When asked if there was any writing or memorandum which would show that MUTO personally disapproved of this plan, he replied he did not receive any special writing from MUTO on the matter but only heard of it from him orally. Asked again if there was any writing or memorandum anywhere which would show that MUTO personally disapproved of the plan, he replied no, there was no such writing. 33050 * Exhibit 3446, an excerpt from the Report of the Congressional Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack, being a portion of the KONOYE Memoirs, dated 14 Oct. 1941, stated that War Minister TOJO's remarks were so sudden that the other Cabinet members were somewhat taken aback and no one would open his mouth to answer. The Cabinet Meeting, after settling other subjects, made no reference to the problem of continuing negotiations and adjourned.

On the afternoon of the same day, the Chief of the MAB, MUTO, came to the Cabinet of the Chief Secretary and said that somehow or other it seemed that the reason the Premier could not make up his mind was because the Navy could not make up its mind. If the Navy really does not wish war, the Army also must think about it. The Navy did not say anything openly to the Army, but only that it would leave it entirely up to the Premier. Just to say it would be up to the Premier would not be enough to control the inner circles of the Army, but if the Navy would come openly and say that at this time it did not wish war, then the Army could easily control its command. MUTO wondered if it could not be managed so that the Navy would come and say something along this line. Thereupon, the Chief Secretary spoke to the Chief of the Naval Affairs Bureau OKA concerning the matter, but all the latter would say was that as far as the Navy was concerned, no matter what anyone might think, for it to say it did not wish war was something it could not do formally. What the Navy could say was that it was entirely up to the Premier.

BY MR. COLE

33055 * The affidavit stated that in 1941 the witness was Chief of the Medical Bureau of the War Ministry. To the best of his recollection, at a meeting of bureau chiefs about 27 Nov. 1941, Chief of the MAB, MUTO, had not read a document "Principal Reasons Alleged for the Commencement of Hostilities Against USA and Britain". (Exhibit 1175) As far as he remembered, it was not true that when the US reply, dated 25 Nov. 1941, arrived, MUTO at the meeting of bureau chiefs on the 29th, said that if Japan accepted the proposal, not only the firm establishment of the East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere would come to naught, but Japan would go out of existence. To prevent this and firmly establish the Co-Prosperity Sphere, they would have to fight by all means.

33056 * To the best of the witness' recollection it was not true as alleged in Exhibit 1175 that at noon 9 Dec. 1941, at a party of bureau chiefs, MUTO said that, in short, the dispatches of Ambassador KURUSU and S.S. "TATSUTA-MARU" and so forth were no more than measures for camouflaging the way leading to the commencement of hostilities. The witness stated it was not true that MUTO made his appearance at the War Ministry Dining - on every day to take lunch. On the contrary, he did not appear there on most of those days. The witness did not recollect that at noon on 9 Dec., the day after the outbreak of war, all bureau chiefs gathered at the dining room, for on that day they were all too busy.

There was no cross-examination of the witness.

33060 * Exhibit 3448, Regulations for Enforcement of the Army Officers' Service Ordinance dated 3 Nov. 1937, and Exhibit 3449, Regulations Concerning Personal Matters of Army Officers, dated 3 March 1941, were received into evidence but not read.

* The affidavit stated that from 14 Apr. 1943 to 1 Apr. 1944, the witness was C/S of the Second Imperial Guard Division in Sumatra under the accused MUTO and from then until immediately before the end of the war was a staff officer of the 25th Army. While MUTO was in that position, the Garrison Area under the Guard Division (after 1 June 1943 called the Second Imperial Guard Division) was gradually reduced from the outbreak of war to April 1943. It included the West Coast Province of Sumatra, Rio Province, Tapanori Province, Eastern Coast Province and Acjie Province.

33063

* From May 1943 it included only the last three provinces and after Jan. 1944 only the last two. The Commander of the Guard Division had nothing to do with military administration in the Garrison Area, but was authorized only to give necessary instructions as to defense and only when the garrison might be attacked. With regard to the treatment of POWs in Sumatra, the witness heard that early in the war, a temporary POW Camp was established by the Division. In the meantime, however, administration of POWs was taken over by personnel dispatched directly by the 25th Army Commander at Singapore. About July 1942, the Camp was built according to an order from Tokyo. MUTO arrived at Medan to take command about 11 May 1942. At that time the administration of the camp was not in the hands of the Commander of the Division. From that time on, the camp was administered as a branch of the * Malay POW Camp at Singapore under Headquarters of the Army of the South. The Division Commander had nothing to do with administration.

With regard to the administration of the civilian internees' camps, the Province Governor and official of the Military Government was in charge of them. The military government was also responsible for the guarding of these internees' camps. However, when a request was made for help owing to a personnel shortage, the Division Commander made it a rule to comply. From 1 April 1944, the 25th Army Headquarters directly administered these internee camps. At the same time the Division was under obligation to assist Headquarters in construction of the camps as to supplies, but the Division had not been responsible at all for administration.

33065 * Originally the Division's principal duties were to guard the Imperial Palace and escort the Emperor, and it was composed of excellent men. Statistics regarding crime indicated that the 25th Army was one whose discipline was the most strict and of all units in the 25th Army, the Division gave the best showing. The witness had no recollection of any complaint brought to him by the military government or from natives regarding misconduct of the Division.

There was no cross-examination of the witness.

33069 * Exhibit 3451, the affidavit of KUMEGAWA, Yoshiharu, stated that on 22 Dec. 1944 he arrived at his post in the Philippines as a staff officer to 14th Area Army Commander YAMASHITA. He was appointed 33070 Senior Staff Officer, in charge of the Tactical Affairs Section. * From then until the surrender, he was in the Headquarters of this Army and was nearly all the time in the same place as YAMASHITA and C/S MUTO with whom he was closely connected.

33071 When the witness arrived at Manila, YAMASHITA's Headquarters was at Fort McKinley. At that time a part of the U.S. Army had already landed at San Jose, about 250 kilometers south of Manila. Lines of operations on Luzon Island were decided and every unit was successively moving to each allotted position. YAMASHITA, in consideration of future operations, moved his Headquarters to equal 30 kilometers northeast of Manila on Dec. 26th. As a result, YAMASHITA and MUTO never stayed in Manila. At that time the Army in Luzon was small, poorly equipped, short of * maneuvering power, and lacking in air force. The U.S. Army was absolutely predominant in the air and superior in fighting power and equipment and had great maneuvering power. The U.S. forces could land at any point at their own choice and the Japanese Army Commander was at great pains to infer their landing points.

In view of the difference in strength and equipment between their army and the enemy, the Commander intended to evade decisive battles on the plains and carry out persistent struggle in the mountains. When the Japanese had been concentrated in the Manila vicinity, if the U.S. Army should have their main force put ashore in the Bay of Lingaen, the Japanese forces would be forced to fight in the plains, for which their equipment was unfit, and put in danger of being destroyed. The Commander's program was that Manila should be abandoned and the main force located in northern Luzon, that the Japanese forces in the vicinity of Manila should occupy the mountainous region on the east of Manila, that only forces necessary to carry and escort war supplies and keep guard would be left in Manila and the city should be evacuated

Page prior to the U.S. entry. In moving Headquarters from Ft. McKinley to Ipo on 26 Dec. 1944, YAMASHITA meant to inform his men by his personal action of his idea of abandoning Manila and hasten the exodus of forces and munitions from there. Manila was the most important Far East Base for the U.S. In Manila were a great number of inflammable wooden houses, the city was technically of little value and besides the million citizens were suffering extremely. It appeared impossible to defend the region, including the city. Besides, it was always in YAMASHITA's mind that it was wrong to reduce the sole civilized city in the Philippines to ashes. * MUTO also insisted on abandonment.

Neither Imperial Headquarters nor the Southern General Army ordered Manila to be defended to the last. Luzon operations were wholly left to YAMASHITA's strategy.

33074 * YAMASHITA named the Japanese forces which were to occupy the mountainous region east of Manila the Ghibu Group under the command of YOKOYAMA, and dispatched one unit to Batangas Peninsula, ordering it to check the enemy's rush to Manila. Then YAMASHITA removed Headquarters to Baguio on 4 Jan. 1945. YAMASHITA was rigid in commanding the Army but communication facilities in the Philippine campaign were incomparably inferior to those of the U.S. Express delivery prior to the opening of operations was found difficult owing to lowered ability of operators, intricacy of ciphers and the fact that there existed only one wireless available in the principal direction. After operations opened, the difficulty increased extremely and only important commands or reports could be barely communicated.

The naval forces were independent until the termination of the war but naval units in Manila and other districts were subjected to the Army Commanders in the districts concerned with the opening of hostilities so far as land fighting was concerned.

33075 * The naval unit in Manila was placed under General YOKOYAMA on 5 Jan. 1945. The fact was that YOKOYAMA was not acquainted with the condition of the naval forces in detail during the campaign. Air forces were not under his command until 1 Jan. 1945.

No report was made to Army Headquarters of any Japanese killing Filipinos or ill-treating POWs and YAMASHITA and MUTO were utterly ignorant of such fact. YAMASHITA was rigid as to military discipline and if he had been informed he would have severely punished anyone concerned. He never ordered murder or ill-treatment.

YAMASHITA and MUTO were always at the same place except when the latter went to inspect the front. At Ft. McKinley the office of the C/S was next to the Commander. At Baguio the two were in the same room, and later in the same air raid shelter. After moving to Banban the end of April, they used one desk in common. Such being the case, MUTO was well aware of YAMASHITA's plans, but when he found anything uncertain in the intention of the Commander, he made it a rule either to ask YAMASHITA about it or reserve decision and give instructions later. The C/S was not invested with authority to decide principal matters and MUTO was faithful to this rule. There were some routine matters within the C/S's confidence and in these YAMASHITA often gave his views.

* Exhibit 3452, an excerpt from the book "The Winning of the War in the Pacific and Europe", General Marshall's report, stated that in the six days of naval action, Japan's position in the Philippines became critical. Most of its servicable elements in the navy had been committed to battle, with disastrous results. The strike miscarried, and MacArthur's land wedge was firmly implanted in the vulnerable flank of the enemy. TERAUCHI no longer had an effective fleet to cover his forces or communications. 260,000 Japanese troops were scattered over the Philippines, but most might as well have been on the other * side of the world so far as the enemy's ability to shift them to meet American thrusts was concerned. MacArthur succeeded in establishing himself in the Visayas where he could stage, exploit, and spread, and nothing could prevent him from overrunning the Philippines.

Exhibit 3453, another excerpt from the book, stated that no opportunity was overlooked to conceal this bold plan from the Japanese. While the assault force proceeded up the west coast of Luzon, planes and guerrillas concentrated on destroying roads, etc., to prevent YAMASHITA from shifting forces. Guerrillas in southern Luzon diverted Japanese attention to the south. Mine sweepers swept the bays on the south coast. Landing ships and merchantmen approached the beaches until they drew fire, and then withdrew. Transport planes dropped dummies. The Tokyo radio reported that U. S. troops were trying to land on Luzon, but had been driven off. Japanese forces, * harassed by guerrillas and by air, drove in all directions in confusion, and generally dissipated what chance they might have had to repel the landing force.

On 7 January, the U. S. 6th Army hit the beaches in Lingayen Gulf, and by nightfall 60,000 troops were ashore and in control of a 15 mile beachhead. The landing caught every major hostile combat unit in motion except the 23rd Division to the southeast of the beachhead and its supporting brigade. YAMASHITA's inability to cope with MacArthur's swift moves, his reaction to the deceptive measures, guerrillas and aircraft, placed the Japanese in an impossible situation. The enemy was forced into a piece-meal commitment of his troops. The Japanese 10th and 105th Divisions in the Manila area, which were to secure Highway No. 5 on the eastern edge of the central Luzon plain, failed to arrive in time. The brunt of defending this withdrawal road to the north fell to the division which should have defended the road to Clark Field.

by Mr. Cole.

33080 * The accused identified and verified exhibit 39081 3454 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the accused, from 1922. was in the office of the Inspector-General, engaged in revising drill manuals, etc., in accordance with changes in tactics. His service there continued until 1929, when he became ill. In December, 1929, he entered the Staff Collage as a post-graduate student to study higher strategy and tactics for one year.
33082 * He learned of the incident in which Chang Tso-lin was killed by a bomb at Mukden only through newspapers.

* In November, 1930, he was attached to the General Staff and served in the 2nd Section, which corresponded to G-2 in the U. S. Army. In August, 1931, he was transferred to the 1st Section to do work in communications matters. The Chief of Staff ordered him to revise regulations concerning line of communications matters. The so-called Manchurian Incident broke out in September the same year, and there was tension in the General Staff. However, strength ordered to move was only one brigade from Korea to reinforce the Kwantung Army, so those in the line of communications branch were not especially busy and the accused continued his compilation until March 1932. On completion, he served in the 2nd Section again.

33083 * He learned that a society called "Sakurakai" existed at the time, but he was not a member nor had anything to do with it. In March, 1934, he was transferred to the 1st Infantry Regiment. Prior, in August 1933, he was promoted to lieutenant colonel. As it was provided a regimental commander should be a colonel, he acted there 33084 as an assistant. * Next, he was transferred to the Military Administration Section of the MAB in March 1935, and was there until June 1936, during which he concurrently taught in the Army College. During this period he remembered the February 26 Incident in which young officers murdered several senior statesmen and occupied government buildings. At that time he worked day and night as a member of the War Ministry Staff, for suppressing riot and dealing with its aftermath. He learned his name was listed in the second assassination list, because he had hitherto opposed the young officers' movement.

Page

In June 1936, he was appointed a Kwantung Army staff officer in charge of information as Chief of the 2nd Section, the operations department. His service there continued up to March 1937. TANAKA, Ryukichi, who had appeared as a witness, was then his subordinate.

33085

* In March, 1937, he was transferred to the General Staff in charge of operation, organization, etc. as Chief of the 2nd Section under the 1st Division. He had not arrived until mid-March, and the operation plan for 1937 had already been drawn up, so he made a study of the following year's plan.

In regard to the operations plan concerning China at the time, his answer in his interrogation was incorrectly understood in that he was supposed to have answered as if there was at the time a unified plan for an over-all war against China. The operational plan was for a partial dispatch of forces to China for protection of Japanese residents in north or central China. When an incident broke out in north China in July 1937, this plan could not be put into practice. The General Staff had planned only for reinforcement to protect Japanese residents * in and around Peking and Tientsin. However, the situation was completely different, and another study had to be made and he took these tasks on his director's orders.

In the latter part of October, 1937, he was ordered by the Chief of Staff to Shanghai to observe the military situation there. While there, about November 4, the 10th Army under YANAGAWA, landed at Hangchow Bay, according to the General Staff's plan, and Central China Area Army Headquarters was established, and the accused MATSUI, C-in-C of the Shanghai Expeditionary Army, came to hold simultaneously the post of C-in-C of the Central China Army and to command concurrently the Expeditionary and 10th Armies. The accused was appointed MATSUI's Assistant Chief of Staff, and did not return to Tokyo.

MATSUI's operations duties were to protect the lives and property of Japanese residents by driving back the Chinese around Shanghai. His duties were accomplished about 23 or 24 November. By that time, MATSUI had not yet * been given the function of occupying Nanking, and orders for this did not come until 1 December from Imperial Headquarters. MATSUI then ordered the Expeditionary and 10th Army to proceed to attack Nanking. MATSUI's headquarters were in the suburbs of Shanghai, and went to Soochow about 5 December.

33088 About 7 December, the new C-in-C took over, and MATSUI was relieved as C-in-C of the Expeditionary Army, and acted solely as C-in-C of the Central Army. Receiving about 8 December the report that vanguards had advanced and were approaching Nanking, MATSUI ordered that the first line shall remain three or four kilometers outside Nanking; to advise Nanking guards to surrender, leaflets would be scattered by airplane. If the Chinese surrendered, the Expeditionary and 10th Armies shall select two or three * battalions to enter Nanking and preserve public peace, with the main forces remaining outside the city. Foreign rights and interests shall be protected.

If the Chinese should not surrender by noon of 10 December, Nanking shall be attacked; provided, that in such case the units entering the city shall act in accordance with the preceding items, maintain strict military discipline and morale, and secure public peace. These orders were delivered to headquarters of both armies by Chief of Staff TSUKADA personally.

33089 As the Chinese did not surrender, the attack started from noon of the 10th, and forces advanced over the castle wall on the 13th. MATSUI was ill when he went forward to Shanghai from Foochow, so the accused arranged to remain at Foochow to take care of him. However, he had to participate, as Army Supreme Commander, with the Navy * Supreme Commander in the formal entry to be held on 17 December. After the formal entry on that date, MATSUI heard for the first time from Chief of Staff TSUKADA that most units entered the city against the Commander's order, and that following the entry plunder and rape occurred.

Concerning this in his interrogation it was stated to MUTO that MATSUI had been blamed by his staff for these cases, but this was a misinterpretation. MUTO meant that MATSUI got very angry.

33090 MUTO ordered both commanders to withdraw promptly, except for forces necessary for guarding Nanking to maintain discipline and morale. The accused understood both commanders executed the order. However, withdrawal was delayed a little because Chinese forces were burning buildings, and * there was little water to drink.

The office of the accused was Assistant Chief of Staff of the Central China Area Army. He was to assist the chief and act as intermediary, coordinating the work of their organs, replacement of personnel, supply, etc. The assistant chief was only a partial assistant for the chief, and had no power to make decisions, and his duties were not to maintain military discipline and morale.

While in Nanking, MUTO, on the Chief of Staff's orders, investigated the camping capacity outside Nanking and engaged in withdrawing of soldiers from the city. As for MATSUI, after he stayed at Nanking for four or five days.--it was MUTO's wrong recollection that he answered in his interrogation that MATSUI stayed there for a week--followed by his staff officers. MATSUI * returned to Shanghai Headquarters about December 21, and MUTO went with him, because MATSUI had another duty of reducing Hangchow.

After the formal entry at Nanking, 10th Army Commander YANAGAWA forwarded his army to Hangchow, along with the 101st Division, which had remained near Shanghai. Therefore MATSUI returned to Shanghai to command these forces. Chinese at Hangchow retreated, and it was captured without bloodshed about December 24.

In early February, 1938, Imperial Headquarters reduced the strength of forces in Central China to about six divisions and abolished the Central China, 10th, and Expeditionary Army, and left only the Expeditionary Army in Central China. Then MATSUI, Prince ASHKA, YANAGAWA, and most staff officers returned home, and the accused HATA became the new C-in-C. with MUTO remaining as Assistant Chief of Staff for him.

Early in July, 1938, MUTO was transferred to Vice Chief of Staff of the North China Area Army, and moved to Peiping, remaining there until October 1939. Count 46 of the Indictment charged MUTO on account of the attack on Canton on October 21, 1938, but the attack was carried out by a unit having no relation to the North China Area Army, and he had no connection with it. The same was true of the attack on Hankow about 27 October, 1938. (Count 47). The "Khalkin-Gol" River case in the summer of 1939, (Count 26), he had no connection with, as he was then still attached to the North China Army in Peiping, and it was carried out by a unit which had no connection with that army.

In October, 1939, he became Chief of the EAB and was appointed Chief Secretary of the Supreme War Council and secretaries or councillors of about ten kinds, but these were concurrent posts automatically following the position of Chief of the EAB and had no special implications.

He was Chief of the EAB from October 1939 to April 1942, * but no changes were seen in the duties during that time, but in July, 1940, after the second KONOYE Cabinet was formed, the authority of the Cabinet Information Board was strengthened, and such things as censorship of matters connected with the army hitherto carried out by the Intelligence Division of the War Ministry were transferred to the new board.

* Even when he became Chief of the EAB he knew nothing of political or diplomatic problems, but as he had served in China for about two years he had some opinions concerning Chinese affairs. It was his tentative opinion that among the five hundred million people in China was rising racial consciousness and the China Incident was assuming the form of racial war, with its nucleus as Chiang Kai-shek. Chinese questions would not be solved with old views regarding China. The longer the incident continued the harder the settlement would be, and they should work out a solution to deal with the Chiang Regime, breaking the impasse and harmonize relations between Japan, U. S. and Britain.

33096

The accused had no special connections with the * National Policy Institute. From what his predecessor told him, he regarded it as a middle-of-the-road organization of intellectuals, beneficial because it permitted knowledge of the opinions of civilian circles. Although Chief Secretary of the Society YATSUGI testified that MUTO addressed the institute a few times, this was erroneous, for never did he show up there for an address. He was asked time and again to address the group after he returned from China, but refused. He did attend a luncheon in February or March 1940, when he was invited by leaders of the group, but after it, upon request, he stated his personal opinions concerning China for about ten minutes. This was the only time he ever visited the institute.

Though he did not remember the date clearly, Baron OKURA visited him in the autumn of 1941, and after explaining the financial difficulties of the Institute, requested subsidies from the War and Navy Ministries. In accordance with procedure, MUTO told the Vice-Minister * about it, he approved, and subsidies amounting to ¥20,000 were granted. MUTO did not know for what purpose the money was used, nor anything about research documents on the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere prepared by the institute, and had never seen them. They must have been prepared after he left Tokyo in April 1942.

The purpose of the Liaison Conference was to promote understanding between the government and supreme command, and MUTO attended in the capacity of a secretary. His duties were to prepare and arrange for conference topics for discussions chosen by his superiors, and if necessary prepare explanatory notes or bring persons to explain. In the conference, when opinions were unanimous they were to sign the decisions, but the secretary had no capacity to do so. He attended the Imperial Conferences also in the capacity of secretary, and had even less business here than in connection with the Liaison Conference, and the secretary's duties were merely to distribute documents prepared by organs in charge.

He attended the Inquiry Commission Conference of the Privy Council as an explainer. Primarily, policy was to be explained by the minister. but if it went into details the explainer explained on the minister's behalf. As a matter of fact, MUTO never made an explanation there. He attended the above conferences automatically, without any special intent. If reasons were sought, the only one would be that he was Chief of the MAB.

* Exhibit 2243 was an excerpt from articles reporting MUTO's address in the Committee of Accounts of the Diet on 20 March 1940, but this was quite different from what he said. The Committee of Accounts consisted of ten members, and the Chief of the Accountant's Bureau customarily took charge of its explanation, but one of the members called for the minister's attendance. When informed he had just attended another committee, it was said it would be enough if the Chief of the MAB would attend in his stead, and for this reason he attended.

As HATAJI had delivered an eloquent address, MUTO replied. The prosecution had charged that his answer showed disapproval of political parties, denial of liberalism and insistence on totalitarianism. As could be seen from the shorthand records of proceedings, (Exhibit 3440), political parties, officials, and * professional officers should go shoulder to shoulder to tide over the national crisis. Instead of opposing them, he earnestly hoped for political parties' sound development.

HATAJI had said they should adopt totalitarianism, but MUTO replied that while totalitarianism prevailed over Europe, the Japanese should be based on the idea of national polity proper to the country. He stated that the principle of Japanese national constitution or national polity as principle held good in Japan.

33101 In regard to the denial of liberalism, MUTO had replied that inasmuch as erroneous liberalism based on selfish individualism should be done away with when the nation was confronted with a crisis, they should strive not for their own interests as much as for the country's advantage. Though HAMAJI had bluntly criticized officials of the military and political parties, MUTO had replied * that the army wished them to speak out whatever fault the army might have. HAMAJI expressed gratitude, stating he was delighted to find these plain opinions on the army's part.

33102 Under the War Minister's instruction, MUTO engaged himself on routine work in the Japanese-U. S. negotiations. He deemed it necessary to lead the negotiations to a successful conclusion, for he never thought the Japanese, who had been called upon to lighten their belts ever since the Manchurian Incident, were anything but fed up with the China Incident. Japan was impatient for a speedy winding up of the Incident, but to their regret found the assistance given by the U. S. and Britain to the Chungking regime prevented them from doing so. If matters were left to take their own course, she had no other way but to be faced with a grave crisis. If the negotiations should be successfully concluded, relations with Britain and the U. S. * would not only be adjusted, but still better the China Incident would come to a settlement.

The possibility of successful conclusion of negotiations changed for better or worse, but they cherished a gleam of hope until the end of November 1941. The army's opinion regarding the negotiations was framed by mutual agreement between the War Minister and Chief of Staff, and the decision was not solely the former's, because of the peculiarity of army structure. When the army disclosed its views on foreign policies, it did so from the angle of national defense and military tactics. The General Staff studied and made plans on the basis of information collected by them, but the War Minister, having no such intelligence organs, made arguments chiefly from the angles of home politics, budget, and materials. Only when the views of both were in agreement was the opinion regarded as the army's foreign policy.

33103 Concerning problems during the course of the negotiations, the General Staff and War Minister often * disagreed. Liaison between the War Ministry and Foreign Office was through the Chief of the KAB and the Chief of the American Section of the Foreign Office. On that occasion, if the War Ministry's opinion was at divergence with that of the Foreign Office and Naval Ministry, they

Page studied the opinion of the army again from the beginning. Not a few times MUTO made concessions at conference with the Naval Ministry and Foreign Office. Especially, about August 1941, when Japan made concessions to America, MUTO thought he made them. War Minister TOJO never reprimanded him for these compromises, but did on other matters, and the General Staff protested to MUTO. Not rarely he was summoned to the General Staff and required to explain. During the reverses and vicissitudes of the U. S.-Japan negotiations, public opinion became strong, and some, including himself, were in danger of assassination, and he was given a special military guard.

33104 * On 12 October 1941, at KONOYE's residence in Ogikubo, a discussion was held concerning the prospect of the Japan-American Conference by the Premier, War, Navy, and Foreign Minister, etc. When the problem was again discussed at the Cabinet Conference on 14 October, TOJO contended he would make no concessions concerning the problem of military occupation of China in the conference, and the decision of September 6 could not be altered. This caused a collision between TOJO, KONOYE, and Foreign Minister TOYODA, and the resignation of the Cabinet was said to be probable. MUTO also learned that Navy Minister OIKAWA expressed his desire to leave all matters in the Premier's hands.

MUTO queried the General Staff as to OIKAWA's proposal of leaving matters in the Premier's hands and if this might be interpreted as the Naval Ministry's evasion of opening hostilities, having altered the September 6 decision. Whether the army should also have to alter its attitude, considering the part to be played by 33105 * the navy in the war against America, the General Staff's answer was that it would not change its attitude, as the Naval Staff was not inclined to change the September 6 decision.

At this, MUTO guessed the issue was the divergence of opinion between the Government and the Supreme Command, and thus the question would remain unsettled even if the KONOYE Cabinet resigned. KONOYE should assume the responsibility of solving the problem rather than resigning, and to this end it was necessary for OIKAWA to disclose his real intention. Thus, TOJO would be able to obtain the General Staff's understanding. MUTO called on Chief Secretary TOMITA on the 14th and desired his tactful handling of the matter, but the attempt to get the Navy to express their wish against war proved unsuccessful. This was reported to TOJO immediately.

* According to the testimony of TANAKA, Shinichi, the operations plan mapped out by the General Staff could not be determined without the War Minister's consent. This was really not so, but the operations plan was the most important duty of the General Staff, and the War Minister could not interfere. If the War Minister could not guarantee the execution of their request to provide personnel, materials, and money for the plan, the General Staff made new plans so the War Minister could give his assurance. The operations plan was naturally apt to be idealistic, and it was usual that the personnel and materials required should be so big that the War Minister could not meet them.

TANAKA, Shinichi, testified that the War and Vice-Minister and Bureau Directors signed the Chief of Staff's order to the front line units to be prepared for war. The Chief of Staff had the authority to give the order, but * from the viewpoint of diplomacy and supply, it was necessary to inform the War Ministry. To speed up procedure, it was the rule to send a draft of telegram to the Ministry to obtain signatures, but whether the signature and seal of the Chief of the MAB was on it was of no decisive meaning.

The Conference of Bureau Directors was a meeting at which each reported to the Minister and Vice Minister the state of business. To get the Minister's sanction, it was the general rule that a Bureau Director should first obtain the Vice-Minister's approval and then present the matters to the Minister, but there were some cases where the Minister orally passed decision at the conference and documents were submitted afterwards for formal sanction.

* After August, 1941, MUTO sometimes reported the progress of Japanese-American negotiations at the conference, but only reported what was determined in the Liaison or Imperial Conference, and never stated his own opinion. TANAKA, Ryukichi, testified that at the Directors' Conference about 29 November 1941, MUTO expressed his opinion about the interruption of the negotiations after the receipt of the Hull note of 26 November, but MUTO denied it absolutely.

TANAKA had testified that the control of the press was a function of the Information Section of the MAB, but this was incorrect. This section belonged to Imperial Headquarters, and the MAB merely took charge of editing the Army weekly and supervising pamphlets.

Page The Information Section was created after Imperial Headquarters was established in December 1937, and was made to belong to the latter and not under the Chief of the MAB. In the War Ministry, however, a reduced Intelligence Division was still left. The fact that the Information * Section of Imperial Headquarters and the Intelligence Division of the War Ministry were located in the War Ministry Building perhaps misled TANAKA. Soon after the Second KONOYE Cabinet was organized, censorship relating to the army came to be administered in the Cabinet Bureau of Intelligence. Announcement of the war situation and enemy propaganda were functions of the Information Section of Imperial Headquarters.

The Chief of the latter section was not controlled by the Chief of the MAB, but was under the Chief of the MAB as to editing their army weekly, compiling pamphlets, and explaining current topics for military education.

33110 * Former Chief of the Military Service Bureau, TANAKA, Ryukichi, had testified that when MUTO sat with him at a luncheon he talked with him about international problems, but at such a meeting the accused was never inclined to take up a serious question; much less did he say that Japan, under the Tripartite Alliance, must establish a new order in East Asia in concert with the attempt of Germany and Italy to build up a new order in Europe. While TANAKA admitted he did not hear this from MUTO, he had testified that in the MAB there was a consistent view favoring the Tripartite Alliance since the ABE Cabinet. MUTO entirely denied this. It was in the middle of October 1939, at the time of the ABE Cabinet, when he became Chief of the MAB, and he learned then that at the time of the preceding HIRANUMA Cabinet, the army hoped for the conclusion * of the Tripartite Alliance, and made an effort to materialize it but failed, owing to the German-Soviet non-Aggression Pact. MUTO was one of those who felt at the time that Japan had been deceived by Germany, and Hitler and Mussolini could not be trusted.

33112 * His opinion regarding Germany and Italy was that their national strength was not so strong as propagated, and believed that once Hitler and Mussolini failed they would spoil the glory of Japan's national polity, and it was dangerous to conclude an alliance with them. War broke out between Britain and Germany in September, 1939. In the latter part of May 1940, Germany won the victory at Dunkirk, and it was generally believed among the Japanese that Germany would have final victory.

Some people again advocated the Tripartite Alliance, * but MUTO predicted the war would prove protracted and doubted Germany would win finally. For the German air force was not as sufficient as propagated, she could not cross the Strait, and her naval force was inferior to Britain's. The overwhelming superiority of Britain's navy, the calm attitude of the British, and Churchill's statement that the U. S. would help Britain, were factors in favor of the latter. MUTO concluded that in the long run HITLER would fail to conquer Britain.

* TANAKA, Ryukichi, testified that the resignation of the YONAI Cabinet was due to the accused HATA, the War Minister, offering a proposal regarding the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact, which TANAKA said was supported by the MAB, but it did not come to a unanimous agreement, and HATA resigned. This was wrong. There was no request during HATA's tenure that the government conclude the Alliance. The YONAI Cabinet's policy was not to intervene in the European war, and HATA supported it. Regarding HATA's resignation at that time, the General Staff was eager to settle the China Affair and proposed to have Germany intervene, and urged the War Minister to solidify the national structure. To these demands of the General Staff the YONAI Cabinet did not return any earnest response. KONOYE resigned as President of the Privy Council, and started a new party movement to improve internal affairs.

* The YONAI Cabinet became more unpopular with the public. For about ten days between the latter part of June, 1940, and the beginning of July, MUTO was away from the War Ministry, serving on a reception committee for the Manchukuo Emperor. When he returned to the War Ministry he saw official correspondence to the War Minister from the Chief of the General Staff, that a proper step should be taken to tide over the emergency. It was an expression of a very strong intention.

HATA was very anxious to solve this matter, but it did not go as expected and he was placed in a delicate position between the General Staff and the Government, and was obliged to resign. This was not at all due to disagreement regarding the Tripartite Alliance, as far as MUTO knew.

Interviews with foreign military attaches was a duty of the MAB, and MUTO frequently received calls from them. Exhibit 523, he supposed, was what he talked about when he received a call from the German attache. The date showed it was in the latter part of June, 1940, the time

Page when there was an opinion that Japan should ask Germany to intervene in settling the China Affair, so he assumed the talk must have referred to that matter. The words "Japan has interests in FIC problems" appearing in the exhibit probably concerned the fact that both Japan and France had a mutual understanding regarding a ban on transportation of materials to the Chungking Regime and that the Inspection Corps under NISHIHARA started for FIC. This was not MUTO's personal opinion, but a description of what was then going on.

33117 When TOJO entered the KONOYE Cabinet as Premier, the army felt that the main object of diplomacy should be settling the China Affair. As for other problems, elastic constructive diplomacy should be carried on to attain that object, as was shown in the political program of the KONOYE Cabinet. * The diplomatic policy was not so limited as to require concluding the Tripartite Alliance. The fact that the alliance was rapidly concluded in September, shortly after the KONOYE Cabinet had been formed, was due to Foreign Minister MATSUOKA's taking such an active part. MATSUOKA carried out a drastic reform in his ministry without giving ear to any other's opinion, and it was due to his sole activity that the alliance was rapidly concluded.

33118 MUTO had no knowledge of the Pact's significance until he heard the Chief of the Treaty Bureau explain the Pact's text. In this court he first learned that he had been suggested for an order by Ambassador Ott because he endeavored for good relations with Germany. The telegram from Ott regarding the decoration was in mid-May, 1942, after he had left the position as Chief of the MAB. According to international usage, this kind of affair was * practiced by a mutual exchange of proposals. Germany, he believed, was informed of his name by the War Ministry, because he at the time was Chief of the MAB. He had never seen the decoration.

From October 1939 to April 1942 he was Chief of the MAB. From July 1940 to April 1942 he was under War Minister TOJO. In response to a prosecution inquiry, he was interpreted as if he had answered that TOJO came to his office to seek his opinion, but this was a misinterpretation, for a minister never came to a director's office. MUTO could express his opinion to TOJO as War Minister, but not in his capacity as Premier. As far as the function of Premier was concerned, TOJO adopted no opinion of the War Ministry staff.

The prosecution seemed to contend that in case of disagreeing with the War Minister, MUTO could resign his * position, but this was prohibited, and only in case of illness were the Japanese military permitted to do so. TANAKA, Ryukichi, testified that he knew someone who had resigned as Chief of the MAB for such a reason, but MUTO did not know whom he referred to. There was an instance in which someone did not follow the War Minister's order and the authorities transferred him. This was the worst instance, and as a matter of discipline it was not to be excused. As for transfer, while MUTO was Chief of the MAB, soon after TOJO became War Minister, MUTO frequently asked the Chief of the Personnel Bureau to transfer him. After the TOJO Cabinet was formed, he expressed his desire for transfer at a meeting attended by the War Minister, Vice-Minister, and Chief of the Personnel Bureau, but every time it was not adopted.

* TANAKA, Ryukichi, had spoken of MUTO as a statesman, but this was sarcasm. TANAKA had once rebuked him, saying he was too business-like. His personal history showed he had never made a study of politics or diplomacy and had no experience in those affairs until he became Chief of the MAB. After receiving this position, as a matter of duty he studied these problems. His views were sometimes adopted by the Minister and sometimes not.

TANAKA testified that TOJO had scarcely any sense of politics and diplomacy and no experience, so he adopted MUTO's opinions. This was contrary to the fact. TANAKA had once been Chief of the Military Intelligence Organ in China, and over-estimated his experience in politics and diplomacy, and MUTO was disgusted to hear him speaking from such a viewpoint of TOJO, for he was quite wrong in his criticism of him. Needless to say, TOJO, being a military man, had no political experience, but he was a hard worker and studied anything concerning politics and formed his opinion about it. He was not a person who would blindly obey an opinion of MUTO's. This could be seen from the fact that for more than two years after MUTO was transferred, TOJO steered through difficult positions as Premier. It was at the busiest time after the outbreak of the war that MUTO was transferred.

33121 * TANAKA also testified that he was opposed to the political intervention of military men, especially of the MAB. He added this was prohibited by constitution. TANAKA was wrong that it was prescribed in the constitution, for there was no such provision. The legal basis was that military men in active service had no franchise; military criminal law restricted freedom of political speech and association; the imperial rescript of 1882 admonishes that military men should perform their duties without intervening in politics.

33122 * However the war minister could and must take part in politics because he could attend the cabinet conference as a state minister, however the war minister must carry out the decisions of the cabinet and it was necessary to have political machinery. The MAB was this machinery and its function was to carry out political affairs but not in politics itself. If the bureau were not allowed to carry them out, the war minister as a politician would be functionless. The organization of the war ministry (exhibit 74) indicates clearly that liaison with the Diet was a duty of the military affairs section of the MAB.

33123 On this point, chief of the military service bureau TANAKA never protested to MUTO and MUTO was quite surprised to hear him make this self-righteous statement * for MUTO remembered him making speeches and taking actions regarding politics which did not belong to his duties, and MUTO had to advise him to abstain, but this advice was given in vain and soon after a rumour prevailed that MUTO and TANAKA had had a quarrel. It was true that in 1941 MUTO objected to TANAKA attending a Diet session as a government commissioner, for in the war ministry explanations and replies in the Diet were prepared beforehand and approved by the war minister so there might not be any inconsistency or misunderstanding.

This was the same in every ministry but TANAKA made a bold utterance of his own accord and the MAB was annoyed by facing a protest from other ministries and the general staff.

33124 On 8 December 1941 when the war broke out, TOJO * delivered an address to the war ministry staff. Just before the address TANAKA told MUTO that with this war TOJO had become a hero. MUTO replied that if Japan should be defeated her national polity would be changed and consequently, far from being called hero, TOJO might be blamed for high treason. MUTO remembered he regreted he told TANAKA that national deity might be changed if Japan was defeated. MUTO remembered that TOMINAGA, chief of the personnel bureau, told him what a man TANAKA, to say that TOJO would become a hero, and TOMINAGA said he accused TANAKA of his imprudence. TANAKA had testified that MUTO had stated this and MUTO could not understand his motive. TANAKA testified that about 9 December 1941, when MUTO talked with bureau chiefs at a luncheon about the progress of negotiations with America, MUTO said that KURUSU's 33125 visit to America * and the sending of the Tatsuta Maru had been a sort of camouflage. MUTO said that he absolutely had not said that.

As for the visit of KURUSU to America, MUTO had heard it suggested as a sincere step taken by TOGO, at NOMURA's request and had been decided after consultation with TOJO. MUTO had no connection with sending the Tatsuta Maru. After the war broke out there were mysterious stories and he believed matters regarding KURUSU and the Tatsuta Maru might have been among them.

Exhibit 2240 indicated that MUTO answered he had made a draft of the imperial rescript regarding the declaration of war together with the accused HOSHINO, chief secretary, and the accused OKA, chief of the naval affairs bureau, but this was a mistake. MUTO and OKA only offered reference material 33126 for the rescript * to HOSHINO. A rescript was prepared in the cabinet, which made a draft of it.

In the government, the general control of POWs was under the war minister's charge, and collateral matters, such as the mail service, etc., were under the charge of the ministers concerned. This did not mean that POWs were under the war ministter as soon as they were delivered to the army. First, the army or navy commander who took the POWs at the front examined them, made a list of them, and reported to headquarters which would report to the war minister, who would indicate the location and capacity of the proper camp. Headquarters would arrange for their transport to this camp and when this was completed, they would be under the war minister's charge for the first time.

In previous wars the war minister had the POW inter-33127 ligence bureau and the POW * camps as organs for controlling them. In the last war, however, the POW administration department was organized. Because, while in previous wars the business concerning POWs was comparatively simple, in the Pacific

Page 33128 war it became complicated. * The organization of the POW intelligence bureau and the POW camp ordinance were promulgated toward the end of December, 1941, but the POW control department was established by the war minister's order toward the end of March, 1942. These regulations were drawn up by the MAB, to which the accused was attached. However, the order establishing the control department was issued during the absence of MUTO and he was informed of it later. When he left the MAB as director in April, 1942, no plan for taking POWs had yet been laid because there was no authentic report from headquarters.

33129 The questions whether it was right to transport POWs taken in the tropics to the north in a cold season; whether there were suitable buildings, etc., were being investigated and were not decided. At Shanghai and Zenzuji camps were urgently set up, as POWs taken by the navy were transported by boats. As for POW labor, no study had * been made at the time. He had no recollection of any protest regarding the treatment of POWs from any foreign countries during his tenure as director.

. Exhibit 2246 stated there were explanations of the international situation at the informal meeting of the war councillors in July, 1941. But MUTO was absent from the meeting because of illness. He had never read the report of investigation made by the provost marshal concerning the air men who made the raid on Japan on 18 April 1942 (exhibit 2245). At that time he was no longer chief of the MAB, also not in Tokyo, and it was impossible for him to read the report.

Regarding exhibit 2247, MUTO was in Sumatra when the ceremony of awarding decorations was held in the German Embassy on 1 October 1942, and he never received decorations from the German Ambassador.

33130 Exhibit 476 included a secret diary of imperial headquarters concerning the Singapore incident from February to March, 1942, but he had never seen it. * An attendant of the war minister was not given a seat at imperial headquarters, nor was the secret diary to be seen by an intendant. Regarding the treatment of war representatives in China, the prosecution produced his interrogation as evidence and the contents were true.

In October, 1939, when he took charge as director of the MAB, it was two years and three months after the outbreak of hostilities with China. During this time, captives were not treated as POWs. Even the POW intelligence bureau was not in existence. The Chinese operated on the same basis as the Page Japanese did in regard to captives. Even after that time Japan never declared war and the treatment of captives was carried on as before. Accordingly they were never within the jurisdiction of the war minister and the director of the MAB had nothing to do with them, and MUTO was never ordered to make a study of this matter.

33131 * He was ordered by the war minister to go to the southern area of operations to observe affairs there for three weeks from about 20 March 1942. He returned on 12 April and when he arrived at the war ministry, director of personnel TOMINAGA told him that he was transferred to the command of the imperial guard division at Sumatra. He was actually appointed to this post on 20 April and until the date of his departure did no work as director of the MAB. He arrived at Medan on 11 May and in thirty years as a soldier this is the first time he ever had a responsible post and this period ended when he was relieved in 1944.

33132 His duty in Sumatra was to take charge of the the defense of northern Sumatra in accordance with the 25th army commander's orders. MUTO took command of the guard division of which one infantry division, among three, had been * detached in Malaya as under the command of the 25th army commander. As regards the military administration in the district, the organ under the direct control of the commander at every province of Sumatra was in charge of it. Between military administration and defense a clear line was drawn. As for the control of the POWs and internees, it had been handed over to the commander when he arrived and was under the charge of an officer dispatched by the commander. Ordinary enemy aliens were interned by the military administration and it was no part of MUTO's duty to superintend affairs concerning POWs and internees.

The growing activity of British forces on the Indian Ocean reduced the area of his defense after April, 1943, into Patanori, East Coast, and Achie Provinces in the northern end of Sumatra and afterwards into Achie and East Coast Provinces from the beginning of 1944.

33133 While he was in office in Sumatra, there were no hostilities and no POWs taken. He never employed them for labor. Within his area, however, * there were many forces beyond his command and certain corps among them were employing POWs. It was not MUTO's duty to defend the camps of either POWs or internees. As for trouble with natives, although he received reports on the punishment of soldiers, all these related to cases inside the army and he learned only one case having anything to do with natives. After arriving at his post, MUTO ordered everyone to put a mark on the left breast so the natives could recognize anyone of the guard division. Even with such identification he heard of no complaint from the military administration or the natives about his division.

33134 * Having been appointed chief of staff of the 14th area army, MUTO left Medan for the Philippines on 12 October 1944, and arrived at Port McKinley the night of 20 October 1944. As regards conditions in the Philippines at that time, the U.S. army landed at Leyte on 18 October before YAMASHITA, who had arrived in early October, became well acquainted with the state of the islands. The 16th division defending the island was routed at a stroke, and reported nothing about the situation and the whole Philippine Islands were plunged into chaos. The alleged atrocities during this time in the Philippines occurred in this chaotic situation.

33135 YAMASHITA's duty was to defend the Philippines in accordance with C-in-C TERAUCHI's command. For that purpose, expecting the United States to invade the Southern Philippines, he was to make preparations for decisive battles * and cooperate with air and naval forces in carrying out operations. TERAUCHI was then at Manila and later removed to Saigon on 17 November 1944.

33136 This duty of YAMASHITA was suddenly altered, due to the order from Southern General Army Headquarters given about 12 or 13 which said the 14th area army shall destroy the enemy invading Leyte Island with the maximum strength of the army forces, in cooperation with the naval and air forces. Up to that time the operation plan was that if the United States invaded the southern Philippines only the 35th army should participate in the battles to be fought by the army and air forces. As nothing had been prepared for transporting army forces from Luzon Island, they hastily set to arrangements. After the air and naval forces were frustrated in the battles about October 24 or 25, command of the air and sea in the Southern Philippines fell to the enemy. * No more than 50,000 men were sent about seven times up to early December, most of their ships were sunk. Thus, early in December YAMASHITA could only acknowledge that for all his efforts he had completely failed in the battle of Leyte.

33137 * As for the Luzon campaign, alterations were also made as to YAMASHITA's duty, the later operations having called for Luzon forces, emptied the latter island of its defence and completely spoiled the defence plan. Reinforcements were sent from Japan, but one-half or one-third was

Page lost to enemy action, and barely the remnants arrived. They had no maneuvering power and TERAUCHI ordered YAMASHITA to evade decisive battles and assume the defensive. Thereupon YAMASHITA decided on evading decisive battle in the plan to restrict the enemy to Luzon as long as possible, taking advantage of mountainous regions and delaying the attack against Japan proper.

33138 He took steps to establish three main positions in the mountainous regions east of Manila, in the mountains west of Clark Field, and in the mountainous region in the vicinity of Baguio and Paletapas. As to Manila City, they were to disable the harbour * facilities and carry munitions out of the city and then declare the city open. They were to defend against the landing of the United States army by disposing a unit in the vicinity of Apari in northern Luzon, and to detach one unit to the Batangas Peninsula to delay the U.S. army's rush toward the Manila district. It was just after the U.S. force landed at San Jose in Mindoro Island on 15 December that this plan was shown.

The U.S. 6th army landed at Lingayen Bay on 9 January 1945, followed by the 8th army, which landed on the southern part of Luzon. At one time the Japanese army had not completed their disposition. The United States landing contrasted with the Japanese expectation and the cooperation of the air, naval, and army forces were complete and their army on Luzon displayed great power of maneuver and power.

33139 * The Japanese forces found their command system instantly destroyed and were made to fight independently, but YAMASHITA was defeated after all. The communication functions of the army in the Philippine campaign were extremely poor. Communications with the southern Philippines' commander, SUZUKI, Sosaku, became of the worst after the United States landed on Leyte. After the U.S. occupied Ormoc in early December, communication was interrupted except for occasional short dispatches.

33140 Traffic between YAMASHITA's headquarters at Baguio and YOKOYAMA's headquarters east of Manila was suspended about 13 January after the United States landing at Lingayen. Wireless was barely available until about May or June and no telegram, other than really * important ones for operations was dispatched. As for communication between YAMASHITA's headquarters and headquarters west of Clark Field, wireless and land traffic was interrupted and knowledge of the state of the district became uncertain. Communication with forces in the vicinity of Paletapas was also inadequate due to the breakdown of instruments.

Page Communication breakdowns were due to the fact that equipment was originally inferior to that of the United States and many instruments had been soaked in the sea. In addition, most persistent bombarding by the U.S. destroyed the instruments and under these circumstances YAMASHITA's commanding organizations were destroyed. * YAMASHITA never ordered Manila to be defended to the last. As his chief of staff, MUTO was well acquainted with YAMASHITA's intention for he was always with him except when MUTO went to the front, and even then he saw YAMASHITA's orders later.

MUTO once studied on YAMASHITA's order on how to make Manila open. Realizing, however, that the matter was beyond the scope of YAMASHITA's authority and could not be put into practice, he was at last resolved to place Manila outside the battlefield. However, hostilities and violent accidents broke out practically within the city and on 3 January 1945, YAMASHITA ordered YOKOYAMA 8th division commander to take command of the forces in the vicinity of Manila and, in order to command operations in the district of Lingayen Bay, removed to Baguio.

On January 5 the commander of the naval forces moved there also, after investing YOKOYAMA with command over naval forces in the * Manila vicinity concerning land fighting alone. About February 10, YAMASHITA informed of hostilities being continued within Manila, urged YOKOYAMA to withdraw immediately into the mountains east. However, rear admiral IWABUCHI, supreme commander of the forces in Manila, did not observe this.

There were many guerrilla forces in the Philippines, and it was reported, after the termination of the war, that they amounted to some 500,000. There were so many that every native seemed to be a guerrilla after the U.S. landing. About November, 1944, YAMASHITA ordered his men to attack armed guerrillas in view of the increased activity. However, by no means * ordered any guerrilla or any collaborator to be sentenced to death without trial. The staff, including YAMASHITA, were utterly ignorant at the time that, about February or March of 1945, residents were ordered in the Batangas district.

YAMASHITA received no report on this or other atrocities in the Philippines. There was only one case of violence in April, 1945, and Tokyo's order, YAMASHITA ordered YOKOYAMA to investigate it but this was not successful owing to the total destruction of Japanese forces in Manila the end of February.

Page

33144 * POWs and internees in the Philippines were under YAMASHITA's control when MUTO arrived at his post there. Specifically speaking, however, the chief of the POW camp at Manila was dealing with them under the command of the assistant commissary general and no significant alternation was made after MUTO arrived at his post. The food ration, after being inquired into by the chief of the paymaster's department, assistant commissary general, etc., was successively decreased to that for Japanese troops and the ration was reduced from 400 to 300 grams toward the middle of November.

33145 The reason was that the Philippines had imported rice from FIC and Siam even in ordinary times, importation became difficult since United States submarines suspended the * traffic on the China Sea. 10,000 tons came in early November, but one-third was used for the Leyte operations. The reserved rice was released in early December and arrivals after then were only 1,800 tons. To cope with the food situation, they purchased rice in the Central Philippines in cooperation with the Philippine government. One reason YAMASHITA disposed of the main force to Northern Luzon was that the Kagan Valley had overproduced rice. However, only a part of this plan was put into practice after the United States landed, and consequently they could not use the rice accumulated.

The said order for transporting the POW was issued prior to his arrival, and he heard they were made to gather at Manila. As the ships were appointed about December 12 or 13, the assistant commissary general and the chief of the POW camp let them take ships in accordance with order already received, so it did not come to MUTO's knowledge. On being informed of the Oryoku Maru's accident, YAMASHITA ordered the chief of the POW camp to rescue them. MUTO cooperated with the latter by YAMASHITA's order as to arrangement for transportation, food, etc. The U.S. army had landed near Manila and YAMASHITA was very busy but nevertheless did his best.

33147 * In laying the plan for Luzon operations, consideration was given to the question of how to deal with POWs. YAMASHITA decided on liberating the POWs and internees through the state representing Japan's rights and interests, in case the United States landed on Luzon and reported to TERAUCHI to that effect. But TERAUCHI advised it was too early yet to do so. However, the previous regulation of the commander was that POWs might be released if the war situation necessitated it. It was considered practically impossible to remove prisoners and internees into the mountains. Therefore YAMASHITA decided to put it into practice and about mid December ordered the chief of POW camp to that effect, and he immediately made preparations for releasing internees of Baguio and Port McKinley camps.

33149 * For the sake of obtaining information of the enemy they decided they desired to take POWs during hostilities but this proved too difficult in defensive fighting. In accordance with headquarters command, MUTO surrendered together with YAMASHITA on 3 September 1945. YAMASHITA at no time released command of the army nor was he ever absent during the Philippine operations from duty. MUTO was always with him and heard any report with him and was fully acquainted with YAMASHITA's intentions. *YAMASHITA never issued orders against international law nor against humanity, nor permitted nor connived at the misconduct of his subordinates when he knew of them. YAMASHITA, under difficult conditions, took all possible precautions to prevent atrocities.

33150 MUTO attended the trial of YAMASHITA as a witness and was often examined as a war criminal suspect. Toward the end of March, 1946, he was told that he was clear of the crime and told to the same effect by a member of the war crimes' investigation committee.

33152 office. *The document was prepared on decisions * reached at the imperial conference of 5 November 1941 when the so-called A and B plans were decided upon. The document was prepared on this decision and had in view, following the conclusion of negotiations, that it was still necessary to go into detailed discussions. With this in mind, it was drawn up by the general staff.

33153 Asked if he knew why the language in the document was strong, he replied that at that time the general staff was opposed to the adoption of the A or B plans. They were especially opposed to the B plan. With regard to the drafting of the B plan, MUTO expressed his views to the chief of staff and succeeded in having him agree to the views of MUTO. In view of this, the general staff were not only opposed to the A and B plans but also strongly opposed to MUTO himself, and a very strong argument developed * on it. In view of this atmosphere, the general staff agreed to the plans and submitted an additional plan saying it would be carried out.

33154 * After sending the document to YAMAMOTO, he remembered later YAMAMOTO called him and said it was an insensible document and asked the reason for it in an admonishing manner. MUTO told him that as long as it was the general staff plan, he wanted to show it to him, but would do everything to have it revised and MUTO should not place too much importance in it. The document was left as it was, but was abandoned and officers representing the army foreign office, navy, and planning board studied the question and the results were submitted to the liason conference. Accordingly the document

33155 was not seen by the war minister. *The original plan received from headquarters was destroyed and abandoned.

33156 The accused stated it was correct that he attended the liason conferences held the latter part of 1941, and listened to matters discussed there attentively but had forgotten many things. Asked if he had at any time at any liason conference ever heard any navy member advocating an attack on the United States without notice beforehand, he replied he did not remember that at all. This was an important matter and if it occurred he thought he would remember it. Asked if testimony was given that chief of the naval general staff ITO, at a liason conference on 2 December 1941, if 33158 The accused stated that during the TOJO cabinet, chief secretary HOSHINO attended all the liason conferences which he attended as a secretary. * While MUTO was negotiating with YAMAMOTO at those liason conferences on the question of the Japanese-American negotiations, HOSHINO did not join in the discussions. HOSHINO did not have the authority either to participate in the discussions or sign any such documents for he had no such power as a conference secretary.

The accused stated he was director of the MAB when TOJO became premier. Reminded that TANAKA testified that certain members of the MUTO staff were active on behalf of TOJO becoming premier, the accused was asked if anyone within the MAB ever discussed with him the possibility of TOJO becoming premier and he replied absolutely not nor was it suggested by anyone in the war ministry. His becoming premier came as a complete surprise to them and at first they did not believe it. (Attention of the tribunal was called to T. 15,872.)

33160 * The accused stated he was director of the MAB at the time the POW information bureau was set up at the end of December, 1941. Regarding the purpose for its establishment, there was a provision that immediately following the outbreak of hostilities, according to international treaties, such an organ should be set up and its duties were clearly stipulated.

33162 * MUTO stated he did not read the document. The attention of the accused was called to another paragraph of that affidavit in which TANAKA said that he believed the accused SATO prepared the document or that it was prepared under his direction. Asked if SATO ever discussed this document with him on any matter relating to its drawing up, he replied no, there was no such occasion.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. HOZUMI
Counsel for KIDO

33163 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated MUTO called on chief cabinet secretary TOMITA on 14 October 1941 telling him his views in regard to the navy attitude toward the waging of war. Asked to give in detail the contents of the conversation, the accused replied that he could not tell exactly word for word what he said but the general purpose was * that although the navy agreed to the decisions reached at the 6 September conference, at present it seemed that although the navy attitude on the surface was not necessarily opposed to the decision of the 6 September conference, they were not in agreement with it.

As the navy did not want war, the army would have to change its attitude. But the navy took the view, without making it clear, that their attitude was they would leave matters in the hands of the premier. In such a case it would be impossible for the war minister to surpress those advocating a strong policy within the ministry, and so MUTO asked the chief secretary to use his good offices or do what he could to get the navy to clarify its attitude for then the war minister would be able to restrain the extremist elements in the war ministry and the general staff.

33164 * He made this proposal to TOMITA confident that if the navy did take a different attitude against war, he would be able to restrain the army. In a war in the Pacific, the navy would have to play the dominate roll, no matter how strong an attitude the army took, the army would be powerless unless the navy agreed. Asked if he knew the reasons why TOJO, at the cabinet meeting 14 October 1941 strongly advocated the 6 September decision be carried out, he replied that before this

33167 * Asked if TOJO seemed to know beforehand he was being called to the palace to form a new cabinet, the accused replied that TOJO did not even dream this. - 33173 The accused stated that the Lt. Gen. TATSUMI, mentioned in his affidavit, was a military attache to the Embassy in London, serving under Ambassador SHIGEMITSU. Asked if he had a talk with SHIGEMITSU after his return in Aug. 1941, * the accused replied he remembered talking with SHIGEMITSU at the end of August or early September. He did not recall the talk in detail but its gist was that SHIGEMITSU, speaking of conditions in Britain following the British defeat at Dunkirk, said the British were extremely stubborn and there was no likelihood of Britain's losing the war or the collapse of the British Empire. SHIGEMITSU said it was extremely likely that the U.S. would seriously assist Britain and no one must fail to take into consideration the great national strength of America.

Council for TOGO

- 33175 Asked what report he first heard at the Liaison Conference about the time of the delivery of the last Japanese note to the U.S., the accused replied he thought it was at the Conference of 4 Dec. that he heard that the time of delivery of the last note to the U.S. was to be 12:30. He thought this report was made by Vice Chief of the Naval General Staff ITO. * It was not reported how that time had been decided upon. Asked if the question of the time of delivery of the last note was again raised in the Liaison Conference, he replied that perhaps a day or two later he heard a report from ITO and TOGO that the time of delivery had been changed to 1:00 pm at the Liaison Conference. He thought the original report of this fact was made by ITO. The hours referred to were on 7 Dec. Washington time.

33176 The accused was asked if after the decision had been made in the Liaison Conference that the final note should be delivered before the commencement of hostilities, if there was any request or any statement of its position made by the Naval General Staff in regard to the time of serving the final note, MUTO replied that he thought ITO was talking to Foreign Minister TOGO * but didn't know the particulars. He didn't remember the details of what ITO said but what remained in his mind was the Navy's desire to harmonize the time of delivery and naval action. Asked what he meant by the word "harmonize", he replied that in opening hostilities, there must be close coordination between diplomacy and operations, and he used the term in the sense of coordination.

The accused remembered that ITO said something to the effect that the Naval General Staff desired that the note should be delivered as late as possible.

* The accused stated that he had a meeting with TOGO on New Years Day 1942 to pay him New Years Greetings. After the exchange of greetings, the talk turned upon subjects connected with the war and MUTO told him that on that New Years Day the people appeared extremely light hearted and there prevailed an atmosphere of victory which was a dangerous condition. MUTO added that the future of the war was serious and difficult and that something should be done to bring about its early termination and requested TOGO to make plans * which would bring about the earliest possible termination. * TOGO completely agreed and assured MUTO he would do everything in his power to do so, and this was all of the conversation on the subject of ending the war. Asked by the Tribunal if he took any part as a member from Japan in the Italy-Germany-Japan Joint Commission of Experts, he replied he received an appointment as a member but never participated in the meetings.

The accused reiterated that his intervention in Liaison Conferences was merely clerical and that his intervention in Imperial Conferences was nothing more than as distributor of copies of documents to those attending. When he was distributor of copies between Oct. 1939 to Oct. 1941, he was a Major General and he was still distributing copies after the latter date when he had the rank of Lt. General, which was the second highest rank that the Army could bestow to any military man in Japan.

Page Conferences. Vice-Admiral was the second highest rank in the Navy. Asked if on Nov. 13, 1940 he attended an Imperial Conference, he replied he had no recollection of attending an Imperial Conference in 1940, although he recalled attending them * in 1941.

33184 * if he would affirm definitely that he never attended the Conference on Nov. 13, 1940, notwithstanding that he had been shown the document, he replied that his recollection was that he began attending the conferences in 1941. The document referring to some conference in Nov. 1940 did not even mention what was discussed at the conference. He had no recollection of attending it and the document alone was not sufficient to help him recall his memory granted that he did attend the meeting. As far as his recollection was concerned, he could not place any trust or reliability in the document.

33187 * Asked if it would refresh his memory if it were recalled to him that with respect to this meeting it was the Cabinet which asked that he be allowed to attend, he replied it did not refresh

33188 his recollection. * Asked if it would refresh his memory if he were reminded that after great discussion between Lord Keeper EIKI, the Grand-Chamberlain and Vice Grand-Chamberlain, it was finally decided that he should be invited on the principle that the Imperial Conference should consist of those bearing responsibility for giving advice to the Emperor, he replied he had never heard of that.

Asked if it refreshed his memory to recall to him that at the beginning, those in the Palace were reluctant to invite him because they feared the Conference might be too balky, he replied it did not refresh his memory at all. It appeared that these were discussions going on within the Palace which had never come to his knowledge.

33189 * Asked if on 6 Sept. 1941 he met with the accused OKA at the Premier's official residence, he replied he did not recall but he thought he might have seen him. Asked if he didn't frequently meet with OKA there, he replied if there was any business, there were many occasions when they met there more or less coincidentally but there was no case of meeting OKA at the Premier's official residence deliberately. When it was suggested to the accused that on 6 Sept. 1941 he met with OKA there to discuss the basic terms of peace to be offered to China, he replied he had no recollection. If either OKA or himself had any business with each other

When shown a document, the accused was asked if it helped his recollection of any meeting with OKA and he replied he thought it was a misapprehension due to a mistranslation.

33191 By "Minister's official residence" * was meant the Foreign Minister's official residence, at which place a meeting was held among Foreign Ministry Bureau Chiefs, at which OKA and he were present. * He now recalled that he had a meeting at the Foreign 33192 Minister's residence with OKA. This was one of a number of conferences held there attended by OKA and himself with Foreign Ministry Bureau Chiefs and possibly the Foreign Vice Minister. He thought the document had authenticity.

33193 Exhibit 3456, the top secret document identified by the witness * concerning basic conditions for settling of Sino-Japanese peace, as discussed in a conference with the Directors of the Military and Naval Affairs Bureau, MUTO and OKA, held on 6 Sept. 1941, stated that the Chungking Government shall join in the Nanking Government. Admitting that the fundamental treaty concluded between Japan and the Nanking Government, the agreement attached and the Japan-Manchukuo-China joint declaration were based on these principles: (1) Joining of the Chiang regime with the Nanking Government; (2) Good neighborliness and intimate friendship; (3) Respect of sovereignty and territory; and (4) Joint defense (cooperation in maintenance of public peace, protection of rights and interests, and defense against common menace. For this purpose Japanese troops shall be stationed in Amoi and Hainan Island, as well as in certain districts of Mongolia-Sinkiang area, and North China.

Troops sent to China on account of the incident shall evacuate according to the Sino-Japanese agreement upon settlement of the Incident.

33194 Note: Economic activities of third countries, as far as they were based on fairness and justice, shall not be restricted.

(7) No annexation. (8) No reparations. (9) Recognition of Manchukuo.

The accused was asked if it was not a fact that the same conditions and terms were incorporated in a document handed to Ambassador Grew on 2 Sept. 1941 (Exhibit 1245 F). He replied he did not recall whether this was so, but they were notified to the U.S. during the course of the Japanese-American negotiations.

* Asked if it was not true that the basic terms discussed by himself and OKA, appearing in Exhibit 3456, contained maximum terms beyond which Japan never did go even in the last crucial moments of the negotiations in Washington, he replied that the plan in which OKA and MUTO participated with others was a plan representing the views of the War and Navy Ministries. After the plan was placed before the Liaison Conference and there adopted by unanimous vote, it became national policy. The Sept. 6 plan contained the basic terms, but later, during the TOJO Cabinet, were relaxed.

Asked if it was not true that the stationing of troops in China even after the peace settlement between China and Japan was insisted upon by Japan to the last * moment of the Japanese-U.S. negotiations, he replied that even after the consummation of the negotiations between Japan and China it was recognized that the stationing of troops would be necessary for a certain period for defense against communist activities. Asked if he insisted on stationing troops in Hainan Island after the peace settlement in order to contain communism, he replied he had no clear recollection but he believed it was recognized that in the case of Hainan Island the stationing of troops was not necessary, although he was not clear on that point.

The accused agreed that there was no threat to Japan of communism from Borneo, Sumatra or the Philippines, calling for the garrisoning of troops on Hainan Island.

* Asked if he was a member of the secret committee having liaison with the Five Ministers Conference having to do with China affairs, he replied he was at one time a councillor or secretary of the China Affairs Board but knew nothing about any secret committee liaising with the Five Ministers Conference.

* When shown a document he was asked if it reminded him of his office as member of the Liaison Committee, and he repeated that he was not a member. Asked if the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau was not the secretary of that secret committee of which he was a member, he replied it appeared that the Chief of the Military Affairs Section of the MAB was a member, but the committee existed in 1938 and was not in existence when he became Chief of the MAB and he knew nothing about it. He could neither deny nor affirm the authenticity of the document shown. He did not know * if under the duties of a member of the secret committee

Page something to do with increasing these forces, he replied that in response to a demand of the General Staff, he remembered the War Minister acting in connection with the increase in troop strength and in the transportation of necessary materials.

33200 * When shown a document he was asked if he recognized it as coming from his bureau, and he replied that it was a file of telegrams sent and received by the Foreign Office. He noted that the document had a top secret seal, was dated 11 July 1941, and that the words "Military Affairs Bureau" were written on it. Asked if the document was authentic, he replied he could not say on the basis of it alone. He had no recollection of the document but it appeared to be * a study made by some young officer in the MAB. The words "Military Affairs Bureau" had been written on it but it did not bear his seal nor that of anyone else and he was at a loss to say whether it passed through his bureau. * He could not say whether it was actually a document of the MAB. (Both this document and the preceding one were rejected.)

33203 * When shown another document, he identified it and it was received in evidence.

Exhibit 3459, the document so identified, read by and bearing the seals of Vice Minister KIMURA, Chief of Bureau MUTO, and Military Affairs Section Chief SATO, dated 20 Feb. 1942, from the Acting Secretary General of the China Affairs Board to Vice War Minister KIMURA, concerning the Round Table Conference to be held by Liaison Section Chiefs of the China Affairs Board, stated that in reference to the above conferences, they should be obliged if a competent officer of the War Ministry (desirably the Director or Chief Officer of the Liaison Committee) attend.

33205 * They should also appreciate it if Vice Minister KIMURA would arrange with the Chief of the Military Affairs Bureau, a member of the Liaison Committee, to attend one meeting on Mar. 5, to hear Liaison Section Chiefs report on the current situation, and the President and Vice President would speak. Furthermore, an officer was requested who could explain the outline of the progress of army operations in the Greater East Asia War to the Liaison Section Chiefs.

Asked if, in the face of this document, he still insisted he was not a member of the "secret Liaison Committee" of the China Affairs Board, he replied that the prosecutor had said "secret Liaison Committee." He was a member of the "Liaison Committee," and that was where his misapprehension arose. Asked if it was not the duty of that committee to act as the executive body to handle all affairs of China in accordance with the Five Ministers Conference, he answered that it was not.

* Reference was made to the affidavit of the accused in w.c. he stated that he never called foreign military attaches himself to come to his office. Asked if he called junior officers of the military attaches to his office, he replied that they never called them on their own part.

Asked if in Oct. 1941, he sent for a staff member of the U.S. Military Attache, then Major F.D. Merrill, he repeated his previous answer and added that when they wanted to see somebody in the office they would telephone and if they were conveniently disposed to see them they came. He would not change his testimony if Merrill would say he was invited to call. To the accused was quoted a purported statement to Merrill on 8 Oct. 1941, in which he said there was no longer any real hope of settling the problems between the two countries by talks between diplomats. The matter was for the armies to settle and it was possible to do this without fighting. Therefore, MUTO thought that Merrill should endeavor to report to his superiors that Japan had a good army. He did not care how Merrill criticized but he should be careful to say only the actual facts. If understanding was not reached, they would be fighting Japan in six weeks in Manila. Asked if he told Merrill that, the accused replied it was absolutely contrary. He had never met the U.S. military attache on 8 Oct. He remembered meeting one on 7 Nov. at the Soviet Embassy * and recalled meeting a young captain from the attache's office, but absolutely denied the alleged statement.

Asked when in 1941 he abandoned real hope that diplomatic negotiations could settle the problems between America and Japan, he replied that as he had said in his interrogation, it was after the receipt of the Hull memorandum of Nov. 26.

In October they were most serious and ardent in their endeavors to bring about a consummation of the negotiations. The accused agreed that in the prosecutor's interrogation of him a year before he was asked about his knowledge of war preparations at the time. He agreed that he told the prosecutor then that he knew of war preparations around Oct. 1941 * and they were speeded up after the receipt of the Hull note of Nov. 27, 1941. At the same time he told the prosecutor that in accordance with the Sept. 6 decision, the policy was laid down to do everything through diplomatic means to bring about an understanding but to guard against possibilities of failure in the negotiations. War preparations were also to be carried out. Asked if he did not also say at the time that he knew of war plans about landings in the Philippines, Singapore and Malaya, he answered that he did not reply that way. He replied then that the General Staff might have been carrying on the study of such plans. He said when he was asked why he knew that, he had replied that that was the duty of the General Staff and it would be only 33210 plans * and probably did make a study of such operations. It was not true that his own office was engaged in the frantic task of speeding up construction of airports in Formosa in June 1941. Asked if it was not a fact that on the first day of the war, bombers from Formosa raided Clark Field, Cavite Navy Yard, and other Philippine installations, he replied that Clark Field was attacked by bombers from Formosa.

- 33211 * When shown a document, he agreed that it said that it originated from the Military Affairs Section and that his own name 33213 was on it as Bureau Chief in charge * and that it was an authentic document.
- 33214 * Exhibit 3460-A, the document so identified by the accused, originating from the Military Affairs Section, dated 10 June 1941, re preparations for aerial operations in Formosa, bearing a notation that the War Minister left the matter to others, and bearing among 33215 others the names of Vice War Minister KIMURA and Bureau Chief in Charge MUTO, and * from Vice War Minister KIMURA to C/S of the Formosan Army, stated that the Vice Minister deeply appreciated the efforts hitherto made by the Formosan Army and asked for his continued efforts toward completion of the remaining work in view of the current situation, in accordance with order.
- 33216 * A secret telegram sent 10 June from the CinC of the Formosan Army to the Minister, replied that the first stage of construction at Chaochow and Hengchun airfields had been completed. This telegram had been transmitted to Army and Air Headquarters. A secret telegram sent 30 June from the C/S of the Formosan Army to Vice Minister of War KIMURA replied that he was determined to meet the Vice Minister's expectations by making further efforts toward the completion of the remaining work, and asked for his further guidance.
- 33218 * The accused agreed that in his affidavit he had called Hitler and Mussolini upstarts. Asked if his affidavit meant that he had such deep-seated contempt for Hitler and Mussolini that he didn't hesitate to make known his feelings to his Japanese friends like Col. IWAKURA, and even to Germans like Col. Groner, he replied that the prosecution was not reading the affidavit correctly. He had stated that at first in Japan there was opinion that such parvenus as Hitler were not dependable. Following that he expressed his own views vis-a-vis Germany and Hitler. It was only the latter part 33219 that he told Col. Groner. * He told Col. Groner that Hitler was a first class private and Mussolini a sergeant at the time of World War I, and that such persons whatever they might do could be heroes. He also told him that Japanese statesmen could not possibly do anything in the manner of Hitler or Mussolini because Japanese

Page statesmen were duty bound, as loyal subjects, to exercise the utmost care to see that the historic fundamental character of the state was unblemished. He did not tell Groner that he was opposed to the Tripartite Alliance, but told him these other things and Groner smiled approvingly.

33220 Asked if, whenever he talked with advocates of the * Tripartite Alliance, he invariably told them of his low estimate of Hitler and Mussolini and convinced them it was dangerous for Japan to conclude an alliance with them, he replied that he had spoken to this effect frequently. Asked to whom he voiced such opinions, he replied that he had expressed such sentiments to his subordinates but never to a big statesman. Asked if he didn't feel it his duty, as one who always attended the Liaison and Imperial Conferences and Privy Council Meetings, to inform them that in his judgment it was ruinous for Japan to enter into such an alliance, to people like MATSUOKA, he replied there was no occasion for MATSUOKA and himself to discuss such matters nor had he the authority or qualification to say anything to him.

33221 * Asked if he expressed his view against the Alliance to War Minister TOJO, he replied that TOJO knew of his beliefs on that matter and he thought TOJO agreed because he knew of no occasion in which TOJO on his own initiative advocated such an alliance. Asked if it could be said that during the two months before the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact, only MATSUOKA was for the alliance in the government, he replied it would be more correct to say that MATSUOKA advocated it and others agreed with him, including War Minister TOJO. MUTO himself submitted.

33222 * TOJO's position was that the matter of primary importance was the settlement of the China Affair, that diplomacy must be flexible and constructive and not stationary and difficult of application. MUTO did not know how TOJO responded to MATSUOKA in his advocacy of the Tripartite Alliance. Around military circles in Tokyo, MUTO was known to be against the conclusion of the Pact.

33223 * The accused was asked if it was to be believed that the personnel of the German Embassy, the German Military Attache, and the German Intelligence in Japan committed a colossal diplomatic blunder by recommending for one of the highest military honors a man who mistrusted and opposed the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact. He answered that this statement was far fetched. Once the Alliance had been concluded at MATSUOKA's insistence, collateral business could be handled in the War Ministry by the Military Affairs Bureau. In this case, the personal opinion of MUTO was of no consequence and he would work within the bounds of his assigned duties. He was even nominated as a member of the Joint Commission of Experts. After passing through such a course, he would naturally become one who would be recommended by the War Ministry to be a candidate to receive

33224 * It was correct that he as a good soldier merely followed the decision after it was made notwithstanding the fact that he personally was against the Pact and frequently voiced his opposition. He had active interests in the beginning to see that it was not concluded, but when it came he had to bow to that decision. The accused was asked if it was not true that the following questions and answers were part of his interrogation at Sugamo:

At that time when asked if when he returned to Tokyo, he became in favor of such a Pact and he answered at Sugamo that there was no question of favoring it or not favoring it at the time. He did not believe that the question of a 3 Powers Pact came up when HATA was War Minister. When asked at Sugamo if he asked HATA to demand of YONAI that Japan enter into such a Pact, he replied he had no recollection of saying this.

33225 * When asked at Sugamo if he believed in it at that time, he replied he had no interest in a Pact of that kind at the time.

MUTO agreed that the above answers were a true reflection of what happened in the interrogation at Sugamo. The accused was quoted further questions and answers of his interrogation. When asked if he didn't feel that Germany was going to win the war and therefore he was a very ardent advocate of the Pact, he replied at Sugamo that he did not advocate it. When asked at Sugamo if he disagreed with the signatories formulating such a Pact, he replied that as an individual he favored it but in his official capacity he had no say in political matters. The accused was asked if this did not reflect what he and the prosecutor had talked about in the interrogation at Sugamo, he replied that the part of the interrogation which said he approved of it was erroneous for he was not in favor of it.

33226 * Further questions and answers from the interrogatory were quoted to the accused. When asked at Sugamo if in his official capacity, he didn't frequently advise TOJO that such a Pact would be advisable and helpful in Japan's efforts in settling the China Incident, MUTO answered that it was his job to gather various points of view and present them to TOJO. In the paper presented there may have been some statement advocating the binding of the Three Powers Pact but he had no clear recollection. When asked at Sugamo if there was such a recommendation, he replied that he knew that such feelings were very strong within the military. When asked at Sugamo about his own feelings in his official capacity, he replied he did not personally advocate it. When asked in his interrogatory if he did so in his capacity as Chief of the MAB, he replied that in his official capacity it was his job to keep in contact with the head of the Naval Affairs

After these questions and answers were quoted to the accused, he stated that if throughout the interrogation the words "I was not in favor of it" were substituted for the words "I favored it" the interrogation would be correct.

33228 Asked if the army did not support KONOYE's new political movement because it called for dissolution of existing political parties, strengthening of the German-Japanese-Italian Axis, conservation of the China gains, and establishment of a new order in East Asia parallel to the new order in Europe, he replied that it was a fact that the army approved of KONOYE's movement to bring about a renovation of the domestic situation. * Asked if it was true that the army wanted KONOYE to replace YONAI as Premier, he replied that it was thought desirable that if there should be a cabinet change, it would be desirable to have KONOYE head the succeeding cabinet.

33229 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that the conclusion of the Tri-partite Pact was not pressed upon the government, and that HATA supported the YONAI Cabinet policy of non-involvement in the European War. The accused was asked if it was not true that about July 1940 it was already publicly known in Japan that in military circles sentiment was gaining to alter the policy of noninvolvement, but instead promote KONOYE's movement for a new political structure and strengthen the Axis; he replied that was contrary to fact and the matter could not have been publicly known. Asked if it was not known widely at the time, even in the press, that HATA was going to visit YONAI and advise him to strengthen the Axis and support the new political structure movement, he replied that so far as he knew this was entirely contrary to HATA's ideas and intentions. The accused stated he was familiar with the Tokyo 33230 * Nichi Nichi published in Japan before the war. When shown a copy of the Nichi Nichi of 10 July 1940, he stated that there seemed to be a big play-up in the newspaper about probable advice to be given by HATA to the Premier, but this was contrary to fact and he did not believe that such advice was ever given. He agreed that the Nichi Nichi had a large circulation. * The entire news item was a sort of prediction and he denied the entire contents. The accused was told that sometime in mid-July 1940, he and Vice Minister ANAMI demanded of Chief Secretary ISHIWATA the mass resignation of the cabinet to realize KONOYE's new political order and when he refused, MUTO and ANAMI stated to him that there was nothing to be done but call for the resignation of HATA. Asked if it did not come to his notice that YONAI the next day mentioned the incident to HATA who replied that the opinion expressed by MUTO and ANAMI was only personal opinion. The accused replied this was contrary to fact. Asked if on 16 July 1940 War Minister HATA, after conferring with MUTO, ANAMI, the Big Three and War Councillors, finally handed in his resignation to YONAI to enforce the will of the Army, he replied it was not so.

CROSS-EXAMINATION by Mr. English
Substituting for Mr. Lopez.

33242 The accused stated he had not visited Chief Cabinet Secretary ISHIWATA with Vice-War Minister ANAMI about 11 July 1940, but visited ISHIWATA alone. Asked if * he and ANAMI stated at that time that in order to realize KONOYE's new political order, they would like to have the Cabinet resign, the accused stated that was wrong. ANAMI did not go. The accused did not say at the time there was nothing to be done but to force the resignation of the War Minister.

33243 Asked if it was not a fact that three days later, on 14 July 1940, War Minister HATA handed a written memorandum to Premier YONAI, he replied he had heard this but did not know whether it was a fact. * Asked if the memorandum stated that strengthening of the domestic organization and reformation of foreign policy had been the most pressing problems facing the Cabinet, the witness replied that he knew nothing of its contents.

33244 * Asked if HATA further stated in the memorandum that the government was doing nothing and losing an opportunity that would never come again, he repeated that he didn't know anything about its contents. Asked if HATA at the time suggested the resignation of the Cabinet, he replied that he had heard HATA presented the Premier with a letter, but did not know its contents.

33245 Asked by the Tribunal for what purpose he went to see ISHIWATA on 11 July, 1940, he replied that he was given the duty of being one to welcome the Manchukuo Emperor, and had gone to the Osaka-Kyoto area the beginning of July. When he returned to Tokyo on the 9th or 10th, he found that HATA had received a very strong document from * the General Staff embodying its strong opinions. Because of this note, HATA's position became difficult. When War Minister HATA assumed his portfolio, he received a very strong demand from the Emperor that he cooperate with Premier YONAI. Therefore HATA, who had fully cooperated with the Cabinet, was suddenly faced by these General Staff demands, which might lead to a demand for general resignation of the Cabinet.

When MUTO called on HATA on the 10th or 11th of July, he heard that HATA had conversed with YONAI, telling YONAI that KONOYE was establishing a new party and was about to form a new political structure. Public opinion supported KONOYE.

33246 HATA advised Premier YONAI to call on KONOYE to find out his thoughts. YONAI replied that he was a navy man, had nothing to do with politics, and if KONOYE was really going to set about to create a new party, he would * be happy to relinquish his post, for he had no political desires.

HATA was anxious to hear the results of YONAI's conversations with KONOYE, but no word came from the Premier. That was why MUTO called on ISHIWATA first, to find out the results of the conversation, and second, to find out HATA's difficult position.

33247 The accused agreed that HATA resigned on 16 July 1940. Asked if it was a fact that when asked by Premier YONAI to recommend a successor, HATA reported to the Premier on 16 July 1940, that the Three Chief's Conference had no one to recommend as his successor, the accused replied that this was at variance with the facts. Asked if the failure of the military to recommend a successor did not force the resignation of the YONAI * Cabinet, he replied that he heard on the 16th, when YONAI conferred with HATA, the two failed to agree, and thereupon YONAI told HATA he must ask him to resign. YONAI was reported also to have told HATA that he did not suppose they would be able to find a successor. HATA replied that he could not say anything here by himself, but would have to go back to the War Ministry and see the results of the Three Chief's Conference.

33248 The three Chiefs met, and although MUTO did not know the contents of their conference, they finally concluded that there was no one who wished to accept the post to succeed HATA. HATA then reported that decision to the Premier. Asked if it was true that immediately after the YONAI Cabinet's fall, the three chiefs recommended TOJO as the next War Minister, he replied he knew nothing about the contents of the Three Chief's Conference, but believed that * NODA's testimony was true on this point.

33249 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that the cause of the YONAI Cabinet's fall was that the General Staff was so anxious to have the China Affair settled quickly that it demanded that Germany mediate between Japan and China and that the cabinet solidify internal affairs, and because the YONAI Cabinet did not show earnest response to these demands the Army urged HATA to resign. To the accused was quoted purported questions and answers of his interrogation at Sugamo, in which in response to a question as to why the YONAI Cabinet fell, he had replied that in the summer of 1940 the Foreign Page Office came out with a statement dividing the world into three spheres, the Far East dominated by Japan, the Americas, and Europe. The Army opposed this announcement, and the Foreign Office stated that the Army had opposed it so when MUTO returned from Ise where he had been with the Manchukuo Emperor, War Minister HATA was very disturbed * about how the Army felt about it and the way young officers were reacting. Ultimately, HATA resigned, and that brought about the downfall of the YONAI Cabinet. After this was read to the accused, he stated that in his affidavit he had stated the general reasons, and in the interrogation had told the direct reasons why the General Staff got angry.

The accused was asked if it was not a fact that immediately after KONOYE was directed by the Emperor to form a new Cabinet on July 20, 1940, he issued the following statement for the press: KONOYE said he could not disclose the nature of his discussions with TOJO, Vice-Admiral YOSHIDA, and MATSUOKA, but could state that a complete agreement was reached concerning fundamental foreign policy. The contents of the discussion would be formally revealed after the first cabinet session. Discussions touched on issues concerning disposal of the China Incident, strengthening the Axis, and relations with Britain, U. S. * and the Soviet, as well as harmonization and cooperation between the high command and the civil administration.

After this was quoted to the accused, he stated there may have been such an announcement, but he didn't recall it. The accused stated he didn't recall KONOYE, on 23 July 1940, in a radio broadcast, declare that the new foreign policy would enable Japan to take the initiative in building up a new order. Asked if the KONOYE Cabinet, after its inauguration and after agreement with the Army, laid down on 26 July 1940 the outline of basic national policy aimed at construction of the new order of Greater East Asia, for the attainment of which constructive and elastic measures would be adopted, the accused recalled that the basic national policy was not decided by the army alone, but at a cabinet meeting. (The attention of the Tribunal was called to exhibit 541.)

33252 * The accused stated that it was not true that the draft of this basic national policy, (exhibit 541), was prepared by the Military Affairs Section of the MAB and given by him to War Minister TOJO for him to take up with Premier KONOYE, and that the draft was approved by the Cabinet.

Page

To the accused was quoted a part of his interrogation at Sugamo in which he was asked if in 1940 he formulated a new order for the Empire, which was presented by TOJO to the Cabinet and approved. To the above question he had replied that at the time of the KONOYE Cabinet, when KONOYE called in TOJO to be his War Minister, the plan TOJO took with him was one made in the Military Affairs Section. This was accepted policy, and always followed when a new War Minister took over.

33253

* When asked in his interrogation if that plan was formulated while he was Chief of the MAB, the accused had replied, yes. After this was read to the accused, he explained that the draft which was spoken of there was entirely different from the basic national policy, which was exhibit 541. TOJO's draft concerned the establishment of a foreign policy with the solution of the China Incident as its basic point, and the strengthening of Japan's internal structure for national defense. Whenever a new War Minister was appointed, he should know and be able to present the army view, and it was on that point that TOJO took his proposals. MUTO had never said during his interrogation that this was a policy which every War Minister had taken to every new Cabinet. * The basic national policy was formed on drafts submitted by each new Cabinet Minister, and not formulated by TOJO alone.

* Asked if the basic aim of the draft prepared by the MAS was aimed at a new order in foreign affairs and national, he replied it was directed to that also, and was included in the basic national policy. The accused stated he didn't recall that the Cabinet decision (exhibit 541) deciding the outline of basic policy was discussed at the Liaison Conference of 27 July 1940, at which he attended, and after which it was officially announced that complete agreement was reached between headquarters and the government on the policies approved at the cabinet meeting.

33256

The accused agreed that the Yomiuri Shimbun was a Japanese language newspaper of large circulation.

33257

* Asked if he was appointed as one of the six members of the permanent secretariat of the new Structure Preparatory Committee, he replied that he forgot how many there were, * but he was appointed one of the members. One of the objectives of the committee was to carry out the basic aims of the outline of basic national policy, but had another purpose. KONOYE had from before held the idea of strengthening Japan's internal structure, and this was the committee's principal purpose.

33259 * The accused agreed that prior to the Cabinet decision of 11 July 1940, he had a conversation with Chief Secretary ISHIWATA at the Premier's official residence and exchanged views with him favorable to the creation of the new political structure in the direction toward which KONOYE's intentions were. It was not true that the Tri-Partite Pact, consummated on 27 September 1940, to insure a new order in Europe by Germany and Italy and a new order in East Asia by Japan, were two events pursuant to the Cabinet decision outlining the basic national policy. There was nothing referring to a new order in Europe in the policy. He did recall that MATSUOKA was proud of the manner in which the preamble of the Pact was drawn, as it * expressed his views with regard to the new order, and was proud that for the first time a purely Japanese ideal, which was to enable every nation and people to have their proper place, was incorporated into an international treaty.

Asked if he was present at the first meeting of the Permanent Secretariat on 26 August 1940, to put final touches on KONOYE's proclaimed announcement of the establishment of the new political structure, he replied that KONOYE was not present at the meeting of the Secretariat but was present at the first meeting of a committee of 40 he had nominated for the purpose. Asked if this committee of 40 was the Permanent Secretariat, he replied that the Secretariat was composed of secretaries of a lower level, but the committee of 40 was composed of representatives of private civilian circles and the government at the ministerial level.

* The accused stated he was not a member of the committee of 40, but was of the Permanent Secretariat. Before becoming Premier, KONOYE was organizer and leader of the Showa Research Association, which prepared a sort of outline for a new national structure. The Secretariat undertook the study of the plan prepared by this association. The function of the Secretariat was to study draft plans, but not to nominate or assemble members of the committee of 40. They were to study basic plans relating to reorganization of the national structure.

* Asked if it made or drafted plans for the organization of the new political structure, he replied that secretaries could not do that, and therefore questions submitted by KONOYE to the standing committee and opinions expressed there were used to draw up their plans. Asked if he attended a meeting of the Permanent Secretariat on 26 August 1940, he replied that he didn't know whether a meeting was held on that date. If KONOYE attended, it was

Page not a meeting of the Secretariat, but of the committee of 40. He didn't recall a meeting about 26 August 1940 attended by TOMITA, OBATA, ABE, GOTO, INADA, MORIYAMA, OKUMURA, MAKI and TAKAGI.

33262 Asked if this meeting was called to put final touches on KONOYE's official proclamation announcing the establishment of a new political structure committee, he * replied he recalled discussing a draft of the KONOYE declaration which was prepared somewhere. Asked if it was true that in the original draft of the proclamation, KONOYE wrote strongly that the new order meant neither Nazism nor Fascism, but when it was sent to MUTO he deleted the statement and returned the draft to the Cabinet, he replied that the draft which KONOYE first sent to the War Ministry through the War Minister was very long and loose.

33263 At that time he did not know the draft had been prepared by KONOYE, and MUTO expressed the opinion to have the opinion cut to about half its length. It may be that the KONOYE statement with regard to the fact that the new order did not mean Nazism or Fascism was in the omitted portion. However, later MUTO abandoned his views after * learning that the draft was KONOYE's.

He didn't remember deleting from the draft the words "that the new order meant neither Nazism nor Fascism". The accused stated that there was no Captain of the Naval Affairs Bureau by the name of TAKAGI among the Secretaries of the Preparatory Committee. There may have been a captain TAKAGI as an assistant in the Naval Affairs Bureau but he didn't know.

33264 * Asked if he recalled meeting with TAKAGI on 26 August 1940, to discuss KONOYE's 1st proclamation, he replied he recalled having discussed the draft, but not whether it was with a person representing the navy. He didn't recall telling TAKAGI late in August 1940 that the army was disappointed with KONOYE, his proclamation, and the new political structure. The accused stated there was nothing like disappointment in the army.

Asked if he told Captain TAKAGI that the army was exerting all efforts to induce the dissolution of political parties to form a pro-army party but the plan was frustrated when KONOYE's proclamation was published, he replied that was a misapprehension, and the facts were quite different.

It was not true that he told TAKAGI late in August 1940 that the army had been planning to use KONOYE as a robot. * Asked if it was not true that on 15 August 1940 the Menseito party disbanded and that marked the end of the party system, he replied that it was true that the Menseito disbanded, but he didn't remember the date. The Army was very much disposed to and approved and supported KONOYE's plans for a new party to carry on effective politics. Political parties were disbanded, but KONOYE abandoned the idea of a new party.

After the signing of the Tripartite Pact, the new political structure became officially the IRAA. Attention of the Tribunal was called to testimony of 1, 1, 1,639, and 6706-14.

Asked if he had stated in early February 1941, as a councillor of the IRAA that the army and navy would * fully cooperate with the association in the future just as they had cooperated in the past he replied, yes. At such meetings it was customary for the army and navy to rotate in speaking before the IRAA. On this occasion it was his turn, and he represented both the army and navy.

It was not true that his speech in the Committee of Accounts of the Diet on 20 March 1940, (exhibit 1000) was interpreted in responsible circles as a ringing advocacy for the dissolution of political parties. However the press treated his statements in the manner suggested, and people not knowing the real situation seemed to have been surprised, but those who referred to the stenographic * transcript of the Diet proceedings would understand the contents of his statements.

Asked if three days after his speech Foreign Minister ARITA appeared before the same committee, and if ARITA was asked by INADA if he agreed with the opinion of MUTO who said political parties must be dissolved and if ARITA did not evade the question, he replied he didn't think MHR INADA was at the committee when he spoke for MUTO nor was ARITA, so neither knew what he spoke about. He did not know whether ARITA evaded the question.

In this speech where he had cited General TERAUCHI's views on totalitarianism, this was the same TERAUCHI who was sent in 1939 to Berlin to attend the Nazi Party conference as the official representative. TERAUCHI * however, did not simply talk about totalitarianism itself.

Page Asked if the interpolations governing the Diet speech were directed not to himself but to War Minister HATA, he replied it appeared that INADA desired to call HATA to the committee for interpolation. It was true that he and not HATA replied to the interpolations.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. COLE.

33269 * The accused stated that Imperial Conferences were held in a large room in the Palace. The Emperor's dais was a little above the floor level, and before the dais was a long table at which attendants sat facing each other. In a corner was another small table at which secretaries sat. It was customary at conferences for the Premier to preside. Those speaking stood up in front of his chair and spoke. During the conference no one entered 33270 * or left, and they were held in a very solemn manner.

Liaison conferences were held in a smaller room around which were armchairs. In the center along the farther end sat the Premier, with a circle formed around him. The three secretaries sat near the entrance.

Liaison conferences were held between government and high command representatives to bring about a meeting of minds, and therefore there was no presiding officer and every member spoke freely. Secretaries were constantly leaving and entering. Among the secretaries he included himself.

33273 * HATA was in attendance at a more important committee meeting. When MUTO spoke of this to the Committee of Accounts and asked whether it would be satisfactory if he attended in place of HATA, the Committee said it would be.

* During his tenure as Chief of the MAB, he was never aware at any time of insistence on the part of the army that there be a single party. The army approved of KONOYE's new party movement, but did not consider a single party system, but believed the latter would be tantamount to no political parties whatsoever, and that anything in the nature of a single party would collapse. The army never insisted upon a complete disbanding of all parties.

The movement for the dissolution of political parties was in pursuance of a desire within the parties themselves for a new party.

* When asked by the Tribunal if the YAMASHITA mentioned in his affidavit was the same one who was prosecuted and sentenced to death in the Philippines, he replied that he was.

33286-97 * Opening statement by Mr. Roberts.

33298 Exhibit 3467, the affidavit of TOMITA, Kenji, said that he was chief cabinet secretary * from 22 July 1940 to 15 October 1941, during which time he had frequent interviews with navy minister OIKAWA and director of the naval affairs bureau OKA, who frequently expressed that they were anxious to continue the U.S.-Japanese negotiations and desired to bring about a successful conclusion of them. On 16 July 1941, the third KONOYE cabinet replaced the second, which resigned because it was felt MATSUOKA's presence hindered the progress of the negotiations. The primary reason for the new cabinet was to expedite the negotiations.

33299 While discussing the proposal, the affiant had frequent interviews with OKA since August, 1941, in which he expressed that he was anxious to continue the negotiations and emphasized that KONOYE should be delegated with full discretionary powers to negotiate with Roosevelt in order to settle the matter quickly. OKA further said * he would assist in making preparations for a ship to transport the delegation and hoped to become a member of such a suite. On 17 August 1941 NOMURA first suggested to Roosevelt the meeting with KONOYE.

33300 On 11 October 1941 the affiant visited OKA and told him that a meeting was to be held on the last day at KONOYE's house in Ogikubo and the affiant hoped a strong stand would be taken by the navy to support KONOYE. General navy feeling was inclined to oppose continuation of the negotiations but OKA stated that KONOYE should be encouraged to continue them. The affiant called on navy minister OIKAWA the same day and OIKAWA stated he wished to avoid war and desired to continue the negotiations. He stated, however, that the navy, in view of its position as a fighting unit, couldn't officially state it was opposed to war. It was the navy's duty to observe orders. * If it became necessary to fight, the decision to wage war or not was a diplomatic one within the provisions of the premier for determination.

33301 The affiant then expressed the wish that it would be well at the Ogikubo conference to support KONOYE. * The next morning on October 12 the affiant was telephoned by OKA who said that OIKAWA intended to state at the conference that the decision for war or peace would be left to the premier's orders, and the navy could not decide whether war should be waged, for this was to be determined by the premier, although it was desired that the latter should pursue his course in order that 33301 war might be avoided. OKA observed that the KONOYE cabinet should not resign but continue its efforts for a compromise. If it did resign, there was danger of war and OKA urged the affiant towards everything possible to prevent KONOYE from resigning and stated that for all practical purposes he hoped the negotiations would be successfully concluded. When the third KONOYE cabinet resigned, OKA was gloomy over the prospects of the negotiations, but still kept KONOYE informed of the subsequent developments through the affiant. OKA said this was because * KONOYE was one of the important senior statesmen and it was his intention to activate KONOYE to continue his efforts for peace.

OKA said he did not think Japan should under any circumstances engage in a full-scale conflict with a powerful country like the United States. However, he frequently expressed that being a subordinate he was compelled to follow orders, whether or not they accorded with his personal views. During the many times the affiant was in contact with OKA, he observed he was a man who worked under orders and did not disregard his superiors' wishes.

33304 The witness identified and verified exhibit 2737 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was chief of the military preparations bureau of the navy ministry from 15 November 1940 to May 1945. On 15 May 1945 he became chief of the naval affairs bureau, holding this position to 17 November 1945 and was familiar with the duties of that post. The naval affairs bureau, according to regulations, was like other bureaus in the ministry, subject to the orders of the minister, and functioned directly under the vice minister.

33305 * Therefore, chief of NAB OKA was responsible like other bureau chiefs only to the navy minister. The chief of the NAB drafted plans as provided for in the established organization, submitted them to the navy minister, and went through routine procedure to execute matters approved by him. Therefore OKA carried out his duties as an aide to the minister. As chief of the NAB, OKA could not resign because his opinion differed from the minister or vice minister. When appointed, OKA's consent was not required. Although the minister and vice minister were naval officers, since their status was civilian, they were free to submit resignations and also they were appointed upon their own consent.

33307 * When necessary to negotiate with outsiders in handling matters within its jurisdiction, it was customary for the ministry to do so through the naval affairs bureau. For that reason the chief of the NAB and members of the bureau, as a matter of convenience in maintaining liason between the navy and the various ministries were frequently appointed councillors or members of the committees. Among jurisdictional matters were some involving other ministries, requiring their cooperation. For this reason, when necessary committees were organized with members from various ministries concerned, as members of these, the navy ministry dispatched men from appropriate bureaus and whenever matters came under the NAB's jurisdiction, men of that bureau were appointed. Mostly it was customary to appoint as members bureau or section chiefs to act principally as liason men.

33308 Because there were so many committees, with * the exception of important committees attended by bureau and section chiefs, in most cases the principal persons within the bureau attended, so it was not often that OKA himself was present. As chief of the NAB, OKA was automatically appointed an official of the national general mobilization committee. But bills introduced in the meeting were prepared by the planning board of other ministries. Due to his other duties, it was rare OKA attended these meetings.

33309 As chief of the NAB, OKA was automatically a councillor of the planning board. It was customary to submit important matters prepared by that board to the meeting of councillors, but compared with councillors from other ministries, OKA did not possess special authority and seldom attended meetings. As chief of the NAB, OKA was automatically a councillor of the Manchuria affairs bureau, but since the navy had little to do with Manchuria, his appointment was merely nominal. The person in charge of the matters concerned or a * section chief of the bureau attended, but OKA rarely did so. OKA was also automatically councillor of the south seas board in the overseas affairs ministry, but its meetings were rarely held.

OKA was also automatically a member of the cabinet information section. At its meetings, views on problems submitted by the information section were exchanged. There was no connection with the strengthening of the anti-comintern pact or the tripartite relations. Either a section chief or a member of the bureau attended the meetings and OKA's presence was rare. OKA was also automatically appointed a member of the admirals committee, which met principally to discuss navy promotions, but not one meeting was held during OKA's tenure.

33310 During the time the witness was chief of the military preparations bureau, he was both officially and socially in contact with him and knew well that OKA worked hard to * avoid war with the U.S. As a bureau chief the witness constantly exchanged views with OKA and knew he strongly desired to avoid war with the United States, and he did not keep his desires to himself. When the negotiations ended unsuccessfully, he was very disappointed.

33311 * Examination by the Tribunal

When asked what were the duties of the navy minister with regard to POWs temporarily in enemy custody, he replied that with regard to this the navy minister acted according to fixed regulations and the witness knew of no pertinent orders issued by him in connection with this matter. Asked if the minister had regulations covering the treatment of POWs, he replied that in view of the fact that he was not chief of the NAB during war time, he believed there were more qualified 33312 * witnesses to answer.

Asked what were duties of the chief of the NAB with regard to POWs, he replied that it was to assist the navy minister to see that any decisions of his were carried out.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY CAPTAIN ROBINSON

33313 The witness stated he was chief of the naval affairs bureau for six months in 1945 but was not officially a member of the staff of the NAB while the accused OKA was bureau chief. He agreed that his statements in regard to OKA's conduct and duties as bureau chief were not based on personal observation as a member of the bureau staff * but stated that he was quite familiar with how admiral OKA, as director of the NAB conducted the business of his department, because while he was chief the witness was chief of the military preparations bureau of the same ministry and had occasion to meet him several times a day. He had the opportunity to observe the manner in which OKA performed his duties with respect to POWs, but as far as the actual treatment of POWs was concerned, this was entirely in the hands of naval units in the field, but his understanding was only limited to knowledge that adequate measures were carried out in accordance with navy ministry's general orders.

33314 Asked if he had any knowledge of the positive action taken by OKA in the NAB in connection with POWs, he replied he was not familiar with details. * The witness was reminded that in his affidavit he stated that OKA was responsible only to the navy minister in performing his duties, and he was asked if by this statement he meant to suggest that OKA was not responsible under the constitutional laws of Japan, including international treaty law, for failure to perform his duties, he replied that granted that there was such a situation, then the director of the MAB would be responsible for not sufficiently assisting the navy minister in performing his duties.

33316 Asked if he meant to state that OKA could escape responsibility under Japanese law, including treaties, by putting all responsibility on the accused SHINADA as navy minister, he replied * that from a legal point of view, responsibility resided only in the navy minister, however, OKA had responsibilities to the minister. Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that OKA could not resign because of difference of opinion with the navy minister. Asked if OKA could not have caused the end of his career as chief of the NAB simply by opposing the opinions of the navy minister SHINADA, or premier TOJO, he replied OKA could not do that. All military officers' actions were governed by orders and 33317 they could not resign at their own request * and unless shifts were made by their superiors, they could not relinquish any post of their own accord.

33318 Asked if OKA's performance was such that he was retained without having been given a change of assignment, he replied that he did not know. Asked if he knew of any occasion when OKA was subjected to court-martial or given a change of assignment because of failure to * cooperate with the navy minister SHIMADA, he replied there were no such cases.

33321 About 15 October 1941 the third KONOYE cabinet resigned and on the 18th the TOJO cabinet was formed. The TOJO cabinet decided to scrape all previous understandings and start * afresh, and considered this new approach all during October. In November, a proposed draft of new negotiations was undertaken by the cabinet and completed. There were two proposals, A and B, and reply to them came on November 26 from the U.S. There was great divergence in the U.S. reply. The witness went to OKA who said it was regrettable that negotiations were hopeless and it might be difficult to avoid war. After shedding tears, he told the witness as war was unavoidable they must fight fairly and aboveboard.

About the 3rd or 4th of December a mimeographed copy of the final note to the U.S. was turned over to the witness by OKA for studying. This draft, he was informed, was prepared by the foreign office. The witness felt that the form of it was inadequate as an ultimatum and suggested that a clause be inserted that Japan reserve the right of free action, which would make it clear as an ultimatum. OKA said if that was so, he hoped the witness would make the necessary revision.

33322 * The witness then wrote in pencil at the end of the draft that Japan reserved the right of free action and OKA expressed himself of being of the same opinion concerning the words of the note and approved the suggested change. The reason the witness suggested the revision was because of OKA's expression in urging them previously to fight fairly if it became necessary. Subsequently the witness had a further conversation with OKA who had discussed the suggested change with the foreign office representative, who informed him the additional language was not necessary. OKA stated further that the note was considered an ultimatum in diplomatic language and that the additional phrase would be superfluous. He further stated it was a matter in which he was compelled to accede to the wishes of those in better position to pass upon such questions.

33323 The witness knew from his personal knowledge that OKA worked faithfully and with considerable effort toward maintaining peaceful relations with the United States. In the Greater East Asia Conference held in November 1943, OKA, the accused SATO, and others,* including himself, were present as the attendants of TOJO, the Japanese representative. But the Greater East Asia Ministry and the foreign office took the leading part in preparing and running the conference and the attendants took no active part.

33324 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that OKA told him he had discussed with foreign minister representative the question of the notification to be served on the U.S. The witness stated that OKA did not specify clearly who the representative was, merely saying he was a foreign office representative, * nor did this witness know from any other source who this representative was.

33325 Asked what his duties in section 2 of the cabinet were, he replied liaison with other government departments with reference to matters pertaining to national defense. Asked if he did not also, under article 9 of the Imperial Ordinance of the Organization of the Navy Ministry (exhibit 75), deal with matters concerning international conventions and personnel dispatched abroad, he replied he did deal with such matters and they included matters concerning POWs under the Hague Treaty. Regarding the witness' experience and training in international law, he attended lectures on the subject * when a student in the naval staff college, given by Professor ENOMOTO who had appeared as a witness.

In his affidavit he had stated that he felt that the Japanese final note to the United States was not adequate as an ultimatum and had suggested that words be added whereby Japan reserved the right of free action because he believed that the addition of those words would make the note clear as an ultimatum. He had in mind the former ultimatum presented to the Russian government at the time of the Russian-Japanese war and his recollections of ENOMOTO's lectures, 33326 * but did not have in mind when proposed what the ultimatum should contain or the one presented in 1914 to Germany.

He thought the expression "we reserve the right of free action" added to the words that it was "impossible to reach an agreement through further negotiations" would make the note conform to the requirements of the Third Hague 33328 Convention. * Asked whether he and OKA did not really believe that if the words "freedom of action" had been added the note would still have fallen short of the requirements of the Third Hague Convention for such a note, he replied that he thought that if the language he suggested was incorporated into the note, that would be sufficient.

Asked if OKA told him that TOGO opposed the amendment, he replied he did not hear that TOGO made any such statement but heard that the foreign office was of the opinion that such 33329 an amendment was unnecessary. * He did not hear that the navy representatives would not permit the note to be made so clearly an ultimatum because this would cause a failure of the surprise attack. Asked if OKA stated to him that he was compelled to accede to the wishes of others in rejecting the amendment, if OKA named those who compelled him to drop the amendment, he replied he had not heard of any names. Asked if he or OKA protested in regard to the measure, he replied that with regard to OKA he did not know, as far as he was concerned he did not do anything.

33330 * The witness made no protests to OKA or anyone else with regard to dropping the proposed amendment. Asked if his failure to take into consideration the ultimatum to Germany of August 1914 was due to his lack of knowledge about that ultimatum, 33331 * or to the fact he knew about it but thought that it would not apply, he replied it just did not occur to him. When asked by the tribunal what his duties were in regard to POWs, he replied he had no specific duties.

