA, Ryukichi, testified, (T.14287), that protests received from Allied powers by the Foreign Office relative to the treatment of POWs were routed directly to the MAB. The witness was told that TANAKA also testified that the MAB prepared all replies to such protests. The witness stated that neither he nor his section ever prepared a reply to such protests. The witness was told that TANAKA also testified (T.29051) that there were junior officers in the Military Administration Section of the MAB who held extreme views relative to the execution of the Doolittle fliers. The witness stated there were no members of his section who wished the execution of any or all of the fliers.

32961

* The witness was reminded that when asked by the prosecution to name subordinates within the ministry who favored execution, TANAKA named Colonel OTSUKI of the Administration Section, who, he said, came to him several times urging severe punishment. Asked if there was any such colonel by the name of OTSUKI in his section during 1942, he replied there was no officer by that name in the section during that year. An officer by the name of OTSUKI, Akira, at one time served in the Administration Section, but just prior to the outbreak of the Pacific War he was transferred outside Japan, and the witness did not think he served in any post in Japan during the course of the war. He thought OTSUKI was transferred to Saigon.

32962

The witness was reminded that in his affidavit he had stated that many officers in the ministry concurrently held offices in connection with Imperial Headquarters, and that directors of the MAB and the Personnel Affairs Bureau * attended Imperial Conferences only as attendants of the minister and did not participate in them, but only made preliminary arrangements for the minister. The witness stated that by this he meant to state that the attendants had no voice in decisions reached at Headquarters, and actually the two directors attended only in an advisory capacity to the minister.

Policies and regulations relative to the treatment of POWs were drafted by the POW Administration Bureau.

* He was not able to attend any meeting of Imperial Headquarters. These meetings were held at times within the Palace, and at times at Headquarters. The Privy Council met within the Palace, as did the Supreme War Council. He had been in the room where the latter were held when the conference was not in session. He * had never attended liaison conferences, but knew they were held in a certain room in the Palace.

32966

* Exhibit 3440, an article in the "Japan Times and Mail" re speech made by MUTO at a session of the committee of accounts of the House of Representatives on 19 March, 1940, showed that in the speech MUTO stated he supported the opinion of committeeman HAMAJI. It was the attitude for the Japanese to take in surmounting the emergency. He was of the opinion that they must have the spirit of leadership commonly needed for attaining its purpose. * It was, as already stated by War Minister TERAUCHI in the Diet, essential to oust individualism and liberalism which would attach too much importance to personal interests. Looking over the present international situation, all nations were attaching importance to a national standard. They were carrying on economic transactions with one another with nations as the unit. This had progressed to a "bloc" economy. Each attached importance to the nation as a unit in competition rather than personal gains in an economic race.

32967

MUTO stated he was firmly convinced that it was impossible to unite and give full swing to Japan's strength to see her through the emergency so long as greater importance was attached to personal interests. Regarding totalitarianism, TERAUCHI once stated that they must depend thoroughly on totalitarianism, attaching importance to * patriotism. MUTO wondered if the principle of Japanese national policy would not be satisfactory for this.

32968

It was his firm conviction that if all would unite, based on the nation more than the individual, total strength would be unified and give full swing. Should political parties be neglectful of national affairs and cling to their own interests, this would not be allowable. If government officials should swing to self-complacency, they should reflect and reform. As for the armed forces, should there be any points that should be criticized, they should be amended.

Page He firmly believed that the Japanese should fully 32969 realize a sense of nationalism and act in concert with one another. * If political parties, government officials, military authorities, and all others would reflect and amend themselves, closely cooperating with each other and realizing national policy, he was hopeful of the future and believed the emergency would be seen through. If there should still be political parties clinging to their own interests, they ought to reflect. If they refused, he believed legal measures should be taken to have them dissolved.

32970 It had been mentioned that for close cooperation the military were too powerful, but it could not be said that the military was too strong for fighting an enemy. It was probably kept in mind that the army was too high-handed in uniting and cooperating, but in this connection MUTO
* believed that there was much discussion that the military interfered in politics, but perfect understanding must be reached by both the military and politicians to bring the war to a successful conclusion. In the case of one who was a general and politician at the same time, things would be in agreement; but under the present national structure politicians take charge of politics, generals lead military forces, and were quite separate. If politicians should understand the military in every respect, the latter would be able to devote itself to its own affairs.

This, however, was impossible, so for the military to say they would like to have certain things done to see a successful prosecution of the war was only natural. MUTO was convinced that if they would read but one page of the science of war, the committee would be in complete agreement with him and not ask further questions, particularly so in modern war, where they were forced to concentrate all-out national energy.

32971 The army held a keen interest on even a trifling matter, for if there should occur a rice shortage it would threaten stabilization and have far-reaching effects in the leadership of the war. The same would be true in the case of the sabotage of a single laborer. Consequently, the army hoped the committee would fully understand that they had to ask for certain things to be done, and took a keen interest in every particular of both politics and economics.

* MUTO did not believe this was interference in politics. To work cooperatively, he believed one should speak out his opinion. If the will or indication of the military were to be mistaken as too strong, political parties or government officials should frankly give their opinions without hesitation.

He wondered if the case was not that the military was too strong but that political parties were too weak. He did express his views, but the point was that they should fully realize the mission of Imperial Japan, take full cognizance of the emergency and exchange frank opinions to arrive at an agreement.

32973 He quite agreed to the suggestion of committeeman HAMAJI in which he had stressed that the military should * always act in close concert with political parties.

As to HAMAJI's advice to the army about relations between the militarists and merchants, the other day, the War Minister simultaneously with the budget decision of the Cabinet, informed all forces that every single penny or item should be used with care. Everything was being handled with this attitude, and MUTO was hopeful of there not being any mistakes.

32979 * Exhibit 3441, the affidavit of James Edward Walsh, stated that the affiant was a Catholic Bishop affiliated with the Catholic Foreign Mission Society and at the time of the occurrences related in the affidavit he was Superior General of the society.

32980 In late November, 1940, Father Drought and the affiant were in Japan and were asked by foreign minister MATSUOKA if they would take a message to Washington to the effect that Japan wished to negotiate a peace agreement. MATSUOKA was not very definite about the terms, * but they were told by other government officials that Japan proposed as basic terms to guarantee to nullify participation in the Axis Pact, if not public repudiation, at least in some definite manner that would be effective and said guarantee to recall all military forces from China and restore China's geographical and political integrity.

Other conditions were to be explored and agreed upon and these economic in nature. These were discussed also by MATSUOKA to some extent, but at greater length by other government representatives among whom was IKAWA, the unofficial representative of the then premier KONOYE.

32981 * Father Drought and the affiant agreed to take the message provided that some assurance would be forthcoming from army and navy representatives regarding Japanese unanimity in reaching an agreement and carrying it out. The affiant's diary recorded that Drought and he were introduced to the accused MUTO by IKAWA on 27 December 1940. MUTO was 32982 then chief of the bureau of military affairs. * MUTO at the interview did not appear to speak English and accordingly IKAWA translated for him. The affiant made no record of the conversation at the time but recalled distinctly that the substance of what MUTO said was that he and his army associates were in accord with the efforts to reach a peace agreement, and that he would do all in his power to further and assist such efforts.

32983 From the interview Drought and the affiant received the impression that MUTO was pledging himself to concurrence in the proposed undertaking. The affiant did not recall that the actual terms of the proposed agreement being discussed with MUTO, although they may have been. The interview lasted for less than one-half hour. The conversation was leisurely, but he possessed * no distinct recollection as to whether the terms were discussed. The affiant seemed to recall that Drought had seen some navy representative a few days previously and had a similar assurance on the navy's behalf. It had been represented, chiefly by IKAWA and others, that the peace proposals had not only the concurrence of KONOYE but were largely of his initiation. They were told that they would be taken to see KONOYE before leaving.

32984

* The evening before their ship was to sail on 28 December 1940, they were taken to the premier's office, but he was out at the time and they didn't see him. Drought and the affiant, on arriving in New York, got in touch with secretary of state Hull to arrange for their explaining the proposals to Roosevelt and on 23 January 1941 they explained the matter to the president, Hull, and postmaster general Walker. After the meeting Roosevelt and Hull thanked them and said they would take the matter under advisement.

The affiant believed that shortly after the United States entered into conversations with Japanese representatives relative to the matter. * In June, 1941, the witness went again to Japan for a visitation of Maryknoll missionaries in Japan and Korea. He arrived on June 19, completed visitations in Japan and Korea and wished to proceed to Manchuria, but was informed in Korea he would not be allowed to proceed and no reason was given by the local police.