33336 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3470 as his 33337 affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was navy 33338 minister in the third KONOYE cabinet serving in that capacity until it resigned on 16 October 1941. During his tenure, the accused OKA was director of NAB. The witness attended liason conferences, which were meetings of high ranking men in the supreme command, being the chiefs of general staffs, deputy chiefs, and cabinet ministers representing the government to bring about an understanding between political functions and the supreme command. The discussions were informal and no votes were taken, matters unanimously agreed upon were carried 33339 out by government organs or the supreme command * in the regular channels.

The liason conference not being an official organ was not charged with responsibility but simply was held for the convenience of the parties concerned who met and discussed matters informally. For that reason responsibility of chiefs of staff and of state ministers could not be diminished or altered on account of the liaison conferences.

OKA attended in the capacity of secretary, but was also official clerk, and not a member of the conference. He did not affix his signature to matters taken up. As secretary, OKA could only make explanations when he was asked to do so and he took no part in discussions and had nothing to do with making decisions. His primary duty was to supply information to the members. OKA usually attended the imperial conferences with the navy minister if not ordered elsewhere. His presence at them gave him no right of expression or voting.

33340 * As director of the NAB, OKA attended meetings of the investigation committee of the privy council as explainer, only when the investigation involved matters pertaining to the navy, and also he was never permitted to express himself or vote at such meetings, and could not take part in the decisions. It was his duty to bring data required by the navy minister when he spoke. There were also other explainers from other ministers, but their presence did not affect the decisions. The preparation of the agenda was prepared by the privy council and OKA did not attend privy council meetings. OKA as director of the NAB did not attend NAB meetings. During the witness' tenure as navy minister, OKA was under his commands, never acted upon his own opinion. This was not due to government organization, for OKA was observed to be not the type of person who acted in disregard of his superiors.

The navy did all it could to avoid war, and its sentiment was communicated to KONC.E. In the midst of these circumstances, the reasons for entrusting the decision as to whether they should continue negotiations to the premier was because the witness considered the following, that in his opinion if the navy publicly announced it lacked confidence in fighting the United States, it would create disruption, because the pitting of the army against the navy would develop into a grave internal problem. As the premier was of the same opinion, this problem had an important bearing on overall strength and it should be diplomatically concluded solely on the basis of the navy's standpoint.

33343 * When OKA stated to TOMITA, chief secretary of the cabinet, in answer to an inquiry from TOMITA, that the navy could not fight, he was conveying the intention expressed by the witness. The witness had previously informed TOJO that the greatest work confronting JAPAN was the termination of the China Affair, and could not make public the fact that the army and navy had opposing views thereon, and that they ought to first let KONOYE decide and then abide by that decision. It was incontrovertible that at that time OKA was the witness' subordinate and in no position to make any decision of his own authority as whether the navy could wage war. The witness had many conversations with OKA concerning the negotiations in which he expressed himself strongly in favor of continuing them.

33344 At the time of the witness' resignation as navy minister, OKA remained as director of the NAB because his term of shore service and the term of office of both the vice minister and director of NAB had another year to run. OKA tendered his resignation, but because his term had not expired, * the request was denied and the witness told OKA that he and the vice minister should remain in the ministry and continue to do everything in their power to bring about a compromise in the negotiations.

It was customary in the navy when a new minister was appointed, not to shift those below the vice minister and therefore, regardless of whom the premier might have been then, personnel below that rank were not affected.

33345 The witness stated he remembered that the emperor, on or about 17 October 1941, after the resignation of the KONOYE cabinet, told him, in substance, that cooperation between the army and navy should be made closer than ever. * When he withdrew from the audience before the emperor, the accused KIDO told him, in part, that he had presumed that he had just received imperial words in regard to cooperation between the army and navy. The witness interpreted the emperor's words to mean that both the army and navy should reject all obstacles which had presented themselves and which might tend to make impossible the further continuance of the negotiations, and from a new and imperial standpoint confer together to strive to solve the situation peacefully.

33346 This because the emperor had also desired a peaceful solution. Asked what was the conversation between he and TOJO when they were alone in the room waiting for KIDO to come in after he withdrew from the imperial audience, the witness replied, he had forgotten the details * of the conversation. The general outline was that he talked with TOJO to ascertain the firmness of his resolution to throw away all obstacles obstructing the path, and wipe the slate clean starting afresh in line with the emperor's words. The witness received the impression that TOJO had a strong resolution to carry that out.

Asked if it was not true that Oka spent more than ten of the fourteen years preceding 1945 ashore in Navy Headquarters, the witness replied that Oka's previous long term ashore was in consideration of his health. He didn't mean that every person in the navy spent alternately two years at sea and on land. When he stated Oka had more than one year to remain as Chief of the NAB, he meant that in the ordinary course of events his term as chief should run for one year or more at least.

33353 * Asked if he based his statement that Oka did not attend Cabinet meetings on personal knowledge, he replied he made the statement because he himself attended the meetings, and besides, Oka's position as Director of the NAB did not entitle him to sit at these meetings. The witness did not attend all meetings held during the time Oka was Director, but the government structure was such that the director could not attend Cabinet Meetings, and he had never heard of any such instance where a director did attend. Therefore, he was able to say Oka never attended any, from his own knowledge and from regulations.

33354 * The Navy Minister always attended Liaison
33354½ Conferences. * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that the navy did all it could to avoid war with the U. S. and this sentiment was communicated to KONOYE, as KONOYE was exactly of the same opinion. Asked if it was not true that KONOYE, about 16 October 1941, the day his Cabinet went out of office, said that it was cowardly of the Navy not to avow its opposition to war with America, the witness replied he had never heard of KONOYE making such a statement.

33355 Asked if he was aware that the accused KIDO had testified * that the navy could have prevented war, he replied that this was the opinion of KIDO and KONOYE, he supposed, but he could say nothing about it as he did not know their opinions.

and the witness understood this request was based on the interview. The witness sent OKA on his behalf to YONAI with the premier's message. OKA returned in an hour and stated that YONAI did not wish to enter the cabinet, but would be willing to assume active service and serve on 33359 the * Supreme War Council. The idea of asking YONAI to enter the Cabinet was solely the idea of the witness, and OKA acted on his orders.

With respect to such a matter, the Director of the NAB was subject to the Navy Minister's orders, and could not act independently.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY CAPTAIN ROBINSON.

The witness stated that he was the Japanese naval representative at Berlin while the accused OSHIMA was Ambassador, and he was also the Commissioner at Berlin on the German-Italian-Japanese Military Commission under the Tripartite Pact from 1940 until 1943.

33360 * The witness stated that it could not be said he was an expert in regard to submarines, but had served as staff officer of a submarine squadron, and for one year was principal of a submarine school. It was his understanding that OKA likewise had served in connection with submarine schools. Asked if another common interest shared with OKA was politics, he replied that the only time he had ever been together with OKA politically was when he became Navy Minister.

33361 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that about 17 July 1944 he sent OKA to YONAI to advise him that TOJO desired him to join the TOJO Cabinet, and about an hour later OKA returned and reported the results.

When asked if when he had a political mission of the highest level he called on OKA, he replied that when he received the message from TOJO he was occupied, and therefore sent OKA in his stead. OKA did not object to the assignment.

Asked if both he and OKA favored a strong political party, such as IRAA, he replied that for the five years previous to his appointment as Navy Minister, he was not in TOKYO, * and when he was called to Tokyo urgently had no knowledge of the situation there.

Asked if he did not keep in touch with the Nazi Party and its leaders while he was in Germany, he replied he was not in contact with them, but whenever a telegram came from Tokyo it was his duty to deliver it to them.

Asked if when Admiral Doenitz granted permission for him to return to Japan by submarine if he also provided that the new Nazi Party's group leader of the foreign division should accompany him, he replied his understanding was that they were merely fellow passengers. The name of this group leader was Spahn. Asked if upon Spahn's arrival he advised the witness and OKA and others in regard to methods to make the IRAA as strong as the Nazi Party, he replied he never talked with either OKA or Spahn on such matters.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. ROBERTS.

* The witness stated he had met OKA from time to time since the days when he served on a submarine, but had never felt that OKA did things on his own other than matters on which he received orders.

33365 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3472 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that from 1 July * 1935 to 15 November 1937, he was on the staff of Section One of the Naval Affairs Bureau, in charge of organization and personnel. From 15 November 1940 to 14 July 1942, he was Chief of the Section and had charge of matters relating to armaments and administration. During this period the Director of the NAB was the accused OKA, and the witness was one of his subordinates.

33366 * OKA exerted his best to avoid war with the U. S. and expressed himself as being constantly worried because the negotiations could not be concluded. The witness recalled that early in August 1941, OKA appeared very happy, telling the witness that the government wanted him to commandeer a steamer. The matter could not be made public yet, but KONOYE was determined to meet the U. S. President for direct negotiations. The witness told OKA that the matter might leak out if the Cabinet were to hire a steamer. so it would be better to make it appear the Navy had commandeered it for use in the China Incident, and for the Cabinet to make the necessary disposition of expenses.

When the head of the Bureau of Education raised the question that the singling out of these telegraphy instructors would disrupt naval training. OKA said it was necessary, since the conclusion of the negotiations was vital. During the period the witness served under OKA. He had never seen OKA appear so happy as when he ordered him to make preparations for the Nitta Maru and when he had announced KONOYE had decided to see Roosevelt.

33368 * The Nitta Maru remained moored in Hokohama Harbor until after the outbreak of war, and the removal of the additional wireless apparatus and the assumption of her duties did not commence until after the war broke out.

With respect to the point in the negotiations involving withdrawing troops from China, OKA stated he favored withdrawal so the incident would be settled promptly and Japan not plunged into war with the U. S., and exerted his best efforts to avoid it. If the negotiations took a favorable turn OKA's face brightened, but if they became unfavorable he looked unhappy and hardly spoke.

In January 1941, when a lecture sponsored by the Central Prices Cooperative Council was held, sponsors requested OKA to * express the Navy's views. OKA, after obtaining permission, dispatched the witness as his representative. It was OKA's idea that the development of the state should be along peaceful economic lines. Therefore he instructed the witness to deliver a lecture according to these lines.

33370

On additional oral examination, the witness was asked about his testimony previously concerning the authority of the Navy Minister over POWs, (T. 27354-370), and was asked if there was any specific provision in the ordinance relating to the organization of the Navy Ministry which fixed * responsibility over POWs. He replied there was no regulation clarifying that point.

* The witness was reminded that he had previously testified that Section 1 of the NAB, after 8 December 1941, was the section handling matters pertaining to POWs. He stated that he had testified that although the Ministry regulations contained no allusion to POWs, nor was there reference to POWs in the business regulations, since such matters belonged to general naval administration, POW affairs came under the first section.

Asked if he had not also testified previously that Section 1 handled liaison work in connection with POWs and that Section 2 handled matters relating to international points affecting POWs, he replied he had said that Section 2 was a sort of clearing house for matters concerning international regulations regarding POWs.

* In his present affidavit he had stated that the Nitta Maru's duties as the Navy's commandeered steamer actually commenced after the war with the U. S.

* From exhibit 2866, an excerpt from the KONOYE Memoirs regarding the progress of Japanese-American negotiations during the time of the 2nd and 3rd KONOYE Cabinets, it was stated that the proposal for understanding was to announce in the form of a joint declaration an agreement between the two governments on several fundamental items necessary to break the deadlock. Detailed agreements were to be arranged by a joint conference to follow the joint declaration.

In view of the importance of the matter, KONOYE summoned a conference of high government and military leaders that very night. The government was represented by the Home, War, and Navy Ministers, and the Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Chiefs of the Army and Navy General Staffs represented the Supreme Command. Also represented were the directors of the Military Affairs Bureaus of the War and Navy Ministries and the Cabinet Secretary.

* There was no denying that despite his outward demeanor, the Foreign Minister was giving constant thought to the handling of the pending problems. It was learned later that MATSUOKA had closely examined the text of the American proposal and its revision. Deliberations on the proposal for understanding thus began again, and joint conferences were held on July 10 and 12 to consider the U. S. proposal of June 21. It should be noted that the army and navy ministers remained in office, and that the important post of Foreign Minister was occupied by a navy representative, for the navy was most concerned with the American question. The cabinet was given the additional privilege of holding joint conferences with the Supreme Command in the Palace, and launched immediately upon the * attainment of its objectives.

The previous cabinet, in its last days, had drawn up a counter-proposal to the U. S. proposal of June 21, and had dispatched it on July 25. In spite of this, the embassy at Washington had not yet presented it to the U. S. first, because of the change and second, because of fear its contents might not be acceptable. This was made clear by a cable from NOMURA on the 22nd, and on the 23rd he requested he be informed of the new cabinet's policy.

From exhibit 2913, an excerpt from the Pearl Harbor Attack, being additional memoirs of KONOYE, it was stated that at the beginning there were opening remarks by the Navy Minister, who said that they had come to a crossroads where they must determine either peace or war. He should like to leave the decision entirely up to the premier. If they were to seek peace, they shall go all

If after they had gone on for two or three months and it was said they would not do and that there must be war, the navy would be put to inconvenience. If there was to be war, it must be determined here and now, for this was the final moment of decision. If it was decided not to have war, Navy Minister OIKAWA stated he would like to have them proceed on the policy which would bring the negotiations to fruition no matter what happened. Thus KONOYE replied that if they were to say that war or peace must be determined here, he himself would decide to continue the negotiations.

33379 * The accused identified and verified exhibit 3473 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that the accused was born in 1890, was admitted to the Naval Academy in 1908, and until 1923 studied as a student in various naval schools, in addition to being a member stationed in France for military research, and instructor in naval schools and the Naval College. He was decorated for merit in April 1934 for the Manchurian Incident, and in May 1942 for the China Incident. These awards were the same as those made to thousands of naval men. In addition, the awards made to him were below those made to the most meritorious.

33382 In October the same year he was assigned for duty in the General Staff and concurrently in the Navy Ministry, and was transferred to the Investigation Section, which was temporarily organized. From October 1932 to April 1934 he was in Paris and Geneva as a member of the delegation on the League of Nations Permanent Military Commission and as a member of the Disarmament Commission. Upon his return to * Japan he served in the Temporary Investigation Section of the Navy Ministry. After a term at sea on December 1, 1937, he was assigned in the General Staff and concurrently in the Ministry.

During this period he was not connected with any current problems. Therefore, with respect to the Manchurian Incident and conclusion of the Anti-Comintern Pact and the outbreak of the China Incident, he did not participate and knew nothing directly in connection with the navy attitude concerning them. From 15 January 1938 to 14 October, 1939 he was Chief of Section 1 of the Naval Affairs Bureau. When he assumed this position, it was six months after the outbreak of the China Incident and after the fall of Nanking.

During this time his appointment as secretary to the Manchurian Affairs Board was routine and merely nominal and coexistent with his tenure in that office from January 1938 to November 1939. He recalled attending no meetings of the board.

* Secretaries to the Manchurian Affairs Board and Councillors to it were appointed from the navy, and the accused, in view of his navy duties, was appointed to these positions. Primarily, the navy had little to do with the Manchurian Affair, and the accused did not do any actual work.

The National General Mobilization Law was enacted in early April 1939, and was brought about in view of the situation which called for the production of war materials in conformity with the expansion of the China Incident. The operation of the law was in the Planning Board's hands, and only in case some matter of interest to the navy was a reference made to Section 2, and at that time the accused, as Chief of the Section, was not connected in any way.

He never heard that the law was set forth in any way for preparing for a war of aggression.

The Cabinet Information Board with which he was connected while he was Chief of Section I was different and on a very small scale compared with the Information Board at the time of the surrender and was utilized only for the exchange of information among Section Chiefs from each Ministry who gathered once a week. No discussions touched upon the strengthening of the Anti-Comintern Pact or International questions, nor was the gathering in a position to discuss these matters. He did not believe the chief of the Board was permitted to participate in a discussion of these problems. He became Chief of the Third Division in the Naval General Staff on 15 October 1939, was promoted to Rear Admiral on 1 Dec. 1939, and held the post until 15 Oct. 1940. The Third Division had charge of gathering and investigating intelligence, was not connected with operations or the disposition of current problems.

The accused did not participate in the Japanese-NEI Negotiations or the Japan-FIC Protocol, the advance into North FIC or the Tripartite Pact. * He became Director of the Naval Affairs Bureau on 15 Oct. 1940 and served there until 18 July 1944. That he served as Director of the General Affairs Bureau concurrently as charged in the personal history section of the indictment was a mistake, as there was no such bureau in the Ministry.

On 1 Dec. 1942 he became a Vice Admiral. 18 July 1944 he was appointed Navy Vice Minister, serving as such until 5 Aug. 1944. On 9 Sept. 1944 he was appointed Commander of the Shanghai Naval Station, and retired on 23 June 1945. As set forth in regulations, the NAB, like other bureaus in the Ministry, received orders from the Minister who performed its routine functions under the Vice Minister's supervision. The director, like other directors, assumed responsibility in his official duties only to the Minister.

* With reference to matters pertaining to the Navy Minister's decision, the Director and Bureau Chief merely performed routine procedure as they were consistently regarded as nothing more than organs in the nature of aides to the Minister. They could be considered as part and parcel of the Minister, and therefore the Director of the NAB was never in position to assume any independent responsibility vis-a-vis outside contacts. He became Director after the Tripartite had been signed. The China Incident had been considerably expanded, relations with U.S. and Britain had become strained. Japan was economically embarrassed and it was a time when something should have been done, coping with the situation through diplomatic channels.

He was informed that Foreign Minister MATSUOKA had planned to turn U.S. relations to the better on the basis of the Three Power Alliance, but with a lapse of time, MATSUOKA's diplomacy took an opposite turn and relations with the U.S. were in an inverse proportion to the Japanese-German rapprochement. Because the U.S. negotiations which started in the Spring of 1941 did not progress satisfactorily, MATSUOKA was forced to resign. The 3rd KONOYE Cabinet was formed and KONOYE poured his full strength in the negotiations and to that end TOYODA was chosen Foreign Minister. At that time Navy Minister OIKAWA held high hopes that the negotiations would be concluded and exerted everything in his power to that end. As Director of the NAB, the accused had charge of routine handling of the matter and exerted his best efforts toward the successful conclusion thereof.

The outbreak of the European War, U.S.-British aid to China, the Tripartite Pact, and MATSUOKA's policy, vis-a-vis U.S. involved many delicate problems with regard to the negotiations. Public opinion, and that within the government and Supreme Command, was high and fear existed that if a misstep was made a great disturbance would be created.

As for the Navy Ministry it was most vital that a compromise in the negotiations should be reached. So it constantly cooperated with KONOYE, who entertained an ardent hope to find a way to resume relations with U.S. Upon appointment of NOMURA as Ambassador and TOYODA as Foreign Minister as being most appropriate to readjust relations, OIKAWA did everything to support them. The accused knew that OIKAWA urged KONOYE to use his political judgment in arriving at a decision in the negotiations and the Navy gave its whole hearted support.

With respect to domestic procedure, first of all the Foreign Office drafted the plan of negotiations. Upon the basis of this plan it was deliberated upon by various quarters, including the Supreme Command and a unanimous decision was reached which would be telegraphed to the Ambassador, but because of the situation in the country, it was difficult to formulate a drastic plan. It was not within the province of the department of the accused.

The construction of Exhibit 1115 (T. 16970) was denied by KIDO (T. 31238) and was borne out by Exhibit 1207-A, an extract from TOGO's interrogation. The latter was with reference to a note written by the Foreign Office concerning negotiations in which the statement appeared that the note was written by the Foreign Office but the responsibility rested with the participating members of the Liaison Conferences.

In Exhibit 1207-A also appeared the statement that as TOGO had said previously, members of a Liaison Conference responsible for the study and discussions were TOGO, SHIMADA, SUGIYAMA, NAGANO, TSUKADA, ITO, KAYA, SUZUKI, and the three secretaries, HOSHINO, MUTO, and OKA.

* As to Cabinet members, they were responsible for Cabinet decisions, even on matters outside their respective offices. This was also confirmed in the testimony of YAMAMOTO (T. 25901). The idea that a Bureau Director could possibly be responsible for drafting a complete government formula was preposterous. It was this erroneous conception which had led the prosecution to build a fallacious understanding of his real duties.

About Aug. 1941, KONOYE announced his intention of personally conferring with Roosevelt to find a way for compromise. Because the negotiations made no headway, OKA presumed that KONOYE felt no opportunity should be lost as it was realized this was the most appropriate way to bring about a successful conclusion of the negotiations.

* The Navy had confidence in KONOYE and believed that if he were clothed with full power and given wide discretion, a drastic proposal could be formulated and pave the way for concluding the negotiations. OKA was ordered by the Navy Minister secretly to have a merchant ship stand by and made preparations for it to sail at any time. However, the contemplated interview did not materialize because it seemed the U.S. first desired to fix the basic principles, after which to put the finishing touch at the conference which was contrary to KONOYE's intention. The Navy then took the view that with reference to the negotiations, the withdrawal of troops from China and elsewhere would not be prejudicial. OKA understood that Admiral YAMAMOTO also suggested this to KONOYE as did OIKAWA. It seemed there was strong opposition within a quarter of the Supreme Command to such a move. Utmost caution was required not to bring about disunity between the army and navy, and it was dealt with as a political issue among the Ministers. OKA believed this was a reason why the Navy Minister maintained that it should be entrusted to the Premier. The position of the Navy in opposing war had at all times been well defined. As late as the Third KONOYE Cabinet, it remained adamant that war should be avoided if possible.

A quotation from the memoirs of KONOYE (T. 10254) showed that KONOYE stated that OIKAWA had said "Let the decision as to whether there was hope for a successful conclusion of the negotiations be left in the hands of the Premier and Foreign Minister and as for the Navy, she would comply with that decision. If there was hope for a successful conclusion of the negotiations, they wanted them to be continued. OIKAWA added that if they were to rely on negotiations, they should be carried out thoroughly. They wanted success at all costs and a decision of the Prime Minister, and they wished to comply with this decision.

KONOYE made an additional remark (T. 10263) and said that at the meantime it became known that since the Navy had not the will to Page fight but couldn't say so herself, she was appealing to the Premier through OKA by way of Chief Secretary TOMITA for the Premier to express it. As an outcome, MUTO of the MAB, called on TOMITA requesting the Navy be asked to make a definite statement. When TOMITA relayed this to OKA, he stated the Navy could say no more and that she would comply * with the Premier's decision. Although the above statements were not exactly correct, they proved that at the time when the negotiations were carried on between the Premier and Navy Minister it was clear that his participation in the negotiations were official acts as Liaison Officer and he was merely delivering the messages of higher officials. The Navy Minister stated that KONOYE's resignation would bring about hopelessness in the conclusion of the negotiations and desired he should assume a tenacious attitude.

KONOYE also entertained a strong determination and in early October OKA heard from TOMITA that KONOYE was determined to attempt to continue the negotiations and under no circumstances would he resign. OKA was encouraged, but in mid-October the resignation of the Cabinet suddenly took place. OKA was informed by the Navy Minister that after the cabinet meeting on Oct. 14, it was proposed to hold a conference of the Premier and the Foreign, War and Navy Ministers. During the cabinet meeting there was heated argument between the War and Foreign Ministers and as a result it was felt no useful purpose could be served by holding the proposed Four Ministers' Meeting, and it was called off.

The Navy Minister also advised OKA that it was intended in the contemplated conference of the Foreign Ministers he would reiterate the Navy's stand that it would leave the matter of war or peace in the Premier's hands.

33397 * That night TOMITA called on OKA, informing him of the Cabinet's decision to resign en bloc. TOMITA told him he was asked by the Director of the MAB, MUTO, to inquire that if the Navy would state that it would be unable to fight, the Army would be quieted. TOMITA said he replied to MUTO that it would be difficult for the Navy to state this and OKA agreed.

Then OKA asked TOMITA about his opinion to hold the Four Ministers Conference to confer on the matter but TOMITA replied it was too late.

33398 The Navy became apprehensive over the prospect of the negotiations and was concerned over the next cabinet. After the resignation of the cabinet, Navy Minister OIKAWA heard from KONOYE that Prince HIGASHIKUNI should head the next cabinet * and they were wondering what the Prince's idea would be in connection with the negotiations. When the report reached them that TOMITA was commanded to form the new cabinet, they were surprised and the Navy

Page Minister and the rest of them were taken aback. OKA felt that for the War Minister to become Premier would make the prospect of negotiations all the more difficult and found it hard to understand what was in the minds of the senior statesmen. Thereafter, he discussed this with TOMITA, who said that according to KONOYE the step taken would be the best policy in coping with U.S.-Japanese relations. OKA felt the position inconsistent and was hard put to understand it.

Since TOJO was ordered to form a Cabinet, it became necessary for the Navy to exert its efforts all the more toward the negotiations. OKA thought it best for OIKAWA who was conversant with past developments to remain in the new Cabinet but he refused and SHIMADA was appointed. When SHIMADA became the new Minister, there was no change in enthusiasm with regard to the negotiations. As a condition for accepting the portfolio, SHIMADA urged TOJO that the negotiations be expedited and upon assumption of his post, he instructed the Vice Minister and Bureau Director that utmost effort should be made to avoid war with the U.S. and the way should be paved to consummate the negotiations by overcoming all difficulties. It was clear the Navy did not want war. It was their desire to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion. No logical conclusion could be drawn from the evidence which would support charges that OKA aided, abetted or otherwise engaged in any plan of conspiracy to wage aggressive war. On the contrary, he and his superiors diligently endeavored to avoid war. He never met, and consequently never spoke to the defendants KIDO, ARAKI, DOIHARA, HATA, KOISO, MATSUI, MINAMI, OSHIMA, UMIZU, OKAWA, SHIRATORI and HIROTA.

Japan's final reply to the U.S. note was drafted by the Foreign Office and delivered to OKA by YAMAMOTO of the Foreign Office. As was customary, he ordered his subordinates to study it. OKA sensed it was inadequate as a final note and felt it would be appropriate to insert the wording that Japan reserved freedom of action. Accordingly, this wording was inserted in the draft and related to YAMAMOTO. When the draft was distributed by the Foreign Office at the Liaison Conference in early December, OKA discovered the suggested revision was not made. After the conference, he asked YAMAMOTO whether that could be regarded as the final note and he replied in the affirmative.

* At that time OIKAWA was of the opinion that the problem of diplomatic procedure should be carried out on the Foreign Office's responsibility and because he personally lacked knowledge of such procedure, he relied on Foreign Office authorities.

The Navy Ministry was not involved in the problem concerning the despatch of the final note prior to the outbreak of the war.

Page To his knowledge neither the discussions were had with the Navy Minister or Vice Minister nor was the Ministry asked by the General Staff pertaining to the problem, and he assumed the Foreign Office would adopt the appropriate procedure. Such being the situation, he did not give it much thought. He was vague as to the exact nature of Japan's reply and believed it to be an ultimatum and in all probability the Minister and Vice Minister thought likewise. After the war this matter became an issue and when OKA asked TOGO at Sugamo with respect to the question, was told that the reply to the U.S. was not the so-called ultimatum but a last notification.

33402 * TOGO explained that according to the circumstances at the time it had the same significance as a declaration of war. When OKA heard this explanation, he understood what YAMAMOTO meant when he said the draft was all right. With respect to the time in which the final note should be delivered to the U.S., OKA recalled that at the Liaison Conference TOJO stated it would be entrusted to consultation between the Foreign Office and Supreme Command. Later he heard it would be delivered to the U.S. in Washington one hour before the opening of hostilities. He did not remember the date nor from whom or where he heard this except he had a strong impression that it was to be delivered at his time. He was not aware that the time was changed to 30 minutes and learned for the first time after the war that Deputy Chief of the Naval General Staff ITO and the Deputy Chief of the Army General Staff called on TOGO and after consultation with him the time was altered to 30 minutes prior to the opening of hostilities.

33403 * At that time OKA had not heard from any source that the Naval General Staff entertained any idea it would commence hostilities without notice. As he thought the Foreign Office would take the proper procedure, he did not anticipate that any such question would arise and entertained no concern over its progress. Long afterward, when he learned that apparently through the fault of the Embassy in Washington the note was not delivered at the expected hour, he was much surprised.

Personnel affairs were in the hands of the Navy Minister. The basis of shore service of officers was usually two years for the same service and place. When the TOJO Cabinet was formed, both the Vice Minister and Director of the NAB had served for about one year and it was not time for making a shift. It was customary not to shift the Vice Minister, much less the Director of the NAB, even if the Navy Minister was changed. Therefore, the change in personnel did not affect personnel below that of the Vice Minister and there was no precedent for such changes. Even though a cabinet other than the TOJO Cabinet had appeared or one other than SHIMADA had become Navy Minister, such appointment would not have altered the personnel. As a matter of fact, OKA offered his resignation to OIKAWA but he refused to accept it. During his service in the Navy, OKA had not

Page once been assigned for duty in connection with operations. He had been assigned duty in connection with routine planning of an armament program several times and had been connected with it for many years. In Japan the defense plan was drafted by the Army and Navy Supreme Command and after Imperial approval, was submitted to the Premier. Its contents was not a war program but the principal objective * was planning an armament program. As for the Navy, its principal objective was planning a minimum force to cope with the strongest naval power which might attack from the Western Pacific. As far as he knew, this objective was the policy of the Naval Supreme Command which had been conceived prior to the Washington Conference without any alteration until immediately preceding the war. It would be more accurate to regard it in a defensive rather than an aggressive sense.

The General Staff studied armaments which were necessary, taking into consideration domestic conditions. It went into the details and plans for classifications, types of warships, etc., then drafted the proposal and made a request upon the Navy Ministry about every four or five years. The Ministry then investigated and considered expenditures, materials, etc. and consulted and negotiated with the General Staff and prepared a joint plan which was discussed with parties in the government. When unanimously agreed upon, it would be put into operation. The final plan was usually one-half or less than that requested by the General Staff; therefore, the actual strength of Japan's Navy was generally far below that requested by Naval General Staff.

33407 * The result of Japan's construction after the Washington conference was insignificant compared to the American navy's and there was no way of coping with the Vinson and Smith bills. Operational authorities counteracted the American plan by utilizing the limited number of big battleships or devising midget submarines. There was considerable deficiency in the production of aircraft, domestic materials, and industrial capacity. The China incident gave further bangs to naval preparation and it was evident that they could not possibly think of operating against the United States and British navies. The general staff operational plans were not formulated as operations against the U.S. * and Britain. The accused had never seen or heard of any plan or idea to wage such a war and was convinced that they were not formulated.

It was natural for the navy to be constantly apprehensive of relations with the U.S. and Britain becoming aggravated, and the navy desired its adjustment and exerted itself towards that end. While the navy was worried about American naval expansion, the China incident extended with no prospects of termination, American-British aid to China became vigorous and economic pressure on Japan became intense, finally making her feel the threat militarily. It was believed that if these matters were allowed to follow their course the incident could never be settled and they would face a critical situation by being attacked by a third power at any time.

33409 The navy believed there was no other way than the successful conclusion of the U.S. Japanese negotiations and made efforts to that end. The naval general staff how, if it became necessary, to wage war against the U.S. and Britain, and it was natural for it to make plans against an eventuality. The accused was unable to state exactly when the study started and what development took place because he did not participate in them, but it seemed to him that nothing was done in the general staff during 1940.

33409 In October 1941 he heard for the first time the general staff's views from ITO, deputy chief, who said that in the event of war against the U.S. and Britain, the general staff had confidence in the early stage of operations and was a possibility of continuing the war for about a year and one half thereafter, but it could not make a definite statement after that as it depended upon what the war capacity of the nation would be. If war could not be avoided, the sooner the better, and if it should be * the next year they would be challenged by the United States and Britain and would have to submit without exchanging blows.

Page

When OKA heard this, he felt the need of accelerating the negotiations. It was not the navy ideology or plan of operations to wage war against the U.S. and Britain, but it arose out of the China incident when the nation was faced with a critical situation. Then for the first time the matter was studied as a last resort and was not a plan of long preparation. The prosecution had contended that during the closing days of the TOJO cabinet, in July, 1944, the accused SATO and OKA had been maneuvering against YONAI and others to save the cabinet. This must have been predicated on the language of YONAI in the KIDO diary, which referred to the request TOJO made to the navy minister to sound YONAI * as to whether he would accept a portfolio in the cabinet.

Since OKA was vice navy minister at the time he sounded YONAI, after being ordered to do so by navy minister NOMURA, and SATO did not accompany him. YONAI stated he could not join as a cabinet member but would be glad to assist as a military councillor. He also desired SUETSUGU as councillor to assist the chief of staff. OKA had never called on anyone other than YONAI and had not, without orders from the navy minister, conducted himself otherwise. While he was director of the NAI, with three or four exceptions, he attended the imperial liaison conferences as secretary and the investigation committee of the privy council as explained. In none of these meetings was he authorized to participate in the discussions or * exercise the right to vote.

The liaison conference was not based on government regulations and did not make decisions. It was merely in the nature of a round table discussion for the exercise of opinions. When a concurrence was reached, the supreme command and the government would, through their specific organs, carry out their respective tasks. As official clerk, OKA was not a member of the conference and could not add his signature to any matters taken up but could only make explanations when asked to do so, and his primary duty was to supply information.

The secretary's position was different from that of the members and he was not at all responsible for matters taken up. As exhibit 1203 shows, OKA was never present without the navy minister, * and never attended without him, although it showed he did fail to attend some meetings attended by the navy minister. According to exhibit 1209. According to exhibit 1209, an extract from TOJO's interrogations concerning a similar imperial conference held on December 1 or 2nd, TOJO named those who attended those conferences saying they were the responsible people. Continuing TOJO said there were also probably

33414 three in the capacity of secretaries who usually came. These were chief cabinet secretary HOSHINO, chief of the military affairs section of the war ministry MUTO, and chief of the military affairs section of the navy minister OKA. TOJC's remark was significant because only responsible persons who attended could be recalled by him and TOJC was not even certain that OKA was present. * The prosecution placed undue significance on his attendance at meetings of the investigation committee of the privy council, but he attended them only in the company of the navy minister as explainer. The explainer did not express himself or participate in the decisions, but merely accompanied the ministers. (Exhibits 649, 1241, 1266, 1275, and 687.)

33415 While the prosecution had stated that he had attended cabinet meetings, he never attended any nor was he privileged to do so. * It was the practice for the general staff to draw up and draft plans for operations after which the outline was shown to the minister. According to regulations, the navy minister handled all administrative matters and the vice minister, the vice minister, the director of the cabinet, the director of mobilization bureau, and others were members of his suite. Yet they did not participate in the discussions pertaining to the operations' plan or matters within the provisions of the general staff, or imperial headquarter's matters discussed at their meetings.

33416 Personnel were called in to enable them to contact headquarters when it made requests of the ministry in connection with the disposition of administration matters. OKA had not once attended a headquarter's conference nor served in headquarters. No one in the ministry was connected with the plan of operations of either headquarters or the general staff. * Headquarters was divided into an army and navy section and orders were always similarly divided. They were not simply called imperial headquarter's orders. The order pertaining to the Burma-Thailand railroad was the army section's order and it was not connected with naval operations, so that the naval general staff must not have been aware of its contents.

As for the navy ministry, beginning with the minister, no one participated in the matter, consequently any suggestion that the NAB was involved was unfounded (see exhibit 475). With reference to the tripartite alliance and the anti-comintern pact, the prosecution had alleged that as a member of the military affairs committee, he was connected with strengthening them. However, the meeting of the military affairs committee was not of vital importance. It was composed of about 15 members headed by the foreign minister, and included vice

33418 Government ministries were interrelated and there were matters which frequently required collaboration with other ministries. Every ministry created committees on such matters. The navy ministry appointed committee members depending upon the nature of the matters involved. However, as a rule, the director * or a chief of the section was chosen to serve. Actually most of these committees were merely liason and it was sufficient if the navy knew what had taken place and where it was held in most cases. The man in charge of the matters or the section chief would attend and OKA, as bureau director, seldom attended and he did not recall even being mentioned as a member of such committees because they were too numerous.

When appointed, in many cases he accepted on condition he should not be required to attend. A similar situation prevailed with regard to council meetings where matters pertaining to important state policy were never deliberated. He was never present at these meetings. There was no special department in the navy ministry for handling POWs who, when captured, were turned over to the army. POWs captured by the navy were handled by army agencies, such as the POW information bureau.

33419 * If it became impossible to deliver POWs to the army immediately, they were provisionally * earned by the naval unit on the field, or if in Japan by the naval staff. Further procedure was carried out under the commanding officer and OKA assumed the handling of the POWs was conducted according to laws and regulations. The prosecution said that he was responsible for the mistreatment of POWs by quoting testimony of SUZUKI that the note of protest respecting their treatment was dispatched to the navy ministry. However, this witness had admitted that the documents were sent to the chief of the POW information bureau and the chief of the NAB and/or vice minister of war. The only document in evidence, wherein a copy was sent to the NAB, was dated 11 April 1945, one year subsequent to his vacating the post (exhibit 2174).

33422 This incident concerned the combat unit on the spot and the navy ministry was not connected with it. It would be absurd to hold the director of the NAB responsible. * The same could be said with reference to POWs on Mackin wherein the prosecution quoted the testimony of rear admiral ABE to place the responsibility on the central command. This too was learned for the first time at the trial. The statement that oral instructions came from the central command was inconceivable, particularly in the light of the testimony given by TOMIOKA in exhibit 3057.

33423 The prosecution attempted to fix the responsibility for the sinking of merchant ships on the director of the NAB, but this was absurd. Needless to state, the navy ministry, much less the NAB did not participate in matters pertaining to combat strategy. There was no evidence of a policy of the central command wantonly to kill survivors of sunken ships or mistreat prisoners. Exhibit 3054-C and similar orders showed the contrary. The prosecution had an unintentional misconception of the importance of the * office held by him as director of the NAB, for * was a clerical bureau subordinate and responsible to the navy minister, and he was never in a position to determine matters of state policy.

His presence at many policy-making conferences was always as a secretary. He was aware of stories circulating after the war concerning his alleged power and influence among a so-called "group" but there was no basis for these. He had always been opposed to groups and factions and the mere suggestion of his participating in such a group was erroneous and revolting to him. He was devoted to performing his duties in accordance with regulations and was careful to guide his actions and those of his subordinates under the best traditions of the navy.

33424 He was never in a position, politically or otherwise, and consequently did not conspire to initiate or wage any wars of aggression or commit any of the * crimes charged against him. He had spent his life in his country's service as a naval officer and never swerved from the path of duty.

33425 On further examination the accused was asked to what extent the NAB participated in handling POWs and he replied that in all the regulations of the military there was none providing for the treatment of POWs. Matters relating to them were handled as matters belonging to general naval administration. Drafts relating to these affairs were drawn up by the assistants to the navy minister and in the * navy ministry they were the NAB, the legal bureau, the intendance bureau, and sometimes the medical bureau and the munitions bureau. In many cases these rules had already been established when he came to office he had nothing to do with these matters while in office.

33426 The second matter handled was liason with various offices with regard to handling POWs and this was mainly by the NAB. The third point was demands coming to central authorities from units at the front in regard to handling of POWs. The question of funds relating to their internment, supplying clothes and medicine were generally handled by units at the front. When they found their own resources inefficient, they would make demands on the ministry which would be handled either by the intendance, medical, or the munitions bureaus. * In regard to actual supervision or control of POWs in battle areas, the fleet commander was in supreme authority. In the homeland the supreme authority was either the commander of the naval station or the commander of a minor naval station where POWs were similarly interned.

The minister's position vis-a-vis commanders was that since he led all navy men and civilians attached to the navy, he had supervisory powers.

33427 * CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY
COUNSEL FOR UMEZU

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that the navy had little to do with the Manchurian affair and consequently did not do any actual work concerning it. The accused recalled the naval mission being established in Manchuria soon after the incident, and believed the organization later abolished and transferred its duties to the naval attache in Manchukuo. Asked whether he knew the office was established with or without consultation with the army, he replied he did not know the circumstances surrounding its establishment nor what kind of work the mission was engaged in.

33428 * Asked whether it was responsible to or under the jurisdiction of the C-in-C of the Kwantung army, he replied he didn't know, but judging from the structure of the mission, he believed that while it had relation with the Kwantung army, it was not under its command. He believed that the mission or naval attache's office, as it later became, had the guidance of the Manchukuan navy. Asked if it was true that the Japanese navy had priority in imports from Manchukuo of iron ore and other materials, he replied he knew nothing about that.

33429 * Asked if he knew that the Japanese navy had a priority for imports of diesel fuel for submarines, he replied he didn't know whether they had priority but knew that the navy did get oil from the Fushun area.

33430 * Asked if he knew whether the Japanese navy had officers dispatched to and stationed in the Manchukuo munitions plants, he replied he didn't know about that nor did he know that those officers were stationed there and they assumed authority to guide the production of munitions.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY

33431 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that he learned that the final note to the U.S. would be delivered in Washington one hour before the opening of hostilities, and that it had been so decided after consultation between the foreign ministry and the supreme command, the accused was asked if this meant that he learned that the note was to be delivered at * a time which, as the naval high command knew, was one hour before the commencement of hostilities, or was it his understanding that the foreign ministry knew that the time so set was one hour before the commencement of hostilities. He replied that in the negotiations of the naval general staff with the army general staff and the foreign ministry, he believed that the negotiations were conducted on the basis of the actual time. Asked if, while the high command knew the actual time, he had any reason to believe that the foreign minister or any foreign ministry official knew what would the actual time of attack be, he replied he didn't know.

33432 * He didn't believe that the time for which the attacks were scheduled were ever mention in a liason conference. He knew it himself and believed he probably heard it from the naval

33434 Asked if he was at that meeting, he replied he was not and he learned only after the end of the war. Asked if he had any reason to believe that the foreign minister knew or was at that meeting told at what time the attack would take place, he replied he didn't know about that. He didn't recall the points of attack ever being mentioned in the liason conference. Regarding his part in drafting or revising the final note to the U.S., he had some difficulty in recalling the details, but it came to him that the draft was originally drawn in the foreign office and then passed on to the navy minister, then he gave it to his subordinates and ordered them to study it well. This was a practice he had always done in regard to similar drafts.

33435 * His subordinates told him it would be better to insert words to the effect that they would reserve freedom of action. OKA agreed and immediately contacted the director of the American bureau of the foreign office YAMAMOTO informing him about it. When the note was distributed at the liaison 33436 conference, he saw no wording as he had suggested and * when the conference was concluded, he asked YAMAMOTO if it would be an ultimatum, and YAMAMOTO replied yes, that it was perfectly all right. This was his only connection with the preparation of the revision of the final note.

33437 He did not recall other proposed revisions which were or were not accented and added to the note. This revision of his was a matter he had entirely forgotten until after the end of the war and * after the trial had been in progress for several months. Asked if in fact he didn't remember it until Captain SHIBA told him it had haapened, he replied he knew of it before that.

33438 Before being interned in Sugamo he was interrogated by the prosecution, who asked him if he and MUTO did not go to the foreign office and ask TOGO to have the wording changed. On being asked this sudden question, he was unable to recall the circumstances and told the prosecution to that effect. When he entered Sugamo he met TOGO who told him that he himself did not recall that * he and MUTO ever came to see him on that point. It seemed that the prosecution's question was based on the interrogation of TOGO and therefore he asked TOGO why he was asked that question.

TOGO told him that YAMAMOTO's first draft and second draft were quite different and YAMAMOTO told TOGO that the revision had been made at the request of the ministries concerned. Therefore TOGO thought the revision was made at the request of the war and navy ministries and that was why TOGO had replied as he did. This is how OKA was able to find out that the fact that he was unable to remember ever going to TOGO to ask for a revision was correct and actually he had not gone to TOGO to do so.

33439 In his interrogation he said that he believed he had not gone to see TOGO and he did not think any revision had been made. On thinking the matter over he felt that he had seen the draft somewhere. After the trial commenced he contacted his defense counsel who told him that Captain * SHIBA had said certain things, then for the first time OKA remembered what SHIBA had told him. OKA may have asked TOGO on this point in Sugamo because he wanted to know whether he had actually visited TOGO or not.

Also what he told YAMAMOTO at the liason conference was something he himself recalled. Since YAMAMOTO was also a secretary and MUTO was another, MUTO must have heard it on the same occasion. OKA asked MUTO about this and MUTO said he didn't remember it. Then he made sure once more about SHIBA's recollection of the affair, and finding out that it was sure, he wrote it in his affidavit. He didn't recall when he took up with YAMAMOTO the question of revising the draft, but believed it must have been in the beginning of December, probably after the imperial conference of 1 December.

The accused was reminded that his affidavits stated that after this wording was inserted in the draft it was related to YAMAMOTO. He now said he didn't know if this was done by telephone or messenger. He said this was as he had stated. He forgot to say before that he had also asked YAMAMOTO on this point some time ago since the trial commenced.

33441 YAMAMOTO said that *neither OKA's proposed revision of the draft nor his talk with him as the liason conference was in his memory. After preparation of the draft had been either related or sent to YAMAMOTO, he had never talked with him nor anyone else in the foreign ministry about the matter.

Asked if when he attended the subsequent liason conference and found distributed a draft of a final note without the clause inserted, if he then called attention to that question, he replied that he didn't call anyone's attention to it except as he had mentioned before, after the conference finished. He had not mentioned the matter before the liason conference nor during the conference to the navy minister. Asked if in his interrogation he had stated he had taken no part whatever in making up the final draft or revisions thereto and had merely

33442 * read it and didn't even know when he had first read it,*he

33443 answered that he didn't recall the exact language he used in the interrogation but did reply that he knew nothing at all at that time on the general point of the preparation of the note.

33445 * The accused was asked if, in his interrogation he was not asked if he recalled a discussion between TOGO and NAGANO and ITO regarding notification of the U.S. prior to any attack, to which he answered that he recalled it. The accused stated that he remembered this question but also remembered that his reply was exactly opposite to that which had just been read to him. The reply he gave to the prosecutor at that time was that he did not recall any such conversation.

33446 * To the accused was read a purported question and answer in his interrogation in which, when asked the gist of the conversation between TOGO, NAGANO, and ITO regarding notification prior to any attack he replied he didn't know what it was. The accused stated that this question and answer were correct as read. Asked why he said he didn't know the contents of any told the prosecutor at the time in regard to the liason conference that the form in which they were conducted were such that no special subjects were decided beforehand. A more or less free exchange of views was held and people participating in that conference just talked with their neighbors on various subjects; so that not all the secretaries knew all that was going on in the liason conference. If anyone participating affirmed that he had said a certain thing to someone at the conference someone else at the conference could not deny that. He, himself, could not recall anything of that nature. His position was that if it happened he didn't know of it, and if that answer was recorded in his interrogation it was incorrect.

* DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. LOGAN

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that OKA was surprised when he learned TOJO was commanded to form a new cabinet and that he was hard put to understand how that would aid American-Japanese peace negotiations. The accused stated at that time he had no talks with TOJO to ascertain what his intent was at the time. He did not know what took place at the senior statesmen's conference and did not recall at that time that admirals YCNAI and OKADA had opposed a navy man as a new premier.

33449

* Asked if in forming his opinion at that time he took into consideration that TOJO was able to control the army when peace negotiations became successful, he replied that he had never thought of that. Asked if he was of the opinion at the time that a navy man could have controlled the army if the negotiations were successful, he replied he had never thought of that either. Asked if he had changed his opinion after hearing these facts from what it was at the time they occurred, he stated that there was no difference, it was just as he stated it in his affidavit.

Today, after hearing of all the various * facts presented before the tribunal, he could only deepen the feeling he held at the time and at that time he formed his opinion without knowing those facts.

33451 that opposed any change of the final draft as suggested by him, he replied that the proposed change was a mere suggestion by the NAB, who just happened to think of that and suggested it to the foreign minister. It was not a strong assertion on their part. The navy minister's policy was that the * foreign office should bear full responsibility in these problems. The naval affairs bureau merely thought of the proposed change and brought it to the attention of the director of the American bureau of foreign office.

He didn't think he even told the navy minister about it. He did believe that his subordinate, before bringing this proposed change to him, did contact someone in the navy general staff. In view of the attitude of the navy ministry and the navy general staff at the time, it would have been anyone who would have opposed it. He himself passed it on to the foreign office without even bothering to tell the navy minister about it because he felt certain that SHIMADA would be certain to agree

*When asked if between 1931 and 1945 he was mainly in Navy Headquarters at Tokyo or in naval duty he replied that he had spent some time at sea and was stationed for a time abroad but for the greater part he was in Tokyo. More than ten of the fourteen years from 1931 to 1945 he was attached to Navy Headquarters and he was promoted to Rear Admiral on 1 December 1939 and was promoted to Vice-Admiral, the second highest rank in the navy, on 1 December 1942.

He received a decoration for services in the China Incident. In his affidavit he had listed this and three other decorations received and in addition he had received a fifth from the Nazis Government on 9 February 1940. Asked why he omitted this Nazi decoration from his affidavit he replied he omitted several Japanese decorations also and merely listed those received for services during war. Asked if this decoration was not awarded him for services in connection with services in the conclusion of the anti-Comintern Pact he replied that he had not yet been given it but since he had nothing to do with the conclusion of the Pact he surmised it was for something else.

33457 *Asked if his many years in the navy's chief political bureau and his promotions, decorations and activities did not indicate that he was very successful in giving TOJO and his navy supporters, such as SHIMADA, unquestioning obedience he replied this was completely contrary to the facts. The Navy Affairs Bureau had nothing to do with politics * and only the Navy Minister had authority to participate in political affairs. In accordance with navy traditions he had never heard of a Navy Minister positively engaging in political action. The decoration referred to was granted for meritorious service in connection with the China Affairs. The number of naval officers granted decorations of Class 2 and 3 of the Order of the Golden Kite numbered several hundreds. YONAI was given Class 1 and OKA Class 4, but the decoration was received for services rendered up to April 1940. *He received his decoration later in 1942 and it had nothing to do with anything he did after April 1940 nor did it have anything to do with Premier TOJO or Navy Minister SHIMADA.

33462 The accused was reminded that in his affidavit he had stated that there was no basis for the rumor that he had power and influence among a so-called group. Asked what group he referred to *he replied that he was not pointing to any specific group but was just referring to various individuals. Furthermore, he did not know what activities these groups engaged in. While he was Chief of Section 1 and subsequently Chief of the NAB there may have been a group of young army and navy officers who favored the use of force in dealing with China, but he knew no specific instances. He had no recollection of meetings with other members of the young officers group in which secret plans connected with the China Affair were carried out.

The accused was asked if it was not true that in June 1938 while he was Chief of Section 1 he and General KAGESA of the Military Affairs Bureau and a certain KISHI dined weekly and talked on matters concerning the China Affair. The accused recalled that

KISHI was KONOYE's private secretary and KAGESA was either a member of the Military Affairs Bureau *or Chief of the Military Affairs Section of this bureau. In accordance with KONOYE's orders KISHI met weekly with the Chiefs of the Naval and Military Affairs Bureaus to exchange information. OKA attended these meetings with the Vice-Minister's permission. He did not recall what was actually discussed but presumed they heard explanations with regard to China from KAGESA who was a China expert. At that time OKA was Chief of

Section 1. *He thought KAGESA was the Chief of the similar section of the Military Affairs Bureau. He did not know if KISHI called this gathering a meeting of the three ministers. Asked if in June 1938 at the time of these meetings KISHI stated that KAGESA would bring over a certain Kai Tsung-wu, who until recently had been Chief of the Asia Bureau of the Chiang Government, and confined him in the army club he replied he might have but he did not remember. He did not remember KISHI stating as to the scheme devised by the young officers that it should be kept a secret and should not be mentioned to the War Minister.

33465

In his affidavit he had stated that as Chief of the NAB he had no authority to determine or approve matters of state policy. *He did not recall a conference with KAGESA of the Military Affairs Bureau on 30 August 1938 concerning plans for the capture of Canton. He did not think this possible because such a matter would be outside the province of the Chief of Section 1 of the NAB. Asked if as a result of that conference he and KAGESA drew up a plan for the capture of Canton, *he replied this could not be possible because such matters were outside the scope of his duties. Asked if he and KAGESA decided that the capture of Canton was only the application of overall policies and could be carried out without prior consideration by the Five Ministers' Conference, he replied that no such decision was ever made. Asked if he and KAGESA decided that to leave Canton operations to the Five Ministers' Conference might give rise to the charge that the Supreme Command's prerogative had been violated, he answered that such decision could not be made by them.

When shown a document, appearing to be a record of the conversation between himself and KAGESA on 30 August 1938, concerning the capture of Canton he stated he had seen the document. Asked if the facts in the document were substantially * correct, he replied he had no recollection with regard to that but only presumed after glancing through it that it appeared to have some information imparted by KAGESA. Asked if it refreshed his recollection if it was recalled to him that the plan was to have land forces land east of Bias Bay to avoid friction with Britain, he replied he had no knowledge of that. He recognized the initials of officials of the East Asia Bureau and Foreign Ministry in the margin of the document. Asked if he had any reason to believe the document incorrect he stated that while his name appeared in it he had no recollection of it. As to the contents it did not say it was a decision reached as a result * of a conference among them and a glance would show that it was nothing more than information heard.

33469 It appeared to him that KAGESA merely imparted information with regard to War Ministry decisions and that was a record of his report. OKA was totally unfamiliar with operational conditions at the time and so could not say whether the contents were true or false. He had absolutely no recollection of a conversation between himself and KAGESA on 30 August 1938. *He could neither deny nor could he confirm the document, he had no recollection of its contents nor familiarity with them.

33470 *Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that the NAB performed routine duties under the supervision of the Vice-Minister and the Director of the NAB was never in a position to assume independent responsibility vis-a-vis outside contacts. Asked if he meant that for all official acts as Chief, the accused SHIMADA alone was responsible, he replied that with regard to government regulations the Bureau Chief constituted merely the staff of the minister and it would amount to that legally. Asked if the bureau was the political and liaison branch of the Ministry, he replied there were no political functions in the NAB and it did not control public relations of the whole navy. Asked what other branch handled public relations, *he answered that all bureaus were the same.

33472 Asked if it was not true that the invitation to attend was made on request of the cabinet he explained that the procedure by which any subject could appear in the Imperial Presence *was difficult, and no one of his own free will attended. Even when secretaries would be in attendance their names had to be channeled through the Imperial Household Ministry. Asked if it was not true that it was decided at that time that since Imperial Conferences should consist of those bearing responsibility for advising the Emperor the Chiefs of the NAB and the MAB were invited to join in addition to the usual members, he replied he did not think so but thought that secretaries were always in attendance in the past. When shown exhibit previously marked for identification, Exh. 3455, the accused was asked if it did not state there that he as Chief of the NAB attended the Imperial Conference of 13 November 1940, *he agreed that it stated this there and when asked if in view of the fact that it was the first conference he had attended, if he remembered being there, 33474 he replied that he thought he attended the meeting. He could 33475 not state that the facts in the document were substantially correct, he thought he attended the meeting because he *attended most of the Imperial Conferences. Asked if he *had any reason to believe the document was not authentic he stated that this was a matter referring to the Imperial Household Department and beyond the scope of his knowledge.

(The document was offered in evidence but rejected as not being sufficiently identified)

33476 The accused stated that he was appointed on 19 January 1939 a government commissioner on matters related to the Navy Ministry in the Diet as Chief of the First Section of the NAB. In this position he did not act as liaison between the Navy and the Diet but his duties were to provide materials and information to explainers whenever questions arose relating to matters in charge of the Navy Ministry.
He was re-appointed to this position yearly from 1940 to 1943.
It was a duty attached to the Chief of * the NAB. ~~He has no~~ ~~recollection~~ recollection of having anything to do with the organization of the IRAA in 1941 and did not recall in March 1941 drafting with MUTO a joint plan for its reorganization.
It was not true that at that time he strongly opposed the weakening of the IRAA and favored a single party system.
When shown a document purporting to be a newspaper article dated 26 March 1941 stating that he and MUTO were drafting a joint plan for the reorganization of the IRAA he was asked if the article was substantially correct and he replied that he had no recollection.

33477 *With regard to the IRAA he was unfamiliar with it at the time of its establishment because he was not then Chief of the NAB. After he became Chief he became a councillor of that body because the Navy was asked that he be one because the government as a whole was to participate but as far as the Navy was concerned it had little interest in the IRAA and there was no evidence of the Navy engaging in any activities with reference to the IRAA. Matters of the kind referred to in the document were completely outside of his recollection. Asked if it refreshed his recollection if it was recalled to him that he and 33478 MUTO as * Chiefs of the Naval and Military Affairs Bureaus had an interview with Cabinet Secretary TOMITA about March 26, at which a detailed account of the government's plan of reorganization of the IRAA was given, he replied there was absolutely no such case.
Asked if he denied that he had taken any part in this joint Navy-Army plan for reorganization of the IRAA, he replied that what

33479 recollection concerning it. When shown a document * the accused agreed that something to the effect of an Army-Navy plan of re-organization of the IRAA was written in the Asahi Shimbun of 28

33480 March 1941. *Asked if the facts stated in the article were substantially correct, he replied that he could not conceive of ever participating in matters relating to the IRAA to that extent because of his lack of interest and there was nothing in his recollection pertaining to the matter. He had no recollection of himself and MUTO interviewing TOMITA in the Prime Minister's residence on 27 March 1941 and presenting the joint plan. Asked if at the interview he and MUTO strongly urged TOMITA to be made the central figure in the IRAA to engage actively in campaigning, he replied he did not think there was anything of the kind. Asked if after the first article appeared * in the Asahi he notified the publishers they were publishing erroneous statements regarding his political activities, he answered he was seeing the article for the first time. According to navy traditions officers were not to engage in politics. Asked if after both these newspaper articles had been published he ever protested against their implicating him in political activities, he replied he had never seen the article before and did not think he did anything of the kind. Asked if he denied the facts in the article, he replied that he had no recollection whatsoever and did not know under what circumstances such an article appeared.

* The accused stated that the NAB did not act as liaison between the General Staff and the Cabinet, nor was it the channel through which the navy made known its policy to the Cabinet and vice versa.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that OKA never attended cabinet meetings, nor was he privileged to do so. Asked if he meant that as Chief of the NAB he was disqualified to attend, or if he meant he was never invited to attend, he answered that he had no qualifications nor was he ever invited to attend. He didn't remember himself and MUTO attending an extraordinary session of the cabinet on 29 August 1941.

* When shown an excerpt from the Tokyo Nichi Nichi for 30 August 1941, he stated it did not appear there that he attended the cabinet meeting of 29 August 1941. He then changed his answer and said that he was slightly mistaken, for he did see that it did say there was an extraordinary session of the cabinet following a regular meeting. He thought this was erroneous reporting, because this was a peculiar expression.

33484

* He had no recollection of Foreign Minister TOYODA reporting at the meeting in recall on the later negotiations with the U. S. in the presence of himself and 33485

MUTO. * Asked if he denied he attended such a cabinet meeting, he stated he didn't think it was a cabinet meeting and furthermore he didn't think he was ever in attendance at a meeting in which TOYODA made a report to cabinet colleagues.

33486

The accused stated he was not opposed to the withdrawal of troops from China, and it was not true that * he strongly insisted upon their remaining there. Asked if he had a meeting with MUTO on 6 September 1941 at the Foreign Minister's official residence at which they discussed basic conditions of settlement of the Sino-Japanese peace, he replied he had no clear recollection, but there were frequent gatherings there to discuss the Foreign Office's plan, and therefore he believed this was one of them. Asked if one of the terms agreed upon by himself and MUTO there was that Japanese troops should remain in

33487

Amoy and Hainan Islands, as well as certain districts in Mongolia and North China, he replied he didn't know the text of the decision, but that might have been the case.

Page

When shown a document and asked if it did not state there the basic conditions for settling the peace as discussed in a conference between himself and MUTO on 6 September 1941, he replied that was not so. It was stated in the document that for the purpose of joint defense, troops shall be stationed in Amoy and Hainan Islands, as well as certain districts of Mongolia-Sinkiang area and North China.

33488

Asked if it was not true that the same conditions and terms were included in exhibit 1245-F, the document containing the proposals of Japan delivered to Grew on 22 September 1941, he replied he had no clear recollection. * Asked if he admitted that the conference mentioned in the document between himself and MUTO took place on 6 September 1941, he replied he remembered neither the date nor the contents.

33489

It said there that MUTO and he conferred, but such a thing was impossible so far as this matter was concerned. He thought it was a Foreign Office plan discussed at a meeting sponsored by that office, with either the Vice Minister or the Director of the American Bureau presiding. If it was that conference, he thought he was in attendance. He didn't think that this was the final plan, although he didn't recall the contents. * He didn't recall the contents nor the date of the conference mentioned in the document, and although the document represented himself and MUTO as having conferred and agreeing on terms, it appeared that the document was a Foreign Office plan in connection with a conference sponsored by it, and it appeared that representatives of the army and navy were called into consultation on the plan.

Asked if it was not true that the basic discussions regarding the stationing of troops in China arrived at at * the conference was the chief obstacle to the successful conclusion of negotiations, he replied, no, not only this.

On 6 February 1941, he probably was appointed to assist the Imperial Commissioner in arbitrating the dispute regarding the border of Indo-China and Siam. Asked if four months later, on 25 June, 1941, he participated in the liaison conference at which it was decided to station troops in Indo-China and Siam to acquire naval and air bases there, by diplomacy if possible or otherwise by armed force, he replied he didn't know whether that was entirely correct, but he did attend a liaison conference which discussed similar matters.

Page He had heard the evidence introduced which showed the total number of liaison conferences he attended from 13 January to 30 June 1941 was 24, but he didn't think this * was correct. (Exhibit 1103). Asked how many such conferences he attended after that period, he replied he thought he attended practically all liaison conferences, but there were times when he was ill and was absent. Sometimes when he was absent because of illness there were press reports to the effect he had attended liaison conferences. so if the total was arrived at from newspaper reports it would be mistaken.

33491 * In his affidavit he had stated that he had attended Imperial and liaison conferences with the exception of three or four times due to illness. * Generally, liaison conference decisions had such weight during that period that they were always approved by the cabinet and Imperial conference. However, the liaison conference was between the high command and government, and he didn't think that purely political matters were discussed.

33492 * In his affidavit he had stated that he had attended Imperial and liaison conferences with the exception of three or four times due to illness. * Generally, liaison conference decisions had such weight during that period that they were always approved by the cabinet and Imperial conference. However, the liaison conference was between the high command and government, and he didn't think that purely political matters were discussed.

33494 Asked if in the conference, he and MUTO made various explanations and even participated, he replied they never participated. * When he stated in his affidavit that the navy did not desire war, he shared in that attitude.

33495 Asked if it was not true that on 14 October 1941 when the KONOYE Cabinet was deposed, the army offered to give way if the navy would come out definitely against war, he replied that he had written in his affidavit that he heard this from Chief Cabinet Secretary TOMITA. Asked if it was not also true that when this offer was reported to him by TOMITA he refused to do it, leaving it up to the premier, he explained that on the 14th TOMITA told him that the cabinet had reached a decision to resign en bloc, and that the Director of the MAB, MUTO, had said certain * things to which TOMITA replied to MUTO that that would be a difficult thing. Thereupon OKA said to TOMITA that it was difficult, and that the navy had constantly pursued the policy of leaving the matter to the premier.

33496 At that time the cabinet had already arrived at a decision to submit its resignation. Hence the matter was brought to him merely by way of information. At the time he told TOMITA that the resignation was extremely regrettable in connection with the successful conclusion of the negotiations, and that if there was any room left he ask TOMITA how about calling the Four Minister's Conference together to impart the full facts to the entire cabinet.

However, TOMITA said it was too late, because the cabinet had already decided to resign. * He didn't recall if for several days before the final draft note to Washington was approved, he and MUTO were in frequent contact with the Foreign Office in connection with drafting many revisions.

Asked if it was not true that Admiral ITO, himself, and MUTO frequently contacted the Foreign Office to present the navy's view that no warning be given which would endanger the surprise attack, * he replied he had never contacted the Foreign Ministry to any such effect.

33499

* Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that in regard to giving the U. S. notice of the commencement of hostilities, he thought the Foreign Office would take the proper procedure and therefore he entertained no concern about this. Asked if he meant he entertained no concern for himself because he thought TOGO was alone responsible, he replied that this meaning was that diplomatic procedure was a matter under the Foreign Ministry's charge; in connection with such matters, the Navy Ministry had no responsibility. * So far as the authorities in his department or ministry were concerned, they would warn or give advice or propose revisions so far as such guidance occurred to them, but inasmuch as the Foreign Office was handling such matters on its own responsibility, they agreed to whatever final conclusion they reached.

Such matters were not only outside the Navy Ministry's duties, but it had no experience in such matters. Asked if it was not true that about 4 a. m. on the morning of 8 December 1941 he telephoned TOGO, reporting on the success of the surprise attack at Pearl Harbor, he replied he didn't recall, but such a thing was possible. He was informed of the success of the attack from his subordinates, and thought they got their information from radio reports. * He didn't remember imparting such information to Foreign Minister TOGO, and the fact that his subordinates might have informed him was merely a supposition. He might have been informed about 4 a. m. that morning about the attack.

He did not deny telephoning TOGO about this, but he didn't recall it. He had stated in his affidavit that he attended meetings of the Investigation Committee of the Privy Council only as an explainer, and did not participate in the decisions.

Page Asked if it was not true that after every committee meeting he attended a meeting of the Privy Council itself, he replied he was not always in attendance, and he never 33502 * participated in any decisions of such Privy Council meetings. He probably attended as an explainer the meetings of the Investigation Committee on 8 December 1941, at 7.30 a. m., at which the bill for declaring war was unanimously adopted.

He didn't recall on 8 December 1941, after this meeting ended, a Privy Council meeting which heard the report of the Investigation Committee and discussed the measure proposing a declaration of war. He didn't recall attending this meeting of the Privy Council, but probably did so as an explainer.

33503 * Asked if at this meeting, he or other committee members were asked to retire prior to the decision, he replied that at any meeting of the Investigation Committee when a decision was taken the explainers were not there. Asked if at this meeting he was not present and joined in the unanimous decision in favor of a declaration of war, he replied there was no case of his participating in the decision, but he had no recollection as to whether he attended.

33504 When shown a document, the accused was asked if it did not state that he and MUTO attended a Privy Council meeting on 8 December 1941, and he replied in it he was included among those present. * Asked if the facts in the document were correct, he replied that he could not say whether it was correct, but it appeared to be a document of the Privy Council. (The document was offered, but rejected on the grounds of insufficient identification.)

33505 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that no special department in the Navy Ministry existed for handling POWs, and the accused was asked if it was not true that the NAB handled matters relating to POWs subsequent to 7 December 1941. He replied that it handled liaison work within the country relating to POWs. * In connection with them, if there were matters requiring contact with the army, they handled that. If there were matters requiring liaison with the Foreign or Home Office, they handled this also, and in accordance with needs, they handled liaison with naval units having POWs in their hands. The navy kept POWs in temporary camps prior to turning them over to the army in some cases. Asked how long they retained these POWs before turning them over, he replied he didn't know the details.

33506 Reminded that he had testified that the Navy Minister had supervisory powers over local commanders of naval stations in the supervision and control of POWs, he stated it seemed the meaning was a little different. The highest authority in connection with the supervision of POWs were commanders of naval stations, fleets, and naval * guard areas. The Minister supervised naval commanders and others in like positions in his capacity as one supervising personnel.

• Asked if it was not true that he, as Chief of the NAB, issued orders concerning POWs held in these temporary camps, he replied he had no recollection of the NAB issuing such orders.

33507 With reference to the 98 American civilians captured on Wake in December 1941 and later executed in 1943, he, as Chief of the NAB, had no supervisory control over such civilians. * Asked if as chief he could have ordered their transfer from the temporary camp on Wake to a POW camp in Japan, he replied he didn't quite remember the circumstances, but remembered after being informed there were POWs on Wake saying it would not be wise to hold them in a distant island, but it would be better to transfer them to the homeland. His recollection was that they were sent to the homeland after consultation with other navy ministry bureaus and departments. In such matters the NAB had no authority to issue orders.

33508 He didn't recall about 30 November 1943 ordering 38 POWs to be transferred from the Ofuna temporary camp to the Army POW camp at Tokyo. Such matters were purely routine and handled by his subordinates, either in his name or in the name of the NAB, and there were many such * matters not within his knowledge. Liaison work within Japan which the bureau handled when necessary, was one of the items requiring internal liaison work. Whenever demands came from the field for the transfer of POWs to the army, the NAB performed the liaison work.

33509 When shown a document, the accused was asked to state whether it was not a secret order issued by the Chief of the NAB while OKA held office to the Chief of the MAB concerning the transfer of 38 POWs from Ofuna POW camp. He stated this was not an order, but an item requiring liaison work. Such matters were handled in his name or in the name of the bureau, and he did not then see any * documents of this kind nor had he any recollection of this. This was not an order but an inquiry in connection with liaison work.

It may be that the document was issued by the NAB while he was chief, but he did not have sufficient data to confirm it. There appeared to be a copy of the seal of the POW Information Bureau but not the seal itself on the document, and under the words Chief of the Naval Affairs Bureau was a square indicating the chief's seal, but was not the seal itself.

Asked if he had any reason to believe that the facts in the document were not substantially correct, he replied he did not know because he did not personally handle the matter and because he had no recollection of it. * He had no recollection as Chief of the NAB of ever ordering the transfer of POWs from the South Seas to camps in Japan.

33511

Asked if it was not true that about 19 October 1942, as Chief of the NAB, he ordered the evacuation of one thousand POWs from Macassar to Sasebo Naval Station, he replied that such matters were handled in accordance with requests made by the authorities in the field. He was not informed of such a matter, nor did he recall anything pertaining to it. He did not recall on the same date directing that Sasebo Naval Station turn these one thousand POWs over to the army and that they should be used for work at a Nagasaki dockyard. He did not think there were any such directions, but didn't remember. He * had no recollection of directing on the same date that the War Ministry Control Department furnish 100 POWs for work in four factories under Navy charge at Osaka and Hiroshima.

33512

* When shown a document, he was asked to state whether it appeared to be an order from the Chief of the NAB while he held that post addressed to the Chief of the War Control Department, dated 19 October 1942, concerning 1,000 POWs to be evacuated from Macassar to Japan. He stated this, too, was not an order, but an inquiry in connection with a matter requiring liaison. There was no seal on the document, but it only said there was a seal. Inasmuch as he did not see the documents at the time, he could not confirm it.

* He had never heard that POWs at Ofuna Camp were given inadequate food and medical care and were severely beaten with clubs, with the result that many died or were permanently injured. Asked if it was not also true that members of Allied submarine crews and airmen were singled out for particularly brutal treatment at Ofuna, he replied he had never heard of the kind of POWs held there nor how many, and such matters as were mentioned were never brought to his attention.

33514 He didn't think that he ever inspected Ofuna camp or caused it to be inspected. Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated that a report covering the name and rank of all POWs held by navy units came within the NAB's jurisdiction. Asked if he meant by this that such reports were forwarded to the NAB from the naval units, he replied that he was referring to inquiries transmitted to the Navy Ministry by the Foreign Office * which were referred to in order to reply to such inquiries. It was stipulated that names, the number and the personal effects of POWs were to be directly notified to the POW Information Bureau by naval units in the field. Details were forwarded to the Ministry only upon specific request. When necessary, inquiries were made by the Ministry to provide information for the Foreign Office, and when necessary, inquiries were handled by the NAB.

33515 Asked if in the course of handling these inquiries the NAB made a report to the Foreign Minister, he stated that the list of names was known to the POW Information Bureau. If inquiries were addressed there, the information could be supplied by that department. He thought that whenever the Foreign Office required certain information it could obtain it from that bureau. When necessary, there were times when the NAB could handle inquiries and communicate to the Foreign Office, but whether it actually * did it he did not know.

The accused was reminded of evidence that from 7 December 1941 to 21 August 1945, the Foreign Ministry received forty notes from the U. S. asking for information about U. S. civilians captured by the navy on Wake Island. Asked if he ever received from the Foreign Ministry a request for information as to such POWs, he stated that he learned of these matters for the first time in the trial. He tried his hardest to recall anything about this. Such matters were purely routine. He did not know whether his subordinates even handled them. He did not mean that TOGO had failed in his duty to forward such notes.

33516 * The accused was reminded of evidence by the witness YA'AMOTO, who served as Chief of Section 1 of the NAB from 1942 until 1945, that the Bureau did receive some protests concerning atrocities on survivors of Allied merchant ships sunk by submarines in the Indian Ocean. Asked if he ever saw or heard of such protests, he replied that during his tenure he had never seen one. (Reference was made to the above testimony at T. p. 27382.)

* The accused was reminded of evidence that the Foreign Minister, by letters dated 12 February and 11 July 1944, forwarded notes of protest concerning treatment of POWs to the Navy Minister. Asked what action his bureau took with respect to these, he stated that not having seen them he didn't know, but the general handling of such documents was that in order to investigate into any incident, inquiries would be addressed to the unit in which the incident occurred to assemble all information pertaining to it. Only after full investigation were replies prepared. So far as these matters were concerned up to this point, they were handled through ordinary channels and required a considerable length of time.

He had examined the protests in evidence during * the period he held office, and discovered that most had very little relationship with the navy. Generally, he thought that the POW Information Bureau had all the information necessary upon which to draw up replies. It was his recollection that copies sent to the Minister or Vice-Minister were sent for reference only. (Reference was made to exhibit 473 and 2173).

Asked if in view of the fact that the evidence showed that copies were received by both the Navy Minister and his subordinate, the Chief of Section 1, if he still denied that he ever saw or heard such protests, he replied that unless he saw a specific document he wouldn't know, but generally he did not think he had ever seen a protest. If copies were sent by the Foreign Office to the Navy Ministry, so many of the matters did not relate to the navy at all that it was customary not to see the protests.

* The function of the Ministry with regard to territories occupied by the navy pertained to military government there. The responsibility for control over POWs resided in the naval unit exercising control, and the highest authority for control was the fleet commander of the unit controlling the POWs. * This was with regard to POWs temporarily interned by the navy prior to transfer to the army.

Asked if he called those temporarily interned that he held on Wake for approximately two years, he stated that all POWs held by the navy were considered to be held temporarily. The Navy Minister had no direct authority over the control of POWs.

Page A part of exhibit 628 entitled "Japanese Foreign Policy" was quoted to the accused, which stated that if any important natural resources should be destroyed, all persons connected with the raw material, and government officials concerned, shall be severely punished as being responsible. * Asked if there were any discussions in the Ministry as to the means to insure that NEI oil fields should not be destroyed, he stated he had no recollection that such a discussion was held.

Asked if while he was in the Ministry it discussed with Foreign Office officials the plan called "Tentative Plan for Policy Toward Southern Regions", the exhibit just referred to dated 4 October 1940, he stated that, * not having been appointed to the post of Chief of the NAB on that date, he did not know how that document was handled or what it was all about. He was appointed on October 15, 1940, but didn't recall this study draft and had no recollection of its contents. * He would not know whether they were discussed also with the General Staff.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. ROBERTS.

33526 * The accused was reminded of his cross-examination by counsel for TOGO, in which there was reference to an alleged discussion between TOGO and Admirals NAGANO and ITO, in which the accused had answered that the answer should have been that he didn't recall. To the accused was quoted a part of his interrogation in which he was asked if he recalled conversations with NAGANO and ITO in which he also supported them in their stand that the war be started with maximum effectiveness, and no notice should be given to the U. S. before attack. To this question the accused had answered that he didn't remember it.

33527 When asked if he recalled the above question and answer, he stated he did. * Additional questions and answers from his interrogation were quoted him. Asked if he had remembered a discussion between TOGO, NAGANO, and ITO, he stated he had heard after the war that there was a discussion between TOGO and ITO.

Asked what he heard, he had answered that before the attack he had not heard it, and the first time was from U. S. sources. He heard it from U. S. sources after the war, from the demobilization board.

Asked if these questions and answers were given, he replied that it seemed different. He thought there was some mistake with regard to such matters as American sources or that he heard it after the war broke out. It appeared that the last answers are the correct ones.

The question asked in his interrogation, if it did not come from American sources, to which he had answered that it did not come from such sources, was a correct answer.

* With respect to the meeting he had with KAGESA in 1938, it was in accordance with a suggestion of the premier and at the orders of the Vice-Minister and the then Chief of the NAB. The purpose of the meeting was the exchange of information, and he had the duty of reporting the information to the Vice-Minister and Chief of the NAB.

In 1941 Navy Minister OIKAWA advocated withdrawal of troops from China, and he had heard that OIKAWA advised accordingly to KONOYE. OKA supported this view.

YAMAMOTO, Yoshio, remained in his post after the accused vacated the post of Chief of the NAB and Vice-Minister.

* He had never issued any order relative to the treatment of POWs, and it was not his duty to inspect or visit POW camps.

The question of the interval of the time between the delivery of the note and the attack on Pearl Harbor was never discussed at the liaison conference.

33547 * In the proceedings before the Commission, the witness identified and verified Exhibit 3479-A as his affidavit.

33550 * The affidavit stated that at the time of the Mukden Incident on 18 Sept. 1931 he was Foreign Minister and MINAMI was War Minister in the WAKATSUKI Cabinet. On the morning of Sept. 19, an extraordinary Cabinet meeting was called and the witness reported the receipt of a telegram from the Consul General in Mukden to the Foreign Office, stating that a little after 10:00 o'clock on the 18th, Chinese troops had blown up the SMR lines in the vicinity of Liu-T'iau-Kou, and clashed with the Japanese Railway Garrison. MINAMI reported he had received a similar telegram from the Kwantung Army. As these reports were brief, the situation was too obscure for the government to make any judgment at that time. * Cabinet meetings were held daily thereafter and the situation on the spot became gradually distinct. MINAMI declared that the General Staff and War Office should make every effort to prevent expansion of the Incident although the Kwantung Army's action originated from its proper aim of guarding the railway. All Cabinet members being in accord decided upon a policy of non-expansion which was proclaimed on Sept. 24.

33552 The WAKATSUKI Cabinet resigned en bloc on Dec. 10, 1931. Up to that time the witness, in cooperation with MINAMI, always did his best to prevent aggravation of the Incident. It was simply a mischievous rumor to circulate such an unfounded story as the one purported that the witness * was at loggerheads with MINAMI on account of their maintenance of opposite ideas at Cabinet meetings and that friction extended even to their personal emotions. Actually, from that time to the present he had been on intimate terms with MINAMI.

* CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. COMYNS CARR

33590 The witness stated that up to the time of the WAKATSUKI Cabinet's resignation he did his best in cooperation with MINAMI to prevent aggravation of the Incident. Before the Incident actually occurred, he had reason to suppose that something of the kind was about to happen. He had no official information but four or five civilian residents in Manchuria came to the Foreign Office and said something extraordinary * was going on. Young officers had come to see them and ordered help as they wanted certain things which should be stored in certain places. They didn't know why the young officers wanted those things and became suspicious that some warlike preparations

Page might be going on, and asked the witness if he had any information about it, but he told them he had none. Since they were in Manchuria, and the witness believed there must be something in their reports, he immediately asked MINAMI to come over for a talk. MINAMI came and the witness said he was suspicious about what he had been told, and told MINAMI that the first thing for him would be to maintain strictest discipline among the young officers there for they should mind their own business and not go about seeking war materials to be stored at different places. * He told MINAMI it was a very serious thing if the report was true and he had every reason to believe it was. MINAMI quite agreed, telling the witness he would do his best to maintain discipline. He had done his best already but the witness reminded him to try again if anything untoward might happen. MINAMI didn't say what he would do but the witness presumed he would come into contact with officers in Manchuria.

* After the Incident broke out, they received a number of telegrams from the Consul General HAYASHI in Mukden and other consuls. MOISHIMA was under HAYASHI in Mukden, KUWASHIMA was Consul General in Tientsin. The witness didn't know whether ARAKAWA was Consul General in Yinkow and in Niuchang, and didn't know definitely whether * YAMAZAKI was an official of the Foreign Office in Liaoyang. TSUKAMOTO was Governor General of Kwantung and YANO was Counsellor in Peiping. It was difficult for him to remember receiving reports from all these persons about what was happening in connection with the Incident. He sent copies of reports from his subordinates to MINAMI and to Premier WAKATSUKI * and the Navy Minister, but didn't think he sent any to anyone else. When the witness was asked whether he sent any to the Chief of Staff, he stated he thought he did. In the case of the more important reports, he brought them up and discussed them in the Cabinet after the Incident.

When shown Exhibit 2193, the witness was asked if it was one he received, of which he supplied a copy to MINAMI. He stated it was difficult to remember * but he did supply MINAMI with copies of practically all the telegrams he received and didn't think he made any exception. * He remembered that he sent a copy of the telegrams to the Army and Navy which bore on the Manchurian Incident and by the Army he meant both the War Minister and General Staff.

* When shown Exhibit 294, the witness stated he noticed there was a telegram from ARAKAWA, the Consul General at Yinkow, and was dated 13 Nov. 1931. He didn't remember exactly whether ARAKAWA was posted at that time in Niuchang (Yinkow).

* When shown a document, the witness agreed it was a telegram from Consul General HAYASHI in Mukden, addressed to the witness, dated 21 Sept. 1931, to which he attached a Foreign Ministry certificate showing it came from their files as one sent to the witness on that date. He identified it as one he had received and there was a copy passed to MINAMI.

* Exhibit 3479-B, the document identified by the witness, stated * that in view of the situation in and around Mukden, the Army Commander on 20 Sept. 1931 would place the area under the temporary administration of Japanese and Chinese, acting under the Army to promote the welfare of both Japanese and Chinese inhabitants.

The Mukden administration area would be limited within the walled city and its foreign settlement and the SMR zone would remain as before. City administration would be conducted at the Municipal Building which would be set up in the walled city, and city administration would include all matters concerning Mukden except as otherwise provided. Officers of the administration were named * and included the accused DOIHARA as Mayor and all were Japanese.

Besides the ones named, other Japanese or Chinese subjects would be employed to take part in accordance with a separate regulation.

* The telegram stated that according to what DOIHARA told MORIOKA, it was scheduled that the Local Preservation Committee organized to maintain peace and order in Mukden should be led and gradually made into the central organ of administration, and a distinguished Chinese should later be appointed by the committee as Mayor. Furthermore, he said it was decided that the self-defense corps now under the * Kempei Tai should be transferred to the committee and unified under the name of the Peace Maintenance Corps and it was also decided to have them organize a considerable number of policemen. To date, 1000 rifles were delivered for this purpose, it was said.

- 33607 Exhibit 3479-D, a telegram from Consul General HAYASHI to SHIDEHARA, dated 3 Oct. 1931, was identified by the witness and received in evidence. * It stated that there was a rumor on the 3rd among certain Japanese residents in Mukden that the organization of the Liaoning Autonomous Government with Yuan Chin-Kai as its leader had been decided upon. A message to this effect was said to have been wired to Japan. This was pure fabrication and HAYASHI had heard that Yuan had told influential Japanese that such a nonsensical report was extremely embarrassing. As for the origin of this incorrect telegram, HAYASHI guessed that Japanese newspaper men were informed that on the 2nd, DOIHARA summoned Ting Chien of the Local Peace Preservation Committee and persuaded him to open financial and business offices. Ting replied he would answer after deliberation with the leaders. They added their imagination and tied it with the establishment of a new regime, spread propaganda about it as if it were an actual fact. In regard to this request by DOIHARA, Yuan Chin-Kai, Ting Chien-Hsiu and others could not foresee the future policy of the Emperor. It seemed that they, hearing of the recent formation in Chinchow of the Liaoning Provincial Government through the instigation of Chang Hsueh Liang, were of the opinion it was impossible at present for the Local Peace Preservation, now a mere organ, to keep public order in Mukden and start such important * administrative organs as financial and business offices. This restricted telegram was transmitted to China, Peiping, Nanking, Tientsin, and to every consul in Manchuria.
- 33610 * The witness identified a document as a telegram from Consul General HAYASHI to himself, dated 6 Oct. 1931, and it was
- 33611 received in evidence as Exhibit 3479-A. * It stated that the Four Peoples Preservation Committee, whose president was Kan Chao-Hsi, was an organization whose establishment as a religious and charitable organization had been authorized by the Municipal Office. Lately, with this committee as the basis, YOSHII, Kiyoharu and
- 33612 others were planning * the establishment of the new political regime and they were trying to negotiate with the army. It was said that the military authorities recognized this would not only have a bad influence upon the Local Peace Preservation Committee supported by the Army, but would be contrary to their fundamental policies, and on the 5th, DOIHARA and gendarmerie detachment commander MITANI admonished Lt. Gen. ISHIMITSU, who came with YOSHII, that it was very unfortunate that he was being taken advantage of by such an adventurer as YOSHII and advised YOSHII to resign voluntarily.
- 33613 * The witness identified a document as a telegram from Consul General HAYASHI to SHIDEHARA, dated 16 Oct. 1931, and it was received

After these appointments had been decided, it was the Army plan to have every Japanese resign his post and utilize Japanese experts as advisors in every field. HAYASHI requested this be withheld from the press for the time being.

A telegram was transmitted to the Minister in Peiping, Nanking, Tsingtao, Tsinan, Tientsin, Hankow, Canton and each consul in Manchuria.

33616 Exhibit 3479-G, next identified by the witness as being a telegram from HAYASHI to SHIDEHARA, dated 19 Oct. 1931, stated * that Chao Hsin-po, though recommended as Mayor of Mukden by the Local Preservation Committee, flatly refused to accept, but upon the earnest advice of DOIHARA, he accepted on the 18th. It had been arranged that within the next two or three days, as soon as preparations for taking over the municipal administration were completed, Chao would formally assume the post of Mayor, and Mayor DOIHARA and all the Japanese Section Chiefs would resign from their posts. This wire was sent to China, Peiping, Nanking, Tientsin, Harbin, and Kirin.

33617 * Exhibit 3479-H, next identified by the witness being a telegram from HAYASHI to SHIDEHARA, dated 27 Oct. 1931, stated * 33618 that Hsieh-Chieh-Shih visited him on the 27th and confided in him that by making a cat's paw of Lo Chen-Yu, some of the staff of the Kwantung Army attempted at first to draw out Emperor Hsuan Tung (Pu-Yi) to Manchuria, but this plan did not make much headway owing to the Emperor having backed out as result of Kashi, Commander of the Tientsin Garrison Troops having advised the Emperor to be prudent. Therefore, by despatching a certain UEZUMI (?) a political free lancer to Tientsin to consult Pattalion Commander SAKAI, possessing radical views, they planned to kidnap the Emperor to Tangku where he was to be put in a cargo boat and then landed at Yingkow. Their plan could not be realized due to the strict watch kept by the Japanese police. It had been arranged to newly entrust DOIHARA with this mission and DOIHARA left Mukden secretly for Tientsin via Dairen with a political free lancer named OTANI, Takeshi on the evening of the 26th. On arriving at Tientsin, they were expected to resort to some suitable measure for executing the plan.

The other day Staff Officer MIURA of the Garrison Troops came on a visit to Mukden for liaison purposes in this matter. The

- 33621 * Exhibit 3479-J, next identified by the witness as a telegram from Consul General HAYASHI at Mukden to SHIDEHARA, dated 7
- 33623 November 1931, stated * that as a result of pressure brought upon Yuan Chin-Kai by Army Headquarters on the night of the 6th, morning of the 7th, the Local Peace Preservation Committee held an executives' meeting and decided to add to the decree on acting for the regime the words that it would sever relations with the old regime of Chang Hsueh-liang and the National Government as required by the Army, and this was to be published on the 8th. This wire was relayed to China, Peiping and Tientsin.
- 33624 * Exhibit 3479-I, next identified by the witness as a telegram from Consul General HAYASHI to SHIDEHARA, dated 28 Oct. 1931,
- 33629 stated * that in a prefecture, a prefectural Autonomy Guidance Committee should be established under the supervision of the Local Autonomy Guidance Office, which should guide and supervise the prefectural Autonomy Executive Committee, and the Guidance Committee should be actually occupied by Japanese. Furthermore, a policy was decided to provide separately an autonomy inspection office for inspection of prefectural autonomy and establish an Autonomy Guidance Members' Training Center. The Guidance Office was said to be comprised of youth league members in the employ of the SMR.
- 33630 On the 28th the military called together the garrison commanders and the provost marshals of various areas to support this policy. At the meeting C/S MIYAKI gave instructions that this enforcement of the local autonomy and the policy mentioned should be * absolutely a matter of internal relations and should never be revealed outwardly, for there were many which were steadily succeeding in their administration in enforcing the present autonomy system. Clear instructions were issued that special attention be given to the points mentioned and every effort made toward realizing local autonomy in accordance with conditions in each area and subject to what had been recognized as suitable in each case. This wire was transmitted to China, Peiping and all the consuls in Manchuria.

Asked if he took further steps to try to get MINAMI to compel them to do so, he replied he had often told MINAMI of what was happening in Manchuria but his impression was that he had practically no power to control these men. The witness was sure he had every desire to put into practice what was discussed and determined at the Cabinet Council, but his order was not obeyed by his subordinates in Manchuria. Asked if he had asked MINAMI why he did not recall those subordinates, he states this suggestion * was made at the Cabinet Council but MINAMI looked embarrassed and the witness did not think he sent out orders of that kind to Manchuria. Asked if MINAMI said that sending instructions as to what they were to do would be of no avail, he replied he was not quite sure what MINAMI thought of it but the fact was plain that his repeated instructions proved of no avail. Asked if the Cabinet could have, if they wished, stopped financial supplies to the Kwantung Army, he replied that was not discussed and he was not quite sure if that was an obvious way of putting a stop to it.

It was decided in the budget that whatever was contained there when approved by the Diet had to be carried into practice by the Government, and the budget had been approved before the Incident broke out. Asked if there was any provision in the budget for the additional expenses caused by the Manchurian Incident, the witness replied he didn't remember whether they had applied for a supplementary budget but thought there was no discussion of one at the Cabinet. Asked where the money came from for the Manchurian Incident, he stated that at that time the Diet was not in session and without its approval they couldn't spend any money. But so far as it was contained in the budget and approved they had to supply necessary expenses. Asked if they had to supply the War Ministry with the amounts voted in the budget before the Incident broke out, he replied that after it broke out the Cabinet collapsed in early December. The War Ministry could find ample means * within its limits of the budget to meet expenditures. His impression was that the War Ministry did not ask for further funds beyond what they already had in their budget.

The witness remembered troops being moved from Korea without an Imperial Order on about 21 Sept. and there was a heated discussion in the Cabinet about that. Asked if before this happened, MINAMI proposed that reinforcements be sent from Korea and if the Cabinet refused to agree, he replied he didn't believe MINAMI had first proposed reinforcements be sent. The report of their being sent came as rather a surprise to all. The witness was not quite certain nor did he remember one occasion expressed a desire in the Cabinet that he would have permission to send troops from Korea into Manchuria and that the Cabinet refused permission. Asked if MINAMI asked the Cabinet to provide the necessary funds and if the Cabinet agreed to do so when the troops were sent without permission, he stated he

* When it was suggested to the witness that the Cabinet agreed in some way to provide the additional expenses caused by the troops being sent from Korea, he stated he didn't know how that could be done for the Cabinet had no power to modify the budget approved by the Diet. If additional expenditures were needed, what they could do was to apply to the Diet to call for an extraordinary session, and it was again suggested to the witness that the Cabinet agreed to find that money in whatever was the proper procedure, he stated that * after the reinforcements were sent from Korea, the War Minister thought the expenditures could be defrayed within the limits of the budget and he remembered they didn't apply for additional expenditure.

He didn't remember MINAMI's applying for Cabinet approval to appropriate part of the original budget to pay for the expenditure. This was not necessary for so far as it was already approved by the Diet, there was no need to go to the Cabinet so far as these expenditures could be covered within the budget limits. Asked if it was within MINAMI's power to apply or refuse to apply part of the money already voted in the budget for expenses in Manchuria, he replied that he remembered that when the WAKATSUKI Cabinet was in power, expenditures needed were not such a large amount. MINAMI did not ask permission, nor did he bring up that question before the Cabinet Council. It was true that if MINAMI was really sincere in wanting to stop it, he had complete power to do so either by refusing to find the money out of his budget or by recalling the officers who were not carrying out his instructions and he did neither. While this was legally right, there might be quite a revelation among the Army men and he would be placed in a very impossible position. Perhaps MINAMI thought about it and didn't press the question at the Cabinet Council.

33640 * There might be wholesale indiscipline and the men in Manchuria would be without money. The witness thought the men in Manchuria had to look at the question from the practical side. Asked if he was saying that it was considered better that a war be carried on in Manchuria contrary to orders and that the troops in Manchuria be without money on which to live, he replied that they had already given assurance that there would be no aggravation of war and all the Cabinet did was put that declaration into effect with possibly less friction. Consul General HAYASHI in Mukden from the very beginning had been making extremely adverse reports with regard to the conduct of the military in Manchuria, and the witness passed these reports on to MINAMI and the General Staff.

33641 * The witness was quoted a part of Exhibit 3422-D, a telegram dated 20 Sept. 1931, from the Vice Chief of the General Staff to the Chief of Staff of the Kwantung Army, which stated that as some Page officials in Japanese diplomatic and SMR circles in Manchuria were suspected of sending groundless reports about army actions. Kwantung Army C/S was to investigate their sources and seriously provide all means to eliminate such unpatriotic acts. The Vice Chief believed the Army should make a declaration of its grave resolution in case unpatriotic schemes were still continued. Asked if he knew this was what the General Staff was telegraphing to Mukden about the Consul General there, he replied that he hadn't been sent a copy of the telegram and had no knowledge.

33642 MORISHIMA was the head of the Asiatic Bureau in the witness' ministry, and * this was a different man from the MORISHIMA who was assistant consul in Mukden. The witness didn't think he sent the former MORISHIMA to Mukden for any purpose in Sept. 1931 but it was not impossible that MORISHIMA was sent from Tokyo to see HAYASHI and find out what was happening there. Asked if MORISHIMA said that he had told HAYASHI that the Cabinet did not want the Incident to 33643 enlarge and that he should bear that in mind, * and if HAYASHI had replied that this was practically impossible, in the last week of September or the first week of October, the witness said he didn't remember. He didn't remember MORISHIMA's reporting that the situation in Manchuria was such that the Incident had a tendency to expand further nor did he remember if MORISHIMA said that even HAYASEI's life was in danger. Probably HAYASHI's life was in danger, but everyone's life was in danger, including the witness'.

33644 *Asked if MORISHIMA reported that militarists in Manchuria considered HAYASHI an obstacle and there was an indication of an attempted assassination, the witness stated he didn't know if there was any attempt to assassinate HAYASHI. MORISHIMA reported to him that the condition there was such that the C-in-C of the Kwantung Army was in a state of restriction to quarters. Asked if he heard this from MORISHIMA he stated he didn't know but he heard it from somewhere and it was an open secret at that time. Nobody could approach the Commander of the Kwantung Army himself and if anyone applied for an interview subordinate officers would say he shouldn't approach him directly. Witness didn't remember MORISHIMA reporting that three Kwantung Army staff officers, ISHIHARA, HANATANI and ITAGAKI were the center of activity in Manchuria and since the Chief of Staff, MIYAKE, was not able to control his staff the three were left to do things as they pleased. Witness didn't remember MORISHIMA reporting that when these three drank together they always boasted that the plot was planned long before. If he had so reported it would have agreed with information he had from businessmen from Manchuria, nor had the witness heard that the three were saying that an artillery battery was made ready in Mukden as early as 25 July.

Asked if MORISHIMA had reported in August that the Army was attempting to use the killing of Captain NAKAMURA as a tool for solving the Manchuria-Mongolian matter by enlarging its importance, he replied it was difficult to recall these things as they happened years before.

33647 *In reference to the telegrams from KUWASHIMA and others about the escape of Pu-Yi from Tientsin at the end of October and his ultimate arrival in Manchuria, the witness was asked if MINAMI took the view that it would be a good thing to have an independent Manchuria established under Pu-Yi at the proper time but it was premature in October and November 1931. The witness stated that he couldn't tell what MINAMI had in mind with that question as he hadn't discussed it with him. Asked if he had the same view himself, the witness replied it was not only premature but that course of action was altogether wrong.

33650 *When shown Exh. 286, the witness acknowledged it was a telegram sent by him to KUWASHIMA in Tientsin on 1 November 1931.

33652 he stated that the telegram did not signify that. To the witness was quoted a part of the Exhibit which stated * that to form an independent state in Manchuria at this time would immediately raise the question of its being contrary to the Nine Power Pact. Even if they made it in the form of a voluntary escape of the Emperor, the other Powers were not likely to believe this and it was extremely difficult to keep such incidents secret. The witness agreed that this part that was quoted to him was correct.

33652- (After being quoted the remainder of this Exhibit the

33655 *The witness thought he remembered a cabinet meeting on 1 October 1931 in which he asked for a clarification of the policy of the Japanese in Manchuria before the opening of the League of Nations Council to be held in Geneva on 14 October. Quite possibly he suggested that the maintenance of more than necessary troops in Manchuria, and particularly in Kirin (Dairen) and Tungkai (Tientsin) would be harmful to the views that foreign Powers would take at that meeting.

33657 *MINAMI did not propose that Japan should there and then withdraw from the League nor did he say that if they withdrew troops now the situation would be difficult and they would not be able to maintain control in Mukden and Kirin, and it was better he believed to withdraw from the League. So far as the witness remembered there was no discussion of the question of withdrawing from the League at all; they were actively collaborating with and supplying information to the League and their delegates were participating. There was no occasion for MINAMI to say they should withdraw. When it was suggested to the witness that on two occasions MINAMI advocated that instead of trying to do what the League wanted they should withdraw, *he replied he was sure MINAMI had not raised that question.

83659 *The witness stated that on very important questions he and MINAMI did not have opposite ideas at cabinet meetings, nor was there friction between them. Reference was made to the cross examination where the witness had said that something might be a legal point but that practically MINAMI had no choice in the matter.

33675 * Exhibit 3480, the affidavit of ISHII, Akiho, stated that the affiant was a Staff member of the Military Affairs Section when MUTO was Chief of the MAB and took charge mainly of diplomatic problems affecting the ministry. He knew MUTO's view on international problems and was aware of his difficult position. MUTO felt that early settlement of the China Incident was the first requisite and always advocated peaceful cooperation with other countries. At least three times the witness heard him oppose aggressive policies.

33677 None except those especially concerned had participated in the negotiation. About mid April, 1941, when a report was made from Ambassador NOMURA on the draft of an understanding with America, MUTO was much pleased and said, "Hereby has Japan been served!" In May, 1941, a telegram was received from a military attache to the Japanese Embassy at Berlin to the effect that he was against the * negotiations with the U.S. as long as they were dependent upon the secession from the Tri-Partite Alliance.

MUTO ordered the affiant to send a telegram of reproof, and the affiant made out a draft stating anyone abroad must act according to the government's policy. The negotiations with the U.S. were based upon policies of the government and Supreme Command. When this draft was finally brought to TOJO through the Director of the MAB and the Vice Minister, TOJO revised it personally into a more severe one. In the spring of 1941, America considered the western Atlantic safe and was helping England and appeared to show keen interest in the negotiations. In early May, reliable information was received that America would in the end enter the European War, upon which the War Minister asked the MAB what should be done if this occurred. They answered that in such case they should 33678 not let the war spread to the Pacific in conformity with the principles of the * Tri-Partite Pact, regardless of Article III of it. MUTO said he agreed and reported it to War Minister TOJO and Vice Minister KIMURA, and the affiant was told by MUTO that both TOJO and KIMURA were of the same opinion.

At the beginning of June, 1941, when the expectation for war between Germany and the Soviet came to their knowledge, MUTO submitted a question as to how they estimated the progress of that war, if it really broke out. The affiant then gave as his judgment that although Germany would maintain superiority during the earlier period of the war, it would ultimately end the same as the China Incident. MUTO told the affiant he was of the same opinion and in case of war, Japan should fall back upon the Japan-Soviet Neutrality Pact.

33673 About mid June, 1941, MUTO was bewildered with the intention of Foreign Minister MATSUOKA, who advocated an aggressive policy against the Soviet at one time and proposed an advance toward the south at another. MUTO was ill and did not attend the liason conference * at the end of June and the Council in the Imperial presence on July 2. Directly after the Council in the Imperial presence of 6 September 1941, MUTO returned to the War Ministry reporting the proceedings of the Council to the Chief of the Military Affairs Section, the Chief of the Military Administration Section, and other senior members.

He said that the phrase, "For the sake of self-existence and self-defense" meant in Article I, "in order to live." Before their assets were frozen, they were to be able to maintain a self-sufficient state in spite of economic pressure. The phrase, "try every diplomatic means" appearing in Article I meant that every possible means of diplomacy should be tried and Article II should precede Article I from the point of real necessity. MUTO said they must try to succeed in diplomatic negotiations at any cost.

33680 * Japan conceded step by step from the first to latter part of September and at last an exploring proposal was made to realize the KONOE-Roosevelt conference as soon as possible. As for their duties under the Three Power Alliance, it was suggested they could not commit themselves in writing but expected to arrive at an understanding by conferring. MUTO, together with Chief of the NAB OKA cooperated with the Foreign Ministry most enthusiastically in making these supplicating overtures.

As for withdrawing troops from China, it was settled at a Council in the presence of the Emperor on September 6 to withdraw them in accordance with a new agreement with China. There was discussion as to whether this meant to make a new agreement or follow the provisions of the Sino-Japanese basic treaties concluded on 30 November 1940. MUTO read this to mean an agreement to be newly concluded after further negotiations and tried to wire to that effect to America in cooperation with the Foreign Ministry.

33681 The General Staff made a * strong protest against this interpretation, but MUTO refused it vehemently saying he detested the war. The affiant clearly recalled MUTO made strenuous efforts to avert war with the United States. Informed he was scheduled to be a member of KONOYE's suite for the talks with Roosevelt, he made preparations for it. At the end of September they received the news from Washington that the negotiations were not likely to succeed. MUTO said this was critical and war should be averted at all costs because it endangered the State.

About 20 October 1941, immediately after the formation of the TOJO Cabinet, TOJO asked for MUTO's opinion and he replied that the people are tired of the China Incident and if TOJO, as Premier, succeeded in the American negotiations and settled the China Incident, the nation would be heartily grateful. TOJO ought to do everything to accept diplomatic negotiations. TOJO heartily assented to MUTO's views.

33682 * The A and B plans for the negotiations with the US were discussed in the liason conference on the night of 1 November 1941. The B plan was introduced in that conference fresh from the portfolio of Foreign Minister TOGO without being exhibited beforehand to the Supreme Command of the army and navy. There was a heated discussion between Chief of Staff SUGIYAMA and TOGO. MUTO, who acted as a mere secretary to the conference and had no vote, met SUGIYAMA during the recess and told him unofficially that it might be unreasonable for the Chief of Staff to raise a flat objection to any plan drafted by the Foreign Minister and to prevent him from taking diplomatic means. When the conference resumed, SUGIYAMA agreed to plan B and thus it was decided on.

33683 This was what MUTO told the affiant the next day. His staff, as well as General Staff authorities, were anxious as to whether plan B could insure national defense. * But MUTO said he had told the Chief of Staff what he believed to be the best. If the plan should bring bad results, he knew what he ought to do. The affiant knew that most readers of the national policy expected the US to take a compromising attitude toward plan B and when MUTO asked his staff how America would deal with it, the affiant said America will surely agree. Leading Japanese circles, including the army, detested war in general, although some irresponsible men maintained a positive attitude and the affiant and MUTO were criticized as being weak-kneed. MUTO told his staff that TOJO was desirous of success in the negotiations.

33684 The affiant often took documents to TOJO when he was intent on studying the negotiations. The affiant left for Saigon on the morning of 27 November 1941. Toward evening of the previous day, MUTO told the affiant that the question of war or peace was not yet decided and asked him to struggle hard if war came. * Those whom the affiant visited in the navy and foreign affairs ministries on that day were still expecting success in the negotiations and were impatient for a favorable reply.

33700 * DIRECT EXAMINATION OF WAKAMATSU, Tadaichi
 By Mr. Shimanouchi

33703 By order of the Chief of Staff, the witness left Japan, November, 1935, for Germany and stayed in Berlin for about 2 weeks from the end of November to the middle of December. It was customary for military attaches in Europe to meet at certain intervals for study and his mission was to attend as a General Staff member one of such meetings. His second mission was to see Military Attache OSHIMA in order to * ascertain the actual situation in Germany. With regard to this second mission, a telegram from OSHIMA in Berlin had arrived at the General Staff prior to his departure from Tokyo. Although he did not recall clearly, its content was vague, saying that Ribbentrop wanted to know the view of the Japanese army as to concluding an agreement an agreement between Japan and Germany, providing Japan or Germany did not help the USSR if war broke out between Japan or Germany and USSR.

Prior to his departure from Tokyo, the witness received an oral order from the Chief of Staff to find out on his visit the views of the German army and government as to Ribbentrop's agreement, the possibility of concluding an anti-Comintern agreement between Japan and Germany, and who Ribbentrop was, his position and his relations with the German government.

33704 According to an explanation by Deputy Chief of the General Staff SUGIYAMA, the reason why the army wanted to conclude such an agreement with Germany was that Japan, being isolated internationally after the * Manchurian Incident was feeling menaced by the Soviet, which was growing rapidly by the Five-Year plan. It was also necessary to frustrate the communistic offensive. The approach to Germany was considered the first step for making Japan's position more secure by building up an anti-Communistic front with China and Germany, and if possible with England and America. The witness left Japan at the beginning of November, 1935 and, upon arriving in Berlin at the end of the month, immediately met OSHIMA to convey what he was told by the Chief and Deputy Chief of the General Staff. OSHIMA understood and agreed to it. The witness never heard from OSHIMA nor anyone else the idea the agreement was to be concluded with Germany in order to use it for an attack for waging war against China and other countries.

33705 The witness met with OSHIMA, Ribbentrop, and General Blomberg, German Minister of Defense, to ascertain the German views as * to the Japanese-German agreement proposed by Ribbentrop. Ribbentrop suggested that a separate anti-Communistic agreement be concluded between Germany and Japan, and the witness replied on the basis of the Deputy Chief of Staff that the Japanese army also had such an idea. He left Berlin mid December and arrived in Tokyo January, 1936, and reported to the Chief of Staff.