He returned to Japan where he was sought out by IKAWA, who had been sent to Washington to take part in the peace conversations. IKAWA informed the affiant that the peace proposals had encountered difficulties but there was still some hope. He asked the affiant if he would lend his assistance particularly in trying to get messages to and from the State Department in Washington and the American Embassy in Tokyo. The affiant replied he would do so if the embassy approved.

* This was in late August 1941. On consulting chargé d'affaires Eugene Dooman at the American Embassy he was advised his cooperation might prove useful and understood Dooman had consulted Grew and had obtained his approval. IKAWA and the affiant spent two months in facilitating the exchange of information and messages between Japan and the United States. The many messages for the State Department forwarded through the affiant were sent by him by cablegram under his own name and in plain English, but concealed under missionary phraseology to Father Drought in New York for transmission to State Department officials. All messages for the embassy were taken 32987 there personally by the affiant and given to Dooman orally.

* IKAWA awakened the affiant early one morning at his hotel and said it would be safer if they would change their place of residence, explaining that some extremist elements might make trouble. The affiant understood him to refer to militaristic and pro-Nazi elements in the government and army. The affiant distinctly recalled IKAWA's statement that MUTO was protecting their activities and would continue to do so to the best of his ability. However, IKAWA said it was not possible to safeguard them against every eventuality, and so they removed from Miyashita to Kamakura, where he continued for another month to transmit messages.

32988 He never saw MUTO during this period nor again at any time. On 14 October 1941 the affiant was asked by IKAWA if he would take another message from premier KONOYE to Roosevelt. * The affiant referred the matter to Dooman, who later advised him that after consulting Grew the embassy approved. KONOYE recited the message to the affiant in Japanese and it was translated by cabinet secretary ITO. The message was a short statement reaffirming the desire of the Japanese to conclude the peace agreement. Its real intent, as he was given to understand by IKAWA and ITO, was to intimate that the pressure of events on the Japanese government was such that it would not be able to negotiate much longer but would have to reach an agreement very soon or not at all.

32989 The affiant tried to make this clear in his memorandum to Hull. IKAWA then gave the affiant a ticket on a Japanese plane that was to leave for Canton, China, the next day, telling him it had been secured by MUTO. He also gave the affiant a safe-conduct letter from MUTO signed by him.
* The affiant was also given a code name for MUTO to be used if it should become necessary to refer to him in later messages. There was no doubt that the safe-conduct letter of MUTO enabled the affiant to proceed successfully from Tokyo to Hongkong, preparatory to reaching Washington with his message.

32990 He left Tokyo on 15 October 1941 and when the plane arrived in Fukuoka, officials appeared bent on making him turn back, until he produced MUTO's letter. The same thing happened later in Canton. While in Canton he learned that KONOYE had resigned. He cabled IKAWA in Tokyo, asking if there had been any change in policy or attitude that would affect the validity of the message. * IKAWA replied that

32994 in the military administration section was from August 1938 to March 1941. So he had a knowledge of diplomacy since external affairs affecting national defense were studied there.

The army's opinion on foreign policy came from the national defense plan, of which the general staff was in charge. The general staff had the duty of collecting and examining military and diplomatic information and supervised military attaches. Army's opinion on diplomatic policy used to be initiated by the general staff. The military affairs bureau was to report matters transferred from the general staff to the war minister and negotiation with the foreign minister, according to the war minister's intention. When any matter was proposed by the foreign minister to the MAB it, after transferring the matter to the general staff for its opinion, obtained the minister's decision and replied to the foreign office.

Only a few officers therefore served at the military affairs section of the MAB in considering diplomatic affairs affecting international defense.

32995 * On 22 January 1947 TANAKA, Ryukichi, testified that the MAB sustained a consistent policy aiming at the conclusion of the tripartite pact and of the construction of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere from the time of the ABE cabinet. Regarding the army's attitude toward the pact, it was remarkably different from TANAKA's description and it was groundless to say that the military authorities had established a policy as to the construction of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere.

32996 About the middle of October, 1939, MUTO became director of the MAB. The witness never heard from MUTO of the proposed tripartite alliance. MUTO did give his views frequently about the settlement of the China incident. As he had been on the China front for two years, he was well aware of the difficulty of settling it. He believed it urgent to settle it and they should not only deal direct with Chiang Kai-shek * instead of taking the attitude of having nothing to do with him, but also make concessions in the terms of negotiations to bring about peace. He further insisted in avoiding a dispute with any third power.