At that time the Japanese Ambassador in Berlin was Viscount MUSHAKOJI, who was in Japan from about the summer of 1935 until about April 1936, and was therefore absent from Berlin at that time.

33706 * CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. TAVENNER

The witness thought he saw 2 or 3 telegrams from OSHIMA before he left Japan on his assignment, and recalled that they showed that the character of the contemplated pact was a No-Aid Pact in the event of war between the USSR and Germany. Asked if the negotiations up to that time indicated the manner in which cooperation was to be given in the event of hostilities, he said he did not know what was pointed at when negotiations were spoken of. In the OSHIMA-Ribbentrop talks, in his recollection, such matters were not brought up.

33707 Asked if at the time of his departure, the General Staff advocated a military alliance with Germany, he replied that at that time OSHIMA merely reported that there was some kind of proposal submitted by Ribbentrop and the matter had not reached any concrete * stage whatsoever. Inasmuch as the German proposal was vague, there was no definite advocacy among General Staff officers. Asked again if there not members of the General Staff at that time who advocated a military alliance with Germany, he said no there were not.

The witness stated he was not instructed by the General Staff before he left Japan to advise OSHIMA to continue his investigations for a military alliance. He did not, acting on General Staff instructions, deliver a secret code to OSHIMA for his use in making direct and secret reports to the General Staff regarding negotiations. He did bring a general code book for military attaches in European countries but did not bring OSHIMA a special code.

33708 * He did not think it was true that on his arrival in Germany he learned that the German army did not want a German alliance with Japan made public at that time, and in consequence the pact was changed at German suggestion to an anti-Comintern pact. He did think the decision to convert it into an anti-Comintern pact was made from the German side before he arrived there. The Japanese General Staff entertained the desire to enter into some kind of agreement to protect Japan from communism, not only with Germany but with any other countries so disposed.

33709 * While enroute to Germany the idea of an anti-Comintern pact had arisen in Germany, and of this those in Japan had not been informed through OSHIMA up to the time of his departure. Asked if when he arrived in Germany he heard that the reason for the anti-Comintern pact being suggested from the German side was that the German army was not prepared at that time and not willing that a * military alliance be made public, he replied that he knew nothing of that. He did not recall if OSHIMA told him he did not want the world to know that Japan was aligning herself against another country in a military alliance, nor had he heard anything about it.

33711 Asked if the anti-Comintern pact, as finally concluded had attached to it a secret provision which incorporated the original non-aid provision that OSHIMA had telegraphed about, he replied that what happened at the end he did not know because he did not participate in it, but at the time he heard nothing of the matter. Asked if he expressed the view that by the anti-comintern pact, Germany would be kept from drawing too close to the USSR, * he replied that he must have said so because he had such an idea in mind.

Asked if he also expressed the view that Japan would be able by such a pact to procure intelligence and new type weapons from Germany, he replied that he did not recall but he did have such an idea in mind and he thought that by such a pact Germany would be prevented from taking sides with China.

33712 * Asked if he made a detailed report to TOGO of his experiences in Germany and matters relating to the proposed pact, the witness stated he did not make any detailed report but did recall reporting to him some time later on his impressions of Germany. Asked if he recommended to TOGO the need for speed in concluding the pact in order to preserve secrecy, he replied he had no recollection but may have said so. The witness talked to TOGO after his report had been submitted to the General Staff, and the General staff transferred it to the War Ministry, and the War Ministry transferred the matter to the Foreign Affairs Ministry.

Reference was made to the cross examination where the words "military alliance" were used. 33716 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 33717 3493 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was in Berlin by order of the army from January 1938 until early November that year, when he returned to 33718 Japan. * He was supposed to be the successor to OSHIMA.
In July, 1938, Attache OSHIMA told him that Ribbentrop proposed a defensive alliance between Japan, Germany, and Italy, and asked him to ascertain the army's views and return to Japan.

33719 The witness arrived in Japan the 1st of August, explaining the German proposal to army and navy authorities and Foreign Minister UGAKI. The German proposal was that political support be given in case Japan, Germany, or Italy were threatened by a third power, while military assistance would be given if they were attacked. The matter made rapid progress, and at the end of August the Japanese policy was decided upon at a Five Ministers' Conference.
Chief of the MAB MACHIJIRI told the witness that both the government and army wished to settle the China Incident as early as possible, but feared a Soviet attack and therefore
* a prompt decision was made. MACHIJIRI also said that the decision of the Five Ministers' Conference approved the German proposal in general and acknowledged the duty of mutual military assistance in case the contracting powers were attacked without provocation, but that the qualification that the Soviet would be the primary and other countries the secondary objects.

The army communicated the decision to OSHIMA, instructing him to take steps so that Germany would make a formal proposal to Japan promptly. The witness returned to Berlin, arriving there about 20 September, and explained to OSHIMA the progress of the matter and the purpose of the Tokyo decision. OSHIMA told the witness he communicated the decision to the Germans.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. TAVENNER.

33720 * Asked if the decision of the Five Ministers' was communicated to OSHIMA by telegram from the War Ministry and that he was to take steps so that Germany would make formal proposals, the witness stated he had no clear recollection, but ordinarily it was the custom for the General Staff to communicate by telegram to the attaches.

The witness stated he saw the telegram before it was sent some time between the decision of the conference and his departure for Germany. He thought * he departed for Germany about 5 September, and the Five Ministers' decision was about the end of August. He didn't recall exactly the telegram's contents, but its purport was that revision was made to the extent that it would be satisfactory to Germany and accepted by her.

He had no exact recollection of the number of telegrams sent before his departure for Germany relating to these instructions, but they were sent only about once, * but there may have been telegrams sent without his being informed of them. He only knew of one telegram sent prior to his departure, and if there were others he was only partially informed. He thought to some extent OSHIMA communicated the decision to Ribbentrop before he arrived in Germany, but did not know whether OSHIMA made a full report. OSHIMA may have been waiting for his return to Berlin, and pending it reserved part of the report.

33723

* The witness knew OSHIMA gave notification to Ribbentrop either prior to his return to Germany or after, but whether OSHIMA made the report with or without reservations he did not know. He thought that at least OSHIMA reported to some extent reserving certain details and definite statements until the witness' return to Berlin. He thought those details were conditions placed by Japan on the extent of the treaty, but was saying this from his own knowledge of the results.

33724

* The witness stated, when asked what these reservations were, that he had not said OSHIMA made reservations, but had only said it was possible to make them. This was because after his return from Berlin, OSHIMA asked the witness if it was not a little bit different and ambiguous, and from this the witness surmised OSHIMA may have made reservations in making the report to Ribbentrop prior to his return from Berlin. Asked what OSHIMA did about those ambiguous matters, the witness stated that he thought he handled the matter after finding out that the contents of the witness' explanations was consistent with the army telegram.

The witness arrived in Germany around 20 September, * and he thought OSHIMA took the matter up again with Ribbentrop immediately after that. The ambiguity mentioned by OSHIMA, the witness thought, was something referring to war participation in the event of an attack by a country other than the Soviet.

33730 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 33731 3494 as his affidavit. The * affidavit stated that the witness entered the Foreign Office in 1920, and after various diplomatic posts was appointed Councillor of the Embassy in Berlin in 1938, arriving there on 11 November 1938 and remaining there until May 1940. During this period he assisted Ambassador OSHIMA continuously until the end of August 1939 in the negotiations for strengthening the anti-Comintern Pact.

33732 Since all records were lost, he could not state accurately the contents of telegrams, etc., exchanged with the Foreign Office in Tokyo, but remembered their broad outline. * When the witness arrived in Tokyo, OSHIMA had become Ambassador in the latter part of October. Official negotiations for strengthening the pact had been commenced, and a tentative German plan had been cabled by OSHIMA to the Foreign Minister. OSHIMA told the witness that while he was still Military Attache, a request was received from Ribbentrop to ascertain the Japanese Army's views as to the idea of a mutual assistance treaty. OSHIMA sent General KASAHARA home to convey this request. The army brought the matter before the Five Ministers' Conference at the end of August, and on the basis of the decision there cabled OSHIMA that approval was given to the German idea in principle. Shortly thereafter KASAHARA returned to Berlin, reporting to the same effect.

Upon army instruction, OSHIMA informed Ribbentrop of this. After OSHIMA became Ambassador, Ribbentrop presented officially a German draft proposal asking for Japan's official view. OSHIMA then sent a telegram to the Foreign Minister and waited for instructions.

33733 * The Five Ministers' decision at the end of August was also cabled from the Foreign Minister to the Embassy in Germany, and the witness remembered reading the telegram. The telegram in reply to OSHIMA's telegram transmitting the German proposal was received from Foreign Minister ARITA shortly after the witness arrived in Berlin.
In effect it said that the proposal was a capital idea, killing three birds with one stone. It would be conducive to the speedy settlement of the China Incident, would strengthen Japan's defensive position vis-a-vis the Soviet, and improve the general diplomatic position.

33734 The cable stated that concrete plans were being studied which would be cabled to Berlin as soon as decided. Those on the spot got the impression that the attitude of the authorities was very positive. However, shortly thereafter, ARITA sent a further telegram, stating there seemed to be a misunderstanding with respect to the treaty's objective, which was as to the question whether countries * other than the Soviet should be included in the object. From what the witness learned from OSHIMA, the Five Minister's decision conveyed to him by the army telegram while he was military attache, approved the German proposal in principle of a general mutual assistance treaty without limiting the object, with the explanation that the Soviet was primary and other countries secondary. Therefore, OSHIMA requested ARITA by telegram to clarify what he meant by stating there was a misunderstanding. However, no clear answer was received.

The witness remembered that ARITA's telegram transmitting the Five Ministers' decision at the end of August did not contain any passage limiting the object, and the witness got the impression that the government was going to conclude a treaty of a general nature.

33735 No progress in the negotiations with the Germans was made until the arrival of Special Envoy ITO. In mid-December 1938, on Ribbentrop's request, OSHIMA went to Rome and saw Mussolini. Ribbentrop requested that, as Italy, although in principle, consented to participating in the proposed treaty, nevertheless made reservation as to the time of its conclusion, and the Italian intention was to be ascertained also by the Japanese. OSHIMA went to Rome with ARITA's approval, and OSHIMA told the witness after his return to Berlin that he met Mussolini only once, and Mussolini answered that he approved the treaty's purpose, but could not say anything definite yet as to the time of its conclusion.

33736 At the beginning of January 1939 the HIRANUMA Cabinet was formed. Shortly after the telegram was received from ARITA announcing that ITO and others would be sent to Berlin to transmit instructions regarding their policy decided upon. OSHIMA requested he be informed by telegram at least of the outline of the government's decision, * but the reply was that in view of the necessity of secrecy the arrival of the ITO mission should be awaited. Besides Minister ITO, the mission consisted of Col. TATSUMI and Admiral ABE, and they arrived in Berlin at the end of February 1939.

33737 As their instructions were addressed to both ambassadors in Germany and Italy. Ambassador SHIRATORI came to Berlin, and together with OSHIMA heard their explanations. The witness also attended the conference. The content of the instructions was that as to the treaty itself, it was a draft of a mutual assistance treaty of general nature, without limiting the objective. In the preamble, the treaty's purpose was stated to be general defense against the communistic menace in Asia and Europe. By a secret mutual understanding on a separate paper, Japan wanted to reserve that she would render no military assistance if countries other than the Soviet became involved, and if inquiries were made by third powers as to the nature of the treaty, explanations should be given that * it was an extension of the anti-Comintern Pact, thus in fact limiting the object of the treaty to the Soviet.

In the detailed explanation attached to the draft was a passage to the effect that the government felt compelled to come down to this extent from its original standpoint, as Germany and Italy had been led to misunderstand Japan's intention.

* OSHIMA had already informed the Germans of the Japanese approving the draft treaty of mutual assistance with the Soviet as primary and others as secondary objects. Therefore he thought it necessary to clear the question of his responsibility in view of Tokyo's intimation that Germany and Italy had been misled, and cabled requests for explanation to Foreign Minister ARITA the first of March. As to the instruction's content, OSHIMA and SHIRATORI wired Tokyo, requesting the government to reconsider the matter.

The gist of this telegram was that the Japanese proposal for a secret understanding limiting the objective practically to the Soviet while stipulating in the text itself in a general sense, would cast a slur on Japan's good faith, as it would contradict what had already been communicated to the Germans, and moreover would never be entertained by Germany and Italy. Japan should conclude the treaty first without the proposed secret understanding, referring the definition of the duty of military assistance to be borne by Japan to later discussions.

* ARITA replied at the end of March that no one in particular was responsible for the misunderstanding. OSHIMA accepted this as settling the question, and never tendered resignation at any period.

To the opinion of the two ambassadors there was a reply at the end of March, which was to change the content of the secret understanding insofar as that although Japan acknowledged the duty of military assistance in regard to countries other than the Soviet, she would not be able to carry it out effectively for the time being, and Japan would explain in case of inquiries of third powers that her actual menace was the destructive activities of the Comintern, and as far as Japan was concerned she had nothing other than this view in concluding the treaty.

33740 OSHIMA transmitted the new instruction to the Germans at the beginning of April and reopened negotiations. Germany consented to this proposal insofar as the text of the draft treaty itself was concerned, but was reluctant to accept the secret understanding, and requested its withdrawal or its reduction to a mere oral understanding, stating these matters should be referred to agreements arranged after the treaty's conclusion. Germany further insisted that if countries other than the Soviet became the objects, Japan should be ready to accept at least the duty of participation in the war, although Germany and Italy did not expect much military assistance by Japan.

33741 The Japanese instructions showed that while insisting on committing the secret understanding to black and white, certain readiness to concede in substance to the form of German views, and especially, they never denied the duty of war participation. Nevertheless, they wanted to interpret the latter in a much broader sense than usual, and tried to include it to cases which normally could not be considered as war participation. Therefore, it was difficult for those on the spot to understand the instructions, and OSHIMA experienced much difficulty in explaining them to the Germans. To overcome this, the witness and Secretary TAKEUCHI, in consultation with Chief of the German Treaty Department Gauss, made in May a tentative * draft as to the contents of the secret understanding, adopting generally the Japanese government's idea. There were several negotiations on this basis without arriving at an agreement.

As Germany was opposed to the idea of putting the secret understanding in writing, negotiations were deadlocked since the end of June, and while no instructions were received from Japan the German-Russian non-Aggression Pact was signed on 23 August, whereupon Japan broke off the negotiations.

During the negotiations, OSHIMA, to fulfill his duty as envoy, sometimes presented his opinion to the Foreign Minister in accordance with the Ordinance, and as a result original instructions from Tokyo were changed. The witness didn't remember OSHIMA ever refusing to carry out the instructions or exceeding their limits. There never was a case of OSHIMA tendering his resignation or threatening to resign.

33742 * Most of the instructions of ARITA during the negotiations were based on the decisions of the Five Ministers' Conference. Tokyo's instructions were very ambiguous. It was difficult for those on the spot to understand them and transmit them to the Germans. OSHIMA, pressed by the necessity of conducting the negotiations, sometimes requested fairly strongly that ARITA clarify the government's attitude, and endeavored to transmit to Tokyo the true idea of Germany. * These things might have caused OSHIMA to be rumored as recalcitrant, but the witness could find no impropriety in his conduct. OSHIMA never communicated at the time directly with the War Ministry or the General Staff.

The conclusion of the non-Aggression Pact was a complete surprise for Japan. There was no previous notification, and they were very much surprised and angered. OSHIMA protested orally when Ribbentrop gave the first information, about 20 August, by telephone, and OSHIMA repeated the protest when he saw Ribbentrop in Berlin on 22 August on Ribbentrop's way to Moscow.

33744 * At the end of August an instruction was received from the Foreign Minister ordering a protest to Germany. As Ribbentrop was not in Berlin, OSHIMA brought the note of protest to Vice-Foreign Minister Weizsaecker. Upon the latter's urgent request to postpone the handing of the note in view of Germany's grave diplomatic position, OSHIMA * postponed execution of the instruction until mid-September when the prospect of the German-Polish war became clear, and handed the note to Weizsaecker.

Page On further oral examination, the witness was asked if in August 1939, when the non-Aggression Pact was signed. if OSHIMA tendered his resignation, and he replied that at that time OSHIMA requested the Foreign Office for a recall about 23 August. OSHIMA told the witness that one of his reasons for asking for a recall was his sense of responsibility over not being able to anticipate the * non-aggression pact. Also, it had become clear it would be impossible for him as ambassador to further negotiate the Tri-Partite Agreement because of the new situation, and in consequence felt it inappropriate to continue his efforts. Another reason was that OSHIMA regarded the German step as insincere to Japan. for while conducting talks with Japan, without notifying her it had concluded such an agreement with the USSR.

33746 * Asked if OSHIMA notified the witness of talks with influential Germans in view of his position as Embassy Councillor the witness stated it was customary for him to inform him. The witness had never heard that OSHIMA met Himmler in January 1939, nor at any time.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. CAUDLE,
Counsel for SHIRATORI.

33747 * When shown exhibit 2619, the witness agreed that it was a draft of a tripartite pact dated May 15, 1939, consisting of the pact proper, the signing protocol, the secret accessory protocol, and papers 2, 3, and 4. It stated that Japan did not yet concur to the last three papers. The witness stated that he knew the draft.

 Asked what were the differences between that draft and the draft brought by the ITO Mission, he stated that the pact proper, the protocol, and the accessory protocol constitute the main part, and were the same as the draft brought by ITO. Papers 3 and 4 were different from the draft brought by him. The draft brought by ITO was the draft of items for a secret understanding which Japan had proposed without reservations, and what corresponded to that were papers 3 and 4.

33749 * Germany did not approve the proposed Japanese plan, and the witness and Gauss had discussions, and as a result Gauss proposed a plan which constituted papers 3 and 4. Paper 2 related to the German-Italian Alliance, and was not included in the draft brought by ITO. This was proposed by Germany as an addition.

Page Substantially, Germany agreed to papers 3 and 4, the Gauss draft, but was opposed to recognizing the draft officially, and against stipulating such reservations in writing, and proposed an oral understanding.

33750 * Japan did not go so far as to give its consent to papers 3 and 4, the Gauss draft. This was the only point upon which no agreement could be obtained until the last. Asked if the accused SHIRATORI, or any other person, ever advocated a stronger alliance than the draft, exhibit 2619, the witness stated SHIRATORI had never advocated an alliance stronger than this draft. Also, there was no one else who advocated it.

33751 * Asked if the Tri-Partite Pact of 1939 would be directed also against the U. S., he stated that the question of the U. S. was not discussed at the time. In accordance with the preamble of the draft, the U. S. was considered outside the consideration.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. TAVENNER.

33752 When asked if he saw the cable OSHIMA received advising that the Five Ministers' Conference in August 1938 had approved in principle the German proposal, the witness stated that at the end of August OSHIMA was attache and not yet Ambassador. * The witness himself did not see the telegram, but heard of it from OSHIMA generally. Since the witness was not yet councillor, he could not say when it was received, nor from whom it was sent.

Asked if everything in his affidavit regarding the notification of OSHIMA about the decision of the Five Ministers' Conference was what he learned from OSHIMA and not what he knew himself, he stated he was familiar with matters after he had arrived at his post, because he personally handled such matters after November 1938.

33753 * Asked if the telegram from the Foreign Ministry was different from the one originally notifying OSHIMA of the action of the Five Ministers' Conference, he replied that the telegram he saw was the one addressed by the Foreign Office to the then ambassador following the Five Ministers' Conference. He saw it after he arrived at his post in Berlin, and thought it was dated either the end of August or the first part of September. It was addressed to Ambassador TOGO, but he didn't think there was anything in it directing TOGO especially to take any specific measures.

33754 * With regard to the idea proposed by Ribbentrop, it was regarded as generally satisfactory if some revisions were made. The telegram said that in connection with this matter, arrangements should be made for negotiations through diplomatic channels, and the army was notifying Attache OSHIMA to that effect and that this information was given to Ambassador TOGO for his reference. The witness' recollection was that there were no specifications clearly made as to reservations in the telegram.

33755 Asked if he discussed this telegram with OSHIMA, he stated it arrived in Berlin before his arrival there, so he had no special discussion with him in connection with it. * The witness had no positive recollection of OSHIMA's telling him he discussed the matter with TOGO, and the witness himself had no occasion to talk with TOGO about it. Asked why these transactions were conducted with the Military Attache instead of the Ambassador, he replied that he arrived at his post after TOGO had left, and did not serve under him but under OSHIMA.
33756 * Asked how long after he arrived on 11 November 1938 was it that the telegram was received from ARITA acknowledging receipt of the German proposal sent by OSHIMA, he stated that in response to the official German proposal transmitted by OSHIMA to ARITA, ARITA did not send a telegram saying Japan accepted it. Shortly after the witness' arrival in Berlin a telegram arrived from ARITA that the German proposal was splendid, that Japan would study it carefully, and in the near future would submit its views more concretely.

33757 Asked how long after the first telegram the second telegram was received, he stated he thought it was about the end of November or early December. * Asked if from the end of November or early December there was any question in his mind with regard to the fact that Japan did not intend to be automatically bound in participating in war against a country other than the Soviet, he replied nothing definite was known because they thought that as for Japan, only a general treaty was being considered, and no instructions had been received yet.

Asked if it was not true that early in December OSHIMA went to Italy to attempt to sell Mussolini the German view of the Pact, he stated he could not testify as to that, but in mid-December OSHIMA did go there and talk to Mussolini in response to a hope entertained by Ribbentrop.

33760 * DIRECT EXAMINATION OF KAWABE, Torashiro
By Mr. Shimanouchi

33761 The witness identified and verified exhibit 3495 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was Deputy Chief of the General Staff at the end of the war. From April 1929 until January 1932 he was the senior officer in the Operational Section of the First Division of the General Staff. The accused OSHIMA was from August 1931 chief of the Fortress Section of the First Division. The Fortress Section was in charge of international defense and not connected with offensive operations. OSHIMA was also concurrently a staff officer of the navy General Staff, as was the custom at that time.

33762 On 18 September 1931 the Mukden Incident * broke out. As OSHIMA was in the post mentioned above, he had nothing to do with it nor its continuance and the witness did not know either that OSHIMA played any part in the Incident from his individual standpoint, apart from his official duty. (The attention of the court was called to T. pgs. 28029-32 with regard to the number of persons receiving dedications in connection with the Manchurian Incident.)

33764 fidavit and verified it. *The affidavit stated that the witness was in Berlin from December 1938 until February 1940 as military attache to the embassy and OSHIMA was Ambassador from October 1938 to October 1939. The witness' appointment as attache was in October 1938 and prior to his departure from Japan he was briefed by persons in the General Staff concerning his new duties. At that time he heard explanations as to intelligence and counterintelligence activities in Berlin against the Soviet from Lt. Colonel USUI, who had been in Berlin from May 1937 until January 1938 and was in charge of these matters exclusively over Military Attache OSHIMA.

33766 * into effect in peace time.

The witness, like his predecessor OSHIMA, left MANAKI entirely in charge of these matters. The witness received reports from him but never indicated them to OSHIMA because OSHIMA had no relation with this matter, did not touch upon them and never asked questions about them. The witness met several times with the White Russians concerned and found out that they were either nothing but anti-Soviet ideologists, like Bamand, or professionals who demanded money by presenting impractical anti-Soviet plans.

33767 * The witness knew that USUI had bought a house in the suburbs of Berlin, had turned it over to MANAKI, and that a few White Russians were quartered there engaged in a small scale printing of anti-Soviet pamphlets, but he did not know what became of those pamphlets. He had never heard that OSHIMA nor any other Japanese officer sent anti-Soviet pamphlets into Soviet territory by balloons from Poland, or that they bought a motorboat to bring such papers into the Crimea across the Black Sea, or that they sent Russians into the Soviet to assassinate Stalin.

When the witness arrived in Berlin as attache in December 1938, OSHIMA was engaged in negotiations regarding the Japanese-German-Italian treaty. From this time until the negotiations were terminated about August 1939, the witness, with the Naval Attache, had frequent conferences within the Embassy discussing the matter with OSHIMA as leader. During these negotiations OSHIMA always gave the matter careful consideration and often called the Embassy staff and attaches 33768 * together for consultation and study.

As to the reasons why the government and central army authorities wished to conclude the treaty, OSHIMA often told them that at the time the China Incident was expanding without prospect of early termination, and all Japanese efforts for settlement had been of no avail. Both the government and army circles felt threatened by the Soviet's powerful armament. By concluding this treaty with Germany and Italy, they wanted to improve Japan's diplomatic position with the ultimate purpose of bringing the China Incident to the earliest end and also be prepared for attack from the Soviet.

33769 The witness never heard from OSHIMA that Japan intended or desired to utilize the treaty to initiate or wage aggressive war against other countries, nor heard from anyone that OSHIMA planned or desired anything of this nature. In February 1939 ITO, Nobufumi, accompanied by an officer from both the army and navy, arrived in Berlin with instructions * regarding the treaty. The witness, together with the higher Embassy staff and the Naval Attache, was present when ITO gave the explanations to OSHIMA.

The purport was to limit to the Soviet the object of Japanese military assistance to be given to Germany and Italy on the basis of the treaty. This was at variance to what OSHIMA had already communicated to Germany upon instructions of the government, which was that although Japan considered the Soviet as the primary object of the treaty, Britain and France would be secondary objects. Facing this situation, OSHIMA cabled his opinion to Tokyo that in view of the progress up to that time, Germany might become distrustful if he transmitted the changed Japanese views and moreover she would never accept the proposal.

According to exhibit 2230, OSHIMA told Ribbentrop on 27 May 1939 that the War Minister requested OSHIMA by wire to hold off until later against ARITA so as not to disturb discussions among various quarters in Tokyo, and the army was firmly resolved to fight the matter out quickly even at the risk of a cabinet overthrow.

* According to the witness' recollection about mid May 1939, he sent a telegram from Berlin to Tokyo stating that Japan must clarify her position as to whether she was going to conclude the treaty and that to continue an ambiguous attitude would only invite foreign contempt. War Minister ITAGAKI replied that the matter of the treaty was under earnest discussion in the cabinet and as the atmosphere was turning favorable to its conclusion, they had better remain silent for the time being. ITAGAKI added he had no thought of overthrowing the cabinet. The witness told OSHIMA of the telegram.

The witness stated that this was the sixth time he had appeared as a witness for the defense. Reference was made to the affidavit where it mentioned subversive activities directed against the USSR. * Asked how well acquainted he was with Himmler, he replied that he had heard his name but had never saw or met him. He had never heard that OSHIMA and Himmler

To the witness was quoted a part of his interrogation in which he was asked how friendly was OSHIMA with Himmler, and if he knew of any occasions when they met. He had answered then that they were friendly and he believed they met quite often, although perhaps not in an official capacity, but he believed they saw a great deal of one another. Asked if he did not make such a statement in answer to the question, he stated he did not know, but if it was so recorded he must have replied * to that effect.

In reference to the affidavit's statements relative to OSHIMA's activities in negotiating with Germany regarding the proposed military alliance, the witness was asked if he knew before his departure for Germany that OSHIMA was engaged in negotiations for military alliance, the witness replied he did not know of OSHIMA working for a military alliance. * Asked what OSHIMA was working for, he replied that OSHIMA left Germany about four months before the witness left there. For ten months ending August 1939 from the time the witness went to Berlin and the time OSHIMA left, OSHIMA devoted his efforts mainly to strengthening the anti-Comintern Pact.

Asked if he knew before he left Japan that OSHIMA was working for an alliance, he replied that on 1 September 1938 the witness was called to appear at the General Staff and notified he was to be appointed Military Attache in Berlin. He did not leave for his post until the latter part of October. When the previous question was repeated to the witness, he answered he knew before leaving Japan that OSHIMA was engaged in negotiating for an alliance in Germany. * The Chief of the Intelligence of the General Staff advised him that OSHIMA had been named Ambassador in order to bring about this alliance.

The witness had frequent discussions with OSHIMA regarding the progress of the negotiations after he arrived in Germany. Asked if it was not the idea of OSHIMA and himself to have a strong pact aimed with Russia and England as the objectives, he replied the word strong was not proper but they were of the same mind in concluding an alliance directed at Russia and England. Asked if their idea was, that if Germany became involved in a war with England, Japan would participate in it, he replied that he and OSHIMA had the idea they must bear the * obligation to engage in war under those circumstances. Germany had the same view, and the witness was of the opinion that Hitler, Ribbentrop and OSHIMA saw eye to eye.

He became acquainted with the viewpoint of the Japanese government from explanations to that effect given at meetings within the Embassy in Berlin by the ambassador, and he also obtained that information from telegrams which came from the General Staff Office in Tokyo. He thus knew the government's attitude and that it was in opposition to the views of Ribbentrop's views.

The witness recalled only two occasions in which OSHIMA and SHIRATORI met personally re these negotiations. These were once when ITO arrived in Berlin and some time later he did recall a conference in Italy between the two and thought it was in early spring of 1939. * At this meeting, besides the witness, Naval Attache ENDO, a member of the Embassy staff, and the military and naval attaches stationed in Rome were present. No one was present representing Germany or Italy.

33777

During the meeting SHIRATORI and OSHIMA talked to each other directly and his recollection was that no conclusion was reached during the discussion, but it was merely an exchange of views. * Asked if SHIRATORI and OSHIMA shared the same views with regard to the proposed pact, he replied that the two generally agreed and the witness was also in agreement with them. From the side lines it appeared as if there was a difference between the two with regard to diplomatic procedure. He was not referring to differences in fundamental ideas regarding the pact.

33778

His recollection was that this conference was after the arrival of the ITO commission. Asked if OSHIMA passed on or urged his views regarding a pact upon his government, the witness replied he had no definite recollection. * Asked what his position was at the time the witness stated that he personally desired the realization of the pact and frequently urged army circles to bring it about as soon as possible. When the witness was again asked his position at the time, he replied that he was the official military representative in Berlin, and his duties included to convey the views and opinions of the army to the ambassador, to transmit the views and opinions of the ambassador to the army in Japan, and also to report to the army the progress of negotiations.

Asked if he was not in the middle of the game instead of on the side lines, he replied he had no idea of being right in the midst of the whole thing because that was not his responsibility.

When asked what other means did he use to bring about the adoption of this pact, he replied he did not remember the date but OSHIMA made a tour of important countries in Europe, visiting Japanese ambassadors to hear their views and took measures of this nature to establish his own views.

33781 * The impression gained was that he thought OSHIMA took the trip to make clear his belief by meeting these ambassadors that it was proper to enter into an alliance with Germany in the light of the prevailing international situation, i.e., an alliance which would obligate Japan to participate in a European war if England became involved in war with Germany. In London OSHIMA interviewed SHIGEMITSU and in Belgium

33782 KURUSU. * But he could not recall the names of others nor could he recall if OSHIMA took the trip on his own initiative or was directed by his government.

According to the witness' recollection, OSHIMA, following his trip and the talks with the heads of Japanese missions, told the witness that most of them did not clearly express their approval and Ambassador KURUSU was among them. Asked if OSHIMA nevertheless continued to press his views for approval of the pact, the witness stated he did not interpret OSHIMA's position as being that he had pressed these ambassadors for approval.

33786 * The witness did not recall what countries OSHIMA visited in addition to England and Belgium. OSHIMA did not tell him what the ambassadors in England and Belgium would do with regard to advising the Foreign office as to the course to be followed with respect to the proposed alliance. Discussions were held in the embassy among himself, the naval attache, and staff members, and after fully understanding the * aims and intentions of the ambassadors, these messages were sent out.

33790 * The messages were never sent to War Minister ITAGAKI but ITAGAKI on one occasion communicated with the witness. This was the occasion he had mentioned in his affidavit and 33791 there was no other. * Asked if OSHIMA was pro-Nazi, the witness said he could not express OSHIMA's attitude or views by the word "pro-Nazi" and he did not say he was. OSHIMA impressed the witness as having good will toward Germany but never did he express pro-Nazi sentiments. The witness was reminded of his interrogation in which, when asked if he would say that OSHIMA's attitude was pro-Nazi, he had replied "Yes."

33792 * Also in his interrogation, when asked if OSHIMA expressed this pro-Nazi attitude, he had replied "Yes" that OSHIMA told them many things about the good points of Nazi ideology. OSHIMA was a man who had spent many years in Germany, knew the Germans well, and was very fond of them, and extremely pro-German in his ideas. He was very fond of Hitler, and his views and Ribbentrop's seemed to coincide. But the witness did not believe he got along with Goering.

33794 Asked if those answers were not made in his interrogation, the witness stated that there was some confusion in the statements said to have been made by him between Nazi and Germany. When he was asked the questions he took the word "Nazi" to mean Germany. * He did recall that such questions and answers took place but not whether the phraseology was actually that which had been just quoted him. Asked if when he made the statement in the interrogation that OSHIMA's and Ribbentrop's views seemed to coincide if he meant Nazi views, as he well knew that Ribbentrop's views were Nazi, he replied he was speaking of Ribbentrop's character as the character of the German Foreign Minister.

33797 * many years in Germany, knew Germany and Germans well, was very fond of them and was extremely pro-German in his ideas, he was very fond of Hitler, and his views and Ribbentrop's seemed to coincide, but didn't believe he got along very well with Goering.
OSHIMA was very friendly with Himmler, and he believed they met quite often, although perhaps not officially. Under ordinary circumstances he believed they saw a great deal of one another.

33798 * CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. FURNESS
Counsel for SHIGEMITSU

33799 Asked if after OSHIMA's trip to England and Belgium he heard from him or anyone that SHIGEMITSU had expressed approval of the proposed pact * the witness had not.

33800 * REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. SHIMANOCHI

33801 The witness stated that his affidavit, exhibit 3496, was true and correct. The witness was asked to explain the contradiction in his cross examination in which he had said that he never heard that OSHIMA ever met Himmler and his statement in his interrogation in which he replied that they had met quite often. * He stated that the answer he gave in his interrogation was based on his observations and presumptions. It was his impression that OSHIMA, being a long resident in Germany, had many friends there. At that time Himmler was an important and influential leader and naturally he supposed OSHIMA was on friendly terms with him and had opportunities to meet him quite often.

He understood the question put by the prosecution in his cross examination was whether he knew that OSHIMA and Himmler actually were friends, or that they had meetings. It was to this question he had replied and hence he believed there was no inconsistency in those two answers. He neither saw nor heard of OSHIMA meeting Himmler toward the end of January, 1939.

The witness was reminded of testimony in his cross examination in which he had stated that after reaching Berlin, he often consulted OSHIMA with regard to negotiations for the conclusion of a treaty and that his views agreed with OSHIMA's.
Asked if when he talked with OSHIMA on this question, he talked with him alone or if others were present, he replied that he believed OSHIMA took into consideration the views of others in regard to the question. Whenever he participated in such a discussion, the meetings were held in the embassy, or in the ambassador's official residence. Participating at all times were the consular and other staff members, the naval attache, and himself.

- 33803 * The witness was reminded that in his cross examination he had stated that OSHIMA was of the belief that in case of war between Germany and Britain, Japan should shoulder the obligation of fighting Britain, asked if OSHIMA advocated that, in case of an Anglo-German war, Japan should actually, immediately organize a war, mobilize her army, and fight Britain, he replied that OSHIMA advocated the necessity of Japan's participating as an obligation in principle, but as to participation in war, in his sense, it was vague and broad.
- 33804 He did not mean that armed forces immediately should be used to assist Germany. *Asked why OSHIMA said that Japan should shoulder the obligation of fighting Britain if an Anglo-German war should break out, he said that OSHIMA explained that it was the general contention that when Japan and Germany should conclude such an assistance pact, then Japan should shoulder the same obligations as Germany. This meant that in the event of an Anglo-Japanese war, Germany agreed to participate, in principle. The situation should not be unilateral, and if Germany, in the event of an Anglo-Japanese war should shoulder obligations to participate in principle, then in the event of such a war Japan would, in principle, recognize such obligations. This would be a very superficial and unilateral view.
- 33807 * The witness was reminded that in his cross examination he had said he knew that OSHIMA submitted his views in regard to the proposed pact to the government, but that he did not know if OSHIMA urged his views on the government. The witness was reminded that he had also testified that OSHIMA had urged the government to accept his views. Asked which reply was correct, he stated that as to the latter statement, he thought his expression was that OSHIMA urged the government to accept his views and opinions. After OSHIMA submitted his
- 33808 views, the * return instructions of the government stating whether it was acceptable then did not come for a long time.
- 33809 * When asked what he meant by "urge" he stated it was to urge the government to send a reply. During these negotiations he did not know of any occasion when OSHIMA disregarded or disobeyed the instructions of the government.

* DIRECT EXAMINATION OF MATSUI, Iwane
By Mr. Mattice

The accused identified Exhibit 3498 as his affidavit and after corrections verified it.

33813

* The affidavit stated that regarding the object of the government for sending troops to southern Chiangsu Province in 1937, owing to discord between Japan and China in North China in July 1937, * an anti-Japanese movement among the Chinese Army and civilians in Shanghai district grew intense. The Chinese Army, disregarding the Truce Agreement of 1932, persistently concentrated troops around the Japanese settlement in Shanghai, threatened troops and residents there, finally leading to the assassination of Lt. OYAMA on Aug. 9. The Government, realizing the necessity of quickly reinforcing its naval forces and to protect Japanese lives and interests, decided on 15 August to send to Shanghai an Expeditionary Force of the 3rd and 11th Divisions. The accused was appointed C-in-C and troops were sent successively on and after 20 August. The object of the force was to reinforce the naval force and protect lives and property.

* During his four years in the Army up to 1935, in which year he was placed on the reserve list, he was successively member of General Staff Headquarters, Chief of the Second Section, Commander of the 11th Division, C-in-C of the Taiwan Army, etc. During his career he was stationed in North and South China about 12 years, doing his best to bring about cooperation between Japan and China. All through life he had worked hard so the two countries could be on friendly terms and that Asia could be built up. The greater part of his Army work was in line with these ideals.

In 1937 the Shanghai Incident broke out and the Expeditionary Force was despatched. The War Minister told the accused that the reason he, who had been on the reserve list, was appointed Commander was because of his past experience. His appointment was due to the fact that at that time the government policy toward China was to settle the Incident locally as soon as possible.

* MATSUI was always firm in his belief that strife between Japan and China was a quarrel between brothers and it was unavoidable for Japan to rescue by force the Japanese residents in China and protect her interests. It was no different than an elder brother thrashing his young and recalcitrant brother, and the action was to make China come to her senses out of love. When he assumed command, he promised to settle the trouble on this on this belief and hoped to make the despatch of the force not a cause of enmity but something to bring about friendly relations and cooperation. He required his officers to make their men thoroughly understand the true meaning of

33818 According to reports, the number of Chinese troops in Shanghai and along the banks of the Yangtze, west of Shanghai, was about 100,000 and they made violent attack on the landing troops. After 15 or 16 days of bitter fighting the force, China succeeded in securing a position along the bank, but counter-attacks intensified and their force reached more than 30 or 40 divisions after reinforcements. The Expeditionary Force was reinforced in proportion and on Nov. 5 the 10th Army under YANAGAWA landed on the * coast of Chekiang Province.

33819 The Expeditionary Force, after fighting desparately for more than two months, was barely able to drive the Chinese Army from the Shanghai vicinity and to occupy the city toward the end of October and beginning of November. During the fighting, MATSUI noticed that anti-Japanese sentiment of Chinese officials and people around Shanghai was very strong and the guard unit of Chiang was most daring in counter-attacks. Chinese units were finally driven back in confusion but before their retreat they adopted "clearance tactics", destroying or burning transportation facilities and buildings. Some changed their uniforms to plain clothes and turned guerillas, sniping and threatening the rear. The local people cooperated with their troops by cutting telegraph wires, etc., jeopardizing the Japanese to no end. MATSUI was aware of many instances where troops and nationals of England, America, France, etc. in sympathy with the Chinese troops * intentionally gave assistance to them, obstructing military movements. MATSUI felt keenly that the Chinese attitude and long, bitter fighting had estranged the Chinese Army and people in Central China from the Japanese Army, causing hostile feeling between the two nations. He instructed his command to give protection and be decent to the Chinese and have a regard for foreign rights and interests. As an example of Page this instruction the battle in Nunshi, the southern district of Shanghai, ended without any damage to the district.

33820 Immediately after the 10th Army's landing at Hangchow Bay, on 5 Nov. 1937, this Army and the Expeditionary Force were organized into the Central China Area Army and MATSUI was appointed Commander for a while, serving concurrently as Commander of the Expeditionary Force. The Central Army Headquarters was over the Expeditionary Force Headquarters and the 10th Army Headquarters, and its mission was to unify * the command of the two units. Since it had only a small staff, its duty was limited to giving operational instructions and had no authority to dispose of intendance and medical matters in general.

33821 Before he was relieved of command of the Expeditionary Force, his relation with officers and men in the field with regard to command was indirect. After driving the Chinese Army out of the Shanghai area, the Central Army occupied the line between Chiahsing in Chekiang Province, Soochow and Changchow in Kiangsu Province and sought to maintain peace and order in the Shanghai area. The Chinese Army, with Nanking as its base, kept up large scale battles in North China, concentrating a great number of troops to prepare for attack in Kiangsu and Chekiang Provinces. The situation grew so bad that unless the Chinese base around Nanking was captured, it was impossible to maintain peace and order and protect interests in Central China. Consequently, Japan decided to capture Nanking to restore peace in southern Chingsu Province * and Headquarters ordered the Central Army to seize Nanking in cooperation with the Navy. The Army commenced a quick offensive operation in spite of difficulties. In accordance with the policy to localize the area of battle and because of MATSUI's idea to bring about cooperation in capturing Nanking, he took every precaution not to make the campaign a cause of struggle for the entire Chinese population.

33823 A ceremony for entering Nanking was held on 17 Dec. and a memorial service for the dead was held the next day. On the 19th MATSUI inspected the city but fires had been put out and the streets were calm with refugees returning to their homes. They saw only 20 dead Chinese troops in the streets and order within the city * was being restored. The water works, electric facilities and important government and municipal buildings had been destroyed by Chinese troops before the entry and there were comparatively few fires.

* During his stay in Shanghai after the fall of Nanking until Feb. 1938, he only heard a rumor toward the end of Dec. 1937 that there were some illegal acts in Nanking but it was no official report. The U.S. Army broadcast in Tokyo after the war's end concerning the alleged large scale massacre and outrage was the first time he heard anything about it. After the broadcast he tried to investigate Army activities after the capture of Nanking but the responsible persons were already dead, detained or punished, and the documents were destroyed by fire and it was impossible to investigate the true situation in detail. It was possible that a great number of Chinese were killed or wounded during the Nanking Campaign by gunfire, but he did not believe there was truth in the charge that there were cases of planned massacre. Nothing could be farther from the truth than the slander that the Army ordered or tolerated these deeds.

33825

* Needless to say, MATSUI did everything in his power as Commander of the Central Army to take measures to prevent the occurrence of such unfortunate incidents and to punish the guilty and compensate for damages. To his regret, the result was not perfect due to the hectic condition of wartime.

After entering Nanking on 17 Dec., he left on the 21st for Shanghai. In Shanghai he was busy negotiating with local Chinese with regard to the maintenance of general peace and order and taking relief measures for the people and getting in contact with commanders * of foreign military and civilian officials to look after incidents occurring after the campaign. This was because the Central Army, after MATSUI's return to Shanghai, was ordered to concentrate its efforts in securing the entire area south of the Yangtze and east of Nanking, especially in the Shanghai neighborhood.

When he heard the rumor of outrages in Nanking after returning to Shanghai, he again issued a warning to the officers and men staying in Nanking by sending subordinate staff officers at the end of 1937 and ordering a thorough investigation of the rumors and quick punishment for the guilty. Up to the time he left the post, he received no authentic reports concerning these matters. Besides the maintenance of peace and order in the occupied areas, he felt the necessity of negotiations for a general peace movement with the Page Chiang Government. He urged Chinese key officials in the Shanghai neighborhood to make efforts in this connection and sent envoys to Foochow and Canton and had them communicate with Chen yi and Sung * 33827 Tzu-wen; but simultaneously with the reorganization of the Central Area Army in the latter part of February, he was dismissed from his post and returned home.

When he was dismissed as Chief of the 2nd Section of the General Staff Headquarters in Dec. 1928, he started a tour of inspection of Asia and Europe. When passing through Berlin in April 1929, military attaches in Europe got together to renew friendship with him. This was not an official conference and had no particular purpose.

It was presided over by the attache in Berlin and was not called or sponsored by MATSUI. At that time MATSUI had no official power to sponsor such a conference. It was an informal discussion at which the attaches expressed their opinions on the European situation. No minutes were taken and no report was made to his superior after his return. A supreme war councillor was mainly given a temporary mission regarding education and training within the army and was not to meddle with anything, especially with foreign affairs. A cabinet advisor was appointed mainly as a consultative agency and had no substantial authority. While in these positions, his opinion was never taken up concerning China and Asiatic problems, etc. and he never offered his opinion.

For many years it had been MATSUI's regret to see Asia invaded by Europeans and Americans and he prayed for the reconstruction of Asia by the Asiatics. In view of the alienation between Japan and China after the Manchurian Incident, it was his desire that the two peoples look at the whole situation instead of misunderstanding each other. To give impetus to the movement of the "Greater Asianism" among interested persons in Japan and China, he established the Greater Asia Association together with men of the same views in 1933. This was not a political organization 33830 but one to study social culture. Its object was to reconstruct * Asia by spreading the principle of bringing about co-existence and co-prosperity for the Asiatic people and by contributing to humanity as a whole. The number of Japanese members reached more than 2000, but due to lack of funds it was unable to do anything special.

In 1935 and 1936 he travelled in China and tried to accomplish the movement. For years in China, Greater Asianism had been widely advocated by Sun Wen, former President of China. Hoping that the Chinese movement and Japanese movement would be in line, he talked with interested men in Peiping and Tientsin in

Page the fall of 1935 and in the spring of 1936 there was established the 33831 Chinese Greater Asia Association. It was true that in this regard he persuaded Chin Te-chun, the mayor of Peipin, * but Chin's affidavit did not agree with his words at the time. Their claim was not necessarily to drive out Europeans and Americans from Asia, but he advocated that the latter should join in the idea of co-prosperity and co-existence.

33832 * The Dai Nippon Asia Development League was established at the time of the First KONOYE Cabinet, combining the numerous organizations engaged in developing Asia. The IRAA was organized also and the League came under its supervision. Due to frequent Cabinet changes, the Asia Development League was constantly compelled to reorganize and change its sphere of activities. All it could do and did was to get in contact with cultural organizations in China and Manchukuo to ask their cooperation, and besides that, nothing concrete was accomplished.

33833 The reason MATSUI was Vice President or Advisor of the League was due to his past relationship with the Greater Asia Association. As the result of the frequent changes in the organization * of the Development League, it reorganized and changed its name as Dai Nippon Asia Development Association at the time of the Koiso Cabinet in 1944. It was placed under the supervision and guidance of the government but was of a cultural nature. With the progress of the Pacific War, the acute situation prevented its starting any concrete movements and it was only able to publish its organ and give guidance for Asiatics residing in Japan. Because of his past connection with this association, MATSUI took charge of its management, but the war came to an end and he was obliged to dissolve it.

33834 About 12 Dec. 1937 he received a report that an artillery unit of the 10th Army bombarded a British gunboat near Wuhu. He ordered his C/S to investigate, and according to his report about 11 Dec., Chinese troops were retreating * on the Yangtze River by ships, many of which were displaying foreign flags. The 10th Army Commander YANAGAWA ordered that these ships be fired upon which had retreating Chinese soldiers on board. When Colonel HAYASHI located several ships sailing with Chinese soldiers on the morning of the 12th in the fog-covered Yangtze River, he opened fire and the Ladybird was among those ships. MATSUI immediately ordered the Commander of the 10th Army to apologize to the British Naval C-in-C. MATSUI, returning to Shanghai from Nanking, called on Admiral Little and apologized. Little fully understood and promised he would transmit the apology to Britain.

The bombing of the USS Panay was done by a Navy plane by mistake. The plane was not under MATSUI's command and he had Page nothing to do with it. Since it was an unfortunate incident, MATSUI went to Admiral Yarnell, the U.S. Navy Commander, expressing his regret.

33835 * MATSUI protected peaceful people and respected foreign rights and interests. After the Shanghai and Nanking battles, he visited Admiral Little and Admiral Yarnell to promote better understanding, and he also met the French Ambassador and Navy C-in-C and exchanged opinions about the French Concession and Nanshi.

33836 The number of Japanese officers and men killed or dying from disease during the fighting at Shanghai, Nanking, etc. was more than 21,000 * and the total casualties were more than 80,000. He decided there were many cases of massacre. He thought there were many victims of Chinese soldiers and people and among them were not a few who suffered from cholera, etc. prevailing at Shanghai and in the Chinese Army. To his way of thinking, when the Chinese and Japanese ought to have cooperated as brethren it was a calamity that they struggled against each other and a tremendous cost. It was his hope that the incident would give 33837 an opportunity for the two to live in harmony. * After returning home he built a temple and a statue of the Goddess of Mercy, dedicating them to the victims of both countries.

33838 *Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that Japan decided on 15 August to send an expeditionary force to Shanghai, which consisted of the Third and Eleventh Divisions. The witness stated that before he left Tokyo to take command he asked that the number of divisions be increased to five. Since there were reports coming in that the number of Chinese troops in Shanghai and vicinity was about 100,000 it was believed a strength of five divisions would be appropriate to meet the situation. *To meet the demands of the situation, troops were increased to the point that the expeditionary force alone consisted of five divisions and the Yanagawa Army had three divisions, a total of eight. The expeditionary force reached five divisions during the first of October. The Tenth Army under YANAGAWA landed in China about 5 November 1937.

33840 *Reference was made to the affidavit where he referred to the reason for his appointment as C-in-C of the expeditionary force. The accused stated that during his military career he had spent about twelve years in China. In 1907 he went to Peking as assistant Military Attache at Shanghai and after three years there he returned to Japan. * In 1914 he went to China again, staying there for about four and one-half years. During this time he cooperated with Sun Yat-sen and other members of the Kuomintang in trying to overthrow Emperor Yuan Shih-kai. While he was in Shanghai he was military agent there. A military Attache acted in conjunction with the legation or embassy but a military agent was under the direct control of the General Staff *and worked independently. One of his duties was to examine the terrain in the vicinity of Shanghai and Nanking. Asked if that wasn't the reason he was appointed C-in-C in 1937, he replied he didn't think his knowledge of topography was of great importance but believed his appointment was due to his friendship for leaders of the Kuomintang with whom he had become acquainted in Shanghai and Nanking. Asked if his knowledge of the area had not come in useful later on, he replied there might have been occasions on which it was of service.

33843 Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated the intention was to settle the incident locally as soon as possible and to prevent the armed *conflict from spreading. When it was suggested to the accused that before he left Tokyo in 1937 he made known his desire to press on to Nanking, he stated he did have such thought at the time he left Tokyo.

33844 *Asked if the Chinese resisted at every turn, he replied that "resist" wasn't the word, but from the very beginning it was the Chinese who took the offensive. When the Japanese took the offensive the Chinese did resist. In connection with his statement in the affidavit that the expeditionary force was a means of bringing about friendly relations he was asked if at this time, late 1937, he was not in favor of continuing negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek. He answered that on one hand the Japanese forces attacked the Chinese who threatened them and on the other hand they conducted behind-the-scenes negotiations with Chiang and his regime for conclusion of peace.

*He never advised his government to have nothing to do with Chiang Kai-shek at that time. Asked if he expressed strong opinions to that effect, he replied that since his thoughts were to open peaceful negotiations with Chiang he did not voice such opinions. His thoughts were to crush as quickly as possible the opposing forces in the Shanghai-Nanking area and immediately to open peace negotiations after they were crushed.

33846

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that he was aware of instances where troops and nationals of England, America, France, etc. in sympathy with Chinese troops intentionally gave assistance to them and obstructed Japanese military movements. Asked what countries constituted "et cetera" he stated that almost all European and American countries in or near Shanghai at the time * were in sympathy with the Chinese. Germany directly aided the Chinese and there were many German advisers to the Chinese forces. None of these countries made war on Japan but they were not only out of sympathy with the Japanese side but were actually giving moral and even actual material help. Asked what they gave, he stated that if he gave all the facts they would be many in number, but as an example, Britain furnished food, supplies, equipment and arms. When the Japanese were attacking the Chinese battery at Woosung a French warship intentionally went through the Japanese lines, hindering the attack. The ship was lying outside Shanghai Harbor * but when the Japanese began attacking the battery it went up the Yangtze.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it referred to the Central China Army * and stated that Headquarters had only seven staff officers and its duty was limited to operational instructions to the two Headquarters and had no authority in intendance and medical matters of the army in general. The accused stated, by this he meant it had no authority over such matters as rations, quarters, pay and medical services. Where he said that his relation with the officers and men in the field * with regard to command and supervision was entirely indirect, he meant he exercised command through the commanders of the Shanghai Expeditionary Force and the 10th Army. It was true that the 10th Army and the expeditionary force were under his command.

In his affidavit he had stated that some excited young officers and men might have committed outrages in Nanking. He did not see this with his own eyes but knew of it from reports. These outrages were murder, rape, looting and forceful seizure of materials and he received these reports from the gendarmery.

He stated he heard it from reports of the expeditionary force commander, Prince ASAKA, and from the 10th Army Commander, YANAGAWA, and both kept him in close touch with the progress of the operations. Reminded that he stated in his affidavit that he heard about the outrages after entering Nanking on 17 December from the Commander of the Kempei Unit, he was asked if he received reports from other persons after entering Nanking. He stated that when he went to the Japanese Consulate he heard stories of similar nature from the consul. *Asked why he didn't put that
- 33851 in his affidavit, he stated that was because he did not hear it as an official report but merely heard stories from the consul in the course of the conversation. He did not hear from the consul that complaints had been lodged by foreign residents with the Consulate. He heard from the consul that among the officers and men who had entered Nanking were some who had committed outrages. Asked if the consul mentioned any particular units, divisions or armies he replied the conversation did not go into such details. He believed it took place about the 18th or 19th of December. Asked if he also received reports of outrages
- 33852 from army and divisional commanders while he was in Nanking * he replied he did not receive such reports. He acknowledged being in Court when the witness NAKAYAMA, an intelligence officer of the Central China Area Army gave evidence. Asked if he heard NAKAYAMA say that he received additional reports from commanders and divisional commanders of MATSUI's Command as well as from diplomatic organs he replied he didn't think NAKAYAMA said that since MATSUI was army commander he received reports from the two army commanders but not from divisional commanders as they were not his subordinate commanders. He did receive reports from the two army commanders immediately after his entry into Nanking. These reports were in regard to the general war situation and he did not receive reports on outrages from them.
- 33853 *His Chief of Staff on 18 or 19 December was dead and he could not recall his name. Asked if he succeeded Lt. General IINUMA, he replied that IINUMA was Chief of Staff of the area army and Chief of Staff of the expeditionary force was appointed by the General Staff. When told that it was understood from the witness IINUMA that he relinquished his post about the time of Nanking's capture, the accused stated that at the time of the capture IINUMA was Chief of Staff of the expeditionary force and later in February of the following year when the army was reorganized IINUMA was relieved.
- 33854 Asked if his Chief of Staff immediately after the fall of Nanking told him of outrages committed by troops under MATSUI's command, he replied he did so report, saying it was a report he had received from the Kempei.

The accused was reminded of testimony by the witness HIDAKA (T 21,453) that reports of atrocities from foreign residents in Nanking were sent to the Foreign Office in Tokyo and to the army in Nanking. The accused stated that such reports, if sent to the army in Nanking, should have gone to the Headquarters of Prince ASAKA, commander of the expeditionary force. The witness was reminded of testimony of NAKAYAMA (T 21,927) that he thought the reports went to the Special Service Department of the Shanghai Expeditionary Force and the accused was asked where that department was subsequent to December 17, 1937, the accused replied the Headquarters were in Shanghai but believed a part of it had gone to Nanking. Headquarters of the expeditionary * force were inside the walls of Nanking, and he believed 10th Army Headquarters were in Nanking for two days but moved to Hangchow around the 20th.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that hearing about these atrocities MATSUI ordered every unit to investigate thoroughly and punish the guilty men. Asked if they reported back the result of investigations, he replied that each specific unit would not report to him directly but if he received reports it would be from the two army commanders. Up to his departure from Shanghai in February the following year he received no reports on these investigations. * He had asked that they be reported to him but the reply was that they were in the midst of investigations and as soon as they were completed they would reply. He had also received no reply until he left China in February 1937. Asked if the General Staff in Tokyo communicated with him regarding the behavior of troops in Nanking, he stated he was not aware of any communications from the General Staff to him on that point. He knew nothing at all of any communications from anyone in Tokyo addressed to anyone that came to his knowledge in China. He did remember that toward the end of January 1938 when Major General HOMMA was sent to his headquarters from the General Staff he said Tokyo authorities were very worried about reports * of outrages committed by Japanese soldiers in China. In December and early January he did not receive any complaints from any government or military authority in Tokyo regarding the conduct of troops in Nanking. He heard nothing about a communication sent to Prince ASAKA, commander of the expeditionary force from Japan, * nor did he hear about any complaint sent to ASAKA from any place whatsoever.

The accused stated that on 18 December he called together all units stationed in Nanking for a memorial service and he believed that all officers above the rank of regimental commander were there. They were assembled because on the previous

... say he had received through his Chief of Staff the report of the gendarmery commander in regard to outrages committed by Japanese soldiers and he gathered the officers together to give them direct instructions. He did not know how long the atrocities went on in Nanking but thought most were committed immediately after the entry.

33859 *The accused stated he had heard but did not believe the evidence of the witness Magee (T 3922) and the witness Bates (T 2644) in which they said atrocities went on for about six weeks after the fall of the city.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that not a few of the crimes in Nanking were committed by Chinese troops and people when the city fell. Asked how he knew that, he replied he knew it from receiving reports made by Staff Officer NAKAYAMA and Counselor HIDAKA, whom he had sent to investigate. He believed he received the report in mid January. In their report they mentioned crimes committed by Japanese soldiers but as they reported orally he didn't remember the contents too well.

33860 *Since they went to Nanking to investigate after the incident had broken out and since they caught no one actually in the act MATSUI was not able to get an exact report. Asked if he sent them back to make a further and better report, he stated that at the time it was after the incidents had occurred and almost impossible for the Chief of Staff and Foreign Office authorities to make exact investigations. The only method left was to order unit commanders to investigate in regard to their own units but such reports took quite some time and he did not have them when he left China for Japan.

33861 The accused was reminded of the testimony of the witness OKADA (T 32,747) who said he had a conversation with MATSUI in the Metropole Hotel in Nanking on 18 December and MATSUI told him he was sorry because unknowingly he had wrought a most * grievous effect upon the city. The accused acknowledged making this statement to OKADA. MATSUI stated he had no desire to occupy Nanking by war but wished the occupation to be peaceful and had no desire to turn Nanking into a field of carnage and that is what he meant when he referred to a most grievous effect upon the city.

In his inspection on 19 December he did not enter the refugee zone. Asked if he had no conversations with those refugees as set out in the affidavit of the witness OKADA, he replied that it was not in the refugee zone but elsewhere that he met two refugees and talked with them.

33863 *The accused was reminded that the witness NAKAYAMA (T 21,893) testified that MATSUI informed Chief of Staff TSUKADA to issue an order to all staff officers that as Nanking was China's capital its capture was an international event and careful study must be made so as to dazzle China even more greatly with Japan's military glory. The accused acknowledged issuing that order.

The witness HIDAOKI was an embassy councillor in Nanking before the incident. After the incident the embassy was located in Shanghai.

*HIDAOKI was the official who received the complaints of the foreign residents of Nanking and was the same official who MATSUI asked to make an investigation in January 1938. HIDAOKI's report was verbal and the accused did not hear him mention that he had been receiving constant reports of complaints of the foreign residents of Nanking. MATSUI had HIDAOKI investigate into matters of damages and losses inflicted upon the embassies and legations of foreign powers in Nanking and indemnify them. This included the Chinese. *Asked if it was not true that HIDAOKI was to investigate upon the basis of the information contained in reports of complaints he had, the accused replied he did not know what method was used but he assumed he based his investigation on reports of foreigners in the refugee zone. MATSUI at that time did not hear of such reports. Asked why he then assumed that he predicated his investigation upon such reports, he replied he was assuming now and after being informed that many such reports had been submitted to the consul.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that when he inspected the city only about twenty dead Chinese soldiers were seen lying on the streets. Asked how many bodies of dead civilians, including women and children, he saw, he replied he did not see any. *Witness was reminded that in his interrogation (Exh. 257) he was asked if he saw any bodies of dead civilians, women or children, when he went to Nanking on the 17th and he answered that they had all been removed but he saw a few dead soldiers near the west gate. Asked if it could be understood from that answer that the bodies of dead civilians had been removed by the time he got there, he replied he did not know of any Chinese women and children being killed within Nanking. Asked why he said in his interrogation that they had all been removed by the time he entered the city, he replied he did not know whether he said that or not but if there had been it was his idea then that they would naturally have been removed from the scene.

Reference was made to the affidavit during his stay in Shanghai after the fall of Nanking until February 1938 where he stated the only thing he heard was a rumor at the end of December 1937 that there were some cases of illegal acts in Nanking but he received no official * report about such fact. Asked where the rumors came from, he replied that at the time there were many rumors among Chinese and foreigners and he learned this from persons hearing these rumors. Such rumors might have appeared in Chinese newspapers but he did not think at that time such matters got into print. There might have been some in the foreign press but from his careful scrutiny of Chinese and foreign newspapers at the time he did not notice any. Reminded that the accused MINAMI had testified (T 20,015) that the rape of Nanking had been reported in the press of the world he was asked if he read any of those reports and he answered that he had not read such reports but they might have been reported after he had already left Shanghai because he did not notice any while he was there.

*He had a conversation with Mr. Hallett Abend in Shanghai twice in January 1937. He met him to hear what he had heard and to impart information to Abend. Asked if he wanted to quell the rumors abroad at that time, he replied "quell" was hardly the word to be used. His desire was to see the truth reported. To the witness was quoted a part of his interrogation (Exh. 257) in which when asked when he first saw Hallett Abend after the Nanking capture he replied he met him for the first time about a month after. Asked if Abend asked for an interview he replied "no", he requested Abend to see him as he had * heard rumors and wished to quell these by putting the facts before Abend. The accused conceded that this was what took place. Asked what rumors he was referring to when he mentioned this conversation with Abend, he replied that regarding the many outrages alleged to have been committed in Nanking his desire was to tell Abend the truth of the situation as he believed it and although there were many foreign correspondents in Shanghai at the time he felt Mr. Abend the most trustworthy. He could not say who was talking about these outrages but thought the source of the rumors was mostly Chinese and foreigners who had heard them from Chinese. He could not recall but thought it was one of his subordinates who passed the information on to him, *and it probably was his Chief of Staff. He was going to tell Abend the facts so there would be no misapprehension about the true state of affairs. Asked if he had received any report from his investigators at that time, he stated "no", but he had been receiving fragmentary reports from the gendarmerie, not directly himself but his staff officers were receiving them daily since the fall of Nanking. Asked if those reports were communicated to him as C-in-C, he replied that as the gendarmerie were not his direct subordinates but the subordinates of the army commanders the reports were made to them and not to himself. * Asked what the army commanders did with the reports received from the Kempetai, he replied that when the facts were made known the offender was tried and punished. When he had mentioned fragmentary reports from the Kempetai he meant staff officers on his staff as C-in-C. Asked if the reports were brought to his knowledge, he replied that ordinarily discipline and morals was the responsibility of the division commander and the army commander supervised the divisional commander and maintained the courts martial under his jurisdiction. MATSUI was the commander above them and his area had no military police under its direct control and therefore reports were not made to his headquarters or to himself directly.

33869

33872 *Asked if staff officers of his headquarters were constantly receiving reports from the Kempeitai, he replied it was more correct to say that inasmuch as he told his staff officers to put these matters under investigation they went to the Kempeitai to get information rather than to receive reports from them. Asked if after investigation they returned to headquarters with reports, he replied that at that time there was a battle going on. It was not easy to get the desired facts and it was only natural that reports were fragmentary and abstract. Asked what reports he had as to what was going on in Nanking from his staff officers who got it from the Kempeitai, he replied that inasmuch as these incidents had already occurred and reports were heard indirectly through various informants and with troops

33874 of the two armies under his command * but did not have direct authority to handle discipline and morals. Asked if had the power to see that discipline and morals were maintained in units under his command, he replied it would be more correct to say obligation or duty rather than authority. This was the reason he summoned his officers in Nanking after the entry and talked to them about disciplinary measures. Asked if he was not attempting to say that power of discipline was not inherent in his command, he replied that he was not evading all responsibilities in connection with the capture of Nanking as area commander but was not directly responsible for the discipline and morals of the armies under his command. Asked if this was because there was an army commander

33875 in the units under his command and he carried out * disciplinary measures through his army commanders, he replied that he himself did not have authority to take disciplinary measures or hold courts martial but such authority resided in army or division commanders. He had no legal right to order a court martial to be held in the army or division. Asked how he explained his efforts to show that he ordered severe punishment to the guilty for outrages in Nanking and did everything in his power as C-in-C to give severe punishment to the guilty, he replied he had no authority except to express his desires as C-in-C to the army and divisional commanders. It would be a difficult thing in the light of the law for a general officer commanding to express his desires to subordinates in the form of orders.

33876 *Asked when he wanted those under him to do something what he did, he replied that authority vested in him was overall operational command of the two armies and that was all. It would be

- Page difficult to determine his legal responsibility with regard to the question of discipline and morals. Asked if his military superiors in Tokyo were dissatisfied with the conduct of the army in China who they would held responsible, he replied it was difficult to try to determine this legal question and he did not know how the general staff offices in Tokyo felt at that time but while he was in Shanghai or after his return to Tokyo he was never reprimanded by the Chief of Staff.
- 33877 Asked why General HOMMA went to Shanghai early in February of 1938, he replied * it was only natural that the central authorities would be greatly worried about the reports of outrages and MATSUI ~~was~~ shared that misgiving and because of his great worry he instructed officers to rectify such actions and he told them that discipline had to be maintained. General HOMMA came to his headquarters but did not speak about the particulars of the reports received in Tokyo, but did speak generally about the conduct of MATSUI's troops in Nanking.
- 33878 *HOMMA came to China because the higher command was concerned about the conduct of the troops and MATSUI presumed he learned of these matters from reports sent by the Foreign Office to the army. The accused was quite sure that he himself did not send a report to Tokyo Headquarters. He may have talked about the matter to the General Staff after his return but never sent an official report, nor an
- 33879 *unofficial report. Asked if although he did know of some incidents having occurred he didn't report these to Tokyo, he replied if there was any necessity for sending reports with regard to discipline and morals that authority did not reside in the area commander C-in-C but was in the divisional commander. Asked about the responsibility of the army commanders he stated that legally this would be difficult to say and his interpretation was that the responsibility resided in the divisional commander to send reports to central authorities through their immediate superior, the army commander. Asked if the divisional commander would send a report through the army commander through the
- 33880 C-in-C to Tokyo, he replied * he could not speak of this definitely from the legal standpoint. Asked if they were not channeled through the C-in-C of the central army, he replied he could not say whether it was legally correct or not but as a matter of fact such reports were not sent by him.

33882 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that after entering Nanking on 17 December, he heard about it for the first time from the Kempei commander and at once ordered every unit to investigate thoroughly and punish the guilty men. Asked how he explained this statement if he had no power to give orders relative to the maintenance of discipline, he stated that he meant to say that he gathered together his army commanders and unit commanders, expressing his desires in regard to the maintenance of discipline and ordered them to take appropriate measures.

33883 * Asked about his testimony before that he had no power to give orders, he replied that at the time, being area army commander, he was given authority to unify the joint strategy of the two armies, therefore he could not say that the maintenance of discipline had no connection with strategy, and in so far as the two were interconnected, he thought he would have power to interfere in matters of discipline, but in the strict legal sense he did not conceive himself as having the power to give specific orders in detail with regard to discipline and this was his belief to the present day.

33886 It was true that the duty of a general staff officer was to be told what he was to do and to do it, but his trip was authorized by the general staff because he had just completed a long tour of duty in it, and it was partly for the purpose of recuperation and also to enable him to get a better idea of world situation. *When he visited Europ.countries, he saw the military attaches there. Asked if it was not unnecessary then for him to get together with them in Berlin to renew friendships, he replied it was thought desirable that the European attaches should have the opportunity of getting together, and therefore the attache in Germany, OMURA, sent invitations to the countries and they all accepted.

33887 They knew MATSUI was coming to Berlin because he had told them he would arrive and there were attaches there from Britain, Germany, France, Poland, Russia, Austria, Turkey, and Italy. The accused, HASHIMOTO, was there from Turkey, and * SUZUKI, the attache from Poland was there but this was not the accused SUZUKI. No such thing as sabotage and espionage against Russia were discussed, but each representative told of the situation in the country in which he was stationed. After talking all day on various topics, they spent the evening at a restaurant.

The accused was reminded that the accused HASHIMOTO had testified before the court that at this meeting the topic of sabotage and espionage against Russia came up (T. 28,839), and MATSUI was asked if HASHIMOTO was wrong. He replied that since HAGHIMOTO was attache in Turkey, he spoke of intelligence work vis-a-vis Russia, but did not recall the contents of his talk. He recalled that HASHIMOTO spoke of utilizing White Russians in Turkey but did not recall concerning sending White Russians into Russia surreptitiously.

33890 * Asked if it was not true that this meeting was to discuss what might be done by way of espionage and sabotage against Russia, he replied that officers stationed in countries neighboring Russia probably talked about Russia, but each attache spoke of the subjects he was most concerned with. The accused stated he believed he resigned as a supreme war

Page 33891 councillor in March 1935 and did so because he was appointed commander of the Taiwan Garrison force. It had nothing to do with disagreement in policy. Reminded that he was then appointed a cabinet advisor, and that he had stated that his opinion was never taken * up concerning China and Asiatic problems, and that he never offered his opinion, he was read what the accused KIDO had said about the position of a cabinet councillor in court (T. 31,413). When Kido had been asked what was the duty of a cabinet councillor, he replied he thought that according to government regulations, his main function was to serve as consultant to the Premier in connection with bringing about an early termination of the China Incident.

When KIDO had been asked if a cabinet councillor was a special position created for that precise purpose, he had replied "yes". Asked how he reconciled KIDO's statement with his own statement that he had never offered his opinion on any matter concerning China or Asia, he replied that the original reason for setting cabinet councillors might be as KIDO said, but actually they were only advisor in name and although they gathered once or twice a week at the Premier's official residence, they did a lot of talking which never came to anything more.

33894 Asked if in order to enter into this Greater East Asia, it would be necessary for these countries to break away, as for example, Siberia and Mongolia from Russia, he replied that his principle of Greater Asia did not call for the separation of these peoples from the country from which they were affiliated, and they did not necessarily think necessary, for instance for the Yukuts Republic to leave the Soviet Union or if India remained in the British Commonwealth. What they aimed at was that all the Asiatics should work together for Asia's prosperity. Asked if Manchuria would be an example of what he was advocating, he replied that it could be considered that way. * Asked if in the case of war with the USSR, Manchuria would be a very valuable base of operation, he replied that history had proved that in case of war between Soviet and Japan, Manchuria would be a base.

Page It was suggested to the accused that the policy of his association was that these Asiatic countries and peoples were to be brought into the structure of Greater East Asia and as their entry could not be brought about by peaceful negotiations, the question would have to be settled by war. He said that the basic principle underlying the movement was the same as the one for a federation of Europe, which arose in Europe, and of the Pan-American movement.

33895 * In 1935 and 1936 he was traveling in China and preaching the gospel of this association. After the out break of the Greater East Asia War, in 1941, he made tours of FIC and the southern regions and was in the Philippines. Asked if in these countries, his effort was to convince those people of the propriety of their entering the structure of the Greater Asia Association, he replied that by that time they had established a Great Asia League and he went around exhorting the peoples of Greater Asia to cooperate with it, but at the same time he had many friends in the south asiatic countries, and

33897 He did not recall the time the league was established. The Japanese government assembled representatives of the Great Asia countries for a conference in Tokyo. Reminded that he had said in his affidavit it was at the first KONOYE cabinet, and asked if that was correct or if it was the second KONOYE cabinet, he stated * he believed there was confusion regarding the three societies with which he had been concerned: the Asia Association, the Asia Development League, and the Great Japan Asia Development League. These three had common principles and all advocated asianism, but their form and structure differed from time to time according to the changing international circumstances and the internal political situation.

33898 Asked when the Dai Nippon Development League was established, he stated he thought it was during the first KONOYE cabinet. Mention was made of the affidavit where he said the Dai Nippon Development Association published an organ, and he was asked if this was the Dai Asia Shimbun. He stated it was not a newspaper but a magazine and the association published the Dai Asia Shugi, or The Principle of Great Asia. After the Development League was established, the name * of the magazine became Dai Asia, or Great Asia. When shown a document he identified it as the magazine "Dai Asia Shugi" for January, 1941. Exhibit 3499-A, an excerpt therefrom being an

33900 article written by the accused, MATSUI, entitled a * "Proposal for unification and rapid progress of various organizations

Page for development of Asia"by MATSUI, Iwane, stated that the year 2600 of the Imperial Japanese Era brought faith in Imperial history and awakened the whole nation with a determination to face the present world situation. The conclusion of the tripartite pact between Japan, Germany, and Italy and the recognition by the Nanking Kuomintang Government had forced them irresistibly to go on the road to construct a new order in Asia against long dominance by Britain, America, and France.

Reconstruction of the various internal organs was urgently necessary to meet this serious situation, together with the establishment of a so-called new structure in politics, economics and in various other spheres. They welcomed 2600th year with great pleasure and pride in living in this sacred age of Showa to promote the building of Greater Asia. However, they could not consider the determination of the people both in and out of power quite insufficient.

33901 * The tripartite pact had been concluded in alliance with the declaration made at the formation of the KONOYE cabinet and the rescript was issued to urge the people to make up their minds. But they felt that since the government had been carrying out foreign policy without firm faith to resolutely execute the national policy, and since many politicians and learned people had not come up to expectation in their enthusiasm, the internal situation was reflected on foreign countries and it was regrettable that not only many Asiatic countries headed by China, but also European powers were beginning to make light of their determination and foothold.

33903 Up to the present, they had not been the same in their measures, but were acting independently far from answering the requirement of the present New Structure of Society. Such different organizations of these bodies had disturbed the peoples' faith and ideals in * the Asiatic Revival Policy. Such being the case, recently they had organized the League of the Asiatic Development Bodies, exerting efforts for more than a year to unite and adjust all of them into one and to control and guide

DEFENSE - MATSUI - Cross

Page it by a uniform thought and faith, together with starting a new collective activity by concentrating the separate and duplicated efforts of them. They hoped to correct and guide the concepts of Asiatic Revival and unify and lead the peoples' ideals. What the organization aimed at must harmonize with government policy and sometimes it would advise and encourage them to assist the Asiatic Revival policy. Its ambition was to become the nucleus of the nation's cultural idea of revival and start an international movement east and west with a view to join the IRA movement started by the Asiatic Revival organizations.

33904

* In spite of the many revival bodies in the country, new ones were being organized and some measures to control them was urgent. Although these old bodies had their own history and special circumstances, their unification would not be difficult and it would not be hard to continue the work of the old ones under consistent control. In controlling, they must depend upon the effectiveness of each person and organization and all members of the various bodies were earnestly desired to agree with them, and the authorities of the China Affairs Board were to contemplate this matter.

MATSUI here suggested the unification of all the Asia Revival bodies and desired apostles for the cause to rise and cooperate and guide the people. The present situation had become clear and did not allow them to hesitate. If overcautious they would entangle the situation * misleading the country. It was necessary to listen to the nation's voice for those who wanted to guide national policy with sincerity and good faith, but they could not approve shirking responsibility, especially when the decision of national politics depended upon determination to put national policy toward Greater Asia into effect.

MATSUI felt most deeply their responsibility as apostles of the revival and this was why he appealed to their comrades to rise at once.

Regarding the above article, the accused was asked in what way the government was too scrupulous in carrying out its foreign policy. He replied that at the time hostilities between Japan and China were in progress and some of the government policies toward Asia, as a whole, were imbued with a strong Asianistic spirit. But in view of Japan's internal situation, there were many who tried to think in * negative terms. Hemmed in by these two extremes, the government's policies were very vacillating and MATSUI felt strongly that they were too weak and dilly-dallying. Reminded that the tripartite pact had been signed and there had been a move into FIC, he was asked what he wanted the government to do. He stated his movement was mainly cultural and ideological and he had no idea of Page advocating a policy of force or of intentionally setting themselves up against European and American nations. But in view of the international situation and Japan's national strength, he felt they should not sit idly by. His ideas were quite different from Gandhi's movement which was negative. The fundamental spirit which animated MATSUI was the spirit of Bushido and of Buddhism doctrines. * Even if he was sacrificed, he would give up his life for the welfare and reconstruction of the Asiatic people and even if Japan was to be sacrificed, she should give herself up for Asia's sake.

* Reference was made to his reference to the Ladybird incident in his affidavit, and that he had stated he was responsible for all operational matters. He agreed that the bombardment of the Ladybird came within this classification and he took full responsibility for it without hesitation. Reminded that he had ordered the 10th Army Commander to apologize to the British c-in-c and that he took no responsibility for the bombing of the Panay, he was asked why he went to Admiral Yarnell about that incident as was it not proper to go to the U.S. Navy commander, he stated that the main purpose of his request for an interview * with Admiral Yarnell was discussed on American rights and interests in the Shanghai-Nanking area.

33909

Even though the navy was responsible for bombing the ship Panay, it belonged to the United States navy and as MATSUI was directing joint navy-army operations, he felt that although it was not his direct responsibility, it was in accordance with Bushido to express a word of regret to Admiral Yarnell. Navy units were not under his operational command but entirely independent and under the navy. The commander of the Japanese fleet, HASEGAWA, issued the operation orders, which were carried out by those naval units and he was not under MATSUI's command but independent.

Asked how he could direct operations without the navy being under his operational control, he stated that in order to do this they acted in cooperation with each other. * Reference was made to the affidavit where it spoke of a contribution of 10,000 yen to a Reverend Jackinough in Shanghai, and he was asked where the money came from. He stated that since he did not possess such even that amount, he used the money of headquarters' official funds.

Asked what his attitude toward the negotiations with America was in 1941, he stated that when he was fighting in the Shanghai-Nanking area against the Chinese, the attitude of the American officials was more or less neutral and he could find nothing criticizable in their attitude. 33911 Page out the fighting men of Japan and America should cooperate to maintain peace in the Pacific and Admiral Yarnell fully agreed. This was his sentiment * in 1938 and when again asked about his attitude in 1941, he would have to go back to explain this point. In January 1938 the U.S. President made a speech mentioning Japan's attitude toward Asia and her actions and in language with which he found it difficult to agree and he expressed his dissatisfaction to a New York newspaper correspondent.

33912 Asked again if he was in favor of carrying on negotiations with the United States in 1941, he replied that it was his earnest desire that pending issues between Japan and the United States be settled through peaceful negotiations, but what he thought of the situation at the time was almost as though a Japanese-American war had broke out. When shown an article in the Dai Asia Shugi, * he acknowledged that he wrote it.

33913 Exhibit 3500-A, an excerpt from the Dai Asia Shugi, July 1941 issue, being an article entitled " The Settlement of the China Incident and the Problem of the United States" * written by the accused, MATSUI, stated that a lukewarm argument for compromise with the United States was being put out. It was difficult to comprehend, when he heard that today when the hostile feeling of the U.S. was so acute, compromise with her was being taken seriously. When compromise was advocated from one quarter, its influence extended to Chungking, Nanking, Thailand, French Indo-China, and the NEI, and cast a gloomy shadow on national policy. The reason why the NEI suddenly took a firm attitude and the Japanese-Netherlands Parley was on the brink of a break-down, was solely because the NEI received the impression that Japan would submit to the U.S.

33914 The strengthening of Chungking's war attitude, the wavering of FIC, the uneasiness of Nanking, were all the effect brought about by the lukewarm argument for a Japanese-American compromise. To complete the Holy War, strengthen the peoples' spiritual unity, and make the Asiatic races place their confidence in Japan, it was first necessary to sweep away the servile argument for compromise with the United States. * The basis of the argument for a compromise seemed to lie mostly in the idea that by compromising, it would be possible to stop aid to Chungking, make them cooperate in development of the Nanking Regime, obtain U.S. loans, and direct U.S. cooperation, and secure material resources in the southern regions. This was a fantastic mistake. America considered England her first line of defense

Page and also Chungking and Batavia her first line of defense. There was no reason for America to consider a compromise. America wanted to divert the Hawaiian fleet to the Atlantic and then enter the war, but if she did, the tripartite treaty would make itself felt. The U.S. had neither the preparation nor the power to wage a two-front operation. She wanted to hold Japan down for a while by utilizing the Japanese groups advocating the status quo, the pro-Anglo-American groups, and the groups advocating dependency on the U.S. and Britain. She wanted to de-33915 ceive Japan and prolong matters * without taking a definite step, and in the meantime was making war preparations.

This was their direct intention and if Japan was fooled by such a trick, it would be disastrous and they would fall from a position of certain victory to one of certain defeat. They must not absolutely compromise with the U.S. for if they did, the significance of the China Incident would be lost and the significance of the war for constructing the New Order would come to nought. Also it would violate the spirit of the tripartite alliance and would be a retrogression of Japan's world policy. The spirit rather than the wording of the alliance was the important thing, for its spirit enabled each nation to have its rightful place in the world. Germany in Europe and Japan in Asia were both fighting for a new order and MATSUI asked how they could violate this lofty aim and international faith for momentary profit.

33917 If one was persistent in the idea of wanting to settle the China Incident early, he became weak minded. A good soldier forgets his enemy. As long as it was declared that Chiang would be ignored, they may as well forget his existence. The best would be to take the attitude of ignoring the Chungking Regime and Chiang, * for their immediate enemies were clearly Britain and the U.S. and the group of democratic nations. This was common knowledge already. If a compromise was reached with Britain and the U.S. and they tried to settle Incident through Anglo-Saxon cooperation, how could they ever face the spirits of departed heroes. In the name of the Page 100,000 dead heroes, he absolutely opposed compromise with the U.S. If the U.S. declared war on Germany, Japan must also rise unhesitatingly in accordance with the obligation of the tripartite alliance.

EXAMINATION BY THE TRIBUNAL

Reference was made to a statement that on 24 November NAKAYAMA and HIDAKA reported atrocities committed by Chinese troops in Nanking. Asked how many cases were reported to him, 33918 * he stated he did not hear any specific facts, but they only conveyed general rumours in regard to those cases.

33919 * Asked if he knew of any cases in which a Japanese soldier was tried by court martial and sentenced for atrocities committed in Nanking beyond a mere reprimand by his superior, he stated that the witness TSUKAMOTO and OGAWA had testified that the number of officers and men tried before a court martial and convicted reached over 100.

Asked if he had any other knowledge about the number, he replied that he did hear at the time that two or three cases were being tried in Shanghai. After returning to Japan he tried to investigate the matter but as the documents had been burned, he was unable to carry it further and he was unable to 33920 ascertain the actual figures. * The offences for which these men were tried were rape, robbery, looting, outrages, and murder.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. LOGAN
Counsel for Kido

Reference was made to exhibit 3500-A in which he had spoken about pro-Anglo-American groups in Japan. Asked if he included in that group court officials around the throne, he replied he didn't think court circles were necessarily pro-British or pro-American, but there may have been such people among them. Asked whom he included in the pro-Anglo-American 33921 groups, he stated that he did not like to say specifically that such and such a person was pro-American or pro-British, but he thought it inevitable that those with close ties with the two countries should be imbued with such ideologies. Asked if he was acquainted with the views of the Lord Keeper, KIDO, at the time, he stated that he had never talked directly with KIDO on such problems and didn't know much about them.

* Exhibit 3501, the affidavit of TAKAHASHI, Michitoshi, stated that he was in Berlin as Secretary of Protocol for the Ambassador from September, immediately before OSHIMA took his post as ambassador, until January 1939. During this time all conversations with high German officials were arranged beforehand by the witness. As far as he could remember, there was never any case about January 1939, that Himmler requested an interview with OSHIMA, nor was any request made by OSHIMA to see Himmler.

* Exhibit 3502, the affidavit of SUGIURA, Hiroshi, stated that he was Secretary of Protocol of the Embassy in Berlin during January and August 1939 as successor to the previous witness, TAKAHASHI. During this period, every contact of OSHIMA with outside persons, including high German officials, was arranged through the affiant. As far as he remembered, Himmler never asked through the affiant for an interview with OSHIMA, and no request was made by OSHIMA to see Himmler.

33927

Exhibit 3503, the interrogation of Ambassador Ott, the direct examination only being read by the defense, * stated that Ott identified exhibit 508 as a telegram dated 27 October 1939 addressed from Woermann to himself as the German Ambassador in Tokyo. According to this telegram, the Reich Foreign Minister requested to support in all respects Ambassador OSHIMA, who after his return would work further for Japanese-German friendship.

33928

Asked if during OSHIMA's stay in Japan after his return from December 1939 until January 1941, Ott or the * German Embassy rendered any support to OSHIMA in the sense of the telegram, Ott replied none whatever. During this period OSHIMA never asked him or the Embassy for any support in the sense of the telegram. Told that according to the telegram Ribbentrop requested Ott to transmit in code and without changes telegrams delivered there by OSHIMA to Ribbentrop personally and take care of the forwarding of letters addressed to Ribbentrop unopened so far as they were sealed, by sure and speedy route, Ott was asked if OSHIMA, during the above period, handed to himself or the Embassy any telegrams or letters addressed to Ribbentrop, he replied none at all.

* When shown exhibit 511, Ott agreed it was a telegram dated 23 February 1940 addressed from Stahmer and Ott to the State Secretary. To Ott was quoted the telegram which stated that after his arrival he found such Japanese already known to him as OSHIMA, SHIRATORI, TERAUCHI, ISHII, etc., in an unchanged friendly attitude and ready for every support.

Page Asked why in the telegram which was signed jointly by Stahmer and Ott the singular personal pronoun was used, Ott stated that it was drafted exclusively by Stahmer and had the name Ott attached only according to official regulations to secure transmission of the cipher telegram by Japanese postal authorities.

 Asked if OSHIMA, after this visit of Stahmer to Japan, actively worked for closer relations with Germany under Stahmer's influence, he stated that there was no active work by OSHIMA as a result of Stahmer's influence.

* When shown exhibit 516, Ott acknowledged it as a telegram dated June 12, 1940, addressed from himself to the German Government. To Ott was quoted part of exhibit 516, which stated that each German and Italian move which revealed concern over the American attitude in the near future would only be a cue to the government and press which was close to it to make new courtship of America. The government would further try, as in the case of the Asama Maru, to impute to them the intention of using Japan as a tool, an argument which would not be ineffective with the known suspicion of the Japanese. The Embassy was still endeavoring to stir up Japanese ill-feeling against America by influencing the press and leading political personalities in a way deemed proper. Ott himself had expressed the thought to leading political personalities as KONOYE, SUETSUGU and KUHARA, that American interests and activity in the Pacific made in the long run a conflict between Japan and America inevitable.

In confidential cooperation with the Embassy, Ambassadors OSHIMA and SHIRATORI and circles close to them, * were operating in the same direction. With reference to this telegram, Ott was told that counsel for the accused SHIRATORI had previously handed him exhibit 516, dated 12 June 1940, from Ott to the German Government, wherein he spoke of Japanese-American relations. Ott was asked at that time by SHIRATORI's counsel to explain in detail what he meant by references in the telegram to historical background, Japanese psychology, and existing conditions at the time the communication was sent. Ott had explained to SHIRATORI's counsel that the background of the report was that the collapse of France was obviously imminent, and the British situation precarious. The only effective relief which might keep up English resistance and work against early settlement of the war could come from the U. S., and was asked from them very urgently. Therefore Germany endeavored to hamper such relief * and considered as a useful way continued tension in the Pacific which might prevent the U. S. from removing their attention and fighting forces from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

It was complicated to advance such a policy because the Japanese attitude was much divided. In this situation, Ott got instructions to back an Italian protest against a Japanese measure in favor of the U. S. and contrary to Italian interests. When Ott presented his objections, he had to avoid Ribbentrop's permanent distrust that Ott was inclined to block his aims. Therefore, Ott stressed in paragraphs 3 and 4 in the report that he was working in his own way and pointed to the cooperation of SHIRATORI and other Japanese known to Ribbentrop to impress him and succeed in the objections.

When asked by SHIRATORI's counsel in the previous interrogation if he meant in the 4th paragraph of the document that the Embassy, OSHIMA and SHIRATORI worked in a common program based upon mutual understanding and common agreement, * he replied, no, he didn't mean that, because there was no such agreement. SHIRATORI, as far as he knew, warned by private talks and sometimes by the press, against courting the U. S. after they enforced hard economic measures upon Japan. This was not a common plan taken by SHIRATORI, OSHIMA, and Ott, and Ott had only private talks with them separately, and OSHIMA kept himself much apart from political activities while in Japan.

Ott was never in the company of OSHIMA and SHIRATORI at the same time to carry out this political cooperation. * When he stated that there was close cooperation, he used the expression to give weight to the message, and to carry through his objections he used the names of KONOYE, and SUETSUGU for the same reason.

33935

After these questions and answers from Ott's previous interrogation by SHIRATORI's counsel were read to him, he was asked if he could make for OSHIMA the same statements he made then for SHIRATORI with reference to exhibit 516, and he stated he could do so. * Asked if OSHIMA did anything to stir up ill-feeling against America, he replied he did nothing but share the suspicions of the Japanese press concerning the sincerity of the Anglo-Saxon powers.

33936

Asked what he meant concretely by "OSHIMA, SHIRATORI, and circles closely connected with them", he meant groups of politically interested individuals with whom they were associated.

* When shown exhibit 560, he recognized it as his telegram dated 13 December 1940 to the German Government.

Page Ott was quoted the telegram, which stated that he knew that the Foreign Minister had repeatedly offered the Ambassadorial post in Germany to OSHIMA, who declined it to be able to continue his politically active work for the Tri-Partite Pact in Japan. When asked if OSHIMA, from December 1939 until 27 September 1940, while he was in Japan, worked actively for promoting the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact. Ott stated OSHIMA didn't have any part in the preliminary negotiations or the conclusion of the Pact, and he was sure OSHIMA was not consulted.

33937 During or prior to the negotiations for the Pact in September 1940, neither he nor Stahmer asked OSHIMA for advice or opinion. * Asked if OSHIMA, from the conclusion of the Tripartite Pact until his departure for Germany, worked politically for the Pact, Ott replied that the only thing he could recall was an interview with the press on the subject.

33938 * From exhibit 3503-A, the cross-interrogatory of Ott, was read by the prosecution certain telegrams which were introduced in his cross-interrogatory and made a part of his interrogatories. The telegram of 31 December 1939, from Ott to Berlin, stated that the Japanese Government is functioning under the heaviest foreign and domestic political pressures. The three big problems of her foreign policy were, the settlement of the China question, understanding with America, and adjustment with Russia, and all were yet to be solved. Announcement of the opening of the Yangtze up to Nanking did not bring about the change in the American attitude which had been sought. The U. S. Ambassador brought forward further demands with the ostensible objectives of the independence and free trade of China. He was said to have demanded especially, gradual withdrawal of all troops except eight garrisons to be left in N. China, guarantee for the open door and treaty rights, accompanied by the dissolution of the monopolistic Japanese development company.

33940 The U. S. attitude gave rise to disillusionment after the initial high expectations. To avert U. S. pressure, some circles advocated that the China Incident should be solved by making concessions to Chiang Kai-shek, and if possible negotiate with him by abandoning the KONOYE declaration, and utilize Wang Ching-wei as a mere mediator. The Army, particularly the China Army, was until recently still determined to establish a new central government * under Wang Ching-wei, although he demanded a great amount of independence and had serious personnel difficulties.

Negotiations with Russia were restricted on details without touching the fundamental question of adjustment, in particular the Russian attitude toward China. Minor counter claims of Russia were causing difficulties.

As foreign political pressure and continued internal differences continued to exist, neither a coalition cabinet nor the affiliation with any of the European power groups was to be expected for the time being. According to the views of Ambassadors OSHIMA and SHIRATORI, who were working hard to overthrow the present cabinet, two or three more transit cabinets would be needed to bring about a more drastic change of course.

33942

* The telegram dated 23 January 1940 from Ott stated he was endeavoring as the highest objective of his further action to achieve the release of the arrested persons. He had already presented these views unofficially to the Foreign Minister, but step by step tactics alone were the only ones of prospective success. This also corresponded to the urgent advice of Ambassadors OSHIMA and SHIRATORI.

33943

* The telegram dated 26 January 1940, from Ott to Ribbentrop, stated that he heard confidentially that the Japanese Foreign Office instructed Ambassador KURUSU to ask the German Foreign Office to put off the planned visit of the Duke of Coburg on the ground that time was not sufficient to prepare for such a visit, and all influential political persons were being occupied in the Diet. As no special missions from any foreign countries had been considered for the occasion of the national foundation anniversary, the Foreign Office requested the visit of the Duke as a friendship mission. Ott expressed to a confident his personal anxiety that the Japanese conduct could cause strong annoyance in Berlin. He saw the deeper reason for this stronger attitude in the petty attitude of the government that exclusive representation of Germany by a special mission might damage Japan's neutral status in the eyes of third powers. Also, the court circle was strongly agitated by the anti-British wave caused by the Asama Maru incident, and feared intensification of pro-German feeling by the visit of the Duke at this time. The fact that the government considered

* shortly before the Asama case to prepare a pompous reception for the Duke justified this assumption also.

Page Ambassador OSHIMA also pointed to the anti-British movement as the main reason for the sudden retreat of the government from the promise apparently given Berlin. OSHIMA saw, however, in this postponement possible advantage for the German-Japanese policy, as the anti-British movement would be enabled to develop to the full extent if not burdened with the suspicion of its being under German influence. According to information just received, the movement was spreading to broad party circles and could result in bitter fights in the Diet in February and March, probably bringing about collapse of the government. OSHIMA urged the journey be postponed to April or May, but reserved decision as to the final time-table.

33959 * Exhibit 3504, the affidavit of TANAKA, Shinichi, stated that the affiant was from October 1940 until 7 December 1942, Director of the First Division of the General Staff, in charge of operational matters. The affiant had testified previously that in the peace time operational plan of 1941, no concrete plans for attacking Hong Kong, Singapore, etc., were included. Besides this peace time plan, the Army made between January and May 1941 no concrete plans for occupying Singapore, Hong Kong, or the Philippines, and no study worth mentioning was even made.

33960 The General Staff received neither from Germany nor OSHIMA any suggestions or influences in drafting and deciding operational plans, or any plan including attacks on British Malay, Singapore, Hong Kong, the Philippines, NEI and the Southern Regions, nor was there any case that * the General Staff concerning these plans ever asked through OSHIMA, directly or indirectly, any opinions or assistance from Germany. OSHIMA never recommended to the General Staff preparations, or the carrying out of these operational plans.

33961 * Exhibit 3505, the affidavit of KOMATSU, Mitsuhiro, stated that he was appointed in the winter of 1940 Assistant Military Attache and concurrently the Assisting Member of the Tripartite Mixed Commission in Berlin. He arrived in Berlin with Ambassador OSHIMA in February 1941, and was appointed Military Attache and concurrently member of the above commission at the beginning of 1943, succeeding General BANZAI, remaining in that post until the war's end. These commissions were never convened until after the outbreak of the Pacific War, and even after its outbreak met only two or three times, and were never convened after the beginning of 1943. * BANZAI told the affiant that during the meetings there were only propagandistic reports by the Germans.

Shortly after the Pacific War's outbreak, the military agreement between the three countries was concluded in January 1942. It was purely a military agreement, and according to BANZAI, OSHIMA was not at all connected with it.

OSHIMA consulted the military and naval attaches and other high embassy officials whenever he received instructions from Tokyo or talked with German leaders. He often said that because very little information was received from Japan, it was regrettable he did not know the government policy. OSHIMA thought that it was most important to find out what plan Germany had for the future of the European war, and especially whether and when she was going to carry out landing operations against England and what preparations she was making.

OSHIMA told the affiant that Germany desired Japan to attack Singapore in the spring of 1941, but learned that OSHIMA was only expressing his personal opinion on the basis of military common sense and did not broach the question on his own initiative. The Singapore question was brought out only before the outbreak of the German-Russian war, and therefore Germany changed her mind, asking Japan to attack the Soviet, according to OSHIMA.

The affiant was allowed to see important telegrams OSHIMA sent to Tokyo, but never read a telegram by which OSHIMA recommended such attacks as his own opinion. Those in Berlin, including OSHIMA, received almost no communications concerning the Japanese-American negotiations, and could not understand the situation in Japan well. * OSHIMA's opinion, even when he received instructions to negotiate for the Non-Separate Peace Treaty immediately after the war's outbreak, was that war would not be opened between Japan and the U. S. The affiant was much surprised on hearing of the Pearl Harbor attack, as were OSHIMA and all others at the Embassy.

* Exhibit 3506, the affidavit of TATSUMI, Eiichi, stated that he was Military Attache to Britain from 1936 to 1938 and from 1939 to 1942. He was repatriated in September 1942. 33968 3507 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that the witness was appointed in September 1940 * Naval Attache to the Embassy in Germany, and remained in Berlin until October 1943.

About February or March 1943, Vice Admiral NOMURA and the witness learned from Ambassador OSHIMA of an offer of Hitler to transfer two submarines to Japan for study by the Japanese Navy. OSHIMA told them that no conditions were attached. Thereafter, telegraphic instruction was received by NOMURA from central naval authorities that the navy was pleased to accept the offer. Upon request, OSHIMA saw Foreign Minister Ribbentrop convey this acceptance, and they understood no special conditions were attached. The practical procedure of transfer was completed between the two nations, and during these negotiations also no strings were attached to the matter.

33969 * The witness never heard from OSHIMA, nor from the Germans, or anyone else, about attacking or annihilating crews of torpedoed merchant ships, nor did he hear from OSHIMA or anyone that Germany adopted such policies.

On additional oral direct examination, the witness was asked if, about the end of November 1941 or the beginning of December, OSHIMA was in Berlin or some other place. He replied that toward the end of November OSHIMA left Berlin for Vienna to attend a music festival.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. TAVENNER.

33970 * The witness stated that at the time of the transaction relating to delivery of the two German submarines, he, as naval attache, was a member of the joint military commission in Berlin established under the Tripartite Pact.
He and Admiral NOMURA, also a member of the commission, consulted with the German Navy in regard to the details for the transfer of the two submarines. Problems relating to the transfer and other military matters were not settled by the military commission.

Asked if he and NOMURA who were on the commission, conferred regarding the matter, he replied that they did consult, but NOMURA consulted in his capacity as the highest naval representative in Berlin and the witness in his capacity as naval attache.

* He and NOMURA did not consult on military matters as a commission. Asked if he meant to say that the military commission, established to discuss military matters, did not meet and discuss them, he replied that that might have been the purpose of the commission, but actually no such discussions were held, and he had no recollection of ever having discussed military matters.

* He did not know the reason why the military commission did not discuss them. It was not true that the commission failed to function because an informal commission composed of Ribbentrop and OSHIMA took over the committee's functions and military matters were settled on a higher level.

To the witness was quoted a purported statement he made in his interrogation, that another reason that the joint military committee did not function effectively was that an unofficial commission of Ribbentrop and OSHIMA was established, and they conferred in respect to military measures and with these conferences proceeding on the level of the German Foreign Office it was difficult for the subordinate commission to carry out its functions.

* Asked if he did not make that statement, he replied that he thought he said something to that effect. Asked if in March 1934 Ribbentrop requested OSHIMA to communicate to his government the German desire that submarine warfare in the Indian Ocean be intensified, he replied he had not heard that he had demanded that of the government, but did hear that he had expressed such desires to the government.

33974

33975

* The affidavit stated that the accused was born in 1886, was graduated from the Military Academy; in 1921 was appointed Assistant Military Attache in Berlin, and after his return home in 1925 held various military posts in which he was most concerned with educational matters. From Aug. 1931 until the spring of 1934, he was Chief of the Third Section of the General Staff in charge of internal defense matters. He was then appointed Military Attache in Berlin and after being appointed Ambassador to Germany, resigned his commission as a Lieutenant General. While in the Army * he never belonged to any clique nor did he know if there was such a thing in existence.

33976

In Oct. 1921 he went for the first time to Germany as Assistant Military Attache, remaining there until Feb. 1923, when he was appointed Attache in Vienna. Because Germany was in the midst of depression and confusion after her defeat, he got an unfavorable impression politically, economically and militarily of the country. When he returned to Berlin in May 1934 as Military Attache one and one-half years after Hitler came to power, he found everything changed and considerably improved, and felt there were things in the new Germany worthy of serious consideration. As Attache it was his duty to gather information and report to the General Staff in Tokyo concerning military matters. In this duty he naturally came into contact with leading members of the German Army and air force, with the exception of Ribbentrop, with whom he became acquainted through the preliminary contact for the anti-Comintern Pact. His contact was generally with military leaders. During his two tours as Ambassador, he found that the bulk of his time and energy had to be devoted to matters such as culture, trade, protection of Japanese nationals, etc., and diplomatic contact with the German Government was only a small fraction of the business of the Embassy. His direct approach to the Reich was through Ribbentrop. Ribbentrop was often absent from Berlin and OSHIMA met him no more than five or six times a year. He met Hitler usually upon his request and this was possibly two or three times a year. Other than Hitler and Ribbentrop, he met other Nazi leaders only on ceremonial and social occasions and had no official connections with them.

* The German Foreign Office disliked foreign diplomats making direct contacts with leaders other than foreign ministers or with branches of the government other than the foreign ministry. Ribbentrop having made his wishes in the matter quite clear to OSHIMA, he was careful not to go over his head.

The Anti-Comintern Pact was in existence during his first ambassadorship, and the Tri-Partite Pact was already in effect prior to his second sojourn in Berlin. As Ambassador, he felt duty bound to concentrate his efforts on the maintenance and improvement of Japanese-German relations in the spirit of these agreements and always acted in line with the home government's policy. For this purpose he tried to maintain as close a relationship as possible with Hitler, Ribbentrop, and other German leaders to make himself an effective channel for smooth exchange of views. He never approved Nazi ideology or policy as a whole, and particularly had no sympathy with the Nazi race theory or their * anti-Jewish and anti-Christian policy. He disapproved of their administration in occupied territories during the war but diplomatic discretion prevented him from expressing his views openly although he thought it was sufficiently understood by the Japanese and Germans with whom he dealt.

The Japanese-German cultural agreement was concluded in 1938. OSHIMA thought the exchange of culture between the two nations would benefit both, although he did not agree with any features of the Nazi party's cultural policy. He supported the enterprises of the Cultural Society and a considerable part of his time was occupied with these enterprises.

* Regarding the parts of his interrogations which had been quoted by the prosecution, since he had practically no knowledge of English, it was inevitable that some misunderstandings or misinterpretations occurred and he found this out later. The prosecution tendered many German documents concerning conversations with Hitler, Ribbentrop and others. The conversations were in German, without an interpreter, and at those with Hitler, Ribbentrop was always present. Stahmer or his successor was sometimes present at the interviews with Ribbentrop at which there was no recorder present. The records of the conversations must have been made afterward from memory and could not always be accurate.

33981

* Regarding the documents concerning his conversations with Ribbentrop, they were generally compiled in a vein favorable for him. Sometimes it was even stated that OSHIMA agreed with Ribbentrop on certain matters while actually they were only talked about and he had expressed no opinion. He thought this was because Ribbentrop had many enemies in the German Government and military circles and in distributing the documents to them he had to resort to internal political maneuvering to show the success of his pro-Japanese policy. The accused knew well that it was only Hitler and Ribbentrop who decided German foreign policy and it was no use to talk to their subordinates. He always talked over important matters either directly with them or through the liaison man, Stahmer, or his successor, when Ribbentrop was absent. Very seldom did he meet other foreign

33982 In the records prepared by Weizsaecker, Erdmannsdorf, etc. of his conversations * with them, there were many matters of which he had no recollection. They evidently drafted the documents to make it appear as if they had important talks with him and then presented them to Ribbentrop.

33983 He first made the acquaintance of OTT in Apr. 1934 prior to going to Germany as Military Attache, when OTT arrived in Tokyo as the Attache of the German Embassy. He had personal contact with OTT during his stay in Tokyo between Dec. 1939 and Jan. 1941 when OTT left Japan for his second tour of duty as Ambassador. They sometimes had informal chats but OTT never considered them seriously as he was completely retired from public life at the time, did not know the government's view, and had no inside information to give. He was much surprised that his name was often cited in Ambassador OTT's telegrams. * From Aug. 1931 until Mar. 1934 OSHIMA was Chief of the Third Section. Since he was in charge of purely internal defense matters, he had no connection with the Manchurian Incident or with the Manchukuo problem, and this situation continued after he became the Attache in Berlin in Mar. 1934. After being appointed Attache, he arrived in Berlin in May 1934. He heard he was chosen because he spoke German well and had some knowledge of Germany as result of his previous stay there.

33984 At that time the C/S was Prince KAN-IN and the Deputy Chief was General UEDA. Prior to his departure, OSHIMA received oral instructions from UEDA concerning his duty in Germany. He was ordered to watch and investigate * the stability of the Nazi regime, the future of the German army, relations between her and Russia, and was further instructed to collect information and report on the Soviet.

According to the Japanese system, the Military Attache belonged directly under the C/S and was not subordinate to the Ambassador.

33985 Exhibit 3509, a certificate showing military attaches and assistant attaches to Embassies and Legations were under the command of the C/S in compliance with military orders, was received in evidence. The affidavit continued and it was stated that regarding OSHIMA's contacts with Ribbentrop * prior to the negotiations for the Anti-Comintern Pact concluded in 1936, the prosecution had offered parts of his interrogation (Exhibits 477 and 478). Regarding this, the contacts he had with RIBBENTROP and Hack as narrated there, were for the sole purpose of collecting information, one of the attache's main duties. They were nothing in the nature of negotiations.

When he met Ribbentrop in 1935, he had the title of Ambassador unattached. Hack was a salesbroker of arms for foreign countries.