When Germany won a victory over the British in May, 1940, the affiant discussed it with MUTO, who said that generally many people overestimated Germany's strength. The German army, however, would never be able to invade Britain across the Straits of Dover. The English were sure to rally through America's assistance. It was to be anticipated that the war would be protracted.

32997 * The witness went to America in March, 1941, as an assistant to Ambassador NOMURA. Because NOMURA asked vice war minister ANAMI and chief of the general staff SUGIYAMA to send an assistant, and not on MUTO's recommendation was the witness sent. His main duty was to assist NOMURA at large. Prior to going to America he made arrangements with IKAWA, Tadao, with a view to restoring diplomatic relations promptly with America. They proceeded with private negotiations with Bishop Walsh, Father Drought, and others in America. The witness, accordingly, prepared a program of formalizing the negotiations.

KONOYE also expressed himself in favor of the negotiations. IKAWA and the witness, after going to America, reported this plan to NOMURA, who readily agreed. From then on negotiations were entered into in line with this plan.

32998 * On 15 April 1941 the tentative plan "Draft of the Understanding between Japan and America" was unofficially taken up by NOMURA and Hull and was reported to the foreign minister. At that time the witness wired war minister TOJO urging to give his support. MUTO was delighted and sent the witness a telegram of thanks.

In August 1941 the witness was ordered to Japan and after returning home was informed by director of the MAB MUTO that some of the foreign minister staff were criticizing the presence of outsiders in connection with foreign office affairs. Accordingly, war minister TOJO ordered the witness home to get rid of a possible obstacle to further negotiations. The witness reported to top war minister officials and found his efforts were appreciated, and MUTO especially asked him in various ways about the prospects.

32999 * The witness answered that according to his impression when he talked with Hull and Walker there was a full possibility of bringing the negotiations to a success, MUTO was very delighted.

After the witness left the war ministry, his acquaintances in the MAB and general staff informed him that MUTO had made an effort to the last to conclude the negotiations.

* CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. LOPEZ

33000 The witness stated he was attached by the MAB on NOMURA's staff in Washington to represent the army's viewpoint. * The navy side was fully represented by the navy attache, Captain YOKOYAMA. The witness went to the United States in active military status in uniform and his orders were to assist NOMURA generally. He did not know whether the United States State Department knew him as "Special Military Adviser" to NOMURA, but knew that such United States representatives as Ballantine, Hamilton, and Hull placed great importance in him.

33001 * The witness was not a spokesman of the government but one of several responsible for the initiation of negotiations. The witness was the actual author of the draft plan for an understanding. When negotiations were brought up to the Hull-NOMURA level, the witness accompanied NOMURA in the negotiations on several occasions, and was given the opportunity to express his opinion freely. He did not know whether at one time NOMURA

33002 requested undersecretary Wells whether the witness could see Roosevelt personally. However postmaster general Walker * said that the witness and IKAWA should meet Roosevelt. He did not know if NOMURA made this request when the witness was about to leave for Japan in July, 1941. The witness stated that he was conscious that he was engaged in a very important work but did not recall expressing the desire to Ballantine that he wanted to see the president.

33003 The views the witness expressed on the issues pending negotiations were in accord with the general army policy, but his own personal views were also included. * Asked if he was being cued up from Tokyo what to do in Washington, he replied not necessarily on minor matters. He did not receive army directions with respect to any particular matters. He knew that the official government viewpoints were wired by the foreign ministry and in those reports were included the army's views. He did not recall receiving direct instructions from the army and never received any instructions from military affairs bureau chief MUTO.

The witness knew that if reports were sent to the foreign office they would be referred to the army, but he sent no direct report to MUTO.

33004 * The witness recalled a conference with Hull, WAKASUGI, IKAWA, MATSUDAIRA, Hamilton, and Ballentine, but did not know whether it was on the 4th of June, 1941. This was probably held at the Wardman Park Hotel at 3 p.m. The witness was asked if it was not a fact that at that conference he explained that it was entirely incorrect to assume that the purpose of the understanding was to enable Japan to drift away from the tripartite pact and that if the United States became involved in the European war, and the circumstances called for Japan to act under its interpretation of its obligations, Japan would feel obliged to discharge them, much as she would regret taking up arms against the United States. The witness replied that he thought he explained probably in such a manner.

33005 * Asked if he was pulled out from Washington after the entry of Japanese troops into FIC in July, 1941, he replied he did not know the reason, but because negotiations became difficult he wired that he would like to report the details. In reply he was called back, but did not know the 33006 the reason. Asked if it was not true that weeks previous of the entry into FIC, United States representatives made representations to him and NOMURA that the United States had received reports of Japanese intention to penetrate FIC, he replied he thought there were representations but he had no clear * recollection of them. Asked if he and NOMURA were told by Hull and Wells that the move into FIC was a demonstration on Japan's part of lack of sincerity in really entering into peace negotiations, he answered that that may have been so but he had no recollection.

He understood that because of the entry into FIC the United States president issued the freezing order. Negotiations met with more difficulty because of that entry.

33007 * When shown a document, the witness identified the 33008 seal on it * as being top secret. After reading from the 33009 document, the witness was asked * if the IWAKURO mentioned 33010 in it was not himself, and he replied it was. * The chief of the military affairs bureau that sent the cable was the accused MUTO.

33011 * Exhibit 3443, the telegram so sent by MUTO to the witness, IWAKURO, and dated 2 June 1941, stated that according to information reportedly given by Roosevelt, his aim in adopting a new conciliatory policy towards Japan was the transfer of the Pacific fleet to the Atlantic Ocean. According to this explanation, the United States seemed possessed of a specially strong wishful thinking that Japan would refuse to perform her duty of attacking the United States under the tripartite alliance even in case of the United States entering into the war.

33012 In his "fireside chats", Roosevelt concluded that the European war had already developed into a world war and openly stated that patrolling by the United States had been greatly strengthened and every possible effort should be made to insure that goods to England left here safely. He expressed praise regarding Chiang Kai-shek for his continued resistance * against Japan and stated that he was convinced of furtherance of Chiang's resisting power. All the above was against Japan's wishes and this attitude should be carefully watched.

Furthermore, IWAKURO was presumably aware of foreign minister MATSUOKA inquiring of NOMURA regarding the report of Halifax to Eden that Roosevelt insinuated that in regard to the negotiations, different views prevailed within the

Asked if it were strictly correct to say that he was a representative of the MAB, he replied the MAB had no authority to send anyone abroad, and was in no position to send any official representative outside of Japan. In the strict sense the witness was not a representative.

33014 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3444 as 33016 his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was chief of the far eastern bureau of foreign office since September, 1940, and concurrently was chief of the American affairs bureau after October, 1941. He kept in close touch with chiefs of the army and navy military affairs bureaus, MUTO and OKA, who had been deeply concerned with negotiations between Japan and America. He also had many chances through the liason conferences between the government and imperial headquarters to meet the two who were both secretaries of the conference, to which the witness usually presented himself as a sort of foreign office liason secretary.

33017 * The secretary for the liason conference took charge of conference clerical work, i.e., the preparation, explanation, and adjustment of the draft and collection of materials, etc. By preparation of the draft, he meant the preparation for submitting it which had been studied and prepared by others on matters deemed necessary to be submitted. The draft was written by proper authorities in the government or headquarters. The draft on military matters was done by the army or ministry on the supreme command, and that on diplomatic matters by the foreign office and those concerned with the resources and productions by the planning board.

33018 The adjustment of the draft meant to adjust it after various amendments following exchange of opinions in the conference in the decision of the conference was not made by a simple majority. Discussion continued until all views were completely agreed, and after that the members signed the draft decided upon. The secretary did not attend as a conference member but as a clerical official, so neither the accused HOSHINO, MUTO, nor OKA had any right to express their opinions, to vote, or sign the document.

TOJO declared at the conference, opened after the formation of his cabinet, that the new cabinet would consider Japan-American negotiations on a clean slate, freed from the decision on September 6. After that careful studies were continued and in the meantime MUTO always wished for the negotiations' satisfactory agreement and he had considerable anxiety in adjusting and softening the strong opinion of some groups which were too prone to be involved in the war.

33019 In November, 1941, on the preparation of the A and B drafts submitted to America from Japan, a strong opinion was expressed from a certain group of the Supreme Command. The witness heard from MUTO, however, that he succeeded with * difficulty in bringing about a modification of these opinions. In routine functions, MUTO, as well as OKA, had to get the Supreme Command's approval in addition to the consent of their senior officers.

The Japanese draft of November 5 was deemed most fair under the political, economic, and military situation in Japan, and in Japan's view it conceded the utmost, so they expected and heartily wished that peace would be brought by understanding and compromise on America's part.