In Exhibit 478 it was made to appear that in answer to the question: Were the Japanese military and naval attaches authorized by virtue of their position to enter into negotiations with the military of another nation, looking toward a pact or treaty or an international agreement between the two nations, he had stated, yes, if it was a strictly military matter, they might discuss those matters without going through the Ambassador.

* To clarify his answer in the above interrogation, the Japanese military or naval attache was authorized to negotiate for and conclude purely military agreements. In this case no participation of the Ambassador was tolerated. As to other matters, the attache could only send information to the General Staff but was not authorized to negotiate.

In Exhibit 478 it was also made to appear that he had stated it was quite true that the army had enough power very probably to sell the pact to the Japanese Government and that he would say no treaty could possibly have been made if the army had not wished it. Regarding this, OSHIMA had no recollection of stating such things. He had only said as to the reason RIBBENTROP approached him was that he might have thought that the Japanese Army was mostly interested in such a matter and this statement must have been misunderstood.

After he reported RIBBENTROP's desire to the General Staff, Lt. Col. WAKAMATSU was despatched to find out the views of the German Government and Army. * He arrived in Berlin at the end of November 1935 and OSHIMA took him to RIBBENTROP and Minister of Defense General Blomberg. In the interview RIBBENTROP proposed an Anti-Comintern Pact on the ground that the 7th Congress of the Communist International in Moscow of that year brought out a resolution to the effect that Japan and Germany were its primary enemies and therefore the two countries had common interests to defend themselves. OSHIMA expressed no opinion to this proposal. WAKAMATSU left Berlin with this information and arrived in Tokyo at the end of Jan. 1936. At that time Ambassador MUSHAKOJI was on leave in Tokyo. He returned to Berlin at the end of Apr. 1936 after the main points of the matter had been decided in Tokyo. Thereafter, negotiations were conducted by MUSHAKOJI with RIBBENTROP in accordance with government instructions and the Anti-Comintern Pact and Secret Agreement with Germany were concluded.

33988

Concerning the Japanese Government's purpose in concluding the Pact and Secret Agreement, OSHIMA's understanding was * that inasmuch as Japan was internationally isolated after the Manchurian Incident, it was desirable to remove that uneasy feeling by finding an ally or allies. Also, since the destructive activities of the Comintern were rampant in U.S. and Asia, it was felt advisable that as many nations as possible should join hands and take counter-measures, especially in view of the resolution of the 7th Comintern Congress of 1935. In addition, Japan was keenly feeling pressure from the Soviets. Russia had developed her industries under the 5-Year Plan and increased her armament to a great extent and considerably reinforced her army in the Far East. Therefore, Japan wanted to come to a political agreement with Germany which was similarly situated vis-a-vis the Soviet to make her position more secure. With this purpose of the Pact, OSHIMA was in complete agreement.

33989

* The prosecution had alleged that the Anti-Comintern Pact and Secret Agreement were forerunners of the Tripartite Pact and were aggressive agreements directed against democratic countries and particularly used in the aggression against China. He never heard that the Japanese Government and Army ever had such thoughts nor did he himself. He believed the Anti-Comintern Pact was ideological to check the spread of communism and at the Secret Agreement was of a very peaceful nature, only stipulating that Japan or Germany would not carry out any measures which would relieve the position of the Soviet if one of the two were attacked unprovokedly. The text clearly showed this, and OSHIMA also did not dream of the outbreak of the China Incident at the time the Agreements were concluded.

* The outbreak of the China Incident in July 1937 was a complete surprise to him. He had been in Berlin as attache since the spring of 1934 and was completely out of touch with the China problem. He learned by telegraph from the General Staff after the outbreak of the non-aggravation and non-extension policy and believed it would be settled locally soon. It gradually became clear that it would not be settled quickly and he was much concerned at Japan's position being endangered because of Soviet armament in the Far East.

At the end of Dec. 1937, he received an instruction from the General Staff to request the German Army that peace be offered to Chiang Kai-shek through General Falkenhausen, the military advisor to Germany. OSHIMA approached the German Army at once and General Keitel agreed and initiated action to that end. This peace attempt did not materialize and had to be abandoned when the efforts of mediation by Ambassador Trautmann were terminated.

* Exhibit 489, Himmler's memorandum, said that Himmler visited OSHIMA on 31 Jan. 1939 and talked with him concerning

Page counter-intelligence activities against the Soviet, but Himmler never visited him then and he could not remember even seeing him then. During his 10 years in Germany he had no special relations with Himmler. He received visits from him only twice: in the winter of 1936 when an official of the Japanese Home Office came to Germany to study measures for controlling communism and OSHIMA invited Himmler to a dinner party to solicit his assistance on behalf of the Japanese official; the other occasion was in Mar. 1941 when OSHIMA went to Germany as Ambassador for the second time and Himmler paid him a courtesy call. About June 1937 while OSHIMA was attache, his office in accordance with the C/S's instructions * began to study the use of White Russians in Berlin to collect information about the Soviet and for propaganda and counter-intelligence purposes in case of war between Japan and Russia. The task was entrusted to Lt. Col. USUI and later to Col. MANAKI of OSHIMA's staff. This was a fairly special service and their office and expenditure account were separated from OSHIMA's, and in the General Staff Office in Tokyo, the section in charge of this service was different from the one handling general matters concerning attaches. OSHIMA's function was to supervise rather than direct, although since he received reports, final inspection for the service rested with him. Instructions of the C/S concerning counter-intelligence were that this matter was only to be studied in consideration of war and not to be executed in peace time.

There was an understanding between the German and Japanese Armies to collaborate in this. On the German side it was exclusively handled by the counter-intelligence section * and was kept strictly secret, even within the Defense Ministry.

33993

Himmler was not concerned with counter-intelligence and he and the Chief of the Counter-Intelligence Section were on bad terms. Therefore, neither OSHIMA nor other Japanese officers ever talked with Himmler or his subordinates about this matter, and OSHIMA never concerned himself with counter-intelligence after becoming Ambassador. He received reports from USUI that he had bought real estate in a Berlin suburb and kept White Russians there who were engaged in small scale printing of anti-Soviet pamphlets. OSHIMA knew nothing more than that and never visited the place. He never knew nor heard of the sending of anti-Russian pamphlets into Soviet territory by balloons from Poland. To carry this out it would have been necessary to secure Poland's collaboration, but he never heard that such talks were conducted with her. He never heard of the buying of motor-boats to send pamphlets into Crimea from Roumania across the Black Sea. To do this Roumanian collaboration would have been necessary and he didn't think relations with her were so cordial as to permit such talks. As to the story of sending 10 Russians with bombs into the Soviet to assassinate Stalin, the contention was fantastic and ridiculous.

*As to the Japanese army officer stationed in Afghanistan, OSHIMA had no connection with his affair. In this memorandum it was stated he was expelled because he was suspected of wanting to overthrow the Afghan Government but according to what OSHIMA heard he was requested by the Afghan Army to return to Japan as a result of his anti-Russian remarks. The greater part of the memorandum contained matters he did not know about and in view of the fact that the memorandum nevertheless stated OSHIMA talked about them he denied the authenticity of the document and even thought that Himmler or his subordinates concocted the document utilizing his name for some internal purpose.

In 1938 and 1939 lengthy negotiations took place between Japan, Germany and Italy for strengthening the anti-Comintern Pact in which OSHIMA participated as ambassador. The negotiations ended in complete failure and no result was obtained.

*In July 1938 while he was Military Attache Ribbentrop showed him what is purported to be a brief draft of a treaty of mutual consultation and assistance between Japan, Germany and Italy and asked him to find out how such an idea might strike the Japanese Army. OSHIMA dispatched Major General KASAHARA at the end of July 1938 to Japan for a first hand report. After KASAHARA reported to the General Staff and War Ministry things developed with unexpected rapidity. The army brought it to the attention of the Foreign Minister UGAKI, who presented it to the Five Ministers' Conference at the end of August.

At the conference it was agreed that subject to verbal alterations general approval could be given the German proposal provided the Soviet was considered as primary and other countries the secondary objectives, it being understood that the basic idea was amplification of the anti-Comintern Pact. * It was agreed the matter should be transferred to formal diplomatic channels but there would be no harm in communicating to the Germans in the meantime through the army channel the above mentioned decision. This was what OSHIMA learned from telegrams sent him from army authorities and from KASAHARA's report after he returned to Berlin at the end of September. OSHIMA was surprised at the unexpected turn the matter had taken but conveyed this promptly to Ribbentrop.

He was appointed ambassador in October 1938 and did not know what happened in Tokyo prior to his appointment. In September he unexpectedly received a telegram from the General Staff asking whether he had any objection to the appointment and he firmly declined because he would have to resign from active military service and besides had no diplomatic experience.

* After repeated urgings from the General Staff he finally gave in because as a soldier he could not refuse to comply with the army's wish. The Foreign Minister at the time was Premier KONOYE who held the post concurrently and shortly thereafter ARITA was appointed Foreign Minister. Upon his appointment OSHIMA was placed on the reserve list and practically all his army connections were cut off. He considered it his primary task to bring the proposed treaty between Japan, Germany and Italy to fruition.

34001

At the beginning of November after becoming ambassador Ribbentrop formally presented a German draft of the treaty asking OSHIMA to transmit it to his government and he sent it by telegram to ARITA. ARITA replied that it was a capital idea and would facilitate the settlement of the China Incident, be effective in strengthening defense against the Soviet and improving * general diplomatic position. ARITA's telegram further stated that the government was contemplating a concrete counter proposal which would be cabled as soon decided upon. From this telegram and from the Five Ministers' Conference at the end of August OSHIMA gained the impression that his government was in agreement in principle to the German proposal. Shortly thereafter however a telegram was received which stated there seemed to be a misunderstanding as to the objective of the proposed treaty. OSHIMA cabled back for an explanation but received no clear answer. The Japanese announced counter proposal did not arrive despite his repeated requests and he could not proceed with the negotiations until the arrival of the ITO mission at the end of February 1939.

After HIRANUMA replaced the first Konoye Cabinet at the beginning of 1939 ARITA sent a telegram announcing the dispatch of a mission headed by ITO, a former * minister to Poland, as a special envoy to convey and explain the government's instructions. The mission arrived in Berlin at the end of February and as the instruction was addressed to both the ambassadors in Germany and Italy SHIRATORI came to Berlin and they met the ITO mission together. The Japanese counter proposal corresponded in its main part to the draft treaty of mutual consultation and assistance between Japan, Germany and Italy, the signing protocol and the secret accessory protocol. (Exh. 2619) As far as the treaty to be published was concerned no limitation or condition was placed on the duty of mutual assistance. However, two secret understandings were to be annexed and it was to these they were instructed to try to obtain the concurrence of the German and Italian Governments. These secret understandings were that Japan would not render military assistance if Germany and Italy were attacked by countries other than the Soviet unless these * countries turned Communistic and the explanation would be given to third parties that the treaty was a strengthening of the anti-Comintern Pact. According to this instruction, secret understanding No. 1 was going to limit the duty of military assistance to Japan to cases where the Soviet was involved. OSHIMA thought this would contradict what he had already committed to the Germans in accordance with the telegrams received from Tokyo when he was Attache. To present this proposal would not only cause Germany to doubt Japan's sincerity but OSHIMA was also sure that they would not accept it. He therefore cabled his view to Tokyo that if Japan wished the successful conclusion of the treaty it would be necessary to reconsider Secret Understanding No. 1. According to Japanese law an official can present his view to his superior concerning the business under his charge. Exhibit 3510 an excerpt from the Foreign Ministry Year Book being an Imperial Ordinance issued 30 July 1892 in support of OSHIMA's contention was received in evidence. * The affidavit continued and stated that when OSHIMA presented his observations he was only following this principle. In the detailed explanation attached to the instructions was the remark that Japan was compelled to make concessions to the extent of the draft treaty because Germany and Italy had been misled concerning Japan's position in the course of the negotiations. OSHIMA thought this a grave matter for if he had misled Germany he had to take responsibility and therefore he cabled ARITA asking to clarify this point. ARITA replied at the end of March that no one in particular was responsible.

OSHIMA did not tender his resignation at that time nor indicate any wish to resign nor tender his resignation during the whole course of the negotiations.

*Exhibit 501, an excerpt from Ciano's diary and Exhibit 502, a telegram of Ribbentrop stated that OSHIMA refused to carry out the ITO mission's instructions and threatened the government by resignation, but this clearly was not the case. As to 502, it was quite untrue the original draft of the proposed treaty had been drafted by direct negotiations between Ribbentrop, Ciano and himself. He never talked with Ciano concerning it and the draft was drawn up by the Germans without his participation. In answer to OSHIMA's observations as to the instructions brought by ITO, a new instruction revising the original text of the secret understandings was received at the end of March which he immediately conveyed to Ribbentrop. That new instruction provided that Secret Understanding No. 1 was revised and made to read that although Germany accepted the duty of military assistance if Germany and Italy were attacked by countries other than the Soviet she would not be able to carry it out effectively * for the time being. As to Secret Understanding No. 2 Japan wanted the reservation that if inquiries were made by third parties Japan would explain that as far as she was concerned she had nothing in view but the destructive activities of the Comintern in concluding the treaty. Ribbentrop stated it was his interpretation that by the proposal Japan accepted in principle participation in war if Germany and Italy were attacked by countries other than the Soviet and asked OSHIMA if this interpretation was correct. He replied that since Japan accepted the duty of military assistance he thought she accepted in principle the duty of war participation although the scope and mode of it would differ from time to time. Ribbentrop said he could not consent to Japan's making a different and independent explanation to third countries concerning the treaty's purpose. OSHIMA tried hard to explain Japan's situation. After consultation with Hitler, Ribbentrop stated that although he would accept the proposal so far as the treaty, the signing protocol and the secret accessory protocol were concerned, * he desired that Japan withdraw the proposal for secret understandings. He suggested that as Germany did not intend to ask Japan to go beyond her capacity details of the obligations should be referred to conferences envisaged in the secret accessory protocol. In short he asked reconsideration on the part of Japan and OSHIMA cabled Tokyo in that sense.

*Tokyo's instructions thereafter never denied the duty of war participation. Only they gave a very broad interpretation to the term by including measures which could not be interpreted normally as war participation and instructed OSHIMA to secure Germany's consent to that interpretation. The instructions were ambiguous and difficult to understand and OSHIMA was sometimes hard put as to how to make them clear. He found out later that the ambiguity was due to the fact that the instructions were drafted as a result of oral compromise while the difference of opinions remained unreconciled. In spite of these difficulties he tried to explain the Japanese point of view to Ribbentrop who finally recognized the need for Japan to make the two reservations and proposed that proper formulation for them should be studied from a legal point of view. At his request OSHIMA sent, at the beginning of May,

34009

Councillor USAMI to Chief of the Treaty Bureau Gaus * for consultation concerning the reservations and a tentative plan drawn up by Gaus was cabled to Tokyo. (Exh. 26917) About the time OSHIMA cabled the Gaus plan Premier HIRANUMA sent a personal message to Hitler and Mussolini through the German and Italian Ambassadors in Tokyo, in which he stated that Japan was resolved to stand at the side of Germany and Italy and render military assistance within her capacity even if the two were attacked by countries other than the Soviet but under the circumstances she was compelled to make certain reservations. He requested Germany to make concessions as to the secret understandings and trust Japan's sincerity. The purport of the message was strongly in support of the negotiations which OSHIMA was pursuing. The message was wired him by ARITA simultaneously with its delivery to Ambassador Ott in Tokyo and he had it delivered at once to the Foreign Office. * When the message arrived, Ribbentrop was staying with Hitler in South Germany and telephoned OSHIMA, saying that Hitler upon reading the message had said that although he was not asking much from Japan he could not agree because of some remaining ambiguities. Exhibit 2230, telegram from Ribbentrop to Ott stated that at the end of May OSHIMA again refused to carry out instructions. OSHIMA told Ribbentrop at that time that he cabled Tokyo his observations to an instruction concerning the Gaus plan. Ribbentrop must have misunderstood that and wired Ott in that sense.

34010

It was untrue that OSHIMA received, as stated in Exhibit 2230, a telegram from War Minister ITAGAKI in which ITAGAKI requested him to hold off until later against ARITA in order not to disturb the discussions in Tokyo and that the army was firmly resolved to fight the matter out even at the risk of a cabinet overthrow. Concerning this OSHIMA recalled that Military Attache KAWABE in Berlin wired central army authorities criticizing the government's equivocal attitude. ITAGAKI replied to him that as the atmosphere of the Five Ministers' Conference was inclining to favor the conclusion of the treaty he better keep quiet. ITAGAKI stated he had no intention to overthrow the present cabinet. OSHIMA heard this story from KAWABE and thought he told it to Ribbentrop. He never received telegrams from ITAGAKI concerning these negotiations for this was not permitted and he was not concerned with the exchange of telegrams between KAWABE and ITAGAKI.

34013 During the whole negotiations OSHIMA's constant idea was that the proposed treaty was purely defensive and its object was not war but was meant to be used as a means in diplomatic negotiations. According to his understanding the reason why Japan wished the conclusion of the treaty was to strengthen her diplomatic position to facilitate the settlement of the China Incident and to improve her defensive position vis-a-vis the Soviet. This intention was also clearly expressed in the treaty draft drawn up as a result of OSHIMA's negotiations. (Exhibit 2619) In the preamble of this it was stated that Japan, Germany and Italy, in the conviction that the activities of the Comintern threatened peace in Europe and Asia determined in the spirit of the Agreement to strengthen defense against the communistic disintegration and preserve their common interests, had agreed upon certain provisions. As was proper for an ambassador, OSHIMA did his best during the entire period of the negotiations to bridge over the opposing views of the two governments. For this purpose he conveyed the German views accurately to his own government, while interpret-

Page ing the Japanese point of view truly to the Germans. Sometimes he represented to his government after sounding German views that if it desired the successful conclusion of the negotiations it was preferable to make some concessions. While the instructions from Japan were equivocal he requested clarification and postponed executing the instructions until the wires were answered. However, he had no recollection of having contradicted or having refused to carry out instructions or going beyond their scope. He received no censures from the Foreign Minister in this respect during and after the negotiations.

About 20 August 1939 Ribbentrop called on OSHIMA by telephone informing him of the decision of concluding the Non-aggression Treaty with the Soviet, explaining this had been made inevitable by the exigencies of the European situation. * OSHIMA told Ribbentrop this was in contravention of the Anti-Comintern Pact and an act of extreme bad faith. When Ribbentrop passed through Berlin on his way to Moscow for signing the treaty OSHIMA repeated his oral protest.

Thereafter ARITA instructed him to lodge a formal protest and he drafted a note of protest and saw Secretary Weizsaecker to hand it to him as he could not see Ribbentrop at that time. Weizsaecker begged OSHIMA to postpone presenting the note because Germany was in a difficult position in connection with the negotiations with Poland. OSHIMA thereupon consented to the request and postponed presentation of the note until mid September when the war situation in Poland was somewhat clarified.

Having received the notification from Ribbentrop about 20 August that the conclusion * of the Non-aggression Pact was imminent he immediately cabled Tokyo offering his resignation. One month later he received orders to return to Tokyo and arrived in Japan in December 1939, and his request for resignation was granted and he was relieved on 27 December. The reason he offered his resignation was because he felt he had not fulfilled his duty in not anticipating the Non-aggression Pact, also he was annoyed at Germany's volte face. He resigned on his own initiative and had no thought of going to Germany ever again. He learned for the first time in the Trial that Ribbentrop worked on the Japanese Government to keep him at his post. He was functioning as ambassador after offering his resignation until his departure from Berlin in October 1939. During this period he had no important conversation with the Germans except over routine * matters.

Exhibit 507 said that before OSHIMA's departure he expressed full approval to Ribbentrop's theory concerning future Japanese-German collaboration and German good offices for improving Japanese-Russian relations as he thought it desirable at that time to bring about friendly relations with the Soviet. He expressed this idea as his private opinion to Ribbentrop.

As to Exhibit 508, a telegram from Weermann to Ott, OSHIMA explained that before his departure from Germany he thought Ribbentrop asked him to give any advice for Germany which he thought fit, but OSHIMA never heard from anybody about the secret communications, etc., as described in that telegram. He never committed anything to anybody concerning his conduct after his return to Japan and he never communicated with Ribbentrop through the German Embassy in Tokyo after his return home or through any other means.

*From his resignation in December 1939 until reappointment as ambassador in December 1940, he never occupied any official position and had no connection with any political, ideological or cultural groups. He was never consulted by anyone in the government nor did he ever see any official documents. As he had been away from Japan for more than five years he wanted to retire completely and devote himself to studying Japan's internal-situation. He received invitations to join political parties or make public speeches but he consistently refused. He did make a few private speeches. He never made any remarks to stir up anti-British or anti-American feeling on these occasions. He had nothing to do with the conception, negotiation and conclusion of the Tripartite Pact in September 1940. He did not even know what kind of negotiations were taking place and was never consulted by Foreign Minister MATSUOKA, Ambassador Ott or Stahmer.

*Exhibit 1299A, an article published under his name in the Yomiuri Shimbun of 27 October 1940 was an interview he gave to newspaper correspondents and he gave it in accordance with statements issued by the government.

In December 1940, he was again appointed ambassador to Germany. When MATSUOKA offered him his post he refused more than once once but because of his strong urging he ultimately accepted it.

Exhibit 560, Ott said OSHIMA refused because he wanted to stay in Japan and work politically for the Tripartite Pact but this was completely untrue. He refused because it was hardly a year since he had resigned and he did not want to go again to a distant foreign country. His reappointment took place after conclusion of the Tripartite Pact in September 1940. * The Rescript on the day of its conclusion (Exhibit 554) and the government statement (Exhibit 2734) indicated the pact would form a cardinal point in Japan's foreign policy and he was convinced that his actions as ambassador must be guided by the pact. As to its purpose, he understood from MATSUOKA it was to keep the United States out of the war and facilitate settlement of the China Incident. He naturally thought Japan should be prepared for all eventualities but never advocated the use of armed force for any but defensive purposes.

In January 1941 prior to his departure he was invited by Premier KONOYE to a party, together with Admiral NOMURA, the new ambassador to the United States. Among those present were Minister, without portfolio, HIRANUMA, War Minister TOJO, Navy Minister OIKAWA, Chief of Staff SUGIYAMA and Deputy Chief of Staff KONDO, etc. At the party KONOYE explained the government's attitude toward the Tripartite Pact, emphasizing * what Japan's prime desire was. The Foreign and Navy Ministers stated that even if the United States-German war should break out Japan would not enter the war unless it was determined clearly that Germany was attacked and asked OSHIMA to collect and report as many accurate data as possible. Besides desires were expressed that Germany's intentions in the European war be ascertained, especially as to landing operations against England.

In January 1941 he met Ott and the Russian Ambassador Smetania at the German Embassy at Ott's invitation. On this occasion OSHIMA emphasized his desire for improving Japanese-Russian relations in accordance with the idea of the Tripartite Pact to which Smetania agreed. As a result of Smetania's communication to his government OSHIMA and his party got Russian visas quickly and this provided other special favors.

*OSHIMA arrived in Berlin on 19 February 1941 and went to Berchtesgaden on 28 February to present his credentials to Hitler.

Exhibit 571 described his conversations with Ribbentrop on 23 February. It was true that Ribbentrop in the interview tried to lead conversations in the direction of inducing Japan to attack Singapore. However, OSHIMA had no recollection of telling Ribbentrop that preparations for attack on Singapore, Hongkong, etc. would be completed by May and he had never received any information on such subjects, nor did he ask MATSUOKA to visit Berlin with a concrete plan to attack Singapore. He knew that such a matter was purely an operational matter in charge of the High Command and no outside intervention was tolerated. When Ribbentrop touched the question of an attack on Singapore OSHIMA expressed his personal opinion and let the talk go along the line Ribbentrop suggested because he as ambassador considered it important to ascertain German intentions, especially toward Britain and thought * these talks would be a good clue for this purpose. He thought also it was to some extent necessary not to give the impression of Japan's assuming an evasive attitude.

Exhibit 580 said that MATSUOKA asked Ribbentrop for help in the attack on Singapore. Ribbentrop told MATSUOKA the question had already been discussed with OSHIMA, however, OSHIMA never talked with Ribbentrop about such matters which were outside his competence.

Exhibit 573, a directive issued by Hitler's Headquarters on 5 March 1941 concerning collaboration with Japan said that the aim of cooperation with her based on the Tripartite Pact must be to bring Japan, as soon as possible, to active operation in the Far East. OSHIMA never heard anything about this directive from Hitler, Ribbentrop or any other Germans and learned about it for the first time during his interrogations.

*MATSUOKA arrived in Berlin at the end of March 1941 and after several conversations with Hitler and Ribbentrop left Berlin for Moscow in early April. Prior to OSHIMA's departure from Tokyo the Foreign Minister's visit to Germany had already been talked about but as the matter was not yet decided he did not talk with MATSUOKA about it in detail. After his arrival in Berlin he was never instructed to arrange an agenda of conversations for MATSUOKA and only arranged MATSUOKA's itinerary according to instructions. He attended only the first conversations of MATSUOKA with Hitler and Ribbentrop. At that conversation Hitler emphasized the desire for closer Japanese-German relations and MATSUOKA responded without suggesting anything concrete. There was talk about the attack on Singapore but MATSUOKA made no commitments.

Thereafter * MATSUOKA had several talks with German leaders but never consulted OSHIMA prior to them nor tell him anything about their particulars. OSHIMA did not ask MATSUOKA about that because he knew the primary object of MATSUOKA's trip was a conclusion of a Neutrality Treaty with the Soviet and no importance was attached to his journey to Germany and Italy. OSHIMA never met MATSUOKA prior to their meeting in November 1940 when he urged him to accept the post of ambassador. During the month before his departure to Germany and when MATSUOKA visited Berlin he saw him only several times. OSHIMA's impression was that MATSUOKA was a man of strong self confidence and did not like to consult anyone. OSHIMA received before his departure from Tokyo no written instructions but only brief oral instructions concerning the Tripartite Pact and he had no conference with him on Japan's foreign policy in general.

34026 * Exhibits 587 and 1097 were telegrams exchanged on 28 June 1941 between Ribbentrop and Ott. OSHIMA never told Ribbentrop he would recommend to his government military action against the Soviet, nor did he ever make such recommendations, and the contents of those telegrams were not true. After the outbreak of the German-Russian war and after the German army's onslaught began to slacken, Ribbentrop two or three times urged Japan's joining in that war. OSHIMA conveyed this request to Tokyo in execution of his ambassadorial duties and did nothing more.

After the Pacific war's outbreak, also such German requests were repeated, but after OSHIMA refused, upon instruction of the Japanese government this request in the summer of 1943, they were never repeated.

Exhibit 3511 in support of this statement certified re NOHARA, Komachi, who was not formally a member of the embassy, although in its service, was received in evidence. OSHIMA heard that NOHARA was following overseas radio broadcasts, but did not know him personally nor did he talk with him, and absolutely did not allow him to touch secret matters. As to the Japanese-American negotiations, at the end of May 1941, some time after their commencement, OSHIMA received a brief telegram from MATSUOKA informing him that the negotiations had commenced.

34028 Thereafter no information was received from the government and no reply was received to OSHIMA's inquiries. * The decisions of the liason and imperial conferences after the summer of 1941 and their contents were never communicated to him and he learned of them for the first time in the trial. He was left completely in the dark as to the progress of the negotiations, government's policy and intentions, etc. Ribbentrop often asked OSHIMA about the real situation of the negotiations but, because he was completely ignorant, could give him no information. OSHIMA was not in a position to express concurrence or opposition in the matter of the negotiations. His opinion was that the China problem was the primary cause of Japanese-American difficulties and it would be difficult to ease the tension, unless that problem was solved. As to the

Page tripartite pact, he thought it would not be difficult for the U.S. to understand it as it was purely defensive. He believed that if the pact had been made on Japan's Pacific policy, adjustment of American negotiations could be made only so far as 34029 it did not contradict the pact. * During the negotiations, rumours were rampant and Germany grew suspicious lest the pact be rendered meaningless. OSHIMA feared that if the negotiations should fail, Japan would fall into worse diplomatic isolation than ever as the U.S. would look upon Japan and Germany and Italy would not trust her any more.

It was his same conviction and hope that peace would be maintained with the U.S. and this opinion was expressed in telegrams to MATSUOKA dated 20 May 1941 (exhibits 1075 and 1076). Ribbentrop told him his strong suspicion as to the contents of the negotiations, and OSHIMA sent those telegrams as he thought it his duty to report the German view, although he had received no communications concerning the negotiations.
This was the only time he presented his observation to his home government concerning them.

34030 * Germany also did not wish for a collision between Japan and the U.S. and approved the negotiations so far as they did induce the U.S. to observe neutrality without affecting the tripartite pact. He thought, in fact, that Germany tried to appease America in spite of the dangerous situation in the Atlantic.

Exhibit 603-A was allegedly an intercepted telegram sent on 29 November from Berlin to Tokyo. He did not recall the interview with Ribbentrop referred to in it, nor its contents. If the interception, decoding, and translation by the U.S. authorities was correct, his loss of memory must be due to the fact that the conversation made no strong impression on him. He did not remember Ribbentrop's telling him Germany would join the war immediately if Japan became engaged in a war within the U.S. If Ribbentrop made such a statement, OSHIMA thought it was because he wanted either to ascertain the Japanese attitude towards the U.S. or to influence Japan by strong expressions, as he was always afraid lest Japan would turn away from Germany as a result 34031 * of the Japanese-American negotiations.

Germany's determination not to join the Japanese-U.S. war at once was clear from the fact that Ribbentrop postponed the answer on the pretext of consulting Hitler when OSHIMA approached him on this subject a few days later on instruction of his government. About 29 November 1941 OSHIMA suddenly received a telegram from foreign minister TOGO saying that Hull's reply of 26 November was strong and

Page uncompromising, but as OSHIMA was unaware of the progress of the negotiations, he did not dream of the imminence of war and 34033 went to Vienna to attend a Mozart Festival. * In Vienna he received a telephone call from KAWAHARA, councillor, asking him to return to Berlin at once and upon his return, the morning of 2 December, he first learned that a telegram from TOGO had arrived instructing him to initiate negotiations for the Non-Separate Peace Treaty. He immediately communicated this matter to Ribbentrop.

Although the danger of war was mentioned in the telegram, he did not believe the danger of war was inevitable nor imminent, thinking that Japan's intention was only to make preparations for an eventuality. OSHIMA thought there was still possibility of continuing negotiations and the instructions arrived so suddenly he could not grasp the situation.
34034 * When Ribbentrop asked him whether war was going to break out with the U.S., he replied it was clear.

To this proposal, Ribbentrop said it was a grave question whether Germany should immediately declare war if war broke out between Japan and America and he must consult Hitler. This situation was described in exhibit 605, OSHIMA's telegram to TOGO, sent the 2d and arriving in Tokyo on 3 December 1941. The date of OSHIMA's visit to Ribbentrop in the telegram, 1 December, was obviously wrong and must be the 2nd. The fact that the telegram was sent in the afternoon of 2 December clearly indicated that he saw Ribbentrop on that day.

At that time Hitler was at the front near Moscow 34035 conducting operations himself, * and it was extremely difficult to contact him. Thus despite OSHIMA's urging, the German reply was postponed until 7 December. The afternoon of that day, OSHIMA received an instruction to hasten the negotiations. After consultation with the embassy staff, he drafted a telegram explaining the German attitude, ordered the dispatch thereof, and returned to his residence about 8 p.m. After 10 or 20 minutes he received a telephone call from one of the embassy staff, informing him that the London radio had broadcast the attack on Pearl Harbor. He was very surprised and could hardly believe it, but as a precautionary measure, ordered the embassy to withhold dispatch of the telegram to Tokyo.

Some time later Ribbentrop asked him by telephone whether the broadcast was true and he replied he could not answer lacking official information. Upon Ribbentrop's

Page request, OSHIMA saw him at the foreign office and he also was much surprised and seemed not to believe the outbreak of war.
34036 As the same report continued * to be broadcast, by midnight OSHIMA began to think it might be true. On the morning of the 8th, he received an official telegram informing him of the outbreak of war and conveyed the news to Ribbentrop and they began drafting the Non-Separate Peace Treaty which was signed 11 December.

The proposal of the treaty was not made to Germany until he received these instructions from the foreign office, and prior to that there was no talk concerning it. As to exhibits 601 and 602, he heard for the first time in the trial that such contacts were made in Tokyo between General OKAMOTO and General Kretschmer, the German Military Attache, in November 1941. Ribbentrop never told him about that.

In answer to a question during his interrogation, he had made detailed statements as to the circumstances in Berlin at the time of the outbreak of the war (exhibit 3512),* an excerpt from OSHIMA's interrogation was received in evidence in support of this statement.

34042 * Shortly after the outbreak of the war, he received a German decoration and thought it a gesture, since the two countries were now allies. It was customary in Germany that any foreign diplomat received a decoration after 2 years' stay in Berlin.

On 18 January 1942 the military agreement between Japan, Germany, and Italy was concluded in Berlin. It concerned matters belonging exclusively to the high command and no intervention by OSHIMA as a civilian was tolerated. He had no connection with it. He, as ambassador, was ex-officio in accordance with the memorandum concerning the commission's organization (exhibit 559), a Japanese member of the Mixed Special Commission in Berlin based on Article 4 of the Tripartite pact.

34043 * The commission was never convened prior to the outbreak of the war and even after the war it convened not more than three times. The agenda was confined to an exchange of ceremonial greetings and to general explanations of the war situation by the German members, and no material discussion concerning combined operations took place.

With respect to communication between Japan and Germany, the route through Siberia was closed as a result of the German-Russian war. After the outbreak of the Japanese-American war the communication became more difficult. Only a Page few Japanese succeeded to get a Soviet visa and the difficult voyage by German blockade runs or submarines became next to impossible. Communication by air was found impractical and the only means left was radio, which was very inadequate. After the outbreak of the Japanese war, he never received from his government any communication concerning political and military plans.

34044 * As far as he knew, the military and naval attaches received no information either, and it was almost impossible to collaborate with the Germans. No special desire of the government in this respect was communicated to him.

After the outbreak of the Pacific war, military matters were often brought up during his conversations with Hitler and Ribbentrop. As operational matters were outside his duty, and as he received little information from Tokyo, all he could do was offer his personal views on the war situation from general knowledge of military matters and on the strength of other meager information.

The Japanese-German Economic Agreement was concluded in January 1943 and was signed in accordance with government instructions. As he did not have sufficient knowledge concerning economic matters, he entrusted it to a minister attached to the embassy who was a specialist. He did not know the details of the negotiations nor how it worked out after its conclusion. So far as he knew, the agreement remained nothing but a piece of paper, because communication with Japan * was difficult and transport of goods practically impossible.

Either at the end of February or at the beginning of March 1943, Ribbentrop told him that Hitler wished to offer two German submarines as a present to Japan. He told him that Hitler would like to make the present as the efficiency of German submarines was very much improved. OSHIMA conveyed this to NOMURA, vice admiral, then resident in Berlin, and the naval attache YOKOI, and also cabled it to the Foreign Office. Naval authorities in Tokyo telegraphed NOMURA that Japan would be glad to accept the gift. NOMURA asked OSHIMA to convey the acceptance to Hitler, but as Hitler was not then in Berlin, he met Ribbentrop for that purpose. Thereafter, all talks concerning the transfer were conducted by NOMURA and YOKIO without his participation.

In his interrogation (exhibit 2106) were several errors owing to failure of memory and the misunderstanding of the interpreter. The prosecutor said he would receive OSHIMA's statement drawn up on the basis of his corrected memory, and OSHIMA presented him a memorandum on * 19 February 1946. Exhibit 34046 3513, OSHIMA's statement of this date was received in evidence.

Page In January 1942 he heard from Hitler that * he was going 34047 to issue an order to annihilate crews of torpedoed merchant ships. As the matter concerned the German navy only, OSHIMA did not object. He did not convey this story to his government as this was purely a naval question not concerning the foreign office nor ambassador. When the offer of the two submarines was made in March, 1943, neither Hitler nor Ribbentrop talked about annihilating crews of torpedoed merchant ships.

34048 * In April 1945, when danger became imminent to Berlin, the German government requested the diplomatic corps to move to south Germany and they left on April 14. In mid May the U.S. forces entered the area and they were placed under American custody and were then sent to the U.S. After their internment in Germany until their return home, OSHIMA was always treated by the U.S. as a diplomat under custody.

The prosecution had alleged that he participated in a conspiracy with the other accused and divers other persons, or with German and Italian leaders, to secure the domination of a part of China and the whole world by unlawful acts, and planned, prepared, initiated, and waged with these people wars in violation of treaties or wars of aggression. This allega-34049 tion * was totally groundless. First, he was as ambassador or attache or an agent on the spot, and not in position to determine government policy. He did not even receive information concerning overall government policy. Secondly, he never acted with the knowledge that Japan was waging any unlawful or aggressive war. He was firmly convinced it was the highest duty of an ambassador or military attache or Japanese citizen to contribute to the preservation and development of Japan in accordance with government policy.

The prosecution alleged he participated in a conspiracy of initiating hostilities without proper notice against the U.S. and other countries, and committed murder by ordering, causing, and permitting Japan's forces to make such attacks on 7 or 8 December, 1941. However, he never desired the initiation of the Pacific war and was surprised on hearing 34050 of * these attacks after they took place. He never consulted with anyone concerning them prior to their taking place, nor suggested nor ordered them. He was merely an ambassador with no power to order forces to attack nor to prevent such attacks.

The prosecution alleged he participated in the conspiracies to murder POWs and others, and of committing acts contrary to the laws of war and humanity, and ordered, caused, or permitted the commission of these criminal acts. However, he never consulted anyone concerning this matter, nor suggested, ordered, nor authorized anyone to commit them. He was only an

Page ambassador and had no power to do so. He did not know these acts were permitted nor was he in a position to prevent them. He was indicted on account of the allegation that he participated in a conspiracy with the co-assused, however, from 1934 until 1945 he was only * in Japan one year and had no chance to exchange political views with most of the accused. He had no acquaintance or communication with HIROTA, HOSHINO, KAYA, KIDO, OKAWA, and SATO. He was slightly acquainted with ARAKI, DOHIHARA, HASHIMOTO, HATA, ITAGAKI, KIMURA, KOISO, MATSUI, MINAMI, MUTO, and SUZUKI. With TOJO and UMEZU he served together in the general staff about 1931 and 1932, but their assignments were different and he had no intimate relation with them.

He met HIRANUMA only once prior to his departure for Germany in 1941. He had only a very slight acquaintance with OKA. SHIMADA was in the naval general staff in about 1933 when OSHIMA served there concurrently with his assignment in the army general staff, but he knew him only slightly. He became acquainted with SHIGEMITSU in 1938 or 1939 in Europe. He was with TOGO in Berlin in 1938. He became acquainted with SHIRATORI in 1939 when they were engaged in the same negotiations.

During his two tours of ambassadorial duty, the Japanese foreign minister changed nine times and with any, except TOGO, he had no closer * relations than brief acquaintances. He never discussed with any of the accused nor anyone else on matters contained in the indictment, nor never suggested such matters to anyone.

* Exhibit 3509, which was introduced during the reading of his affidavit, certified that military regulations concerning the organization of general staff headquarters were destroyed by fire.

34053

* Exhibit 3510 (introduced T. 34,003) stated that government officials shall obey public laws and orders and discharge their duties, observe the orders from the chief of officials to whom they were assigned, but could express their own opinion relating to such orders.

34054

Exhibit 3511 (introduced T. 34,027) certified that NOHARA, Komakichi, was in the embassy service but not a * formal member of the foreign office.

34055

* Exhibit 3513 (introduced T. 34,346), being OSHIMA's revised statement after his interrogation, stating that the

Page previous interrogations had consisted of two points: (1) In 1943 Ribbentrop asked him if the Japanese navy intended strengthening the submarine warfare in the Pacific and proposed to present two submarines to the Japanese as suitable models. (2) He informed OSHIMA that orders had already been issued to kill the crew of any U.S. vessels sunk by German submarines.

34058 Regarding these points: (1) The first point was a fact. OSHIMA immediately notified naval commissioner NOMURA and navy attache YOKOI and they cabled Japanese naval authorities. OSHIMA sent a telegram * to the foreign minister asking him to transmit it to the other naval authorities, who then cabled instructions to the two admirals to negotiate the transfer. Though OSHIMA informed Ribbentrop of this telegram at the admirals' request, he had nothing to do with the matter since the negotiations were exclusively between the admirals and the Germany navy. While under the German system Ribbentrop had authority to talk over such military matters and take part in them, it was entirely different to the Japanese system and neither the foreign minister nor ambassador could do this, as the navy had exclusive jurisdiction. They only transmitted information to the navy and that is why they had received no telegram from navy or foreign ministers.

34059 As to (2), he must have misunderstood and somehow mixed the first and second points. * But after tracing his memory, he recalled that this was told by Hitler in January 1942 in newspaper articles, but was sure the matter was not mentioned at the interview with Ribbentrop in 1943. He did not cable this to his government, because the German government had only told him about such steps without any official request to Japan. Such a measure was against Japan's traditional spirit and not worth serious consideration.

34060 * The problem was under the sole jurisdiction of the navy and not in his authority. He may have mentioned it to NOMURA and YOKOI, but his memory was not clear. When asked on his interrogation if he had received a cable from the Japanese navy dated 20 March 1943, he could positively assert he never received it. He was never notified about the sinking of an American ship on the Indian Ocean on 2 July 1944, and with regard to the massacre of the crew, he had no talks with the German government. Such a problem was under the sole jurisdiction of the navy and foreign ministers had nothing to do with it. In so far as he knew, Japan navy authorities never talked about it with German navy authorities.

Page 34062 *On further oral examination, reference was made to exhibit 3503, a telegram from Ott to the German Foreign Minister dated 31 December 1939 in which Ott stated that OSHIMA was working for the cabinet's collapse. Asked if he had any idea what was meant by this statement, he replied he knew nothing. Shortly before the date of the telegram, on 10 December OSHIMA returned to Japan after five years abroad and had no knowledge of the domestic conditions. Thus there would be reason whatsoever for him to participate in such movements for the collapse of the government. He might have met Ott but certainly never spoke of such a matter with him.

34063 * Not only then but later he had never participated in any movements to bring about the downfall of the government.

Reference was made to exhibit 3503, a telegram from Ott to the German foreign office dated 23 January 1940, which referred to OSHIMA's opinion as to the handling of the Asama-maru incident. Asked if he recalled in this connection, he stated his recollection was that he had not talked with Ott on this incident ever. At that time he had already resigned as ambassador, the foreign office was not supplying him with any information, and he learned of the incident only from newspapers. He did not express his views to others and presumed probably Ott used his name because the Asama-maru affair did not progress as he had hoped and he feared a reprimand from Ribbentrop.

34064 Reference was made to the telegram from Ott to Ribbentrop dated 26 January 1940 attached * to exhibit 3503, in which Ott stated he asked for OSHIMA's opinion concerning the visit of the Duke of Coburg to Japan. Regarding this, the accused stated he recalled Ott called on him and told him that the Japanese foreign office had requested the Duke's visit but postponed it until after the Diet's recess. At that time OSHIMA was not receiving any information from the foreign office and learned of the matter for the first time from Ott. Not being an important matter, he probably told Ott he might do just as the foreign office advised.

Being only one month after his return to Japan, he had no knowledge whatsoever of a anti-British movement in Japan and there could have been no occasion nor information for his speaking to Ott about it.

with Ambassador SHIGEMITSU the proposed pact. OSHIMA gained the impression that SHIGEMITSU disapproved the proposed pact.
The trip was not made for investigation in connection with the 34068 The accused stated that while he was Section

Chief in the General Staff from August 1 1931 to April 1939, there were occasions on which he conferred with 34069 * War Ministry officials when such matters were in his charge. During this period, ARAKI, as War Minister, MINAMI as War Minister, KOISO as Director of the Bureau of Military Affairs, and SUZUKI as a member of that bureau were in the War Ministry.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated that he served with TOJO and UMEZU on the General Staff, and he was asked if MATSUI and MUTO were not also members of the General Staff while he was in it, and he replied that MATSUI was not there at the time, but MUTO was there briefly, although he had no direct dealings with him. He had not come in contact with HATA, Inspector of Artillery from August 1931 to 1933.

34070 * With respect to German officials, Weizsaecker was Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs while OSHIMA was Ambassador in Berlin, Knoll was an officer of a low level in the Japanese section with whom OSHIMA had no contacts; Tiehl was Director of the Commerce Bureau of the Foreign Office, Woermann was Director of the Political Affairs Bureau, Erdmansdorf was Chief of the Japan Section; Makensen preceded Weizsaecker as Vice-Minister, Scholl was 34071 * a major or lieutenant colonel once stationed in Japan and later attached to the German Legation in Siam. He didn't recall who Neumann was, but Thomas was probably a German general who was Director of Technical Headquarters of the Ministry of Defense. Rintelen was first a subordinate to Woermann, and later became a member of the Secretariat of Ribbentrop, and was later Ambassador-at-large. Schleier 34072 held the diplomatic rank of *minister, and was Charge d' affaires at Paris.

The accused was asked if in addition to the instructions he had stated he received from the General Staff concerning his duties in Germany, if he was not instructed with regard the proposed pact with Germany, that he should try to discover what Germany would do in case of war with Germany and Russia before he left Japan for his post. He stated there were no detailed instructions of that kind, but in performing his duties he naturally looked into such matters after arriving in Berlin. He was not told, however, to try to discover what Germany would do in case of such a war.

34075 Asked again if he made the statement read to him from his interrogation, he replied he didn't recall whether he used those exact words. As he had stated in his affidavit, he was told by the General Staff before leaving Tokyo to watch German-Soviet relations, particularly to those between the two armies. Therefore, it would be natural that an investigation would be made as to what Germany would do in the event of a German-Soviet war. * So in answer to the prosecutor's question, he stated he naturally investigated into German-Soviet relations and how a war between them would develop. He did not deny the interrogation, but he would like to add that the instructions given him prior to his departure for Germany did not so specify.

34076 Hack had spent many years in Japan, and was at one time adviser to the SMR. * Asked if prior to December 1935, the only treaty contemplated in OSHIMA's discussions with Hack and Ribbentrop was one providing that in the event of war with the USSR, the other party should agree not to carry out any measure which would relieve the USSR's position, the accused stated in explanation that in the event Russia attacked either Germany or Japan without provocation, the other party was not to take any measures lightening Russia's burden. The accused was again asked if that was not the only treaty discussed between himself, Hack, and Ribbentrop prior to December 1935. He stated he had no discussions with Ribbentrop and Hack at that time. Hack had nothing to do with this, and there were no repeated negotiations with Ribbentrop on it. At the time the matter had advanced only to the stage where Ribbentrop asked him to find out what the Japanese army thought of this idea.

* These were the only matters not discussed prior to December 1935. With regard to the treaty contemplated and discussed before that date, in the event of war with the USSR there would be consultation between Japan and Germany on measures they should take for their common interest.

Asked if it was not also true that the German Army did not want a military alliance with Japan made public at that time and in consequence the pact, at Germany's suggestion, was changed to an anti-Comintern Pact, he replied that not only Germany but also Japan had no intention of making it public because the pact was directed entirely against communism.

The accused was reminded that he had stated that prior to December 1935, the only pact considered and discussed was the one mentioned, and that he was now being asked whether or not the whole plan was changed at the instance of the German Army, which didn't want a military pact made public and therefore suggested it be converted * into an anti-Comintern Pact. He replied that was not so, and explained that the matter first discussed was a secret pact which was not a military alliance. As was suggested, the purpose of the pact was not to the extent of lightening Russia's burdens. The purport of the pact was that it carried only light obligations on the parties.

34079

* It was not true that Germany suggested that the arrangement discussed should be converted into an anti-Comintern Pact. To the accused was quoted a part of his interrogations, in which when asked if while conducting these negotiations they were contemplating there would be two treaties instead of one he had replied that prior to December 1935 and the arrival of WAKAMATSU in Berlin, the only treaty contemplated was the one wherein the two nations would agree not to enlighten the USSR in case of war. The Germans, however, said this would be a very weak treaty, and thus suggested the anti-Comintern Pact, and this was the * first time that matter came up. Asked if he made that statement, he replied he did not and it was contrary to the facts.

The accused was asked if WAKAMATSU expressed his views with regard to the results to be obtained by Japan in concluding an anti-Comintern Pact with Germany, when WAKAMATSU testified that by the conclusion of such a pact Japan could forestall Germany from drawing closer to Russia, obtain necessary intelligence and new type weapons from Germany, and keep Germany from taking sides with China.

Page The accused answered that he had heard WAKAMATSU's testimony, but had no occasion to speak on such matters with him. There were various fruits to be obtained by the conclusion of a pact, but the purpose of the anti-Comintern Pact was as he had stated in his affidavit. Asked again whether WAKAMATSU's views were his own views, he replied yes, such fruits would accompany the pact.

34081 * Asked if at the time of the conclusion of the pact, 25 November 1936, Germany had not yet emerged as the powerful nation she later became, he replied that Germany was then in the midst of revival and did later become strong. He knew and recognized at the time the potential military might of the new Germany dominated by Hitler and the Nazi party.

It was not true that he sponsored and aided the conclusion of the anti-Comintern Pact believing that by linking Japan to Germany in the midst of huge military preparations, Japan would be aided and strengthened in its position in Manchuria and in its policy being executed in North China.

34082 * About a year later Italy joined the pact, but he had no connection with that. Asked if he likewise knew that at the time of the admission of Italy to the anti-Comintern Pact and during the negotiations for it, the League of Nations had, on 7 October 1935, declared Italy an aggressor against Ethiopia and that Italy, following Japan's example in Manchuria, occupied Ethiopia on 2 May 1936, he replied that he didn't recall, but supposed the dates were correct. As he had said before, he had no part in the negotiations vis-a-vis Italy joining the pact, but there was nothing to prevent her from common defense against communism.

34083 * Asked if by admitting Italy into the pact he believed and recognized that by so doing Japan would further strengthen her hand in China and secure her rear against Russia so as to have a free hand in China, he replied that as a public official he had no part in these negotiations. At the time the pact was concluded, there was no intention of applying it or utilizing it in connection with China. The preamble of the pact obviously showed its purpose was to form common defense against the communists, who were interfering in internal affairs of other countries. It was not the purpose of the treaty to interfere in the communist parties of each country.

Page Asked what was the real motive back of the pact, he stated there was nothing underneath or in back of it. While the negotiations for the pact were pending. General Ott * returned to Germany, but not in connection with the anti-Comintern Pact, but did so to attend war maneuvers in * Germany. Asked if during the negotiations the then Ambassador to Sweden SHIRATORI made frequent trips to Berlin for conversations with him discussing the pact, he stated that SHIRATORI was never at any time connected with the negotiations or conclusion of the anti-Comintern Pact. SHIRATORI did make visits, but on other matters, and when he visited Berlin they did not discuss matters relating to the pact. He had not stated in his interrogation that he had discussed the pact several times with SHIRATORI in Berlin, but had stated there that SHIRATORI, during that period, came to Berlin and that the matter of the pact had been mentioned to him, but no discussion as to its contents was held between the two.

Asked if he was drawing a distinction between mentioning the pact to him and discussing it, he replied that when SHIRATORI came to Berlin, it was mentioned to him that such a pact was under negotiation, but no mention was made of its contents or what was to be done in the future or any discussions held in connection therewith. This was the first time he had ever met SHIRATORI.

The accused was told that in exhibit 497, an excerpt from his interrogation, he had stated that in January 1938, Ribbentrop asked him if there was not some way in which Germany and Japan could be brought closer together. Asked if he learned about this time that Germany, which had hitherto opposed Japanese aggression in China, reoriented its view and began to support Japanese policy there, he replied that he didn't think the policy changed after January 1938. * Asked if he didn't know that about this time Hitler assumed his full role as dictator, assumed command of the army, ousted Neurath and appointed Ribbentrop Foreign Minister, he replied there were such personnel changes in February 1938 and he knew about them.

Asked if they were not very significant changes, he stated that of course, as a result various policy changes took place. It would be more correct to say that men came underneath Hitler who were capable of executing his policy. He didn't think it was correct to say there was any fundamental change of policy.

Page With regard to China Policy, there were various arguments pro and con within Germany after the outbreak of the China Affair, especially was there opposition in German economic circles, but their influence waned. This personnel change took place and as a result some policy changes were made, but there was no radical change.

Mention was made that the accused had stated that the influence of economic circles had waned, and he was asked if as a matter of fact it disappeared entirely when Hitler assumed command of the army in February 1938, as far as China was concerned. He replied it was weakened, but did not disappear.

34089 Asked if he had not advocated and supported in every possible way the conclusion of a military alliance with Germany, a nation that he knew in 1938 was bent on aggressive action, he replied it would be difficult to * reply unless he had an understanding as to the character of the military alliance referred to. If the prosecutor was referring to a pact entered into between two countries in which the exercise of armed force was stipulated, he could reply yes or no; but if the prosecutor referred to a military alliance in which the contracting powers stipulated offensive or aggressive action of any kind, then he would have to answer in accordance with that definition.

34091 * He did not advocate an alliance which obligated Japan to participate in the European war between Germany and England whether Russia was in the war or not, at any stage of the negotiations. Asked if he opposed Ribbentrop's request that Japan unite * in an alliance obligating Japan to engage in a European war in the event England was at war with Germany, he replied that Ribbentrop made no such request. Asked if he did not oppose Ribbentrop's views and what Ribbentrop was requesting, he replied no question arose in connection with the British involvement.

The accused TOGO was Ambassador to Germany during the negotiations for the alliance up to October 1938. Asked if shortly after he was advised the decision of the Five-Ministers' Conference of August 1938, he was directed to

Page inform TOGO of all matters relating to the proposed alliance, and if he was directed to continue the negotiations in his capacity as military attache, he replied that he had

34093 directions with regard to certain parts. He was informed by the army the result of the Five-Ministers' Conference and directed to transfer negotiations to official channels as soon as possible, and report the progress up to that time to TOGO. While requesting the German side to transfer the matter to official channels, he reported to TOGO the

To the accused was quoted a part of his interrogations in which he was asked if matters had reached the stage that he was to keep TOGO informed of what was going on, but still keep negotiations going on in his capacity as military attache, to which he had replied, yes. Asked if he did so answer, he replied that that was not so, because no instructions came, and in their absence there would be no occasions for him to do anything of the kind. The contents of that interrogation were contrary to the facts, and he did not make that reply.

34096 He conferred with TOGO and reported the information regarding the proposed alliance as soon as he was notified of the Five Ministers' decision, as he was instructed to, the first part of September. He did not discuss these matters with TOGO prior to nor after that time. * He didn't report to TOGO all the information regarding the proposed alliance, but only the highlights. TOGO was already in receipt of a telegram from the Foreign Ministry giving the general purport of the matter.

34097 Asked if he discussed the general purport with TOGO, he replied that there was no discussion because there was no desire on TOGO's part, and he merely reported to him. Asked if TOGO expressed himself in accord with the plan of the proposed pact, he replied he had no discussions on this matter with him, but his impression was that TOGO disapproved of it, * but he could not say what points he disapproved and which he did not.

Asked if in his interrogation he had stated that TOGO wished to have the proposed pact only so far as Russia was concerned, he answered not in exactly those words, but only to some extent to that effect. That did not accurately represent his answer. Asked in what way his answer differed from what had been quoted him, he stated that he had said his impression of TOGO was that he could say with certainty he disapproved of expanding the matter to include Britain and France.

- Page As to his being in favor as far as Russia was concerned, OSHIMA had no discussion with him, nor did he ask * for his opinions to the extent that he could say so unequivocally. * Asked if it was a matter of disagreement on TOGO's part to extend agreement to England and France if there must have been then discussed between them a plan by which Japan would be obligated to participate in the event of a German-English war, he replied there was no discussion. Germany's first proposal included all countries. From the provisions of the treaty proper, it would appear that the pact was directed at all countries, but in order to put restrictions on this a secret understanding was proposed.
- 34099
- 34100 OSHIMA did not advise the General Staff and War Minister ITAGAKI of TOGO's views that he was not in favor of extending the pact against England and France. * It was shortly after his conference with TOGO that he received a communication from the General Staff suggesting he become ambassador. Asked if War Minister ITAGAKI consulted the Foreign Minister about his appointment, he replied he had no knowledge as to what kind of discussions took place and did not know if his appointment was urged by the War Ministry and General Staff.
- 34101 * He took with him to Germany his credentials when he was appointed ambassador the second time, but not the first time because he was in Germany then, and it was sent and addressed to Hitler. Asked if the credentials were merely a standard form used for ambassadors, he replied he could not reply with assurance because he had never
- 34102 * compared his with others, but he supposed they were in the same form as all credentials issued by his government.
- 34103 After the conference with TOGO he did not carry on negotiations with Ribbentrop regarding the proposed alliance while he was still attache, nor did he discuss the matter with Ribbentrop because there was no data on which to pose such discussions. The first time he consulted Ribbentrop about the receipt of information regarding the action of the Five Ministers' Conference was one or two days after, in the latter part of August 1938. Asked when was the next time he saw him and talked to him about the pact, * he replied there was talk about it but no discussion about the time KASAHARA returned to Berlin around 20 September, while he was still military attache. Asked if he conveyed to Ribbentrop certain information regarding the pact without consulting the ambassador, he replied that the instructions he received from Japan were to convey the information to Ribbentrop.

Page Asked if he was not then directed to continue the negotiations as attache, he replied he had no such direction. * A rather detailed report on the conference decision was sent him. The main points of the instructions was that he should talk to Ribbentrop and see to it that the matter was transferred to official diplomatic channels as quickly as possible. Also, there were a number of revisions made to the German proposal.

He didn't recall exactly the date of the instructions from Japan to which he was now referring, but thought it was at the end of August or the 1st of September. The instructions received were to hand the Japanese revisions to Ribbentrop informally and request him to draw up a proposal incorporating the revisions proposed by Japan. Although progress on the matter was rather rapid in Japan, the Germans were not prepared as the proposal had been informal, and they had not discussed the matter or taken it up with Italy, and therefore desired a short wait. Asked if he had not stated that when Ribbentrop submitted the proposal to him in July, 1938, Ribbentrop suggested a mutual aid treaty aimed not only at the USSR but at all countries, he replied that while the text of the treaty so stated, actually it was not so * and there were restrictions applied to it.

Ribbentrop did not make a proposal to him in July 1938, suggesting a mutual aid treaty aimed at all countries, and he had not told a prosecutor in his interrogations that he did. He only told him of the limitations placed on the proposed treaty. To the witness was quoted a purported answer he made to a question in his interrogation in which he said that to the best of his knowledge, Ribbentrop * had said on this occasion that what he was saying was not based on talks with Hitler or any other official, and he felt Germany would not approve a treaty agreeing to consult only and was somewhat one-sided and not strong enough, but suggested a mutual aid treaty aimed not only at the USSR, but at all countries. In other words, what Ribbentrop meant was that a German-Japanese pact would, if strong enough, hope to preserve world peace.

Asked if he made this statement, he said he was supposed to have said that and did. * He didn't recall the date of the Five Ministers' Conference which considered the proposal brought by KASAHARA, but thought it was late in August.

34112 * To the accused were quoted certain questions and answers from his interrogation in which when asked if it was not a fact that the military urged his appointment as ambassador, he replied yes, he thought so. When asked what military officials urged or suggested it, he had replied he believed it was General Staff Headquarters and the War Ministry. He did not know of any other organizations. Those advocating it were the army in particular.

34113 In the fall of 1938 without his knowledge, the army apparently put forward his name for the ambassadorship and he received a telegram from General Staff Headquarters requesting him to take the position. He refused, saying he was a soldier and not a diplomat, but after repeated urgings he finally was more or less * forced to take the job. At that time TADA was C/S and Headquarters had such men as Major General KASAHARA and General HOMMA. There were no others urging his appointment and he was not a member of any army group. The War Minister who urged his appointment he believed was ITAGAKI. When asked if those questions had been asked and if he made the above answers, the accused replied yes.

34114 Reference was made to his testimony on cross-examination (P. 34104) that around or between the 29th of August and 2nd of September, he received a detailed report on the Five Ministers Conference decision, in which revisions were made to the German proposal, the accused stated he did not recall whether the report was made in one or two telegrams * but thought there was more than one. When shown a document purporting to be a copy of the telegram, he stated that it seemed to jibe with the circumstances but he had no definite recollection whether the entire document was correct. He did not know what else was incorporated in the telegram nor know what explanations were added to it and could not confirm the document. He was certain he received a telegram the end of August or 1st of Sept.

34115 * The telegram shown him was dated 1938 and contents to the effect were in the telegram but whether the one he received contained the exact information as here or whether there were explanations added, he could not say.

34116 * Exhibit 3514, the telegram identified by the accused, stated that both the army and navy agreed with the purport of the treaty plan brought by KASAHARA. The opinion to adopt it was made upon the following conditions:

"a. Add the following essentials as the preamble.

"b. Change 'diplomatically' of Article 2 to 'economic.'

"c. Change in Article 3 from 'there is an obligation to perform' to 'will enter into a conference immediately.'

"d. The phrases, 'menace and attack' of Articles 2 and 3 will be designated as 'unless provoked.'

"e. It is our opinion that we would like to prescribe clearly the methods of execution and limit the sphere of the conditions of military aid to be given in accordance with the secret treaty to be attached to the main treaty.

"2. Since we desire to conclude this treaty as promptly as possible, we wish Germany would take steps to submit this plan formally soon."

When shown another document and asked if he did not receive this telegram the same day he received Exhibit 3514, he replied that the contents were generally the same * but he could not say for sure whether it was exactly so.

Exhibit 3515, the telegram identified by the accused being an explanation concerning the previous telegram (Exhibit 3514), he stated * that "The Preamble Draft" was that this treaty was an extension of the Anti-Comintern Pact and a plan making clear the intent that the Soviet was the chief target. Care was taken so as not to give the impression from its wording that England and U.S. were its greatest enemies. The Text Plan, Obligation of Military Aid in Article 3, was not instantaneous or unconditional. To nullify the danger of being involved in a purely European problem against their will, the principle was a conference before entering with military aid.

To allow the purport of this treaty to take on a defensive character "menace and attack" would be limited to "provocation." The text of the plan was at present under consideration.

The accused stated that in compliance with instructions, he communicated the revisions at once to Ribbentrop.

Regarding his trip to England and Belgium, it was shortly after becoming ambassador * somewhere around Feb. 1939 before the arrival of the ITO Mission. He entered England with an official visa in his capacity as Ambassador. When asked if he had any official mission to the British Government requiring him to be officially received, he said that ordinarily such a thing did not take place according to diplomatic precedent and he was not so received. When asked if his presence in those countries was made known publicly, he stated he went in openly with a visa issued by English authorities * and his presence in England and Belgium was open.

Page No conference of Japanese ambassadors and ministers in Europe was held in Berlin in 1939. In addition to SHIRATORI, other ambassadors visiting Berlin in 1939 were KURIYAMA, Minister to Sweden and AMAU, Minister to Switzerland.

34122 * He thought the latter came in 1939 after the ITO Commission's visit. There was also occasion for Ambassador TOGO to come from Moscow and SHIRATORI from Italy. He did not recall the occasion for TOGO's coming but this was not so long after the ITO Commission was there and the Commission arrived late in February. * He could not remember the exact date the ITO Commission arrived. Ambassador SAKO from Poland also came to Berlin after the ITO Commission came. All these ambassadors came at different times. It was a custom of officials of the Foreign Office to take opportunities to visit other posts for liaison and exchange of information.

34124 * TOGO came at his own initiative and he thought that SHIRATORI was present at the time. Asked if it was not true that he held a meeting at which at least TOGO and SHIRATORI were present and that he and SHIRATORI expressed the view that Germany and Italy were rising powers in Europe and to align with them would allow Japan to improve her position in East Asia, he replied it was possible that the three met because SHIRATORI attended the conferences when the ITO Commission came to Berlin and TOGO came about that time. He did not remember what they talked about nor what SHIRATORI said but since he himself entertained such ideas, he believed as a matter of course that he expressed them.

34125 * There were no other ambassadors from Europe present at this meeting. Asked if he did not learn that he and the army had been severely criticized in early Feb. 1939 by Foreign Minister ARITA for carrying on diplomatic negotiations without his consent, he replied he was never cautioned. According to the Japanese system, there could have been no possibility of ARITA criticizing the army. Besides, he remembered no occasion of conducting negotiations without the Foreign Ministry's consent.

34126 Asked if he did not learn that the Foreign Minister charged in Feb. 1939 that OSHIMA sent a telegram to General Staff Headquarters concerning strengthening the Anti-Comintern Pact, the contents of which had not been made known to him, * the accused replied he had never heard of it and there was no such fact. When he was military attache, he sent no wires to the Foreign Office but only to the army. After becoming ambassador, he sent none to the army but only to the Foreign Office. He thought that NAKAJIMA was Deputy Chief of the General Staff in Feb. 1939. Asked if the Deputy Chief in early 1939 warned him that supreme authority of diplomacy was vested in the Page Emperor, he replied that the Deputy Chief had no authority to warn him nor was there ever such a fact, and he did not communicate with him either directly or indirectly about his conduct as ambassador.

34127 * Asked if SHIRATORI accompanied the ITO Commission from Italy to Berlin where he had various conferences with OSHIMA regarding the proposed Pact, he replied that he arrived later than the Commission but a conference was held. Asked if there were not many conferences between himself and SHIRATORI while the Commission was in Berlin, he stated that after the Commission's arrival, SHIRATORI and he listened to their explanations for two or three days.

34128 * There was no occasion of himself and SHIRATORI having frequent conferences while the ITO Commission was there. Asked if when the Commission delivered a draft to him of the Compromise Proposal if after studying it he made the statement to ITO that he was unable to convey such a proposal to the German Government for he deemed it far short of what he expected it to be, he replied no, he did not say so to him. Asked if ITO insisted on his delivering a proposal and upon receiving the German Government's opinion instead of his own, he replied that ITO said nothing of the kind.

34129 The accused was reminded that if as he had stated the Commission arrived in Feb. and he did not receive a counter-proposal from Japan until the latter part of March, that there was an interval * of more than a month. He was asked if in this interval he officially delivered to RIBBENTROP the draft proposal presented by the ITO Commission. He stated it was only natural that he should not have delivered officially the proposal inasmuch as he was in the midst of addressing opinions to the home government. He did not officially deliver to RIBBENTROP the draft proposal. In this interval he did not receive telegrams from ARITA instructing him to do as recommended by the government.

34130 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that a new instruction was received the end of March, revising the instructions brought by the ITO Commission, and where he described the alleged revision. When asked if the revision described in the affidavit was a revision attempted in June 1939 after the Five Ministers Conference of June 5, he replied it was absolutely not so. * The reply he received in March stated that matters should remain the same as far as Russia was concerned and was the same as in the original ITO Commission report. Asked if the reply stated that in regard to other countries, Japan would go farther than simply stating that the pact would be aimed at nations embracing communism in that Japan would give aid against those countries which would consist of military

Page advice,* he replied that was not so. Asked if by military advice 34131 was meant trading of intelligence, temporary leasing of bases, export of fuel oil and other commodities, and in general all aid outside of actual participation, he replied no.

(Reference was made to Exhibit 497)

34132 * Asked if he conferred at Rome with SHIRATORI and an Italian representative about 2 Apr. 1939 regarding the pact, he replied he did not remember the exact date but about that time he did go to Rome for a discussion. Asked if it was another meeting on the following day with RIBBENTROP who had been unable to reach the conference the day before, he replied that the Rome discussions were participated in only by SHIRATORI and himself, and that Italians and Germans did not participate. A day or two after he returned he met RIBBENTROP. SHIRATORI and himself had with them at their conference in Rome the ITO Commission Directive of Jan. 23 and the final directive of Mar. 25 which was the Japanese compromise proposal.

34133 * Asked if he did not recall that at the first conference either himself or SHIRATORI informed Count Ciano of the nature of the directives which he and SHIRATORI had received from Japan, he replied that he had never met or talked with Ciano. It was not a conference. He merely called on SHIRATORI and no Italians were present. SHIRATORI also did not confer with Ciano or any Italian representative. He heard that Ciano transmitted the directive and he did not inquire as to what Ciano replied when he received them.
Asked if the matter was not important enough for him to inquire as 34134 to the result of his * conference as far as Italy was concerned, he replied that the directives were transmitted after he returned to Berlin. Asked if he made any inquiry as to the result of the conferences between SHIRATORI and Ciano, he replied that he received notice that the directives had been transmitted from SHIRATORI.

There was no need of any further notification unless there were changes. Asked again if he inquired as to what occurred between SHIRATORI and Ciano or whether he afterward learned what occurred, he replied he did not learn. Asked if at the conference the next

34135 day with RIBBENTROP, if RIBBENTROP made the statement to him that the proposed pact was weak and * this was very disturbing, he replied that RIBBENTROP expressed his opinions but not that.

Asked if RIBBENTROP asked him if Japan was to participate in the war and he replied she probably would participate, the accused answered that that was not the reply he made, although it was the question RIBBENTROP asked him.

* Regarding his reply, the instructions he received from Japan was that although armed resistance would be given, it would not be effective. The instruction was that he was to convey that. That was vis-a-vis Third Powers outside Russia. Thereupon, RIBBENTROP asked him if Japan was going to participate in principle, and OSHIMA replied that inasmuch as Japan was speaking of armed assistance, it was recognized that she would participate in principle. However, inasmuch as the particulars would be incorporated in the secret protocol as to what Japan would do in specific cases when war actually arose, the fact that Japan recognized the point in principle might be understood. It was OSHIMA's understanding that Japan recognized participation in principle.

Asked if he learned that early in Apr. 1939 he was severely criticized by the Emperor for usurping the Emperor's prerogative in expressing an intention of participating in war, he replied he had never heard of it * and there was no possibility of such a thing arising. Asked if he did not also learn that the Foreign Minister recommended to the Emperor and to the Five Ministers Conference that the statements made by him and SHIRATORI should be rescinded as actions overstepping their limits, he replied he had never heard of it and no message was received as to rescinding anything.

He met with SHIRATORI on Hitler's birthday, Apr. 20, 1939, in Berlin, SHIRATORI having been invited. Asked if following this meeting he and SHIRATORI requested the government to recall them from Germany and Italy and the matter was considered at the Five Ministers Conference of 25 Apr. 1939, he replied there was no special occasion and there was no time when both of them tendered their resignations. Shortly after the Five Ministers Conference of 25 Apr. 1939, a further compromise proposal in the form of the HIRANUMA Declaration of * May 4 was delivered to the German and Italian plenipotentiaries in Tokyo, but it really could not be called a compromise proposal.

The accused was asked if within several days after the delivery of the HIRANUMA Declaration, if RIBBENTROP called him on the telephone from Munich on his way to meet Count Ciano and asked OSHIMA if when a contracting nation went to war against another, and even if there was no military aid from Japan, would it be permissible to recognize Japan as being in the state of war, to which OSHIMA had replied in the affirmative, the accused stated that he did not recall whether such a question was asked him by RIBBENTROP but granted he did reply that, since Japan had already recognized in principle her obligation to participate, there would be no possibility for him to go outside that scope in replying. Asked if RIBBENTROP arranged for a joint conference with him and SHIRATORI

Page in Berlin for 16 June 1939, he replied that about that time SHIRATORI came to Berlin and that both were invited to luncheon by RIBBENTROP but he did not recall the exact date. * He did not recall if at the conference, SHIRATORI said that the government's obstinacy in the question of exchanging notes as regards Japan's limited military capacity, forced him to conclude that the government was still making mental reservations with regard to a military alliance. OSHIMA said he held a conference with SHIRATORI the latter part of July or first of August at Lake Como. Asked if before holding the meeting, he and SHIRATORI issued a joint communique publicizing that such a conference was to be held, he replied that no joint communique was issued but he faintly recalled that newspapermen called on him. SHIRATORI, and not he, met the press.

34141 * Asked if the government neither suggested nor authorized the holding of such a conference or issuance of any public statement regarding it, he replied that there was no authorization or suggestion. He knew nothing about War Minister ITAGAKI's threatening to resign in early Aug. 1939 because of his inability to successfully advance a very strong military alliance with Germany and Italy which ITAGAKI, OSHIMA and SHIRATORI had been working for.

To the accused was quoted part of Exhibit 2198, a telegram of 11 Aug. 1939, from Ambassador OTT to RIBBENTROP, which stated that Chief of the Central Section of War Ministry, MACHIJIRI, who on the afternoon of 10 Aug. 1942, had requested he be received jointly by OTT and the Italian Ambassador, transmitted the following communication of the War Minister ITAGAKI: The army had resumed a bitter battle for alliance at the Five Ministers Conference of 8 Aug. but made no progress beyond the Japanese proposal of 5 June. The army had urgently striven for conclusion so as to reach an early and successful end to the China conflict, conform to popular wishes and alleviate present tension and prevent a serious reaction in the direction of an economically tempting settlement with England. These reasons were so compelling that ITAGAKI was resolved as a last resort to risk resignation which would almost certainly entail the resignations of OSHIMA and SHIRATORI. This action might gradually improve the basis for alliance, but would at first produce violent setback. Nevertheless, resignation was the only possible decision and was due to be reached 15 Aug.

After the above was read to him the accused was asked if it did not refresh his recollection regarding ITAGAKI's threat to resign, and he stated he had never heard of this.

34143 * From the same telegram, an additional part was quoted to the accused which stated that since the Cabinet confirmed the proposal of 5 June, ITAGAKI deemed an early conclusion attainable with Page the following mutual concessions: Berlin and Rome would declare to the Japanese Ambassador that the proposal of 5 June was acceptable with the provisos that they provide that no mental reservation was behind the wording; and that the verbal form of a Japanese supplementary statement be found. War Minister ITAGAKI than expected to express confirmation of this interpretation regarding the proviso concerning the mental reservation. Concerning the verbal form of the settlement, the verbal statement to be set forth in the protocol would be prominently mentioned. MACHIJIRI almost entreatingly requested concession before 15 Aug. ITAGAKI would communicate his demarche to O and SHIRATORI bypassing the Foreign Ministry.

34144 * After the above was read to OSHIMA, he stated he had never heard of it.

34145 * To the accused was read a part of a second telegram, Exhibit 2198, of 18 Aug. 1939, from OTT to RIBBENTROP, which stated that the domestic political following in the alliance question continued undiminished. Press reports of supposed compromise possibilities between the Foreign and War Ministers were inexact. In the last Five Ministers Conference, ARITA was assigned the task of again clearly fixing the text for the Japanese proposal of 5 June without any essential change. This draft was to be distributed among the participating Ministers and if accepted at the next Five Ministers Conference, was to be transmitted to the Ambassadors in Berlin and Rome for written delivery to governments.

ITAGAKI rejected the Foreign Minister's proposal and continued to insist on going beyond the proposals of 5 June. Since he was unable to break through the unanimous front of the other Ministers, he deemed a resignation unavoidable, according to the information from the War Ministry. ITAGAKI was strengthened by the pressure of junior officers, who were demanding unconditional alliance.

The accused was asked if reading the above did not refresh his recollection of ITAGAKI's views, and he stated he had not even heard of this.

34146 * In July 1939, OSHIMA's Naval Attache in Berlin was Capt. ENDO. The accused was asked if sometime in July, ENDO explained the Navy's position in regard to strengthening of the Anti-Comintern Pact to the Chief Secretary of the German Navy Ministry, wherein he stated that if war should break out between Germany and Italy and England and France, it would be fine if Japan maintained a friendly neutrality and that upon learning this from ENDO, OSHIMA became angry and inquired of STAEMER if RIBBENTROP knew it. He stated that this was not so.

Page Wiehl was Director of the Commerce Trade Bureau. He had no recollection of having a conference with him in Berlin on 21 Dec. 1938 in which Wiehl said that RIBBENTROP insisted that preferred treatment be given Germany as compared with third powers in China, and that this should be stipulated in writing in the Pro-Memoria regarding German-Japanese cooperation in China. Asked if Wiehl stressed in the conference that Germany was entitled to preferential treatment * 34147 not only politically but also economically and morally because of her aid given China, such as recall of military advisor, stoppage of war materials and losses resulting therefrom, he replied he had no recollection whether Wiehl said anything like that. Economic matters were in the hands of economic experts and even if they were brought to the Embassy's attention, it would be only by those experts. He did not recall declaring that he had always urged preferential treatment and that the Japanese Army was in favor of it.

 Asked if he recalled that in that conference, he told Wiehl that he had sent a wire report to Tokyo on 9 Dec. that preferential treatment should be granted in writing, he replied he had no recollection and by that he meant that any negotiations with Wiehl were conducted in principle * by the economic experts in the Embassy.
34148 However, it might be possible that the official in charge of economic affairs might have talked with Wiehl about such matters but he had no recollection of himself talking with Wiehl as he had almost no knowledge of economics. He may have sent such a wire to Tokyo on 9 Dec. but as such matters were entirely in the hands of the Economic Department, he had no recollection.

 Asked if he further informed Wiehl that he had sent letters to the same effect to leading personalities of the Japanese Army through a Japanese general who had recently visited Berlin, he replied he might have. Asked if, while a representative of the government, it was not true that he was Chief of all Japanese diplomatic representatives and intelligence * services in Europe, he replied no, that all ambassadors and ministers were independent of each other.

34151 Asked if he had not stated in his interrogation that one of the reasons he resigned as Ambassador was that he mistrusted the German leaders, * he replied that what he had stated was that they had hurt his feelings. He did not change his views in that regard either. Asked if he considered that the conclusion of the Pact created an extremely critical situation between the two governments, he replied he did not think so but it did cool their sentiments. He said the Japanese only filed a protest against Germany, and he lodged a protest twice with receipt of notification.

 * He identified the document which was Jan. 1940 issue of the "Bungei Shunju" and in it was an article entitled "The Idea of German Diplomacy" written by himself.

0 162 0003 5550

34153 * Exhibit 3516-A, the document thus identified by the accused stated that German diplomacy was Hitler's diplomacy. Hitler mentioned honor, equality, and freedom as the three principles of diplomacy and, in other words, endeavored bravely to improve such things as impaired Germany's honor, hindered her equality, and took her freedom away. The Versailles Treaty was against these principles. Germany tried hard to break off from this regime and the declaration of rearmaments, the denunciation of the Locarno Treaty, the occupation of the Rhineland, etc., had all come from these principles. Any obstacle to Germany's honor, equality, and freedom must be swept away.

In the complicated international relations of today, mere speech could not secure a country's safety. It could be understood that she had tried to maintain a strong army in a short time to carry out her diplomacy of three principles. She had often achieved bloodless victory because she attended to affairs, being prepared for war. The difficult work of the present reconstruction of Germany had been accomplished entirely because of the sagacity of the statesmen to perceive the development of things.

Page Decisions in the right moment, powerful army, perfect command with the whole nation under it. It deserved admiration that Germany had made herself what she was. Could it be considered that the bloodless diplomacy which dealt with Austria and dealt with Czecho-Slovakia twice, failed in its diplomacy by giving rise to the second world war by finally making a foe of England and France by annihilating * Poland on the pretext of the Danzig problem?

Diplomacy presupposes the other party. About its nature, it was adaptable to any changes to suit the occasion, and it was not necessarily right to think that German diplomacy failed or made a miscalculation in coming to the present war. Germany was always prepared for war and carried out all policies on that basis. She was determined to resort to arms at any moment according to the other parties' attitude to her when she carried out her own positive policies. In this way the victory of bloodless diplomacy came about and her firm resolution was the same as before.

There was nothing more necessary at present than such close connection of diplomacy and military force. The conclusion of the Nonaggression Treaty between Germany and Russia gave an impression that both countries were two crafty. OSHIMA thought that they could not rightly oppose this as the last measure Germany resorted to in her critical situation when by this means she would either be forced to make operations on two fronts, or by only one front, or be able to avoid war. Was not the Soviet at present desiring merely to advance to the Baltic Sea and reach a rapprochement with Japan in the Far East on the other? Diplomacy admitted of no conjectures, but he thought it possible at this juncture to make the Soviet wash her hands of China.

Hitler carried on diplomacy himself with Ribbentrop as a good assistant. While Hitler had had no experience as a diplomat, he had become a first-class personage and diplomat in the world. He studied histories and philosophical works while busy in state affairs, meditated hard and was devising all policies from the principles which had crystallized in his head. Ribbentrop was one * with Hitler and had a good understanding of Hitler's diplomatic belief, and it was not too much to say that German diplomacy lay in the hands of those two. Such being the case, quick daring diplomacy could be carried out which astonished the world. Ribbentrop had an acute intellect and a quick perception which Germans seldom had. He had a very strong will and was exactly the right diplomatic assistant who had no match in the positive diplomacy which was the upshot of the Nazis ideology.

Page Ribbentrop's trait was to spare no pains and he was truly a modern international statesman who handled matters quickly. Being active, he did not stick to trifles but tried to grasp main points in negotiations or disputes, and OSHIMA recognized his quick perception and he was quite a different type of statesman * from the so-called petty officials.

OSHIMA had much intercourse with Goering and other military men while a resident officer, and had been acquainted with Ribbentrop and other diplomats since becoming ambassador. These men impressed him that the Nazi leaders were settled in resolution and were young. Since the Munich disturbance in 1923 the Nazis had been under the oppression of communism and social democracy, had exposed themselves to constant danger, and had busied themselves to make the defeated Germany what she was today. This had trained them and made them statesmen, sincerely anxious about their country's future.

As Germans usually did, Hitler strongly trusted and respected Japan. He had political interests, but he depended much upon the Japanese nationality and character. Hitler paid attention to German history and traditions. Perhaps * because he knew a man could not perform his duty as a citizen unless he respected his country's history. It was quite natural that he respected Japanese history of 2600 years.

Hitler taught constant bravery and his speech of 1 September in the Reichstag he said, "Let Goering be commander when I am killed at the front; let Hess succeed Goering when he dies; and choose the bravest Nazi when Hess dies." He then went immediately to the front. The Japanese were likewise very brave and did not fear death. It was quite natural that even the parties concerned should be unable to foretell what would become of the European War. The prevalent view was that a modern war was a protracted national war and Germany was well aware of this.

Since she had entered into war it might be thought she was prepared for a protracted war and also had confidence in her operations to win it in a short time. However, victory was an uncertain affair. It was dangerous to judge the present war by * the standards of past wars. Each country was trying to localize the war and they must constantly watch how the world was moving, study war and ponder its results. Whether they were participants or not, all powers were affected by the war in question. The Japanese government at this juncture must establish national policies and exert itself to carry them out.

A far-sighted policy had to be formulated for future Japan so as to win the consent of the people. The European War occurred after a lapse of 25 years, and everyone must take this opportunity to lead Japan to greater prosperity in the world.

34162 The accused was asked if in January, 1940, the month after his return from a 5½ year sojourn in Germany if he knew of the founding of the Gestapo under Goering in 1933 and he replied that he didn't know when it was founded but knew of its existence. When asked if he knew Hitler's Mein Kampf, * teaching the right of pure Germans to dominate all races, and that force was necessary to solve international problems, had been used in the schools and colleges throughout Germany and distributed to all government officials, he replied he knew the book was widely read, but not that it was distributed in this way.

He knew it but did not know the cause of the murder without warning of those opposed to Hitlerism doctrines in the "Blood Bath" of June, 1934. Asked if this blood bath had its counterpart in Japan in the various assassinations between 1931 and 1936 of those who opposed the policy of the Japanese army, he replied that since he was not in Japan after 1934 he had no knowledge on which to base opinions with regard to these incidents.

34163 * Asked if he also witnessed the establishment of the notorious concentration camps in Germany and if he was familiar with the line of terror following, he replied that he knew of the camps but had never seen them and had heard rumours of maltreatment but had never investigated the facts. The accused was asked if with all this knowledge and more on his part, he prepared this article relating to the so-called Hitler diplomacy of honor, equality, and freedom for the purpose of aligning more closely the Japanese government and people with Hitlerite Germany, he replied no, there was no particularly deep meaning for writing the article. He wrote it because the Japanese at that time were interested in conditions in Germany and about German leaders. He wrote it to introduce the German's better side. In all things there were good and bad aspects and in this case he introduced the good aspects.

34164 * Reference was made to the article in which OSHIMA had asserted in effect that Germany had established a strong army in order that Hitler's three principles of honor, equality, and freedom would have the support of real power

34165 Asked if he considered these incidents and, as he had stated in his article, the annihilation of Poland on the pretext of the Dansig problem were the better parts of Germany he wanted to recommend to the Japanese people, he replied that in his thinking such matters as the significance of an incident of this kind should await the comments of future historians. Reminded that he himself was not awaiting on future history to comment and was imparting his conception * of Germany to both his government and people through this article, he explained that he wasn't urging it on the Japanese people nor was he helping history along by encouraging it and presenting it to them.

34166 What he had written in the article was the actual state of affairs. It was not true that he was trying to warm up relations between Germany and Japan, which had cooled off because of the Nonaggression Pact. He wrote it because there were many Japanese who desired to know about German conditions. He did not write it on his own volition, but the magazine company asked him to. He was never asked by * the General Staff or anyone connected with it.

Reference was made to the article where it described that Germany as a nation was prepared for war and was determined to resort to arms to carry out her positive policies. Asked if the same thing was not true in Japan after the Manchurian Incident, he replied that he thought any country was armed for any eventuality. Asked if in the article when he added "There is nothing more necessary at present than such close connection of diplomacy and military force" if he was advocating a military partnership between Japan and Germany in order that both might better carry out their positive policies, he replied that this was not a diplomatic document but article written at the behest of the magazine and had no deep significance. It was not written to influence Japanese policy.

34167 * It was not written with the purpose of advocating a military partnership to enable the two nations to carry out their positive policies.

Page Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that his constant idea was that a military alliance between Japan and Germany was meant to be used as a means in diplomatic negotiations, and he was asked if he did not actually mean, in keeping with the sense of this article, he would not hesitate to hold a loaded pistol to the head of his neighbor determined to pull the trigger if he refused to obey directions, he stated there was no connection between what he wrote in the magazine article and what he wrote in his affidavit with regard to this as a means in diplomatic negotiations.

34168 Asked if his statement in the article that Japan at this juncture must establish national policies and exert herself to carry them out was intended as a criticism and attack on those in the government who were opposed to the Tripartite alliance, he replied that because he was unfamiliar with conditions in Japan * he was not offering any concrete plans. He merely wrote in a very abstract manner that the Japanese should not be disturbed or remain confused. He was not advocating any alliance.

Asked if this public demand made by him that the government establish national policies reached fruition in the replacement of the YONAI Cabinet by the Second KONOYE Cabinet in July, 1940, and the conclusion by it of the tripartite pact on September 27, 1940, he replied that these incidents occurred one after another but he had no connection with them. Asked if after he returned to Japan from Germany he had conversations with SHIRATORI in which he discussed various aspects of the tripartite pact, he replied that being acquaintances they of course met but at no time did they combine together to promote a tripartite alliance.

34169 * Asked again if they talked on occasions about various aspects of the tripartite alliance, he replied that he thought there might have been such occasions but they never discussed any concrete measures for it. SHIRATORI at that time was still ambassador without assignment. SHIRATORI did not discuss with him from time to time about what was going on about the pact. The accused was asked if he hadn't stated shortly before that they had talked on the matter on occasions, and he replied that that wasn't so, that because they were acquaintances they had met socially and the subject might have come up, but they never discussed the subject of the tripartite pact in * particular.

Page negotiations for the pact begun at that time and Stahmer did not talk to him about it. OSHIMA said he had told Stahmer to go and discuss the matter with MATSUOKA. Stahmer said he had come with preparation to talk on the matter, to which OSHIMA replied he was in no position to be concerned with it so he had better see MATSUOKA. He thought Stahmer then went to see 34171 MATSUOKA. * Shortly after that OSHIMA was invited to dinner at the German embassy and Stahmer told him at that time that he was negotiating with MATSUOKA about the pact. He said that negotiations were under way and MATSUOKA wanted to issue a statement to which he, Stahmer, said that that would be troublesome or objectionable.

OSHIMA did not hear the contents of the matter broached by Stahmer, and they did not go further into the question. OSHIMA merely told him that he had better see MATSUOKA for he himself was not in a position to give assistance in the matter.
 34172 * Stahmer was not asking for his advice regarding the step in the negotiations, and he did not advise Stahmer to express his views clearly to MATSUOKA. If he were to give him advice he would first have to know the contents of the German proposal and what MATSUOKA said in regard thereto. When he told Stahmer to express his views to MATSUOKA clearly to matters it was not advice, it was merely only a reply in the course of the conversation.

Asked if he was drawing a distinction between advising him and telling him to do it, he replied he was only saying that he did not feel that he gave any views. Asked if MATSUOKA or either of the diplomatic councilors of the Foreign Office, SHIRATORI and SAITO, were present at the conference at the 34173 German * Embassy, he replied that no one was there. Only he himself was invited to the dinner. However, Ott was present.

34174 * He did not know if the signing of the tripartite pact and the formation of the IRAA was jointly celebrated by Japanese and Germans throughout Japan on Sunday morning, 13 October 1940. He was not present at any such occasion. Asked if he was in favor of the tripartite pact, he replied that he supported it because it had been decided on national policy and supported by the Japanese at large. At the time of its conclusion he expressed favor of it.

34175 Asked if there were substantial elements in Japan which did not approve of the pact he replied that since this question was important, he knew there were some who opposed it, he * thought there would be some opposition to it, but he didn't realize there were as many opponents as he learned about before this Tribunal. Asked what means were used by government leaders to silence this opposition, he replied that being out of office he knew nothing.

Page Asked if he did not know that an Imperial edict was secured which had the effect of compelling the Japanese nation to follow the provisions of the alliance, and if he didn't so inform Hitler or Ribbentrop, he replied that he made no such report, but the Imperial Rescript was used to unify the people and of this he had informed the leaders of Germany upon his return to that country.

34176 Asked if he advised the Emperor be used in this manner, he replied that being out of office he had no connection with such matters. To the accused was quoted a part of exhibit 562, a telegram from Ott of 31 January 1939, which stated that "Unity of government and nation* behind the Tripartite Pact has been unmistakably proved in the Diet negotiations." Asked what he did to secure the unity of the Government and nation behind the pact, he replied he did nothing.

34177 * When handed a document, the witness conceded that it was a copy of the November, 1940, issue of the magazine
34178 Dai-Asia Shugi, * which included an article entitled, "Tripartite Alliance and the United States" written by him. He had no recollection as to ever having given such a talk to a representative of the magazine. It appeared that the article was based on something he said somewhere else. Asked if he had not said in his article that he had published an article in the fall of 1940 in this magazine, he replied that his recollection was that he spoke of two other magazines and not the "Dai-Asia Shugi Magazine."

34179 His name was printed here, but he had no recollection of the article. Probably it was the society in which the accused MATSUI was associated, but * he had no connection with this society at all. After looking at the contents of the article, however, the accused stated it appeared to be something written by him and it appeared that the magazine was published by the Greater Asia Association. It was true that it stated there that the following accused were officials of this association: MATSUI, Iwane, HIROTA, Koki, SHIRATORI, Toshio, and MATSUCKA, Yo'usuke, and SUZUKI, Teiichi.

34180 Exhibit 3517-A, the document so identified stated
34181 that the fact that the tripartite alliance was concluded recently and the Imperial Rescript graciously * promulgated, truly fills one with gratitude. In Japan they had always striven for the manifestation of Hakko Ichiu. The Sino-Japanese War, the Russo-Japanese War,

Page and the Manchurian Incident were carried out with this spirit. Needless to say the present China Incident was too being carried out with the idea of improving China and trying to establish a new order in East Asia. *In Europe too the object of Germany and Italy in starting the recent war was quite different from those of previous ones. Hitler had said God did not create the world for one or two races and those that were born into the world had the right to live at the same time. The world's resources existed to realize the right of mankind to live. The term "right" was an incorrect expression, but his idea was to enable all people to obtain their place in the world. After the commencement of the European War, Hitler said that its aim lay in the establishing of a new order in Europe which excluded the restrictive interference of England.

In this way, the war aims of Germany and Italy lie in correcting the illogicality of the old system. It was similar to the Japanese object in dealing with the China Incident and this is why the alliance was concluded. In other words, Germany and Italy also comprehended the manifestation of Hakko Ichiu, which is the great spirit of the Japanese national foundation. Consequently the alliance differed from the previous ones. *Looking at history they could see that, up until now, there had been many treaties with various nations, but they were all concluded to fulfill personal desires and Britain was a good example of this.

34183

* The fact that the recent alliance was concluded with the grand object of establishing a new world order was a great feature of the treaty. They must fully realize this and OSHIMA believed that the entire nation must unitedly support the government to make the treaty effective and appropriate. Concerning its contents, in it Germany and Italy recognized and respected Japan's leadership in Greater East Asia. Since the Meiji Era, Japan, as the stabilizing force, had contributed to the happiness of the peoples of East Asia, and was striving further for this.

34184

If Japan did not exist, what would have been the condition of East Asia. There were countries in the world where culture developed early. These countries had advanced to Africa, America, and finally to Asia, and many Asiatics had been conquered by * the leading European and American nations. Conditions of semi-colony or of slavery have come about, and natural resources had been monopolized. The fruits of the natives had been taken away by the American and European nations. Their force knew no limit, and at one time the partitioning of China was even advocated. However, Japan by herself had been stopping and preventing the greed and ambition of them.

Page Recent changes in the world situation had intermingled the interests of the various nations. Since the establishment of the new order in East Asia was influenced by situations in Europe and America, he believed that the conclusion of the alliance was extremely advantageous for accomplishing their plans. The alliance was advantageous to Japan. But they must give cooperation to the establishment of the new order of Germany and Italy and responsibilities had become greater.

34186 How to realize Japan's leading position * or what sort of a new order should be established in leading East Asia? This was a grave mission. The conditions in NEI and FEI and perhaps India and the South Sea Islands must be improved. It was essential that they immediately plan with Germany and Italy an established concrete policy. The question of the understanding in the treaty concerning attacks made by third Powers not connected with the present conflict was in line with frequent government statements that the treaty would not have war as its object. Anyone could see this by reading the text. But according to the newspapers and cables, it seemed that the people of the U.S. claimed the treaty was a challenge.

34187 This was puzzling since it was common knowledge that Japan had never thought of laying a hand on any U.S. territory or made any preparations for it. * For three years Japan had devoted herself to settling the China Incident and so what need had she of making an enemy of the U.S. The U.S. herself should fully understand this. They could not help but conclude that to regard this treaty as a challenge to the U.S. meant either that she was unhappy about the establishment of a new order in East Asia or that she harbored an ambition towards East Asia.

34188 The U.S. was by no means the judge of the world. If she, rich in resources and productive power, crossed the Pacific and thought of advancing into East Asia, it would violate the law of nature and would be fully punished by Heaven. The preamble of the treaty mentioned that there should be no hesitancy to cooperate with any country wishing to establish a new order. If the U.S. truly desired peace, she would cooperate in a new order in East Asia. If the U.S. thought she could make Japan * yield by threats, it was a great mistake. The U.S. attitude was practically unbearable ever since the outbreak of the China Incident, but Japan had been devoting itself to settlement and had been awaiting tolerantly the U.S. to reconsider. The U.S. must consider the tripartite alliance an opportunity for her reconsiderations. The Japanese were a patient people, but there was a limit. If the U.S. with her rich resources would

Page endeavor to establish a new order on the American continent and would carry out a fair policy of exchanging resources with other continents, then not only she would contribute to world peace, but also much happiness would be brought to the American people.

Asked if in the previous article (exhibit 3516-A) the great weight of his influence was again used in another critical period in an effort by this article to unify both the Government and the Nation behind the Tripartite Pact, he replied he did not think those two articles could have such an influence on society. The latter article was written on the basis of the Imperial rescript and the statement issued by the Japanese Government generally.

34190 * Reference was made to the article where it was stated that the alliance was concluded with the object of establishing a new order constituting the great feature of the treaty, and he was asked what provisions of the treaty provided for this. He answered that not being a drafter of the treaty, all that he knew was what he learned later, and from his own studies of this alliance pact. In the article there is a phrase, "To enable each and every people to have their proper place in the world," and the ideal of the new order was expressed therein. That was what he was referring to in his article.

34191 To the accused was read the exact language of the provision of the preamble relating to the new order which stated that the three governments had made it a fundamental principle to establish a new order for coprosperity of its own race in Great Asia and Europe, and to maintain the same end had reached the decision to cooperate and coassist each other in carrying out this basic fundamental in each respective field. Asked if this was the provision which constituted the great feature of the treaty, he replied that since several years had elapsed since the conclusion of the pact, he could not recall with exactitude * the language in the preamble. However, the expression the "new order" was the new feature of the treaty.

Page To the accused was quoted another part of the treaty which stated that Japan, Germany and Italy would agree to cooperate with one another in carrying out the aforementioned policy. Asked if this new feature he spoke of was the new order provided for in the preamble and which was implemented by the provision just read, he replied that the three Powers should cooperate for the new order was not all. Its establishment was the ideal and for this purpose various steps were to be taken.

34192 * He had been asked in what sense does this pact contain new features, and so he spoke of the conception of the new order as mentioned in the preamble, but he had not 34193 spoken as to what the new order meant. * The new order expressed the desire to create a new and unoppressed society. Asked what Hitler and Mussolini did to carry out this fundamental principle of a new order, he replied he thought that what they were doing accorded with the principle.

34194 Asked if, in other words, Hitler and Mussolini continued to wage the war of aggression in Europe at the time of the conclusion of the pact, * he replied that depended on different individuals in the way they look at it. He himself did not necessarily consider this action aggressive. As to the matter whether this was an aggressive war, he replied that it had no direct connection with Japan so he had made no detailed investigation.

34195 * There were efforts made at Geneva to define the word aggression and a treaty was created but not one country ratified it. Asked if with all his experience and knowledge of German affairs if there was any doubt in his mind that 34196 the annihilation of Poland on the pretext of the Danzig affair was aggressive or defensive, * he replied that even Geneva was unable to decide the meaning of the word so it was unreasonable to ask him to define the term. However, it was undeniable that it was Germany that opened the attack on Poland.

34197 The accused was reminded that Hitler's General Order No. 24 (exhibit 573, T. 6470) provided that the aim of the cooperation based on the Three-Power Pact must be to bring Japan as soon as possible to active operations in the Far East. Asked if in his interrogation he had not stated that by the issuance of this order, Hitler may have intended to invoke the statement in the preamble about the building of a new order in East Asia. He replied that he did not answer in that sense. He did not know how the other party replied and did not even know of such an order.

Page When the question was repeated, he replied that he never thought of it in that way and did not know how Hitler thought. He had no recollection of making such a reply in his interrogation. To the accused was read a part of his interrogation why Hitler did issue such an order and base collaboration upon the 34198 Pact unless there was something in it or an understanding * between Japan and Germany, he replied that he did not know why Hitler said so. Maybe he intended to invoke the statement in the preamble about the building of a new order in East Asia but he did not know.

Asked if he made that answer to the question that had been read to him, he replied there must be some mistake. He had no recollection of having made such a reply. It was true that he showed Hitler a military map of Singapore containing the location of field fortifications and gun emplacements, but he never discussed with him the method of attack. Hitler asked how long it would take to reduce Singapore but there was no discussion of the difficulties of an attack.

The accused was asked if in his interrogation he did not justify the delivery of the map by stating that it was in 34199 accord with the agreement * at the time of the conclusion of the tripartite pact. Even if he did say so, however, he thought that what he did was justifiable for there should be nothing wrong in showing them a map in answer to their wish.

Asked if that was what he considered to be in conformity with the fundamental principle of the pact relating to the establishment of a new order, he replied there was no connection whatsoever.

* Asked what Japan did to carry out the fundamental principle of the pact relating to the establishment of the new order, he stated that although the idea of the principle was one of the pact's purposes, work did not proceed to the point where it was concretely materialized. Asked if this was because they lost the war, he replied it was his interpretation that Japan engaged in a war of self-defense and not for the purpose of creating a new order.

Asked if Japan did not continue the war with China which had been in progress for many years prior to the conclusion of the pact, he stated that Japan referred to these hostilities as the China Affair, but it was true that they continued. Asked if Japan continued its efforts to establish the new order in East Asia under the pact's provisions by military occupation of FIC, where naval and air bases were secured, he replied that because he was then in Germany he could not testify with regard to the details of what Japan was doing or for what purpose she did certain things, because he was not informed.

Reminded that in his article in the November 1940 issue of Dai-Asia Shugi (exhibit 3517), he informed the Japanese nation it was necessary that they cooperate * in the establishment of the New Orders of Germany and Italy, he was asked if this was not based on these provisions of the Pact. He answered that the pact had been concluded and a Rescript and government statement issued, and his statement in the article was a mere repetition of what had already been announced. He had not referred to what must be done concretely to carry out the pact, but was mentioning these matters more as an idea.

The accused was asked if Article 3 of the pact, regarding aid in the event of an attack by a power not presently engaged in war was, in fact, designed as a cloak and shield to protect the participating powers in the course of conduct in which they were then engaged in Europe and China, and he stated that not having participated in the drafting of the pact he did not know what the actual intentions were, but his understanding was that there was no intention of concealing anything.

* The accused was reminded that exhibit 559 was a memorandum between Japan, Germany, and Italy dated 20 December, 1940, providing for the establishment of a military commission and an economic commission. Asked if he was head of the General Commission embracing these two, he stated, yes, but just as a member as there was no chairman.

His commission was not charged with the responsibility of determining in the event of war whether a party to the pact had been attacked within the meaning of Article 3. Its work was to assemble all possible data, report it to the home government, and the decision was to be made by the latter.

* To the accused was quoted a part of his interrogation. In it he had been asked if it was not a mutual aid pact providing in effect that if one of the three was attacked then the other two would help the one attacked. He had replied that in substance he knew that was what it meant. The right to decide whether one of the signatories was attacked and whether the others would furnish aid was left to the commission. If the U. S. and Germany had gone to war, for instance, Japan was not obligated to furnish aid unconditionally. The commission was to decide whether the attack had occurred or not.

34206

Asked if the above question and answer had not been given, he stated that such a question and answer took place, but there must have been some misinterpretation. The memorandum clearly stipulated that the decision was to be made by the contracting powers. * It would be quite possible for the question as to who attacked would come up for discussion at the general commission conference, but the procedure was that reports of the data be sent to the home governments to make the decision. The general commission was never called into session to determine who was the aggressor between a party to the pact and a third power.

He was asked if he received a joint order from the War, Navy, and Foreign Ministers when the commission was established under the pact which changed the existing rule relating to ambassador's duties by providing that in the case of the ambassador to Germany permission was given to discuss matters of a military nature with German officials if the military and naval attaches and members of the military commission accompanied the ambassador to such conferences. The accused explained that the duties were not changed, and there was no change in the principle that the ambassador, being a civil official, was not to participate * in military matters; because, however, high command matters were not handled in Germany and Italy as they were in Japan, if such matters were ever to come up for discussion at the meeting of the general commission it was unavoidable that the ambassador must take up the matter and restriction was placed so that the ambassador on such occasion must be accompanied by the attaches.

Page

Told that the question was not confined to the meetings of the commission but referred to discussions generally with German officers, the accused stated that this was the power given to the ambassador in discussing at the general commission, and he was not given power to discuss military matters with German officials generally.

Asked if he did not frequently discuss military matters with Hitler, Ribbentrop, and other high ranking Germans without having present at such conferences any of the officials required under the joint order, he replied * that at times the Germans brought up matters of general nature, but they were never discussed when they came up as they did not require negotiations with the Japanese government, he transmitted them to the military and naval attaches, who in turn communicated with their Tokyo headquarters.

34209

* Asked if, in other words regarding military matters he was a mere embassy messenger, he replied that military matters were spoken of, but the scope was very wide. There were some such matters in the competence of a civil official, but there were also military matters of a very special nature requiring handling by military men. With respect to the latter, he did act as a sort of messenger boy. As far as most matters were concerned, they were discussed and disposed of between the attaches and the competent military and naval officials of the German side.

34210

Asked if on 2 January 1942, he informed Ribbentrop that he had received instructions permitting him to concentrate in his hands all questions regarding the general line of cooperation in a common war, and that only * questions of details in military and economic fields would be dealt with by the military and economic member of the special commission under the Tripartite Pact, he stated he received no such instructions. The Germans did desire that he have such instructions, but the Japanese system did not permit them. The general commission, the economic commission, and the military commission were independent. The general commission could seek the cooperation of the others, but had no power to command.

34211

Asked again if he didn't recall that at this conference Ribbentrop said he welcomed the concentration of authority in his hands because it switched the center of gravity of the Tripartite Commission to Berlin, he replied he didn't recall exactly, but did know that * Ribbentrop had such ideas.

Page

He didn't recall that at a conference with Hitler on the next day, 3 January, Hitler said he would discuss military affairs only with OSHIMA personally. He didn't say to Hitler at that occasion that he was empowered by his government to discuss the prosecution of the war with Ribbentrop. He was only empowered with handling political aspects, and he thought he naturally told Hitler this.

34212

* Asked if he didn't further state to Hitler that while individual questions might be discussed between the army, air force, and navy, it was of prime importance that the principal policy be laid down exclusively by himself and the Foreign Minister, he replied that he didn't know the expression used, but he thought he himself said that policy matters were under his charge. Asked if this was not in fact actually done and often matters of prime importance and principal policies were settled by him and Ribbentrop, he replied that they talked, but there was no case of deciding new policy.

34213

He didn't recall stating to Hitler that this same method should be applied to economic and political questions, but it was within his authority to handle them. Prior to Pearl Harbor, Japan and Germany, on a small scale, exchanged raw materials for use in the wars then being waged by those two countries. * So far as his own participation was concerned, they did not exchange military and technical knowledge prior to Pearl Harbor. If this took place, it probably was between the respective armies and navies.

34214

* He had stated in his affidavit that he approved the exchange of culture between Japan and Germany, but this did not include scientific knowledge and inventions useful in the waging of war. Asked if many German agents migrated to Japan between 1938 and 1942 in the guise of business men, technicians, teachers, etc., for the purpose of instructing the Japanese in the Nazi way, he replied that so far as he knew there was no case in which Germans were employed as teachers in Nazi methods. He knew that some technicians were employed to study technical matters. The period referred to included the period in which he was a military attache in Germany. At least during his tenure, not one German officer came to Japan as an instructor.

Asked if there were not many officers in the army and navy sent to Germany for study, he replied that * they sent young officers not only to Germany, but to France, Italy, U. S., Britain, and other countries. So far as he knew, there was no Japanese army officer who studied at a German university.