33020 In the middle of November when it was reported by NOMURA that Roosevelt proposed his good offices between Japan & China, they recognized a ray of hope and the witness, together with MUTO, and OKA, was busily engaged in the making of preparations in the event of the agreement's being concluded. At the time there was a clear understanding * that if the negotiations should be concluded, the emergency taken would be canceled and the situation restored to normal. The witness remembered that in the middle of November both MUTO and OKA told him that although instruction had already been issued to the dispatched troops, simultaneously with the conclusion of the negotiations, all emergency measures should be immediately stopped. They were making their best efforts in avoiding any fault in this respect, as this was a very difficult work.

* CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. LOPEZ

33021 The witness stated that he was the same YAMAMOTO, chief of the American bureau of the foreign office, who had constant telephone conversations with KURUSU at Washington and himself in Tokyo in October, November, and December of 1941. * When code was used in a telephone conversation, it was after the latter part of November.

33022 * Instructions to KURUSU and NOMURA by secret cable were not sent by the witness but by the foreign minister TOGO. The witness was asked if on 28 November 1941 he sent a secret cable to NOMURA and KURUSU which said that the United States had gone ahead and presented this humiliating proposal.

NARRATIVE SUMMARY OF THE RECORD

Page This was unexpected and regrettable and Japan could be no means use it as a basis for negotiations. With a report of the views of the Japanese on the proposal, which would be sent NOMURA and KURUSU in two or three days, the negotiations would be de facto ruptured. This was inevitable. However, he did not wish them to give the impression that negotiations were broken, but should merely say that they were awaiting instructions and that, although the opinions of their government were not clear, to their own way of thinking, Japan had always made just claims and borne great sacrifices for the sake of peace in the Pacific.

The witness stated he recalled that a telegram to the above effect was sent out at the end of November.

33023 * Reference was made to the affidavit of the witness where it was stated that in middle November 1941, he was heartened by Roosevelt's proposal to mediate between China and Japan and MUTO, OKA and himself prepared plans about what Japan would do if the agreements were concluded successfully. The witness was asked if OKA submitted or prepared any plans to him in that eventuality. He replied he had no positive recollection whether any concrete plan was submitted by chief of naval affairs bureau OKA at that time. However, he received information that various considerations were given to the rescinding of emergency measures in the event such an outcome was realized at that time.

33024 With regard to military matters, MUTO was speaking of the same things as OKA. It was his recollection that he was constantly talking about the necessity for the preparation of the withdrawing of troops from China in the event of an agreement with the United States. * The witness was asked if it could be said that after the receipt of the news of Roosevelt's proposal of mediation if there was perfect harmony of views between himself, OKA, and MUTO. He replied that he could not say there was perfect agreement with regard to concrete measures. By the offer of mediation there were prospects of a successful outcome of the negotiations and there was perfect agreement among the three with regard to the necessity of making preparations with such prospects in view.

Asked if during that time MUTO expressed his views about the stationing and withdrawal of troops in China, he replied it was felt that immediately upon the successful consummation of the negotiations, the question of withdrawal of troops from China would arise and there was perfect agreement in connection with the necessity of making concrete preparation for this.

- 33025 * MUTO expressed his views to the witness orally. Asked if MUTO expressed his views about the question of oil in writing or verbally, he replied there were various discussions from MUTO in connection with the problem of petroleum after the submission of proposition B to the United States. In addition to what MUTO told him orally his recollection was that about mid November he submitted in writing what he said were the views of the general staff regarding the question. Asked if that proposal called for demanding six million tons of oil from the United States, he replied it was considered necessary
- 33026 to get six million tons of oil per annum and in his recollection * was to secure this amount upon consummation of proposal B.
- 33027 * Asked if foreign minister TOGO considered this proposal as exorbitant and above the usual imports from the United States, he replied that MUTO's plan was presented not as reflecting the views of the army but as representing views of a section of the general staff at that time. The witness said that such an exorbitant amount was out of the question but he accepted the document for reference.

Asked if the proposal stated that if the United States did not give that amount that Japan would commence military operations against her, he replied that he didn't recall the exact words used but as far as he remembered rather strong terms seeking to persuade the United States as much as possible to accept the requests were used. When the witness showed this plan to TOGO he expressed anger and said it was preposterous to receive such a plan and the witness was reprimanded for receiving it.

- 33028 * Asked if it was not true that the MUTO proposal called for military operations against the United States even in the eventuality the United States should agree to it, but if the United States would not deliver six million tons of oil in equal amounts monthly seven days after the conclusion of the agreement, Japan should undertake operations against her, he replied that the plan was not submitted as a proposal of MUTO and he gave it to the witness as a reference saying there was a section in the general staff which held such views.

- 33029 Asked again whether there was such a demand on the United States as was said in the previous question, he replied that as far as the United States was concerned, the demand included in the plan was not submitted as it was. Later after consideration, instructions * were sent to request four Page million tons of oil, which figure was arrived at as a result of aggregating the average import volume in the past, the instructions being that this request should be submitted after acceptance of proposal B. Asked if it was not also true that MUTO demanded from the United States that she ask NEI for four million tons of oil and if NEI did not comply with its delivery, troops would be sent there, he replied that he thought there was something to the effect that the next step would be necessary in the event this demand was not accepted.

33030 Asked if proposals A and B contained demands for oil from the United States and the Netherlands, he replied whether with respect to proposal A or B, if one of the two were accepted by the United States, Japan sought to have the United States export to her the required amount of raw materials, including petroleum, to the extent which would restore the situation to where it * existed prior to the freezing order. The concrete amount of raw material, including oil, was not stipulated in either proposal A or B. It was Japan's intention to determine the amount of oil to be imported through negotiation following acceptance by the United States of proposal A or B.

Asked what would happen if the United States did not give the full amount demanded, he replied that at the time they did not entertain any ideas of returning again to the situation prevailing prior to the consummation of negotiation when they considered the question of nonacceptance of the concrete particulars of the Japanese demand.

33031 * Asked again what under the MUTO plan would happen if the United States did not accept the demand for four million tons of oil, he replied it was his recollection that if the point sought in the proposal handed over to the witness by MUTO was not accepted, then they were to return to the situation prevailing prior to the consummation of the negotiations. The witness was asked what in plain language that meant. He replied that this did not mean in his understanding an attack on the United States by military operations. He did not recall the phraseology used but it was his understanding that there would be no war breaking out merely because six million tons of oil were refused.

* The witness stated that he recalled that in the plan submitted to him by MUTO, fairly strong language was used in regard to what would happen if after the successful conclusion of the negotiations the provisions of the final agreement were not carried out by the U.S. In the plan, language was used to the effect that if activities aiding the Chiang regime were not brought to a definite stop, hostilities would be commenced. On the whole this was the purport of the plan.

* When shown a document, the witness acknowledged that a pencilled note on it giving the date 18 November 1941 and from MUTO, Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau, and with the signature YAMAMOTO written in his own handwriting. MUTO referred to was the accused in the dock and he scribbled it when he received the document from him on 18 Nov. 1941. The seal on the cover was a state secret seal, the highest and most secret seal of the government.

33037

* Exhibit 3445, the document identified by the witness being a plan regarding future steps in negotiations between Japan and the U.S., stated that necessary steps in case the treaty was concluded on the "A" Draft was to have the U.S. admit that she shall not take measures obstructing Japan's efforts regarding the solution of the China Incident. At the end of the first item of the article, referring to measures for establishing peace between Japan and China of the draft of 25 Sept., this meant the U.S. was to avoid and abstain from any kind of action helping Chiang as specified at the end of the instructions given NOMURA on Sept. 13.

* The U.S. was to admit the following as its understanding of Article IV (Trade between Japan and USA) of the draft of Sept. 25: Both governments within 3 days of agreeing to the understanding shall reciprocally abolish property freezing measures, and the U.S. shall supply Japan with 6,000,000 tons of mineral oil yearly, including a million and a half tons of aviation gasoline, equal amounts being supplied each month.

Regarding Article V (Economic Problems in the Pacific) of the draft of Sept. 25, the first item shall be revised that both governments reciprocally pledge that their economic activities in the Pacific Area shall be carried on peacefully and that if the principle of non-discrimination in international trade was applied to the whole world, it shall also be applied to the Pacific Areas, including China. (Note: If U.S. avoids the condition regarding the principle of non-discrimination being applied to the whole world, then the original draft of Sept. 25 shall be revised.)

They were to have the U.S. admit the following before the conclusion of the A Draft: The U.S. shall take measures to have Britain within 3 days of the conclusion of the agreement on the A draft restore Anglo-Japanese trade relations and avoid and refrain from helping Chiang, such as closing the Burma Road, etc.