Civilians studied at various universities, and there may have been some at Munich University. Asked if Karl Haushofer was known as the leading German authority on Japan and if his works were read and studied by Japanese both in Germany and Japan, he replied that in Germany he was one of those who knew Japan, but could not say whether his works were read widely in Japan. Asked if he had not stated in his interrogation that his works were read widely by Japanese students in Japan and Germany, he * replied that his works were read by Germans in Germany and to some extent by Japanese in Germany, but they had no influence whatsoever in Japan.

The accused was told that in his news article of January 1940, (exhibit 3516-A), he had referred to the possibility that the Soviet desired to reach a rapprochement with Japan in the Far East after the conclusion of the German-Russian Non-Aggression Pact. Asked if it was to * be understood by this that in January 1940, he favored a rapprochement with Japan and the USSR, he stated he had no recollection, but did desire it.

34217

Asked if shortly after his return to Germany in February 1941, on his second mission as ambassador, if he learned of the probability of a German attack on Russia, he stated he did not imagine such a thing at that time. He had no conference with Hitler in February or March 1941, in which Hitler advised him that Germany probably would attack Russia. However, when MATSUOKA came to Berlin, * either Hitler or Ribbentrop said something to that effect, although very vaguely, at a meeting which he attended.

* Asked if he recalled telling his naval attache, YOKOI, in March 1941, of a conference with Hitler in which Hitler told OSHIMA of the probability of a German attack on Russia, he replied that he probably told YOKOI of a conversation between MATSUOKA and the German leaders, but the meaning was different. The question suggested that the German attack on Russia was already decided, but the expression used by Hitler or Ribbentrop was not that certain, but very vague. Aside from any direct statement to him by German leaders on this matter, OSHIMA did have reason to believe from the concentration of large bodies of troops on the Russian border and extensive military preparations that Germany would probably attack Russia. The reason he considered this probability was on the basis of the great increase in forces, but could not arrive at the conclusion that such movements would inevitably lead to war.

* It was his impression the latter part of March and early April that the relations between Germany and Russia were undergoing a change. Asked if he did not conclude that in the light of that situation it would be better to think things over carefully before Japan and Russia should enter into a non-aggression pact, he replied they must not be too hasty.

34222

Reminded that he had testified, (T. 34147), that economic matters were entirely in the hands of economic experts and that (T. 34148) he had almost no knowledge of economics, he was asked if it was not true that he was very active in economic cooperation in the joint pursuit of war. He replied that with the war traffic between Germany and Japan completely suspended, there was no economic cooperation. Regarding his activities and negotiations relating to economic matters, he handled these when instructions came from the government, but because of the * suspension of traffic he had no recollection with regard to his activities in this, as there was nothing to negotiate about.

He didn't recall, but might have presented a memorandum suggesting certain concrete negotiations regarding the mutual use of German and Japanese economic power, at a conference with Ribbentrop on 2 January 1942. Asked if he recalled presenting a plan providing for a German credit to Japan of one billion yen and a provisional credit of fifty million yen to enable Japan to obtain machines and factory equipment, he replied he didn't recall, but there may have been such. Plans on matters of this kind were prepared and drawn up by the economic section of the embassy, and he merely took the document when he approached German officials.

* Asked if he acted purely on his own initiative in presenting the plan and without government authority, he replied he had no correct recollection, but that was not quite possible. He did not recall if Ambassador Ott and Wohltat, on 23 January 1942, questioned his authority to initiate the plan. He had never seen the telegram from Ribbentrop to Ott questioning the authority, nor heard of it through German sources.

Page Asked if MATSUSHIMA, head of the Economic Division, informed Wiehl on 24 January 1942 that OSHIMA had presented a draft of the economic treaty of assistance without his 34226 * government's approval, because OSHIMA believed it would unduly delay the credit arrangement if the Japanese government's consent would have to be obtained first. he replied it was true that MATSUSHIMA was in charge of Embassy economic questions and was drawing up various plans, but he didn't recall their contents. However, assuming this was so, it was quite possible for such matters to be brought up in bargaining with the Germans, but he could not give any definite views.

34227 Asked if he didn't present that plan of economic assistance without first obtaining authority from his government, he replied he didn't recall, and there would be no possibility of an occasion for it. * He didn't recall himself and Ribbentrop discussing future economic cooperation between the European-African sphere under Germany and Italy's leadership and the East Asia sphere under Japan's leadership, at a conference on 23 March 1942. He didn't recall their contemplating the establishment of an economic agreement between the three aimed at establishing advantages and privileges to the exclusion of the U. S. as much as possible.

34228 Asked if he recalled at a conference between himself and Ribbentrop on 9 May 1942, that Ribbentrop's position was that the Tripartite Pact was the starting point for all economic and political discussions and plans for international relations, even after the period of the war, he replied Ribbentrop might have, but he didn't recall, nor did he recall enthusiastically concurring in Ribbentrop's statement.

* He didn't recall that he envisaged war with the U. S. in the field of economy by a Japanese-German pact. to be enforced after the shooting war ended. He didn't recall in this conference of 9 May 1942, discussing the facilitation of economic cooperation between the two great economic areas defined in the Tripartite Pact by establishing strict control of the economy of those nations. Asked if the discussion did not even extend to the question of how they would control the economy of independent states located within the spheres defined under the pact, he replied there would be no occasion for discussing such a thing, nor did he recall discussing it.

He didn't recall a discussion going to the extent that it involved a plan on the part of the Axis to exert influence on independent states so as to compel regulation of their individual economies.

* He didn't recall himself and Ribbentrop at this conference agreeing that so far as the U. S. and Central and South American countries were concerned, a binding arrangement should be made that after the war the resumption and continuation of economic relations should only take place after mutual agreement between Japan, Germany, and Italy.

When handed exhibit 50, an announcement by the Board of Information of the agreement between Japan and Germany concerning economic cooperation, he recalled that * there was an economic agreement similar to that mentioned in the document, and it was also true that all economic agreements signed in Germany were signed on his own responsibility. He thought he signed this exhibit. He did not handle economic negotiations, but had the responsibility for them. He thought probably that this was the same economic agreement of assistance to which he had referred in his affidavit as being concluded in January 1943, but didn't recall the contents.

34231

* Asked whether there was a secret protocol, he replied he didn't think there was any secret agreement attached to an economic agreement, and didn't recall there being a secret protocol. After MATSUOKA's return to Japan in April 1941, he received notification for the first time in the latter part of May, that talks were being conducted between Japan and the U. S., nor was he aware before this that talks were being conducted.

34232

* He didn't oppose the diplomatic policy of MATSUOKA with regard to the U. S. Asked if he didn't inform MATSUOKA that in his opinion Japan would lose the chance of establishing her leadership in East Asia if Japan concluded the anticipated agreement with the U. S., he replied he didn't state anything to him in that manner,

34233

* He did submit to MATSUOKA two plans he prepared from the German viewpoint, one contemplating the refusal of the U. S. proposal and the other binding the U. S. to abandon the convoy patrol plan. He also reminded MATSUOKA that the European war was developing favorably for Germany, and in a few months very important developments were expected.

He said something to MATSUOKA that if Japan should lose the confidence and trust of Germany and Italy it would be very unfortunate for Japan.

34234 Asked if he didn't also suggest to MATSUOKA that his policy was two-faced diplomacy which would lead Japan to international isolation during the critical period which might arise after the war, he replied he didn't think that MATSUOKA's policy was two-faced, but did say that this * would result if he did undertake a two-faced diplomacy. It was not true that he was doing all he could in presenting his views to MATSUOKA to discourage and defeat a rapprochement between Japan and the U. S.

Asked if he did not explain to MATSUOKA his apprehension that should Japan lose this opportunity to expand southward and the possibility of attacking Singapore she would invite the contempt of England and America and also Germany and Italy and if he did not urge this explanation to discourage negotiations between Japan and the U. S., he replied he made no efforts to discourage anything. He informed MATSUOKA of these matters, but there were important preliminary remarks.

Asked if he did not charge that if MATSUOKA persisted in this policy it would mean Japan had abandoned her mission to establish a new order in East Asia, he replied he didn't say the mission would be abandoned if MATSUOKA's diplomacy were continued. The opinion which he sent to MATSUOKA was to secure neutrality of the U. S. and seek a rapprochement with her. Asked if he didn't then call upon MATSUOKA to establish the idea of the Tripartite Pact by upholding the principle that Japan was to facilitate the battle of Germany and Italy against Britain, he replied that this was Japan's natural obligation under the Tripartite Pact, and for this purpose it was necessary to have the U. S. remain neutral. As Ambassador in Germany, he was instructed to act with the Pact as the standard, and it was therefore his obligation to see to it that Japan did not violate this, but he did not undertake to control the diplomacy of the government by his communications to MATSUOKA.

* Asked if he did not state to MATSUOKA that he begged him to take these circumstances under consideration, he replied he sent a wire to MATSUOKA with the intention that he would give it his consideration. (Attention of the Tribunal was called to exhibit 1075).

He didn't know if early in May 1941, MATSUOKA contemplated a trip to the U. S. regarding these matters. When handed a document purporting to be a telegram of 4 May 1941, from OSHIMA to MATSUOKA marked "secret", he stated the message was sent from the Embassy in Berlin and naturally would come under his direction, but it was purely a rumor.

* Exhibit 3518, the document so identified, stated that a rumor that MATSUOKA was planning to go to the U. S. was lately in circulation, and on 30 April the Domei newspaper carried the speech of ISHII to the effect that Germany and Italy would be asked if they objected to MATSUOKA's trip to the U. S. and that the U. S. was a neutral nation. This gave the people an impression that the rumor was well grounded. It was now common sense that the U. S. had completely become a hostile country against Germany and Italy by aiding Britain. At this time when German papers were severely attacking Britain and the U. S. the German Government had made no expression of her will outwardly on this rumor and the papers are keeping silence. It could be judged that they had great concern inwardly. OSHIMA asked MATSUOKA therefore to inform him of the truth by return cable.

* He thought his military attache in May 1941 was Lt.Gen. BANZAI. Asked if he discussed with BANZAI his objection to MATSUOKA's proposed visit to the U. S., he replied he had not objected to it. He didn't recall discussing the question with BANZAI, nor did he convey any information to BANZAI to lead him to the conclusion that there was a possibility of his resigning as ambassador.

When handed a document, he stated it was a telegram sent by the attache to the General Staff. He had no knowledge of it whatsoever. The military attache, BANZAI, on his own, entertained a feeling whether MATSUOKA's proposed trip would come to pass. It was written by BANZAI, but he did not know with what meaning he wrote it.

* It appeared to be a document from the Army to the Foreign Office for reference, but was not in the normal Foreign Office form. There was a Foreign Office seal on the document, but it was an army telegram, and he thought it was referred to the Foreign Office for reference.

34244 OSHIMA. *Exhibit 3519, the document so identified being a reply to exhibit 3518, OSHIMA's telegram, stated that concerning this matter, MATSUOKA had received several inquiries from the German and Italian Ambassadors in Japan. Though the U.S. may presumably want him to visit America, he had no such intention.
He replied to both ambassadors to this effect and had them cable this to their governments.

When he was asked questions by Japanese pressmen he answered that since he was very well acquainted with matters concerning the U.S., there was no necessity to visit there but would rather have Roosevelt and Hull visit Japan to rectify 34245 their cognizance of Japan. * OSHIMA was to let both attaches know about this.

The accused stated that he did not recall but naturally thought he informed Attache BANZAI about MATSUOKA's message.
When he informed BANZAI he did not discuss with him the reason for the message from MATSUOKA to him and he did not learn then that BANZAI had sent through a message to Japan regarding the matter. The reply from the foreign office was to his own telegram and he presumed he showed it to the two attaches. He did not talk with BANZAI about it.

34246 When handed a document * the accused recognized it as a copy of the secret protocol in connection with the economic agreement for assistance between Japan and Germany and it was received in evidence as exhibit 3520. (Read in evidence later, 34248 T. 34267.) * The accused stated that he conferred with Ribbentrop on 23 February 1941 but did not know whether he discussed with him plans for close cooperation in all spheres of activity in carrying on the war. There were plans discussed, particularly with regard to new service and newspapers.

He did not recall Ribbentrop's suggestion that cooperation should be in the same manner as was already being done in Italy, Rumania, Hungary, Slovakia, and Bulgaria, although that matter was discussed. He did not recall himself stating that he intended to create a plan for more intensive Japanese propaganda. His reason for so stating was that such matters were brought up for discussion but because they were not carried out, they did not remain in his memory.

Asked if he recalled setting up a newspaper division within the embassy and Minister SAKUMA was brought over from 34249 Japan to take * charge, he replied it was true that SAKUMA came to the Japanese Embassy as chief of the press division, but he did not come for that purpose. He did this as a part of his work. The results of the propaganda work in the embassy in Berlin were not sent to Japan. Asked what the source of the information used in the propaganda was, he replied that publicity activities were actually not carried out but they gave information coming from Japan to the news agencies in Germany.

34250 He did not recall discussing a general plan of extension in Japan of the propaganda idea with Ott in Germany in March, 1941. The question * might have been broached but he had no recollection. (Reference was made to exhibit 571.) He did not recall in his discussion with Ott approving a plan drafted by the German Foreign Ministry which provided in part for the building of a demonstration hall in Tokyo, however he wanted to state that because there was a project under discussion with reference to the erection of a Japan-German Association building in Japan, the subject might have been brought up.

34251 The purpose of intensification of propaganda was to foster good will between Germany and Japan. Asked if he had a conversation with Ribbentrop shortly prior to 4 January 1942 regarding cooperation between the Axis and Japan in the field of propaganda directed especially toward India and the Arabian countries, * he replied that he recalled discussion in connection with India and other countries, but none of the things discussed were ever carried out.

Asked if a joint military commission was set up in December 1941 to decide matters of tactics and operations, he replied he did not participate in the establishment of it, and as far as he knew he had not heard that it was held. He had never heard of the military commission of which NOMURA and YOKOI and BANZAI were the Japanese members, and Keitel and Doenitz the German representatives. This was not a military commission because the Italian representatives were not mentioned in connection with it.

34252 * Such persons often met, but this was entirely outside the scope of his duties and they had no responsibility to report to him. The group should not be called a military commission for they merely undertook the discussion of routine matters between the military and naval attaches and the military and naval authorities on the German side.

Page. The agreement between Japan, Germany, and Italy of 18 January 1942, dividing the world into two zones for military and naval operations, was not merely a military agreement. OSHIMA, as a civil official, had nothing to do with it. Asked if it was not true that a common code was arranged for the use of the Japanese and German navies, he replied that after the agreement was concluded, he heard informally that methods of communications had been decided upon.

34253 * Asked if he was informed in a conference between himself and Hitler of 3 January 1942 of the German invention of a new armor-piercing hollow grenade, and if it was not offered by Hitler to Japan, he replied there was some talk of a matter of a similar nature. This talk was that a new shell that was capable of piercing a tank had been created and was to be presented to Japan. He talked of the matter to the military attache and all negotiations thereafter with the German army were conducted by the attache. He did hear that this shell was given to Japan.

34254 He had no recollection but thought Hitler entertained such an idea as stressing the importance of the exchange of military activities. Asked if he did not enthusiastically agree with this idea and if he did not state that the Japanese army was skilled in landing operations, having carried them out for 50 years, and offered to the German army Japanese officers who were experts in army operations, he replied he had no recollection, but * since the carrying out of operations had been decided, he presumed he mentioned something to that effect.

He did not recall that the Japanese army did seek to occupy Burma, and he considered it important that Germany and Japan make a joint declaration against India. He did not recall saying that once English bases in India were eliminated Japan could easily send convoys to the Persian Gulf. What he meant was that whenever he met Hitler, he was asked by the army to say certain things to him and was requested by the two attaches to bring up certain matters. Therefore, he might have said such a thing to Hitler but had no exact recollection.

34255 * He did not recall but probably did, at the conclusion of the conference, express the hope that Germany and Japan would enter into close cooperation after the war. Asked if he recalled Hitler stating to him that this was probably the first time in history that two such powerful military powers were situated far apart and were engaged in joint battle, he replied that Hitler might have said so, but he did not recall.

Page Asked if on 6 March 1943 at a conference with Ribbentrop he stated that Japan intended to increase submarine attacks and would set about immediately making the necessary preparations, he replied if he did so he was conveying the intentions of the Japanese navy. Asked if he did not mention the Japanese submarines were not suited for shipping attacks and the navy had to revamp its construction program, he replied that he may have and if he did he was conveying the message of the navy authorities. Being an ambassador abroad he knew nothing about submarine construction and * if he did say anything of the kind, he was conveying the message of the naval authorities.

34264 *Asked if he stated that the Japanese navy would be grateful if it could obtain two submarines from the German navy, he replied the navy desired the transfer of them. Asked if Ribbentrop agreed with him and stated that he would speak to Admiral Doenitz about it, he replied he did not know what Ribbentrop actually said -- told Doenitz, because after that the matter was transferred to the naval attache and he conducted negotiations. He presumed Ribbentrop may have * said that, but he didn't know.

Asked if he recalled that Ribbentrop again summoned him explaining that the government, after a consultation with the navy, was prepared to place one or two U-boats at the disposal of the Japanese navy, he replied that Ribbentrop, quite a while before, had said that Germany was prepared to give one or two submarines, but he had no recollection whether he repeated that again.

Asked if at this time Ribbentrop further stated to him that the German government further offered these submarines on condition that the Japanese navy tackle immediately submarine construction on a large scale and carry mass production into effect, he replied he did not know what Ribbentrop later said, but in connection with the transfer, no conditions were attached. Ribbentrop expressed the desire that Japan utilize submarines for the purpose of * destroying lines of communications and also the hope that Japan would expand the construction of submarines, but he did not attach any conditions with the presentation of the U-boats.

Asked if about that time there was a distinct change in policy in Japanese naval warfare which placed emphasis upon the destruction of tonnage warfare, he replied that was something with which the ambassador had no connection whatsoever and was never informed.

Page 34267 * Exhibit 3520, the secret protocol in connection with the economic agreement for assistance between Japan and Germany (in evidence, T. 34246) stated that in carrying through article 2 of the agreement, Germany and Japan did guarantee mutually for three years the payment of 586 million Reichsmarks and of a thousand million yen. Each would respect the guidance of the other in economic activities and their economic spheres. In building up their interior economic sphere for economic exchange, each would respect the needs of the other in preference to lands outside the spheres.

34268 * The parties would treat goods from the other party's sphere as far as possible more favorably compared with goods outside the two spheres. In territories occupied by them, they would grant the protection to each other's nationals and firms in the spirit of the tripartite pact and would accord preferential protection over nationals and firms outside the international spheres. With regard to detailed agreements after the war, they were to consult each other. At the end of the war, they would resume economic relations with those states which were at war with them or with whom they had broken off diplomatic relations, only after mutual consultations.

34269 The parties will take these principles into consideration in their treaty agreements with each other as well as with the remaining independent states of the economic spheres * and work toward having these principles respected by the other independent states. If one of the parties reached treaty accords with independent states of the other economic spheres, it should consult with the other party in advance.

This protocol had a force of the inseparable constituent part of the treaty between Germany and Japan on economic cooperation, but it should be kept a secret. The accused stated that this was the secret protocol to the agreement but had no sure recollection. Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated that Germany first officially requested Japanese participation in the war against Russia in the summer of 1943, and he was asked if this was not in the summer of 1942. He stated that the last official representation from Germany on the matter and the last time that Japan officially denied the request was in the summer of 1943.

34271 * Only one official request was made for Japanese participation and the request was made in the name of the government. He still thought that the official request was made in the summer of 1943. Even after a statement in his interrogation in which he said that in the summer of 1942 Germany officially

Page requested Japan to enter into the Soviet war was read to him, 34272 he still thought 1943 was correct.* He had never expressed an opinion in favor of a Japanese attack on Russia prior to the summer of 1942. Several times he had conveyed German desires in this regard. Asked if, prior to the summer of 1942, he 34273 had numerous conferences with various German * officials regarding the progress of the war against Russia, he replied that regarding its progress, he gained information from the army who got it from the German army and from talks with Ribbentrop.

At the end of July or the beginning of August 1942, when he asked Ribbentrop concerning the progress of the war, he called Marshal Keitel in and had him explain the war situation. Asked if he spoke to the German civilian officials about the progress of the war in Russia other than Ribbentrop and Keitel, he replied that he did hear secondhand from the military attache but he himself had never heard anything from the German Army except from Keitel.

34274 * He would ask from time to time about the progress of the war, but had no recollection of ever conducting discussions with persons other than Ribbentrop on that point.
Asked if shortly prior to 17 November 1941 he had a conference with Erdsmandorf of the Japanese section of the foreign office relating to the war against Russian, he replied that there was never any occasion on which an ambassador would talk with a section chief and he had never asked Erdsmandorf anything 34275 in regard to this. He might have had informal conversations with him but had never discussed that matter with him.

34276 He determined that Erdsmandorf obtained such information from conversations held at social gatherings. * He did not recall telling Erdsmandorf that he had no information concerning the intention and deliberations of the Japanese Government, but according to OSHIMA's personal opinion, Japanese military operations against the Soviet could take place only on a limited scale. Asked if in a conference with Ribbentrop on 23 March 1942 the latter mentioned to him that an advance of Japanese armies against Vladivostok towards the Baikal Sea would be advisable if Japan felt that she was strong enough, he replied that may be so, but he did not remember it.

34277 Asked if he did not fully agree with Ribbentrop's suggestion and state that although he had received no official communique, he favored an advance against Vladivostok within East * Siberia within the year as he was of the opinion a more opportune time might never arrive again, he replied he had no recollection of saying this and had never had such

Page thoughts. He did not recall any conversation with Weiszaecker on 21 April 1942 stating that it seemed then that Japan should attack the Russians in East Asia. Asked if in this conference he assured Weiszaecker that he was working hard to put an end to a unnatural situation in which Japan was still living in peace and neighborliness with the Russian Army so furiously engaged by Germany, he replied he never had such a conference. He knew more than anyone else that it was impossible for Japan to fight a war on two fronts. He did not make such remarks.

34278 * According to his recollections, the official request for Japanese entry into the Russian War was made in 1943. If a request was made on 9 July 1942 he believed it was denied and not official. He did not recall at this conference stating he was well pleased with developments in Russia and North Africa and that he was convinced of the imperativeness of a Japanese attack on Russia. Asked if he did not indicate to Ribbentrop that he was very enthusiastic over the idea and 34279 would immediately report the request to Tokyo, *he replied that if on that date there was a request from the German side he must have transmitted it to the Japanese government.

Asked if he also indicated he was enthusiastic over the idea of Japan participating in the Russo-German War, he replied he didn't convey anything except expressions of diplomatic courtesy. He did not mean to say that his approval of Japan's entry was anything more than a diplomatic gesture. The duty of an ambassador was to faithfully convey whatever one government wanted to convey to another. What he said was that even though he knew in his own heart that Japan was unable to carry on war on two fronts, it was his duty to convey any German request in this regard, and to preserve the formal diplomatic procedure.

34280 * But he did not advise Ribbentrop that he was en-34281 thusiastic of the prospect of Japan entering the war. * Asked if on 30 July 1942 he conveyed to Ribbentrop the Japanese reply to the official request for participation in the Russo-Japanese War, he replied that if on 9 July Germany actually made that request, naturally at some later date the Japanese government would have sent refusal. He thought he must have conveyed this refusal saying it was impossible. At the time he conveyed the reply to Ribbentrop, he did not recall advising Ribbentrop he had cabled Tokyo details of the last talk with him and he had his own point of view that an early intervention against Russia and intensive action to paralyze English shipping in the Indian Ocean was proper.

34282 * He did not recall on this occasion stating to Ribbentrop that he had personally shared Germany's understanding that a uniquely favorable opportunity presented itself to Japan to deal a blow to the Russians and moreover that the Japanese Army had always advocated the opinion that such action against Russia was necessary. He did not recall telling Ribbentrop that undoubtedly there were various opinions in Japan on this matter and that he did not consider the answer that had been given to be final. He did not also state that he had proposed again and again to utilize the opportune moment and this would be borne in mind in Japan.

He did not recall at a conference between he and Ribbentrop at Fusel on 18 April 1943 he stated that he knew the Japanese Embassy at Sofia had reported to Tokyo rumours about a separate peace between Germany and Russia in consequence of which OSHIMA had arranged for all such telegrams from Sofia to be given to OSHIMA and that he had taken measures against its repetition.

34284 * He did receive in September 1944 an instruction from his government suggesting conclusion of a separate peace between Germany and Russia. Asked if in his conversation with Ribbentrop regarding this matter, if he stated that Japan would fight on Germany's side until the final victory, he replied he didn't recall making this statement but since Japan was Germany's ally, it was but natural that he should have. Asked if he approved Japanese exploitation of FIC in September 1941, he stated that he never heard of that. He received home instructions that the government desired the German government through its ambassadors in France to support Japanese representations vis-a-vis French Indo China. He conveyed these instructions and that is as far as he knew of the matter.

- 34288 * The accused stated he did not recall saying to Weiszaecker about 12 July 1941 that he had recently advised MATSUOKA again to break off negotiations with Washington. He was convinced he did not say such a thing. * Asked whether he received a wire from MATSUOKA on 17 Feb. 1941 requesting him to take appropriate measures to bring about German pressure on France to accept Japanese mediation in the FIC-Thailand dispute, he replied that at that time he was not yet in Germany. When shown a document purporting to be a copy of this telegram, he stated it arrived in Berlin before he arrived there and believed the Charge d'Affaires took care of it. He thought he must have seen it after assuming his post but had no clear recollection. Since the telegram bore neither the seal of the Foreign Office nor of the recipient, he could not verify it was from the Foreign Office. At the time the telegram was received in Berlin, he was enroute to there from Japan.
- 34289 * His recollection was that he assumed his post on 19 Feb. 1941.

- 34295 Exhibit 3521, the telegram from MATSUI to OSHIMA in Berlin, dated 17 Feb. 1941, stated * that concerning the current mediation in the Thailand-FIC border dispute, OSHIMA was to propose to Germany to use its good offices to have Vichy accept the mediation plan after explaining that the success or failure of Japanese mediation would not only gravely affect the political situation in East Asia but the positions of all Axis powers. This was not merely a local problem, for in case of rupture of the mediation, fighting between Thailand and FIC would inevitably start again and might lead to Japanese armed intervention. In such case it would be impossible to obtain the products of that area necessary to both Japan and Germany. This not only would be a great obstacle to the national policies of both nations but would enable England and America to take advantage of this opportunity to throw the South Seas into confusion through intensification of their activities toward NEI and FIC and through carrying out their favorite propaganda. This would upset Japanese southern policy and cause a serious setback in the operations of Germany and Italy. In this instance, the situation would be such that it would be difficult to guarantee England would not steal a march on them and take action to occupy strategic Thailand points. If the mediation was a success, they would be able to peacefully establish their influence in Thailand and FIC and establish the grounds upon which to request various conveniences besides leaving no room for the activities of England and America. The question as to whether Japan's position in East Asia would be strengthened depended directly on the success of this mediation and also affected the question of the extension of Axis influence against England and America.

Page

The question as to whether Japan's position in East Asia would be strengthened depended directly on the success of this mediation and also affected the question of the extension of Axis influence against England and America.

34297

* There was too great a gap in French and Thailand assertions and there appeared no sign of their compromise. Further delay in settlement was not permissible and after taking the assertions of both into consideration, they decided on this mediation plan. Its gist was to return to Thailand the greater part of the territory lost in 1904 and 1907. The former was taken by France as compensation for the abolition of extraterritoriality. It was illogical to make Thailand cede this territory and it should be corrected. The latter was taken from Thailand as an exchange for several small areas but there was no basis for it. It was merely a case where France stole it.

In the Japanese mediation plan, they had decided to return only a small portion of the latter to Thailand in the form of a sale and reserve for FIC the historic sites of Cambodia and * recognition of FIC's cultural achievements. Reasons for deciding on a mediation plan were that for France the question of restoration of lost territory having no natural connection when considered from all aspects, but for Thailand it was a problem of her domain and racial alienation.

Although France pointed out that Thailand had suddenly enlarged upon her demand made prior to acceptance of Japanese mediation and asserted it was unreasonable, that there might be such a change with the development of military action was inevitable. Hence, the question lay in whether the present Thailand--FIC border was correct.

Although Thailand was defeated in sea battles, she had been victorious on land * and if the Japanese had not proposed to mediate, the Thailand Army would have over-run all Cambodia. Japanese soldiers inspecting the locality unanimously stated that the morale of the Thailand Army was high, while the FIC Army had no fighting spirit and the same opinion existed among the French officials. In view of this and from the fact that the FIC Army was unable to oppose the Thailand Army while the Japanese Army was stationed north of Hanoi as at present the defeat of the French was nearly certain. Consequently, it would be wise for France to forget sentimental arguments and seek a rapid solution with the magnanimity worthy of a great nation, rather than discuss peace after being defeated. In regard to the territory lost by Thailand in 1904, although it seemed France had a true intention toward restitution on the whole, she showed considerable disapprobation in regard to the territory lost in 1907. * As for Thailand, there was a view that the former could have been acquired without depending on Japanese mediation and if Japan had not intervened,

34300

Page they would have been able to take back more territory in the Cambodia area. The British were supporting this view to dampen Japan's mediation, and since this would lead to the alienation of Japanese-Thailand collaboration, the possibility of Thailand regarding mediation as troublesome and resorting to arms again was great if restoration of lost territories was restricted to that lost in 1904. Hence, they were confronted with the necessity of making the French make some concession in regard to that lost in 1907 and preventing Thailand from ceding their camp and joining the Anglo-American camp. According to Thailand's explanation, when she sought German help in regard to the question of restoring the lost territories, Ribbentrop had replied that since problems of FIC had all been left in Japan's hands, Japan should be consulted and Thailand was thinking of acting according to Japan's views. However, there had been manifested no such intention from Germany. Also, France had hinted that as a result of the German French armistice, they had no right to dispose of such problems until the peace conference.

It was deemed then that the difficulty for the completion of the mediation lay with France. Because the success of mediation would greatly affect the execution of the Axis national powers, it was necessary to bring this immediately to success and establish influence and stamp out American and English activities. If they did not satisfy Thailand to a certain extent, there was a danger of her swinging away from Japan. For this, it was necessary to apply pressure on France and make her accept the plan, and it was deemed * there was no alternative but to rely upon the speedy and effective good offices of Germany toward the Vichy Government. Hence, appropriate measures were desired to be devised immediately.

34303

The Chief of the Bureau of South Seas Affairs had shown the mediation plan to the German councillor in Tokyo on the 17th and had requested Germany's good offices.

* Asked if he assumed his duties in Berlin on 19 February, the accused replied his duties could not commence * until after he presented his credentials and he did not begin his duties until the 28th of February, having actually arrived in Berlin on the 19th.

Asked if he held conferences with Ribbentrop as early as 23 February, before presenting his credentials, he stated this was in a different capacity. He could not meet Ribbentrop in an official capacity until after presenting his credentials, but since they were old friends, he asked OSHIMA to come to see him and this visit was entirely contrary to diplomatic usage although it did occur.

He did not recall that the German representatives in accordance with this telegram brought pressure to bear on Vichy, France,

Page nor did he recall later communicating with Tokyo in regard to this. Asked if he approved Japanese establishment of naval and air bases in South FIC in 1941, he replied that his opinion was never asked in this matter and since he had no knowledge of * oriental affairs at the time, he never thought of that. Asked if he did not as early as 12 July 1941, advise Weiszaecker that the occupation of certain positions in South FIC as bases for aircraft and warships was an urgent Japanese need, he stated he must have conveyed to him instructions arriving from Japan. He did not learn as early as July 12, 1941 that Japan contemplated the establishment of air bases and naval bases in South FIC. He knew of such thoughts in Japan for the first * time through instructions he received. If it was true that he saw Weiszaecker on 12 July 1941 and talked to him on this matter, it must have been based on instructions. If he had received no instructions by that date the report of that conversation must have been false.

34307 He didn't recall the exact date he first received instructions but it must have been some time in July. This matter * was not handled by the Embassy for an extended period and only once did they receive instructions from the government on this matter. He did not recall ever being informed of the penetration of Japanese troops into FIC and asked if he approved that action he stated he was not consulted on that matter and didn't think he ever in fact approved it.

34311 * The accused stated that he was not of the opinion that the Japanese Government, in establishing the new order in East Asia under the Tripartite Pact, planned to use armed force for its accomplishment. He did not recall stating in a conference with Erdsmandorf around 18 Oct. 1941 that in his opinion the government in concluding the pact must have been certain that the Great East Asiatic area could be achieved only by advance with the sword to the south. He did not recall stating at that conference that action had been prepared and the question was only one of time. He did not recall further stating that the attack might possibly be simultaneous with German operations against Britain.

- 34312 * He did not recall also stating that it would be advantageous to establish a land connection between Germany and Japan by Japanese advance into East Siberia and that he had proposed this repeatedly to his government. He had no official conferences with Erdsmandorf at all. His belief was that Erdsmandorf merely pieced together what he told him at social functions with other information. He did not recall stating to Erdsmandorf around 17 Nov. 1941, his personal view that an advance by Japan toward the south was unavoidable, especially because of the pressing need for petroleum.
- 34313 * Asked if in this conference with Erdsmandorf he also explained that by advance to the south he meant the seizure of Borneo, above all, was necessary. He replied he never made such an explanation. It was not true that he and Erdsmandorf examined the map to determine how far it was from Borneo to the nearest Japanese troops in South FIC and that they determined the distance was 1000 kilometers.
- 34314 * He did not recall discussing the nature of Singapore fortifications nor suggesting that an attack on it would be most effective. He did not recall telling Erdsmandorf that the three Japanese infantry divisions on Hainan Island he assumed were being trained for landing operations and combat in tropical regions.
- 34318 * Asked if he had a conference with Gaus about 11 Oct. 1941, with regard to the prolongation of the Anti-Comintern Pact, he stated he didn't recall whether his conversation was with Ribbentrop or Gaus but knew he did have such a conversation. He did not recall advising the person with whom he conferred that he had wired Tokyo repeatedly about the matter. Nor did he recall discussing the advisability of playing up the * occasion of prolonging the pact in a big manner.
- 34319 In accordance with instructions from his government, he signed the agreement prolonging the pact on Nov. 25, 1941. In commemoration of its signing, he believed a reception was held at Hitler's but he did not speak on that occasion nor have any public word to state at the reception or the time of the signing. The form adopted when the prolongation was decided on was that each participating country was to make a declaration of its intent. When Japan's turn came, he made this declaration. The signing of the pact by writing was not done for a declaration of Japan's position was equivalent to a * written signing. No other Japanese spoke on that occasion in addition to himself, and he spoke in German. When handed a document, he stated it did not represent the speech he made for his statement was very simple and he did not recall making the statement handed him.
- 34320
- 34321 * He made no speech at the commemoration reception but merely a declaration at the ceremony taking place after the signing. He had no recollection of making such a speech at a meeting in commemoration occasion. Asked if the speech was made by him or by someone else 34323 with his approval on any occasion, * he replied he had no recollection of the speech at all nor any knowledge of the document.

34324 * When he arrived in Berlin on 19 Feb. 1941, there was no reception at the train, but State Secretary for Foreign Affairs Weiszaecker met him. When shown a letter prepared by Weiszaecker, bearing date of 17 Feb. 1941, he stated it refreshed his recollection and that he arrived on 17 Feb. instead of the 19th. Asked if the telegram he had previously stated arrived before he got in Berlin did not actually arrive after he got there, he replied he did not know because he wouldn't look at a telegram immediately upon arriving.

* EXAMINATION BY THE TRIBUNAL

The accused stated that the non-aggression pact between Germany and the USSR was not aimed at Japan nor were any Japanese interests prejudiced by this. Asked for what reasons he was dissatisfied with this pact, he replied that first, it was against the Anti-Comintern Pact. Also it was concluded in the midst of negotiations for the strengthening of the Anti-Comintern Pact and without previous notice to Japan. At no time did he advocate a declaration for war against the USSR by Japan and Germany.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. CUNNINGHAM

Reference was made to the affidavit where it referred to the instruction given by OSHIMA at the end of March 1939 that Japan accepted in principle the duty of military assistance if Germany was attacked by countries other than the Soviet and the witness was reminded of his interrogation (Exhibit 497, P. 6065) where it appeared he stated that according to this instruction, aid would be confined to military advice such as trading of intelligence, etc. Asked to explain the discrepancy, he replied he thought there was a misinterpretation and that "military assistance" was translated "military advice." The instructions he received were that Japan would accept the duty of giving military assistance. In his interrogation, the contents of his statements were abridged. Instructions regarding details of military assistance or entering the war came later. In this part of the interrogatories there were points which were confused and on which there were mistakes, and so he decided to make a general correction in his affidavit instead of trying to correct all those errors.

34331 * FURTHER EXAMINATION BY THE TRIBUNAL

34332 Asked if he conducted negotiations in Berlin with the aim of obtaining land and a house for the Embassy where he could carry out intelligence and subversive activities against the USSR, he replied that when he was military attache, one of his subordinates did buy a house and he thought this real estate was bought in the name of an officer in the Ministry of National Defense and paid for by the Japanese Army. Asked if he confirmed that this estate was then the headquarters of the White Russian spies where anti-Soviet pamphlets were printed to convey to the Soviet and where the different subversive measures were worked out against the USSR,* he stated he did hear that a small number of people were carrying on printing work there but did not know what they achieved nor did he think the house was ever made headquarters for any subversive activities.

34333 * Asked if he was aware that in 1938 and 1939 the Embassy in Berlin sent saboteurs and terrorists into USSR by way of Turkey to kill Stalin, he replied there were no such facts. Asked if he had a talk with Himmler on 31 Jan. 1939 to the effect that together with German spies and with the assistance of White * Russians, he was undertaking a large-scale sabotage and terroristic work and that he sent ten of his agents with bombs across the Caucasus in order to assassinate Stalin, he replied he never had any such conversation with Himmler.

- 34340 *Exhibit 3523/dated 16 September 1938 from Foreign Minister UGAKI to Premier KONOYE re the Emperor's appointment of OSHIMA as ambassador to Germany stated that with reference to appointing military attache
- 34341 OSHIMA as ambassador as already arranged with KONOYE * informally UGAKI relied upon KONOYE to obtain the Emperor's approval at his earliest convenience so he would be able to proceed with this matter.
- 34342 *Exhibit 3523A, all from KONOYE to UGAKI dated 22 September 1938 re Imperial approval re the appointment of OSHIMA as ambassador to Germany acknowledged UGAKI's request and informed him that Imperial approval had been informally obtained on the 22nd. Exhibit 3523B, all from KONOYE to War Minister ITAGAKI dated 6 October 1938 concerning the appointment of OSHIMA as ambassador to Germany
- 34343 *asked whether it was objectionable on the part of the War Ministry. Exhibit 3523C, all from ITAGAKI to KONOYE dated 7 October 1938 regarding the appointment of OSHIMA as ambassador replied to the above letter and stated there was no objection on the part of the War Ministry.
- 34351 *In Exhibit 3524A, excerpt from the official transcript of the Nurnberg trial, being the direct examination of Ribbentrop
- 34352 was asked, "Did Japan before her attack on Pearl Harbor * notify Germany of her intentions?" He stated that this was not the case. At that time Ribbentrop tried to move Japan to attack Singapore. A peace with England did not seem possible and he knew it would be militarily possible to do this. Hitler instructed him to do everything to weaken England's position so that peace might be brought about. He believed this could be done best through a Japanese attack on England's possessions in East Asia and therefore Ribbentrop tried to influence Japan to attack Singapore.
- 34353 *After the outbreak of the German-Russian war he also tried to have Japan attack Russia for a quick ending of the war. Japan however did not do that. She did neither of the two things Germany wanted her to do but did a third - attacked the United States at Pearl Harbor. The attack was for the Germans a complete surprise. They had considered the possibility that Japan might attack Singapore, Hengkong or England but never that she would attack the United States. They knew that in an attack on England the United States would intervene and they hoped that would not happen. He received news of the attack on Pearl Harbor through the press and then received a Reuter's dispatch from OSHIMA. All other reports were completely untrue. Even this
- 34354 attack was a surprise to OSHIMA as OSHIMA said it was a * complete surprise to him also.

- 34372 *Exhibit 3503B, the redirect interrogatory for Ott (the direct and cross interrogatory introduced at T 33925 as Exh. 3503 by the Defense) stated that in Ott's telegram dated 31 December 1939 he had declared that according to opinions of Ambassadors OSHIMA and SHIRATORI who were strongly working for the collapse of the present cabinet etc., Ott was asked to state what actions OSHIMA took in this respect. *
- 34373 And he answered it was a general situation report reflecting the political pressure in Japan. The cabinet was inefficient and being attacked from various sides. The opposition of OSHIMA and SHIRATORI was not a determining factor and he did not remember the details of his actions on the basis of his knowledge. Asked on what occasion OSHIMA made his statement in the telegram that still 2 or 3 more transition cabinets would be necessary he replied that it was generally accepted that the Japanese cabinet should follow a more conciliatory course. It was mentioned by OSHIMA in an unofficial discussion with respect to the telegram from Ott dated 23 January 1940. He was reminded that he had stated in this telegram regarding the settlement of the question of Germans taken away from the Asama-Maru by the * British and that step by step tactics were the only ones with prospect of success and this was in accordance with the strong advice of OSHIMA and SHIRATORI. Asked on what occasion this advice of OSHIMA was given he replied that OSHIMA's personal advice on this complicated matter was expected to be helpful. With regard to Ott's telegram dated 26 January 1940 he was reminded that in it he had stated OSHIMA's opinion on the relations between the visit of the Duke of Coburg to Japan and anti-British movements there. Asked on what occasion this opinion was expressed by OSHIMA he replied he visited OSHIMA to get his advice and find a way out of the resistance of the Japanese Government to the Duke's mission. He expected a more favorable reaction by Ribbentrop by expressing also * OSHIMA's opinion but did not suggest to OSHIMA that he might quote him on the matter.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF YOSHIE, Seiichi by MR. FREEMAN

*The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3525 as his affidavit. The affidavit stated that the witness from 1 October 1940 to 30 April 1943 was mainly in charge of personnel affairs * of staff officers in General Headquarters and engaged in personnel and protocol business of War Ministry officers as a member of the Appointments Section of the Personnel Affairs Bureau. From 1 May 1944 until the surrender appointments of staff officers, director of the Military Affairs Bureau and Section Chiefs in that bureau were to be deliberated over by the Director of the Personnel Affairs Bureau on consultation with General Headquarters.

After the February 26 Incident the army was particularly careful of personnel administration and paid much attention to appointments so as not to be influenced by the consideration of personal intimacy. All war ministers assuming that office after the Incident strictly maintained this policy. *Consequently the autonomous power of making appointments by the Personnel Affairs Bureau was strengthened so as not to be affected by coercion etc. by outsiders. TOJO when he became War Minister also observed this policy and when appointment was to be made instructed those concerned to inquire closely into the candidate's personal history, particularly after the war broke out to make sure he had a thorough knowledge of the circumstances to carry out his new duty. These concerned then submitted the matter to the War Minister for approval.

In 1941 the accused SATO succeeded KAWAMURA as Chief of the Military Affairs Section. The appointment was first deliberated by the Director of the Personnel Affairs Bureau NODA and then approved by the War Minister.

Because of his knowledge of the Military Affairs Bureau and Military Affairs Section * through his service as Chief of the Press Section and as a front line staff officer and his experience in the United States SATO was recognized as one possessed of the deepest knowledge of not only the army situation but also of affairs at home and abroad. All in charge considered the appointment an appropriate one.

In 1942 when Director of the Military Affairs Bureau MOTO was transferred SATO was appointed his successor. He was first selected by the Director of the Personnel Affairs Bureau TOMINAGA and after deliberations and the approval given by the three army chiefs he was appointed by the War Minister. This also was a very natural and appropriate appointment for SATO was familiar with the business of the bureau * since prior to the war. Furthermore he was qualified to be a War Ministry Director as he had been promoted to Major General.

On further oral examination the witness stated that he was familiar with the occasion of SATO's appointment and it came through regular channels. As far as he knew there was no pressure brought upon the General Staff or any other appointing authority to get the appointment through.

*The witness knew TANAKA, Ryukichi when he was head of the Military Service Bureau and he left this post in the summer or fall of 1942, * resigning because of illness. The witness was familiar with the circumstances under which an officer might resign from the regular army and except on account of illness preventing him from continuing his work no other reason was recognized. He knew TANAKA from the summer of 1941 until the time * he left his position as Chief of the Military Service Bureau. He was not in a position to know of TANAKA's work or of him in detail but as these of the War Ministry and General Staff were located in the same building there were frequent opportunities to meet TANAKA and he was able to hear of him quite often.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY COLONEL MORNANE.

- 34393 * Asked what he meant when he said that appointments of various officers were to be deliberated over by the Director of the Personnel Affairs Bureau, he stated that he meant consideration for selection of a suitable person, not only from the standpoint of his competence, but also from the standpoint of possible effects of appointments on other quarters.
- 34394 * Asked if this consideration before selection was provided for in regulations or was a matter of the War Minister's policy, he replied that generally, while there was a War Minister policy, the fundamentals were already stipulated in the regulations of the War Minister. Asked to refer the Tribunal to the particular regulation providing for the Director making the selection of various officers, he replied he didn't remember, but thought the matter was stipulated in regulations governing the organization and functions of the War Ministry. However, he didn't recall the exact language of the provisions.
- 34395 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated that all War Ministers, after the February 26 incident, strictly maintained this policy. Asked why he referred to it as a matter of policy if it was a matter laid down by regulation which could not be avoided, he replied that without regard to time, the regulations stipulate the basis on which such actions were to be taken, but according to the circumstances the War Minister sets down certain detailed policy.
- 34396 * In regard to the autonomous power of making appointments by the Personnel Affairs Bureau mentioned in the affidavit, the witness was asked if that meant that the Bureau actually made the appointment or if it was the War Minister who actually made it. He stated that by that he meant that the Bureau merely carried out the routine of appointments, and the actual decision was made by the War Minister.
- 34404 Exhibit 3426, * the affidavit of ABE, Nobuyuki, stated that he was a full general at the time of his retirement from active duty in 1936, when the February 26 incident occurred. He became Vice-Minister of War in 1928, and was appointed a State Minister without portfolio from June to December 1930. He was Premier from August 1939 to January 1940.

- 34405 * On the day the third KONOYE Cabinet fell, the accused SATO visited his home to tell him about the situation in army circles. He was well acquainted with the accused SATO, having known him thirty years. Asked if SATO discussed or made any recommendation as to who should succeed KONOYE, he replied that SATO conveyed a message from the army, and by army he meant TOJO and not the General Staff, for it had nothing to do with politics.
- 34406 * Therefore, he believed it could be assumed that the message was from War Minister TOJO. At that time SATO was a colonel.

The message was that since the KONOYE Cabinet fell, the army deemed it desirable to recommend that an Imperial prince become premier. The name mentioned was Prince HIGASHIKUNI. At no time during this visit did SATO mention TOJO's name for premier.

- 34407 The affiant stated he attended a conference about October 17 to recommend a successor to KONOYE, at which he believed were WAKATSUKI, OKADA, HIROTA, HAYASHI, * HIRANUMA, YONAI, HARA, KIYOURA, and the Lord Keeper, KIDO, who presided as chairman. The affiant recalled that KIYOURA mentioned HIGASHIKUNI's name, and the affiant did not express his opinion relative to HIGASHIKUNI's becoming premier to SATO, nor to anyone else.

- 34408 * Asked if he paid absolutely no attention to the message SATO brought, he replied he just listened to his story, and nothing he said affected his opinion. At the conference on October 17 they finally recommended TOJO as premier. Never once during this visit did SATO mention TOJO's name as one who should be premier. The affiant believed it was KIDO who recommended TOJO, but
- 34409 * there was no one present absolutely against having him as premier.

The affiant stated he was familiar enough with the War Ministry to state whether the bureaus within it were on an equal level as to exercising authority. He knew TANAKA, Ryukichi, and knew that he had been used by the prosecution as a witness in the trial.

34410 To the affiant was quoted a question in TANAKA's direct examination, in which TANAKA was asked if he remembered SATO telling him anything about the matter in which TOJO became premier. * To this question TANAKA had answered that after TOJO became premier, he came to the affiant's office and told him about the matter.

It was always the stand of the Military Service Bureau that the army, outside the War Minister himself, should not interfere in politics, and he thought SATO's visit was in connection with this matter to explain his position.

SATO told TANAKA he had seen the two generals, ABE and HAYASHI, to whom he had said that unless TOJO was made premier it would be difficult to control the army. After this was quoted, the affiant was asked if SATO made any statement about TOJO becoming premier and if he were not it would be difficult to control the army, and the affiant replied he had never heard it. There never was any indication that there would be trouble with the army unless TOJO was appointed Prime Minister.

34411 The witness identified and verified exhibit
34412 3527 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was in the Military Affairs Bureau of the War 34413 Minister as a staff member, * becoming Chief of the Military Affairs Section December 1942, remaining there until July 1944. While he was Chief of the Section, the accused SATO was his immediate superior.

The chief functions of the witness' section was to handle matters dealing with other ministries and those relating to international agreements. Told that TANAKA, Ryukichi, had testified, (T. 14287), of protests relative to the treatment of POWs being sent from the Foreign Office to the War Ministry and then to the Military Affairs Section of the MAB, the witness stated that he himself didn't recall receiving such protests.

34414 Asked if it was true, as TANAKA had testified, that replies to be made to authorities outside the war office were prepared in the Military Affairs Section, the witness stated that was not so, but all replies relating to * POWs were made by the POW Information Bureau, which had already been established when he became head of the Military Affairs Section. The Chief of the POW Information Bureau at that time was Lt. Gen. UYEMURA. The function of UYEMURA's bureau was to handle matters relating to POWs. The protests from Allied powers received by the Foreign Office relative to treatment of POWs would be forwarded to the POW Information Bureau.

34415 Asked if these protests relative to the treatment of POWs had passed through his section, as TANAKA testified, if he would have known it, he replied, yes, but he didn't * recall ever receiving these protests.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY COL. MORNANE.

34416 * The witness stated that he thought TANAKA left the War Ministry about July or August, 1942. Asked if he would disagree with TANAKA's evidence, he stated no, as he had no exact recollection. The witness stated he was actually in the War Ministry when TANAKA left. Between April and December 1942, the witness was private secretary to TOJO as War Minister, but not as Prime Minister. As private secretary to TOJO, he was not in the Military Affairs Section or the Military Affairs Bureau.

* He had no recollection of seeing any protests in his capacity as private secretary. At that time he would not see the Military Affairs Bureau or Military Affairs Section files. He could not say as between April 1942 and the time TANAKA left the War Ministry whether any protests went to the Military Affairs Section.

Asked if the Military Affairs Bureau dealt with lots of matters concerning POWs, he replied that matters relating to POWs were handled by the POW Information Bureau. Asked if it was not the practice to send copies if not originals to the MAB, he stated he didn't think it was customary. When something was being sent out it was the usual procedure to send either the original for notation or copies.

34418 * Asked if all replies to protests when they went out would be signed by the MAB, he replied it would not mean that it would see all of them. Asked if he didn't, in his capacity in the Military Affairs Section before becoming private secretary to TOJO, actually handle certain matters regarding POWs, he replied there was no case of handling such matters in that capacity, and he had no exact recollection of seeing any in that section.

34422 * Exhibit 3528, an item of exhibit 3367 for identification only, being a draft of an answer to the War Ministry dated 25 March 1942, and being the document identified by the witness, stated * that the Vice Minister informed the Foreign Ministry, that in their opinion Article 36 of the Geneva Treaty on POWs could not be accepted and applied completely or exactly as it was.

34420 * In view, however, of the fact that Japan was on her own part providing facilities and treating properly her POWs, in case the U. S. expressed her intention to give proper treatment to Japanese not only in the U. S. but in American countries which had declared war on Japan, Article 36 would be applied mutatis mutandis as the occasion demanded, and Swiss representatives would be permitted to pay visits. As to enforcement details, their intention was to investigate each case and give permission.

34535 * Exhibit 3552, the affidavit of H. A. Gynne, stated 34536 that the affiant was * editor of the Morning Post from 1911 to 1937 and his relations with the Japanese Ambassador had always been cordial. The incidents at Tientsin and the invasion of China were subjects of conversation with both Ambassador YOSHIDA and SHIGEMITSU, who succeeded him. Both these gentlemen expressed strong opposition to the China invasion, clearly expressed disapproval of it, and strong opposition to the war party in Japan. SHIGEMITSU suggested that the affiant publish occasional articles pointing out that the war party was losing friendly feeling for Japan and said from his experiences in Moscow and his contacts with Japanese diplomats in Europe, he was convinced that Hitler, at the first serious set back sustained by the German army, would be swept away by the general staff.

34537 He expressed fears lest the war party lose * their heads and allow themselves to be infected with the germ of world domination which had already contaminated Germany. He was strongly opposed to widening the area of hostilities and indicated he was doing all he could to prevent the war party from further aggression. These conversations covered a two-year period and SHIGEMITSU gave the affiant his full confidence as far as was consistent with his official duties. He indicated he attached more weight to the articles the affiant published than the affiant himself did and said he believed they would appeal to the moderate men in Tokyo and enable them to fight against the war mongers.

34538 Extracts from the articles appeared in the Japanese press but the affiant saw little sign of a favorable reaction.
SHIGEMITSU's conversations indicated he was well informed about Germany's attempts to induce Japan to join the war on her side. * SHIGEMITSU expressed consistent opposition to this and to every suggestion of extending the war. The affiant never once found him wavering from this opinion nor recalled any statements which would cause him to doubt SHIGE-MITSU's good faith.

34541 * Exhibit 3554, the affidavit of TOYODA, Teijiro, stated that the affiant was foreign minister in the Third KONOYE Cabinet from 18 July 1941 to 18 October 1941 and soon after his appointment SHIGEMITSU arrived in Japan having been recalled from London where he had been ambassador. In SHIGEMITSU's oral report he emphasized that Britain would 3454: * Exhibit 3555, the interrogation of Sir Robert Craigie, stated that Craigie was British ambassador to Japan from 3 September 1937 until the outbreak of the war. From information received in his official capacity, he had opportunity to know the activities and policies of ambassador SHIGEMITSU from October 1938 until his return to Tokyo on leave * about 20 July 1941. After SHIGEMITSU's return to Tokyo, he met him six or seven times on both official and social occasions.

34547 SHIGEMITSU told Craigie he had returned on leave because he believed he could do more in Tokyo than in London to arrest the deteriorating relations with the Western Powers. He discussed with SHIGEMITSU the improvement of Anglo-Japanese relations, the peaceful settlement of differences between the two countries, and the avoidance of war. * At SHIGEMITSU's suggestion, a meeting took place at the foreign ministry between foreign minister TOYODA, SHIGEMITSU, and Craigie to which the critical stage of the Washington negotiations was explained to Craigie and he was asked to urge Britain to attempt to avert a breakdown.

At SHIGEMITSU's request, Mr. Yoshida SHIGERU came to Hayama about October 1941 to enquire whether Craigie could make any personal suggestions for ending the deadlock in regard to FIC, however, Craigie was precluded by instructions from taking any official part in discussing matters under negotiation in Washington.

34550 * Exhibit 3556, a dispatch dated 2 September 1944 from Minister to Sweden, OKAMOTO, to Foreign Minister SHIGEMITSU, stated that the Paris radio had announced on the 29th the names of the French Provisional Government, all of whom were members of the Algiers Government. The Provisional Government announced by radio that France had been in a state of war with Japan from 8 December 1941 and in collaboration with the Allies, would keep fighting with all her might until not only French territories were liberated, but also the enemies of France in Asia and in Europe were repulsed.

34551 *Exhibit 3557, minutes of the proceedings of the Supreme War directing Conference of 15 September 1944, it was stated that after making his report on the Soviet-German

Page peace problem, Foreign Minister SHIGEMITSU distributed a tentative draft prepared by officials in charge and opened a free discussion on the subject. As the question was of a very serious nature, the necessity of keeping it secret was emphasized.

34552 * In particular questions to be taken up for the sake of adjustment of Soviet-Japanese relations, such as the cession of rights and interests in Manchuria, and the cession of Southern Saghalien, etc., were so complicated and grave that the conference arrived at no conclusion. However, it was unanimously agreed that any treatment of such questions as routine should be avoided.

It was agreed that SHIGEMITSU be requested to make a basic draft as the policy should be decided upon in accordance with the progress of Soviet-Japanese negotiations, hoped shortly to be commenced in Moscow.

34553 Annex B, the tentative draft of diplomatic measures to be taken vis-a-vis the Soviet Union dated 12 September 1944, stated that Japan would immediately initiate an active diplomatic demarche towards the Soviet Union to secure the maintenance of neutrality and improvement of diplomatic relations; the realization of peace between Germany and the Soviet; and the improvement of Japan's situation through * Soviet assistance, if Germany fell out of the present war. For this purpose, a special envoy shall be dispatched to the Soviet to conduct negotiations.

34555 They were to try to secure the use of good offices for peace between Germany and the Soviet; mediation for peace between Japan and the Chiang regime; and to sound out the Soviet * as to her attitude in case of Germany's collapse or her conclusion of a separate peace, and to try to secure and enhance her favorable attitude toward Japan. Simultaneously negotiations should be conducted between Japan and the Soviet on the following matters: Demarcation of the borders between Japan, Manchukuo, and Inner Mongolia

Page on the one side, and the Soviet and Outer Mongolia on the other; establishment of demilitarized zones along such borders; means of solution of conflicts along such borders; exchange of commodities between Japan-Manchukuo, and the Soviet.

34558 The annexed tentative plan on the limits of Japan's Concession to the Soviet Union in Connection with the Demarche to be Made to the Soviet Union stated that in case some sort of understanding was reached through which the Soviet Union maintained her attitude of neutrality, and further contributed to the amelioration of Soviet-Japanese relations, Japan had no objection to acceding to all Soviet demands, except to the cession of the North * Manchurian Railway, recognition of the Soviet sphere of interest in Manchuria and Mongolia, abrogation of the Tripartite Pact and Agreement, as well as the cession of Southern Saghalien and the Northern Kuriles.

If Soviet-German peace was realized, Japan had no objection to acceding to all Soviet demands, except the cession of Southern Saghalien and the Northern Kuriles.

If peace between Japan and the Chiang regime was realized through mediation by the Soviet Union, Japan had no objection to acceding to all Soviet demands, except the cession of the Northern Kuriles.

If Germany should collapse or conclude a separate peace, and general peace should be realized through the good offices of the Soviet, Japan had no objection to acceding to all demands of the Soviet. The same was true in case the Soviet attitude toward Japan deteriorated and Japan desired to guard against Soviet attack.

* Exhibit 3558, the affidavit of Widar Bagge, stated that the affiant was Swedish minister in Japan in January 1937 to September 1945 and as such had conversation with Japanese regarding peace treaties. The affiant had a friend named, SUZUKI, Bunshiro, who was not a politician, but had excellent political connections and was very well informed.

* They sometimes discussed the political situation and in mid September 1944 SUZUKI outlined a plan to obtain peace and mentioned the concessions that Japan would be prepared to make. He told the affiant that KONOYE was behind this feeler and that he was acting as a go between. He then completed the peace plan and mentioned the concessions that Japan would be prepared to make. The main feature was that all territories conquered during the war would be returned and even the possibility of giving up Manchukuo might be considered.

SUZUKI said that KONOYE and the group around him were responsible for this plan which they wished the affiant to forward to the Swedish Government with a request that a feeler should be put out to London. It was considered that it might be easier to find understanding for such a plan in Britain than in the U.S. The affiant reported all this to Stockholm.

In the following months the affiant often met SUZUKI and discussed with him the political situation and heard from him and from other sources that the allied request for unconditional surrender was one of the greatest obstacles * to peace. Even those inclined to surrender could not think of such decision as long as they did not know what the nation would be exposed to. If the Emperor was to be insulted or Japanese national pride humiliated, everyone thought it preferable to continue the war until the bitter end.

The affiant had conversations with SHIGEMITSU shortly before he resigned as Foreign Minister of the KOISO Cabinet on 7 April 1945. It was known that the affiant was returning to Europe, and it was this fact that decided the Foreign Minister to take up the peace question with him. SUZUKI sent an old friend, SAKAYA, Tadashi, former Japanese minister to Helsingfors, and the affiant gathered from conversing with 34562 Page him that the purpose of his being sent was to get a preliminary impression on the peace problem and to probe the affiant's sincerity. A few days later the affiant was asked to see SHIGEMITSU, who did not conceal his opinion about the bad war situation. He blamed the military clique and said now it was for the Japanese diplomats to try to get the country out of the war. He spoke at * length about the Emperor as a peace-loving man who had always been against war. He said he himself, as well as most Japanese diplomats, had been against the war from the beginning and requested the affiant to do what he could to find out about the possibilities of a negotiated peace.

He asked the affiant to collaborate with the minister to Stockholm, OKAMOTO, who was then to report to Tokyo. From the conversation the affiant retained a vivid memory of SHIGEMITSU's earnest desire to end the war as soon as possible, even at great sacrifice to Japan. SAKAYA again called on the affiant a few days later and told him the peace question was very urgent. SHIGEMITSU hoped he would leave as soon as possible and go straight to Stockholm to take the matter up.

34563 The resignation of the KOISO Cabinet of which SHIGEMITSU was Foreign Minister, came unexpectedly a few days later. TOGO became the new foreign minister and the next day the same emissary called to say that TOGO had been informed of the conversations between * the affiant and SHIGEMITSU and that he took the same attitude to the peace question. After the affiant arrived in Sweden in May, 1945, while still minister to Japan, he asked OKAMOTO whether he had received any confidential telegrams about peace efforts, and told him that he had had several talks with SHIGEMITSU, who had been very frank and asked him to make a peace feeler.

34564 OKAMATO replied that he had not heard about it and that he would make inquiries as to whether the affiant should continue his work in this effort. Two weeks later OKAMOTO said he had received a telegram from TOGO that since this had been handled by the former cabinet, it would require some investigation which would take some time before OKAMOTO could be informed definitely. The affiant remembered, however, that at the time when TOGO became foreign minister, it was mentioned in Tokyo as an important point * to his credit that he had a strong position in Moscow since he was ambassador there and preferred to put his past efforts toward Moscow.

34565 * Exhibit 3558-A (introduced T. 34,559) certified to the nonavailability of telegrams between OKAMOTO and TOGO concerning peace feelers with the Allied Powers.

* OPENING STATEMENT BY MR. BRANNON

* DIRECT EXAMINATION OF OIKAWA, Koshiro
By Mr. Brannon

The witness identified and verified exhibit 3559 as his affidavit.

34570

* The affidavit stated that the witness was navy minister from 5 September 1940 until 18 October 1941. When the Third Konoye Cabinet fell it became the witness' duty to recommend a successor as navy minister. He decided not to succeed himself before he ever heard that TOJO was to become the new Premier, but had made up his mind that a new man might be better. At that time he heard from KONOYE that there was a strong possibility of Prince HIGASHIKUNI being named premier. Therefore it was not because TOJO became the new premier that the witness decided not to succeed himself, for he simply thought * it was time for a new man to take over.

34571

Up to that time no navy minister in Japanese history had ever been appointed except from the ranks of senior active officers, and consequently potential candidates were limited. The witness noted that in order of seniority the accused SHIMADA was 10th, the 9 senior to him were ineligible for various reasons which the witness set down in his affidavit.

34572

* From the evening of 16 October 1941, until the following morning, the witness carefully deliberated as to whom to recommend. About 11 a.m. he saw Prince FUSHIMI, who was the ranking navy officer, and told him he considered SHIMADA as the logical successor and he agreed. OIKAWA's opinion was formulated in the morning of 17 October 1941 before he knew TOJO was to assume the premiership. There was no truth to the allegation that SHIMADA was appointed because TOJO wanted him to be. To his knowledge, SHIMADA and TOJO were not even acquainted then.

On the evening of 17 October, the witness conveyed to SHIMADA his desire that he accept the recommendations, but he refused stating he had been out of touch with current affairs and felt there were others better qualified. The witness asked him to consider the matter over night * and the next morning SHIMADA was summoned and both Chief of Staff NAGANO and the witness discussed the question of his appointment with him. The cabinet formation headquarters called

Page and urgently requested that the new navy minister be recommended since all other government business had been decided. After renewed insistence by both NAGANO and the witness, SHIMADA agreed to accept.

The witness and SHIMADA continued their conversations relative to the navy's views on the negotiations with America and the need for arriving at a peaceful solution. SHIMADA fully agreed to the witness' position and they discussed the procedure to be followed in carrying out the navy viewpoint. SHIMADA then went to see Premier TOJO to give him a prerequisite to his acceptance of the post. This was to continue negotiations sincerely and earnestly, and approach them from a completely new slant.

34574 SHIMADA was selected simply because he was a high ranking admiral whom the witness thought possessed * excellent qualifications. The procedure followed in recommending him was no different than that pursued in the past. Both shared the same views and the navy decision to fight was entirely dependent upon the then existing situation which then took a violent turn for the worse.

* CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. KEEMAN

The witness stated that he thought the choice of Navy Minister made in Mid-October 1941 was of vital importance to Japan. Asked if there had not been a failure during the Third Konoye Cabinet to obtain Army-Navy harmony as to Japanese policy, he replied that to most national policies he did not believe that the Army and Navy disagreed but as to whether to discontinue the Japanese-American negotiations, here were several points on which the two were not in accord. As to the question of initiating war against the U.S. had not yet received much consideration at the time, the important problem was solution of the China Incident and on this question there was not too much discrepancy between the Army and Navy views. * He did not know whether the Army had by that time reached the stage where they desired immediate commencement of hostilities but the Navy was firmly convinced that all efforts should be made to continue the negotiations and peacefully solve pending problems. The witness was a member of the 3rd KONOYE Cabinet from 5 Sept. 1940 until 18 Oct. 1941 and, as Navy Minister, attended Cabinet meetings.

34577

He did not recall TOJO, as War Minister, conveying the general view to the Army * of the subject of immediate war with the western powers before Sept. 1941 and didn't think he did. At first the witness believed TOJO showed an earnest desire to have the negotiations continued but later felt he entertained doubts as to whether it was possible to continue them. He didn't have an exact recollection as to the date TOJO expressed such doubts. The witness remembered an Imperial Conference about 5 or 6 Sept. 1941 * where a decision was reached as to Japan's policy.

* The Navy took the interpretation that the Imperial Conference of 6 Sept. did not make war as its principal subject but if the negotiations were not satisfactorily concluded, things might develop to such a state. The decision was that if by Mid-October there was no prospect of the negotiations being concluded satisfactorily, the situation might be that they might have to decide to go to war. A decision for war was a grave matter and should not be taken until many conferences had been held. At the time of the 6 Sept. conference, the situation was such that no one thought of immediate war but were concerned with the prospects the situation might develop into where war might be unavoidable. They did go so far as to use the statement "a decision for War" but actually they didn't go that far.

34583

* Preparation for war and not the opening of hostilities nor the commencement of war was the first point on the agenda for the Sept. 6 conference. The witness recalled Chief of the Naval General Staff NAGANO commented at the conference that they should take up the subject of peace first and war later and said if there were any doubts on that point he was quite willing to have the order of the agenda changed. * Thinking back over the matter the witness then said he thought it was the Emperor who made the remark about the order of the agenda being changed.

* Asked if there developed much dissention and bitterness between TOJO and KONOYE early Oct. 1941, he replied that as far as he knew TOJO himself was careful not to give in to such emotions. He did not know that the feeling of bitterness was so intense that TOJO refused to speak to the Premier. In view of the critical situation, it appeared to the witness that TOJO was careful to prevent emotional splits within the Cabinet. At that time he met with TOJO

* continuously and they felt there should not only be no differences between TOJO and KONOYE but that they should be careful to avoid such splits between the Army and Navy itself. The witness did neither deny nor confirm that there was strong dissention between TOJO and KONOYE in early October. There were of course differences of views. Asked if that difference in view was that TOJO favored going to war in early October or by mid-October unless Japan's terms were accepted by the U.S., Britain and the Netherlands, he replied that at that time the view was that if the negotiations were not successfully concluded by mid-October, it would be unavoidable for Japan to start war preparations.

34587

* At that time the problem of initiating war immediately was not even discussed. The witness did not know about the Fleet under YAMAMOTO already preparing by way of practice for the Pearl Harbor attack. The Navy position was that its appropriations were limited solely to expenses needed for settling the Sino-Japanese conflict and the Navy was given no other appropriations. There were no items in the budget for preparing for war with the U.S. and no steps were taken for such a war. He did not know about preparations for Pearl Harbor attack made by YAMAMOTO. After the war he learned about the preparations. As other nations did, their naval college too conducted studies but the witness did not learn of the actual plan until after the war had begun.

34589

* Regarding the fall of the KONOYE Cabinet, at that time he heard from KONOYE his intention to resign two or three days before the Cabinet actually resigned. KONOYE stated that the situation had become so complicated he felt he was unable to solve the crisis and

4 December 1947

SHIMADA

Oikawa - Cross

Page the only method was to have the Imperial House take direct steps. KONOYE stated that he felt it would be better for such a person as Prince HIGASHIKUNI to assume direct control and that KONOYE could assist through his political experience and by this way accomplish a peaceful settlement. KONOYE said he wished to resign after recommending Prince HIGASHIKUNI.

34590 * Asked if he was not surprised that a harmonious Cabinet like KONOYE's would fall by the Premier's resignation, he replied that he did not believe there were emotional differences in the Cabinet but as regarded political questions there were differences.

34591 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that as a matter of political morality it was best that OIKAWA not succeed himself. Asked what was meant by "political morality" he explained that the problem was how to settle the complicated situation and it was felt that the * next Cabinet should wipe the slate clean and start afresh. If it became the new Cabinet's duty to do this, the witness felt that if the old Cabinet members remained in the new one, it would be proper. He believed it would be going contrary to this policy for the old members to stay on and that as a minister of state, such a view should be his morals. Asked if he was not informed that they didn't intend to leave the slate clean very long and that the question of peace or war would be decided in a very few weeks, he replied that the expression "wiping the slate clean" did not mean that an early decision for war would be made but meant that the decisions of the 6 Sept. conference would set a time limit of mid-October for taking steps if no prospects of settlement were reached, that such matters * would be scrapped and that a new approach would be made. No one had any idea of waging war within a few weeks. The witness did not necessarily think that if Japan would not obtain its minimum demands it would have to decide upon war within a brief time because of matters of supply and the like.

34593 * KONOYE never told him in substance, just previous to his resignation, that the Navy should be ashamed for not taking a positive position in stating it would not support a war with the western powers. The witness stated that he knew SHIMADA well at the time he recommended him as a Navy Minister. At this time SHIMADA had just returned from China on 15 Sept. where he had been C-in-C of the China area Fleet.

34594 * The witness and C/S NAGANO met him when he returned and he was received that morning by the Emperor with the witness present. Asked if he recalled that SHIMADA made a detailed report to the Emperor about war conditions in the 1 1/2 years of his service, such as the Chinese coastal brigade, operations of the Navy Eagles, he replied that as a rule reports to the throne were not given in such detail. He didn't recall accurately the nature of SHIMADA's report but judging from precedent the conduct of operations are reported but not in detail.

When shown a document, the witness recognized it as the photostat of the Asahi Shimbun of 8 Sept. 1941, containing an item reporting a meeting of SHIMADA and the witness and NAGANO with the Emperor on the morning of 15 Sept. 1941.

* Exhibit 3560, the document so identified, was received in evidence. Asked if Exhibit 3560 did not show that a report was made on the bombing of Chungking while SHIMADA was in charge of the China Area Fleet, he replied that it was true that the bombing took place while SHIMADA was C-in-C * of that fleet. * Asked if as such SHIMADA would receive reports of the bombing of Chinese cities, he replied that in the Japanese Navy, problems relating to operations were the Chief of Staff's responsibility and such testimony should be given by someone connected with it.

34601

To the witness was quoted an extract from the KIDO Diary of 6 Sept. 1941 (Exhibit 1135) reporting a conversation with the Emperor prior to the Imperial Conference wherein KIDO said to the Emperor that he advised that since * President of the Privy Council HARA would ask important questions on the Emperor's behalf, the Emperor should only give a warning that the Supreme War Command should exert every effort to bring about a diplomatic success as the present decision was so important it might lead to a war. Asked if this refreshed his recollection that HARA did ask questions, the witness replied that at that time the question of whether continued negotiations was mentioned by HARA. Asked if he was not the only one that answered HARA's questions, he replied that he attended the meeting representing NAGANO and the Navy and expressed his views in that capacity. It was said afterward that NAGANO was silent because he had different views * but that was not the case for the witness spoke up for NAGANO. It was true that the Emperor took the High Command to task for not answering HARA's questions.

34605 * DIRECT EXAMINATION OF SAWAMOTO, Yorio
BY MR. TAKAHASHI

The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3561 as his affidavit.

34607 * The affidavit stated that the witness was Navy Vice Minister from Apr. 1941 until July 1944, serving under Navy Minister OIKAWA and SHIMADA. While the witness was C-in-C of the Second Expeditionary Fleet under the China Seas Fleet, SHIMADA was C-in-C of the latter fleet. Around 20 Dec. 1940 SHIMADA called a meeting of his various subordinate commanders, expressing vital interest in the relations of Japan and U.S. He was very discouraged about the increasing tense-ness of the situation and said there must not be war with the western powers. He told them he was opposed to the further sending of Japanese forces * to FIC. He said he had been corresponding with C-in-C of the combined fleet YAMAMOTO, who was worried over the international situa-tion and stressed there should never be war with the U.S. and Britain.

The witness became Navy Vice Minister on 22 Apr. 1941 when OIKAWA was the Minister. When the Third KONOYE Cabinet failed and TOJO was designated to form a new cabinet, he was at his post only six months. He continued as Vice Minister at the direction of OIKAWA and the wishes of SHIMADA.

34609

The international situation had deteriorated and the possi-bility of war was alarming. The atmosphere was tense and all were working under strain. * SHIMADA was a full Admiral and high on the seniority list. While he had served in the Naval General Staff, most of his duties had been at sea and his experience in administration in the Ministry was not great. Moreover, he had just returned from China and was not well informed on the home situation. The first few days the witness explained to him the situation and suggested he promote the naval policy of continuing negotiations to reach a peaceful settle-ment. The witness knew that SHIMADA's avowed intentions when he assumed the post were no different than his predecessor OIKAWA.

Very shortly after becoming Minister, SHIMADA called a meet-ing of high ranking officers of the Navy Ministry and Navy General Staff and told them of his determination to push the peace talks to the limit to achieve success and outlined the naval policy exactly in keeping with the naval views of the old cabinet. The witness recalled SHIMADA once said * he would resign if elements opposed to exhausting every effort toward peace through diplomacy became too strong.

The witness personally knew that on the morning of Oct. 18, after agreeing to become Minister, SHIMADA went to see the new Premier TOJO to set forth a prerequisite for his entering the cabinet to which TOJO must agree. This condition was that diplomatic negotiations with the U.S. must be continued with the avowed purpose of reaching a peaceful settlement. SHIMADA told the witness and others at the Navy Ministry that TOJO had completely agreed and that they were going to adopt the policy of making utmost concessions to the U.S. to avert war. The witness recalled a conversation with SHIMADA on 23 Oct. 1941 at which SHIMADA said that TOJO said he was calling his first conference that day with the firm resolution to reconsider problems with the U.S.,* disregarding all past decisions. SHIMADA then said that the Navy's object would continue to be to achieve peace through negotiations if possible. Those in the Navy Ministry were viewing this movement with hope because the new government was approaching the negotiations from a new angle. However, upon receipt of the Hull note on Nov. 26, protagonists of concessions being made to the U.S. received a jarring blow. The U.S. reply was interpreted in naval circles as a virtual ultimatum, revealing an unbending and noncompromising attitude that promised no hope of the negotiations succeeding. The witness believed the note destroyed all but a faint hope for peace in the minds of naval men who had previously held out against war.

While Vice Minister, the witness had no recollection of receiving protests relative to the treatment of POWs. He would not say they were not sent to the Ministry because he did not know, but would say that it was understandable that if such protests were received they would have been handled by lesser officials because such matters primarily concerned the Army and Foreign Office. Certainly, if the witness did not receive such protests, it would be unlikely that SHIMADA as Minister did.

The Ministry never issued orders concerning operational movements of the Fleet but these came from the combined Fleet and C/S. Even so, he had never heard of any orders commanding the commission of atrocities or violating recognized rules of warfare. Before and during the war, the Navy Ministry issued interpretations relative to rules of warfare and he thought it unthinkable that this same Ministry would issue orders commanding the commission of atrocities or violation of the rules of warfare.

* CROSS-EXAMINATION BY CAPT. ROBINSON

The witness stated that he served under SHIMADA in the China Area Fleet from 15 Oct. 1940 to 4 Apr. 1941 and as Vice Minister served under him from 18 Oct. 1941 to 17 July 1944, a total of about 3 years. - 34614 * The witness left the post of Vice Minister on 17 July 1944 and at that time had no idea of the TOJO Cabinet's resignation. Asked if in general his service and SHIMADA's were cooperative, he replied that when SHIMADA became Minister, the witness requested transfer. Of course the witness expressed his own views and heard SHIMADA's views, but ultimately carried out the latter instructions.
- 34615 * In the affidavit the witness had said that he and SHIMADA were simply carrying out naval assignments, assignments at sea, and were disconnected from politics. Asked if by the words "naval assignments at sea" he meant that SHIMADA and himself were engaged in blockading Chinese ports and bombing Chinese cities, he replied that at that time he was C-in-C of the Second Expeditionary Fleet in China waters and the principal assignment was naval blockade. Bombing the cities was not his principal assignment but they did at times conduct such bombing. The witness had said in his affidavit that SHIMADA called a meeting of high ranking officers and outlined the naval policy exactly in keeping with the naval views of the old cabinet and he was asked what those views were. * He replied that they were to facilitate diplomatic negotiations and bring about peaceful settlement of Japan-U.S. relations. * Asked the distinction between the views under the old cabinet and the naval views, he answered that the Navy's fundamental views at all times were to bring about a peaceful settlement of the issues with the U.S. The cabinet's views were generally the same but it would not have the die-hard attitude which the navy had.

The navy consistently advocated that in spite of the various difficulties as to how to bring about a settlement, a peaceful settlement must be effected at any price. Asked the names of the individuals in the cabinet opposing this view in opposition to war, he replied he had never attended a cabinet meeting and did not know the details of those discussions. He had heard about the situation within the cabinet from SHIMADA but had no recollection as to the details of the discussions.

- 34618 * Asked what were the principal parts of the discussion SHIMADA brought back from meetings of the TOJO Cabinet and discussed with the witness, he replied that this question did not arise to any extent at the time of the TOJO Cabinet. After this cabinet's formation, reconsideration of the situation was held beginning 23 Oct. about 7 or 8 times. He thought the matter last discussed by the KONOYE Cabinet was that it was difficult for it to see any prospects in regard to the diplomatic negotiations * and even at the time of the

34619 to the diplomatic negotiations * and even at the time of the TOJO Cabinet it was difficult to see its way clear as to the prospects of them.

The situation being so complicated, no one could say anything definite about it and in that sense there was no opposition with regard to this matter either in the KONOYE or TOJO Cabinets.
Asked what position TOJO took in the KONOYE Cabinet with regard to this matter in which he differed with the Navy, he replied that the Navy's position was that it favored relaxation of the terms in order * to attain success in the negotiations.

The Army's position was that if there were prospects for success, it was willing to take any means to bring the negotiations to fruition. In his affidavit he had suggested that SHIMADA told himself and others that TOJO and he agreed to adopt a policy to make utmost concessions to the U.S. to avert war. Asked what these concessions were, he replied that at that time the reference was to general concessions and nothing concrete was mentioned. The point was that maximum possible concessions would be made.

34621 * REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. TAKAHASHI

The witness was asked if the bombings on Chinese cities were carried out upon instructions of the Naval General Staff, and he replied that the objective was principally to bomb a steel bridge * and this was done on orders of the China Area Fleet under the direction of the General Staff.

EXAMINATION BY THE TRIBUNAL

In his affidavit he had stated that before and during the war, the Navy Ministry issued interpretations relative to rules of warfare. The witness was asked to give some examples and he said that this was prior to the war, but a voluminous document pertaining to the rules of naval warfare was prepared and distributed to all the fleets and various navy branches and units. The expert who drew this up, ENOMOTO, visited various navy units to give necessary explanations, and after the beginning of hostilities, the document was more intensely and widely circulated. There were instances in the Navy where articles relating to POWs in the * Geneva Convention were printed and circulated. No particular interpretations of the articles were made but the rules were presented in an understandable form and distributed with the instructions that they were to be observed. The witness saw no complaints about the killing of survivors of torpedoed ships, nor the order of March 1943 to kill them. He had heard that such a matter became a question after the end of the war, but he

* FURTHER CROSS-EXAMINATION BY CAPT. ROBINSON

The witness said that when he referred to the fact that the pamphlets were distributed prior to the commencement of the war, he meant the war of Greater East Asia commencing 8 Dec. 1941. A fleet order related to the fleet's own operations and there was no occasion of a Navy Minister sending any directions to the fleet.

34628 While the Navy Minister was technically a member of the so-called Imperial General Headquarters there appears to be some misconception * surrounding this term. Headquarters was actually composed of the Army and Navy General Staffs. Each made decisions separately or often without consulting the other. The witness did not know of any actual meeting of this body since business was carried on informally. There was no central office or particular building housing Imperial General Headquarters and the navy had its own building and the army operated from its quarters. SHIMADA did not attend any operational discussions held by the Naval General Staff and certainly could not have attended those held by the Army.

34632 . Regarding awards for the conclusion of the anti-Comintern Pact the navy submitted seventeen names which in the above manner were relayed to the Decorations Bureau which however did not accept all seventeen but rejected eleven including the name of SHIMADA. There was considerable controversy because the army was to be given ten awards and the navy only six and the navy sought to have the army's number reduced or their own increased so they would have parity. Besides the navy awards were of a lower order than the army. The navy was then allowed to submit a supplemental list of four persons who held ranks according to nominees of the army. * Because SHIMADA was Chief of the Naval General Staff his was one of the four additional names submitted.

SHIMADA had not been included in the original list and the navy had no intention of having an award given to him as Vice-Chief if the army had agreed to a reduction in the number of its awards. The award was really a matter of his position with the navy and not dependent upon merit. He ultimately only received a Class B award with many others receiving much higher decorations.

*Witness identified and verified Exhibit 3564 as his affidavit.

34636 *The affidavit stated that on 20 March 1943 the witness was assigned Commander of the First Submarine Squadron under the Sixth Fleet. He had been interrogated relative to Exhibit 2105, a submarine order. In his interrogation he said that while the order appeared to be in the same form as others issued, he did not recall this particular one. After the interrogation he called one of his staff officers who also had no recollection of this order.

Words appearing on p 4 of Exhibit 2105 stating that they were not to stop with the sinking of enemy ships and cargoes but carry out the complete destruction of the crews and if possible seize part of the crew and endeavor to secure information were entirely foreign to the witness. It was not navy policy to conduct submarine warfare in that manner * nor to his knowledge was such procedure ever followed. With the advent of modern warfare it would be sheer folly for a submarine, after attacking an enemy ship to remain above water to carry out such a purpose. Therefore he could not concede that such an order would even have been issued. He denied knowledge of the execution order and that there was any collaboration with German submarines or that they employed tactics based upon German origin. The parent or basic order would have come from the Commander-in-Chief of the Combined Fleet and would probably have been received from the Chief of Naval General Staff.

He had been told that the Prosecution had submitted that the Navy Minister must be held responsible for the top secret naval order * but this was absolutely contrary to fact. The Navy Ministry could not issue such an order since it was a matter entirely within the High Command's prerogative.

Witness stated that on 20 March 1943 he was at Truk as Commander of the First Submarine Squadron and his flagship was the Heian Maru. The word "Gunki" in Exhibit 2105 meant a secret document of the armed forces. A document so classified would be distributed to subordinates connected with the operations and there were such cases when such documents were sent to places or to units having some relationship with that particular operation.

*Distribution was restricted to commanding officers and other higher officers. The document so marked would be preserved by the commanding officer or someone at his command and it was customary then after the matter had been completed to destroy the document. document existed he thought it should have been. He was not acquainted with the German practice announced by Hitler in 1942, * and he learned of it for the first time on the basis of inquiries made after the end of the war. He did not know that under the German practice they seized part of the crew and endeavored to secure information from them after the sinking of a ship. He did not know that the practice as outlined in this order was followed by Japanese submarines in the Indian Ocean in 1944 in the case of the ship Jean Nicolet, the Tjisalak and other vessels. He was never on duty with the navy in the Indian Ocean and he did not know units of the Sixth Fleet on duty there. * There was an Eighth Submarine Squadron under the Sixth Fleet. Asked if channels for orders to the Eighth Submarine Squadron were from the General Staff to the Sixth Fleet Headquarters at Truk he replied, with respect to the chain of command he remembered that there were times when the Eighth Submarine Squadron was under the command of the Southwest Area Fleet and in that case orders for that squadron would come from the Commander of the Southwest Area Fleet and whenever the Eighth Submarine Squadron was under * the direct command of the Sixth Fleet Commander the orders came from him. For that reason the chain of command would change in accordance with revisions made in the organization but he did not recall at what time any reorganization took place. Asked if an order issued at Truk to the First Submarine Force might also be accompanied by a corresponding order to other Sixth Fleet units in the Indian Ocean or elsewhere, he replied it would depend on the organization of the operational units at that time. If a particular squadron was placed under the command of the Southwest Area Fleet orders would come from that fleet commander. Asked if on 27 March and on 2 July 1944 he knew whether there was operating in the Indian Ocean a submarine known as the I-8, part of the Eighth Submarine Squadron, he replied he did not know at the time but learned of it later. *He did not know the commander of the submarine but knew that ARIIZUMI was at one time staff officer in the General Staff and later came to the submarine units although he did not know whether he was at that time commander of the I-8. During a part of 1944 he knew that ARIIZUMI was commander of the I-8 and that he was one of Japan's most able submarine captains. * After serving as commander of a submarine he commanded a submarine squadron. He had not heard that ARIIZUMI commanded the I-8 in the sinking of the Tjisalak on 26 March 1944 and of the Nicollet on 2 July 1944. He did not hear that the procedure followed by ARIIZUMI in the destruction of the survivors of those ships was exactly the procedure described in Exhibit 2105. In his affidavit he had stated that modern radar and airplanes made it sheer folly for a submarine to remain above water to commit atrocities. When asked if it was not true that modern radio-sending sets in lifeboats were one of the factors that caused Japanese to machinegun lifeboats full of survivors, *he replied they never thought of that. He was not acquainted with orders of the Southwest Area Fleet in which secrecy was enjoined and instructions given for the destruction of lifeboats and survivors.

December 1934 he became Vice-Admiral. He was with the Naval General Staff as an attached officer in February 1935 and became Vice-Chief in December of the same year. May 1940 he became C-in-C of the China Fleet, succeeding OIKAWA whom he later succeeded as Navy Minister. 34649 * From 18 September 1946 to 27th he toured naval hospitals then became C-in-C of the Yokosuka Naval Station on 1 October. On 18 October 1941 he was appointed Navy Minister to succeed OIKAWA. In February 1944 he assumed the post of Chief of Naval General Staff in connection with the minister-ship. On July 17, 1944, he resigned as navy minister, and on 2 August resigned as Chief of Staff. He was made a naval councillor and on 20 January 1945, on his own request, was relegated to the retired list.

34650 When he became C-in-C of the Yokosuka Naval Base he had not the slightest thought of being considered as the next navy minister or even know that the KONOYE Cabinet was in danger of falling nor of the dispute between TOJO and KONOYE. His knowledge of the political situation was dependent upon newspaper information. On 17 October, less than three weeks after assuming the command of the Yokosuka Naval Base, he was ordered to report to Navy Minister OIKAWA * and that evening OIKAWA met him telling him that he would like to recommend SHIMADA to succeed him in the new cabinet which was being formed. He said he had carefully considered all the available high-ranking officers and had concluded that SHIMADA was best qualified.

34651 SHIMADA's immediate reply was refusal and told OIKAWA that since December 1937 he had been away from Tokyo and did not feel his knowledge of the political situation at home nor of international complications could qualify him. He also told him that his past career had been at sea or connected with the General Staff and that he had never served in the ministry and stressed his distaste for politics, suggesting that OIKAWA continue in the post. The next morning SHIMADA was again summoned * and was met by both OIKAWA and NAGANO. NAGANO urged him to reconsider the refusal telling him it was his duty to accept. SHIMADA repeated what he had told OIKAWA but NAGANO did not change his opinion. They both told him that Prince FUSHIMI had surveyed the field of candidates and suggested that SHIMADA was logical.

During the conversation several telephone calls came from cabinet formation headquarters urging that a navy minister be recommended as soon as all the other ministers had been determined. SHIMADA hesitated as to what to do realizing he was one of the few senior officers available, and because of the opinions FUSHIMI, OIKAWA, and NAGANO he reasoned that his personal dislike for the assignment must not overlie his

Page 34652 duties to serve and he reserved his earlier decision and agreed to accept * tentatively. He then visited FUSHIMI to discuss the matter and the Prince urged SHIMADA to accept. It was thus upon these recommendations that he accepted and it was never solicited, was initially refused, and was an unwanted and unwelcome assignment.

34653 * The prosecution's contention that SHIMADA joined the TOJO cabinet because he was, and was known to be, an active supporter of the TOJO policy, and that his participation in the conspiracy prior to October 1941 must be inferred from his joining the cabinet was entirely unwarranted. He did not know TOJO, had met him only once in 1940. It would have been impossible for TOJO, an army man, to even suggest a naval man for the post since it would have met with violent opposition, not only because it was contrary to custom and to navy prestige but because of the rivalry and opposing view points of the two branches. He did not know what the TOJO policy was. OIKAWA had briefly discussed the situation at the time of SHIMADA's acceptance but did not know the problems involved.

34654 Immediately after telling OIKAWA on the morning of 18 October that he would * accept the recommendation, he visited TOJO to lay down a prerequisite before he would officially accept. He spoke to TOJO about 11 a.m. telling him that he would insist that negotiations with the U.S. be pursued to the utmost to seek a peaceful solution of existing dangers before accepting the ministership. TOJO emphatically agreed it would be the Government's policy to start from scrap in attempting to sincerely reach a diplomatic understanding to prevent war, in accordance with the Emperor's wish.

34655 SHIMADA was quite impressed and relieved by TOJO's attitude and felt that with the army and navy in complete agreement the essential disagreement leading to the KONOYE cabinet would have disappeared and chances of success were excellent. It was then and now his honest conviction that TOJO accepted the * ministership realizing the responsibility of his new assignment and resolving to do his utmost towards settling matters through diplomacy rather than by the sword, regardless of what previous stand he might have taken.

On October 23 TOJO told SHIMADA he was planning to call the first liaison conference and repeat his firm resolve to commence the discussions of negotiations from a clean slate and explore the maximum concessions that Japan could afford to make. Thus SHIMADA did not have the impression that he was joining a war cabinet but rather believed it was

Page 34656 an appointment in a government which, by its military strength, control and attitude would seek to exhaust all possibilities to settle the dispute peacefully. * The liaison conferences began on October 23 with all present exhibiting confidence that matters could be settled by negotiations. Everyone was wholeheartedly in favor of peace, but the question was how to secure it. Long and continuous meetings were held. The vital issues were not of SHIMADA's creation nor had he any part in their formation.

34657 Since the problems had already crystallized, his only function was to adopt a solution in his new capacity. Between the liaison conferences and the Imperial conference of 5 November 1941, his thoughts were focused on how best to ease the most difficult conditions of withdrawal of troops from abroad and reconcile this with the views of the army section of Imperial headquarters. He asked himself what were the greatest possible concessions that Japan could afford to make. The greatest difficulty concerned the withdrawal of * troops from China and FIC. He ascertained the sentiment in naval circles, other government members, and the trend of public opinion.

Since the navy had opposed and never attached a strong interpretation to the tripartite pact, he did not feel this was a problem incapable of solution if they could agree on other issues, regardless of the perplexing situation Japan found itself in. He considered the questions from the standpoint of the present. The best solution was a compromise with the U.S. and Britain and he directed efforts along this line. There was a strong opinion that matters had developed so far as to make it physically impossible to withdraw all the forces from China and it would be a psychological blow to the Japanese.

34658 It was argued that it would have amounted to a victory for China and would raise the prestige of the U.S. and Britain in the Far East * relegating Japan to dependency on these Powers. He thought it advisable to effect a compromise by a strategic withdrawal from China proper and an immediate one from FIC, if this could be correlated with the opposition. There was no doubt that Japan would then be making concessions not possible at the time of the Third KONOYE Cabinet.

On November 5, at an Imperial conference, a decision was made to put into effect preparations for war while at the same time maintaining efforts towards peace through diplomacy. This was not inconsistent considering Japan's plight. The Allies had effected an economic encirclement and they viewed with alarm the increasing armaments of the U.S. and could not

Page reason that such military steps were taken in contemplation of war with Germany alone. The U.S. Pacific Fleet had long before moved from its west coast base to Hawaii. The U.S. policy toward Japan had been strict * and unsympathetic, revealing a determination to enforce their plans without compromise. U.S. military aid to China had aroused bitter feeling. The Allied Powers had carried on military conferences pointed at Japan. Considering these facts there were two solutions open, one to relieve the overall situation through diplomacy, the other to overcome by their own power the actual difficulties caused by Allied encirclement.

34659

They always considered this last measure purely defensive and to be adopted only as a last resort. He never entertained doubt that Japan nor any nation had the sovereign right to act in self-preservation and to determine for herself what events would entitle her to exercise that right. The government, with the high command studied the situation and not a single member of either group wanted war with the U.S. and Britain. * The military knew that Japan had on its hands the China Affair, which promised no hope of being successfully terminated. To reason that we would voluntarily incur additional hostilities with the U.S. and Britain would be to attribute to them juvenile military reasoning.

* The government had carefully considered the maximum concessions that could be made, exerting every effort to reach an agreement. The High Command was faced with the problem of being called upon to carry out its function if negotiations failed. The High Command argued that the navy had about two years' supply of oil and there was no more coming. The civilian oil could not last more than six months. With the advent of December, monsoons would blow in the Formosan Straits,*the Philippines and Malaya areas rendering military operations difficult.

The High Command charged that if forced to wait until the next spring, they would be unable to risk a naval fight because of the steadily decreasing oil supply. In this setting the High Command revealed its position at the conference of November 5, arguing that if diplomatic negotiations failed and they were called upon to go into action it would have to be a step undertaken by early winter or not at all. It was thus in an atmosphere of growing desperation that the government took detailed steps for war, even though hoping for peace through negotiations.

Page The prosecution had contended that SHIMADA admitted he knew that YAMAMOTO had prepared his plan for attacking Pearl Harbor early in 1941 and that the plan was adopted in May or June, and that SHIMADA admitted that he knew early in 1941 that the navy commenced the development of a shallow water torpedo for use at Pearl Harbor * and that the fleet practiced the use of it during the summer of 1941. This statement was misleading for it inferred that SHIMADA knew about the Pearl Harbor plans before becoming navy minister, but this was not the case.

Only after he became minister did he learn of the Pearl Harbor attack plan and of the practice and research that had gone on in the past from First Division Chief FUKUTOME of the Naval General Staff. Since the accused was serving with the fleet in China, it would have been quite improbable and impossible for him to have been informed of this vital information. Being primarily engaged with administrative duties in his cabinet, he did not direct attention to operational procedures over which he had no jurisdiction, especially since they would be worked out previously and were entirely within the hands of the Naval General Staff.

While he had within his power the ability to know exactly when the fleet headed for Pearl Harbor, he actually did not know the exact date. Operational and strategical problems were left entirely to the General Staff and Combined Fleet, * and since all operational movements of the navy could have been called off in a matter of minutes, he did not concern himself with the location of the fleet units. The overall question was whether peace through negotiations could be reached before hostilities commenced and they were all working against the early winter deadline.

The government's determination to conclude matters peacefully was further expressed with the dispatch of Ambassador KURUSU to the U.S. and there was no subterfuge or deceit attached to his going to the U.S. It was a fight against time and a redoubling of their efforts to succeed in diplomacy before being forced into hostilities. On the following day, SHIMADA was still very hopeful that peace would come through diplomacy, but began to fully appreciate the gravity of affairs. * He was not a statesman or diplomat but still summoned all his skill to seek a solution. It was in this mixed atmosphere of doubt, hope, fear, and speculation that the Hull note of November 26 was received. This was a jarring blow. It was his prayer that the U.S. would have viewed whatever concessions as a sincere effort to avoid war and would attempt to go half way, but here was

There were no cabinet members or responsible officials of the General Staff advocating acceptance of the Hull note. The view taken was that it was impossible to do so and that this communication was an ultimatum threatening the Navy's existence. The general opinion was that acceptance of the conditions of the note would be tantamount to defeat.

34666 No nation willingly relegates itself to a secondary position if it can help it, * but constantly seeks to preserve its rights, prestige, and dignity. As a patriotic Japanese, he was confronted with the question of whether Japan could bow to U.S. demands and yet preserve its standing in the world. It would have been treasonable to advocate a step contrary to the country's best interests. It was the Hull note that caused him to step over the boundary line of peace when the final decision was made at the Imperial Conference of 1 December 1941. Even at this time, however, there would have still been time to prevent hostilities had the U.S. recognized they were sincerely trying to reach a compromise. In later November the government had all but lost hope of peace and felt war inevitable.

34667 The contingency upon which the war or peace hinged was the attitude of the U.S.. Using the Hull note as a criterion, SHIMADA did not personally feel it was possible to expect any improvement. The navy was never confident of victory over the U.S. but they were confident they were better prepared at that * time to fight than they would be later. Chief of Staff NAGANO had expressed this opinion several times previously, therefore NAGANO and SHIMADA, on 30 November, told the Emperor that the navy had made adequate preparation. The question of confidence of the ultimate outcome of war was not the theme of the conversation but only if they were confident of the preparation the navy had made.

The prosecution's contention that fortification of the Mandated Islands was carried out secretly for years prior to 1941 was completely unfounded. While he knew nothing of the blue-print map introduced into evidence, he could say that it was natural that desk plans be kept in reserve to meet eventualities. The U.S. must have recognized, after occupying the South Sea Islands, that there was little resembling fortifications. Defense of these islands was hurriedly carried out from immediately prior to the war with only necessary equipment installed and the converting of airfields the main objective in mind for defensive position.

34668 * Never did he favor a change in the government in the midst of war because it would betray to the world Japan's disunity and encourage the enemy. Regarding the evidence concerning his talk with Foreign Minister TOGO concerning his resignation, his action was based upon what he felt to be the Emperor's feeling at the time. This did not mean that he did not personally feel the necessity of preserving unity.

34669 Exhibit 1273 showed that KIDO advised the Emperor to seek SHIMADA's assistance to solve the dispute between TOGO and TOJO. The prosecution had said that SHIMADA was a member of the IRAPS and that when in July, 1944, reorganization was being considered, including a change of navy minister, TOJO suggested the advisability of SHIMADA being appointed welfare minister * in order to have a member of the society of IRAPS in the cabinet. This statement was misleading for the person referred to was SHIMADA Toshio and not the accused. This was an unfair attempt to cast SHIMADA in the role of a politician. The navy opposed involvement in politics and even when an officer served as navy minister he guarded this principle.

As minister, part of his duties entailed the issuance of regulations providing for the handling of POWs taken by the navy. In pursuance of this responsibility, the ministry would issue regulations such as exhibit 3055. After their reception it became the duties of the commanders of the various areas where prisoners might be located to follow and enforce such directives. They could issue necessary orders to fit the circumstances so long as these did not violate the ministry regulations.

34670 * Regulations issued by himself or the ministry did not contravene accepted standards of international thought pertaining to that subject. However, evidence had revealed that on some occasions naval personnel were guilty of reprehensible conduct. He heard for the first time in the court room of instances where naval personnel mistreated POWs and he was shocked and ashamed. Under no conceivable interpretation of regulations and by teachings could such conduct have been tolerated. Although he was in the navy ministry, he heard nothing of these matters and lacked the command ability to control the conduct of men on the scene. But because of his supervisory position, he must assume responsibility. While it was not a chain of command responsibility, it was more a moral responsibility. He did not receive

Page have reached the ministry but were not routed to his personal desk. Exhibit 2105 purported to be a secret order concerning submarine warfare but not even by stretching his imagination could he believe such an order was issued. If it was, it did not come from the ministry which did not issue orders of this kind. It was a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the general staff. As to cooperation with Germany regarding submarine warfare, there was little. Two submarines were sent to Japan but only one arrived.

34672 The object was to assist Japan in building better submarines but nothing resulted from this. As to following the German policy of submarine warfare, to his knowledge nothing of this kind ever took place for it was an operational matter solely within the knowledge of the general staff. He felt that Admiral Wenneker * in his testimony might have had adequate grounds to complain concerning the lack of cooperation with Germany, for the Navy never viewed with favor German relations. With modern methods of warfare on the seas, it was reasonable to assume that many of the old rules regarding submarine warfare became antiquated, but this was not saying any orders were issued by the ministry contrary to international law regarding submarine warfare.

34673 The prosecution had introduced a so-called speech made by him at a Diet committee on 10 February 1942. But this was not a speech but a discussion. At no time did he ever advocate cruelty to the enemy or the nationals of any countries. This was more or less an informal gathering of a minor committee whose function was to check on expenditures of Japanese budgets. The comments considered in their entirety lent a different light to the few reported words appearing in evidence. *The committee was asking questions and he was answering them and he did not believe any statement could be called a speech.

He was explaining that the meager economy of Japan necessitated support of the war effort from occupied countries. He did not speak in terms of eliminating or exterminating individuals, but in the abstract of achieving a supply of necessary materials and the elimination of economic opposition. Regarding the question as to whether the navy favored an attack on the U.S. without a declaration of war or giving notice, it was his firm belief that in such matters he could rely upon the knowledge and skill of the foreign minister and his experts. He never felt any concern about the procedure adopted until the question was raised after the war, and never at any liaison conference or other meeting he attended was there a discussion in

Page which the navy advocated an attack without notice. He did not recall notification being discussed at a liaison meeting, or the question whether notice should be given at all. He believed that as a result of consultations between the foreign office and army and naval general staffs * that it had been decided to deliver the notification at least one hour before commencing hostilities.

Testimony of YAMAMOTO Kumaichi of the foreign office that the vice chief of staff ITO insisted on an attack without notice, and did so at a liaison conference on 2 December 1941, was in error. The accused did not recall a liaison conference on that date. Not long before his death, NAGANO and the accused were told of this contention and they voluntarily questioned all the accused who attended the liaison conference, including TOJO, SUZUKI, KAYA, HOSHINO, OKA, and MUTO. None except TOGO remembered such a thing.

The prosecution had stated that SHIMADA received awards in 1934 for services in connection with the 1931-34 China War, and in 1938 for services in connection with the Anti-Comintern Pact, and in 1940 for services in the China War, and that the award for services in connection with the Anti-Comintern Pact had special significance. However, he received this minor decoration simply because at the conclusion of the pact he was vice chief of staff.

34675 * It was not known for high ranking officers to receive decorations on such occasions, even though they did nothing in regard to the event, as was true in his case. As to the other decorations, they depended simply upon his service and the rank he held during those times. Many other officers received similar decorations and no significance had been attached to it. As to his membership on the China Affairs Board, it was a post he took by virtue of becoming navy minister and had been a routine procedure for certain ministers to assume a vice-presidency on the board. He had no specific duties and exercised no specific function.

34676 The issuance of military currency and its connection with the navy ministry must have been inherited by him when he assumed the post for he had no recollection of approving or requesting this. It was quite possible that the matter was taken care of by subordinates. * Significance appeared to have been attached to the fact his name appeared as a member of the Imperial General Headquarters, which was composed of the army section and navy section. The former

Page section was controlled by the chief of the army general staff and the navy section by the liaison chief. He never attended these meetings and had no right to do so. Purely operational and strategic matters were discussed and since he had no voice in such matters, it would have been inappropriate for him to attend.

34677 He came to know HOSHINO, KAYA, KIDO, KIMURA, MUTO, SATO, SUZUKI, and TOGO after becoming navy minister in October, 1941, and if he met them before he could not remember it. He met TOJO for the first time very briefly in December, 1940, and next saw him in October, 1941 when the cabinet was formed. He met SHIGEMITSU for the first time in Shanghai in 1932 and they met again in April, 1943, when he became foreign minister in the TOJO Cabinet. He met UMEZU * in 1932 and HATA and ITAGAKI in 1940. His acquaintance with KOISO was in July, 1944, and it was only after he became navy minister that he talked with him at length. The following he met after being confined in Sugamo Prison: ARAKI, DOHIHARA, HASHIMOTO, HIRANUMA, MATSUI, MINAMI, OSHIMA, and SHIRATORI.

* On further oral examination, the accused was shown two documents and asked to identify them. He stated that he was familiar with them and that they were left among various reference data in the office of his predecessor OIKAWA, and that he had read them and made studies on the subject. Originally the documents were prepared by Foreign

* CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY,
Counsel for TOGO.

Concerning the testimony in his affidavit on the U. S. note of 26 November 1941, he stated he was familiar with the answer to the note prepared and delivered to the U. S. on 8 December as Japan's final note in the negotiations. He didn't recall whether he saw the draft of the note in the Liaison Conference, nor was he positive that he had seen the document at all, but because people said YAMAMOTO read the document before the conference, he was * inclined to agree. He didn't believe the testimony of his co-defendants, that copies of the document were distributed in the Liaison Conference.

Asked if he hadn't been asked whether he had seen that draft in his interrogations, in which he had replied that he had, he answered that he somewhat recalled that, but his recollections were vague. When he was interrogated he had not thoroughly studied the situation on which he was being asked questions. Later, after recalling his memory, he had come to the present conclusion. * Asked if his present recollection was that he was familiar with the note but didn't remember whether he ever saw the original or a copy, he replied that he had actually read the document for the first time after being confined in prison. He tried to trace back his memory, and concluded that he had never read the document before, but because other people said YAMAMOTO had read the document at the Liaison Conference it must be that he heard it read there.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. LOGAN,
Counsel for KIDO.

34687 Reference was made to the affidavit which stated that SHIMADA came to know KIDO after assuming the post of Navy Minister in October 1941. In connection with this, SHIMADA stated that he might have met KIDO before this, but he didn't recall it. It was absolutely untrue that KIDO at any time prior to his accepting the Minister-ship ever spoke to him asking him to accept. If a message had ever come from KIDO asking him on KIDO's behalf to accept the position, * he would kick the messenger out.

While SHIMADA was Navy Minister, KIDO never interfered or dictated as to what should be done in his office, and this would be totally impossible. KIDO absolutely did not try or achieve any interference or dictation over SHIMADA's office in any indirect method.

34688 SHIMADA recalled the all-day meeting of 29 November 1941, held between members of the cabinet and senior statesmen in the morning, and between some of the cabinet and elder statesmen and the Emperor for about an hour at 2 o'clock, and that later in the afternoon the morning session was resumed with the Emperor not present. * SHIMADA was present all day, and KIDO was not present at the morning session, but was present at the hour session in mid-day when the Emperor was also there. KIDO was in attendance on the Emperor only, and said nothing in the one hour session. KIDO was not present at the afternoon session, at which the Emperor was not present. SHIMADA did not know about the meeting between the Elder Statesmen and the Emperor being suggested by KIDO to the Emperor as early as 19 November 1941 so the Emperor could get everyone's views.

34689 * The accused was quoted a part of Admiral OKADA's testimony wherein OKADA stated that after the morning session they were given a luncheon, and after it each submitted their dissuading opinion to the Throne. Asked if he agreed with this statement, he replied that the Senior Statesmen present expressed the opinion as to whether there could be found any means to avert war.

34690 *OKADA's statement was correct when he said that none of the Elder Statesmen supported or encouraged war at the meeting, especially WAKATSUKI, KONOYE, HIRANUMA, and OKADA.

- Page: In his affidavit SHIMADA had stated that he believed his appointment in the TOJO Cabinet was an appointment in a government which by its very nature in military strength, control and attitude would seek to exhaust the last possibilities in a peaceful effort to settle the grave international dispute. Asked what was meant by the term "by its very military strength", he replied that the most difficult question was that of withdrawal of troops. The General Staff of the Army had a very large voice in this matter, and it was one in which negotiations were required between the General Staff and the government.
- 34691 * The purpose of his meaning in the affidavit was that in order to bring about a settlement it would be necessary first to effect a powerful control over the Army General Staff, for unless that were done it would be difficult. Asked if he meant that when TOJO took office as Premier his position became entirely different from his previous one when he was merely War Minister, he replied that TOJO as War Minister in the KONOYE Cabinet was entirely on a different position when he became TOJO, the Premier. As Premier, he must listen to and coordinate the opinions of the Cabinet Ministers, and would have more frequent opportunity for audiences with the Emperor, and the Emperor's repeated wishes for peace would impress itself upon the Premier's mind.
- 34693 Exhibit 3560, * which had been introduced during the cross-examination of the witness OIKAWA, (T. 34595), being an article from the Asahi Shimbun dated 9 September 1941. in which SHIMADA reported on war conditions to the Throne, was read by the prosecution before proceeding with SHIMADA's cross-examination.
- 34694 * The exhibit stated that SHIMADA, former C-in-C of the Chinese Area Fleet, triumphantly returned to Tokyo station, where he was received by the Aide-de-camp to the Emperor, Navy Minister OIKAWA, Chief of the Navy General Staff NAGANO, Vice-Chief ITO, etc. He then proceeded to the palace under military escort. * An Imperial audience was granted SHIMADA, OIKAWA, and NAGANO. SHIMADA, after expressing his greetings, made a detailed report to the Emperor about war conditions during his one and a half year's service in Chinese coastal blockade operations, the Navy eagles (T.N. pilots) bombing of Chungking and the hinterlands of China, the occupation of FIC, the morale of officers and men in the front, etc., after which the Emperor rewarded SHIMADA for his meritorious service.

34696 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it stated that at the Imperial Conference of December 1, SHIMADA stepped over the boundary line of peace and joined in the final decision for war. The accused stated that at that time he was Navy Minister, and as such was also a state minister, holding that position on the preceding day, November 30, 1941. As Navy Minister and State Minister, it was his function to advise the Emperor so far as matters relating to the Navy were concerned.

34697 There was no occasion in which he and Chief of Staff NAGANO were summoned to an Imperial audience on November 30, 1941, to advise the Emperor. * Reminded that in his affidavit he had stated that on that occasion he, with NAGANO, advised the Emperor that the Navy had made preparations. he was asked if there was not such a conference.
34698 * After explaining that it had been suggested in the first question that they went to the palace to advise the Emperor, but this was not so and they went in response to a summons, he changed his answer and said that he was summoned in audience before the Emperor on November 30. At that time they did not advise him.

Reminded that in his own words that he and NAGANO told the Emperor the Navy had made adequate preparations, he explained that because the inquiry from the Emperor was to that effect, they replied to it.

34699 * The accused was told that in KIDO's testimony, Exhibit 3340. (T. 31046). KIDO stated that he requested that the Navy Minister and Chief of the Naval General Staff be called at once, and the true intention of the Navy be ascertained to the Emperor. KIDO had also stated that at 6.35 he was summoned and told that the Navy Minister and Chief of Staff had answered the question, and so he instructed the Emperor to proceed as planned. Asked to what subject KIDO referred in his testimony, SHIMADA replied that his understanding was that he was summoned to the palace, and responded to inquiries from the Throne. The instructions were to inform the Premier that the Emperor had approved convening an Imperial Conference the next day, 1 December.

34700 * This was the same occasion as the one referred to in his affidavit, where he told the Emperor that the Navy had made adequate preparations. In his affidavit, SHIMADA had said that the question of confidence in the ultimate outcome was not the theme of their conversation, but only whether they were confident in the preparations the Navy had made.

Page . Asked if he meant that he was advising the Emperor that the Navy was prepared for an Imperial Conference, he replied that the inquiry from the Throne to NAGANO was, what were the state of the operations plans for preparations. To SHIMADA, the inquiry was what were the state of preparations so far as the Navy was concerned. To these questions both NAGANO and SHIMADA replied that the preparations * were completed. After hearing the answers, the Emperor instructed KIDO to convey the Emperor's words to the Premier, TOJO, that the meeting might be convened as scheduled, because the Emperor had previously told TOJO to postpone the meeting for the time being. At that time they didn't tell the Emperor that the Navy was never confident of achieving victory over the U. S.

The inquiry from the Emperor was, are your preparations as Navy Minister complete, and to that he had responded that every possible effort was being made in connection with personnel and materials. * Asked preparations for what, he replied war preparations.

Asked if when he told the Emperor that he was confident of the Navy preparations if he made it clear to him that he was advising him that the Navy was prepared to start a war but was not confident it could not be brought to victory, he replied that such points were considered and studied by the Liaison Conference, and were supposed to have been reported to the Throne by TOJO. They did not investigate whether or not the Throne was advised to this effect.

When he had stated in his affidavit that preparations were adequate, he meant they were adequate for war * with the U. S. and Britain. At that time the Emperor did not say to him and NAGANO that it was his understanding that in executing the Pearl Harbor operations the U. S. would be duly notified prior to the commencement of armed action.

The accused was asked if he was aware that Premier HIGASHIKUNI, on 3 October 1945, forwarded to Headquarters of the U. S. Armed Forces in the Pacific, * an official reply to questions asked him at a press conference on September 18, and that HIGASHIKUNI had stated then that regarding the question of whether the Emperor knew of the plan to attack Pearl Harbor before it was made, although the Emperor had heard from NAGANO of the general outline of the operations, he had not been told of the details of execution. It was the Emperor's understanding that in executing operations, the U. S. would be duly notified prior to armed action.

Page SHIMADA was asked if this was an accurate statement of the Emperor's understanding with the Navy as obtained in this conference with himself and NAGANO. He replied that all that he had previously said took place * at the audience of 30 November, when inquiries were addressed by the Throne. Other than this, there was nothing else.

34706

Asked if he knew that the Emperor did have that understanding with the Navy, he replied that such matters were operational and if mentioned to the Throne it would have been by the Chief of Staff NAGANO, but he didn't know to what extent such a matter was brought up.

34707

When shown a document, the accused was told it was a copy of a press release from U. S. General Headquarters, releasing the letter received from Premier HIGASHIKUNI. * He was asked if it was not an authentic statement of the situation, being the words which had been quoted to him. The accused repeated that not being in a position to speak about operational matters, he didn't know anything about it.

34708

* Asked if he was suggesting that the Emperor understood the U. S. would not be notified prior to the armed action, he replied that the question had two parts, apparently. The first was to what extent did the Emperor know about the operational plans for an attack on Pearl Harbor, and he had replied as he did because it was in this connection. The second point of the question was in connection with notifying the U. S., and with regard to this, not being his responsibility but that of the Foreign Office he did not know.

34709

The accused was asked if, as Navy Minister and Minister of State, it was not his duty as State Minister to advise the Emperor in regard to the Navy. He stated that * even in matters relating to the Navy, if it was a question of operations it was the responsibility of the Naval High Command and not his own, as was shown in Article 11 of the Constitution. Asked if as Navy Minister it was not his responsibility to see that the attack did not take place before the Emperor's command was complied with, or if he was contending that all this responsibility could be placed on the Chief of Staff, who was not a State Minister, * he replied that the Navy did everything that could be done. The operations were to be commenced according to a fixed schedule, and before that sufficient notification was to be sent to the U. S., and in that * manner the necessary arrangements were made.

So far as notifying the U. S., it would be in the hands of the Foreign Office.

He did not deny that it was the Emperor's understanding that in executing operations at Pearl Harbor, * the U. S. would be duly notified. This was not only the Emperor's policy, but that of the government. The matter of notification was under the jurisdiction of the Foreign Office.

34713

December 8, 1947

After being handed the document containing Premier HIGASHIKUNI's statement to U. S. General Headquarters after the war's end, the accused was shown a part of it which stated that the Emperor affixed his signature to the Rescript at 11.30 a. m. 8 December 1941. SHIMADA stated that this was correct. * The Rescript was issued to the Japanese people to express the Imperial will. The Rescript read to the effect that "We hereby declare war on the U. S. and Britain".

Asked if this was not the declaration of war delivered to the U. S. on December 8, he replied he knew nothing about such diplomatic procedure. The attack on Pearl Harbor had commenced about seven or eight hours previously. The delivery of the Japanese notification * was arranged so it would take place at 1 p. m. Washington time 7 December.

34718

Asked what word he had received from Pearl Harbor, he replied that he heard of the first report only by telephone and didn't have exact recollection, but recalled the report was to the effect that the attack was carried out well. He received this from his private secretary about 5 a. m. The secretary reported to him in accordance with the telegram, probably addressed to the C-in-C of the Combined Fleet, YAMAMOTO, which he thought was intercepted. * It was supposed to have been sent by the commander of the task force, Admiral NAGUMO. At that time he did not know that the notification had not been delivered to the U. S. before the attack, but heard of this after Ambassador NOMURA returned to Japan in 1942.

34720 Asked if he reported the attack to the Emperor, he replied that this was the duty of the Chief of Staff.
* He did not know when the Emperor learned that his command that notification be delivered before the attack had not been complied with.

34722 * Asked if he had not previously stated that he knew this had been the Emperor's understanding and policy and if he was not interested in finding out whether the Emperor's wishes had been complied with and if it was a matter of no concern to him, he replied it was not a matter of no concern, but was of the utmost importance not only to him but to the government.

Asked why he didn't check up on it to find out whether the Emperor's wishes had been complied with, he replied that this was the important task of the Foreign Ministry, in which they had utmost confidence.

34723 Asked if he was placing the responsibility then entirely upon TOGO with regard to performing this wish of the Emperor, he replied that in deciding it the Foreign Office and others concerned participated in the decision. After the time had been fixed there was nothing others not directly concerned could do or help in the matter of its delivery.

Asked if he meant that he was not directly concerned as a State Minister to cooperate with TOGO and see that the matter was carried out, he replied that although it was a matter of the utmost concern, there was nothing he could do about it because the task of having the note delivered from the Foreign Office to the Ambassador on the spot was entirely a Foreign Office matter, and others outside could do nothing about it.

Asked if he therefore did nothing in advance or after the attack in regard to the delivery of the notice, he replied he was only anxious, but had no desire to interfere in a task belonging to the Foreign Office.

34724 Told that in his affidavit he had stated that Foreign Minister TOGO said he remembered that Vice-Chief of Staff ITO had tried to prevent the Foreign Office from * sending any notice, he was asked if that was his view also. He replied that this was not the case. It was the Emperor's desire that notification be given in advance. This was also the government policy in strict observance of international law.

It had been the navy tradition to adhere strictly to international law, and those in the navy never held such petty views or ideas as to take advantage of the opposite party by violating international law, not to mention Admirals NAGANO and ITO, the accused had never heard that there was anyone in the navy who dared entertain such ideas.

Asked if he had not heard Admiral Richardson's testimony that NAGANO and YAMAMOTO insisted that the utmost secrecy be observed in the attack on Pearl Harbor, he replied that he didn't know from whom Richardson heard of such a thing, but there could be no possibility of his knowing this.

- 34725 * Asked if he denied there was any member of the Navy who did not think that the notification procedure should be avoided to prevent the failure of the Pearl Harbor plan, he replied that at no time had he heard such information. YAMAMOTO, one of those most concerned about strict adherence to international law before the attack took place, was very much concerned about giving advance warning and repeatedly insisted on making that matter certain. Members of the Pearl Harbor attack units who testified said that when they approached the Hawaiian Islands for the attack, they went resolved to meet a most bitter situation because the enemy would be there waiting. This was the impression of the Navy as a whole.
- 34726 * The accused stated that he knew about the attack on Kota Bahru, Hong Kong and Shanghai on 7 Dec. 1941 and knew that no notification was given Britain before these attacks. Sometime in November the combined Fleet called together staff officers for consultations at Iwakuni. Due to some accident pertaining to a unit in the south, no staff officer from that unit which later carried on the attack on Kota Bahru, attended the conference. For this reason, the unit undertaking the Singapore operations attacked shortly before the time of
- 34727 the delivery of the note to the U.S. at 1:00 pm and this * was a matter concerning which SHIMADA felt only the profoundest regret. He believed that the attack on Shanghai began with ample time provided for, and the same was true with Hongkong. He knew that in fact there was no note delivered in Washington at 1:00 pm. Asked if he knew that the note delivered later that day was merely a statement that there was no use to carry on negotiations further, he replied that with regard to the notification delivered to the U.S., it was his understanding that the Japanese intentions were fully expressed therein. Asked if that might be true and still the note might not have complied with the Hague Convention, he replied that he could not say as to this but at the time it was his understanding that Japan's intent was fully expressed in the
- 34728 notification. He * had read the Hague Convention III requiring notification before the commencement of hostilities.
- 34729 * Asked if he knew that this convention required that before one government shall commence hostilities, it shall give a previous explicit warning in the form of either a declaration of war or an ultimatum, stating conditions and reasons. He answered that since he was a layman, he had no ability to argue the matter. He would say that already before that date they had received from the U.S. the Hull Note of 26 Nov. which was taken in Japan as being in effect an ultimatum. By this note, Japan, against her wish, was driven into war for self-defense.

34731 * Asked if he was in the Navy in 1914 at the attack of Tsingtao, 34732 * he replied that at that time he was in Tokyo as a student in the staff college. Asked if a Tokyo newspaper was incorrect in stating he was in Tsingtao, he replied he had never seen such a report.

34733 * At about 7:30 a.m. on Dec. 8, 1941, he might have been in the Imperial Palace but had no exact recollection and he might have been attending a meeting of the Inquiry Committee of the Privy Council then. He had forgotten the exact words he used in the meeting but reported on the operational situation in the Hawaiian area, and then he attended a meeting of the Privy Council immediately after the approval of the Rescript declaring war.

34734 * In his affidavit he had stated that the vital issues were not of his creation and he then added that the greatest difficulty concerned the negotiations preceding Pearl Harbor attack had to do with withdrawal of troops in China and FIC. Asked if it was in pursuance of this troops and military installations were selected as targets but he did not remember where, he recalled that the point of attack was the Shanghai and Nanking areas. Asked if the Asahi Shimbun account was correct, that this was the first time in history that a trans-oceanic battle had been carried out, * he replied that he did not recall.

34737 Asked if while Vice Chief of Staff in July 1937, he transmitted to Admiral HASEGAWA orders to carry out the bombing of Nanking by Naval planes, he replied that directions were supposed to have been given in regard to bombing military targets and the air force in and around Nanking. Asked why he said "supposed to have been given" and if he did not brief HASEGAWA in Tokyo, he replied he used the words because his recollection was very vague. It might be that this bombing was the first time in history that the capital of any country had been subjected to air bombs, but he did not know.

34738 * He did not recall exactly if it was the HASEGAWA Unit which on 17 Dec. 1937 bombed and sank the U.S. Ship Panay because at that time he was no longer Vice C/S. He did not know if HASEGAWA was still carrying out his instructions.

34739 * The accused was appointed Commander of the China Area Fleet on 1 May 1940. He didn't remember exactly when he proclaimed the blockade of the China coast, but the previous proclamation continued in effect and when he considered it necessary he repeated it about May 7, 1940. In Aug. 1940 he strengthened the blockade by adding other places.

The primary purpose was to prevent military supplies from going to Chungking, but the blockade covered all shipping. He notified the diplomatic and other organs of the Third Powers of the blockade but it never entered his mind that the purpose was to starve the Chinese people into submission. It was only natural that the blockade did cut off not only imports of scrap iron, steel and oil, but also food supplies because troops eat food. Asked if this were not an actual case of economic strangulation, he replied that the circumstances were such that it could not be done to that extent.

While he was Commander of the China Area Fleet, he did not order the bombing of cities but the bombing of military installations and armed forces.

34741 Asked if on Oct. 10, 1940, a naval air unit made the forty-second bombing attack * on Chungking, he said it wasn't the city itself but important military activities there.

Asked if on the Double Ten Festival of Oct. 10, 1940, he visited a naval air base and encouraged the fliers who had been bombing Chungking, he replied that was a natural duty as a commander of a fleet, and that he did so.

Asked if Japan had declared war on China prior to this time, he replied it was the China Incident so there could not have been a declaration of war.

34743 After completing his term as Chief of the China Fleet, he returned to Tokyo on 15 Sept. 1941. Subsequent to the interview with the Emperor and on the same day, he did not recall issuing a statement that as Chief of the China Fleet, he had intensified the blockade and air operations against the Chungking regime. He did not remember at that time stating that although the China Incident had been making steady progress, the confrontation between Chiang and Japan had assumed serious proportions suggestive of an aggravated tension in the international situation.

When shown an excerpt from the Osaka Mainichi for 16 Sept. 1941, he stated he did not recall making the statement set forth there after his name.

34744 * He never recalled using the term "Chiang supporting powers" in suggesting an aggravated tension if they did not quit assisting China, nor did he recall ever using that term, nor recall an interview using the term "Holy War."

About 16 Nov. 1941, as Navy Minister, he reported on the war situation at the beginning of the Diet Session. * Asked if in the speech he stated that the Navy was blockading 28 miles of China coast, he replied he didn't recall the contents of the report.

When shown an excerpt from the Asahi Shimbun of 17 Nov. 1941, he was asked if the facts in the document were substantially true as a report of the speech he made on that occasion, he replied that being a press report he could not say that it was true. * He did not recall stating on that occasion that the situation in the Chungking area in particular had included some 40 attacks day and night and there would be no occasion for him to use the expression "day and night." He did not remember telling the Diet that early in March, surprise attacks upon several strategic points on the coast of the Kwantung Province had been made in cooperation with the army.

Asked if those events had not actually occurred, he replied * he had a faint recollection that a sudden foray was carried out to seize weapons being brought in on the coast of Kwantung Province. He did not remember telling the Diet that surprise landing operations were made at no less than 26 places to complete the coast blockade or remember saying then that Japanese Naval Units had advanced into South FIC in the latter part of July.

Asked how many aircraft carriers were used in these surprise landings, he replied he did not recall there being any carriers.

* In his affidavit in connection with his activity in China, he had spoken of the essential disagreement leading to the fall of the KONOYE Cabinet. Asked if this essential disagreement was between those who wished to continue negotiations while preparing for war with the U.S. and those who wished to drop negotiations and proceed to war immediately, he replied he did not know the matter in detail but thought that Admiral OIKAWA's testimony sufficiently explained that matter.

* He did not recall a talk made by himself as Navy Minister published in the Tokyo Mainichi on 7 July 1942, in which he said substantially that the Great East Asia War arose as a natural consequence to round off the China Incident. He did not recall, nor would there have been any occasion for him asking in that talk "What makes us feel more reassured than ever is the way our friends, the Germans and Italians, are enlarging their wonderful war results in Europe."

When shown an extract from the Tokyo Mainichi for 7 July 1942 and asked if that article did not quote a speech made by him, he stated that in the headline it stated a "gist" of an interview by himself. It was doubtful whether such a news item had accurately * reported what he said and he had no recollection of it.

34752 * He could not tell whether it was accurate or not. He did not recall saying that war to annihilate the U.S. and Britain by closely united Japan, Germany and Italy was progressing strongly toward victory. Asked if he could not find in the article a statement of the Three Demands which he favored and which made impossible the success of diplomatic negotiations with the U.S., namely, the conquest of China, domination of Greater East Asia, and the Axis alliance, he replied there could not have been any occasion for him to say any such thing because such an idea never entered his mind.

34753 * In his affidavit he mentioned a Navy shortage of oil as one reason which the High Command charged would prevent concessions to the U.S. He had no positive recollection as to how many tons of oil the Navy had on hand. It was his business as Navy Minister to deal with materiel and personnel * for operations. It was not true

34754 that one reason urged for making war on U.S. was economic strangulation with regard to oil. They obtained most of the 2-year supply of oil they had stored up from the U.S. and Netherlands but he did not remember in what proportions. Asked if, when he voted for war, he did it on the ground of economic strangulation by the U.S. and Britain as a matter of self-defense, he replied that in making a decision for war, an opponent was required and only upon the conduct and attitude of the opponent could a decision for war be made. * No

34755 decision for war could be made on the basis of economic strangulation. However, economic strangulation was one of the causes which led to the war. The decision was based upon the final attitude which the U.S. took at a critical moment as result of the economic blockade but economic strangulation was not the sole reason. Part of this economic strangulation was the U.S. refusal to provide millions of tons of oil to the Navy.

34756 Asked if, when he voted for war, he considered it in part just grounds for an attack on the U.S. * as self-defense, and that the U.S. failed to supply Japan with enough oil to feed the planes and ships which would be used and were used later to destroy American lives at Pearl Harbor, he replied that the question of oil mentioned was not a deciding factor but was an indirect cause.

34758 * The question of oil was very vital and of great importance to the armed forces for if there was no oil, warships, tanks, and airplanes, etc. would be useless. Heavy industry also depended to a very great degree on oil and if the supplies were stopped they would not be able to function as desired. From the standpoint of national defense alone, it would not be an exaggeration to say it was based upon adequate oil. Asked again whether the oil embargo

Page 34759 was one of the factors which caused him to vote for war, he replied * that it was one of the factors but not the fundamental one.

Generally, he was familiar with the Japanese proposal of Nov. 20, handed by NOMURA to Hull (Exhibit 1245-H). He remembered that in the proposal, it read that the U.S. shall supply Japan a required quantity of oil. Asked who made the decision to include this requirement, he stated that the Navy had a big voice in the matter and he himself emphasized the necessity. Actually the various arrangements were made by the officials in charge and he expressed his views to them.

34760 * At the time he did not consider the question of the quantity of oil profoundly. He was most concerned with whether the U.S. while understanding the purport of the demand would approach Japan in bringing about a settlement. He was not concerned whether U.S. offered to supply one million tons or 500,000 in response to Japan's demands for two million.

34761 * Asked if two million tons was the amount he mentioned in requesting this sentence he included in the proposal of Nov. 20, he replied that he had a vague recollection that the quantity was four

34762 million tons per annum. * Asked if by this statement he meant that the Navy having two years' supply had 8 million tons in storage at the time, he replied that was not his meaning. The quantity demanded was not for the Navy alone but included civilian and Army needs. Although the Navy had a 2 years' supply of oil, he did not recall the exact figure of the 34763 quantity in storage, but it may have been 4 to 6 million tons. * Asked if the requirement with regard to oil was one which the U.S. had to meet if Japan was not going to attack, he replied it was not a question of oil alone. He didn't believe he could state it so flatly. Asked if NOMURA and KURUSU had come back without that provision being met, if the decision would have been acceptable to him, he replied that the matter of oil might be regarded as a basic condition forcing them to decide on war, but it was not a deciding factor.

34764 Asked if the words the U.S. "shall" supply Japan with oil were not the language of a demand, he replied that * this proposal of the 20th of November was not a basic cause of war although the prosecutor seemed to be suggesting it was. In his affidavit, he had stated that he was confronted with the question of whether Japan could bow to U.S. demands. Asked where the U.S. made any demands upon Japan, he

34765 replied that the demands were in the Hull note of 26 Nov. 1941, one of which was that Japan * should withdraw entirely from the continent. Also, the Hull note had a lot of statements on the premise that everything

34766 * Asked if it was not true that Hull accompanied the note by oral proposals for financial cooperation between Japan and U.S., he 34767 replied * that he did not recall what Hull said.

- 34769 * Asked if he claimed himself as a state minister, and that Japan, through such representatives, had the right to make decisions without responsibility to any other authority, he replied that his position did not run contrary to any
- 34770 * international interpretation or practice. Reference was made to the affidavit where he spoke of the German policy of submarine warfare and he was asked when he first heard of the German policy to destroy survivors. He replied he did not remember the exact words but heard for the first time this was talked about when he was placed in Sugamo.
- 34772 * Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that operational plans would be within the sole knowledge of the naval general staff. Asked if "within the sole
- 34773 knowledge" * meant that the navy minister could not interfere even if he knew about operational plans that violated international law, he replied that that was not his meaning. Strict adherence to international law was stressed in the navy and he never believed that the general staff would violate it. If there was any case in which international law was violated, the navy minister would issue the necessary warning. He had never thought about the chief of staff's refusing to follow this warning and believed it could not happen. If there was no other choice he would see if there would be a transfer of the chief.
- 34774 * The accused was chief of the general staff in addition to being navy minister from February to July 1944, assuming this post the same month in which TOJO became army chief of staff. Asked if in the period when he was both chief of staff and navy minister he learned of the wide-spread atrocities committed by Japanese submarine personnel in the Indian Ocean and elsewhere, he replied he knew nothing. Asked if he could explain why immediately after he took that double command Japanese submarines launched their campaign to cut allied supply lines in the Indian Ocean and massacre of ship survivors, he replied he never knew of such occurrences, nor believe that they could have occurred.
- 34775
- 34776 He became chief of staff from the necessity created by the war situation. It was essential that during a war there be closest cooperation between the general staff and the ministry. As the military situation became worse, gaps between the two occurred, and the accused undertook to preside over both posts to avoid any controversy within the navy. He could not recall exactly whether at that time the army was conducting a campaign in India. * It was quite important to cut the Indian Ocean supply lines but he did not think it was especially important on that occasion. He did not recall if the Germans were likewise using greater submarine activity in the Indian Ocean early in 1944.

34778 * He did not recall if as chief of the general staff and navy minister he gave orders in February 1944 to intensify the submarine campaign there. He had heard the evidence showing that submarine atrocities had centered about the dates between February 1944 and July or August 1944. Reference was made to the affidavit where he stated that on some occasions naval personnel had been guilty of reprehensible conduct. Regarding them he said there was no means by which he could check the prosecution evidence on these but, believing there was some ground for the evidence, he had merely expressed his feelings about them. * If there were instances of machine gunning survivors he could not believe it but was expressing regret if such an event had occurred.

34782

34783 * He did not recall as chief of staff preparing general staff directives bearing on Japanese-German cooperation regarding submarine warfare. * When shown a document he acknowledged that it bore his name and was a general staff directive to TOYODA, C-in-C of the combined fleet. The directive ordered cooperation with German submarines in their communication destruction war in the Indian Ocean. He believed the document was authentic but * could not believe that the document shown him was the best duplicate in the navy ministry and since this document was not in his recollection he could not identify it.

34787

* The accused stated that he was acquainted with rear admiral ICHICKA, but did not recall what his command was during the first half of 1944. He had no recollection receiving from ICHIOKA, as commander of the 8th submarine squadron, a top secret communication outlining submarine records in the Indian Ocean between December 1943 and May 1944.

34788

* When shown a document he stated that it appeared that it was addressed to the navy minister and received on 14 August at which time the accused had already left his post. Such a document was sent to the personnel bureau recording personnel merits to be used for decorations. His memory was not refreshed by the document.

* The accused stated that he did not recall discussions about the means to prevent the destruction of oil fields in the NEI and had never heard any proposal to threaten the white population with death if the oil fields should be destroyed. Reminded that TOJO, in his

Page 34790 interrogation (Exhibit 1979-A), said that imperial headquarters drew its membership from army and navy staff and the ministries, the accused was told that he had testified that he had no right to attend. The accused stated that he firmly believed that his own statement was correct.

34791 *CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY
Counsel for TOGO

The accused was reminded that during cross examination he was asked if he knew no notification of the commencement of hostilities was served on Britain and was asked if he knew the reasons therefor. He was now asked whether either through discussions in the liaison conference or through seeing copies of diplomatic telegrams routed to the navy ministry he was aware that Hull had often told the Japanese ambassadors in Washington that Britain, the Netherlands, and China were being consulted on the progress of the negotiations. He replied that he knew that very well and also knew that foreign minister TOGO had discussed with Craigie the question of securing a British participation in the negotiations.

34792 * Contemporaneously he knew of Churchill's speech of 10 November 1941 stating that hostilities between Japan and America would be followed within an hour by the British declaration of war on Japan.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. LOGAN
Counsel for KIDO

34793 The accused stated that with reference to the meeting had with the Emperor on 30 November KIDO had never requested him to appear there, nor had KIDO any talk with the accused before he appeared before the Emperor. Reference was made to the KIDO affidavit (p. 31046) in which it was stated that at * 6:35 KIDO was summoned in audience and told that the navy minister and chief of naval general staff had answered the question about the previous matter with considerable confidence so KIDO was to instruct TOJO to proceed as planned. SHIMADA stated after this was read to him that this procedure was exactly as stated in the KIDO affidavit.

34795 * Regarding the meeting of November 29 when the Senior Statesmen and the members of the cabinet met, the accused recalled there were very long explanations given to the Senior Statesmen by government representatives. None of them refused to answer any questions of the statesmen upon matters other than purely military operations.

34796 * No further military operations were discussed and the operation for Pearl Harbor was top secret and only a few

Page high ranking officers knew of it. There would be no chance for KIDO knowing about it and KIDO would not be included among those officials you might know.

34797 * REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. BRANNON *

34798 The accused stated that when an admiral of the fleet returns from overseas to Japan he was ordinarily received by the Emperor and this was the case when he returned from his China Seas assignment. Asked while C-in-C of the China fleet he had formulated operational * policies against China, the accused replied that this was conducted in accordance with the directions of the chief of the naval general staff. The orders were then forwarded to SHIMADA as C-in-C who acted in pursuance to them. As C-in-C of the China fleet he never at any time issued an order for attacking a non-military objective.

34799 The blockade of the China coast was carried out primarily for preventing the inflow of any raw materials. * In so far as food was concerned, such supplies going to the armed forces were prevented from reaching them but all materials were not kept out but only those considered to be a military necessity. While the accused was navy minister, no oil supplies were received from the U.S. Asked if when he had been asked by the prosecution if he received more oil from the U.S. than from FIC he had answered on what went on before he became navy minister or during the time he was navy minister, he replied that the prosecutor's question had been directed toward the proportion of oil in storage in Japan between the U.S. and NEI. But while he was navy minister not one drop of oil came through Japan.

34803 * Asked to explain his statement that it was not true that one reason urged for making war on the U.S. was economic strangulation
34804 with respect to oil,*the accused stated that the situation in latter November was that oil had decreased to the point where it was weakening national defense. U. S. pressure was being daily intensified. Telegraphic information was being received from NOMURA on U.S. public opinion, from which it was understood that war against Japan was much 34805 more popular in the U.S. than war against Germany. * The factor which lead to war was not oil, but the Hull note. The heart of the matter was the U. S. attitude, and if the latter did not favor war, it was no concern of the Japanese, even if the oil supply fell to zero. In a situation in which the Hull note was unacceptable, if the U. S. attitude was that she did not desire war, there would have been no fear in Japan. But then came the Hull note, intensification of U.S. pressure and U. S. public opinion in favor of war. This situation

Page lead them to believe that if the U. S. should attack Japan, they would 34806 not know when the attack would take place, posing a very serious threat* which could not be ignored, and they were forced to make a decision for war.

34808 * The policy of blockading the China coast was conducted by the predecessors of the accused who took on the same policy and carried it out.

34809 Asked if the orders he issued as Vice Chief of the General Staff were of his own creation, * he replied that they were not, for the Vice Chief had no authority to issue such orders but they came from the Chief. The orders were transmitted by telegram and transmission was in charge of others. The accused stated he did not know that the attack on Kota Bahru, Hong Kong and Shanghai were to take place without previous notice being given. He believed all arrangements were made so that war would begin after lawful procedure had been taken. *
34810 He had no control over operations in those attacks.

34811 Reminded that he had previously testified that he would have seen to it that the Chief of Staff was transferred if he disobeyed warnings concerning illegal submarine warfare, the accused stated that the Emperor appointed the Chief of Staff. * Asked how he would, then, affect a change in the Chief, he replied that he would present his views to the Throne for permission. Such an act of the Chief as was mentioned would be a violation of Imperial wishes and the accused would be confident that the Emperor would grant permission to make a change.

34812 * The accused knew of no case in Japanese history where the Navy Minister discharged the Chief of Staff by going to the Emperor. It was customary and also his duty to report regularly to the Diet.

34813 * SHIMADA had heard the accused KAYA testify that NAGANO at a liaison conference 1 November 1941 said the Navy was not confident of over a two year war. The accused heard this frequently from NAGANO and the accused shared these views. When a Minister of State was summoned by the Emperor, he merely replied to the inquiries and did not volunteer information

34814 Asked if he had set forth in his affidavit his complete views on his responsibility for naval atrocities * he replied that it was the task of the Navy Minister in connection with POW to issue regulations for their handling in accordance with international law.
It was customary to hold POW for only a short period and, therefore, regulations were few. Commanders on the spot were responsible for 34815 handling POW in accordance with the Minister's regulations. * Necessary regulations may have been issued by Commanders on the spot on 34816 the basis of the Minister's regulations, * and the former also was responsible for supervising those who actually handled POW. The Navy Minister cannot bear the responsibility so far as chain of command is concerned.

Asked if the ^{Navy} Ministry had anything to do with the transportation of POW from the war theatres to Japan and Manchuria, he replied that

- Page with regard to this the Minister had consultations with the Army and 34817 further gave directions to the Commander on the spot. * Transportation would be the job of the unit commander handling transportation and it would be the same when they were transported to Japan. He received no reports about numerous deaths during these voyages. He never heard of U.S. submarines destroying ship's survivors. He never heard of anyone in the Japanese Government or General Staff or any other responsible official in the days preceding the Pacific War state his opinion that Japan was not justified in going to war.
- 34818 * Asked if there were any civilian members of the Government who knew of the Pearl Harbor operational plans prior to 7 December 1941, he replied that the Pearl Harbor attack was highly secret and there was not supposed to be a single civilian who should have known about it beforehand.
- 34820 * Exhibit 3573, an excerpt from the interrogation of SHIMADA was received in evidence but not read.
- 34821 * Exhibit 3574, regulations concerning POW rations, was received in evidence to show that POW received rations on the same scale as the Japanese Navy, but the document was not read.

34832 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3577 as his affi-34834 davit. * The affidavit stated that the witness held the position of Secretary General of the Society for the Study of National Policy. The Society was purely private and was neither an organization of the Government nor part of it. The accused SHIRATORI was not a member of the Society nor had any relation with it. In order to write a history of the world war, the witness borrowed various materials. Among those borrowed from ARITA were copies of private letters written by SHIRATORI, the then 34835 Minister to Sweden in November 1935, * and sent to ARITA, the then Ambassador to Belgium. From the copies of two letters of SHIRATORI dated November 4 and 12, the witness made other copies for his own use and returned the borrowed copies, and has never seen the originals. The copies taken by the witness were confiscated by the IPS, and Exhibit 774-A contains these copies of the copies of the private letters of SHIRATORI. When shown Exhibit 774-A, the witness identified it as the document referred to in his affidavit.

34837 * The witness stated he had never been a Government official.
 THERE WAS NO CROSS EXAMINATION OF THE WITNESS.

34838 * From Exhibit 774-A, a letter dated November 4 from SHIRATORI to ARITA, it was stated that what was written there was a conclusion from 34839 SHIRATORI's long-cherished and later revised views, * but as it was dashed off in a sitting, there might be inconsistent points in his aim.
 From a letter dated November 12, 1935, from SHIRATORI to ARITA, it was 34840 stated * that SHIRATORI's last letter had been written only for ARITA without copies and had not been prepared to be shown to others.

The Foreign Office should be aware that the situation prior to the Manchurian Incident more than proved that mere formality of good will had no value. The militarists appeared to be focusing their eyes on North China, building up a somewhat modified Manchukuo. Foreign views aside, from the standpoint of the Empire's interest, the propriety of such policy was at least very problematic. Future China policy should be aimed solely at excluding outside influences and immediately disregarding small profits. * By excluding foreign influences, they 34841 did not mean exclusion of all foreign activities to acquire monopolistic positions, due respect should be given legitimate foreign establishments in China and they should be prepared to give them cooperation. They only meant the expulsion of all influences harmful to China, and consequently itself.

Although they might say this shall be applicable to all they found that foreign activities in China retained no vestige of the days when each country had its sphere of influence. If Japan took the in-initiative in discarding extraterritoriality and other special rights, 34842 would not the rest be satisfactory? *Among the foreign influences that should above all be expelled was that of Red Russia, and the Empire's diplomacy must concentrate on this question, and for its solution, Sino-Japanese cooperation with Anglo-Americans is necessary. Thus taking a far-sighted view, SHIRATORI believed that adoption of a policy of instantaneous removal of future calamity at this stage when they are comparatively impotent should not be neglected. He was not saying they should unreasonably force war against Soviet Russia, but only that they should start negotiations with her with determination, not even refusing war if it was inevitable, to shut her out completely from advancing into East Asia.

34843 Diplomatic measures should be taken as early as possible, since the relationship of Germany and Poland with Russia * was the same as Japan's. There was no need for any specific understanding with them, for if war broke out, they would surely rise. The only problem was England. How to reach an understanding with England was the most urgent question. The first step was to open a way for understanding of China problems, but for this they must slacken the pace of the China policy, but should not have to make many concessions. He believed the problem was soluble as far as it concerned China. The nucleus of the China policy was a Sino-Japanese alliance against the Soviet. Japan and China should cooperate in having the sovereignty of Hsinchiang and Outer Mongolia restored, subjugating Communist rebels, reorganizing and strengthening the Chinese armed forces.

34844 * Japan-Britain cooperation should be within these bounds, and other problems were minor. Since this policy did not infringe on existing treaties, it would be free from criticism, and an anti-Communist alliance would draw sympathy from the world, and even the U.S. would understand Japan's real intentions. Success would depend on the method of execution and preparation. Reference was made to Exhibit 3575 to show that SHIRATORI was Minister to Sweden in November, 1935 at the time the above letter was written.

34845 * Exhibit 3578, a certificate of authenticity regarding ARITA's appointment as Ambassador to Belgium and transfer from there to China, was received in evidence to show ARITA's position and transfer.

34850 Exhibit 3579, interrogation of Eugen Ott, stated that Ott was * a German national, former Ambassador to Japan, and was an official attached to the Reichswehr Ministry as Chief of the Political Department prior to his first visit to Japan. He arrived in Japan in June, 1933 as an Army observer, remained until December and next went to Japan in March 1934 as Military Attache,* remaining as Attache 34851 until March, 1938 when he was appointed Ambassador. He served in this position until January, 1943. He did not return to Germany then, although he had requested permission to do so.

34852 * Ott met SHIRATORI for the first time about October or November, 1938, prior to SHIRATORI's departure for Rome as Ambassador to Italy. Prior to his departure, Ott never discussed with him any alliance between Japan, Germany and Italy. Ott first learned of such negotiations in April, 1939. He was first officially notified by Ribbentrop

Page 34853 * the latter part of April, 1939 about this subject. Ribbentrop instructed him to keep the information secret, but requested Ott to observe and report developments. Ott first took active part in these negotiations with Japan in May, 1939, when the Japanese Foreign Minister handed to him a letter from Prime Minister HIRANUMA to Hitler, to be conveyed through Ribbentrop. Ott did not hear from SHIRATORI at any time during his stay in Europe.

34854 * The second time Ott met SHIRATORI was after his return to Tokyo in the fall of 1939, but met him rarely in the months after that. The meetings were social and the Tri-Partite Alliance was not discussed during that time. At that time SHIRATORI was still nominally Ambassador to Italy, but in fact had been relieved of his functions. SHIRATORI took no part in the negotiations from his return to Tokyo until he was officially relieved as Ambassador in early 1941. All negotiations had been stopped after the German-Russian Non-Aggression Pact.

34855 * The Non-Aggression Pact struck Japan a surprising blow, causing the resignation of the HIRANUMA Cabinet. All negotiations with Germany about the alliance were stopped and German-Japanese relations cooled to a low degree. This situation existed until late spring of 1940, when the war in Europe reflected a change in the Japanese minds. Also strong U. S. economic measures contributed to this change.

34856 Ott learned that SHIRATORI was placed on the waiting list of Ambassadors about three months after he returned to Tokyo, keeping this status until late August, 1940, when he was appointed adviser to the Foreign Minister. It was normal procedure to retain Chiefs of Mission for three months * after recall. Ott had no official relations with SHIRATORI during this time, but saw him occasionally in a private capacity.

34857 * The principal aim of the Alliance at that time was a defensive pact against Russia, but such an alliance was never concluded. * In-34860 asmuch as SHIRATORI became an adviser to the Foreign Office in late August, 1940, and the Three-Power Alliance was concluded in late September, 1940, SHIRATORI occupied his new position for only one month prior to the conclusion of the treaty.

34861 * When handed Exhibit 502, a communication to Ott from Ribbentrop dated 26 April 1939, Ott stated this document informed him for the first time about the negotiations for a defensive alliance between Germany, Italy and Japan. It was evident the negotiations had been started in the summer of 1938 without Ott's knowledge. Ott took no action upon receipt 34862 * of this communication - he had been instructed only to observe and report. He did not remember hearing SHIRATORI mentioned by the Japanese side from his observations.

When shown Exhibit 503, dated 4 May 1939, a communication from Ott to the German Foreign Office, Ott stated it was a message of HIRANUMA referred to before, sent to break the deadlock in negotiations at the request of the Japanese Foreign Minister.

* From Exhibit 504, a communication dated 5 May 1939, was quoted an extract which stated that from the Foreign Ministry a senior officer who stood close to SHIRATORI it was learned that in the Government a deep cleft between friends and enemies of the Alliance had formed. When handed this document Ott stated that he thought this was one of the causes of the deadlock referred to. The person who obtained this information was either MATSUSHIMA or KURIHARA, and Ott presumed the information came from the discussions in the Foreign Ministry. At that time SHIRATORI was in Europe, and Ott mentioned the name of SHIRATORI in the communication so that it might add weight to the report.

* Ott was handed Exhibit 2198, dated 11 August 1939, from Ott to the German Foreign Office relating to information given Ott by HACHIJIRI pertaining to German-Japanese-Italian relations. The document stated that the War Minister should risk his resignation in the furtherance of better relations, which would also certainly entail the resignation of Ambassadors OSHIMA and SHIRATORI. In it there was also stated that it was imperative that a decision in reply to the concessions demanded be made by August 15, 1939, and that the War Minister would communicate the measures he had taken direct to OSHIMA and SHIRATORI, by-passing the Foreign Minister.

34865

* In regard to this, Ott stated that this was the only case he was informed of when the War Minister by-passed the Foreign Minister in communicating with SHIRATORI about these negotiations. This unusual procedure was followed because it was a matter of extreme urgency, otherwise there was a possibility of delay. Ott had no knowledge of what happened immediately after that, but on August 29 the Japanese Cabinet resigned following the non-aggression pact between Germany and Russia, and all negotiations between the Three Powers ceased.

Ott was handed Exhibit 498 dated 8 September 1939, a communication from Ott to Germany wherein it was stated that the Ambassador *in Rome --SHIRATORI-- would return from Rome since at that time he had taken up the post of Ambassador purely in the expectation that he would succeed in concluding a Japan-German-Italian Military Alliance. In regard to this Ott stated that he did not know of his own knowledge, nor had he ever officially or semi-officially, been advised that SHIRATORI was appointed for this specific purpose, or that he took this post with any expectation of concluding this Alliance. He thought the information in the document must have been based on heresay.

* Ctt was handed exhibit 511 dated 23 February 1940, a communication to the German Foreign Office signed * "Stahmer-Ctt" wherein it was stated that after Stahmer's arrival he found Japanese already known to him, such as OSHIMA and SHIRATORI in an unchanged, friendly attitude, and ready for every support. Ctt was asked in the interrogation why the message was signed "Stahmer-Ctt", and he stated the message was sent by Stahmer, but due to cipher regulations the Chief of Mission had to sign, and he was Chief of Mission at the time.

34870 Stahmer privately visited SHIRATORI with Ctt on Ribbentrop's instructions. * Asked what the occasion of Stahmer's visit was, Ctt replied that Stahmer was attached as a representative of Ribbentrop to the mission of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, which was sent to present Hitler's congratulations on the anniversary of the founding of the Japanese Empire.

34871 * SHIRATORI took no further active part in furthering Japanese-34872 German relations until the late spring of 1940. * Ctt was handed exhibit 516, dated 12 June 1940, from himself to the German Government, wherein he spoke of Japanese-American relations. Ctt explained the background of the report, saying that the collapse of France was obviously imminent, and the only effective relief which might keep up England's resisting power could come from the U. S. Therefore Germany endeavored to hamper this, and considered continued tension in the Pacific a useful way to prevent the U. S. from removing their attention from the Pacific to the Atlantic. * It was difficult to advance such 34873 policy upon Japan because her attitude was divided. Ctt was instructed to back an Italian protest against a Japanese measure in favor of the U. S. When Ctt presented his objections to the German Government's intentions he had to avoid Ribbentrop's distrust. Therefore he stressed in paragraphs 3 and 4 of this report that he was working in his own way and pointed to the cooperation of SHIRATORI and other Japanese to impress Ribbentrop.

34874 He did not mean in paragraph 4 that OSHIMA and SHIRATORI worked together in a common program, because there was no such agreement. As far as Ctt knew, SHIRATORI warned * against courting the U. S. after they had enforced economic measures upon Japan. This was not a common plan, and Ctt had only private talks with both separately, and OSHIMA kept himself much apart from political activities during his stay in Japan. Ctt was never in the company of SHIRATORI and OSHIMA at the same time for carrying out this cooperation. He had stated there was close cooperation in the message to give weight to it, and he used the names of KONOYE and SUETSUGU for the same reason.

34875 * advocated a non-aggression pact with Russia in an interview with Yomuri (newspaper). At that time SHIRATORI was on the waiting list of ambassadors.

Ctt was handed a copy of exhibit 538, dated 2 August 1940, a communication to his government, wherein he stated that SHIRATORI confidentially told him that he had declined the post of vice-foreign minister. It was considered that he would be appointed permanent adviser to the foreign minister, and he believes he can exercise a far-reaching influence in this capacity. Ctt stated that SHIRATORI did get such appointment, but to his knowledge did not have far-reaching influence, as later developments proved.

34876 * Through his official relations, Ctt realized that a vice-foreign minister was the permanent representative of the minister, and responsible for administration and personnel matters. The adviser had none of these functions, his effectiveness depending on his influence with the minister.

34877 * Ctt did not observe personal influence of SHIRATORI with MATSUCKA, even during the Tripartite Pact negotiations. He occasionally got the impression of mistrust between MATSUCKA and SHIRATORI, and they were critical of each other during private conversations.

When handed exhibit 548, another of his cables to the Foreign Office, his attention was called to a passage which stated that with the aim of further preparation of action to adjust state affairs on an authoritarian model, the government had formed a commission of 24.
SHIRATORI was appointed the representative for foreign political matters 34878 * in the Commission, which consisted mostly of reformists and followers of cooperation with the Axis policy. In regard to this, Ctt stated that by that time there were various rumors about interior measures taken by the new Cabinet, and the formation of this commission was one of these rumors. He was never informed of anyone else comprising the commission, and he now considered this information erroneous.

Ctt was handed exhibit 562, dated 31 January 1941, to Ribbentrop from Ctt, wherein the latter stated that activist circles demanded preventive attack on Singapore, and expected to deprive America by surprise 34879 action * of the possibility of military warfare in the Pacific. This minority group was under the leadership of SUETSUGU and SHIRATORI, and had the support of leaders of the army and navy. In regard to this, Ctt stated that he had been informed that by a preventive attack on Singapore it was the idea that this would preclude America from entering the Pacific War, or make it more difficult.

- Page He got this information during January 1941 from the German Embassy members and from Japanese. At this time of heightened tension there was much political discussion. These talks were private. * Ott had never been offered any proof of SHIRATORI being a leader of such a group.
- 34880
- 34883 * Ott was handed exhibit 1113, dated 7 July 1941, another communication from him to Ribbentrop, and was asked to read it. When asked where SHIRATORI was residing at the time of the visit mentioned in it, he stated at Hayama, two hours from Tokyo. This visit was not a special one, for Ott went there many times, * as he had a villa there.
- 34884 On one of these occasions he visited SHIRATORI. He had been directed by Ribbentrop to convey to SHIRATORI his best wishes for his recovery, but did not make a special trip for this purpose.
- 34885 * When asked if he knew at the time of this visit that SHIRATORI's illness was of a mental nature, he replied that he found this out later, but reported then that it was kidney trouble. Asked if the wrong information as to the nature of SHIRATORI's illness was an effort to cover up its real nature, both by SHIRATORI and his friends, he replied he thought it was mainly due to Japanese shyness.
- 34886 * At that time SHIRATORI gave the impression of being mentally tired.
- Ott was handed exhibit 800, dated 1 August 1941, and in regard to it stated that he held the conversation reported in it with YAMAMOTO. SHIRATORI was not present at the time. In the report he pointed out that he had visited SHIRATORI. This visit also was not special. So far as Ott knew, none of the ideas advanced by YAMAMOTO was realized.
- 34887 * Ott was handed exhibit 608, dated 5 December 1941, a cable to his Foreign Office, in which it was stated that SHIRATORI explained to Ott that leading circles had concluded that Roosevelt wanted to enter the war by a conflict in the Far East. The opinion advocated that the U. S. was sure of the coalition of the ABCD States and Russia, and Roosevelt believed that the moment for settlement had come. In regard to this, Ott stated that only the first sentence above related to SHIRATORI. He didn't recall where he saw SHIRATORI at this time, but
- 34888 * possibly at his seaside villa.
- 34889 * SHIRATORI still appeared to be in a state of convalescence, and he didn't think he reported his recovery to his government.

This note was sent while Ott was in Germany, where he had been called to be present during MATSUKA's visit. SHIRATORI was then in Japan. * He met SHIRATORI probably in February 1941, before he left for Germany. This meeting was purely personal.

DEFENSE - SHIRATORI

Page It was correct to say that SHIRATORI was a career diplomat and was at no time in either the army or navy. SHIRATORI's opinion was only that of a layman.

34892 Ott was handed exhibit 1272, dated 17 May 1942, a communication to Germany recommending German decorations. Asked to explain the German protocol in awarding decorations to foreign nationals, he stated that * recommendations for these had to be made to Hitler, from proposals from various ministries. Ribbentrop was anxious to get foreign decorations and became angry when he thought Japan had not bestowed a sufficient number upon Germans, and succeeded in blocking decorations for Japanese for a time. Consequently the Japanese became insistent, and to break this deadlock Ott presented to Ribbentrop a list of recommendations to be bestowed on the second anniversary of the Tripartite Pact in September 1942. * There was somewhat of a contest as to who would get the most decorations. The German Protocol provided that the Great Cross was the only decoration for which one of ambassador's rank was eligible. As this was known to the Japanese Board of Decorations, a lesser decoration would have been considered unfavorable by them. Ott recommended SHIRATORI on the decorations list because he was personally known to Ribbentrop and had been adviser to the foreign minister at the time of the pact's conclusion. Ott did not think from later developments that the efforts of SHIRATORI deserved the award given him.

34894 * MATSUOKA had been decorated previously, and SAITO, an adviser to MATSUOKA, was decorated at the same time as SHIRATORI with the Great Cross. In discussions with the Japanese before the recommendations, they usually suggested distributing decorations in order not to create dissatisfaction. * The recommendation of SAITO and others to receive the Distinguished Service Cross was made by the German military attache upon the insistence of the Japanese Army, which was angry because no German award had been given for a considerable time. Ott backed SAITO's recommendation due to his position as chief of the section, where liaison with the German Embassy was centered.

34901 * When the government, in the face of dramatic changes in German policy, acted as they did, Ribbentrop acted often with marked distrust and overlooked the facts upon which Japan used to base their decisions. When Ott tried to moderate Ribbentrop's views, he awakened mounting distrust. To avoid such development, Ott carried on personal relations with those Japanese personally known to Ribbentrop, and he had mentioned these people, among them SHIRATORI, and stressed their cooperation to give weight to his opinions.

34902 * There was no real cooperation between Germany and Japan in the conduct of the war as to military and economic operations, compared with that of the Allied nations. The Tripartite Pact provided for a commission, which did not set to work until Japan entered the war. In January 1942, an agreement was concluded in Berlin fixing the separate spheres of military operations. In the military field, there was only an occasional exchange of blueprints or samples of weapons. In economics, there was the transport of raw materials to Germany via the Siberian Railway, and later by blockade running. This transport col-

34903 * lapsed about the end of 1943.

Ott stated he had no relations with KIDO in his official capacity, but met him occasionally on ceremonial or social functions. The German government distrusted KIDO, and considered that he belonged to a group which did not favor improving of Japanese-German relations. Under the leadership of Imperial Household Minister MATSUDAIRA, Ott considered KIDO in line with MATSUDAIRA's views.

34906 * Reference was made to exhibit 3575, curriculum vitae of SHIRATORI, to show that he arrived in Tokyo from Stockholm on 23 December 1936; that he was relieved from the ministership in Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Finland, and was placed on the waiting list April 28, 1937; that he was appointed Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Italy 22 September 1938; and that he left Tokyo November 22, 1938, and arrived in Rome December 29, 1938.

by Mr. Caudle.

34908 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 3580 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was Foreign Minister in the first KONOYE Cabinet, from May 26 to September 29, 1938. At the end of August KONOYE suggested the appointment of SHIRATORI as vice-minister, as SHIRATORI was then on the waiting list as a minister. The witness thought it had to leave him without any assignment, and therefore requested SHIRATORI to accept the post of Ambassador to Italy. He first showed reluctance and later consented, and was installed on September 22.

* In deciding on this appointment, there was no consideration to specifically make SHIRATORI conduct a negotiation towards strengthening the anti-Comintern Pact, or have him put forth special efforts to induce Italy to participate in such an agreement, and no mention was made of this matter. The question of strengthening the pact had been brought to the notice of Japan in the form of information from German quarters, and was not a formal overture, being conveyed by the Japanese Military Attache in Berlin as a piece of information. The government decided to launch into a tentative negotiation, but no mature study had been made. The witness 34910 believed that the question of strengthening the pact * centered upon preventing the communistic revolution, and believed that whether the strengthening the pact should stop at mutual political assistance or should embrace military assistance as well should be studied on that premise and determined through negotiation.

The witness had accepted the post of Foreign Minister to tackle the all-important problem of the China Affair, and the question of strengthening the anti-Comintern Pact was a minor consideration with him, and that was why he had not specifically discussed it with SHIRATORI. SHIRATORI left Tokyo for Rome some time after the witness resigned as Foreign Minister.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY, Counsel for TCGC.

34912

* The witness stated that at the time he was Foreign Minister in 1938, the accused TCGC was Ambassador to Germany. He remembered receiving cablegrams from TCGC stating his views on the Three Power Alliance, and the witness recalled that TCGC opposed its being directed against any countries whatsoever.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. IOGAN,
Counsel for KIDO.

34913

* The witness was told of the prosecution contention that he was suggested by WAKATSUKI as the only man who might have averted war at the meeting of the Senior Statesmen, on 17 October 1941. Asked if

Page he agreed with the prosecution's contention, he stated that he must leave that up to the counsel's judgment.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. SANDUSKY.

34914 * The witness was asked if it was not true that Germany, by September 1938, had already at least been informally advised that Japan could not agree to a pact calling for immediate participation in war, or one having no limitations as to its scope or the opposing parties. He replied that he had no knowledge as to whether Germany was informed informally of such views. During his tenure, all he learned was through the military that Germany desired a general military alliance. The matter had not advanced to such a stage where they could carry on official negotiations.

34915 * He did hear rumors of pressure from other quarters to appoint SHIRATORI as vice-foreign minister, but no one approached him directly on this other than KCNOYE. He didn't recall a petition presented by CKAWA and signed by younger officials of the Foreign Office urging 34916 SHIRATORI's appointment. He didn't recall that around June 1938 he complained to KCNOYE that War Minister ITAGAKI was most persistent in pressing for SHIRATORI's appointment. He didn't even hear rumors to the effect that after his resignation as foreign minister, fifty young foreign office officials again presented a petition, this time to KCNOYE, urging SHIRATORI's appointment as foreign minister.

It was true that seven days after SHIRATORI was appointed ambassador to Italy the witness was succeeded as Foreign Minister by KCNOYE.

34917 * In response to a question by the Tribunal, the witness stated that when he said he had no recollection of CKAWA's demands, he meant that no such demands were made.

In response to questions by Mr. Caudle, the witness stated that it might be true that three days after arrival in Rome, the KCNOYE Cabinet fell; he did know that the Cabinet fell in early January 1939.

34918 * Exhibit 3581, a telegram from SHIRATORI at Rome to Foreign Minister ARITA, dated 10 January, 1939, concerning the presentation of 34920 credentials, reported that * SHIRATORI arrived at his post on 29 December, 1938, and on the 31st handed Foreign Minister Ciano his credentials. On 9 January SHIRATORI was informed that the ceremony of the presentation would be held on the 10th, and on that day the ceremony was held.

34921 * Exhibit 3583, excerpts from the Ciano Diary, were received 34922 in evidence. An excerpt dated 1 January, 1939, stated * that Mussolini had returned to Rome the evening of the day before, and Ciano had a long

Page conversation with him. Mussolini informed Ciano about his decision to accept Ribbentrop's proposal to transform the anti-Comintern Pact into an alliance, and wished it to be signed the last part of January. Ciano wrote to Ribbentrop the outlined acceptance.

34923 In an excerpt dated 2 January, 1939, it was stated that the letter for Ribbentrop had been approved. The next day Ciano would transmit to Attolico, with instructions as to what he was to say to the Germans in connection with the Alto Adige and commercial relations concerning the Alto Adige, which would fall in with Hitler's plans to permit the departure of those Germans who want to leave. Ribbentrop was telephoned by Ciano and informed of this decision. Ribbentrop was satisfied, and confirmed * that by the end of the month everything would be ready, even on the Japanese side.

34924 * An excerpt dated 3 January, 1939, stated that Ciano gave Attolico instructions on his mission to Ribbentrop, and in the afternoon Ciano also informed von Mackensen. In an excerpt dated 5 January, 1939, it was stated that after a first conversation with Ribbentrop, Attolico reported that Ribbentrop proposed 28 January as the day for concluding the alliance. Mussolini had told Ciano that he had informed the King of the alliance, and he showed himself satisfied.

34926 * Exhibit 3584, a memorandum of Mackensen, German Ambassador at Rome, 3 January, 1939, stated that Ciano informed him that Mussolini had decided that the signing of the Tripartite Pact could take place immediately. Ciano had written Ribbentrop a letter, which Attolico, was to 34927 * take to him. A day at the end of January was under consideration, and Ribbentrop considered this practical. CSHIMA would sign for Japan. Ciano agreed with Ribbentrop on the choice of Berlin as the place for signing, and the 28th or 30th would be suitable days.

34928 * Exhibit 3585, excerpts from the Ciano Diary, were received in evidence. An excerpt dated 3 February, 1939, stated that Mussolini was discontented with the Japanese delays in concluding the Tripartite Alliance, and regretted the way in which Ribbentrop lightly assumed that the Tokyo government agree to conclude the pact, thinking it might be a good idea to conclude a double alliance without Japan and leave Japan to face Anglo-French force alone. In this way the pact would have no anti-British or anti-American flavor.

An excerpt dated 25 April, 1939, stated that news came from Berlin that the Japanese persist in reservations with respect to the triple alliance, and the signing was postponed sine die. Mussolini was glad of this, for he had considered Japan's adherence more harmful than useful. Ribbentrop would be met on the 6th to define the common policy.

34930 In an excerpt dated May 6 and 7, 1939, it was stated that Ciano took notes of the discussions with Ribbentrop. * The immediate announcement of the alliance was decided Saturday evening, following a telephone call from Mussolini. Ciano reported to Mussolini the results, but Mussolini demanded more and asked Ciano to have the Bilateral Pact announced. Ribbentrop, who at heart always aimed at the inclusion of Japan in the Pact, at first demurred, but then said he must obtain Hitler's approval. Hitler was then called and gave his immediate approval.

34931 * Exhibit 3586 certified to the authenticity of copies of telegrams exchanged between the Japanese Foreign Office and SPINACORI, the Ambassador to Italy, re negotiations concerning the Tripartite Pact, were destroyed by fire.

34935 * From exhibit 2234 a lecture given by SHIRATORI at the Imperial University Alumni Association in February 1940, a previously unread portion stated that there were some who said that if the Tripartite Alliance had been formed, would not Japan have been involved in the war in Europe. It was lucky the alliance had not been formed, for the bare thought made them shutter. However, SHIRATORI said he thought this was fundamentally a misconception. If the alliance had taken shape the war might not have broken out. Britain and France would have made a diplomatic retreat and enabled Japan in * China and Germany and Italy in Europe to solve their questions peacefully.

From the beginning Germany and Italy had said that the real aim of the treaty was for peace and that, since the three powers were destined to share the same fate they would be beaten if divided. They further said that since the alliance was spiritual, it was necessary to display to the public its real effect and so they would begin by assisting Japan to bring the China incident to a conclusion speedily. SHIRATORI believed that had the alliance been realized by April of the current year, results would have been favorable. The Nomonhan incident would not have taken place nor could Britain have assumed a bold front concerning Danzig.

34937 Even if Germany should attempt a speedy solution of her problems * and go to war against Britain and France, it would have been possible for Japan to obtain Germany's consent to her neutrality in case immediate entry into war was inconvenient. It had been arranged that if the alliance was formed, the three foreign ministers would simultaneously meet to discuss politics. In such discussion Japan could have had a great voice in connection with German and Italian diplomacy. Should they undertake war against Britain and France, Japan could have declared she could not offer sufficient support and that they could go ahead with it if they were confident.

34938 He believed that it could not always be said that if the alliance had been formed Japan must enter into war. It is probable that if the alliance * had been formed, war between Germany and Britain and France would not have broken out at that time. Germany and Italy still had much to prepare for. Since it was necessary for Japan to have rest after settling the China incident, the war

34941 * The witness was told that SHIRATORI had brought no written instructions from Tokyo. He remembered SHIRATORI saying that the affair had become clear to him because of the detailed account given by SHIRATORI and the attaches. While serving with SHIRATORI it was his practice to dictate to the witness cables to Tokyo on the subject of the Tripartite treaty. SAKAMOTO and secretaries MIHARA and KABAYAMA were generally present and occasionally also the attaches. About 6 January 1939 SHIRATORI had a conversation with Mussolini and afterward told the embassy he was surprised to know that Mussolini was all for the proposed treaty. SHIRATORI said that inasmuch as a final decision had to be made first by the Japanese government, he tried to dampen Mussolini's zeal.

34942 * The gist of this interview was sent to the foreign minister. When the ITO mission arrived their instructions were not shown or discussed as it was understood a full explanation would be given for them. SHIRATORI, SAKAMOTO and the witness accompanied the ITO mission to Berlin. It was said there was nothing to be called in question concerning the draft text and protocols of the treaty as contained in the Tokyo instructions, but that it was proposed to attach two reservations placing limitations on the treaty. SHIRATORI expressed that not only was there no prospect for such reservations being entertained by Germany and Italy, but it would be a disgrace to Japanese diplomacy to leave on record a proposal amounting to taking back with the left hand what was offered with the right.

The witness recollected a telegram to this effect was sent to Tokyo. * After his arrival in Rome, SHIRATORI seemed to pay serious attention particularly to German-Soviet and Italian-Soviet relations and frequently expressed it was a mistake to presume that Germany and Italy and the Soviet were irreconcilable. He said Italian-Russian relations were not at all bad and it was not impossible that some sort of understanding between the USSR and the Axis could be reached. Japan should be on guard against the contingency of Germany adopting a policy of pushing Russia on to the Far East by guaranteeing her western borders. The witness recollected that SHIRATORI cabled such opinion to Tokyo.

In regard to the proposed treaty, SHIRATORI used to say that it should be considered as a means in * diplomatic manoeuvres, and should be viewed as to the effect that a rapprochement between Japan and the Axis would have on the U.S. and Britain. He thought that while the China problem was difficult to solve with the good offices of the U.S. and Britain, it was necessary to show a gesture of friendship with the Axis to make them slacken their pressure. So far as the witness perceived, there was no close contact between SHIRATORI and the Italian authorities. Italy practically left to Berlin the matter of the Tripartite Treaty and there was little exchange of views between SHIRATORI and Mussolini or Ciano.

SHIRATORI said once that Ciano had cynically told him that the whole question was in the "able" hands of Ribbentrop. The negotiations were carried on almost exclusively in Berlin and SHIRATORI's part was mainly making suggestions to the foreign ministry in Tokyo. * The witness was relieved of his duties late in June 1939, and until that time the Tripartite negotiation was confined to exchanging arguments concerning Japanese reservations. He knew that SHIRATORI had little contact with the Italian side in other respects, that he made few political and social acquaintances in Rome, and had no intercourse with Fascist leaders or the Italian army and navy.

SHIRATORI was on intimate terms with foreign minister ARITA and expressed his views boldly. While strong expressions were used in some of his telegrams, to the knowledge of the witness he never threatened ARITA with resignation.

There was no cross examination of the witness.

* From exhibit 3583, an excerpt from the Ciano diary dated 2 April 1939, it was stated that Ciano received SHIRATORI who brought the Japanese answer on the Tripartite alliance which, while on the whole was favorable, had two reservations. (1) That London, Paris, and Washington be informed that in Japan's view the alliance was directed against Moscow, (2) That a declaration be had that in case of war in Europe Japanese aid would be limited. Ciano had nothing against (2) but with respect to (1) it seemed to him necessary to make clear what actual meaning the reservation was intended to have.

* From exhibit 1113, a telegram from Ott to Ribbentrop dated 7 July 1941, a previously unread portion stated that Ott talked to SHIRATORI who said that since the end of April he had been suffering from kidney trouble and was in danger of his life. He had had to abstain from all political work * and gave the impression of needing rest and being mentally tired. Reference was made to exhibit 3575, the curriculum of SHIRATORI would show that he was ordered to return home 2 September 1939; arrived in Tokyo 13 October 1939; was placed on the waiting list 9 January 1940; appointed adviser to the foreign ministry 28 August 1940; was released from advisership to the foreign ministry 22 July 1941; elected to Diet 30 April 1942; was appointed to the Board of Directors of IRAPS 20 May 1942; and seceded from it 28 June 1943; and resigned from the Diet 5 December 1945.

34951 * DIRECT EXAMINATION OF SAITO, Yoshie
by Mr. Caudle

34956 The witness identified and verified exhibits 3588 and 34957 3589 as his affidavits. * Exhibit 3588, the first affidavit of the witness, stated that * both he and SHIRATORI were advisers to the foreign office from 28 August 1940 to 22 July 1941 under foreign minister MATSUOKA. The duties of the advisor were not clearly defined by act or ordinance, and he had no access as of right to any document or information of the foreign office. His influence and activities depended largely upon the characteristics of the foreign minister. The witness' acquaintance with MATSUOKA began in 1909 and the intimacy lasted unbroken.

34958 When MATSUOKA became vice president of the South Manchurian Railway Company, the witness was appointed director and also an advisor and conducted research upon China affairs. because of this close relationship, he believed * MATSUOKA chose him as advisor to the foreign office when he became minister. As far as the witness knew, SHIRATORI had little to do with MATSUOKA personally or officially and the witness understood that his appointment was due mainly to KONOYE's recommendation.
MATSUOKA had great self confidence and would rarely ask others' advice and rarely even consulted the witness.

34959 SHIRATORI's advisorship under MATSUOKA was more or less nominal and he was not asked to advice on any important diplomatic questions. The wholesale disposal of Japanese diplomats by MATSUOKA and OHASHI (exhibit 548) took place before the appointment of advisors and * SHIRATORI had nothing to do with it. Regarding the decision adopted at the Four Ministers' Conference of 4 September 1940, and the decision of the liaison conference 19 September 1940, concerning strengthening the Tripartite alliance, in these decisions the basic government policy for concluding the Tripartite pact was adopted.

34960 The witness knew that these top secrecy documents were not shown to SHIRATORI. The visit of Ribbentrop's special envoy Stahmer was kept secret to the advisors until a few days before his arrival on 7 September 1940.
The negotiation of the Tripartite pact was conducted exclusively between MATSUOKA, * Stahmer, and Ott.
SHIRATORI's opinion was not asked at any stage nor had he anything to do with drafting the original text.

Page 5687

Page SHIRATORI had nothing to do with MATSUOKA's negotiations concerning FIC and Thailand. Regarding recognition by Japan of the Wang Ching Wei Regime on 30 November 1940 and the joint declaration (exhibit 464), negotiations with the Wang Ching Wei regime were started at Nanking by the * YONAI-ARITA Cabinet through special ambassador ABE. Agreement was finally arrived at under the second KONOYE Cabinet in which MATSUOKA was foreign minister. But SHIRATORI was not concerned in this whatsoever. Nothing was made known to SHIRATORI about MATSUOKA's trip to Europe in the spring of 1941 until a few days before his departure. The object and purpose of the trip were kept entirely from SHIRATORI, and during MATSUOKA's absence the advisors had practically nothing to do. SHIRATORI became seriously ill the beginning of April 1941 and remained convalescent in almost complete retirement for about a year.

34961

Although he was normally an advisor until his resignation in late July 1941, during this period he had not but in any appearance at the foreign office nor had anything to do with its affairs. SHIRATORI did not see MATSUOKA after the latter's departure for Europe until his resignation as * foreign minister. Nor did he concern himself in the diplomatic negotiations with the U.S. conducted by MATSUOKA. SHIRATORI could not have refused the post of vice minister (exhibit 538) for the witness knew that MATSUOKA had OHASHI in mind from the beginning and never offered the position to SHIRATORI. In Ott's telegram he had stated that SHIRATORI informed confidentially he had declined the post of vice minister and it was to be considered he would be appointed permanent advisor, in which post he believed he could exercise far-reaching influence. However, Ott's statement ran counter to the facts.

34963

The position of vice minister was clearly defined by law and a vice minister * could largely influence the conduct of the nation's foreign affairs. While it was true that during the advisorship SHIRATORI and the witness often met Ott socially, there was nothing to indicate that SHIRATORI was on special intimate terms with Ott nor any other member of the Germany embassy. The witness did not believe SHIRATORI was a Germanophile for he remembered SHIRATORI remark that it was no less objectionable to be pro-Axis than to be pro-Anglo-Saxon.

In mid October 1940, SHIRATORI was appointed a member of the directorate of the IRAA, which did not concern itself directly with politics, much less diplomatic Page questions. The witness did not observe that SHIRATORI played any important part as a member of the directorate, and SHIRATORI once told the witness he expected nothing of real value * from the organization. He generally stayed away from its meetings. The witness knew nothing about SHIRATORI's acting as a leader of activist circles demanding preventive attack on Singapore (exhibit 562). What the witness knew about SHIRATORI's views was not an advocate of a southward advance.

SHIRATORI and the witness received on the same date the same German decoration ostensibly in recognition of their service relative to concluding the Tripartite pact (exhibit 1272). The witness knew that the exchange of decorations between governments was largely formality having more to do with officials' positions held by individuals than with their real merit. It seemed that Ott attached undue importance to the position of supervisor.

34966 * Exhibit 3589, the second affidavit of the witness, stated that he assisted MATSUOKA in technical matters concerning the drafting and negotiation of the Tripartite pact concluded on 27 September 1940. OHASHI was appointed vice minister on 19 August 1940 and MATSUOKA was made chief of the treaty bureau on 5 September 1940 and then began assisting the foreign minister in technical matters concerning the pact. MATSUOKA stated in exhibit 3145-A 34967 * that on 5 September 1940 a plan, Annex No. 1, was drafted by OHASHI, the advisors SHIRATORI and SAITO, and presented by MATSUOKA to the Four-Minister Conference for consideration (T. 27,986). This statement was erroneous for OHASHI, SHIRATORI and the witness never made that plan on any date.

The witness had no knowledge as to who drafted Annex 1. He was shown this document by MATSUOKA after it had passed the Four-Minister Conference. Neither the witness nor SHIRATORI had any connection with the revision of it on 4 September. About 5 September MATSUOKA invited OHASHI, SHIRATORI and the witness to a luncheon and told them that since Stahmer was shortly expected to arrive in Tokyo he intended to broach the question of the three-power axis. Neither then nor any other time was there any discussion among them on Annex 1 nor any other plan.

When shown exhibit 3145-A the witness identified it as the draft of the three power alliance pact and an annexed document, being an outline prepared by MATSUMOTO.

- 34970 * In the exhibit he noticed a statement that on the same day Stahmer had told SHIRATORI THAT the German side wished to sign the pact in Berlin. Regarding this, the witness stated that the matter was broached to SHIRATORI informally by Ott and it was not an official communication.
- 34971 * The witness stated that diplomats on the waiting list had no functions, nor responsibilities and just held the status of the rank they held at the time. No diplomat on the waiting list played any part whatsoever in the formulation of national policy nor permitted to see secret documents. They did not even show up at the office.
- 34972 * Asked what steps were taken with regard to a diplomat's status if he had not received an assignment before a certain time, he replied that after three years he was automatically retired. * Actually a diplomat on the waiting list did not work, but when first placed on it was generally given an order to engage in a temporary assignment. The terminology "taimel" was given just for the purpose of giving the salary in full for the first six months.
- 34975 * After six months, his salary would be gradually reduced and he would be automatically retired.

- 34976 Asked if an ambassador or advisor had anything to do with the formulation of foreign policy, he replied that an ambassador in active service when he is tentatively returned home presents his views and opinions with regard to the country to which he was assigned, but an ambassador on the waiting list * ordinarily does not express his opinions, but may be asked them by the foreign minister. The ambassador does not decide foreign policy. An advisor has no fixed functions but there are times when he expresses his opinions to the ministry for foreign affairs. The determination of foreign policy is done by the government.

- 34977 * Asked if SHIRATORI did not have strong views on certain diplomatic questions and expressed them as adviser to the foreign ministry regardless of whether his advice was formally requested, the witness replied that during MATSUOKA's time as minister, SHIRATORI never voluntarily expressed views on important foreign policy, nor was ever asked his views.
- 34978 * The relationship between SHIRATORI and the witness was mainly private, and there was hardly any occasion for them to exchange views on Italian-German questions.

- 34979 Asked if he didn't know that SHIRATORI was widely known as one of the staunchest advocates of an alliance with Germany and Italy, the witness replied he had no grounds upon which to state with certainty that he was a strong advocate of it. Asked if SHIRATORI, on his return from Rome in December 1939 conducted speaking tours and praised collaboration with Germany and Italy, the witness stated that he was not in Japan then and didn't know of his activities. After he became adviser, also he had never heard of such activities. * The witness had read the newspapers, but had never seen any news item in connection with an address by SHIRATORI. The witness knew nothing about SHIRATORI advising MATSUOKA in January 1941, that it would be inopportune then to ask for Germany's recognition of the Wang Ching-wei regime. The witness thought there was no such occasion, because of the relationship * between MATSUOKA and SHIRATORI.
- 34980

- 34981 In regard to the statement in his affidavit that the witness acted as a legal expert on technical aspects of the Tripartite Pact, he explained that MATSUMOTO also was a legal adviser, whose connection began after the negotiations had been completed. * The fact that MATSUMOTO was a director of the treaty bureau made it natural for him to do the work of a legal expert, although MATSUMOTO did have other than legal duties to perform. * These included liaison work with the German Embassy, specifically with such persons as Embassy Councilor Boltze. He conducted liaison whenever there were instructions from the foreign minister. MATSUMOTO actually began to participate in the pact negotiations the latter part of September.
- 34982

- 34983 * The witness was stating with confidence and accuracy his own part in the negotiations for the pact. As to the part played by others, he could not say whether he remembered everything. He did believe his memory was correct when he said SHIRATORI translated the Preamble to the
- 34984 Pact * from Japanese into English. It was true that the witness had previously testified before the Tribunal that the English text was written
- 34985 and proposed personally by MATSUOKA. * In explanation, the witness stated that the proposal presented at the conference among Stahmer, Ctt, and MATSUOKA, was written by MATSUOKA. This was the first proposal.

- 35000 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 3592 as his 35001 affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness had handled various positions as a newspaperman, being employed by the Jiji Shimpō until October, 1942, when he entered the Manchukuo News Agency. At the end of 1940 he established a special news feature agency on his own account.
He became acquainted with SHIRATORI in 1930, when he was chief of the 35002 information bureau * of the foreign office, and the witness was a staff member of the Jiji Shimpō. From then on they had remained closest friends.
- 35003 * Early in 1941, SHIRATORI borrowed many works of Japanese national policy and Shinto mythology, and became deeply absorbed in their study. He became afflicted with an obstinate insomnia, but in spite of it continued his study with unabated zeal until about 20 March, when he was seized with an acute case of nervous debility accompanied with mental indications of abnormality. He was put under the care of a physician, Dr. MURAMATSU, vice-president of a psychiatric hospital, and his condition
35004 steadily worsened. MURAMATSU had him enter the hospital * in mid-April 1941. The witness later learned from SHIRATORI that he had completely lost consciousness between 9 April and 28 April. He left the hospital in mid-May 1941, and removed in June to a seaside cottage at Hayama, where he remained convalescing until April 1942. During most of this time he was strictly prohibited from receiving visitors, or reading periodicals or newspapers. To the best of the witness' knowledge, SHIRATORI faithfully observed this injunction. Because of this, it was unthinkable that as early as July 1941 SHIRATORI should have had interviews with a foreign ambassador and engaged in serious conversation on the international situation. (Exhibits 800 and 1113).
- 35005 About the time of the general election of April 1942, SHIRATORI was not yet completely recovered, * and had little intercourse with the outside world. However, one day a number of young men came to his house and asked his permission to use his name as a candidate in the coming election. Although SHIRATORI first flatly told them he had no interest in politics, they finally prevailed upon him to accept on condition that he would make no speech or public appearance. It was only when rivals contended SHIRATORI was too ill that friends requested him to make a speech or two to counter this, and he consented with much reluctance.
35006 * He did address several gatherings, at which he mainly talked about Shintoism and national polity, dwelling only in passing on current questions of diplomacy and war.

SHIRATORI was one of the so-called recommended candidates, but it was a matter arranged between his supporters and the prefectural branch of the recommending body, and SHIRATORI was not concerned in it.
When elected, SHIRATORI, as a recommended member, almost automatically became a member of the IRAPS and nominated to the board of directors.

Page Because of health, he didn't engage in political activities, either as a director or an MHP. In the early summer of 1943 he was relieved of his seat in the Society, and completely withdrew.

35007 * The serious illness with which he was seized in the spring of 1941 markedly changed SHIRATORI's character and outlook, and drew him more deeply into spirituality and religion. He gradually ceased to have anything to do with government and general political circles.

35008 The witness was well-acquainted with the circumstances under which SHIRATORI wrote or made speeches. He contributed articles or delivered lectures only after being urgently requested, and the witness recalled no instance of his doing these things of his own accord. He made the speeches without manuscript, * and as for his articles he seldom wrote them himself. He would generally dictate or talk freely to magazine or newspaper representatives who called on him with stenographers, the records being presented to him for correction before publication. SHIRATORI's writings and lectures had a certain popularity and were sought after because he was considered one of the most outspoken and indiscreet of Japanese bureaucrats and diplomats. After returning from Sweden in 1936, he held no responsible position in the Tokyo government, having been placed on the waiting list. He used to say then that he could give utterance to his own thoughts more freely.

In reply to criticism in some quarters about SHIRATORI's utterances being too outspoken, SHIRATORI told the witness that in these days of dictators, the axiom "strongly in deed, gently in manner" would perhaps have to be reversed. Since Japan did not want war with any country, it might be permissible or even advisable to indulge in outspoken language.

35010 * On further oral examination, the witness stated he did not 35011 know of a newspaper named "Ars", * but did know of the Ars Publishing Company. Asked if he knew the circulation of the magazine "Diamond" in the middle of 1940, he said the general estimate was ten thousand. The circulation of the magazine "Kokumin-Iyoren" (National Review) in 1940 was about 1000 to 1500 monthly; that of the magazine "Dai-Asia-Shugi" (Greater Asia Magazine) in 1940 was about 2,000. The latter was published about ten years before, and after 1940 coming out monthly.

35012 * The "Cendai" had a circulation in mid-1942 between 20,000 and 30,000 monthly.

- 35013 * Exhibit 3593, the affidavit of MURAMATSU, Tsuneo, stated that the affiant was vice-director of a psychiatric hospital, and a lecturer at Tokyo Imperial. Along with Dr. MIYAKE, the affiant was first asked to
- 35014 examine * SHIRATORI on 12 April 1941. Entries in his pocket diary showed that according to Mrs. SHIRATORI and close friends, SHIRATORI had for a month or two previous to the examination been suffering from sleeplessness and excitability as a result of being too deeply absorbed in religious reading. After April 8 there were indications of mental derangement, and about April 10 he took no food and could not sleep. He later apparently
- 35015 had hallucinations, and was given medical injections. * The affiant and Dr. MIYAKE visited him on April 12, found him mentally in an acute state of manic excitement and in a state of delirium. The diagnosis was manic-depressive psychosis. Arrangements were made for him to go to a psychiatric hospital, where he went on 16 April 1941.
- 35016 On 25 April the affiant was informed that SHIRATORI had recovered consciousness * and he was allowed to leave the hospital on May 10. When the affiant saw him the next day he was still in a state of excitement, and was moreover suffering from beri-beri, and his mental condition was
- 35017 such that he had to take drugs daily. * Judging from the prescriptions which were recorded in the affiant's diary, it was clear that as late as mid-June SHIRATORI's condition necessitated a considerable amount of sedative, and the affiant strictly cautioned against his receiving visits and taxing his mind with international questions, and he was advised to remove to a seaside cottage at Hayama. When the affiant visited him on 13 August, SHIRATORI could hardly be regarded as completely cured, but further visits were thought no longer necessary, the affiant again advising him and family on recuperation for at least six months to a year, refraining
- 35018 from all official work or political activities, * having as little as possible to do with the outside world. He learned from his family that the counsel was faithfully acted upon by SHIRATORI.

The affiant learned that about 23 December, 1941, SHIRATORI had a slight relapse.

35019 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 3594 as his Cabinet /
35020 affidavit. * The affidavit stated that at the time of the second KONOYE / on 22 August 1940, the witness was nominated a member of the arranging committee for the New National Structure. On the basis of a committee report the IRAA was organized, and on its inauguration, 12 October, 1940, he was nominated a managing director and concurrently secretary-general and chief of the central section of the central bureau. The witness resigned on 28 March 1941, when the association was reorganized.

35021 * The arranging committee was composed mainly of representatives of non-official circles, but the actual work was done by a managing secretariat. It was disbanded on 17 September 1940. SHIRATORI was one who was originally invited by KONOYE to form the arranging committee, but did not take part in the discussions, and was generally absent from its meetings.

35022 At the inaugural ceremony on 12 October 1940, KONOYE, the president of the IRAA, said its purpose was simply in fulfilling in a practical way the duties of Imperial subjects, and he had no program to offer the Association. * It was conceived as a public association, as distinguished from a political party, and aimed to organize the entire nation to discharge their duties as subjects. KONOYE on several occasions stated that the IRAA was to be distinguished from the one-party system of totalitarian European countries.

In practice, the business of the IRAA was undertaken by the managing directors, the secretary-general, and the principal members of the central bureau staff. There was a central cooperation conference, consisting of 106 representatives of local branches in prefectures and cities, as well as fifty from press, finance, science, etc., which was called in session now and then.

35023 * SHIRATORI was nominated an ordinary (non-managing) director.
The witness didn't recall his ever attending any meetings of the directorate, or otherwise playing an active part in connection with the IRAA's activities. His activities were so inconsequential, it was only when the witness was asked to make a deposition that he remembered that SHIRATORI was at one time a member of the arranging committee and a director.

When the witness resigned in the spring of 1941, SHIRATORI was among those who resigned at that time, and since he was seriously ill after that he never retracted his resignation, remaining completely out of the organization.

35027 * The accused identified and verified Exhibit 3595 as his affidavit.

35028 * The affidavit stated that the accused was born 1887, entered the diplomatic service upon graduation from the Tokyo Imperial University in July, 1914, remaining in that service for twenty-seven years until he resigned as Foreign Office adviser in July, 1941. Except for periods of service attached to Embassies abroad, he was stationed at the Foreign Office in Tokyo as Secretary, Chief of Sections, Director of the Information Bureau * and finally as adviser. None of his positions carried any policy-making authority. All his activities were bound to be along the line of policies adopted by the Government.

The period between World War I and the Manchurian Affair of 1931 was characterized by a policy of cooperation with foreign nations, commonly called the SHIDEHARA Diplomacy of Conciliation, of which the accused was a faithful votary. He was present at the Washington and Geneva Naval Conferences, as well as being in the inner circles of the Foreign Office at the London Conferences and was considered a disarmament expert.

35030

The Manchurian Incident of 18 September 1931 was a shock to Foreign Office officials. The Government adopted a policy of non-aggravation and * speedy local settlement. At the instruction of the Foreign Minister, the Information Bureau, of which the accused was Chief, did all it could to attempt to mobilize public opinion in favor of a peaceful settlement, but the press did not respond to the Foreign Office appeal. With the press and public opinion ranged on the side of strong policy, the Foreign Minister and his subordinates had a difficult time.

Added to the difficulty was the fact that the Manchurian Affair soon ceased to be a mere question of diplomacy, but became an important domestic political issue, and the so-called "weak kneed" policy of SHIDEHARA was utilized by reformist elements. * There was very little the Foreign Office could do to influence the course of events.

The accused was only a Bureau Chief and although foreign correspondents chose to refer to him as Foreign Office spokesman, his main business was nothing more than handing out news items. Statements and declarations of policy concerning foreign affairs were published through the accused's Bureau merely as part of the routine.

After three years as Minister to the four Scandanavian countries, he was recalled and placed on the waiting list in 1936. He neither sought nor was offered any new assignment for more than two years. He seldom visited the Foreign Office and had no access to official documents. * He knew only as much as ordinary newspaper readers about the China war.

In August, 1938, Foreign Minister UGAKI asked him to go to Rome as Ambassador. This did not appeal to SHIRATORI The China

Affair had become an all-absorbing question. The idea of again serving in Europe was repugnant to the accused, however, UGAKI insisted and SHIRATORI said he would think it over. Believing that it was KONOYE who had recommended him to UGAKI, the accused consulted KONOYE, who advised him to accept, if only to qualify himself for the portfolio of Foreign Affairs in the future. KONOYE also told him that unlike Stockholm, he would find something to do in Rome. SHIDEHARA learned from him for the first time that there was talk of a rapprochement between 35033 * Japan and the Axis. He said he was not much enamored of the idea, but that since direct negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek had thus far proved almost useless, some other diplomatic means had to be sought to dispose of the China mess.

It was KONOYE's opinion that a friendly intervention by England and America was desired, but nothing short of a possible alignment of Japan with the Axis would cause them to modify their anti-Japanese attitude. SHIRATORI concluded that it was not so much the rapprochement with Germany and Italy that KONOYE really desired, as the effect this gesture would have on England and America in regard to their Far Eastern policy. The accused felt he could agree in principle to KONOYE's foreign policy, and finally decided to accept.

Neither UGAKI nor his successor AHITA mentioned the proposed Axis treaty or gave instructions concerning this matter before SHIDEHARA left Tokyo. The question seemed still nebulous with no definite decision. * There was little documentary information in the Foreign Office, and high officials were entirely in the dark about it.

Besides this talk with KONOYE, the accused did not discuss it with anyone in responsible position. It was not correct to say, as the Prosecution contended (Exhibit 498) that the accused was appointed to Rome for the specific purpose of negotiating an alliance. Installed as Ambassador in September, 1938, he did not leave for his post until late November, and arrived in Rome on 29 December 1938, still without special instructions about the proposed treaty. Soon after this, he learned of KONOYE's resignation. As to his successor HIRANUMA, the accused did not remember ever meeting him, and had no knowledge about his diplomatic views.

* The Ciano diary entry (Exhibit 499-A) to the effect that SHIRATORI told the Italian Government that the new Premier was openly in favor of the alliance was not true. * SHIRATORI first called on Ciano on 31 December 1938 to arrange for presentation of his letters of credit and requested that he be permitted to pay his respects to Mussolini. No political questions were discussed. He next saw Ciano on 6 January when he presented SHIRATORI to Mussolini. As the accused had no instructions and was not yet qualified to act as Ambassador as his credentials had not been presented, he was embarrassed at the unexpectedly early meeting with Mussolini, and decided that the safest thing to do was listen and let Mussolini do the talking, which he did.

DEFENSE - SHIRATORI- DIRECT

Page The Ciano diary entry for 7 January 1939 seemed to attribute to the 35037 accused some of the things said by Mussolini. Nothing warranted the statement * in Exhibit 499-A that SHIRATORI was greatly in favor of the alliance which he regarded as a weapon to force Britain to concede "the many things she owed to us all." This phrase reminded him of Mussolini's attitude toward Britain.

Mussolini seemed to be laboring under the mistaken idea that as far as Germany and Japan were concerned, there was complete agreement and that it was only Italy's indecision that had been retarding the Tri-Partite arrangement. He said Italy now wanted a speedy conclusion of the proposed treaty and saw no reason why it should not be done within a few weeks.

Knowing there was no definite decision reached in Tokyo, the accused did his best to discourage Mussolini from taking too much for granted concerning Japan. That being the case, he could not possibly have assumed the forward attitude ascribed to him by Ciano.

35038 * In a later diary entry (Exhibit 501) Ciano stated that SHIRATORI advised him not to accept the Japanese counter-proposal.
That was an unkind interpretation, for his words were merely to the effect that he was afraid the counter proposal would be unacceptable but he did not have to take it as the final word. As to Ciano's statement that SHIRATORI told him of his intention to resign in order to force the Cabinet to retire (Exhibit 501), the accused had no recollection of this but it was ridiculous on its face, for the resignation of an ambassador after so short a time in office, and of one who had no political backing, could hardly have affected the life of a cabinet, or altered the foreign policy. Apparently Ciano received some such report from Tokyo where there were baseless rumors about the Tri-partite negotiations.

35039 The basic idea that influenced SHIRATORI during the course of negotiations was that which was impressed on him, as mentioned, by KONOYE. * Regardless of whether the negotiations were to succeed, the accused considered it of first importance that the fact that such conferences were going on should become known to the world, especially America and England. He was, therefore, on occasion, intentionally outspoken or indiscreet in his press interviews, even assuming an optimistic air when the successful conclusion of the negotiations seemed more than doubtful. This accounted in part for his reputation as a staunch advocate of the Axis Pact out of all proportion to his actual role.

He also felt that although HIRANUMA had replaced KONOYE, it was not impossible that the Government was acting on a similar principle. Ostensibly the discussions were to be conducted in the strictest secrecy, but press reports from Tokyo show that free publicity was being given the matter and in fact, they learned much more from unofficial sources concerning what was going on in Tokyo.

* The Prosecution contended that the accused, contrary to instructions, advocated an all-out military alliance without reservations (Exhibit 501), but this was not true. The text of the drafted treaty accepted by all three nations at an early stage was a weak and harmless document, more like a treaty of mutual consultation and assistance. The accused never imagined such a pact would drag Japan against her will into a war of Germany's or Italy's making; nor did he think it would stand in the way of Japan concluding separate arrangements with England and America concerning China and the Far East. The existence of such a pact was, in his opinion, calculated to serve as a lever in moving Anglo-Saxon countries to reconsider their Far Eastern policy, thereby making it possible for Japan to wind up the China Incident speedily.

As to the charge that he acted contrary to instructions, there was no such instance. It was true he disagreed with his country * in regard to the secondary matter of reservations to be attached to the text, but this belonged to the proper functions of an Ambassador.

That the proposed treaty was to be primarily directed to the Soviet was settled policy, and there was no opposition to it. This point seemed to be sufficiently clear to Germany and Italy, and the draft preamble (Exhibit 2619) left no room for doubt as to this. Not only did the text of the draft explicitly limit the obligation of military assistance to cases in which wanton attacks were made on the contracting parties, but the Japanese reservations in regard to England and France were largely accepted by Germany, the only point of difference was whether they were to be written or oral. This appeared such a trivial matter that SHIRATORI could not understand why the point was contested so stubbornly.

* As far as Germany was concerned, her Non-Aggression Pact with Soviet Russia seemed a sufficient explanation of this. No doubt Germany made full use of the proposed alliance in their diplomatic maneuvers in Moscow where they scored a temporary success by winning the Soviets to their side. The statesmen in Tokyo, however, apparently took the matter too seriously to think of a similar use being made of Axis negotiations in their approach to the United States and Britain.

About February or March, the accused wired his Government that a rapprochement between the Soviets and Germany was quite possible, but this was entirely disregarded. In April, 1939 von Ribbentrop intimated that if Japan hesitated too long Germany might be driven to approach Russia, but Japan took it for sheer bluff. SHIRATORI, however, thought this possibility was always there and urged his * Government not to attach too much importance to their formula of reservations, as the stipulations in the text gave ample guaranty against involvement in an aggressive war in Europe, which was extremely unlikely to be started by England or France.

He considered it of the utmost importance for Japan to avoid complete diplomatic isolation which would render all the more precarious the chances for early settlement by diplomacy of the China Affair. Unless there was a fair prospect of a satisfactory agreement with the Anglo-Saxon countries in the meantime, conclusion of the Axis Pact seemed almost the only way of preventing such an eventuality.

* When the worst came and the Non-Aggression Pact between Germany and Russia was concluded, he saw no sense in staying in Europe and his request for recall was granted.

Prosecution cited a telegram between the German Ambassador in Rome (Exhibit 2232) in which SHIRATORI was represented as assuring him of his continued efforts for the sake of German-Japanese friendship, but could SHIRATORI have answered otherwise to a diplomatic colleague who had expressed his concern about his sudden recall? According to this exhibit, the accused was reported as stating he would particularly welcome an opportunity to have a detailed talk with Ribbentrop on his homeward trip. He could not understand how this could have been said, because it was Mr. Mackensen who told SHIRATORI he had been instructed by Ribbentrop to ask if the accused would return by way of Berlin. If SHIRATORI had really wanted to see Ribbentrop, * he could have easily done so without consulting Mackensen.

The statement in the same exhibit that SHIRATORI advised OSHIMA not to execute the Tokyo instructions to lodge a protest over the Non-Aggression Pact required explanation. SHIRATORI had suggested to ARITA that the protest should be presented by ARITA to Ott for transmission to Berlin, for SHIRATORI thought it would be cruel to make OSHIMA "drink boiling water" in addition to his chagrin at the rapprochement. Therefore, SHIRATORI telephoned OSHIMA to suggest that he wait until Tokyo was further heard from. Besides this talk, there was no communication between the Embassy at Berlin and SHIRATORI concerning this situation.

SHIRATORI's name was mentioned in Exhibit 507, but he promised no one that he would cooperate with the German Embassy in Tokyo along the line indicated there. Whatever his activities after returning from Europe, they were entirely of his own accord * and had no connection with the German or Italian Embassies in Tokyo.

In some lectures and interviews he tried to show that despite the Non-Aggression Pact, there was a possibility for Japan to enter into agreement with Germany and Italy together with the Soviet. Being relieved of his assignment and placed on the waiting list, he was at liberty to say things which would not necessarily please the Government. He had to vindicate himself against the criticisms poured on him for what he failed to do in Rome, but his main motive was to contribute toward the speedy termination of the China war. To have the Democracies alter their attitude toward Japan, he thought it would be more effective to remind them that Japan's isolation was not nearly so complete as appeared on the surface. The advocacy of such views could not have hampered the efforts of the Government, but ought * to have helped them.

The sudden flaring up of public opinion in favor of the Axis in the summer of 1940 was solely due to the success of the German army on the Western Front and not to the activities of any individual or group.

The YONAI Cabinet was succeeded by the second KONOYE Cabinet in July, 1940. As an Ambassador on the waiting list without political connections, the accused had no knowledge about the circumstances attending this Cabinet change. It was believed there would be a reorientation of diplomatic policy during the new ministry. Having seen very little of KONOYE, he had no idea as to what he was contemplating.

35048 * When MATSUOKA became Foreign Minister, he told SHIRATORI that he intended to effect a wholesale dismissal of senior diplomats and suggested that SHIRATORI show the way by resigning the position of Ambassador, offering in compensation the advisorship in the Foreign Office. He told the accused it was KONOYE's desire that his services be retained for the Foreign Office as Vice Minister, but that he had another man in mind. Not desiring to lend color to the gossip that SHIRATORI had been piqued at KONOYE's choice of members of his official family, the accused accepted MATSUOKA's offer without hesitation. By common, though tacit, consent, his position was to be a sinecure, and he was never consulted on policy. Moreover, important documents and information were kept from him, including Exhibit 541, which contained the basic policy regarding the Tri-Partite Pact.

35049 * It might have been supposed that his appointment was part of a program for the forthcoming rapprochement with the Axis Powers, but MATSUOKA seemed determined that no one should share with him either the blame or the credit for the new diplomatic venture. In the negotiations with Stahmer and Ott for the Tri-Partite Pact he was particularly secretive. He made a point of distinguishing this pact from the abortive attempt of 1938-39 and refused to consult anyone who had anything to do with the previous negotiations, and SHIRATORI refrained from butting in at any stage of the affair. He had been adviser for one month prior to the conclusion of the pact, and when he was first allowed to see the draft text of the treaty, it was in finished form in the English language. He was never told by MATSUOKA as to the real meaning of several articles of the pact, nor did he learn if there was any secret understanding. Until they were read in evidence before the Tribunal, he was entirely ignorant of the * existence of many annexes and exchanged notes concerning the Pact.

It was true that after the treaty was concluded SHIRATORI was interviewed by the Asahi Shimbun (Exhibit 2234) and that he wrote a few articles on the subject (Exhibit 557-A), but these were only his personal interpretation and not based on official information.

Page He was not conscious of putting forth any special efforts to unite the nation behind the pact. So unanimous was the acclamation accorded the pact that such efforts would have been superfluous. In MATSUOKA's other diplomatic moves, the accused was even less concerned.

35051 Toward the end of March, 1931, soon after MATSUOKA left for Europe, the accused became seriously ill and was unfit for any activities for almost twelve months during the most critical period. * Since then he did not put in an appearance in the Foreign Office, not had he seen MATSUOKA again until they were imprisoned together. The Prosecution's charge that he with MATSUOKA advocated in July, 1941 Japan's participation in the German-Soviet war, is entirely without foundation. After he returned home from the hospital in May, 1941, he lived a secluded life and never received visitors except a few personal friends.

35052 It was true that Ott called on him in July, 1941. The visit was a surprise and quite informal. The accused was in a weakened condition and does not have a clear recollection of the interview, but it could not have been such as Ott's cable to Berlin suggested. As to the other interview with Ott (Exhibit 608), he could not recall it at all. * Furthermore, the accused had a slight relapse in December, 1941 and was out of touch with the outside world.

These exhibits show the general character of Ott's reports, and the testimony, moreover, of Ott himself in the affidavit submitted in the accused's defense, make unnecessary his efforts to refute these telegrams. SHIRATORI never occupied positions of responsibility in the Government during Ott's sojourn in Japan, nor could there have been any question of official contact between them. Even privately there were not on especially friendly terms, and they only saw each other on social occasions.

35053 * The accused denies emphatically that he furnished Ott with important secrets. Much of Ott's information, the accused has been informed, came from KONOYE's confidential secretary, OZAKI, who was an associate of Serge, who was a Russian spy who had worked himself into the confidence of Ott. It seemed that SHIRATORI's name was used merely to give credit to this sort of information.

In April, 1942, the accused was elected to the Diet. As a recommended member, he almost automatically became a member of the I.R.A.P.S. and was nominated an ordinary director of that society. Since his health was not normal and internal politics were new to him, he played no role in Parliament. He was soon relieved of his seat on the I.R.A.P.S. and resigned from the Society in 1943. He seldom attended the Diet sessions and did not serve on any of the Parliamentary Committees.

35054 SHIRATORI's connections with the Government ended when he resigned as Foreign Office Advisor in July, 1941 and he never held another official position until the end of the war. He had scarcely any friends * in the Government or in the Army or Navy, nor any source of information. He was perfectly free and independent, with no brief for any group or organization.

The accused stated on further oral examination that he never received any direct communications from the then War Minister ITAGAKI during his tenure of office as Japanese Ambassador to Italy.

35055 * The accused stated his present state of health permitted him to understand the prosecutor's questions. He was stationed at Washing-35056 ton about four and one-half years, * spoke and read English. He took the examination for the diplomatic service one year prior to graduation from Tokyo Imperial, and successfully passed it.

35057 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that between World War I and the Manchurian Affair, Japan pursued a policy of peace and cooperation with foreign nations, * and afterwards there was a departure from such policy. Regarding this, the accused explained that there was no desire by Japan to depart from this policy, but Japan's reputation in the world became unfavorable and cooperation did not progress.
The accused loyally and faithfully observed Foreign Minister SHIDEHARA's policy, and since SHIDEHARA neither considered the Manchurian Incident an act of aggression nor opposed it, the accused could not say that he himself opposed it.

35058 The WAKATSUKI Cabinet resigned for internal reasons, and SHIDEHARA also resigned. Before doing so, * SHIRATORI heard from SHIDEHARA that so far as diplomacy was concerned, there was no need to quit. SHIDEHARA did not consider that diplomatic relations as they pertained to the Incident had become difficult. Asked if he therefore felt free to continue on in the Foreign Office, he replied that he was then nothing more than a bureau director, and there was no relation between the minister's resignation and the position of a bureau chief.

Where he said in his affidavit that he was admitted into the "inner council" of the foreign office in 1929, he was referring to a conference attended by the minister, vice-minister and the director concerned. He meant to say he was permitted to attend the meeting as information bureau director.

35059 * Asked if it was true that as bureau chief he was the one who explained to the press and through them to the world Japan's foreign policy, he replied that he undertook to amplify and explain the policy already decided on, and within the scope of that policy, policies newly announced were released by his department.

Counsel for MINAMI.

35062 * The accused stated that just prior to and following the Manchurian Incident, the foreign office received reports from its consuls in Manchuria and China. Asked if such information was transmitted to other agencies, such as the war ministry or general staff, he replied that this was not the work of the information bureau, but it had been the long established custom in the foreign office that the telegraphic section should send telegrams concerning other ministries to them.

35064 Asked if information which would be critical of the Kwantung Army would be transmitted to the War Ministry, he replied it was difficult to say as a matter of principle, as it all depended on the vice-minister's discretion. * The minister did not directly concern himself in such matters. He thought that messages transmitted to the war ministry were addressed to the vice-minister.

35065 Asked if he himself wrote or finally approved all foreign office statements given to the press, he replied that the information board handled the actual business of releasing the communiques, but as to the contents, they were prepared by other bureaus. * From various related documents and telegrams from abroad, the accused had information, and by giving explanations to the press based on it was able to interpret and explain policy. To that extent he was in a position to interpret the announced policy. Asked if that put him in position to twist facts if he desired to achieve a particular effect, he replied he supposed he could have if he had wanted to, but as a civil servant he had a conscience regarding this, and had no recollection of twisting matters. * He recalled no occasions in which he was obliged to make his conscience subserve his duties as a civil servant.

35066 To the accused were read certain questions and answers from his interrogation. In his interrogation he had been asked if from 1931 on he was considered a friend of the military clique that was aggressive in Manchuria and China, and he had answered that he was not a friend, but being Japanese had to try to cast as plausible and bright a surface as possible on the things they had done.

- 35067 * When he had been asked if what he had done was to try to cover up and pacify the public and make them pleased with what the military clique had done, he replied not so much the inside public but the outside world. In regard to the above questions and answers, the accused stated that he recalled they were along that line.
- 35068 * All official statements of the foreign office were not alone made with the approval of the minister, but were made on his instructions. Asked if his position required him to be extremely well informed on policy matters, he replied that on individual problems the bureau director concerned would know more than the information bureau, but since the latter bureau read all communiques the range of their information was far wider than of a bureau director. This position required practically
- 35069 daily contact with the foreign minister. * Asked if by reason of this position he also maintained close contact with KONOYE, KIDO, and others, who shaped government policy during this period, he replied that at the time of the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident he met KONOYE and KIDO two or three times, but then they were not deciding policy. He had not maintained frequent contact with the men mentioned. At the time he had no interest regarding domestic politics, and their conversation hardly ever touched that topic.
- 35070 * He had no recollection about 4 April 1932, being invited to dine and discuss with HARADA and KONOYE as to whether HIRANUMA or SAITO should be the next premier. Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that although foreign correspondents referred to him as the spokesman of the foreign office, his main business was only handing out news items. Asked if he meant that he was no more than a press copy boy for the minister, he replied he did not intend to represent himself in such an inferior light. In foreign nations the president or secretary of state is often referred to as a spokesman. In Japan it was the chief of the information board. He was never so referred to in Japan. Asked if he was suggesting that the press grossly exaggerated his importance, he replied it may be that since foreign correspondents had few opportunities to see any official other than the chief of the information board the - 35070 position might have seemed * rather important to them. However, the position was not as important as they supposed.
- Asked if at that time it was necessary for him to keep in close contact with the military, he replied that they possessed quite a considerable amount of information regarding army activities, and there was no especial necessity to associate with army officers. Liaison with the army was carried on during the Manchurian Incident by the chief of the Asiatic Affairs Bureau. The accused received information from the competent bureau chief, and when he thought it necessary gave it to the press.