* If avoidance and abstinence from actions helping Chiang, lifting of the property freezing measures by U.S. and Britain, and measures restoring trade with Japan by NEI were not actually carried out after one week had passed since the conclusion of the agreement on the A Draft, Japan shall open hostilities against the U.S., Britain and Netherlands, and if NEI did not follow the lead of the U.S. and Britain when they took appropriate steps, Japan shall send necessary units to NEI for security. For this reason, Japan shall unilaterally make the necessary manifestation of her intentions to the U.S. when the A Draft was signed.

33041

Regarding the necessary steps in case a treaty was concluded on the B Draft, they were to have the U.S. consent to the following as her understanding of the second item: The U.S. shall take measures to have NEI accept within 3 days of the agreement Japanese demands presented through * Ambass of YOSHIZAWA to NEI on trade, traffic and communication between Japan and NEI and freedom of enterprise, entry, residence and business of Japanese there, but Japan shall for the time being be supplied yearly with 4 million tons of mineral oil in equal amounts monthly. They were to have the U.S. admit the following as its understanding of the third item: Both governments within 3 days of the agreement to this understanding shall reciprocally abolish property freezing measures and the U.S. shall supply Japan with 6 million tons of mineral oil a year including a million and a half tons of aviation gasoline in equal amounts monthly. They were to have the U.S. admit the following as to understanding of the fourth item: The meaning of the fourth item was that the U.S. shall avoid and abstain from actions helping Chiang and both governments promise to declare this point to the world when they sign the B draft.

* REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. COLE

Referring to the plan regarding the 6 million tons of oil, the witness was asked whether this proposal received from MUTO was MUTO's plan or proposal. The witness answered that when MUTO gave him the plan, he added the words that the plan was presented to him by the General Staff in very strong terms. MUTO said he himself had not yet recognized it as a plan representing the Army as a whole but because the General Staff insisted so strongly that the plan be presented, he was handing it to the witness for his reference.

33044

When the witness received the plan, he glanced through it and then immediately told MUTO that no one could accept such a foolish plan and refused to accept it, but since MUTO again asked him to accept it merely as reference material, he did so. He recalled that MUTO * later told him in private a story concerning MUTO's extraordinary efforts in trying to see the successful consummation of plans "A" and "B". Foreign Minister TOGO staked his position on the success of plans "A" and "B" and worked untiringly for their success. Since the contents of the plan included withdrawal from southern FIC, the General Staff vigorously opposed it. Thereupon, MUTO employed all his powers of persuasion and finally got the General Staff to accept TOGO's plan. The General Staff, after accepting TOGO's plan with great reluctance, immediately presented its own plan through MUTO. MUTO told the witness he was very dismayed at the General Staff's attitude. The plan submitted by the General Staff was Exhibit 3445.

* Asked if the proposal for a demand of 6 million tons of oil was ever carried out, he replied that the circumstances of Page acceptance were as he had before stated and the plan was not even discussed at the Liaison Conference. They completely disregarded the proposal regarding the import of 6 million tons of oil and after negotiations with the authorities concerned, decided that 4 million tons would be a fair figure and instructed NOMURA to that effect. The demand for 6 million tons was never sent to America. When he said that after a discussion between the officials a new plan was made, he recalled that these were officials of War and Navy Ministers and the Planning Board. His recollection was that this figure of 4 million tons was the average of normal imports of * oil from America over a span of several years.

Regarding Exhibit 3445, where it stated that upon the failure of meeting certain conditions, hostilities would be commenced, he was asked if he knew whether MUTO personally was the author of that plan. He replied that he understood by the question that he was asked whether the plan specified that if certain conditions were not met, hostilities would be commenced. His understanding was that if after the conclusion of negotiations, the provisions of the agreement were not carried out, then hostilities would be commenced. As for MUTO, he made it perfectly clear that he felt himself that the plan was outrageous, that it was not even worth taking up, that it was not the result of his own ideas, and that he had not drafted it.

33047

* Asked what official had the job of acting as liaison between the Foreign Office and Imperial Headquarters or General Staff, he replied that the official charged with liaison between the Foreign Minister and Army, or in matters pertaining to the Liaison Conference, was the witness himself as far as the Foreign Ministry was concerned. As for the Army, the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau was the liaison man for all other offices outside the Army. As one of the secretaries in the Liaison Conferences between Imperial Headquarters and the Government, MUTO often had to act as liaison in matters pertaining to the General Staff. Regarding the proposals in Exhibit 3445, referring to matters to be taken up upon the acceptance of either the A or B plan, the Government never adopted these proposals.