NARRATIVE SUMMARY OF THE RECORD
December 11, 1947
SHIRATORI - Cross

35072

The accused was read certain questions and answers from his * interrogation. When he had been asked if right after the Manchurian Incident he believed that he had gained favor with the army by his speaking and writing, he replied that he was in favor of the army. His connection with the army began when YOSHIKAWA said he could not do anything with the army head and wanted younger men to go to the army's younger men and find their real intentions. Foreign Minister YOSHIKAWA saw it was quite impossible to insist upon his own policy, apart from the army, and knew he had to compromise. SHIRATORI was made to go with other young officers in the foreign office to become a liaison instrument. This began his connection with the military. Ever since * SHIRATORI's name became known to the people generally as pro-military the young officers in the war ministry came to the foreign office at the beginning of the Manchurian Affair almost every other day. They came to Director of Asiatic Affairs TANI's office, and the accused as head of the information bureau attended those conferences often.

When he had been asked if it was discussed what the army intended to do about the expansion in Manchuria and later in China, he had replied that the army did not let them know very well what they intended, but they wanted to know how to fight the Geneva matter and answer America and those things especially concerned with diplomacy. Asked if those questions and answers were as read to him, * he had replied that it seemed involved because the English he used at the time was not good enough. The passage relating to YOSHIKAWA seemed quite incorrect. He did not know now what he had exactly said, but he had the impression that the contents were vague and incoherent. * He did recollect that the prosecutor asked him at the time about people saying he was pro-military, and he did make an explanation in reply.

In his affidavit he had referred to the birth of Manchukuo with its "Utopian" program. Asked if he considered at that time it to be "Utopian", he replied it was in the early stages and the various views regarding Manchukuo were idealistic. * The accused agreed with the program in Manchukuo in part, and approved of it in part. He had stated that the press did not respond to the appeal of the information bureau for mobilization of opinion for peaceful adjustment. This appeal was to cooperate with the foreign office policy. Asked if he instituted a policy to keep statements to the press free from inflammatory tone, he replied that Japanese newspapers were not as obedient as is generally thought and disliked outside interference. Therefore he made no such request.

35078

Asked if he issued any releases critical of the Manchurian Incident, he replied that some telegrams were received which it would not be to Japan's advantage to publish abroad. * It was his policy to give both good and bad news to both the domestic and foreign press, and there were times when he did so to the extent that he was reprimanded.

Page

He didn't recall Ambassador Grew protesting his distortion of news which led to inflammatory press articles, but did remember that any time an article unfavorable to the U. S. appeared in the Japanese press the U. S. Embassy thought they were inspired by the information bureau. This was because their realization of the actual position of the Japanese press was insufficient. Asked if the press added anything to the information he gave them, he replied that even if no new facts were added, an entirely different construction could be given on the same press release.

35079

* Asked if it was not true that SHIRATORI wanted to remove him from his post because he took action independently of his superiors, he admitted that as an official he might have been rather indiscreet and SHIRATORI might have thought so too, but he never thought SHIRATORI was so dissatisfied that he wanted to remove him. * The accused had no remembrance of opposing the policy of SHIRATORI's successor, YOSHIKAWA.

35080

Asked if he did not, about 21 February, 1932, ask KONCIE to influence the premier to dismiss YOSHIKAWA, he replied that the premier then was INUKAI and YOSHIKAWA was his son-in-law, and it was hardly possible that INUKAI would be urged to do this. KONCIE at that time was not in a position to exert such influence. * The accused never felt dissatisfaction toward YOSHIKAWA, and didn't think he did what had been suggested.

35081

It was not true that by May of 1932 he was widely known as an advocate of Japan's withdrawal from the League of Nations. The accused was asked if in May 1932, he told HARADA that Japan was unable to stay in the League after the Manchurian Incident, and Japan wanted the understanding of the big powers, but it was not necessary to remain in the League. * It was unreasonable for small European nations to try to restrain Japan, which could take an independent stand if she negotiated directly with England, France, and the U. S. Concerning these purported statements to HARADA, the accused stated he had never said them.

35082

Asked if in October 1932 he was appointed a member of a committee entitled "Committee for Drafting the Protest to the Lytton Report", he replied that no such committee was ever created for this, but he did take part in drafting the reply to the Lytton report. Vice-Minister ARITA, Chief of the Asiatic Bureau TANI, Chief of the First Section of that bureau MORISHIMA, and the accused did take part in drafting the reply, but there was no special committee. * The protest to the Lytton Committee was a detailed justification of Japan's action in Manchuria.

35083

Asked if in September 1932, he considered War Minister ARAKI a fellow faithful votary of SHIMAZU's conciliation diplomacy, he replied that when he referred to himself as a votary of this policy he was speaking of himself as a foreign office official, and did not intend to include high government officials. He believed ARAKI did agree with that policy, but could hardly say he agreed with it entirely.

Page In September, 1932, he did not suggest to HARADA that ARAKI be 35084 made premier. He did not argue for ARAKI's appointment on the grounds that the Japanese exchange rate was dropping because she did not have a strong government; and the best policy would be to have ARAKI representing the militarists become premier and proceed on an unwavering program for five or six years. The accused never harbored such thoughts.

35085 He considered his release from the post as chief of the information bureau a routine promotion, and was never told it was changed at the request of various ministers and ambassadors. He did not attempt to bargain with Foreign Minister UCHIDA concerning the transfer. Asked if he said he would accept a post as minister abroad if Vice-Minister ARITA were sent out of the foreign office, he replied that there may have been rumors then that he and ARITA had quarreled, but this was not true. * Asked if when ARITA refused to go to England and resigned instead if the accused did not consent to go abroad as minister if the foreign office policy is not changed, he replied it was out of the question for bureau chiefs or ministers to make such demands, and he had never done it.

35086 Asked if he became minister to Scandinavia within a month or two of Hitler's domination of Germany, he replied he did not know when Hitler seized power, but he became minister to Scandinavia in June 1933. During his three years in Scandinavia he went to Berlin four or five times, but didn't recall whether it was during this time that the anti-Comintern Pact was being negotiated. The only time he met OSHIMA was at banquets, and * he didn't recall discussing the anti-Comintern Pact with him. He never met Hitler or Ribbentrop during these visits.

35087 Asked if he was widely accredited in Japan as one of the framers of the anti-Comintern Pact, he replied he didn't think it was reported that he was connected with the conclusion of the Pact. An American journalist named Wilfrid Fleisher was one of the correspondents he knew best while in the information bureau. Asked if he recalled discussing the anti-Comintern Pact with Fleisher after returning from Sweden, he replied he had forgotten whether Fleisher was in Tokyo when he had returned and had forgotten whether he had discussed such matters with him. Asked * if when Fleisher asked him what part he had played in the negotiations he had replied that he was a "second-line soldier", the accused replied he had never said such a thing.

35088 When he said in his affidavit that he knew no more about the China War than an ordinary newspaper reader, he meant by that that he had nothing to do with the China Incident. He had received on 29 April 1940, the decoration of the Double Rays of the Rising Sun for his services in the China Affair. All in government service then received such decorations, and since he had been an ambassador * and adviser he thought that was what he received it for.

Page asked if he was in favor or against the China Affair, he replied he wanted it settled as quickly as possible, but as to whether he was for or against it, since it had already begun he didn't think he could use either expression appropriately. Asked if he ever did anything in a positive way to object to continued military action in China, he replied that actually the Incident was a war, and since Japanese could not openly oppose it they could at least hope for its quick settlement and work for that end, and that was what he hoped.

35089 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that SHIRATORI was reluctant to go to Italy as ambassador, and * at first declined. Asked if in view of the increased relations between Japan and Italy this was a definite promotion, he replied it was a natural promotion. The reason he had declined was that he wanted to remain in Japan and work for the settlement of the China Incident. Asked if the connections between Italy and Japan had not become quite close, he replied that Italy had joined the anti-Comintern Pact, but the Japanese considered Italy quite remote and unrelated to them. He did not believe that it would necessarily follow that the withdrawal of Germany and Italy from the League of Nations cemented the bond a little more closely.

35090 * He thought that in March, 1938, Italy sent a goodwill mission to Japan, and three months later an Italian Economic Mission arrived in Tokyo. Asked if in spite of the attractiveness of the Ambassadorship to Italy he continued to refuse it until he was told of a possibility of a treaty strengthening the three power alliance, he replied that he accepted because he could see that even from Italy he would be able to contribute to solving the China Affair. * He did go to Italy because he learned of the possibility of negotiating an alliance with Italy and Germany.

35092 * It was true that when the possibility of concluding such a treaty was defeated for the time being by the Russo-German pact, he immediately requested his recall to Tokyo. Asked if immediately on his return to Tokyo in October 1939, he issued a statement in favor of the old alliance policy even though negotiations had fallen through, he replied he didn't take any formal action such as issuing a statement, but did talk to newspaper reporters to that effect. He didn't recall apologizing to the press for the German action in concluding the pact with Russia. * At that time there may have been considerable enmity toward Germany for concluding the pact.

35093 Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that he didn't discuss the alliance with Foreign Minister UGAKI or his successor ARITA. Asked if it was not true that KONOYE was foreign minister for about one month before ARITA took office, he replied that that was so in form, but actually it amounted to there being no foreign minister for about one month after UGAKI's resignation.

Life When the accused asked KCNCYE's advice on assuming the ambassadorship, he did discuss the alliance, but on no other occasion. Asked if his reason for discussing the alliance with UGAKI or ARITA was that he knew their views on the alliance did not coincide with his own, he replied that he did not consider them to be different.

35094 * Reference was made to the affidavit where he stated that high officials in the foreign ministry were left entirely in the dark about negotiations. Regarding this, the problem was not still officially taken up by the government, and the foreign minister did not tell the vice-minister and subordinates about it. He believed the related documents were in the hands of KCNCYE, who had copies of reports submitted to the army by Military Attache OSHIMA. * The original proposal regarding the alliance came from military channels.

35096 The accused didn't think that he himself had been advocating for some time previous to August, 1938, a closer alignment with the Axis. He didn't recall saying to HARADA about 4 January, 1937, that he wanted an alliance with Germany to check Russia. In his letter to ARITA he had stated that there was no special necessity of reaching any understanding because Japan and Germany were in the same position.

35097 Asked if the stern attitude of England and the U. S. toward the Japanese advance in China led him later in 1937 to conclude that the democracies were the main obstacle to the realization of Japan's continental policy, he replied * that the contrary was true. It was his contention that if Japan's continental policy was to be pressed through to success and understood, the cooperation of the U. S. and Britain was essential.

35098 He didn't recall writing an article in "Contemporary Japan" in March 1938, that Germany, Italy, and Japan would enlarge the scope of the Pact so it would be directed also against the democracies if they continued to obstruct the "have-not" nations. When shown a document, he identified it as a collection of speeches and articles by himself entitled "The Age of War". This collection was handled by MISHIMA, the witness who had appeared for him, * and he gave it to MISHIMA at his request.

He thought the book actually was published in the spring of 1941. On one page there was an article entitled "Fascism vs Popular Fronts", and in it was an article which was reprinted from the March 1938 issue of "Contemporary Japan".

35100 * Exhibit 3596-A, an excerpt from the book "The Age of War", was received in evidence.

35101 * Asked if before he went to Rome he wrote in October, 1937, an article in which he heralded totalitarianism as the future dominant political philosophy, he replied he didn't recall, but may have. When handed a document, he conceded that in it was an article entitled "The Fundamental Significance of our Continental Policy", and that it was a reprint from the October 1937 issue of the magazine "Kaizo".

35102 * In Exhibit 3596-B, a further excerpt from the book, "The Age of War," SHIRATORI stated that with the outbreak of the Manchurian Incident there arose a new spiritual movement in Japan, agitating national thought and leading to untoward incidents. This movement was closely bound up with Japan's military campaign in Asia. The followers of the movement were regarded as being inclined to fascism. Whether they were or not, their ideas had something in common with the new political philosophy of Germany in that they believed in totalitarianism and denounced Communism, democracy and other materialistic ideologies. *

35103 The difference was that the movement in Japan emphasized the unique national character and refused to follow European and American ways. In political theory and practice, liberalism and democracy based on individualism were becoming outworn and the new trend of nationalism and racialism seemed to be destined to continue developing, and tomorrow's political philosophy would probably be exclusively totalitarian. The new age was dawning and SHIRATORI saw no reason why Japanese thinkers should cling to outworn thought. It was not a creditable matter that there was no marked progress in the people's thought to keep pace with their continental policy.

35104 * Criticism of democratic countries against totalitarian states originated not so much in political philosophy as in the fact that the latter were "have-nots" and were compelled to adopt expansionist policies. Therefore, general condemnation of totalitarian states was not just. Future peace did not depend, as Roosevelt said, on the growth and diffusion of democracy, but rather on how well democracies understood fascism and totalitarianism. Japan, Germany and Italy had concluded an Anti-Comintern Pact with the sole aim of common defense against the Comintern. It was only by chance that the three powers *

35105 without natural resources were obliged to seize every opportunity to expand. It was understandable that this should cause apprehension on the part of the "have" nations, but it was difficult to understand that democracies, despite the absence of any threat of attack, should place a false construction on the intentions of the "have-nots" and attempt to check their activities.

35106 * The accused was asked if within six months he did not go further in another article and argue that totalitarianism was identical with Japan's national policy, and he stated that the two essays referred to refreshed his memory. In those days his interpretation of totalitarianism was different from that ordinarily given in the West and he regarded it as being close to Japanese fundamental character. He did not recall writing another article identifying totalitarianism with Japan's national policy.

35107 * An excerpt was read from Exhibit 359C-A, in which he stated that in Japan the tide had turned against liberalism and democracy. Those who saw in Parliament the real center of power had been rejected and the country was becoming totalitarian, and this had been the fundamental policy of Japan's national life for thirty centuries. Government was a necessary evil and its ideal should be anarchy. According to totalitarianism philosophy, a nation was a tree with branches carrying out their own functions, unable to live apart from the whole. Japan has had no other principle since the beginning of her history, * and this principle was to the Japanese eternal and immutable.

35108 The accused stated that he had no recollection of going to Rome prepared and determined to promote a treaty to serve as a basis for joint aims. Reference was made to his affidavit where he stated that he was not appointed to Rome to negotiate an alliance, and he was asked if he meant to deny that his personal reason for going there was to work for it. In reply he stated that this was the intention of KONOYE and himself at the time.

35109 Aside from the question of whether * such a pact could be concluded, the fact of Japan on one hand and Germany and Italy on the other being brought into close relationship, might cause the U.S. and Britain to reconsider their position and force them to take a more favorable attitude, and perhaps act as mediator in the China affair. He did not go to Rome to get a military alliance.

35110 In his affidavit he stated that the text of the treaty at an early stage was weak and harmless, * and he was asked if he meant that this was the type of agreement he personally wanted.

35111 * He replied he did not go to Italy to bring about a specific form of treaty. The draft agreed on was the type which he himself desired, but he did not intend to advocate a specific form. His desire was that it would be satisfactory if a treaty could be concluded along the lines already proposed by Japan, stating on one hand the desire to conclude a treaty, but on the other to advance

35112 * reservations. A treaty was, in his estimate, a disgrace on Japan's part.

The accused stated that he knew that Japan was going to make terms with Britain on the basis of concessions offered in the Tientsin affair. He thought the matter was brought up in 1939

35113 after negotiations were underway * between Japan, Germany and Italy.

Asked if he meant that he opposed or encouraged ARITA to pursue the possibility for peaceful negotiations, he replied that it was ARITA's duty to bring about a rapprochement between Japan, the U. S. and Great Britain, and it was SHIRATORI's task to facilitate an alliance between Japan, Germany and Italy. Although it appeared that these were two opposite movements, he believed the work he was doing facilitated ARITA's work, and he prayed for ARITA's success.

35114 * He did not recall sending two cables in early 1939 in connection with this matter. When it was suggested to him that they were sent to the Foreign Minister when word came to the accused of anti-British feeling after the Tientsin Incident, he replied that he was quite sure such information had been received, but did not recall sending telegrams about it.

35115 From Exhibit 2234, one of the telegrams referred to, it was stated that in order to establish a new order in China, they must first drive out the old order represented by Britain, therefore, he believed Japan should conclude a treaty with Germany and Italy in opposition to Britain and France. After being read this telegram, 35116 the accused stated he did not recall having sent it. * He had never thought that the main purpose of the alliance was to intimidate the U.S. from making any movement in Europe or the Far East, nor did he recall anyone saying such a thing.

35117 Asked what the reservations and disagreements were between himself and his Government in regard to the treaty, he replied he thought they were, first, that in case an attack was made by Britain and France, Japan would not be able to give substantial aid; and second, that in concluding the treaty, Japan would like to explain to Britain and France that the pact aimed only at the U.S.S.R.. The point of disagreement was that Japan to the last insisted that the reservations be written, whereas, Germany and Italy insisted on an oral understanding. * The accused favored the German view that an oral understanding was sufficient.

35118 According to his affidavit, he felt there was no danger in a pact with Germany because it could be invoked by her alone in case of an attack, and he felt it was extremely unlikely that an aggression would be started by England or France. * He held this belief to the end of the negotiations.

Asked if at that time the Danzig issue had taken shape, he replied that the negotiations ended the latter part of May or the first of June, and he did not recall when the Danzig issue came to the fore. Asked if the negotiations did not continue until the conclusion of the Non-Aggression Pact in August, he replied he thought not. He read of the Danzig affair in the newspapers and did not think that Germany was necessarily an aggressor nation.

35119 *Rather than advocate an alliance with Germany following the outbreak of war in Europe, the accused pointed out that as a result of the Non-Aggression Pact, the possibility presented itself to extend any pact to include the Soviet also.

35121 * In his affidavit he had referred to Exhibit 2232, a telegram by the German Ambassador in Rome dated 2 September 1939. Asked if he was not informed by Ambassador Mackenson on 4 September in response to SHIRATORI's request to see Ribbentrop that he had been willing to see him in Berlin, and he replied that his recollection was that the facts were to the contrary, for he did not inform Mackenson about 9 September that he had discarded the idea of returning via Siberia and that he would convey through OSHIMA the matters which he had planned to present to Ribbentrop himself. It was not true that he wanted to submit to Ribbentrop that he should make some statement that he would be willing to influence Russia to disassociate herself from China.

35122 * He did not ask Ott to obtain that sort of declaration from Ribbentrop in his first conference with Ott after returning to Japan. After his recovery he did not contact Ott to advise him of Japan's trends. About 18 August 1941 he did not have a conference with Ott advising him on the good and bad points of the newly appointed Vice-Foreign Minister AMAU.

He, together with OSHIMA, at the end of January, 1941, did not tell Ott that they thought Japan should ask for Germany's recognition of the Wang Ching-wei Regime, nor had they so advised MATSUOKA.

35123 When he stated in his affidavit that the fall of the YONAI Cabinet * was considered inevitable in view of the changed situation, he meant that the situation had changed because of Hitler's military successes. After returning from Italy, he did not oppose the policy of the YONAI-ARITA Cabinet, but might have expressed opinions contrary to it. He did not recall expressing an opinion calling for a Cabinet change about 18 June 1940, at a meeting of the League for the Sacred War. He did not recall stating there that he entertained no hope for reorienting Japan's foreign policy as long as the Cabinet was composed of men who opposed the military alliance of Japan, Germany and Italy.

35124 * He did not recall Ott telling him then that Ribbentrop had cabled him to investigate and report on SHIRATORI's state of health.

35125 * He did not recall in March, 1941 publicly stating that Japan, on the basis of the Tri-Partite Pact, would inevitably become involved in a European war if it continued for some period. He recalled an occasion in which he stated that such inevitability was nothing to be upset about as the country was well prepared. Asked if on another occasion he stated similar views on Asia Renovation Day in 35126 March, 1941, he replied that the magazine "Contemporary Japan" printed the English translation of the address and he learned about it for the first time * at Sugamo.

35127 * Exhibit 3597-A, an excerpt from a book entitled "Radio Lectures and Speeches," quoting a speech of SHIRATORI in which he stated that the European war had every prospect of developing into a protracted world war lasting ten or twenty years, and Japan would inevitably become involved. This was clear enough from the letter of the Tri-Partite Pact. Such eventuality may be considered an expansion of the China Affair. This prospect would be a source of intense apprehension to many people and efforts would come to curb the progress of events, but this would prove fruitless. All great changes in human thought had resulted from long periods of struggle. When this long-term world war does come, Japan should not be uselessly upset but she should put right her internal conditions to cope with the impending world cataclysm.

35128 * When shown another article in the book, he conceded there was an article in it entitled, "World War and the New World."

35132 * Exhibit 3599, the article so identified, stated that Japan was confronted with a crisis, which was said to be the greatest since the founding of the Empire. He could not agree that it was a time of national crisis and a dangerous time. He believes Japan was facing the most favorable time to make a great leap. The people most feared that national power had weakened as a result of the China incident, added to which relations with the foreign powers were extremely delicate, and they might next have to wage war against Britain and the U.S., and also Russia * could not be relied on.

35133 Such people thought that the shortage of commodities and the weakening of the national power, plus delicate foreign relations caused Japan to be confronted with a great crisis, though SHIRATORI thought they ought not to be too optimistic, but also not necessarily apprehensive if the conditions of other countries were studied and compared with Japan.

Asked if in his speeches and writings he did not minimize the importance of treaties that stood in the way of realization of the program, he replied that he did not recall anything which indicated disregard of the value of treaties.

35134 * To the accused was quoted an excerpt from Exhibit 3596-A in which he had stated that a treaty once signed by a "have-not" nation through temporary weakness was considered sacred and its observance was insisted upon with the inexorableness of a Shylock demanding his pound of flesh. The accused stated that he recalled stating something to that effect. He did not recall even before this deciding that the New Order in East Asia could not be accomplished within the framework of international standards of conduct.

35135 To the accused was quoted from Exhibit 3596-B an excerpt in which it was stated that they had noticed how unprepared they were spiritually at the time of the Manchurian Affair. The six elapsed years had largely been wasted and when hostilities arose in North China, the Japanese nation had nothing to offer but such old jargon as the right of self defense or vested interests, or punishment of outrageous China. In the face of wonted * criticism in the Western press, the Government sent special missions abroad to express Japan's case. It was fundamentally mistaken to explain Japan's action in the light of Western views or within the scope of law and treaties only. If they followed Western ways of thinking, they had to obey Western rules of conduct and plead guilty where Western public opinion blamed them. The accused stated that he had a recollection of writing the above.

35136 * REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. CAUDLE

35137 * To the accused was quoted a part of an answer in his inter-35138 rogation in which he stated that there began his connection with the Army people, and the papers said that they acquiesced in the Foreign Office policy but that was not the case. Asked if he meant by that if the press were insinuating that the Foreign Office acquiesced in the policy of the Army, he replied, yes, he thought so.

35139 None of his articles or speeches were ever sponsored by the Government, or sanctioned by it.

35140 By his meaning of the word totalitarianism he meant a philosophy which could be regarded as opposed to individualism.

Page

35144 * Asked to explain his part in the drafting of the reply to the Lytton Report, he stated his work was to put into Japanese the draft reply prepared in English by Dr. Baty, an English adviser to the foreign office. The accused had no part in the actual formulation of the document.

35146 REDIRECT EXAMINATION by Mr. Brooks,
Counsel for MINAMI.

Reference was made to his examination (transcript 35082) in which when asked if it was not true that in October 1932 he was appointed to a committee entitled "Committee for Drafting the Protest to the Lytton Report" to which he had replied that no such committee was ever created, but he did take part in drafting the Japanese reply. From his last answer it could be inferred that the original draft was not prepared by him, and was prepared in English by other personnel.

35147 * Exhibit 3427-A, he thought, was a pamphlet published by the foreign office based on the original of the Japanese reply. He identified a document handed him as an official document of the League of Nations.

35148 In the lower corner was an official stamp. * From a perusal of it, he didn't think there was any mistake about its being official, and the subject matter in it covered the reply verbatim that he took part in drafting from English to Japanese.

35149 At the time of the WAKATSUKI Cabinet, the accused was in the foreign office. SPIDEHARA was foreign minister and MINAMI was war minister. Asked if in preparing this reply he ran on to any comments as to instructions by Japanese officials forbidding the participation * by Japanese any attempts to establish a new political authority in Manchuria, he replied he believed such instructions were incorporated in the reply. He didn't recall the dates of such instructions. He thought that about 26 September they were issued.

35155- * OPENING STATEMENT BY Dr. TAKAYANAGI.

Exhibit 3601, the affidavit of INCUE, Saburo, stated * that since childhood he had had close association with KIDO and KCNOYE, as well as Baron HARADA, and during his army service he contracted close friendship with the accused SUZUKI, often inviting the above persons to his home.

The affiant was informed about a projected coup d'etat of the March Incident some time after its disclosure, and he believed that SUZUKI's admonitions to the insurgents had been a patent factor in checking the incident, and he once told HARADA this. Around August and September 1931, rumors of the March Incident began to spread, and there was an increased tendency among young officers to discuss not only politics but also openly advocate national renovation by force.

* From what he was told by KIDO, HARADA, the Lord Keeper MAKINO and SAIONJI, the Elder Statesmen were most worried about these unlawful movements. To smooth the way for sound parliamentary government, they ordered KIDO and HARADA to discuss with moderate officers to study methods of maintaining army discipline. It was probably for this reason that when KIDO, HARADA, and SUZUKI met at the affiant's home, KIDO and HARADA put questions to SUZUKI and the affiant about army affairs. These meetings were not for any political purpose, but were social gatherings in which politics were incidentally discussed.

35162

* Exhibit 3602, the affidavit of KAMEYAMA, Koichi, stated that the affiant was director of the third division of the planning board from November 1941 to July 1943. The board had no authority in the management of POWs, and did not formulate any principles for their transfer and employment.

35163

He had been shown exhibit 1971-A, an abstract from the Foreign Affairs Monthly Report for September 1942. * The first paragraph of it deviated from actual facts, and he had no knowledge of the facts in the second paragraph. The actual situation in relation to the conference of 15 August 1942 was that early that month, one of the affiant's subordinates in the planning board got a request by the POW Information Bureau wherein it was stated that the War Ministry had decided that some POWs detained in the southern region be transferred to Japan for employment in industries. The Information Bureau wanted to give an explanation on this to other ministries, and requested the Board convene a meeting of ministry representatives so that a war ministry officer could explain the matter.

- Page When ministry officials met, the planning board frequently lent its conference rooms for this purpose and offered its services.
- 35164 * A subordinate therefore consented to this request. The five principles in paragraph 1 of exhibit 1971-A were presumably read by the war ministry officials. The meeting was decidedly not under planning board auspices. The affiant gave his approval to the loan of the conference room, but did not notify the president or vice-president of such routine matters. The Foreign Affairs Monthly Report was not distributed to the planning board.
- 35165- * Exhibits 3603, 3603-A, and 3603-B, the names of control 35168 associations and their competent authorities regulated by the Act of Organizations, were received in evidence to show that the planning board had no jurisdiction over these ministries.
- 35169 * Exhibit 3604, the affidavit of Prince HIGASHIKUNI, Naruhiko, stated that on the evening of 15 October 1941, Premier KONOYE called on the affiant, asking him to head the next cabinet; and early the next morning SUZUKI, the planning board president, told him that he had been directed by KONOYE to explain to the affiant the condition of national strength so it might be taken into account by him in case he formed the next cabinet.
- 35170 * Recently, elements clamoring for the discontinuance of U. S.-Japanese negotiations and the commencing of war against them were in the ascendant, but it was incumbent upon them to do their utmost to avoid the war in view of national strength. Considering the navy's negative attitude, it must be declared highly dangerous that army people should be urging war, for the navy had to bear the brunt. Since KONOYE was a mere subject, it was beyond his power to evade war, and there was no alternative but to rely on the Prince's prestige and influence. SUZUKI begged permission to explain the state of national strength to the affiant.
- 35171 He then explained the matter on the basis of relevant figures, and added that both he and KONOYE solicited the affiant to form a cabinet. * However, on the evening of that same day, KONOYE wrote him that the question of the cabinet resignation and the consequent cabinet formation by the affiant had been shelved. The affiant had urged KONOYE on 3 August and 5 September, and also TOJO on 7 September, that they do their best to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion. He presumed therefore that both had a full understanding of his attitude toward the problem.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF SUZUKI, Teiichi,
by Mr. Levin.

35172 * The accused identified and verified exhibit 3605 as his 35173 affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the accused was born 1888, and 35174 was graduated from the Military Academy, * and held various military posts from that time in China, and had studied Chinese affairs in Shynahai. On 10 December 1929, he was for the second time appointed Assistant Military Attache to the Legation in Peking. In January, 1931, he was attached to the Military Affairs Bureau; in August, 1933, he became chief of the intelligence corps of the war ministry; 15 March, 1934, chief secretary of the research section of the army staff college and an instructor in military science; in May 1935, an investigator to cabinet bureau investigation; August, 1936, regional commander of the 14th infantry regiment stationed in Manchuria; November, 1937, was 35175 attached to the 16th home division in Kyoto; in April, 1938, chief of staff of the 3rd army stationed * in Manchuria; 16 December, 1938, chief of the political section of the China Affairs Board. On 4 April 1941, he retired from military service and became minister without portfolio and concurrently president of the planning board in the second and third KANOYE Cabinet, until he resigned on 8 October 1943.

Certain things had influenced his career and political ideas.
 1, his professional military training had made him mainly interested in problems of national defense. It caused him to have high regard for the traditions of army discipline, and it instilled in him a spirit of self-sacrifice. 2, his studies in financial and economic affairs in 35176 the finance ministry in 1919 * aroused a lively interest in national economy, and this interest was intensified when he was a cabinet investigator. These experiences enlarged his vision, and taught him to look at problems of national defense not in themselves alone, but in the texture of the entire national life. 3, his sojourn in England in 1929 taught him to look at his country objectively and made him realize 35177 his people's shortcomings. 4, his frequent * contact with China afforded him ample opportunity to become acquainted with the Chinese and cultivate their friendship. In January 1927, he was sent as a liaison officer by War Minister UGAKI to meet Chiang Kai-shek. SUZUKI learned from him his ideas and aspirations, and his sympathy for the nationalist movement 35178 was intensified. * He was later assigned the task of assisting the supervision and guidance of Chinese military students. All these experiences deepened his understanding and friendly attitude toward the Chinese. He was convinced that their aspirations for recovery of China's national rights would be realized in due course and that Japan should cooperate and assist the new China represented by the nationalist party.

The course of events in Sino-Japanese relations ran contrary to what he had hoped, but his views on China's destiny did not suffer a change. He had read an affidavit of Mr. Hu Lin (Ex. 3606) in his behalf, and he was glad to know that one of his Chinese friends understood him thoroughly even now.

Page

- 35182 * Exhibit 3606, the affidavit of Fu Iin, stated that he was presently a Chinese publisher and had been a delegate to the U. N. Conference in San Francisco. * He had been personally acquainted with SUZUKI for almost 25 years, and as a publisher had been familiar with Sino-Japanese relations. He met SUZUKI in 1907, and discovered him to be a scholar, though soldier by profession. He sympathized with the Kuomintang, and advocated that Japan should help bring cooperation between Chiang Kai-shek and Chang Hsueh-liang.
- 35183
- 35184 He met SUZUKI again in 1935, when Sino-Japanese relations were getting worse, but SUZUKI still advocated cooperation. After the outbreak of the China War in 1937, his relations with Japanese friends were cut off. * The affiant knew that SUZUKI during the war had been president of the planning board and a member of the cabinet without portfolio.
- 35185 * The affidavit continued, and the accused SUZUKI stated that lastly, not only was his view of politics deeply influenced but the last phase of his career as a civilian administrator and statesman was determined by frequent contacts with KONCIE, KIDC, and HARADA. Among his seniors in the army were INCUE, Saburo, and their relationship had begun as early as 1919. INCUE was of moderate views, * and on intimate terms with KONCIE, KIDC, and HARADA. Thus, when SUZUKI was invited by INCUE he had an opportunity to meet those three, with whom he also became intimate. KIDC and HARADA often asked him about internal army conditions, and after July 1931 seemed especially interested to obtain such information. There had been various rumors concerning the March affair, and SAICNJI and Lord Keeper MAKINO, to whom HARADA and KIDC were secretaries, were seriously concerned over the rumored subversive activities of army officers, and directed the secretaries to obtain information. SUZUKI therefore used to tell HARADA and KIDC frankly what he knew.
- 35186
- 35187 * KONCIE, HARADA, and KIDC were ardent admirers of SAICNJI's liberalism, and their political views exerted influence on SUZUKI. During 1936 to 1938, while in Manchuria and at Kyoto, their contact was suspended for a time, but in September, 1938, when the accused was removed to Tokyo to assume work in the China Affairs Board, the contacts were resumed. It was chiefly his friendship with KONCIE that made him give up his military career in April 1941. Regarding his views on international political affairs, he felt much sympathy for the Chinese Nationalist Movement, and his observation of Chinese affairs convinced him that the gradual awakening of the Chinese would cause the recovery
- 35188 * of her national rights. It was his basic conception that Japan should bring order to East Asia by assisting and cooperating with the New China represented by the Nationalist Party on equal terms.

Regarding the Soviet Union, he thought the Russian people were perfectly free to live under any government they chose, although a dictatorial and totalitarian government was not palatable to him. However, he felt no small disquietude over those activities which aided and abetted subversive and revolutionary movements in East Asia, especially Japan. Those aspects of the Japanese communist movement which advocated the abolition of the Emperor system by revolutionary methods and which discouraged all religion were especially abhorrent.

On the other hand, for preventing the communistic revolution in Japan, he considered it essential that Japanese statesmen adopt measures so that the people's livelihood should be more adequately guaranteed.

35189 * He was aware from history that war between major powers would bring national disaster and believed that war between Japan and the Soviet should be avoided. For peace between the two he believed it indispensable that the Soviet cease to support the Third International in the Far East and that the arms competition be terminated. It was his theory that to stop mutual distrust, non-aggression treaties were not enough, but it was necessary for both to express sincerity by such measures as withdrawal by Japan of troops in Manchuria and by the Soviet of troops east of Baikal. However, he had to recognize that his ideas could not readily be realized and that so long as the Soviet increased her armament in the Far East, Japan must also.

35190 * Although Japan must make preparation for any eventuality although trying to avoid conflict, he was convinced Japan should keep on friendly terms with Britain and the United States unless attacked or immediately menaced. He thought this could be looked at solely from a national defense standpoint, in view of the fact that a serious potential danger lay in the north. Nazi totalitarian government was not in harmony with his views. He strongly opposed the Triple Alliance especially since Germany was at war with Britain. He was only a Section Chief in the China Affairs Board and in no position officially to express such 35191 views. * However, he told his opinion about August 1940 to KONOYE when he formed the Second KONOYE Cabinet, but by then the rough outlines of policy had been almost determined and he could not move him. After becoming Minister without Portfolio in the KONOYE Cabinet he found that the Triple Alliance was a serious obstacle to concluding Japanese-American negotiations.

After the outbreak of the German-Soviet war, he told KONOYE it would be better to terminate the Triple Alliance because of German perfidy toward Japan. KONOYE said he would consult the Foreign, Army, and Navy Minister, but because of MATSUOKA's opposition the suggestion was not realized.

35192 In the period covered by the Indictment, the accused's status was that of a military officer until he became a civilian by being appointed Planning Board President. However, the offices of the Cabinet Investigator and Chief of the China Affairs Section were civilian in character. * During 1931 and later when he was in the Bureau of Military Affairs he was much concerned over the subversive movements of young officers and directed his efforts toward the maintenance of discipline. He explained the condition in the Army to KIDO and HARADA so the situation could be wisely dealt with under the guidance of MAKINO and SAIONJI. While in Manchuria between 1936 and 1938 as Regional Commander at Tongning and Chief of Staff of the Third Army, incidents on the Manchurian-Siberian border were frequent and he feared they might develop into a major conflict. During his service at Tongning he devised a plan to obviate them and fix an operational boundary 35193 line, * inside the treaty boundary and ordered his men never to resort to force unless the operational boundary was invaded. There was no

35193 instance of conflict on the boundary with the defense of which he was charged and in view of his success he persuaded the Third Army Commander to adopt this plan. Again, the Third Army boundary area had no case of a border incident. The China Incident commenced during his stay in Tongning but as a Regional Commander in remote Eastern Manchuria, he could do nothing but anxiously watch the situation. When called back to Tokyo in 1938 as Chief of the Political Section of the China Affairs Board, China policy had already been decided upon by the High Command and government. Many views of 35194 it were diametrically opposed to his own ideas* but as a Section Chief he had to execute the duties assigned to him. However, he did his best to deal with matters in a way most consonant with his convictions and was guided by these principles: (1) Cooperation with China on terms of equality, (2) the security of China in war-stricken areas, (3) respect for the rights and interests of Third Powers.

His efforts were directed so that Chinese property could be returned to its respective owners, Japanese interference in Chinese political affairs minimized and freedom of navigation in the Yangtze restored.
35195 However, these policies were not speedily realized because of local conditions, especially operational requirements, the establishment of new regimes in China was incompatible with his basic ideas, but he had no control over it. He worked however on the hypotheses that this was but a temporary phenomenon which would end with the cessation of hostilities and that the end of hostilities was needed to restore Chinese politics to their natural course. * In April 1941 KONOYE asked him to become President of the Planning Board--he was reluctant to leave his military career but since KONOYE told him that he would be in an awkward predicament if he declined, the accused finally consented. On April 4, 1941 he was appointed Minister without Portfolio and concurrently President of the Planning Board. The precedent for conferring on the Planning Board President the status of Minister had already been set, he was privileged to attend Cabinet meetings, but understood his primary function lay in execution of the business of the Planning Board under the Prime Minister's control.

His first task as President was to draw up a commodity mobilization plan* for allocation of vital materials for the fiscal year 1941. The plan had already been initiated and was to have been put in operation April 1st, but because of a divergence of views no decision had been reached when he was appointed to the Board. When he was appointed, KONOYE told him that it might be natural that the demands of the armed forces should become more insistent, but since national economic life was strained, he wished SUZUKI to perform his work with that in mind. The accused had been chosen not to comply with exorbitant demands of the military but to see that the allocation of vital commodities be made so as not to exhaust economic power. Accordingly, he established an organ in the Board concerned exclusively with living necessities and 35198 initiating a plan for mobilizing such commodities. * He tried to adjust the demands of the ministries from this broader viewpoint. After the end of June he was confronted with the German-Soviet war which made it impossible to obtain steel and other items they had planned to import from Germany; and the sending of Japanese troops to southern French Indo-China

35198 which brought about the economic blockade by America, Britain and others. After this he had to feel special concern over the United-States-Japanese negotiations.

35200 While he had tried to effect a compromise and to draw up a mobilization plan, he realized that Japanese economy would be ruined if kept isolated for an extended period so he asked the Prime Minister to readjust United States-Japanese relations * and recommended steps toward lifting the embargo. KONOYE stated his mind was made up to confer with Roosevelt personally to arrive at a speedy settlement and SUZUKI hoped KONOYE's plan would bear fruit. However, KONOYE's views proved unacceptable to America and in Japan the opinion came to the fore that so long as the United States refused to sell needed commodities they had to use force to take areas containing such resources. In August 1941 KONOYE ordered him to study three problems: 1 - Can Japan provide herself with needed materials without relying upon America and Britain, to which he answered "No". 2 - If the severance of economic relations continues, would Japan be able to stand it for its duration? He reported that the severance of economic relations would put Japanese economy in a difficult position but as long as no further special * development occurred in relations, they could rely on stockpiles except for petroleum and a few other items and might escape collapse for possibly two years. In petroleum, they might obtain self-sufficiency after some years if capital and materials were thrown into those channels as the manufacture of substitutes was possible. 3 - If war broke out and they succeeded in taking Netherlands East Indies would they then be able to obtain the needed petroleum? He reported that the immediate acquisition of petroleum would be impossible as military occupation would be attended with serious destruction. At the end of August 1941 when the effects of economic severance became patent, KONOYE ordered him to attend a Liaison Conference to acquaint himself with its atmosphere, he thought the extent of his statements allowable at the Conference depended on his status and asked KONOYE * what his status was. In accordance with an agreement between General Headquarters and the government (Exh 1103) KONOYE told him (a) 'Persons who attend the Liaison Conference are the Premier, the Foreign, War and Navy Ministers and the two Chiefs of Staff. Other Ministers would be asked when it was deemed necessary.

35,202 When SUZUKI's presence was required, he would receive orders from the Premier and was to attend as President of the Planning Board. The accused interpreted this to mean that he was to attend as the Premier's Technical Assistant and must refrain from speaking except by his order or command. (b) Even if an understanding had been reached between General Headquarters and the Government, its execution must be postponed until after Cabinet approval, but, if it was within the sole purview of the Ministers present at the Conference, it could be executed on his responsibility; he could carry it out without referring the matter to the Cabinet. SUZUKI interpreted these words to mean that the Liaison Conference was not a policy-deciding body over and above the Cabinet, but a meeting convened to reach understanding through an exchange of views between the government and General Headquarters.

The Liaison Conference sometimes convened in the Imperial Presence, but he understood that the Imperial Presence Conference was a kind of Liaison Conference except that weighty matters alone were brought before it and explained that his status there was exactly as at the Liaison Conference. On the Premier's orders he attended the Liaison Conference of 6 September 1941 but he presumed it was KONOYE's intention to have him speak in case there was any occasion requiring elucidation on economic matters. At the Conference he was not called on to speak and was relieved to know that the topic of discussion centered on the continuation of the negotiation with America, war preparations having been considered only a safeguard against really remote danger. After the 6 September Conference, the Navy Vice-Minister requested him directly for an additional allocation of 300,000,000 tons of steel, about the same time the Director of the Equipment Bureau for the War Ministry asked for more steel. He refused these requests although both, especially the Navy repeated their demands. The question was left pending until the war was actually decided upon.

35205 * Early in October, KONOYE told the accused he would like to withdraw from politics but the accused told him this notion was irresponsible and advised him to have a talk with the War, Navy and Foreign Ministers, and he did so on October 12 at Ogikubo with the accused in attendance.

35206 * On the question of withdrawing the forces from China, there arose a sharp difference between KONOYE and TOJO and the meeting adjourned without any conclusion reached. It became clear where the thorny question lay. The Navy thought war with America impossible but did not want to say so openly. The Army did not necessarily want war but vigorously objected to withdrawing troops from China. The Foreign Minister believed that negotiations could not come to success without withdrawing troops. The only way for the Premier to avoid war was either to make the Navy declare its real intentions or make the Army understand these intentions and agree to withdraw the armed forces. The accused saw that 35207 KONOYE was in a predicament, * and this was due to the decision of September 6. After the conference, he asked KONOYE if it was not advisable to request the Throne to wipe the September 6 decision off the slate and continue negotiations. He replied that this proposition would be advisable and ordered SUZUKI to talk it over with TOJO. SUZUKI did so on October 13 and TOJO said that to cancel the decision within one month was a grave matter and he could not agree to the proposition which could be carried out only if and when the Government and High Command leaders have been replaced.

35208 When SUZUKI conveyed TOJO's view to KONOYE, he said he would discuss the matter again with TOJO the next day. The same day SUZUKI visited KIDO stressing the necessity * of requesting the Emperor to nullify the September 6th decision.

At the cabinet meeting of October 14, TOJO declared he opposed the withdrawal of troops from China and that the negotiations with America would be broken off. This declaration so surprised KONOYE and the members of the cabinet that the meeting was adjourned without anyone uttering a word.

That afternoon, SUZUKI was told by KONOYE that from TOJO's attitude, the negotiation was impossible. There was nothing to do except for the cabinet to resign en bloc. Since the resignation was due to TOJO's attitude, he wanted SUZUKI to sound TOJO on his views. SUZUKI called on TOJO

35209 who told him * that he believed that there was no one except Prince HIGASHIKUNI who could save the situation and that he had spoken about this to KIDO. TOJO's reply was unexpected for SUZUKI had often heard that HIGASHIKUNI had an ardent desire for the success of the negotiations. When SUZUKI conveyed TOJO's words to KONOYE, he said it was splendid for HIGASHIKUNI was definitely opposed to war and wanted the negotiations to succeed. He asked SUZUKI to communicate his and TOJO's views to KIDO. SUZUKI did so on the morning of October 15.

35210 * KIDO, however, said it was not customary to install a member of the Imperial family as the head of a cabinet. Also there seemed to be a group of men in the Army who would make their way into war under HIGASHIKUNI's premiership so he would think it over. SUZUKI reported this to KONOYE.

Later, KIDO called SUZUKI and told him to go to TOJO and ask him if he could hold down the Army's war faction if HIGASHIKUNI headed the government and decided against war. SUZUKI visited TOJO in regard to KIDO's opinion and said that if HIGASHIKUNI headed the government and decided on a no-war policy, and if it could not check the Army, under whose premiership could it be checked? TOJO couldn't say whether it could be checked. SUZUKI transmitted these words to KIDO.

35211 On the 16th, KONOYE told SUZUKI that he had an audience with HIGASHIKUNI * and pleaded with him to accept the command to form a cabinet if it came to him. HIGASHIKUNI said he wanted to consult with TOJO and OIKAWA and would like to think it over. KONOYE asked SUZUKI to question HIGASHIKUNI of the nation's strength. SUZUKI did so and also on the need of a satisfactory settlement with the negotiations. HIGASHIKUNI agreed and said war must be avoided. SUZUKI called on KIDO and made a detailed report.

35212 * KIDO expressed fears that HIGASHIKUNI's premiership might cause undesirable impressions but did not positively say he was opposed to a cabinet formed by an Imperial Prince. That afternoon KONOYE told SUZUKI that KIDO had told him it had been decided not to request HIGASHIKUNI to head the government. He supposed KIDO had some idea that the cabinet would resign en bloc at once. SUZUKI accordingly tendered his letter of resignation.

35213 On the 17th, KONOYE told him that KIDO had telephoned him that TOJO was to form a cabinet. At the same time, the Emperor was to give him word * to carry on the U.S. negotiations wiping the September 6 decision off the slate. KONOYE believed TOJO would check the war faction and proceed with the negotiations. SUZUKI was to remain in office and help him if he asked him to do so. If the new cabinet comprised many members of the KONOYE cabinet, it would show that it desired to carry on negotiations. When TOJO asked SUZUKI to continue in office, he consented in conformity with KONOYE's advice.

35214 His status in the TOJO cabinet was the same, Minister Without Portfolio and concurrently, President of the Planning Board but there was a considerable difference in practise. Since KONOYE was a close friend, SUZUKI gave him his opinion on political matters and sometimes SUZUKI was employed to conduct * political negotiations. TOJO, however, warned him that he desired SUZUKI to concentrate his energy on economic mobilization and not meddle in political affairs. The Planning Board President was to function under the Premier's control, therefore, SUZUKI tried to comply with his wishes and devoted himself to the work of the Planning Board.

* TOJO's attitude after becoming Premier differed from that assumed by him before. In order to continue negotiations by wiping the September 6th decision off the slate, he decided to investigate various questions and SUZUKI was assigned the following two questions on which he reported to TOJO the Planning Board's conclusions after consulting certain other ministries.

Question A: If the negotiations were broken off and no prospect existed for ending economic severance, how far could Japan maintain her commodity supply?

The Planning Board reported that the answer depended on the descriptions of commodities. Those available in Japan, Manchuria and China could be increased some * but as to commodities to be imported from FIC and Thailand, a decrease due to U.S.-British interference must be expected. Regarding imports from America, Britain and the Netherlands, especially petroleum, the prospect was not bright. The annual domestic production of petroleum did not exceed 400,000 tons while civilian consumption was about 1,800,000. That stored by the Army and Navy did not exceed 8,400,000 and civilian stores had been nearly exhausted and if military petroleum was to be employed for civilian purposes, it would be exhausted within three years. * The prospect for artificial petroleum production was not bright and the construction of factories for this could not speedily be realized nor meet the urgent needs.

35217

Question B: If Japan, in the event of war, succeeded in occupying natural resources zones in the south without serious damage, how far could self-supply be expected?

35218

Again, the Planning Board's answer depended upon the kinds of commodities. If war broke out, there would have to be an enormous amount of shipping available and certain ship losses must be taken into account. According to War and Navy Ministries' estimates, continuous employment of 3,000,000 tons of ocean going vessels was feasible, but if they were to be not only for transport to and from Manchuria and China but also between Japan and * NEI, it would necessitate strict economy resulting in some diminution in production. As to steel, it might diminish to 4,300,000 tons. Imports from FIC and Thailand would be reduced considerably because of military operations and the rice shortage thus created would have to be made good by substitutes. With regard to imports from the southern areas, especially petroleum, the estimate could not be made by the Planning Board. Since petroleum was a strategic commodity, petroleum questions were studied by the War and Navy Ministries not allowing Planning Board participation. The question of the destruction and repair of oil fields was closely related to the condition of military operations of which the Planning Board had no knowledge now was it aware * of the condition of tankers, etc. As to petroleum, the Board had to rely on the Army and Navy studies in its report. According to these studies, the petroleum obtainable in the first year would be about 300,000 tons and in the second, about 2,000,000 tons provided the southern areas could be occupied after the outbreak of war.

The Planning Board's report suggested that if the negotiation failed, war or no war, Japan's economy would be overwhelmed with difficulties. It suggested that Japan's economic life would be so impoverished that the minimum living standard might seriously be jeopardized.

TOJO, after ascertaining the views of the Ministers responsible for the report, persuaded the High Command and decided to try to bring about the successful conclusion of the negotiations. * This policy was manifested in the Imperial Conference decision of November 5 which decided to withdraw the armed forces from China to make the negotiations successful. On the other hand, TOJO and TOGO seemed unable to totally disregard the High Command's demands.

The High Command's opinion was that the demands upon Japan by the United States seemed to increase in proportion to Japan's concessions and there was no prospect for a successful conclusion of the negotiation. This indicated that what the U.S. really had in view was not the amicable settlement of the China Affair but the destruction of Japan as a leading power. If Japan should recognize in principle the withdrawal of troops and evince her readiness to enter into negotiations concerning the details of the withdrawal and America should assume an attitude evading settlement, it might be concluded that the U.S.'s intention was to gain time and under guise of continuing the negotiations 35221 * intended to strengthen her Far Eastern forces and when fully armed, drop negotiations and turn to an offensive against Japan. If Japan were destined not to be able to avoid war, the earlier it came, the better. Therefore, diplomatic negotiations should be concluded by the end of November and if there was no prospect of success at the beginning of December, the decision for war should then be made.

As one reason for this, the High Command pointed to the concentration of air forces in Malaya and the Philippines, and the growing divergence in fighting power and that after several months, the High Command could not be responsible for national defense.

The Government, especially TOGO, put up a stiff fight against these contentions. The Liaison Conference of November 1 continued its deliberations until 2 a.m. November 2. The High Command did not relinquish its contentions until the very end and as a result, the Imperial Conference of November 5 decided on the one hand that negotiations should be carried on * without delay, and at the beginning of December, they could further continue them if the U.S.'s attitude allowed it. The conditions for conducting negotiations were now more favorable for settlement than at the time of the KONOYE Cabinet because of the recognition of troop withdrawal which had been opposed by the Army. Moreover, troops which advanced into Southern FIC were to be withdrawn.

Further, a preliminary agreement to decide on war might, in view of the precedent of the 6 September decision, be rescinded. When SUZUKI saw this agreement of November 5, he felt that a new prospect of peace had arisen. * However, this determination to continue negotiations was nullified by the U.S.'s reply of November 26.

He was given the purport of the note at the Liaison Conference of November 27 or 28 and also heard TOGO explain that the note was tantamount to an ultimatum. In the previous Liaison Conferences he had frequently heard General Headquarters representatives reporting upon the strengthening of U.S.-British military preparations in the Pacific and he could not but sense now that war with America might be unavoidable. SUZUKI decided to abide by the final decision to be arrived at by consultation between TOJO, SHIMADA, TOGO and the Chiefs of the Army and Navy General Staffs.

On November 29, an informal conference between the Government and Senior Statesmen was held at the Palace. He was directed by TOJO together with SHIMADA, TOGO and Finance Minister KISHI to attend the Conference and answer * questions regarding national economic strength. He did not volunteer any explanation but one of the Elder Statesmen asked a question concerning ship building capacity and airplane production capacity in the event of war.

To the first question he answered that the annual output would be between 700,000 and 800,000 tons and to the second, he replied that materials were not available at the Planning Board as the matter was solely within military purview. He also replied to another question regarding the supply of steel. The main theme of the conference was the circumstances in which the negotiation came to a deadlock. Therefore, there was little time left for SUZUKI to enlarge on economic problems.

TOJO then seemed finally determined to enter into war. At the December 1 Cabinet meeting and before the Imperial Conference the same day attended by all Cabinet members, his conclusion was announced * that war with America, Britain and the Netherlands was unavoidable. The Army and Navy will turn to war operations but when they saw a definite chance for success in negotiations, these operations would be immediately suspended and they would turn to negotiation. SUZUKI agreed to the decision believing it unavoidable as long as they had an U.S. ultimatum.

Following this decision, he engaged himself busily with the revision of the Commodity Mobilization Plan. Although the preservation of a sense of security was an objective of the 1941 plan, it did not cover such a vast armament expansion as would be required for a war with America and Britain. Economically, Japan had not been prepared for any war with America and Britain prior to December 1941 and quick readjustment had to be made. * Thereafter, he concentrated all energy in performing his duties. Prior to December 1, he earnestly wished for and contributed to the avoidance of war but once the decision was made, he considered it his moral duty as a Japanese to do his bit in the prosecution of the war.

Towards the evening of December 7, he was notified there would be a cabinet meeting the next day at 7 a.m. About 6:30 a.m. December 8, when he went to the Premier's official residence to attend the meeting, Chief Cabinet Secretary HOSHINO informed him of the Pearl Harbor attack and he knew for the first time that war had begun.

At the cabinet meeting, SHIMADA briefly explained that operation after which the cabinet decided on the text of the Imperial Rescript declaring war.

After the war broke out, just as before, his main duties as Planning Board President consisted in the preparation of an effective plan * for commodity mobilization with the concurrence of the ministries concerned without authority to compel them or power of the execution thereof. After the war began, the necessity for unified administration of national economic power increased and various ministries came to accede more easily to the Planning Board's opinion. Especially after the end of 1943, the War and Navy Ministries became less insistent in their demands. Thus the Board which was a sort of conciliation Board in the pre-war days gradually commanded prestige. It did not cease to be a conciliation Board although the conciliators came to command more influence. At TOJO's request, SUZUKI left the Cabinet and Planning Board on October 8, 1943.

The Prosecution had referred to certain evidence allegedly proving he had participated in a criminal conspiracy. * As to Exhibits 179-F and 179-G, extracts from the KIDO Diary -- upon hearing about a plot later called the March Incident, he reported it to his Superior, Colonel NAGATA with whom he collaborated to check it. The March Affair did not come to pass but later caused agitation among young officers, some going so far as to advocate national renovation by military force.

SUZUKI admonished them against this reckless behavior and presented his views to his superiors to keep vigilant watch that junior officers might not be swayed to ruin their careers and cast reflection on the honor of the Army. * He did not think this recklessness was not without its causes, one of which was an apparent deterioration in politicians' morals. Another cause was economic depression and soldiers had been conscripted from families in great financial distress. It seemed to him natural that Section or Company Commanders should have sympathy for their subordinates' families and want a Government capable of saving the nation from economic distress. He thought their advocacy of national renovation was due to these causes and concluded that the military were duty-bound to exercise the strictest control over these young officers to maintain discipline but this might have a bad effect in intensifying their resentment unless the statesmen were above corruption, and unless more effective measures were adopted to deal with agrarian problems and unemployment.

*From the standpoint of maintaining Army discipline, he was much concerned over domestic politics and remembered telling KIDO and HARADA that a young and able statesmen, such as KONOYE, should become Premier and form a coalition cabinet of men of known moral rectitude. What he had primarily in mind, was ways and means by which deterioration of discipline might be prevented.

Regarding Exhibit 2252 which concerned the succeeding cabinet and was KIDO Diary entry of May 17, 1932, he presented his views to his superiors that they might keep watch on young officers.

However, on May 15, 1932 a deplorable incident occurred, in which the naval officers and military students * in collaboration with civilian extremists assassinated Premier INUKAI. War Ministry circles received a serious shock by the news and among his colleagues, there was a sentiment of self-reproach. The desire was expressed that the succeeding Cabinet not be organized by the SEIYUKAI Party which was generally condemned for lack of moral integrity but instead, that there be a coalition cabinet of upright men.

When he met KIDO, he gave him the information available at the War Ministry and the views of his colleagues and he supposed the passage in the Diary was a summary statement regarding the conversations at that time.

As to KIDO Diary entry of April 13, 1933, Exhibit 2253 describing Russia an absolute enemy, etc., he was reported * to have said that Russia was an absolute enemy and he was opposed to a non-aggression treaty with her. He did not remember the occasion well but possibly may have stated something to the effect that so long as the Soviet aided and abetted the activities of the Third International, the U.S.S.R. was their absolute enemy and that the conclusion of a non-aggression pact would be illusory.

Exhibit 3371 and Exhibit 670 concerning his alleged speech at Toyama School in 1933 - he recalled that in 1933, War Minister ARAKI invited governors to the school to express thanks for their services to the Soldiers Assistance Society, a charitable organization. He thought ARAKI made a brief speech of thanks but did not recall making a speech himself. He remembered there were several maps of Manchuria * in the ante chamber indicating the state of bandit soldiers in Manchuria and remembered explaining the maps to the society president. He denied any speech there or elsewhere on the necessity of military occupation of Siberia for such idea was contrary to his ideas of national defense.

Regarding Exhibit 2266, an extract from KIDO Diary of 29 December 1938 regarding the KONOYE Cabinet's duty to carry on, etc., - from August 1936 to December 1938, his official assignments were in Manchuria and Kyoto. He was appointed Chief of the Political Affairs Section of the China Affairs Board at the end of 1938 when KONOYE was Premier and SUZUKI was to serve as a subordinate. Before ten days had elapsed after his arrival in Tokyo, he was disappointed to learn that the KONOYE Cabinet was to resign en masse. He thought that since the China Incident took place during KONOYE's premiership, it was irresponsible for him to leave his post with no prospect of its solution. He therefore went to KIDO and told him the KONOYE Cabinet should carry on.

35234 *Regarding his talks with Goette, he remembered that about September 1939, two United States newspaper correspondents came to him at his office in the China Affairs Board and asked his opinion about Wang Ching-wei. SUZUKI did not favor the government policy towards the China Incident and he told him frankly that the policy to deal with Wang was illusory for Chiang Kai-shek was the only real ruler in China. He said hostilities must be terminated early by dealing with Chiang. SUZUKI did not remember whether this newspaper man was named Goette.

35235 Regarding Exhibit 1094, an extract from KIDO's Diary of 23 June 1941 regarding unification and reinforcement of General Headquarters, the Accused stated that he was appointed Planning Board President in April 1941 and charged with the preparation of a Commodity Mobilization Plan. * The worst trouble was that the Army and Navy, without consulting each other, demanded allotments of commodities and that antagonism between them made preparation of the plan impossible. Both kept their secrets from the other. The manufacture of war munitions, etc. had been carried on without any connection with each other involving a waste of materials and labor. SUZUKI thought that to obviate this, it was imperative that General Headquarters, which had been divided into compartments in the shape of Army and Navy divisions, be unified and a system of collaboration be worked out. He told this to KIDO who probably recorded the conversation.

35236 *Regarding Exhibit 1107 and 1152 regarding attendance at Liaison Conferences, the Prosecution alleged he attended the Imperial Conferences of July 2, September 6, November 5 and December 1, 1941. He attended the last three but does not remember attending the July 2 conference. He also attended many liaison conferences but there were some at which he did not assist.

35237 Concerning Exhibits 649, 650, 1241 and 1267 regarding attendance at Privy Council meetings, he attended them as an explainer but had no right to vote (Exh. 83). An explainer's functions were to make such explanations as might be ordered by the Minister in charge. The Premier directed him to attend probably expecting that explanations * might be necessary on Planning Board matters.

Regarding Exhibits 840, 1132, 1133 and 1140 regarding functions of the President of the Planning Board, his functions were provided for in the organization of the Planning Board (Exh. 71). When he assumed office, there was little to do in the way of drafting the outlines of laws and ordinances and his time was mostly devoted to adjustment of conflicting claims in the Ministry. The 1941 Commodity Mobilization Plan and the ancillary Plans relative to transport and labor were prepared under exacting circumstances such as the outbreak of the Russo-German War * which involved a stoppage of imports from Germany and the economic severance of the U.S., Britain and the Netherlands. Japan was confronted with brain racking problems concerning the readjustment of her domestic economy. Through stoppage of petroleum imports, civilian petroleum was exhausted. Certain means of transport could not be used and had to be replaced by railways and sailing boats. An embargo on scrap iron resulted in the necessity to manufacture steel by the use of iron ores requiring a large amount of coal. Those in export industries lost their jobs and there were other numerous problems.

If the plain fact of the situation had bluntly been made public, * it would have inflamed an anti-American sentiment so as to seriously impede the negotiations. Therefore they used such phrases as "strengthening of national defense power," "war time structure," etc. to direct the nation's efforts towards increased production and make the people be resigned to a strained national economy.

35240

It was true that the Commodity Mobilization Plan of 1941 increased munitions allotments in view of the international tension and the China Incident but they were by no means such as would make war with America and Britain feasible. Although various economic plans were styled "Mobilization Plans", in fact, plans for the allocation of commodities, labor and transport were made with an eye to readjustments in domestic economy, out of supplies allocated to civilian use after deducting what had been assigned the military. The making of plans regarding supplies allocated to Army and Navy was outside * the Planning Board's purview. Economic mobilization plans were not prepared by the Board autonomously but various ministries presented their demands to the Board and if their total exceeded the amount of supply, the Board negotiated with the Ministries so that the total amount demanded could be curtailed to the amount capable of supply. The Board functioned thus as a conciliation Board and had no power to make an order binding on the Ministries so long as no compromise was arrived at between the Ministries. No economic plans could come into being nor was the Board invested with the authority to execute the plans.

It was untrue to allege that as President of the Board, he had an all important authority and influence on Japanese economy nor was the allegation that the key Industrial bodies Ordinance was prepared during his tenure true. This Ordinance was deliberated upon and its outlines * formulated before he assumed office. (Exh. 2225). When he assumed office, the Board had nothing to do with its preparations, the Ordinance outlines having already been in the Legislative Bureau's hands.

Liebert's testimony that the Planning Board President controlled Japanese economy together with the control association presidents was in error for the Board had no connection with the associations, their operations being in charge of the ministries concerned.

It was wrong to imply that he was responsible for organizing the Imperial Petroleum Company for not only were matters relating to it outside the Board's purview, but the law regarding its formation was promulgated before he assumed office.

Exhibit 1142 from the KIDO Diary entry of 29 September 1941 regarding his explanations made in the Imperial Presence concerning rubber and tin resources in the United States was based on the fact that on that day he received word that KIDO requested him to go to the Palace and explain to the Emperor regarding U.S. rubber and tin resources. He explained that even if, as a result of war, the U.S. was prevented from importing these items from the southern areas, it would not be a vital blow to her for they could be replaced by imports from South America and he also said that large scale production of artificial rubber would be feasible for the United States.

Regarding Exhibit 2280 from the KIDO Diary extract of 1 October 1941 re: Informal talks concerning the policy towards the United States, by October 1941 the effects of economic severance were becoming manifest. Army circles which had minimized them * became conscious of the grave situation. The opinion came to the fore that to wait for successful negotiation with America would be to wait for the day of economic starvation and they should find a way out by taking an offensive prior to the consumption of U.S. war preparations. However, KONOYE seemed to have felt himself quite helpless and SUZUKI talked to KIDO on encouraging KONOYE to redouble his efforts to bring the negotiation to success.

Regarding Exhibits 1147, 1148 and 2250 concerning the circumstances in the closing days of the KONOYE Cabinet, the Accused stated that at the time of the KONOYE Cabinet's dissolution, he played the part of a messenger between KONOYE and TOJO and KIDO, and KIDO and TOJO, and therefore, Prosecution evidence conflicting with what he had stated earlier in his affidavit did not conform to the facts.

* Concerning the Exhibits 1331 and 1332, on the Sixth Committee and Outline of Economic Counter-plans for the Southern Areas in late November 1941, the Government was inclined to the opinion that opening hostilities might be unavoidable and they made studies to provide for this. To supplement materials necessary for carrying on the war, the November 28 cabinet meeting decided to organize a committee of the officials of the Planning Board and Foreign, Finance, War, and Navy Ministries to work out plans for the development, acquisition, and control of the resources in the Southern areas which might be occupied.

On December 2 when hostilities had been decided upon, TOJO ordered him to be chairman of the committee and execute its functions in collaboration with the members representing these Ministries. TOJO's instructions were that the thing to be most feared after the outbreak of war was that irresponsible enterprisers would proceed to the southern areas, taking advantage of the military expedition and liable to come in conflict with the local population and disturb local economy, wasting funds and materials. Adequate measures should be devised so that these evils might not occur. The outline of policy prepared by the Sixth Committee was in the nature of wartime measures to realize TOJO's instructions.

Regarding Exhibit 1240, concerning the Imperial Rescript declaring war, SUZUKI signed it although war was not what he desired, but he thought hostilities unavoidable for defense so long as an ultimatum had been received and they were in a situation where they were liable to be attacked any moment.

Concerning Exhibit 1271, regarding explanations at a Budget Committee of the House of Representatives,* in reply to an interpellation, he made the explanations mentioned.

Regarding Exhibit 1971A, concerning treatment of POWs, the Prosecution seemed to accuse him of collaborating with the employment of prisoners of war for military purposes, in reliance on a document called the Foreign Affairs Monthly Report which was prepared and circulated without the Planning Board's knowledge. This would be a false accusation for the Board had no authority concerning POW treatment and it was unimaginable that the Board should, without his knowledge, have held a conference under its auspices or participated in the formulation of such policies.

Concerning Exhibit 687, regarding Deliberations of the Establishment of the Greater East Asia Ministry, Prosecution alleged he had an important role at the Privy Council on the organization of that Ministry. However, he attended as an explainer.

Concerning Exhibit 1272 (Ott's telegram concerning German decoration.) At the end of September 1942, the German Embassy invited him to attend a ceremony conferring decorations. He had no interest in such decorations for he had an antipathy to Nazi ideology. He notified the Embassy declining to accept. After the outbreak of the Russo-German war, he advised TOJO that since Germany attacked without giving notice to Japan immediately after Japan's conclusion of a non-aggression pact with the Soviet Union, she should recede from the Triple Alliance. SUZUKI did not know if Ott heard of this from someone and concluded that his attitude toward Germany was ambiguous. Ott's report in Exhibit 1272 contained inaccuracies. He never knew he was called Vice Premier of the TOJO Cabinet * for the order of Cabinet rank at official events was a sheer matter of court precedence and indicated no political significance. There was no special intimacy between TOJO and himself.

The aforesaid decoration was later sent to his residence and as it would be awkward to return it, he kept it.

Regarding Exhibit 3372 re the Total War Institute, he understood at the time that the Institute was a place where academic studies were made and persons who would be needed in time of war would be educated. He was appointed a counselor but it was a nominal post accorded him as Chief of the Political Section of the China Affairs Board. While a counselor, he never visited the institute nor did he see any documents resulting from the studies. He remembered attending some ceremonies at the Institute with other Ministers.

*In December 1943, he ceased to be a minister having resigned from the TOJO Cabinet in October 1943. The statement by the witness MURAKAMI that he was present at a ceremony in December must be in error.

Concerning Exhibit 126, re decorations, he was conferred certain decorations for his services in the Manchurian and China Incidents. However, the decorations were as to the former was conferred on all colonels in active service and the latter was conferred to all majors in active service without any special merit. At the time of the conferment of these decorations, he had already received other decorations. *The accused stated that no protests from foreign governments as to treatment of POW's was ever presented at cabinet meetings.

KIDO, the accused stated he recalled the Ogikubo Conference held at KONOYE's home October 12, 1941, and that in his affidavit he had made a report of what had transpired there. He took the minutes of the meeting down in a small notebook * and then handed them to KONOYE, but he did not know what KONOYE did with them. Cabinet Secretary TOMITA was not there at the conference but he did not know whether he was KONOYE's home in another room.

Page He remembered hearing the KIDO diary entry for October 12, 1941, read in which KIDO recorded that TOMITA visited him and reported what had transpired at that meeting. The diary entry for that date was correct as it concerned the Ogikubo Conference but the notes which* SUZUKI took there did not cover any decisions reached between War, Navy, Foreign, and Prime Ministers. The Ministers talked on various problems but there was no decision reached at the meeting and, therefore, there is no memo concerning any decisions. He did not know what TOMITA may have told KIDO but his own notes did not indicate that they had reached any final decision. * It was true that matters discussed at the conference were left to the Foreign Minister for further study.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY BRIGADIER NOLAN

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that by reason of his long residence in China and his interview with Chiang Kai-shek in 1927 he was sympathetic with the Chinese nationalist movement and it was his* conviction that Japan should assist and cooperate with the new China. Asked if he would say that the Army, War Ministry, and the General Staff were sympathetic to the nationalist movement, he answered that could not say positively that all were so disposed for some were not.

While in the Bureau of Military Affairs in 1932 and 1933 his duties were liaison matters regarding military matters concerning China, matters relating to Japanese advisers and instructors sent to China, and matters relating to Chinese military students sent to study in the Japanese Army.

His duties brought him to study the Manchurian problem and the China Incident,* and he went to Shanghai in 1932. Asked why he went, he replied that the Manchurian Incident had just broken out and the anti-Japanese movement in China had been intensified. He was sent to Shanghai to investigate conditions and went to North China in May 1933 after the Tang-Ku Truce was signed and met Hwang Fu and other Chinese leaders. After his return, he reported to the War Ministry. He did not recall if, at that time, the Army was considering the revision of policies toward China as a result of the Tang-Ku Truce. He did not remember taking part in discussions concerning a revision of China policy. * Asked why he was not considered in view of his knowledge of the China Affairs, he replied that he may have been considered but did not recall. He did not recall a question of China policy arising in July 1943 after returning from North China.

As a result of the Manchurian Incident, Central Army authorities were apprehensive lest the military movement should extend into North China. When shown the document *, the accused stated that he did not recall seeing it before. He read in it that it said it was received from Lt. Colonel SUZUKI on 12 July 1933, with the note that as the War Ministry and General Staffs had un-animously agreed on the following gist of policy, it was decided the Government would decide its policies along the lines of the document". The accused stated that he did not remember handing the document to MORISHIMA and could not remember anything about it. MORISHIMA was a Section Chief in the Asiatic Bureau of the Foreign Office. He did not recall on 12 July 1933 to whom he delivered or caused to be delivered the document to MORISHIMA. At the time documents were exchanged frequently between his office and the Foreign Office and this one may have been one of them, but he could not recall.

*He could not testify with assurance that he did send the document although he may have sent it.

35262

*Exhibit 3607A. The document so identified by the accused being an excerpt from a pamphlet entitled "China Policy Reference Material" compiled September 1933 stated that it was received from SUZUKI on 12 July 1933 with a note that the Government would decide its policies along the lines of the document since the War Ministry and General Staffs unanimously agreed on it. It was signed by MORISHIMA.

Concerning the gist of the measures they must make the North China regime suppress the National Party's anti-Japanese activities in North China and make the Party reduce itself until dissolution. * They should make every effort to prevent foreign powers, especially the United States and the U.S.S.R. in expanding influence over China and giving support to the government officials.

Policies taken by the Nanking Government previously were permanently and fundamentally contradictory to the Empire's policies. They should proclaim to the world that the Imperial Government and its people shall be hostile to the Nanking Government as long as it did not alter its attitude toward Japan, but they were willing to shake hands with China under fair conditions at the earliest possible date.

*In regard to this document the accused stated that he did not express his views toward China and the Nationalist Government.

35265

*The opinion he gave to Hu Lin (Exhibit 3603) was his private opinion. Asked why he didn't tell Hu Lin what the policy of the War Ministry and General Staff really was, he replied that the Army policy, both before and after the Manchurian Incident, was desire for the establishment of satisfactory relations.

Asked if they would do this by making the Nationalist Party reduce itself to final dissolution, he replied he never thought along those lines. When it was suggested that he misled Hu Lin, he replied that he did not say anything wrong nor did he neglect to tell him what was right. Reference was made to the affidavit where SUZUKI stated he deeply deplored the China Incident and in September 1938 accepted the post of the Chief * of the Political Section of the China Affairs Board. The Board was established in December 1938 and he was the first head of the Political Section. He was not one of the chief persons responsible for establishing the Board but he was one of its organizers. The Premier was President and the Vice Presidents were Cabinet Ministers. The principal officers in China were at Peiping and Shanghai and there were other officers at Kalgan and Amoy. * It was suggested to the accused that the Board dealt virtually with all matters relative to China except those related to the Army and Navy, and he stated it handled matters on China with the exception of Foreign relations. It handled business affairs related to industries, transportation, and economic problems and its control was effected through the North China and Central China Development Companies. Matters relating to economy in the field of operations of the two companies were handled.

The China Affairs Board did not give guidance to the Provincial Government in China * but he believed that they did give advise at times. He did not remember what they did about Chinese school textbooks since cultural matters were handled by the Cultural Section.* He did not know whether the Board actually revised Chinese textbooks. He recalled nothing about the control of opium and narcotics. He thought opium matters were handled by the Economic Section rather than the Political Section.

35270

When asked who handled the profits from the opium trade, he replied that he knew nothing about them. None of them passed through his hands nor were placed by him in secret funds. He did not know who was head of the hong at Shanghai.* His Board had nothing to do with Japan's relation with third nations in China. He learned later that there was opposition from the Foreign Ministry to the organization of the China Affairs Board but since he was in Manchukuo up to the time of the Board's founding, he did not know anything about the circumstances.

He remembered the resignation of Foreign Minister UGAKI. Asked if a reason for UGAKI's resignation was the creation of the China Affairs Board and relation to the diplomatic relations with China, he replied as far as he knew UGAKI's reason was incomprehensible. He had never heard that the China Affairs Board was established because the military did not want the Foreign Office interfering in China affairs.

In his affidavit, he stated that features of the policy relative to the China * Incident and decided by the High Command and Government were diametrically opposed to his fundamental ideas on China. Asked what was the policy decided upon by the High Command and Government, he replied that they were the decisions standing at the time he returned to Japan of January and October 1938. These decisions were that Japan hoped for the establishment of a new China East Government and then cooperation with it would work for the stability of East Asia and Sino-Japanese cooperation. This was diametrically opposed to SUZUKI's idea for he felt that though the Army talked of establishing a new regime in China, it would naturally be established under the authority and influence of the Army and it would be difficult to hope for a spontaneous expression of will by the Chinese people * to establish their own government. Also he felt it wrong for Japan to possess an economic system in China based on Japanese laws.

35275 * In his affidavit he had stated that the establishment of new regimes in China was incompatible with his ideas and that he directed efforts so that this interference could be minimized. He was asked what he did to minimize it, and he replied that when the establishment of a new government had been decided upon it was their desire that under 35276 * those circumstances nothing be done to force Japan's intentions. He was making every effort to advance along lines that would make Japan's interference as small as possible.

In December 1938, he became chief of the political section of the China Affairs Board, and in March 1939 liaison offices were set up in China. This was while he was chief of the political section. Regarding the liaison offices, until their establishment the army had had special service agencies throughout China, and the opinion was advanced that it was not good that the army solve all China problems, but the viewpoint of all government officers should be taken into 35277 consideration also. Liaison offices were established in accordance with this idea. It was not true that their real purpose was the guidance of the new central government.

When shown a document, the accused was referred to a decision in it at the meeting of the China Affairs Board on 7 April 1939. He could not recall exactly whether the conference was held on that day or not, but had no reason for suggesting this. * If such a conference was held, certain instructions by the premier and chief of the general affairs section of the board were probably issued. The accused thought he was present. Although he did not remember now, he could not identify with certainty that the instructions written in the document were actually given on that date at that conference. He had never seen the document before. If instructions had been issued, he would have seen them. He believed instructions were issued, * but had no recollection as to whether they were the same as those in the document.

He didn't recall large sums of money being appropriated in June 1939 for the Wu project, for at that time the China Affairs Board did not concern itself with such matters. Asked if the monies were to be paid out of the surplus of maritime customs revenue, he replied he knew nothing of this, nor did he know anything about the funds being drawn in the name of a Japanese to maintain secrecy.

35280 * When shown a document, he replied he was not sure about it, but did know that the army was engaged in such projects. The first document was issued in SUZUKI's name. According to the document, communications were sent from the war ministry to the China Affairs Board, and from it passed on to the foreign ministry. He thought he had seen these documents before.

35282 * Regarding a spot Japanese nominal person responsible for movements, SUZUKI informed KURIHARA that he had submitted a notification to the vice-chief of the liaison office of north and central China, as per separate sheet. The separate sheet stated that with regard to the spot Japanese nominal person responsible for expenses needed for the National Salvation Anti-Comintern League in accordance with the China Affairs Board of April 1, and for movements of Wu Fei-fu in accordance with the Board's decision of June 23, the chief of the MAB had notified them, as per separate sheet. This separate sheet from the chief of the MAB, MACPIJIRI to SUZUKI, informed SUZUKI * that he had notified the finance ministry regarding the spot nominal person mentioned before. The person named was Artillery Colonel KAGESA, Sadaaki, but the name "KAGESA, Sadaaki" should be used in case of receiving money. (The next sheet was the same, except that the expenses were for the movements of Wu, and the name was OSEKO, Michisada.)

The accused thought there had been expenses provided for this Wu project in accordance with the China Affairs Board decision. Asked if he passed on the names of those Japanese who were to draw the money secretly, he replied he did not know what the purpose of the funds was to be, or whether they were to be drawn out secretly. He merely conveyed to the foreign office and branch offices the communication sent him from the war ministry. * He was not present at the meeting of the China Affairs Board when this question of expenses and secrecy was decided. Asked why the names were sent through him, he replied that it was the custom that they be sent in the name of the general director or in his name.

35285

* He knew about such communications being sent, but didn't recall clearly that this money was to be derived from maritime customs revenue. All that he remembered was that various branch army agencies in China were carrying on the Wu Project then, and may have utilized customs revenue for their expenditures. This maritime customs revenue was a duty levied on imports into China, but he didn't think it was collected by Japanese authorities and used for their own purposes.

35286

* In September, 1939, there may have been a decision to appropriate further sums of money for establishing the new Central Government, but he presently had no recollection of it. However, the question of how to finance the new government came up when the question of establishing it was raised. The Republic of China depended basically on customs revenues, and therefore a new government would have to rely on this also.

December 15, 1947

OFFENSE - SUZUKI - Cross

35287 Asked if it was not allowed to collect them, he replied he didn't recall such minor details. * The problem of creating either one or more new governments in China was the most important matter which came to the board's attention, and he remembered when KAGESA went to see Wang Ching-wei and that he carried a letter of introduction from SUZUKI. Asked if this was indicative of his reluctance to interfere with the establishment of the new regimes in China, he replied that at the time the establishment of a new government had not become a question. This was not, however, because they were still trying to persuade Wang Ching-wei to accept. The reason he wrote the letter was that the question of immediate peace with China was all important. Wang Ching-wei had come in answer to the KCNOYE declaration to make every effort for peace.

35288 * KAGESA was to meet Wang and was given letters from the premier, war, navy, and foreign minister. The China Affairs Board was also asked to send a letter to show it was not opposed to Wang's peace moves, but the Board Director YANAGAWA did not know Wang personally. SUZUKI, however, did, and was therefore requested to write a letter exhorting Wang to make every effort for peace.

35289 He did not remember what happened to the money allocated for Wu Pei-fu's expenses when he died. He didn't recall a document which referred to a decision of the China Affairs Board of 28 December, in which it was decided by the Board as to the disposition * to be made of the expenses for the Wu Project after Wu died.

290 When shown another document which referred to a decision in November 1939, he remembered that such matters were discussed, but did * not know whether he had seen the document before. Asked if it was not reasonable to suppose that he had seen it if it was a decision arrived at at a Board conference, he replied he could recall matters actually discussed there, but did not remember whether this document embodied what was discussed and decided on. All documents which embodied decisions of the Board received the signatures of the president and vice-president, and the accused took them to the office of the general director. He didn't recall taking this particular document.

35291 * He didn't know whether the accused DOIHARA played a prominent part when the army was working on the Wu Project, but knew that DOIHARA was connected with it. He remembered that in February 1940 the China Affairs Board recommended advisers to the new Central Government, and he thought that in that month forty million yuan were authorized to be loaned to that government. On 4 April 1941, he became president of the Planning Board and Minister without Portfolio. * He had stated in his affidavit that he was reluctant to accept appointment, but did so because it would have placed his friend KCNOYE in an awkward predicament.

In those days there were movements agitating for establishing a new structure, and they were being advanced in a manner which overstepped the bounds than what KONOYE expected. KONOYE wished to curb this tendency and decided to reorganize the cabinet. OGURA was taken in as the principal leader of economic affairs, and a condition which OGURA laid for his acceptance was nomination of a new planning board president.

In his affidavit when he said that he understood his primary function lay in executing the Planning Board's business, he was not suggesting there that he could escape responsibility attaching to a minister of state. * In connection with his duties, he took over and revised the five year plan of his predecessor, HOSHINO.

The Emperor named the president of the board on recommendation of the premier. The president had the power to advise the cabinet on national policy other than those concerning military or foreign affairs. In other words, those which would affect trade and national resources.

35294

* In his affidavit, he had referred to the impossibility of obtaining special steel, machine tools and scrap iron because of the German-Soviet war and the dispatch of troops to FIC. In the light of the situation, these items were to be used on the whole for the manufacture of war munitions. When he stated in his affidavit that he told KONOYE that the dispatch of troops to south FIC would be a serious matter if they were subjected to an economic embargo, this meant that he objected to the move. He believed that military power should be contracted so they would be able to concentrate it at one point, and * he felt that in view of the domestic situation the deployment of their forces over a wide area was unwise. Although he opposed this move, he did nothing to relinquish the office which he held.

35295

When he stated in his affidavit that the premier told him that the move into south FIC was imperative to ward off danger of war with the Soviet, this was not a question of agreement or disagreement, but SUZUKI merely listened to what KONOYE said. The accused was one of the cabinet ministers who decided on the dispatch of those troops. He didn't think himself that a move into south FIC would ward off immediate danger of a war with the Soviet.

35296

* Reference was made to the affidavit where it mentioned the commodity mobilization plan sanctioned by the cabinet on 22 August 1941, and there was mentioned self-supply and self-sufficiency and the guaranteeing of national security. Asked if this was not merely a war plan, he replied that one could not say so. The key point was not necessarily prompt expansion of armament. They laid great stress on it but that was not all.

To the accused was read a part of exhibit 1132, which purported to be a statement of SUZUKI in which he said that the government previously set the scheme for enforcing the commodity mobilization plan for the first quarter of the 1941 and 1942 fiscal year. The government had examined various measures necessary for the completion of the wartime system in response to the changed international situation. * Asked if he said it, he replied he didn't recall it, but was bending all efforts to strengthen national economy. He may have said that the enforcement of the mobilization scheme depended on a strong war sense and the cooperation of officials and people, as the exhibit stated.

1827

To the accused was read a part of exhibit 1133, a newspaper excerpt of September 7, 1941, which stated that the government, at the cabinet meeting on September 5, decided on the traffic mobilization plan to place transportation on a wartime basis to meet the requirements of the times. The accused stated that this was not a plan made in preparation for war.

35298

* The accused was read from exhibit 1140, a newspaper extract of September 13, 1941, which referred to the workers mobilization plan and said that the scheme jointly formulated by the planning board and welfare office, was based on the emergency labor policy decided in a recent cabinet session, and was aimed at insuring the supply of labor for increased munitions production. The accused stated that this was not a war plan.

35299

* The accused was read from exhibit 1192, another newspaper excerpt, which in describing the new newspaper plan, stated that the new system was aimed at placing newspapers on a wartime basis for fulfilling their mission as an organ of the state and the people in the present strained situation. Asked if this plan was in preparation for war, he replied that the planning board had nothing to do with newspapers, and had nothing to do with formulating that plan. It did have to do with the other plans mentioned.

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that the opinion was brought to the fore, that as long as the U. S. refused to sell needed commodities, they were compelled to take by force of arms the areas containing them. Asked if he considered that America's refusal to trade with Japan constituted a justification for aggressive war, he replied that he believed that aggressive warfare under any circumstances was wrong.

Reference was made to the affidavit where he referred to the stockpile supply and pointed out that the petroleum supply was inadequate. Asked when the oil well equipment in Japan was dismantled by the army and navy to be taken south, he replied his understanding was that the navy began it and the army followed later, and he first heard of it in mid-August, 1941.

* Asked if this was oil drilling machinery or refining plants, he replied that the planning board heard that orders had been given that equipment in the oil fields in Akita would be dismantled with the thought that there might be a possibility of war, and that it might be useful to exploit the oil fields of the areas to be occupied. He understood that in July 1941, a plan was made for FIC and the exploitation of its natural resources; and he understood also that there was a stationary economic organ to be established in the Japanese Consulate General at Hanoi and Saigon.

35302

In his affidavit he described the conversation with Premier KONOYE, in which he interpreted KONOYE's remark to mean that when SUZUKI attended imperial conferences, it was as the premier's technical assistant. By this, the accused stated he meant to say * he replied to questions on economic problems.

35303

In his affidavit he had stated that he understood from what KONOYE said to him that the liaison conference was not a policy-making body over and above the cabinet, but its so-called decisions would not be binding on the cabinet. It was suggested to the accused that when a decision had been made at a liaison conference there was little or no change in it when it went back to the cabinet, and he replied that this was so, but explained * that of the matters discussed at the liaison conference, most concerned foreign relations and a great number matters of commodities relative to military affairs. As the premier was also in attendance, generally what was discussed at the liaison conference was approved by the cabinet.

Before subjects for discussion were submitted to the liaison conference, considerable study and investigation on them had been given by the officials of the foreign, war, and navy ministry, and it was not usual for people not connected with those ministries to make remarks. He did not attend liaison conferences regularly just prior to the war, but only began to attend them after August 1941, and even then attended only those to which he was ordered by the premier.

*After the establishment of the TOJO Cabinet, Liaison Conferences were held continuously until the end of November and he attended all of them. In his affidavit he had stated that he was invited by KONOYE to Ogikubo on 12 October 1941 having been directed to record the proceedings. He was not suggesting he was a mere secretary. The conference was held informally merely to enable KONOYE, TOJO, OIKAWA and Foreign Minister TOYODA to discuss matters on intimate terms.

35305

The main topic was whether to continue negotiations with America and in this connection, the question of withdrawing troops from China also arose. * Since SUZUKI was not asked to do anything by KONOYE, he made no remark there being busy taking notes of what the others were saying. In his affidavit he had referred to certain conversations with KONOYE and KIDO. He did not recall telling KIDO after the fall of the third KONOYE Cabinet that the Army wanted war but did remember telling KIDO that the only way to suppress the Army's attitude was to have the Emperor state he did not want war and he remembered that KIDO did not agree with his views. *

35306

* He told KIDO TOJO's ideas as to whether TOJO could control the Army if HIGASHIKUNI became Premier and established a policy against war. He had done this in response to KIDO's request. When he informed HIGASHIKUNI on the nation's strength, he told him of the material mobilization plan for 1941 with 4,700,000 tons of steel as its base. * He told HIGASHIKUNI that Japan was not strong enough to go to war about 16 October 1941.

Asked if he had known TOJO for a long time and intimately, he replied the only times when he worked together with TOJO were when he was third Army Chief of Staff, when he was Chief of the Political Department of the China Affairs Board and TOJO was its Vice-President, and when he was President of the Planning Board and a cabinet colleague of TOJO's. He did not think this was a very long period when compared to the total length of his military service.

*He thought at the time that TOJO would be able to check the war faction and so did KONOYE because up to a certain time, TOJO had been an ardent supporter of the negotiations and even when MATSUOKA had been replaced, TOJO agreed wholeheartedly to the change. At the time the Army was urging war and therefore when SUZUKI talked with KONOYE, he took into consideration that TOJO did not necessarily seem to advocate war on his own but it was some hidden power pushing war agitation.

35309

*In his affidavit he had stated that TOJO asked him certain questions and he had answered with the prospect of imports of petroleum from America were not bright and that synthetic petroleum could not meet urgent needs.

35310

Asked what these urgent needs were, he replied that he meant they had already looked upon the severance of diplomatic relations with America as a possibility for the situation was tense and under those circumstances, by the manufacture of synthetic oil alone, they could not establish a feeling of real safety as to national defense. His statement that if they were able to seize the southern areas they could increase the oil supply from 300,000 tons the first year to 2,000,000 the second year * was not the result of an investigation carried out by the Planning Board itself. He was merely stating the result of a joint Army-Navy investigation on the matter at the Liaison Conference.

When he was ordered to make this study, he gathered together various ministry officials connected with the mobilization of materials and ordered them to conduct studies. The Planning Board, however, and the other government offices could not touch upon the oil problem except domestic production and consumption and civilian supplies.

Reference was made to the affidavit where he mentioned the Imperial Conference of November 5 which decided to withdraw the armed forces from China to make the negotiations successful and he was asked if there were not certain qualifications to that withdrawal.

35311 He replied it was also decided that those conditions could be changed depending upon the progress of the negotiations. *His recollection was that since Japan was offering to withdraw troops, she also desired America to accept some of her requests.

35312 *Asked when Japan was willing to withdraw the troops according to this decision, he replied that the greatest stumbling block in the negotiations was the question of withdrawal of troops from southern FIC and from China. Once that basic principle had been decided on then the other details were to be decided in the course of the negotiations. When it was suggested to the Accused that the decision reached at the conference was that there would be no troop withdrawing until peace between China and Japan had been come to, he replied that he thought that peace and the withdrawing of troops were the same thing.

35313 In his affidavit he had stated that he was told about an ultimatum or what virtually constituted an ultimatum, and that he could not but sense that war might be unavoidable and he had stated that they were placed in a situation liable to be militarily * aattacked at any moment. He was not sure when hostilities were to be opened against the United States nor did he know the place or day they would commence, nor that the time for opening them was fixed for 8 December. He did not suggest that no notification be sent to the U.S. of this attack.

35314 Asked when the task force sailed for Pearl Harbor, he replied he knew nothing about it. * He first learned of it after the conclusion of the war. He thought this was at some prison when he met SHIMADA who said something to the effect that the fleet had sailed one or two weeks before the beginning of hostilities but he was not sure as to what SHIMADA actually said. The first time he heard of the Pearl Harbor attack was on the morning of December 8 when he went to the cabinet to attend a cabinet meeting and was told by the Chief Secretary.

Asked if the final note sent to the U.S. was signed by all ministers of State including himself, he replied that most of the cabinet members had nothing to do with it, including himself. The matter was not discussed at 35315 any Liaison Conference * or Cabinet meeting he attended. He never knew about any note being sent such as he heard of later. He neither signed it, discussed it at a Liaison or Cabinet conference, or knew its contents until after it was delivered.

35316 . Asked what took place with respect to the note to Britain, he replied that once the decision that war was unavoidable had been reached, technical matters were left up to Foreign Minister TOGO so that all proceedings would be in accordance with international law and therefore he had little interest in the matters. He felt that even to Britain a note would be sent and if there were not, there would be ample reason why it was not so he did not concern himself with it. * He did not know why no note was sent.

35317 He recalled faintly that after the outbreak of the war, the whole matter came up for discussion and TOGO explained that since Britain was one with the United States, there was no necessity to send such a note because it would automatically be made known to Britain. He knew that Britain was a sovereign state, had an ambassador in Tokyo and that Japan had an ambassador in London. Asked if he knew that ambassadors were the usual channels for communication between nations and if he knew nothing was done to warn Britain of an impending attack, he replied that he had no interest in such matters but * after hearing all the evidence he felt that from his own point of view, he would certainly have sent such a note.

35318 *In his affidavit he had said that economically Japan had not been prepared for war with America and Britain prior to the first of December 1941. He was not suggesting by that that Japan's preparation for war took place in the succeeding seven days. It was suggested to the Accused that the idea of the Greater East Asia Ministry was to apply the same methods to the areas comprising * Greater East Asia as had been applied to China by the China Affairs Board.

He stated he did not think it was necessarily so. After the establishment of the Nanking Government, the China Affairs Board was abandoned and the plan under study was to conduct affairs vis-a-vis China through the Ambassador. It was his understanding that the Greater East Asia Ministry was established after the outbreak of war to handle economic and other matters in the occupied areas.

Asked if it was being used to exploit the natural resources of those areas he replied "Yes, that was one of the main tasks."

The Planning Board had no authority concerning the employment of POWs but did have authority and was concerned with the supply and demand of labor in Japan. *In part this labor power was supplemented by POWs but in connection with the business of supplementation or detention, the Board had no power whatsoever with that. The Planning Board never did issue any directive whereby this supplementary POW labor would be utilized.

Asked if the Board said they required POWs for stevedoring purposes, he replied that the Board not once requested such laborers. The demands came from the various ministries which had something to do with such matters and they consulted the War Department.

*The Board made no request for such labor by reason of the ministry requirements. Such matters as labor required for stevedoring purposes were never brought to the Board's attention. The ministry concerned notified the Welfare Ministry and the Planning Board of the number of laborers available from the general supply after POWs had been deducted.

35322

Asked if it was not true that POWs were used for stevedoring to speed up the transportation of war materials, he replied he thought they were utilized for the general purpose of facilitating transportation but did not know in detail whether POW labor was included in the transportation of material or war. *He never saw POWs working as stevedores but saw them working once at a coal mine.

35323 Leaving the presidency of the Planning Board on 8 October 1943, he was appointed administrative inspector in April 1943. His duties were to see to it that production increases were made by inspecting the various factories to take steps to increase production. * One or two months after he left the cabinet, he was appointed Economic Adviser to the Cabinet and in September 1944, he was appointed Chief of the Great Nippon Industry Patriotic Association.

35324 In his affidavit he stated he had deplored the China Incident, that many features of the government and High Command carried out by the China Affairs Board were opposed to his ideas, that the move into southern FIC would be a serious matter, he opposed the Tripartite Pact and was convinced Japan should keep on friendly terms with Britain and the US. Ask if there was a single incident because of his opposing views where he voluntarily resigned from office and refused to carry out the program and policy * of his particular department, he replied that at that time he did express his own views to his superiors but it had always been his way to entrust matter of decision to his superiors and not to press his own views upon them.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. LOGAN,
COUNSEL FOR KIDO

35325 *The Accused were reading questions and answers during his cross examination in which he had testified that while he did not recall telling KIDO the Army wanted war about the time of the fall of the third KAWAYE Cabinet, he remembered telling KIDO that the only way to suppress the Army attitude was to have the Emperor state he did not want war and that KIDO did not agree with his views. SUZUKI stated that he thought this conversation took place on the night of October 13 at KIDO's home.

35326 *He told KIDO about the matters discussed at Ogikubo on the 12th and that since matters had come to this state, it seemed advisable to request the Emperor to use his influence to prevent war. To his recollection, KIDO replied that perhaps in the final analysis, it might be necessary to petition the Emperor for his influence but it was not yet the proper time. SUZUKI did not suggest to KIDO that he petition the Emperor.

35327 In his affidavit he had stated that he was messenger between KONOYE and KIDO, KONOYE and TOJO and TOJO and KIDO. Asked where he got the suggestion to petition the Emperor * he replied he spoke of this idea to KONOYE after the Ogikubo talk suggesting to KONOYE that the Emperor be consulted and state he did not want war. He did not know if KONOYE ever told the Emperor of this. KONOYE said that before bringing this message to KIDO, it would be necessary to obtain the agreement of the War, Navy and Foreign Ministers and if agreement was obtained, it would be no matter at all to petition the Emperor. He therefore asked TOJO's opinion first.

35328 Asked if the idea to request the Emperor to suppress the Army attitude by stating that he did not want war came originally from him, he replied he did not know, but * his idea at first was to have the Emperor scrap the September 6 decision and he proposed that idea. After the talk with KONOYE took place and after meeting TOJO, it was found that the matter was difficult and thereafter he spoke to KIDO about it. He did not see the Navy Minister pursuant to KONOYE's suggestion.

35329 * He did not hear KONOYE tell him to take the matter up with KIDO. KIDO did not explain why the time was not opportune but KIDO always thought that since the Emperor did not desire to voice his opinions on political affairs and relied on the Premier, that course should be taken. * Asked if he himself thought that this was a matter for the Premier to take up with the Emperor, or that of KIDO, he replied that it had always been his belief that while asking the Premier on one hand, at the same time it was necessary that one who was a close advisor to the Emperor should also be informed.

35330 Asked whether it was KIDO's or the Premier's duty to take the matter up with the Emperor, he thought it was the Premier's duty and in case the Emperor was to make any such expression, he thought it was also the responsibility of the Lord Keeper. Insofar as the Premier was concerned, he meant it was the Premier's duty to take it up with the Emperor and also part of the Lord Keeper's duties to keep himself informed in case the Emperor asked him about it, and it was his 35331 idea that whenever such important question was brought up * it was the Lord Keeper's responsibility to have with him such advise as would be decisive in case an inquiry was put to him by the Emperor. Asked what the Army attitude was on October 13, 1941, he replied that from general information as well as what he learned from KONOYE, it was that the atmosphere around General Staff Headquarters strongly favored dropping negotiations and declaring war against the U.S. Asked if on October 13 the situation was so critical that the Emperor was even thinking ahead about an Imperial Rescript in case war should be declared any day, he replied he knew absolutely nothing about that. His feeling at the time was that the time had not come for any final decision as to whether war should * be declared or not.

Asked if there was anything to prevent a Minister of State approaching the Emperor and suggesting to him that the Army could be suppressed if the Emperor stated he did not want war, he replied he could not believe that any Minister except the Premier, or War or Navy Minister could do this. As far as channels are concerned, it would be more properly their function rather than that of the Lord Keeper because he would be interfering in political affairs.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. BLAKENEY,

35333 The Accused stated he did not recall whether he 35338 attended all of the Liaison Conferences between the first of December and the outbreak of the Pacific War * and there may have been some from which he was absent.*

REDIRECT EXAMINATION
BY MR. LEVIN

Reference was made to the affidavit where it was stated that in 1933 he met Hwang Fu in Peking. Hwang Fu was senior of Chiang Kai-shek with whom he was on very intimate terms. The main subject of discussion between Hwang Fu and the Accused was around the question of how to restore relations between Japan and China. Hwang Fu indicated there were three points around which the two countries should make efforts for restoring relations emphasizing that if the three were carried out, it would be possible.

Page

35339 The first was not to take up the Manchurian problem until the feelings in both countries had cooled off. Second was that Japan should not seek a special * economic status in China proper but should engage in economic activities on equal terms with the Powers. Third, he proposed that the common aim of their relations should be placed in anti-communism and SUZUKI expressed wholehearted approval of his suggestion. He report Hwang Fu's opinion to his superior upon returning to Tokyo.

Hwang Fu understood Japan very well. Not only was he on intimate terms with Chiang Kai-shek but was also chairman of the Political Council. In addition, General Ho Ying-ching was Chairman of the branch in Peking of the Military Council. In the light of this, SUZUKI expressed his opinions to his superiors that they should undertake to settle local issues in North China by trusting these various North China organs of the Chinese in cooperation with them.

35340 *At that time not all his opinions were accepted because as a result of the Manchurian Incident, there was a feeling of contempt in the Army for the Kuomintang and furthermore, because of the fact that he was only a lieutenant-colonel perhaps, his views did not carry weight.

35341 There was a Lieutenant-colonel SUZUKI other than the Accused in the War Ministry about 1933 and there was a Lieutenant-colonel SUZUKI in the General Staff Office about that year. As regards the relation of the 1941 mobilization plan not being directed against war with the United States, he stated that in comparison with the amount of materials allocated to the Army, the allocation of materials allocated to the Navy was very small, especially of steel which was hardly different from peacetime allocation. It was only after the decision for war that special allocation of steel was made to the shipping building industry.

35342-

* OPENING STATEMENT BY MR. BLAKENEY.

35346

35349

* Exhibit 3609, the affidavit of ARITA, Hachiro, certified that the affiant was vice-minister of foreign affairs from 10 May 1932 to 16 May 1933, and as such examined and read in 1933 a report by TCCC, then director of the European-American Bureau entitled "On the Foreign Policy of Japan vis-a-vis Europe and America Following Withdrawal from the League of Nations", which was prepared for submission to Foreign Minister UCHIDA. He had seen a * document which he identified as the original report he read at the time.

35350

35363

* Exhibit 3609-A, the document identified by the above affiant, stated that toward the Manchurian Incident the Soviet Union maintained an attitude of neutrality and non-interference. In view of Japan's neutral attitude at the time of the Soviet-Chinese conflict over the Chinese Eastern Railway issue in 1929, this attitude was understandable. Moreover, the Incident was at first * restricted to southern Manchuria, which was outside the Soviet sphere of influence. Even when operations extended to northern Manchuria, involving Soviet interests, Russia continued her neutral attitude. Her consent to Japan's sending troops by the CER, her refusal of the League request for cooperation of Soviet consular officials in Manchuria with the Lytton Commission, her offer of good offices in evacuating Japanese at the time of the Su Ping-won Incident; her expression of consent to the sale of the CER to Japan, and her rejection of the League request to join its advisory council, were among the facts worthy of note. This attitude of the Soviet Union should properly be interpreted in the light of its understanding of Japan's power being much greater than other countries and of the fact that since incidents with foreign countries could not be permitted to occur while Russia was busily occupied with internal activities, she was avoiding any provocative actions.

The desire of the Soviet * for a non-aggression pact with Japan was motivated by its desire to secure the safety of its far Eastern territory from the increasing threat it feels since the Japanese Manchurian advance. To the extent that the Soviet was striving toward world revolution, a clash with Japan might be unavoidable, and the five year plan should be watched. The course which Japan should follow was to pursue their Manchurian and Mongolian policy, but avoid friction and promote friendly relations with other powers. As to Soviet relations, there were various issues hard to solve, but they should make every effort in accordance with the * policy to promote friendly relations with her, and they might be able to solve these issues. It might even be possible to get the Soviet to recognize Manchukuo.

35367 A review of Soviet-Japanese relations would show that the Soviet felt a sense of insecurity over its far Eastern territory since the Manchurian Incident, and especially after Japan, in replying to the Soviet proposal of a non-aggression pact in December, 1932, stated such a pact was premature. This apprehension was to be noted in the statements of influential Soviet leaders. There were difficult issues between the two countries, but if things were left as they were, mutual distrust could not be removed and relations * might come to be dominated by the domestic communism problem or the development of Soviet-Manchukuo problems.

35368 Japan should try mainly to develop Manchukuo and should watch the progress of the five year plan, and the Soviet attitude toward other countries, endeavoring to avoid friction with Russia and establish friendly relations with her. As to the possible influence of the improvement of these relations on third powers, there was no reason that it should disturb U. S.-Japanese relations, as America did not want Japan to dominate Siberia and was not pleased to see Soviet communism firmly established. The fact that some Americans suspected Japan of aggressive intentions because of her refusal of the Soviet * offer of a non-aggression pact showed that improvement of Soviet relations was desirable for betterment of U. S. relations.

With regard to Britain, some feared that friendly relations with the Soviet might cause trouble in relations with Britain, but it was clear that Soviet-Japanese accord would not extend to such a point that the two in combination would oppose Britain. It was not reasonable for Britain to have any apprehensions over this.

35369 Improvement of Soviet-Japanese relations would have a good influence on third powers by proving Japan's peaceful intentions and contribute to the improvement of better relations with other nations. * It was by all means advisable that they make efforts to improve relations with the Soviet, and of all the measures for accomplishing this, that most desired by the Soviet was a non-aggression pact; but there were pros and cons on the question in Japan.

35370 * There were no reasons why such a pact should not be concluded. This pact was recommended, and thereafter they should proceed with negotiations on the questions of recognizing Manchukuo, purchase of the CER, and issues relative to concessions in northern Sakhalien. If the domestic situation did not permit concluding such a pact, they should first endeavor to tranquilize relations between the two countries, keeping in close touch with Manchukuo with respect to her policy toward the Soviet.

35371 To realize these aims, it was recommended that in the economic sphere they conclude a commercial treaty, thus promoting economic relations with the Soviet. In the political sphere, it was recommended that measures be found to prevent border clashes, and in * this connection the problem of demarcation of the Soviet-Manchukuo border should be solved; a system be established peacefully for Soviet-Manchukuo management of the CER on an equal basis; and steps taken to purchase Soviet rights in that railway.

35373 Since the Manchurian Incident, various nations had charged Japan with practically ignoring her treaty obligations and embarking on aggressive actions. They were apprehensive lest Japan engage in such actions whenever opportunity was offered. As a result, Japan had lost as much international confidence as she had gained military prestige. In modern international society resort to armed force was a matter of the utmost seriousness, and every effort should be made to avoid it. Although there were instances in history of unjustified use of armed force, Japan should not repeat this. Respect for truthfulness should * be the same among nations as among individuals, for when a nation forfeits international confidence it was ultimately the loser.

The Soviet was not only making efforts to avoid conflict with Japan, but was not in a position to apply either military or economic pressure in the near future, and Japan should give attention to this point. In case armed conflict with the Soviet became inevitable, it was most desirable to make a common front with Britain and America, but since it was clear the Soviet was trying to avoid this eventuality, other powers would not support Japan but would condemn her as an aggressor, and Japan should by all means avoid clash with the Soviet.

* The witness identified and verified exhibit 3611 as his affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness was a member of the staff of the first section of the European-American Bureau from July 1925 to March 1926, and TCGO was section chief from July 1925 to the end of the year. When the witness was in the first section from January 1930 to October 1933, TCGO was bureau director throughout. When the witness was a secretary-interpreter of the embassy in Moscow from October 1939 to November 1940, TCGO was ambassador, and the witness returned home about a month after TCGO was recalled by MATSUCKA.

While in Moscow, the witness was interpreter at all conversations between TCGC and Molotov, following the settlement of the Nomonhan Incident in September. Thereafter he was in the same capacity in the European-Asiatic Bureau from December 1940 to February 1943, and TCGO was foreign minister from October 1941 to September 1942. It was immediately after TCGO became foreign minister for the second time that * the witness was ordered to serve in the Political Affairs Bureau, TCGC remaining minister until August 1945. During the two tenures of TCGC's ambassadorship the witness was interpreter at all conversations with the Soviet ambassador, and he was therefore familiar with the negotiations and with TCGO's opinion in connection therewith.

35379

While TCGC was ambassador to the Soviet, he took the opportunity immediately after the Nomonhan Incident, when relations showed a favorable turn, to further improve relations, and succeeded in solving various problems which were described by the witness. As to the negotiations for the epoch-making neutrality treaty between Japan and the USSR, TCGO carried the negotiations all but to consummation. * In this, TCGO did not insist on the exclusive interests of Japan, but maintained that the interests of both should be mutually respected. Whenever he found the Tokyo instructions excessive or improper he did not hesitate to ask reconsideration of Tokyo, and always undertook negotiations after fully understanding the facts. This attitude caused him to win Molotov's confidence, and the conversations were carried on in a most friendly atmosphere.

Molotov then was concurrently chairman of the council of commissars and Commissar for Foreign Affairs. It was unusual in Soviet practice that Molotov accepted with hardly exception TCGO's request for interviews. In the all-night negotiations over the modus vivendi of the fisheries problem on the night of 31 December 1939, Molotov insisted when the * question of the gold clause concerning the last payment for the CER that the opinion of experts be obtained, as the question was economic.

TOGO, however, pointed out there was not enough time, and requested Molotov to accept his word that the proposal was not disadvantageous for the USSR. Molotov replied he would rely on TOGO's word and would sign the document. Upon the conclusion of the fisheries agreement on 1 January, Molotov expressed his respect for TOGO's efforts and that Russian-Japanese relations would become more friendly, thanks to TOGC.

* It was TOGO's intention to establish peaceful relations with the USSR, and he recommended the conclusion of a non-aggression pact, finally obtaining government instructions to open negotiations. He made the following oral proposal to Molotov in early July 1940: 1, the two parties should confirm that the basic treaty shall be the basis of relations and declare they will maintain peaceful and friendly relations, respecting each's territorial integrity; 2, if one of the two was attacked by a third power the other shall maintain neutrality; 3, the agreement shall be effective for five years.

35382

Some days later Molotov agreed in principle to the proposal, saying it was in substance a non-aggression pact, and communicated to TOGO in mid-August that the USSR would accept the proposal on condition that the paragraph referring to the fact that the basic treaty shall be the basis of relations * be deleted, and proposed that the concessions in northern Saghalien be terminated. TOGO recommended to Tokyo that the Russian proposal should be accepted, and the proposed pact be concluded. However, MATSUCKA, who became foreign minister in July 1940, when the pact was all but concluded, ordered TOGO home and to suspend negotiations. Molotov repeatedly asked TOGO before his departure as to Tokyo's intentions concerning the pact, as to sudden change of ambassadors being incomprehensible, and that the new ambassador TATEKAWA had made a statement that Japanese-Russian relations should be restored to a clean slate.

35383

TOGO tried to dispel Russian concern by explaining that the negotiations had been conducted with full contact with the government and the cabinet change could not change the policy, and that he, * on returning home, would do all he could to improve Russian-Japanese relations. The witness recalled TOGO's telling him that the motive for his proposing a neutrality pact was to take the opportunity for settling the Nomonhan Incident. The witness was then half TOGO's interpreter and half his secretary, and he recalled TOGO telling him that Japan should not seek in the south anything beyond the promotion of economic interests, for this would cause a clash with the U. S. and Britain. TOGC went to Berlin for a few days in May 1940 for a medical examination, and not for official business, and this was his only trip there that year.

35384 When TOGO became foreign minister in October 1941, Ambassador Smetanin often communicated Soviet requests concerning the maintenance of neutrality between the two on these occasions. TOGO suggested his desire to render good offices for peace between Germany and the USSR. * When Smetanin was leaving for home in January 1942, TOGO entrusted with him a message to Molotov that if the Soviet should come to entertain a desire for peace with Germany, he was ready to render his good offices. TOGO remarked that when the whole world had become involved in war, Japanese-Soviet relations were like a shaft of sunlight, and he desired to extend this light to the whole world. The witness recalled that in the summer of 1942, TOGO complained that the activities of the Japanese authorities abroad were too passive when it was deemed urgent to bring about a general peace through Russo-German peace. When he called on TOGO in early 1943, he urged him to act for Russo-German peace, and TOGO said he deemed this the most proper way to bring about general peace, and was willing to work toward that end if the government would give him powers for action.

35385 The witness returned from Bulgaria in April 1945, and TOGO summoned him in May and told him of his intention * for negotiations with the Soviet to terminate the war. This intention materialized in June with conversations between HIROTA and Ambassador Malik, and the witness served as interpreter and liaison between TOGO and HIROTA. Although the negotiations failed, it was because the war situation had too far deteriorated.

THERE WAS NO CROSS-EXAMINATION OF THE WITNESS.

35386 Exhibit 3162, a supplementary personnel record of TOGO, was received in evidence but not read, to show that the accused was ordered home on 29 August, and left Moscow on 29 October 1940.

Exhibit 3613, a certificate of the foreign ministry, showing the appointment of TOGO's successor, General TATEKAWA in September, was received in evidence but not read.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF NARITA, Katsushiro,
by Mr. Plakeney.

35387 * The witness identified and verified exhibit 3614 as his 35388 affidavit. * The affidavit stated that the witness served in the first section of the European-Asiatic Bureau from June 1934 to January 1938; in the Embassy in Berlin from March to October 1938; in the embassy in Hsingking from December 1938 to August 1940; as senior secretary and later chief of the first section of the European-Asiatic Bureau from August 1940 to November 1942; and as chief of the personnel section from November 1942 to August 1945.

35389 For over three years of his first service in the First Section
* The Bureau Director was TCGO. In this period there were numerous Japanese-Soviet problems. TCGO's practice as bureau director in charge of Soviet affairs was to protest stiffly against any Soviet delicts, but to be equally stern in reprimanding those on the Japanese side guilty of improper practices. They got many requests from the war ministry or the ambassador in Hsingking, who was concurrently C-in-C of the Kwantung Army, to make protests to the USSR concerning border incidents. These requests were routed through the first section, were quite numerous, and many were seen and managed by the witness, and many were not.
Requests were sometimes made orally by the war ministry to his section.
TCGO frequently said that before making the protest further investigation 35390 would * have to be made to give assurance that the fault was not on the Japanese side, and in such cases had such instructions for further investigation sent to the Hsingking embassy or war ministry. He often suggested to the war ministry and Kwantung Army that they mend their ways and refrain from committing wrongs themselves if they wished the Japanese position to be strong when there were cases of Soviet faults.
TCGO also admonished military authorities concerning other cases of Soviet-Japanese or Soviet-Manchukuoan disputes.

35391 Business men operating concessions in Sakhalin and Japanese fishermen operating in Soviet waters under fisheries agreements, frequently complained to the foreign ministry, through the first section, of Soviet oppression. TCGO often told them in the witness' presence that there was fault on their side too, and that they were exaggerating or concealing facts, and were generally not devoting their sincere efforts to compliance with their concession contracts or fishery rights.
* On these occasions when they asked the ministry to take a strong stand against the USSR, TCGO would tell them that they were attempting unduly to depend on government protection, and that only when the USSR had acted in a clearly illegal manner could they expect government help.

During this period the conclusion of the anti-Comintern Pact had a cooling effect on Soviet-Japanese relations. Although it was the European-Asiatic Bureau under TCGO which had to manage the foreign ministry's work in connection with its conclusion, he had then that 35392 TCGO's opinion was that the conclusion of a political agreement for coping with an ideology was meaningless. TCGO strongly opposed strengthening the anti-Comintern Pact, or anything in the nature of a German-Japanese-Italian alliance, and immediately on learning of the negotiations he presented his views to the foreign minister to that effect. The witness learned that his opinion was that Nazi foreign policy * would eventually bring Germany into conflict with the Soviet, Britain, and other countries, and that such an alliance not only would not contribute to solving the China Affair, but would involve Japan in Europe and eventually world turmoil. TCGO's attitude toward the alliance, and his unresponsiveness to German suggestions of closer cooperation in economic matters relating to China, led to deterioration of his relations with Ribbentrop and intensified opposition from military and naval circles to whom his presence in Berlin appeared an obstacle to realizing their desire for closer German-Japanese collaboration.

35393 It was this attitude and opposition from military circles which the witness learned brought about his removal from Berlin and Moscow. What the witness learned then and reported to TCGO in a letter of 6 December 1938, he identified as exhibit 3614-A. * Exhibit 3614-A stated that the witness was supposed to have been informed that TCGO was actively working in Moscow, while in Tokyo he was informed that the choice of ambassadors to Britain was difficult, and Foreign Minister UGAKI said it would be good if TCGO went to London, but if he did so the problem would arise of promoting OSHIMA to the ambassadorship. When the army started to work for transferring the ambassador to Berlin, UGAKI

35394 * was said to have seen no necessity for the transfer, for the ambassador at that time had not failed. However, malicious telegrams were sent from Major-General KASAHARA and Naval Attache KOJIMA, stating that TCGO was extremely unpopular with German authorities and higher officials such as Ribbentrop paid no attention to him, and at the time of the Czecho-Slovakian problem all the ambassadors of friendly nations went to Munich except TCGO.

Moreover, it began to be urged that OSHIMA should be used for the negotiations. The pressure of the military had thus prevailed. It seemed therefore that the telegrams from Berlin pointing out OSHIMA's disqualification had hardly been utilized by foreign office authorities.

The affidavit continued, and the witness added that this information came from the director of the European-Asiatic Bureau, who was familiar with the matter.

*As Chief of the First Section of the European-Bureau during TOGO's first term as Foreign Minister, the witness was familiar with the attitude toward the U.S.S.R. TOGO worked hard for the strict observance by both parties of the neutrality then prevailing.

On 22 November 1941, he called on Ambassador Smetanin and reminded him that on 5 and 13 August, Smetanin had talked with the then Foreign Minister TOYODA, at which time he had assured that the U.S.S.R. would remain faithful to the neutrality pact and grant no military bases on Soviet soil to foreign powers. TOGO asked Smetanin to confirm this policy and that the neutrality pact would continue to be the basis of relations between the two. On 1 December, Smetanin gave this assurance and again on 6 December.

* From the outbreak of the Pacific war to the beginning of September 1942, there were several questions in connection with the navigation of Soviet vessels, etc. The Japanese navy had established sea defense zones and decided to restrict navigation in those areas. On such questions, the Foreign Ministry would notify the Soviet Embassy beforehand of the navy measures and when questions arose, such as detention of a Soviet vessel, it made efforts for a speedy settlement.

Some Soviet vessels were damaged and sunk in areas where there were hostilities. On these occasions, the Ministry did its utmost to accord all facilities for the protection or repatriation of crews, etc.

*Throughout TOGO's second term as Foreign Minister, the witness was Chief of the Personnel Section. At this time military circles intimated the desirability of removing the Ambassador to the U.S.S.R. SATO, who was alleged to be "insufficiently positive" in his attitude toward the Soviet. The witness brought up the question with TOGO, who told him that if SATO were removed, it would be to a European post where he could get in touch with the U.S. and Britain with a view to ending the war. He told the witness to study the question of appointing as minister one who was then an ambassador, having in mind that the post to which SATO would have had to be sent would have been Sweden, Switzerland, or the Vatican. The witness thereafter reported to him. These discussions were held in April 1945, but nothing came of the idea because soon thereafter projects for ending the war through Soviet intermediation were set in motion.

* While Chief of the Personnel Section, the witness was in charge of the examination of ministry officials' services for the grant of awards in connection with the China Affair and conducted negotiations with the Board of Decorations. The Ministry had two fixed standards. One was a list of important matters taking place during the China Affair in which the Ministry was concerned and examination was made of services relating to enumerated matters not limited to those having direct connection with the China Affair. Careers were considered in the light of the table and long service in an important position.

* In TOGO's case, the Board of Decorations agreed according to the first standard that his services in negotiating the Truce of Nomonhan deserved an award. TOGO was already in the category of those deserving a decoration according to the second standard. The Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun was not the highest decoration and was not bestowed upon TOGO for any special reason, but only because he had been already decorated with the next lower decoration in grade in May 1941.

*CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. SUTTON

It was some time in March, after the witness' arrival in Berlin, that he learned that the military attache OSHIMA was working for the strengthening of the Anti-Comintern Pact, and was directly negotiating with Ribbentrop without informing Ambassador TOGO. The witness was reminded that he wrote TOGO on 6 December 1938 (Exhibit 3614A) concerning telegrams from General KASAHARA and attache KOJIMA. Asked if these telegrams contained the statement that OSHIMA was so popular that he went to Munich in Ribbentrop's private plane,* the witness replied he did not read the telegram himself but only heard there was a telegram to that effect.

He had stated in his affidavit that he learned in March 1938 that OSHIMA was working for strengthening the Anti-Comintern Pact and he heard it from his colleagues in the Embassy at Berlin. He never himself made sure of this. Asked if, after hearing this report, he talked with TOGO or OSHIMA on the matter, he replied that he had never talked directly with either.

*The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3615 as his affidavit. *The affidavit stated that in April 1934 the witness was assigned to the Second Section of the Bureau of European-American Affairs, being appointed Chief in September 1936, remaining so until April 1938. From April 1934 to October 1937, the Bureau Director was TOGO.

At the beginning of February 1936, the Foreign Ministry received a semi-official report addressed to the Vice Minister from the Charge d'Affaires at Berlin, INOUE, that the military attache OSHIMA often informally carried on political negotiations with the Germans.

*In April 1936 ARITA became Foreign Minister and shortly after told Ambassador MUSHAKOJI that it was considered proper to conclude some agreement with Germany and MUSHAKOJI should make necessary investigations in Berlin. In May ARITA cabled instructions requesting the Ambassador to sound out German intentions. In July MUSHAKOJI reported that a plan of agreement had been submitted by Ribbentrop containing stipulations for an Anti-Comintern Pact and cooperative measures against the Soviet.

*At that time TOGO told the witness he was against any international agreement based on ideologies and was against a Japanese-German Anti-Comintern Pact. The cabinet members concerned, however, supported the Pact and TOGO could do nothing but carry out their policies. However, TOGO paid attention so that damage to relations with the Soviet and Britain might be avoided and that cooperation with Germany might not exceed the limit of true necessity.

At the joint conference between the Foreign and War Ministries, TOGO maintained with ARITA that it was absolutely necessary for entering into the Pact to conclude also a political agreement with Britain* and succeeded in overriding military objections and persuading them to accept this condition. In negotiating with the Germans, TOGO had MUSHAKOJI request certain amendments which resulted in propagandistic words being toned down, the scope of cooperation in exchange of information concerning destructive activities of the Comintern was limited and the term of validity was reduced from ten to five years.

35412

TOGO also succeeded in amending the draft of the Annexed Agreement in that*the too-comprehensive condition of the first article to the effect that it was to become operative in case either became an object of attack or threat of attack was amended to apply only in the event either became "the object of an unprovoked attack or threat of attack".

35413

*As to Japanese relations with Britain, TOGO often told the witness that he cherished the same belief that relations should be smoothed by an agreement with Britain thus improving also relations with the United States and maintaining world peace. He said the conclusion of such an agreement should be a condition for execution of the Anti-Comintern Pact. Conditions at the time of signing the pact were unfavorable to obtaining British agreement and negotiations were not begun, although TOGO did not give up hope. He determined to resume negotiations with Britain in the spring of 1937 and persuaded Ministry authorities and induced the military into agreement.

out and TOGO's efforts came to nothing.

On further oral examination, the witness was asked how the Anti-Comintern Pact of 6 November 1937 came to be concluded and he replied that toward the end of October 1937 Ribbentrop came to Rome and after conferring with Mussolini and Ciano, the Pact was signed. Japan's attitude toward the Pact was negative.

35415 Asked if TOGO participated in the conclusion of

35420 When the selling of the railway was proposed by Soviet in 1933, there was an opinion supported by the military and other circles that it was useless to pay a high price for a railway which was sure to fall into the hands of Manchukuo for nothing. It was feared that this might prove an obstacle. TOGO, however, reasoned the Director of the Military Affairs Bureau and the Chief of the Second Department of the General Staff into agreement as to his own opinion, resulting in the Cabinet decision of 23 May that the Soviet proposal should be accepted that Manchukuo should be advised to be the purchaser and that Japan should use its good offices in the negotiations. The progress of these negotiations was set out in Exhibit 3234. They made little progress and often came to a standstill. TOGO had frequent interviews with the Soviet delegates concentrating his energies on removing misunderstandings and finally the negotiations were concluded.

While Bureau Director TOGO, to prevent complications arising in connection with Soviet-Manchukuo boundaries, set himself to form a committee for their demarcation and committee for settling boundary disputes and proposed it to the Soviet side.

35422 In July 1935, after the conclusion of the CER negotiations, the Soviet notified Japan it had no objection to negotiations for establishing the committee for settling boundary disputes and in August *submitted a draft agreement.

Manchukuo and the Kwantung Army, however, insisted that boundary demarcation be submitted prior to the committee's formation and this hampered the negotiations. In March 1936, the Soviet notified Japan of its intention to accept on terms the proposal for border demarcation in the negotiations from April until November 1936. Both governments proceeded with a view to forming this committee for settling boundary disputes, but the negotiations failed to materialize.

35423 From the day of his appointment as Director of the Bureau, TOGO was an eager advocate of the conclusion of a Soviet-Japanese non-aggression pact but *as Director was too busily engaged in many problems arising from the Soviet to realize his intention. No proposal was made by Soviet on this problem while he was Bureau Director. There was no cross-examination of the witness.

35423 *From Exhibit 3609-A a document on foreign policy following Japan's withdrawal from the League of Nations, it was stated that in connection with Japanese-German relations, Germany was presently too involved in European problems to give much attention to those in the Far East.

35424 Her attitude towards the Far East problems * had never been positively anti-Japanese but had been rather neutral. Germany had always followed the suit of the other Big Powers. Recently some Germans had advocated recovery of her former Pacific Mandates but it might be presumed she would not insist upon regaining them in the face of Japanese objection. It appeared that Germany intended to make use of this question as an excuse to regain her former colonies in Africa. It was now advisable for Japan to make efforts to have Germany understand Japan's international position in the Far East and promote closer scientific and cultural contacts. *

35429 Exhibit 3618, the Affidavit of KASAHARA, Yukio stated * that in January 1938 he, as Major General, was sent as a General Staff Officer to Europe and was in Berlin until November 1938. He had no particular mission there but was informally told he was to be appointed Military Attache. During this time he met TOGO but had no official connection with him.

35430 In July Ribbentrop proposed to Military Attache OSHIMA concerning a German-Japanese-Italian Alliance Pact which had been discussed sometime previously between them. The Affiant then remarked to OSHIMA that it was strange the proposal was not shown Ambassador TOGO but OSHIMA replied that Ribbentrop asked him not to mention it to TOGO * because he first wanted to sound out the intention of the Japanese military and also he was afraid TOGO would oppose it if he were approached first.

35431 At OSHIMA's request, the Affiant left Berlin arriving in Tokyo the beginning of August. He delivered the German proposal to the military authorities and also informed the Foreign Minister and it was brought before a Five Ministers' Conference where a decision was made. The Affiant returned to Berlin the end of September and reported to OSHIMA. The Affiant called upon TOGO to explain why he had gone to Tokyo with Ribbentrop's proposal without letting him know about the question. TOGO said that although he had been told there had been a Five Ministers' decision on the question * he was opposed to an Alliance with Germany and had submitted these views to the Foreign Minister.

35432 *The Witness stated that OSHIMA asked for a direction from the General Staff in regard to the 35433 Witness's return to Tokyo. * This was to the effect that the Witness might return temporarily to Japan for submitting a report.

35434 *Asked if there had been continuous discussion between Ribbentrop and OSHIMA before July 1938 concerning the Alliance Pact, the Witness stated he heard from OSHIMA that the matter had been taken up a long time before but the talk had been discontinued and it just had been brought up again suddenly by Ribbentrop. The proposal Ribbentrop made in July was a request to sound out the Army's ideas.

35435 A few days before Witness' departure, he met Ribbentrop together with OSHIMA and Ribbentrop and Ribbentrop told him that this * proposal was not intended for war but would enable them to avoid it to which OSHIMA agreed wholeheartedly. OSHIMA said that since he had hoped to obtain the views of the military he would send KASAHARA to Japan but thereafter would like to have the negotiations carried out through a diplomatic channel.

35436 Asked what attitude OSHIMA took towards the opinion in military circles that he be made Ambassador, the Witness replied that OSHIMA told him he had heard that there were rumors he would be appointed Ambassador but his real intention was to remain as an Army officer and he was reluctant to be appointed. The Witness was to tell people in Japan * that OSHIMA would not like the appointment. The Witness knew that OSHIMA stubbornly refused to accept the appointment when the telegram came that he would receive the post.

35437 *Witness identified and verified Exhibit 3619
35439 as his Affidavit. * The Affidavit stated that from February 1937 to December 1938, the Witness was Commercial Attache in the Embassy in Germany and from December 1937 to October 1938, he served under Ambasador TOGO and in this time there were two important problems of Japanese-German collaboration on which he was officially informed of TOGO's views.

35440 On the question of strengthening a Japanese-German-Italian Alliance, TOGO was consistently opposed to them by Military Attache OSHIMA. OSHIMA was working for them ignoring the Ambassador and the Embassy was well aware that OSHIMA was negotiating directly with Ribbentrop. TOGO's opinions were often expressed to the Witness and the Witness expressed his opinion to TOGO that Germany had become economically strong and was * closely connected by trade relations with Eastern Europe and the Balkans and these relations were becoming more important and if they developed, would collide with Britain. Japan if bound to Germany by a Military Alliance would be drawn into war with England as well as the United States which was not to Japan's interest.
TOGO agreed and said that Germany would eventually clash with Britain, Russia and other Powers and he depreciated Japan's aligning with Germany.

35441 In March or April 1938 the Naval Attache cabled the Navy Ministry strongly urging TOGO's removal as he was on bad terms with Ribbentrop. The cable stated that the matter had been talked over with OSHIMA.
*This became known when the contents of the cable were transmitted to TOGO. The Embassy Staff were indignant but could do nothing and in the end, TOGO was transferred to Moscow.

When he received this order he told the Witness he was being expelled from Berlin because of his opposition in the Alliance matter. When the Witness left Berlin on 8 December 1938, enroute to Tokyo, he stopped in Moscow and talked with TOGO who asked him about the subsequent development of the Alliance problem.

The witness replied progress was being made and TOGO requested him that when he reported to the Premier and other ministers, he should say that TOGO was absolutely opposed to the Tripartite Alliance.

35442 *When the Witness arrived in Tokyo he repeated TOGO's opinion to ARITA, SAWADA, KIDO, KONOYE and YUASA.

The other problem during the Witness' service under TOGO in Berlin was that of economic cooperation in China between Japan and Germany. In February 1938 the Government's Economic Mission which had no power to enter into agreements or negotiation directly, visited Germany to assist the Embassy. The Germans first understanding that it was to conduct negotiations concerning commercial agreement but the truth was that the Embassy was to negotiate.

35443 Meanwhile the China situation had so developed that Japanese influence became dominant in North China whereupon OSHIMA after consulting the Naval Attache and the Economic Mission, but not the Embassy, made to Ribbentrop the proposal for settling the conditions of German trade * in China. His proposal was that since Japan had caused much difficulty to Germany in her China trade since the start of the China Affair, she would now give to Germans equal treatment with Japanese in the occupied area. Ribbentrop was much pleased with this proposal thinking it necessary to put it into a formal agreement, he presented TOGO with his memorandum around May, but TOGO replied that any proposal made by unauthorized persons could not be the basis of formal negotiations, that he had received no instructions on the matter and could not enter into the negotiations. TOGO told the Witness about this conversation and the 35444 Witness understood later * from TOGO that Ribbentrop was much dissatisfied with TOGO's attitude but after further conversations with the Attache and the Economic Mission, Ribbentrop presented TOGO another memorandum with the word "preferential" substituted for "equal." TOGO told the Witness about it and since it was the second request, he could not refuse to transmit it but TOGO and the Witness agreed that it was not practically possible to give preferential treatment and Japan could not make such an agreement and this opinion was transmitted to the Ministry.

35445 Because the Witness was completely occupied for some-time thereafter with negotiations for a commercial treaty, he had little acquaintance with subsequent developments on economic interests in China and knew only in a general way that instructions were sent and negotiations continued in the matter but it was his understanding * they showed little progress and he knew no agreement had been reached regarding German trade in China when TOGO was transferred from Berlin.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. LOGAN,
COUNSEL FOR KIDO

35446 *Reference was made to the Affidavit where it was stated that the Witness told KIDO that TOGO was opposed to the Alliance and the Witness was asked what Welfare Minister KIDO said at the time.

The Witness replied that KIDO said that although he was not a member of the Five Ministers' Conference, the matter being of importance he had heard about it and added that he himself felt that the proposal should not be carried through.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. SHIMANOCHI, COUNSEL FOR OSHIMA

35447 *Witness stated that the Naval Attache in Berlin in March or April 1938 was KOJIMA but he did not know if TOGO and KOJIMA were on intimate terms then. The Witness had never heard that telegrams were shown to OSHIMA but not to KOJIMA.

35448 The Head of the Economic Mission * from Japan was GODO and among the members were NAGAI and IINO. He did not know GODO's rank at the time but thought he was a former Minister of Commerce and Industry. He recalled that GODO received specific instructions for coming to Germany. He believed that the Mission came with the idea of conducting negotiations for a commercial agreement but this was found to be a mistake and instructions came that the Ambassador was to conduct the negotiations and the Economic Mission was to assist. * There was no occasion in which disputes arose concerning this matter of the power of the economic delegate. The Witness did not know of any specific matters on which KIDO was negotiating.

The Witness was reminded that in his Affidavit he said that OSHIMA, after consulting with the Naval Attache and the Mission, but not with the Embassy, made to Ribbentrop a proposal for settling conditions of German trade in China and he was asked how he knew this. He replied he knew it because TOGO told him that Ribbentrop had told him of this. In this way also he found out that OSHIMA made proposals to Ribbentrop concerning the terms of this agreement.

35450

*Asked how he found out that OSHIMA consulted Ribbentrop a second time after which Ribbentrop handed TOGO another memorandum, the Witness replied that it was in the same way. TOGO told him that Ribbentrop had informed him about this.

35452 *Exhibit 3620, the Affidavit of SAKAYA, Tadashi 35453 stated * that the Affiant from December 1937 to October 1938 was First Secretary to the Ambassador in Berlin under TOGO and was in charge of the Ambassador's telegraphic code and came to be directly acquainted with such questions as the strengthening of the Anti-Comintern Pact, the German-Japanese Alliance and the change of the Ambassadors to Germany.

35454 In July 1938 he had an inkling that OSHIMA had been negotiating with Ribbentrop for strengthening the Anti-Comintern Pact and that KASAHARA had returned to Japan with a German proposal. The Affiant reported on this to TOGO who cabled the Foreign Minister in middle August * that a German-Japanese-Italian Alliance would not contribute to solving the China Affair and that it would be foolhardy for Japan to cooperate with Hitler. He urged that a Tripartite Pact contained the possibility of being abused to bring about a European war in which Japan might become involved and the pending negotiation should be abandoned as the establishment of closer relations or an alliance with Germany and Italy would threaten great danger to Japan. However, the Foreign Minister replied at the end of August that the Cabinet Ministers concerned had decided to have OSHIMA keep in touch with Ribbentrop on the question of strengthening the Anti-Comintern Pact.

35455 TOGO strongly urged Foreign Minister UGAKI's reconsideration * and that it was not proper for a Military Attache to be charged with matters other than military affairs.

Within a few days after sending this message,
TOGO received a cable from UGAKI requesting his agreement to transfer to Moscow. TOGO refused to assent and answered that he would rather remain in Berlin.
The response was another telegram from UGAKI urging his assent which TOGO then gave and left Berlin in October for Moscow.

On 9 April 1945 TOGO was appointed Foreign Minister in the SUZUKI Cabinet. The previous March the Affiant talked with the Swedish Minister Bagge who was leaving

35456 for Sweden shortly and Bagge told him that he wanted to be of some service to Japan. He set forth his views that the Allies * would not necessarily adhere to unconditional surrender if Japan proposed to conclude peace and at the question of the Imperial Household would not come into question. He suggested that Sweden could sound the intention of the United States and asked if the then Foreign Minister SHIGEMITSU would agree to it. The Affiant conveyed his views to SHIGEMITSU. Later when Bagge called on the Foreign Minister, the matter was brought up and SHIGEMITSU stated that it would greatly oblige him if Sweden would take the trouble of sounding out American intentions in connection with peace terms.

35457 After TOGO was appointed Foreign Minister, the Affiant called upon him and reported these details and asked his intention. TOGO referred to his eager desire for prompt restoration of peace and requested the Affiant to ask the Swedish Minister * to bring his suggestion to realization.

On 12 April the Affiant called on Bagge and told him TOGO was of the same opinion as SHIGEMITSU. Bagge promised to set about bringing the project to realization but was compelled to leave Tokyo without seeing TOGO.

35458 Exhibit 3621, the affidavit of ITO, Nobufumi stated * that in 1939 he had the rank of Minister in the Foreign Ministry and in January left Tokyo under instructions to convey to the Ambassadors in Germany and Italy the Government's intentions on the question of a Tripartite Alliance. He arrived in Berlin in February and while exchanging views with OSHIMA was confined to bed because of illness. During this time TOGO the then Ambassador to the U.S.S.R. called on him. He explained to TOGO that although there were various views in Tokyo concerning a Tripartite Alliance, the Government could conclude it * if it were understood that the measures to be taken in certain eventualities would be decided independently by each party with possible agreement for an exception in the case of the U.S.S.R.

TOGO said Japan should not adopt such a policy even against the Soviet and expressed himself as opposed to an alliance because it would not contribute to the solving of the China Affair and increase the danger of European war and of Japan's being entangled in it.

TOGO desired that the Affiant should promptly return to Tokyo and try to prevent such an Alliance.

35460 * Exhibit 3622, the affidavit of Kurt Meissner, stated that the affiant was president until 1946 of the German Society for East Asiatic Natural History and Ethnography, a society for studying oriental culture. He had never held political office, nor was he in the Nazi party. He had known TOGO since 1921, and it was not TOGO's habit to mix with German residents in Tokyo except in official * relations with embassy personnel.

35462 During the years of his acquaintance with TOGO he had talked with him frequently, and he had occasion to hear TOGO's views on international questions. TOGO had mentioned his dislike of the German-Japanese rapprochement before he became ambassador to Germany. When the anti- * Comintern Pact was concluded while TOGO was director of the European and American Bureau, he commented at the making of alliances on ideological grounds as undesirable, that Japan should not adopt a policy which would alienate Britain and America or the USSR, and that the effect on Japan's international position from entering into this arrangement would be bad.

35463 * As the power of the Nazi regime grew, TOGO became increasingly cold toward Germany and determined that Japan should avoid entanglement with her. His opinions were always anti-Nazi, and when the affiant visited Berlin while TOGO was ambassador he learned he was on bad terms with Ribbentrop.

When TOGO became Foreign Minister, he told the affiant that averting war was his task, and he would fight to the end for a peaceful solution of Japan's problems. TOGO's acquaintance with TOGO, he said, was slight, but he had come into the government on the assurance that his efforts for peace would be fully supported by TOGO and the cabinet.

35464 * Exhibit 3623, the affidavit of MATSUMOTO, Shunichi, stated that while TOGO was foreign minister for the first time, the affiant was director of the Treaty Bureau, and when he was foreign minister the second time the affiant was vice-minister from 13 May 1945 to 17 August. As chief of the personnel section from April 1939 to March 1940, the affiant participated in the examination of the services of those concerned in the anti-Comintern Pact. In conferring rewards for services, consideration must be given to the influences it may exert upon both internal and international relations, and it would not be easy to consider such circumstances as that the success of negotiations should be largely attributed to certain person's efforts, * or that a certain one who was originally against the conclusion of the treaty took charge of the business reluctantly. Therefore, on such occasions the ministry would recommend first the chief officials in charge of the matter.

In the case of the anti-Comintern Pact, those in the foreign ministry receiving rewards were the minister and vice minister, and bureau directors in charge of the matter and lesser officials. TOGO was awarded his decoration as director of the European-Asiatic Affairs Bureau.

35466

When the agreement was concluded on 25 November * to extend the pact five years, the secret agreement between Japan and Germany annexed to the pact was abrogated. TOGO intended, in view of Soviet dissatisfaction, to seize the opportunity to abrogate it so it might not hinder friendly relations with the Soviet, and at his own initiative instructed the ambassador in Berlin, OSHIMA, to propose its abrogation. After obtaining German consent, he referred the matter to the cabinet.

35467

The foreign ministry had nothing to do with the tripartite military agreement on 18 January 1942. No treaty to such an effect was concluded among the three, and the Privy Council's opinion was never requested. If such a military agreement was really concluded, it was no more than an arrangement among military authorities regarding operations. It was not possible under Japan's constitution to commit herself to a plan to divide the world among the * three countries through an arrangement among the military authorities. Moreover, the affiant never heard that an arrangement was made at the time among the military authorities regarding the division of the world.

35468

* At 7 a. m. on 10 August 1945, Japan's notification to the U. S., Britain, the Soviet and China concerning the acceptance of the Potsdam declaration was sent. It stated that it was understood that the conditions included in the Potsdam declaration did not include any request prejudicial to the Emperor's prerogative to rule the country. At 1 a. m. 12 August, the affiant was telephoned by TOGO, who told him that the ministry had heard a radio report of the Allied reply, and he asked the affiant to report on this. At about 5.30 a. m. he called at the minister's residence with bureau directors ANDO and SHIBUSAWA, and reported that their study concluded that the Allied reply accepted in general the Japanese proposal. The reply issued by Hull through the Swiss government was received by the ministry in the early morning of the 13th.

35469

* From exhibit 3609-A, "1933 Suggested Policy", it was stated that as a result of the conflict of views between Japan and the League of Nations concerning fundamentals for establishing peace in the orient, rendering it no longer possible to cooperate with the League, Japan had recently notified of its withdrawal. Now that Japan was outside the League, it was incumbent to give most careful consideration to foreign policy so they could meet the nation's critical situation.

35470 Although the U. S. was not a member of the League, its enormous national power gave it a leading position, and its * influence could not be ignored. Although some elements in the country seemed to expect that the Japan policy of the new American political administration which brought Roosevelt into power would develop favorably to Japan, a change in basic policy could not be expected since U. S. policy had consistently been in accordance with the Open Door principle, the principle of territorial integrity of China, and the principle of international pacifism, condemning the use of armed force.

35472 With regard to the prospects of war, there was a faction in Japan urging that if war * were fought with the U. S., the present would offer the best chance, as by the London Naval Treaty the ratio of naval strength between the two countries would become unfavorable to Japan after 1936. If, however, such a war broke out and Japan succeeded in her operations, captured the Philippines and destroyed the U. S. fleet, this alone would not mean that a fatal blow had been dealt to the U. S. as to force its surrender. Japan might win local battles, but little could be expected in the way of victory outside the Far East. The possibility was great that as an inevitable consequence they would be involved in a protracted war unfavorable to Japan. It was difficult to expect that the U. S. would be the only antagonist, for Britain and 35475 France might act together against Japan. * Therefore, such a war should be avoided.

35476 From the U. S. viewpoint, she would not gain much either in the event of such a war. Any idea of trying to monopolize the Pacific was unrealistic as to either the U. S. or Japan. It was to be expected that the U. S. would not countenance the establishment of a Japanese hegemony over all the Far East. Since the actual interests of the U. S. in the Far East essentially consisted of commercial investments, there was conceivably room to moderate * the U. S. idea of moral guardianship over China, and it was therefore essential to persuade the U. S. to consider its Far Eastern policy.

Page

The basis of policy should be to avoid war and to have the U.S. reconsider its policy. Relations should be studied from all angles, and any measures which would contribute to this basic policy should be carried out, and thus restore stability in the Pacific area. As to concrete steps, it was necessary first to have the U. S. reconsider her China policy. For this, it was essential that the foundations of a really independent Manchukuo be established and that she be allowed to observe as much as possible the Open Door principle and equal opportunity, and it be made clear that Japan entertains no territorial or political ambitions in any area except Manchukuo.

35477

* Steps should be taken to urge the U. S. to remove the discriminatory anti-Japanese clause in its immigration law and to adopt an equitable quota for Japan. In view of U. S. suspicions of Japanese ambitions toward the Philippines, an agreement should be concluded guaranteeing Philippine neutrality if the U. S. would not use the islands as a naval base. Since these measures were not possible of immediate realization, it was proposed first that a treaty of arbitration and one of mediation be concluded to make relations normal.

It would be extremely difficult to come to an agreement on a treaty of arbitration, since the U. S. would insist on excluding domestic matters and the Monroe Doctrine, whereas a treaty of mediation would have a better chance and should be first concluded. It was also desirable to have silk and cotton placed on the free list and to conclude an agreement for reciprocal tariff rates on certain items.

35479 Britain constituted one of the most important international relations. The British Empire possessed strategic points and had established a strong economic ground work in China. In the past, relations with her seemed to have a close connection with Japan's national fortune and would continue so. The problem now facing Japan was to pursue her Manchurian policy and adjust relations with China. This would take considerable time to solve and in the meantime, they had to keep good relations with other Powers. Britain not only had the greatest * interests in China but played a leading role in international affairs. She was the first country with whom cooperation was to be expected. Although some in Japan talk about reviving the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, a study of the situation showed this could not be hoped for nor was restoring cooperation with her with respect to the China problem an easy matter but in view of their common interests, room should be found for cooperation. To realize this it would be proper to try to make Britain thoroughly understand Japan's Manchurian policy, respect Britain's interest in China, cultivate a good atmosphere and urge her help in improving U.S. relations.

35480 France was not responsive to Japan's friendly * attitude towards her because she first had to consider her relations with Britain and America with whom Japan was not quite in harmony. In order to promote friendly relations with France, Japan must first improve her relations with Britain and America.

35481 The Netherlands had vast colonial possessions in the East and was greatly interested in Far East problems. At the time of the Four Power Pact, Japan in compliance with a Netherlands request pledged on February 1922 to guarantee its rights over Dutch possessions in the Pacific but in spite of this pledge, the Dutch were under the impression Japan might entertain ambitions towards their possessions. In connection with this matter, KONOYE had recently submitted a recommendation to the Foreign Minister in view of the possible feeling of uneasiness over future relations between Japan and NEI, * KONOYE suggested certain diplomatic steps such as the conclusion of a treaty of

7 152 0003 5794

DEFENSE - TOGO

Page 5795

Page arbitration and mediation. It was advisable that Japan promote amity with the Dutch and declare to the world her sincere desire to maintain peace in the Pacific. Relations with NEI and Dutch Borneo had always been important. Economic relations with NEI were becoming closer and investments there promise to grow. It was proper they should by their actions, eradicate Dutch misgivings and promote economic relations. Japan was now negotiating with the Netherlands at the latter's initiative, * the conclusion of treaties of arbitration and mediation and Japan should strive for their success. If the Netherlands proposed a treaty similar to the Four Power Pact Japan should respond.

35483 *The basic policy towards the US should seek American reconsideration of her Far Eastern policy. As the U.S. did not want Japan to exercise absolute superiority over the entire Far East, Japan should not make this her actual policy in the foreseeable future. Japan's concern was the development of Manchuria and Mongolia and the US desire was to promote markets and enterprises in the Far East. Thus the interests of both could be adjusted if the principle of the Open Door and equal opportunity were realized. As US's opinion was generally ready to accept Japan's occupying a superior position in the Far East, they should try to have America understand the present Manchurian and Mongolian situation and in China, they should cooperate to develop her with others Powers, especially the U.S. and Britain.

35484 To stabilize relations with the U.S. * it was necessary to push efforts towards treaties of arbitration and mediation proposed by the U.S. From former times, Britain had not only enormous stakes in China but since India was her lifeline, it was essential for her to give consideration to maintain friendly relations with Japan. However, Britain's position in the Far East was second to that of the U.S. as she had many interests in China common to Japan's and room for collaboration was great as compared with other countries.

35485 *Exhibit 3624, the Affidavit of MORISHIMA, Morito stated that the Affiant in mid-October 1936 served in the Bureau of East Asiatic Affairs and in December, became Bureau Director. His duties required him to keep in touch with TOGO. When Chang Hsueh-liang tried 35486 to forcibly recover the CER, the Affiant was Consul at Mukden and was sent together with TOGO to Harbin for a month or so; also they worked in close connection in the negotiation for the purchase of the CER. TOGO as Director of the Bureau of European-Asiatic Affairs was in charge of the Tokyo negotiations while the Affiant * dealt with the Soviet Consul-General. The Affiant accordingly was in a position to get a correct knowledge of TOGO's thoughts and actions.

35487 When the Affiant became Acting Director of the Bureau, negotiations with China had come to a standstill because of the Suiyuan Incident. The Anti-Comintern Pact had provoked the Soviet to refuse the execution of the Fisheries Treaty. The U.S. and Britain also were unfavorably disposed to the Pact. Japan's international position was indeed difficult and TOGO told the Affiant that as to the Anti-Comintern Pact, he did not think it proper to set a political agreement against an ideology * and he could not agree to such measures though it seemed unavoidable.

TOGO said the Anti-Comintern Pact would not strengthen Japan's position but might weaken it and because of this, it was necessary to negotiate and adjust relations with Japan prior to or simultaneously with those of Germany. He considered it necessary also that a Japanese-Soviet non-aggression pact and a Japanese-American Arbitration Treaty be sought.

To secure understanding with Britain he maintained that China problems must be settled. These opinions of TOGO gradually saturated various Government's departments. Meanwhile an understanding was reached with Britain and consideration was also given to one with the U.S.

35488 By the spring of 1937 the policy was established that negotiations with China and Britain be carried on simultaneously * in consideration of their inseparable relation. It was because of TOGO's strong feeling that there was this inseparable relation that despite the fact that the Government confided China affairs to the Bureau of East Asiatic Affairs and that the Bureau Director of the European-Asiatic Bureau participated in them only indirectly. He earnestly advocated the 35489 policy which was eventually adopted of concurrent settlements. The chief subjects of the negotiation with Britain were to be the problem of China, adjustment of commercial interests and the question of the international money market. Britain would not easily be convinced of Japan's true intentions by mere promises and it was necessary to show concrete actions and a radical alteration of policy towards China was necessary. It was decided that certain matters should be first taken up for discussion with China and then when the atmosphere with Britain should have improved, adjustment of foreign relations should be * worked for.

35490 When the subjects for negotiation with China were under discussion, TOGO made great efforts to persuade the Army and Navy to agreement. It was impossible to expect smooth progress of the negotiations unless perfect military understanding was obtained and for this purpose, the Foreign, War and Navy Ministries dispatched representatives to China to explain Government policy to military authorities. The Affiant was sent by the Foreign Ministry and accompanied by the War Ministry representative, visited various cities in China and succeeded in Hsingking in obtaining the consent of the Chief of Staff of the Kwantung Army TOJO. The policy thus established, instructions were sent to Ambassador YOSHIDA in London and consultations were carried on between the Foreign Ministry and YOSHIDA, when the Marco Polo Incident occurred * frustrating all hopes in the negotiations.

On the occasion of the Soviet-Chinese complications of 1929, TOGO who had been sent to North China and had got full knowledge of the importance of the question through his experiences there considered it necessary to settle Manchurian problems through negotiations with Chang Hsueh-liang and he recommended this to the then Foreign Minister Count MAKINO and others.

As to the purchase of the CER, there was very strong opposition from the Army and the SMR Company and various things hindered the progress of the negotiations but in spite of this, TOGO's zeal was unchanged.

Page

He beat down opposition and the success of the negotiations was largely due to TOGO.

35491 *Another excerpt from Exhibit No. 3609-A stated that in the light of present developments a divergence of opinion was likely to occur between Japan and the U.S. at the Naval Disarmament Conference to be held in 1935. If matters stood as at present, agreement on disarmament would naturally fail and the agreement for the maintenance of the status quo with respect to Pacific fortifications would be abrogated. The consequent armaments race leading to a Japanese-U.S. war would ultimately bring a world war unfavorable to Japan. They should make every effort to have the U.S. reconsider her Far East policy and at the same time, Japan should reconsider her own disarmament policy.

35494 The Affiant was then a member of the Fifth Section. It was common knowledge in the Ministry that TOGO was well versed in disarmament problems and had enthusiasm for the success of the conference. The Affiant was in charge of the business concerning disarmament under the two Section Chiefs and was often called before TOGO to receive orders and TOGO revealed his opinions to him.

35495 *Based on this the Affiant could state that in connection with Japan's attitude towards the Preliminary Conference of 1934 the two outstanding points were the common upper limit system of disarmament and the abrogation of the Washington Naval Treaty, both of which the Navy advocated.

As to the common upper limit Japan had accepted the ratio system in the Washington and London Treaties and moreover, had even advanced at the Geneva Conference in 1932 a proposal accepting the ratio system. Considering these facts, it was too sudden a leap to advocate establishing a common upper limit and the plan was apparently advantageous exclusively to Japan. There was little hope that the agreement of the other Powers could be obtained and TOGO foresaw that it might cause doubt by Britain and the U.S. as to Japan's intentions. It would be useless to make * a proposal that they could not accept. TOGO took a firm stand against the common upper limit plan and tried to find a meeting point between the Navy and the Foreign Ministry in some other plan but the Navy did not yield. TOGO adhered to his conviction and opposed the Navy to the last but the negotiation failed.

In the meantime, the opening of the Preliminary Conference was drawing near and the government heads decided to adopt the Navy plan. TOGO considered the abrogation of the Washington Treaty a serious question and feared it might stimulate the national sentiments of other Powers. It would be different if that treaty were replaced by a new treaty but otherwise, chaotic conditions and naval competition would result which would lead to war. His opinion was not adopted, however, owing to naval objections.

*In considering the instructions to be given the Japanese delegates discussion was had chiefly on the question whether Japan should accept qualitative disarmament or the obligation to notify the naval construction program if Japanese points were not approved. The Navy opposed acceptance because it would be nonsense unless quantitative limitation was established. TOGO however, insisted upon accepting at least these as they would make a contribution towards ideal disarmament and help remove the uneasiness among the participant Powers but his opinions were not realized.

As to qualitative disarmament, TOGO thought that the limitation of ships' sizes and gun calibers alone would be sufficient.

35498 As to notification of naval construction he tried to persuade the Navy into agreement * but the Navy insisted upon rejecting it insisting that the maintenance of secrecy was not impossible in Japan. TOGO took a serious view of the influence which the termination of the treaty would exert upon world peace although he hoped for the substantial solution of the disarmament question partly because he wished to lighten the various nations' burdens. Especially it was his desire to restore Japan's international credit by bringing the Conference to a successful conclusion. He adhered most persistently to his stand and often had heated discussions with YOSHIDA, of the Bureau of Naval Affairs.

As to the reply of the Government in February 1938 in connection with notification of naval construction, TOGO had nothing to do with it as he had already been transferred as Ambassador to Germany.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. BRANNON,
COUNSEL FOR SHIMADA.

35503 Witness stated that he was presently Chief of the Economic Section of the Central Liaison Office 35504 which is an outer bureau of the Foreign Office. TOGO had been his superior officer for some time. So long as he could say something in TOGO's behalf which was in accordance with the facts, he was glad to do so.

In his affidavit he had stated that there had been advanced at the Geneva Conference in 1932 a proposal accepting the ratio system and that considering certain facts, it was too sudden a leap to advocate establishing of a common upper limit.

35505 Asked if he considered himself an expert on disarmament he replied that as a Foreign Office Secretary most concerned with the * problem of naval disarmament, he considered himself one of the most well versed members in the Foreign Office in such affairs. Asked if he then should not know what actually took place at the Geneva Conference, he replied that at the time he had not been charged with the problem of naval disarmament and was not thoroughly vested in those details. The statement in his affidavit was the opinion of both himself and TOGO.

35506 Asked if he did not know that Japan proposed a common upper limit at that time and confined it to B class cruisers, destroyers and submarines, he replied he believed that Japan made a proposal for establishing a ratio in regard to battleships and A class cruisers and warships of the B class cruiser type * and lower. He believed a common upper limit was proposed. This was not a new idea.

December 17, 1947

35508 *If the idea of a common upper limit alone was considered, it could be said that France had once before proposed it.

35509 *The Foreign Minister at that time was HIROTA and his views were the same as the views he had set forth in his affidavit. HIROTA gave instructions to the plenipotentiary that the basic policy was to establish a common maximum limitation (Reference was made to Exhibit 3001). The Witness, however, believed that instructions were given jointly with the Navy Minister.

35510 The Premier at the time was OKADA but he did not know what his views were. * The draft of the instructions was brought up before the Cabinet meeting and decided upon. Following an agreement among the Premier and other ministers at the time, the draft was finally approved. The Witness believed that if a single cabinet member disagreed with the proposal, it could not have passed.

35511 Asked if he believed TOGO was better able to advise on these matters of naval security than the Foreign Minister, Premier or naval experts, he replied that at that time TOGO was not only Director of the European-Asiatic Bureau but also Bureau Director in charge of naval questions and was one of the officials most vested on naval disarmament. In 1932 TOGO was Secretary-General * of the Geneva Conference Delegation and the Witness believed that TOGO was, from the standpoint of the Foreign Office's viewpoint, the most suitable person to handle these matters.

Asked if TOGO's experience was not confined to the years 1932-34 regarding such naval matters, he replied that at the time the disarmament question was brought up at the Washington Conference in 1933, TOGO was the Section Chief of the European-American Bureau which was in charge of all naval questions.

35512 At the time of the London Conference in 1930, TOGO was counselor of the Embassy in Germany and he believed TOGO was well informed of the situation at the London Conference * and as a staff member of the Embassy continued his studies of naval questions at 35513 the time. * Of course TOGO did not handle naval questions exclusively but was the Bureau Director in charge of naval questions and although there was no specific section to handle such questions up to that time, such a section was established under TOGO's supervision in connection with the London Conference in 1935 and 1936. He did not think it would be an over-exaggeration to say that from 1934, TOGO as Bureau Director handled the naval question exclusively.

35514 Asked if he did not know that if the Japanese naval proposal had been accepted there would have been a drastic reduction in all types of naval craft, he replied that the Foreign Office consistently advocated the reduction of naval strength * to lessen the people's burdens and frequently asked the Navy as to what strength it would be satisfied with if the Japanese plan was accepted but the Navy replied that the question of naval strength belonged exclusively to the High Command, and was not a matter in which the Foreign Office should interfere and therefore, they were unable to learn the substance of navy intentions.

The previous question was repeated to the Witness and he stated that reductions might have been effected but the reason he had given the foregoing explanation was that they were unable to know just what extent such reductions would take place.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF SUEMITSU, Kadowaki.

- 35517 Exhibit 3626, the affidavit of the witness, stated that he was chief of the personnel section, Foreign Ministry, from March 1940 to
- 35518 October 1942. * At the end of the spring of 1941 he called at TCGO's private residence at the order of his superiors, and in accordance with instructions asked TCGO to resign as ambassador. TCGO then held the nominal post of ambassador, but since his return from Moscow in October 1940 he had no assignment and had been requested by MATSUCKA and the vice-minister to resign. TCGO told the witness that he was not only opposed to MATSUCKA's foreign policy, but was entirely dissatisfied with the way the latter conducted personnel affairs, and that he would not resign because the resignation might be construed as a concurrence with the policies. MATSUCKA should take steps to remove him if he desired. TCGO stated in detail his criticisms of MATSUCKA's policies.
- 35519 * The witness reported TCGO's refusal to his superiors. Shortly after TCGO became foreign minister in October 1941, the witness learned from vice-minister NISHI that TCGO was considering approaching the radical elements in the ministry in order to execute his policies. Thereafter NISHI, at TCGO's order, requested one of the ambassadors who was closely identified with the Southern policy, to resign, and the resignation was given effective October 25. Thereafter, NISHI informed two section chiefs and a secretary who were radical and violated proper discipline that they were to be ordered into temporary retirement. They offered to resign rather than to take temporary retirement. NISHI instructed the witness to accept the resignations, and they were accepted on October 29.
- 35520 * Certain officials in the foreign ministry were dissatisfied with the moderate foreign policy and urged a strong policy, especially toward Britain and the U. S. They not only criticized TCGO's policy openly, but went so far as to violate official discipline by requesting cooperation of radical elements of the army and navy. TCGO's purge was the first in the true sense of the word ever conducted in the foreign ministry, with the design to put an end to these conditions. Only a few were purged, but the effect was remarkable.

Life DIRECT EXAMINATION OF TOMIYOSHI, Eiji.

35521 * The witness identified exhibit 3627 as his affidavit and verified
 35522 it. * He stated he was a member of the Diet, belonging to the Japan Socialist Party, and had often talked with TOGO. In the middle of December, 1940, after TOGO returned from the Soviet Union, the witness and FUMIO, a newspaperman, called on him and talked on various matters.
 The witness, who was opposed to the Tripartite Alliance, asked for TOGO's opinion. TOGO hinted his opposition, saying it was not desirable 35523 to conclude an alliance in accord with * preferences of an individual without considering the true interests of the nation. The witness did not pursue the point further because of TOGO's opposition, but stated that he was opposed to MATSUOKA's methods.

35524 * TOGO told him that Molotov and other high Soviet officials regretted his transfer and were wondering as to MATSUOKA's real intentions. There was a grand farewell party for TOGO, and Molotov toasted him twice.

At the end of October 1941, soon after TOGO became foreign minister, the witness called on him and asked him how he could realize his diplomatic policy by entering the TOJO Cabinet of the military clique. TOGO replied that he had entered the cabinet since TCJC had undertaken that he would try to solve the situation through negotiations.
 TOGO would do all he could to avert war. In the middle of November 1941, the witness again called on TOGO and asked him whether the sending of KURUSU was not a trick. TOGO replied sharply that it was not, and that KURUSU had been sent solely to solve the situation through negotiations and it was wrong to say it was a trick.

35525 * In October 1942, after TOGO resigned, the witness asked him the reason for his resignation. TOGO replied that the reason he was opposed to establishing the Greater East Asia Ministry was not that the scope of the power of the foreign ministry was diminished, but that it was contradictory to the idea of treating East Asiatic countries as independent states. He resigned because the military interfered with diplomacy on every matter concerning it, forcing their way through.

CROSS-EXAMINATION by Mr. Keenan.

The witness stated that he used the term "military clique" because the TCJC Cabinet was constituted largely of military men and that it was organized for some military action. He had no profound meaning when he 35526 used the term. * At the time he was a member of the Diet. The witness stated it was not his meaning that it was the common understanding of the TCJC Cabinet that it was committed to military action. It was that the cabinet was largely constituted of military men. It did not necessarily mean that it was devoted or organized for military action, because such 35527 * action takes place in accordance with or dependent on the course of diplomacy and international conditions.

He could not recall, but he was quite certain that there were a few other military men in the cabinet other than SHIMADA and SUZUKI. They believed at the time that the minister of welfare was a military man. He believed it was General KIZUMI.

35528 * The view to which he had reference was based entirely on what he might call the view of common sense, and it was because he always believed that TCGO was consistently an advocate of peace that he had posed the question to him. He didn't recall that TCGO denied that the TOJC Cabinet was one of a military clique, but stated that TCGO told him he decided to 35529 * enter the cabinet because TCGO had given his assurance to use every effort to bring about a successful end to the negotiations. He didn't recall whether TCGO affirmed or denied the fact that the TOJC Cabinet was a military clique.

When asked what he meant by his question to TCGO whether the sending of KURUSU was not a trick, he stated that he meant that Japan, while not desiring peace, she was feigning peace. When asked why he

35530 * asked that question, he stated that while he had personally always had misgivings as to the character of the TOJC Cabinet and was apprehensive of U. S. relations, it had always been his hope that the deadlock in the negotiations would be broken and that a successful consummation be realized. Because of these feelings he asked TCGO whether there would be anything subversive behind the dispatch of the ambassador. He stated that he trusted TCGO and KURUSU, but the political situation was very unclear and diplomacy was not necessarily progressing in the way the people desired

35531 and expected. He asked the question because of this doubt. * The people of Japan really wanted peace with the western powers. When again questioned, what occurred to his mind was whether or not hostilities were going to be commenced while placing the other party off guard.

CROSS-EXAMINATION by Mr. Logan.

35533 * The witness stated that it was not his opinion that the TOJC
35534 Cabinet was organized for military action. * This was an old opinion of his. He had always disliked the idea of an active army officer becoming prime minister. He had held the idea from the time of the triple alliance. Of course, the tripartite alliance was concluded before the TOJC Cabinet was organized. He had formed his opinion in 1941 as to the TOJC Cabinet,

35535 * at the time it was formed. He did not know at the time of the message given by the Emperor to TOJC and CIKAWA on October 17, 1941. He did not 35536 know that the army and navy had been told to cooperate. * He did not know that KIDO had delivered the message to disregard the resolution of the September 6 conference, and he did not know about the conference. He had formed his opinion without these facts. He did know that after October 17, efforts were made to bring about diplomatic settlement, and he had been much encouraged and relieved when he heard from TCGO that such efforts were to be made.

* He did not trust the TOJC Cabinet completely, but was somewhat relieved. He did trust TOJC, but did not necessarily believe that everything would progress as TOJC desired. He did believe that they were making efforts to settle matters diplomatically. The witness had never been purged.

REDIRECT EXAMINATION by Mr. Blakeney.

* The witness did not remember how long prior to the TOJC Cabinet it had been since an active army officer was premier, but he recalled that in the Taisho Era General TERAUCHI formed a cabinet. He did not recall the exact dates of the Taisho Era. There had been no active army officer as premier since TERAUCHI.

35539

He knew that in the TOJC Cabinet, Admiral TERAJIMA was minister of communications. Also, there was General ANDO as minister without portfolio and later home minister. * When the TOJC Cabinet was formed, the witness held no position in the government, and held no position up to the present, when he had taken a position after the formation of the present cabinet. As a member of the Diet, he had no information as to the progress of the negotiations with the U. S., except what could be gathered in the newspapers. Until the present cabinet, his party had always been in opposition.

35540 * Exhibit 3628, the witness' affidavit, stated that the witness came to know TOGO in February 1936, and he had frequent opportunities to talk with him. In July 1935, when the witness was staff officer with the Kwantung Army, the Soviet informed Japan that it did not object to opening negotiations to establish a commission to settle the boundary disputes, but later the negotiations met difficulties because of the attitude of the Kwantung Army which insisted that the boundary demarcation should be accomplished * before the establishment of the commission, since otherwise the commission would be unable to carry out its tasks smoothly.

35541 TOGO, then director of the European-Asiatic Bureau, sent NISHI to Hsingking in September 1935 to persuade the army, but this failed. When the witness spoke to TOGO in February 1936, TOGO referred to this question, and stated while the army was not unreasonable, it was too much to say that the commission could not function without border demarcation, and he requested army cooperation and stressed that the establishment of the commission would accelerate border demarcation. The witness then suggested that they simultaneously establish a commission for settling border disputes and a commission for border demarcation, to work in parallel, to which TOGO agreed. Vice-minister SHIGEMITSU also consented to this.

35542 The witness reported the matter to General ITAGAKI, vice-chief of staff, and General MINAMI, Commander of the Kwantung Army, who both approved the plan. As a result, * Japan began to negotiate with the Soviet on this principle. TOGO became foreign minister in October 1941, when the witness was with the War Ministry. In the latter part of October he told the witness he had agreed to enter the cabinet on condition that TOGO would do his best to bring the U. S. negotiations to a successful conclusion.

35543 * When the TOGO Cabinet was formed, it was felt in the army that all civilian members of the cabinet were under the control of the military. TOGO's opinion provoked great dissatisfaction within military circles when it was learned that he had stated at the liaison conference in November that failure of negotiations would not necessarily mean war and that the proper way for Japan was to persevere under all difficulties and wait for the opportune moment to mature. It was not rare for a state secret to be divulged through the general staff to younger officers. A party of radicals in the army maintained that it was an encroachment on the prerogative of the high command for a foreign minister to utter such an opinion, and declared that he should be disposed of. The witness asked the gendarmerie to protect TOGO.

35544 At the end of October 1941, the witness spoke to TOGO, * and the latter intimated his intention to resign on the ground that he was strongly against war with the U. S. The witness asked him to remain in office, pointing out the impossibility of finding another person who would do his best to check the outbreak of war in opposition to the army;

if a person like MATSUOKA were recalled to replace him, it would be more difficult to prevent war; and if war did break out, TCGC's remaining in office would be all the more necessary in consideration of Japan's national strength, so that he could seize the easiest opportunity to conclude peace.

35545

At the end of August 1942, TCGC sent his private secretary to tell the witness that the further existence of the TCJC Cabinet was against the interests of Japan, since it had begun to make mistakes in directing the war. There was also the question of establishing the Greater East Asia Ministry, to which he was opposed, * because it would violate Japan's fundamental principles of diplomacy. TCGC revealed that his resolution was not only to resign, but to make persistent efforts to have the cabinet resign generally. The witness expressed his consent, encouraged him to stand out for the sake of the country, and promised to resign in case his efforts should end in failure. TCGC was already then under the surveillance of the Mikuni Organ, the secret police of the army.

TCGC resigned alone. He told the witness that although he did all that he could, he had been compelled to resign alone on learning from SHIMADA that the overthrow of the cabinet was practically impossible owing to dissention in court circles. In July, he called on TOGO as foreign minister in the SUZUKI Cabinet, and asked him if peace could be restored. He stated that he was making efforts in that direction, though the time * was very late. The witness saw him again in November 1945, when TCGC explained the circumstances about the end of the war, and stated that it was to his satisfaction that battles in Japan proper had been avoided.

In the July interview, TCGC declared that he had no way of knowing the exact time and place of the commencement of hostilities ahead of time, the matter being an operational secret, though he had often heard the Naval High Command before the outbreak mention "surprise attack". He also referred to the fact which he had previously told the witness in December 1941, that despite the Naval Staff having committed itself to open hostilities a considerable space of time after the Japanese note was served at 1 p. m. 7 December 1941, the attack was commenced shortly after 1 p. m. and that Admiral ITO, vice-chief of Naval Staff, had expressed his regret a few days after the outbreak, when TOGO had reproached him.

35547 * Exhibit 3629, the affidavit of the witness, stated that in 1931, while Ambassador to Belgium, he was designated as one of the delegates to the Geneva Disarmament Conference, and served until the spring of 1933. He had held various positions in the foreign ministry until 1945, and was presently a member of the House of Councillors of the Diet.

35548 * TOGO, then Councillor of the Japanese Embassy in Berlin, was the Secretary General of the delegation to the conference at Geneva. At that time the session of the Assembly of the League to consider the Manchurian question was held in Geneva, and many Japanese were in Geneva for both conferences. TCGC proposed that the business of the Disarmament Delegation should be kept separate and not mixed with that of the Delegation to the Assembly, and that the two delegations should be composed independently of each other. MATSUDAIRA, the chief delegate, consented, and TCGC worked exclusively on the business of the Disarmament Conference without becoming involved in the Manchurian question, although some of the personnel were connected with both.

35549 * During the recess of the Disarmament Conference in 1932, TCGC was ordered to Japan to make report and receive instructions on disarmament questions. On his return in November he came to Geneva and reported to the delegates, but having been recalled, he stayed in Geneva only a short time.

The chief delegate to the League was MATSUOKA. The session convened in October 1932, and MATSUOKA arrived some time afterwards. TCGC and he were in Geneva for only a week after TOGO returned, and they were engaged in entirely different business. MATSUOKA had nothing to do with the Disarmament Conference, and TOGO had nothing to do with the League. At the time, rumors were current of Japan's withdrawal, and although the question had no connection with the Disarmament Conference, it was 35550 discussed * as one of the burning issues of the hour. The witness recalled that TCJO said Japan should remain in the League and try to maintain friendly relations with other nations. He had known TCGC was one opposed to extreme measures and an advocate of peace with foreign countries.

Toward the end of October 1941, TOGO invited a number of those in the diplomatic service to dinner at his official residence after he had become foreign minister. Relations with the U. S. and Britain had already deteriorated, and the witness asked TCGC to continue with the utmost perseverance for the success of negotiations. The witness pointed out the danger that the situation might develop into a war, and told him that at that critical stage the people would never understand the situation if hostilities had been opened as in the China case, without adequate diplomatic efforts, and should drag on for years. He emphasized 35551 * that should war break out with the U. S. it would be a matter of life and death for Japan, and demanded the best efforts be made to maintain peace.

He told TCGC that the people would never be persuaded to rise in arms, since they were convinced that the war was really inevitable in spite of Japan's efforts, and requested that he leave nothing undone to bring the negotiations to an amicable conclusion, despite all unfavorable criticism, and never give up hope to the last. TCGC stated he was of the same opinion, and was doing his utmost to carry out his task on that principle.

35552 * The following morning the witness was requested to call on TCGC and ask him to become a diplomatic adviser to the foreign ministry. TCGC stated he was too busy with important conferences and interviews to think things over himself. The witness accepted the offer and was appointed adviser on November 11.

At the end of November, after the receipt of the Hull note when TCGC conveyed to the witness that Japan had been compelled to put an end to the negotiations, the witness urged him to try further. TCGC stated he had already done all he could, and he could do nothing further except try to obtain U. S. reconsideration. He stated he was willing to resign and be replaced if a way could be found to bring matters to a conclusion, because it was his greatest desire that Japan should not enter upon a war.
35553 The witness told him that the senior diplomats had full confidence in him and that he should not resign, since no one could do any better.

As diplomatic adviser, the witness was not in charge of any routine business, but from time to time gave advice to TOGO upon his request. In January, 1942, TCGC requested that the witness, in view of the importance of the problem of treatment of POWs, should assist with that bureau by making contact with the diplomatic corps, especially those representing enemy interests. The witness talked about the matter from time to time with the representatives concerned in order to contribute to the satisfactory handling of the matter. At the end of February he was appointed Ambassador to the Soviet, before he had a chance to do much in that direction.

35554 In July, 1942, while Ambassador to the Soviet, he received instructions from TCGC to pay as frequent visits as possible to Moscow * and to pave the way for Japan using good offices to restore peace between Germany and the Soviet. Japan intended to spare no effort toward ending the Russo-German War in order to bring about general peace. The witness considered that since battles were being bitterly fought there was no prospect of peace, and so reported to TOGO. In the middle of August, TCGC again instructed the witness to visit Moscow as frequently as possible, and sent the draft of the new fisheries convention and suggested that he call on Soviet authorities in connection with this matter, as it would give opportunity to bring up the subject of peace. While he was prevented from visiting Moscow, TCGC resigned from the Foreign Ministry, and communications ceased.

Case

- 35556 Exhibit 687-B, an excerpt from the proceedings of the Privy Council Investigation Committee on the establishment of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere, stated that ISHII inquired into the constitutional doubt that despite diplomacy being the prerogative of the Emperor with the Foreign Minister having responsibility for assisting, the plan seemed to assign to the new ministry the responsibility for aiding the Throne in connection with diplomacy but the organ to execute policies was decided by the government organization. He made it clear that it was the designation of the minister who should have charge of the administrative execution and did not mean limiting the scope of the responsibility to the Throne, that the pure diplomacy was assigned to the Foreign Minister and all other matters to the Greater East Asia Ministry.
- 35557 *Member MINAMI asked for the reasons for TOGO's resignation and TOJO replied that it was for personal reasons and that he did not believe it proper to give a detailed explanation.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF SHIMAZU, Hisanaga.

- 35559 Exhibit 3631, the affidavit of the witness stated that he was *private secretary to TOGO from October 1941 to September 1942. His duties were not to participate in transacting diplomatic affairs but to arrange documents for TOGO's inspection, to arrange interviews with the staff and with visitors and to accompany TOGO when he attended various meetings. Diplomatic corps interviews were dealt with mostly by another secretary.

- 35560 About December 6, 1941, TOGO was requested to attend the Central Cooperation Conference of the IRAA to be held December 8th and to make a speech there. TOGO ordered two different drafts of his address, one to be used in case war should be opened and the other in case it had not begun. * The address was abandoned.

After midnight on December 8th Grew called on TOGO and delivered a copy of Roosevelt's message. TOGO ordered KASE to prepare a translation. When this was done, TOGO went to TOJO's residence with the witness, arriving there about 2 A.M. The witness waited for TOGO and they then returned to TOGO's residence and left for the Imperial Palace about 2.30 A.M.

35562 was drafted by the Foreign Office and delivered to him by YAMAMOTO. OKA had ordered his subordinates to study the draft and as a result felt that it was inadequate and that it would be appropriate to insert the wording 35563 that they had reserved the right to freedom of action. * This was inserted in the draft and sent to YAMAMOTO. When the draft was distributed at the liaison conference the suggested revision was not made. YAMAMOTO assured OKA that the note could be regarded as a final note.

The witness stated that the draft of the final memorandum which he sent OKA was as he had previously testified prepared in accordance with the liaison conference discussion but he did not thereafter receive from OKA any draft suggesting that freedom of action be reserved and did not discuss the question with him. He distributed the draft of the memorandum at the Liaison Conference December 4th but could not recall that at the adjournment he had been asked by OKA whether the memorandum was an ultimatum nor having replied to him.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. BRANNON (Counsel for OKA)

35564 *The witness stated that Director OKA never made such a recommendation to him. The witness had discussed various matters at many times with OKA, including several talks on the wording of the note. The witness

35565 could not recall everything that OKA had said. * The witness recalled being interviewed by Mr. Brannon March 11 1947 and he recalled that Brannon had stated that he had an interpreter present and a reporter taking down what he said. He admitted that when Brannon had asked him about the matter he had stated that the officials of the army and navy ministries came to his office and discussed the wording and many other matters and he did not recollect clearly whether OKA came to discuss the particular wording or not. But OKA did come to his office many times to discuss the draft and he did not know whether in those discussions this particular incident had actually happened or not. When asked how he remembered at this time that 35565 OKA absolutely * had not come on that matter, he stated that in March when he talked with Brannon it was an informal talk based on his recollection and he had told Brannon that he would tell what he recalled definitely and would also state what he did not recall well. Later he had given concrete consideration to the various questions brought up. With respect to OKA making a recommendation of this particular phrase, he wished to say that the draft was drawn up in accordance with the decision of the liaison conference and there could have been no case for private conversation as suggested and he had therefore come to the conclusion that no such recommendation was ever made to him.

*Exhibit 3633, the affidavit of the witness stated *that he was appointed vice chief of the General Staff on November 6 1941 and attended the Liaison Conferences held in the latter part of the month. He and the Vice-Chief of the Naval Staff ITO once called on TOGO and consulted about the time of the delivery to the United States. As he recalled on or about December 3rd the Liaison Conference decided that notice of the ending of the negotiations was to be delivered to the United States at 12.30 PM on 7 December at Washington. However the navy found it necessary to postpone the time until 1 P.M. and the army agreed.

The witness and ITO called on TOGO December 5th and asked for his agreement. * TOGO asked whether that time left some length of time prior to opening of hostilities and on receiving an affirmative reply from ITO he accepted. On the evening of the 7th the witness learned that the result of the consultation was reported to the liaison conference of the 6th and was approved. ITO did not inform TOGO when the hostilities would commence.

35571

Exhibit 3634 - Collection of Essays on Problems of International Law related to the Greater East Asia * and stated that the International Law Society had set up a Special Committee to study important problems of international law arising since the outbreak of the war, the direction which international law will take and the Treaty Bureau of the Foreign Ministry had been cooperating with it. In the meantime members of the committee have been presenting valuable reports which were of some use to the Foreign Ministry. They were being printed to prevent them from being dispersed and lost and to keep them available for reference and study.

The reports are the personal opinions of the members and their arguments and conclusions have not always matured sufficiently to represent their final views because of lack of time.

Exhibit 3609 * stated circumstances being as they are they had to be very careful until they prove substantial achievement in developing Manchuria and Mongolia. It is inappropriate to launch on a reckless adventure, reckless in all respects. Not until February 1940 did forty odd nations oppose Japan in Geneva. If there were further disturbances these nations would likely deal in concert with Japan. While they were therefore for many years to be striving for the successful development of Manchukuo they should avoid troubles with these nations unless troubles were forced upon them. With respect to China where they were now confronted with armed resistance they might be obliged to cope with it but if there is any opportunity they should immediately lay down * their policy for speedily restoring good will and strictly abide by it and prove their good faith.

*Exhibit 3635. The witness' affidavit stated *that the witness was appointed Vice Minister of Home Affairs in the TOJO cabinet in February 1942, resigning in April 1943. In July 1942 the witness was informed that a plan was being prepared by the four Cabinet Directors for organizing the Greater East Asia Ministry. In August he received a report of the plan to the effect that the business concerning the East Asiatic countries including all political, economic and cultural relations were to be transferred to the new ministry leaving for the Foreign Office only formal matters called pure diplomacy. The witness thought TOGO had good reason to object and felt this might compel him to resign his office.

*This was undesirable and as a career official the witness was sympathetic with TOGO - to have to see the foreign ministry deprived of its function. The witness decided to see TOGO and he did all he could to prevent any incident which would cause his resignation. He called on TOGO and realized he was dead set against the plan. He could see he was resolved to stick to his position on that issue though he did not express it openly. The witness told him that he was sympathetic and stated that in case an agreement was not reached the ministers who were neutral might be obliged to take the part of TOJO since they did not wish to have the Cabinet collapse. On the other hand, hoping to find a neutral person who could undertake mediation * the witness sounded the opinion of the Navy but after becoming convinced that the latter was supporting the new organization he gave up his idea.

35576

The following day the witness saw TOJO and informed him of TOGO's resolution and inquired whether it was proper to adhere to the new ministry plan and tried to persuade him to reconsider it. However, TOJO was firm. He would not recede, emphasizing the necessity of the new organization under the circumstances. He declared that he wanted the new ministry established at the following Cabinet meeting. The witness told him that since both men were firmly resolved, the next cabinet meeting would probably be the last conference TOGO would attend and expressed the desire they would have the moral courage to state their opinions fairly without being carried away by feelings and discuss the matter from all aspects.

35577

*The matter came up for discussion September 1. TOJO personally explained the plan and emphasized its necessity. His point was that owing to circumstances in East Asia occurring during the way in which the East Asia countries had a common object, the countries were in close kinship and in order to meet this new situation a special organization had to be set up which was to deal exclusively with international affairs of Greater East Asia separated from diplomacy in general. TOGO opposed this. He stated that as a result of the new ministry Japan's diplomacy would be divided in two and would be dealt with by a different ministry from that charged with relations with other countries. Consistent diplomatic activities would be impossible.

*The countries of East Asia which would be subjected to different treatment would entertain doubt as to Japan's true motive. It would hurt their national pride and would infringe on the principle of respect for their independence. He feared that the new ministry would turn out an enlarged Kouin extending the latter's way of handling Chinese affairs to all of East Asia which would be undesirable. The discussion lasted for three hours at which time all were silent except SUZUKI and one or two others. Neither TOGO nor TOJO left anything undone for carrying out their points. The meeting was closed with an understanding that it would be later resumed. But TOGO resigned that afternoon with TOJO taking over the foreign ministry. * The meeting was resumed and the plan passed unanimously. The witness called the next day on TOGO and told him he should have no regrets since he had done all he could on such an occasion. TOGO stated that he had made up his mind to resign because he realized he could not agree with TOJO even on the fundamental question of the guidance of the war not to speak of the matter in question.

*Exhibit 3636, Joint Statement of the Greater Ambassadors' Conference, dated April 23, 1945, stated that the Foreign and East Asia Ministers and the Ambassadors of Manchukuo, China, Burma, Thailand and the Philippines had adopted a joint statement unanimously with respect to the method of carrying through the Greater East Asia War and the idea of establishment of world order through the joint war. The declaration stated that the fundamental basis of the international order to be established should be sought in the idea of co-existence and co-prosperity which aims at the removal of all discrimination based on racial prejudice and the like and to secure mutual friendship and cooperation.

Exhibit 3639, the witness' affidavit stated that the witness was chief of the Third Section, Bureau of European-Asiatic Affairs November 1940 to October 1942 and was charged chiefly with business concerning relations with the British. * Shortly after the Pacific War broke out the United States and Britain proposed to Japan the mutual exchange of diplomatic and consular officials as well as many resident enemy nationals as possible. TOGO assigned the witness to manage the business relating to negotiations with the United States, Britain and other Allied Powers and also the preliminary consultation in the competent Japanese offices.

As a result of the negotiations it was decided that due to the shortage of boats those persons to be repatriated should be limited except for the diplomatic officials to temporary residents and that Japan should send back not only residents of enemy countries in Japan proper but also those in Manchukuo, China, French Indo-China and Thailand including the nationals of all allied European and American countries.

*Despite the difficulties TOGO exerted himself from the first to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion and to carry out the agreement. It was necessary to secure vessels and there was difficulty among the army, navy and other circles concerned with the developing of operations imposing large demands upon shipping. The High Command attached various conditions to setting a date for the voyages through southern waters to the place of exchange on the ground that safety could not be guaranteed under the operations in progress. TOGO frequently conferred with the Naval High Command and other authorities and persuaded them to follow the program.

35588

Japan thereupon chartered two vessels and later two more *all first-class liners which sailed from the place of exchange between June 25 and August 10 1942. The nationals sent home amounted to 3500 the majority of whom were temporary residents. About 2000 were taken on at various places beyond Japanese waters. The largest part of those resident in Japan who were repatriated included many persons interned by Japan. Some of them had been charged under the criminal law and were on trial. There was great difficulty in releasing them but TOGO in person demanded their release successfully. One or two representatives of the Foreign Ministry were on board each of the ships to see that the people were treated well and special attention was paid to facilities afforded them.

35589

*After TOGO's resignation the Teia Maru made a voyage in September 1943.

35590

Exhibit 3640-A, affidavit of SUZUKI, Kantaro stated that *in April 1945 he received the command to form a cabinet. Since he was a novice in politics he requested advice of the Elder Statesman on selecting cabinet ministers. He made his own choice of foreign minister and chose TOGO because he felt he had opposed the war from the beginning and had resigned from the TOJO cabinet in opposition to TOJO's policies.

35591

*He felt from the beginning they could not succeed and when chosen as premier he felt it his duty to bring the war to an end. He had selected as foreign minister a man known to have opposed the war. When the cabinet was formed TOGO was in Karuizawa and the witness requested him to accept by telephone. TOGO stated he would have to discuss the matter before accepting. He therefore came to Tokyo to discuss the matter. The affiant could not speak openly on the question of ending the war but he felt from the conversation that TOGO's views were the same as his own. 35592 remember TOGO might have stated that his acceptance was conditional upon the cabinet working to bring about the end of the war. TOGO said he would have to consult his superiors in the Foreign Ministry, specifically HIROTA before deciding. The next day he accepted. TOGO thereafter conferred with the witness * and brought up the question of ending the war as soon as possible. They agreed.

about the middle of May six-man conferences of Premier, Foreign, Army, and Navy Ministers, and Army and Navy Chiefs began to be held to discuss the question. By the end of May TOGO had persuaded the services to agree to approach Russia although there was still some idea of securing not merely mediation but assistance from Russia.

*Until June 22 there were further discussions regarding the method of procedure. TOGO took the lead in insisting that the war must end and Russian mediation sought. On June 22nd the Emperor told the six members that the war must be brought to a speedy conclusion. There was no further disagreement and arrangements were made to send a special envoy to Moscow. Due to various delays this was not accomplished before the Potsdam Declaration of July 26th.

35594

On August 9th at the Six Man Cabinet meeting TOGO presented a plan to accept the Potsdam Declaration with the sole condition attached of maintaining the national policy. There was some disagreement - some members wanting to add certain conditions concerning disarmament, occupation and other points. The matter was presented to the Emperor for decision and the Emperor accepted * TOGO's proposal and ordered it carried out.

On April 6 1945 SUZUKI received an Imperial order to form a cabinet. As soon as the witness learned that SUZUKI had asked TOGO to accept the foreign office and TO GO was hesitating, he called on TOGO April 9th and asked him to assume the post. TOGO told him that SUZUKI desired to end the war and that he agreed with him in principle but that he believed it was extremely difficult to continue the war and that it must be terminated as soon as possible, SUZUKI thought it could be continued for two or three more years. 35597 SUZUKI differed on this point they could not agree on the high policy and he could not accept the portfolio. The witness told TOGO that SUZUKI's point of view was not fixed and it was desired that TOGO enter the new cabinet and enlighten SUZUKI. It was known that the Emperor was considering ending the war and he need not worry about the point too much, * and it was earnestly desired that he contribute his strength to the Emperor. The witness desired TOGO to assume the job because he felt the war could not end in the domestic circumstances without a foreign minister who would dare to risk his life, as well as possess superior brilliance and he knew of no other candidate than TOGO. KIDO also desired that TOGO accept the portfolio and the witness again called TOGO and requested him to accept the ministership.

35603 Exhibit 3642, the witness' affidavit, stated that when SUZUKI received the mandate to form a new cabinet on 5 April 1945, the witness participated in selecting the ministers. The witness was Chief Secretary of the Cabinet during its entire existence and attended all the Imperial Conferences, Cabinet meetings and Supreme War Direction Councils. * The information which he testified about he learned directly through his own experiences and from what he was told by SUZUKI and TOGO.

When the Cabinet was formed, it was decided to recommend TOGO as Foreign Minister, and an urgent message was promptly wired to Karuizawa to have him come to Tokyo. He arrived on the evening of 7 April and met SUZUKI. He stated that since he had been against the Pacific war, he wanted to try to terminate it as quickly as possible. Although the time must be chosen carefully in light of the war situation, he wanted to know whether SUZUKI was determined to make his Cabinet one to end the war, and he asked SUZUKI's opinion on Japan's war potential. After an exchange of opinions, TOGO declined the offer on * the ground that SUZUKI's reply was not clear, and promised to reconsider. The witness called on TOGO on 8 April and explained how it was impossible for SUZUKI to declare how he intended to bring the war to a close promptly because of the extremely important effect and reaction it might have. The witness pressed the request that, since SUZUKI's intention was not clear, TOGO should accept on that tacit understanding, and asked TOGO to meet SUZUKI on the 9th.

TOGO agreed to meet SUZUKI and did meet him, and after a long talk, accepted the offer to become Foreign Minister. SUZUKI told the witness that it was because an agreement had been reached on the question.

TOGO was the most earnest advocate of peace throughout the 35606 Cabinet. His opinions delivered in the meetings of the Big Six held * frequently from the middle of May onward, were always for prompt ending of the war. TOGO did not necessarily rest his hopes upon the possibility of peace through the Soviet good offices, but intended as far as possible direct negotiation with the United States. His efforts for peace were constant.

There was an opinion supported by some military circles that Japan should get from the Soviet petroleum and equipment to continue the war. TOGO, however, insisted on prompt conclusion of peace.

Since the Emperor's wishes were revealed on 22 June that concrete measures be taken to end the war, TOGO personally directed the necessary preparation and proceeded with the negotiations with the Soviet. When the Potsdam Declaration was issued the trend of opinion was that since negotiations were being conducted with the Soviet, Japan should decide the measures after receiving the Soviet reply. Japan should, for the time being, maintain silence as to acceptance of the Potsdam Declaration. The military, however, stated that Government silence would have a demoralizing effect on the troops, and a strong statement should be issued against it.

35608

TOGO was firmly against the military opinion and pointed out that such a step would prove a fatal obstacle to the conclusion of peace. Later this problem was discussed among the War and Navy Ministers * and the Chiefs of the two staffs. The military opinion prevailed, and it was decided that SUZUKI would state to the press that Japan would not take seriously the Potsdam Declaration which was in substance similar to the Cairo Declaration. The press reported that Japan ignored the Declaration. TOGO regretted this and did not give his consent. When the Soviet declared war on Japan on the pretext of this statement, TOGO said that was what he expected.

35609

When on 6 August TOGO heard of the bombing of Hiroshima he told SUZUKI that the war must be terminated promptly and pressed his opinion upon the military leaders. When the radio reported the Soviet Union's participation in the Pacific war on 9 August, TOGO called on SUZUKI and advised him * to end the war promptly and strongly insisted on the acceptance of the Potsdam Declaration insofar as the Allies would respect the safety of the Imperial Household, but the Council adjourned without a decision. The Cabinet met at 1 p.m., and TOGO repeated his argument and succeeded in convincing the majority of the Cabinet members.

At the Imperial Conference that night, TOGO stated his belief frankly and the Emperor expressed his approval. At the Cabinet meeting on the 13th immediately after the Allies' reply was received, TOGO insisted on accepting the Declaration promptly on the basis of this reply. Some members wanted a more positive reply, but TOGO refuted them with convincing reasoning.* Further discussion was held at the Imperial Conference on 14 August, and the Emperor gave the final decision to accept the Allies' reply as it stood. TOGO concentrated all his energy on restoring peace.

- 35612 Exhibit 3643, an excerpt from the Asahi Shimbun of 21 February 1933, states that in accordance with the conference of the 20th, Foreign Minister UCHIDA that day sent instructions to MATSUOKA in Geneva: That Japan absolutely rejected the Lytton Report and proposed recommendations of the League since they are entirely in conflict with the belief of the Japanese Government concerning the establishment of peace in East Asia; it had been decided that if the General Assembly adopted the report, Japan would withdraw from the League of Nations and would no longer maintain cooperation with it. In withdrawing from the League, constitutional steps will have to be taken and the representatives should return home without taking any steps at the Assembly for withdrawal. When the report and recommendations are submitted, the representative should seize the opportunity to express his opinion and vote against it. He should simultaneously report to the Secretary-General the non-acceptance of the * report and should take steps to publish the statement. On completion of all steps, he should promptly leave Geneva with his staff. UCHIDA would instruct MATSUOKA on the steps to be taken and the form of the statement of opposition.
- 35613 * Exhibit 3644, the affidavit of OKURA, Kimmochi, stated that since 1937 he had been managing director of the Kokusaku Kenkyukai (Society for Study of the National Policy), which was a purely private organization, maintained by membership fees and also
- 35614 by private contributions. * Membership was open to all, and withdrawal free and voluntary. There used to be a continual change in membership, and those who did not belong to some committee were little connected with the activities of the Society, and the only benefit they derived was that they were sometimes invited to the lectures which the Society held, and received the periodicals published by the Society. Many members failed to pay their fees, but so long as they did not express the desire to withdraw, they were treated as members and received the publications. In no circumstances were the major, special publications ever distributed to ordinary members.
- 35615 TOGO joined after he had resigned his post of Foreign Minister. He was only an ordinary member * with no connection with any of the committees and did not participate as an officer or director. At one time it was suggested that TOGO become a member of the Executive Committee, but this was rejected. As OKURA remembered, TOGO did not attend any of the meetings, and he does not remember whether or not he paid membership fees. He was a half-hearted and un-cooperative member.
- About December, 1941 the witness called on NISHI, Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs and asked for a contribution of ¥20,000 and explained that the Society sought contributions for the purpose of studying various wartime problems. Two or three months later the money was received. At the time the request was made the program of study of the Society had not yet been decided and his explanation was sketchy and rather vague as to particulars. He never saw TOGO on * any business concerning this or any other contribution to the Society.

- 35617 * The witness identified and verified Exhibit 3646, his affidavit.
35618 * The affidavit stated that the witness entered the Japanese Foreign Ministry in November, 1912 and remained with it until his retirement on August 17, 1945, except for a period from September 1 1942 to April 9, 1945. He occupied successively the usual positions at home and abroad and received promotions, and decorations in the usual course of his career. He had never held any military office nor had any connection with any military group or clique. He had never been a member of any political party or society nor ever held political office, except that on 1 September 1942 * he became a member of the House of Peers, a retirement honor.

35619

At one time he was a member of the Imperial Rule Assistance Political Society, which might be considered a political party, but he was never active in it and he was not even sure when he received his membership and whether it continued until the Society's dissolution. His profession had been diplomacy and his aim had been the advancement of his country's interests, but he had always been governed by the conviction that Japan would be best served by understanding other's viewpoints; by promoting international friendship, and by striving for amicable settlements and peace.

35620

His career was substantially as set forth in the Cabinet Record, Exhibit 127, subject to the amplifications which he shall mention later. His diplomatic career * was related almost wholly to European and American affairs, and primarily European. He had served less than three years in the Consulate-General at Mukden, but never served thereafter in any country in Asia. During World War I he was appointed to a post in Switzerland, and after the armistice, served at the peace conference. He was sent to Germany and remained there until the peace treaty. He then served in Tokyo as Chief of the First Section of the European-American Bureau, which was concerned with Russia and neighboring affairs.

35621

- In December, 1925 he went to Washington as senior secretary, and stayed there until the end of 1932. He was Councillor of the Embassy in Germany. He was twice ordered to Geneva, once in September, 1930 as a member of the suite of the Japanese delegation to the 11th Assembly of the League of Nations where he remained for only ten days; * and again in December, 1931, as Secretary-General of the Japanese delegation to the Disarmament Conference, and served from February to August, 1932 and in November, 1932.

The Prosecution have argued that since he was in Geneva at the same time as MATSUOKA, he was with MATSUOKA on the League of Nations delegation to defend the aggression and to give the assurances which were so often broken. He stated that in 1931 he was in Berlin and

- 35622 the Prosecution statement probably referred to 1932. At that time he was in Geneva as Chief Secretary of the Japanese delegation to the Disarmament Conference. There was no connection between the business of the two delegations. Although some evidence has * been given on this point, he wanted to emphasize that he originated the proposal that the business of the two delegations should not be intermingled nor should the personnel of the two be common, and this proposal was adopted by MATSUDAIRA. Although there was some overlapping, TOGO had nothing to do with the business of the delegation to the Assembly concerned with the Manchurian question. MATSUOKA did not leave Tokyo until October at which time the Disarmament Conference was in summer recess, and TOGO had returned to Japan to report and confer. Upon his arrival in Berlin on 19 November, he found an order directing him to return to Tokyo and a new assignment as Director of the European-American Bureau. He went to Geneva and reported on his visit to Japan, remained there for ten days and left on 22 December for Japan.
- 35623 He had no official connection with MATSUOKA and no occasion * to 'defend' the Manchurian Incident. When MATSUOKA withdrew Japan from the League of Nations, TOGO was no longer in Geneva, but was in Japan.
- 35624 * The Prosecution have stated that in 1941 TOGO was a member of the Supreme War Council. This Council was composed only of military men and was restricted to general officers, and this has been so stated by the Prosecution. Allegation for his membership seems to be founded on Exhibit 102, the original Japanese of which refers to the Supreme Council for Direction of the War. This organ was established under the KOISO Cabinet in 1944, and TOGO was, therefore, not a member in 1941.
- 35625 * It is known that TOGO received various awards and decorations. It is averred that the award bestowed on him 'for services during 1931-4' was related to the Manchuria Incident. It is obvious from his career that he had no connection with the Manchurian Incident, nor is there any evidence to connect him therewith. He was in Berlin when the incident occurred, and during the period of the award he was in Berlin or Tokyo as Director of the European-American Bureau, which had no direct connection with the Manchurian affair. As awards for services in connection with any contemporaneous affair could have been given in the guise of awards for service in the Incident, the award for his services could have been in connection with other matters; but if he had been decorated for such services, he would have been one of 452,826 recipients of such awards. The award granted him for services in connection with the conclusion of the Anti-Comintern Pact came to him as Director of the Bureau in charge of the negotiations. It is customary under the Japanese system to bestow awards upon the officials concerned * without regard to their personal views or the actual roles played in the matter. That he was given an award upon the conclusion of the Anti-Comintern Pact despite a lack of sympathy is sufficient commentary on the significance of the awards.

With respect to the China War, these awards covered all services in the period under consideration, and there were 3,319,547 received on this same basis.

The witness stated * that he never paid membership fees or dues, never attended meetings, never served as an officer although requested to take office, and never had the slightest knowledge of what the Kokusaku Kenkyukai was doing or proposed. He was solicited by a personal friend to become a member, and did. As to the donation made by the Foreign Ministry, he had nothing to do with it. If it occurred, it was a matter carried out by the Vice-Minister and he was not consulted.

35628 *

Throughout his diplomatic career, Russo-Japanese relations was the most important problem, after that of China, and a great deal of his career was devoted to it. As the European-American Bureau Section Chief he was concerned directly with Russian affairs, and while he was Director of the European-American Bureau, Russian affairs were of paramount importance. While he was Chief of the First Section of the Bureau, he was the official directly concerned with solving Russian problems, and during this time they reached a settlement of many points of contention arising from the Soviet Revolution and the Siberian Expedition carried out jointly with the United States, Britain and France, and which had been since pending between Japan and the USSR. TOGO's efforts were devoted to settling Soviet ratification of the Czarist debts and of prohibition of Communist propoganda in Japan. The settlement was embodied in the Soviet-Japanese Basic Convention, in which Japan recognized Soviet reestablishing relations signed at Peking in January, 1925.

Although he was designated as chief of the European-American Bureau 1 February 1933, he took over the office in early March. * He was charged with assisting in engineering the withdrawal of Japan from the League of Nations; actually he had no connection with this high-level policy decision, the general trend of which had been decided before he entered his new office in March, his Bureau not being the one in charge of the matter. He had expressed his opinion that such withdrawal would be unfortunate for Japan. Although the formal notification was given on 27 March 1933, the policy had been determined when MATSUOKA led the delegation from the Assembly in late February.

35630

After the withdrawal, TOGO submitted to UCHIDA a written opinion entitled 'On the Foreign Policy of Japan vis-a-vis Europe and America Following Withdrawal from the League of Nations.' It should be noted that although this report treats of Japanese relations with the U.S. * and all the chief European countries, over a third of it is devoted to the Soviet question. So far as it was within his competence and his abilities, he worked throughout his career for the fulfillment of the diplomatic policy set out in 1933.

With other important branches of Japanese diplomacy such as affairs of China and the U.S and Britain, he had in later years almost no connection, until they had so deteriorated as to bring us to the verge of the Pacific War, and was not in a position to work to any good effect in carrying out his proposed policies. So far as Soviet affairs were concerned, he had the opportunity to deal with them for a considerable period, and the main points of his program were brought to fruition. There were three of these points: conclusion of a non-aggression pact; settlement of the Chinese Eastern Railway question by purchase of the Soviet interest; demarkation of the Soviet-Manchukuo boundaries.

His first work as Director of the Bureau was the negotiations proposed by the Soviet which led to the purchase * of the Soviet interest in the Chinese Railway and the removal of that source of friction. The negotiations were taxing and complex, and took most of his time for almost two years. At first the parties were extremely far apart in their ideas of the monetary value of the Soviet interest; negotiations were repeatedly interfered with by occurrence of conflicts in Manchukuo, and the military authorities had to be persuaded that amicable settlement was to Japan's interest.

35632

The result was that his bureau and he were fully occupied in persuading the parties to compromise their original claims. The Prosecution have referred to the sale as being intended to strengthen Japan's position in Manchukuo and to eliminate the rights of foreign countries, except Japan. This overlooks the fact that the sale was first proposed by the Soviet and the three types of governments concerned were as one that the transaction would promote peace. It was by the Soviet request that Japan guarantee the purchase price, the Soviet Government lacking confidence in the solvency of Manchukuo. This transaction was one of TOGO's long standing ambitions and was proposed in his report to UCHIDA.

35633 *

During the negotiations the Foreign Ministry was reorganized- the European-American Bureau being divided into two and its functions transferred partly to the new American Bureau and partly to the new European-Asiatic Bureau. The latter was also charged with responsibility for matters affecting European countries and continental Asia except China, Thailand, etc., TOGO's chief interest and specialty being in the Russian field, as he was appointed to the European-Asiatic Bureau.

Immediately after the sale of the Chinese Eastern Railway, he had turned his entire attention to the Soviet-Manchukuoan border question. Before becoming Director of the European-American Bureau agreement had been reached to study the question proposed by Japan of establishing a mixed commission to prevent border disputes. It was not until May, 1935 that negotiations on this question were entered into. After Manchukuo was founded, border incidents had been numerous, 35634 * but during the railway sale question the number of incidents had decreased. This seemed an opportune time to end the expenditure of effort which was required to settle the incidents, by entrusting the task of prevention and settlement to such a commission. He, therefore, tried to begin negotiations in the summer of 1935. The Government of Manchukuo and the Kwantung Army insisted that a border demarkation commission be agreed before the establishment of a commission to settle disputes, to which the Soviet Government agreed, however, due to differences of opinion, negotiations were finally dropped. Even in 1938 when TOGO arrived in Moscow he found neither commissions yet established, and the only result was that he succeeded in bringing about a demarkation of the Mongolian-Manchukuoan border in the Nomonhan District.

35635 * In the summer of 1937 relations were again troubled by the occupation by Soviet troops of the Kwan-tsa-tse Island in the Amur River. The Kwantung Army wanted to dispatch troops to settle the incident by defense of what it considered the frontiers of Manchukuo, but TOGO insisted on negotiation first, and in the end the incident was settled without developing into a serious clash.

In March, 1936, HIROTA had intimated his intention of appointing TOGO Ambassador to the Soviet, however, after ARITA was appointed Foreign Minister the post went to another, and he was appointed Ambassador to Germany in October, 1937. HIROTA stated later that although he considered it appropriate to send TOGO to the Soviet, personnel problems had compelled him to make a different appointment.

35636 * On 15 October 1938, TOGO was appointed Ambassador to the Soviet, and arrived in Moscow on 29 October. He found awaiting his attention a serious problem in the form of the perennial fisheries question. Since 1936 it had been necessary to conclude an annual arrangement, and trouble and difficulties arose annually. In October, 1938 the state of affairs were especially serious, because a large number of the Japanese leases for fisheries lots were about to expire, and the Soviet evidenced no intention to conclude the annual agreement. It required much patience and long-drawn-out negotiations to settle the matter, and for the first time in the course of the fisheries question, the new year commenced without an agreement. The matter became so serious that it threatened to bring about a rupture of relations between the two countries.

35637 Finally the matter was settled in April, 1939, and as a result of those negotiations, the annual agreements were made easier. In 1940 they began negotiations in the middle of November, and were able to reach an agreement by New Year's morning.

35638 The Nomonhan incident is charged against TOGO as a crime against the Soviet. He was in Moscow when the incident occurred and he first knew about it only by the Soviet protests and by cablegrams from the Foreign Ministry. He had never discussed it or any other conspiracy against the Soviet with any person whatsoever. When the settlement was arrived at between Foreign Commissar Molotov and TOGO, * there was no one who suggested that he had conspired to wage a war of aggression, or that his position was other than that of a diplomat negotiating to settle a problem. In fact, Molotov said that the settlement was an augury of better relations between our countries. As a result of the Nomonhan settlement, the demarkation of Soviet-Mongolian boundaries with Manchukuo came about.

35639 At this stage of relations, he felt it opportune to undertake the negotiation of the non-aggression pact. He only wanted to secure for both countries the obvious benefit in the way of improved relations to be derived from the conclusion of such a pact. He certainly had no idea of encouraging Japan's southward expansion - a policy which he had always opposed as leading to conflict with Britain and the Netherlands and probably with the U.S. as well. * He, therefore, had no intention of making a friend of the enemy in the north in order to facilitate a southward advance. His motives for concluding a non-aggression pact were just as he had expressed them in his written opinion in 1933. He had nothing to do with the Soviet proposal for a non aggression pact made in December, 1931 and declined as premature in 1933. The commencement of such negotiations, however, even in 1939 was not easy, and required repeated telegrams and the dispatching of a member of his staff to Tokyo. After obtaining authority, he began negotiations and reached a general agreement with Molotov for conclusion of a neutrality pact, which was put into draft form. It was only the Russian desire to liquidate the North Sakhalin concessions which prevented conclusion of the agreement.

35640 * Although he received instructions to return to Japan, he also received specific directions to cease negotiations. In April, 1941, when the neutrality pact was concluded, he was able to see the realization of the three basic points on Soviet-Japanese relations, which were almost identical with the preliminary agreement reached between Commissar Molotov and himself.

35640 * The prosecution point that when MATSUOKA carried out his purge of the diplomatic service, dismissing those considered insufficiently ardent toward his Axis-alignment policy, TOGO was allowed to remain, seems to arise from an incomplete personnel record. In fact, he was recalled on 29 August 1940 and actually arrived in Tokyo on 5 November. Upon his return, MATSUOKA intimated that his resignation would be accepted, and sent the Vice Minister and the Chief of the Personnel Section with the same suggestion. TOGO obstinately refused and told the Foreign Minister that his demand that diplomats resign simply because they were opposed to his policy was entirely unjustified, and warned him of the consequences of dismissal of experienced diplomats. He told MATSUOKA he would not tender his resignation voluntarily as that would mean his approval of MATSUOKA's policy. No further steps were taken by MATSUOKA, and TOGO held the nominal position of Ambassador, although he actually had nothing to do with the activities of the Foreign Ministry for the year following his return to Japan.

*Although TOGO had served in Germany three times, he had never been a specialist in German affairs. His first impressions of Germany when sent there in April 1919 impressed upon him the horrors and miseries of war. His basic policy for Germany as set forth in his report to UCHIDA was not one of positive cooperation. He was not only antipathetic but was skeptical of the widespread admiration of the strength of Nazi Germany from his knowledge of things there.

His first connection with German affairs was when the Anti-Comintern Pact was negotiated. *He had close connection with it, as director of the bureau in charge from the time it came to the Foreign Ministry. However, the nature and extent of his connection requires some explanation.

The Anti-Comintern Pact history in the Foreign Ministry began about the beginning of February 1936, with a report from the Charge d'Affaires that conversations had been in progress between Germany and the military attache for a defensive alliance. TOGO requested the War Ministry and the General Staff for information and thereafter Colonel WAKAMATSU informed them of his general impressions of German conditions, but not about the details of the conversations.

*ARITA at that time became Foreign Minister. MUSHAKOJI, Ambassador to Germany, was in Tokyo and ARITA had a conversation with him and give him oral instructions that since it seemed necessary to make a political agreement with Germany, he should study the matter upon his return to Berlin. Formal instructions were also sent. MUSHAKOJI reported the German proposal which was basically the Anti-Comintern Pact but it had many objectionable features. TOGO had opposed a pact based on Nazi ideological grounds and so told ARITA. He, however, had no voice in the decision of the policy. Although a bureau director could submit his opinion, he only carried into effect the policies decided and dictated by the government.

35645

TOGO did try to persuade his superiors and the military authorities to make the agreement *as weak as possible, arguing that it be limited strictly to the bare minimum of what had been determined as the national policy of Japan's needs and that the matter should be so managed that it should not affect relations with Britain, United States, and the Soviet. He was successful in several points.

35646

One of his chief reasons for insisting on revising the draft pact was the propagandistic tone of the draft. The preamble which read like a Nazi manifesto was changed greatly and these changes were agreed to between Japanese military and Germany so it resulted in the form it finally took. The text was rewritten to limit cooperation to the exchange of information *on the destructive activities of the Comintern and the counter measures to be taken against them. The term was reduced to five years and TOGO removed provisions calling for meetings of the Foreign Ministers and other high officials. He made the pact more businesslike.

He strongly asserted that the secret agreement should be strictly defensive and he insisted on changes. The first article had provided that it would become effective if one of the States became the object of attack or threat of attack by the Soviet. This at TOGO's insistence was limited to the case of unjustified attack. In connection with Article 2, he succeeded in securing German agreement to a list of exceptions from the requirement of mutual approval of political agreements with the Soviet so as to have Japan freer of German meddling in her relations with the Soviet.

* He felt that it was essential to keep Japan's foreign policy on a rational and balanced basis and that efforts be made to maintain a close relationship with the democratic powers. This can be seen from my 1933 report -- especially since that report put emphasis on the British policy. In July 1936, he presented to a conference held between the Foreign Ministry and army officials a policy for managing the matter. The revisions were agreed to by the army officials. He also presented his views of undertaking negotiations for an entente cordiale with Britain. The War Minister became angry and only after great efforts did he obtain his agreement *to negotiate with England.

35648

What he had in mind was modelled on the familiar treaties of consultation. While time was consumed in working on China affairs related to these negotiations with Britain, the HIROTA Cabinet fell, but TOGO continued his efforts to obtain the agreement of the Foreign Ministry and to persuade the military to start the negotiations. After the KONOYE Cabinet was formed, he requested HIROTA to postpone his appointment as ambassador to allow him to work on the problem. An agreement was

Page eventually reached and instructions sent to London to commence negotiations. Just at this point, the China Affair broke and indefinitely postponed the Anglo-Japanese pact question. His appointment in October as Ambassador to Germany forced TOGO to give up his plan for improved Anglo-Japanese relations.

35649 *With regard to his attendance at meetings of the Privy Council on the Anti-Comintern Pact, the responsibility for managing this matter in the Privy Council was shared by his Bureau and the Treaty Bureau. The director of the Treaty Bureau made the explanations and TOGO made none. A Bureau chief in attendance had no part in the debates nor in the voting. The records show that at this meeting the explanation of the Anti-Comintern Pact to this Privy Council Committee was made by the Premier and the Foreign Minister and TOGO said nothing and spoke at no meeting of the Privy Council.

The Anti-Comintern Pact was signed in November 1936. Italy was not an original signatory and was not a party to the secret protocol. The negotiations which brought Italy into the Pact were carried on entirely in Europe and TOGO took no part in their conduct.

35650 *He was no longer handling the European-Asiatic Bureau when Italy adhered to the Pact. In September 1937, his appointment to Germany as ambassador had already been informally decided upon, and the business of the bureau was being handled by his successor. On October 10, he went to Manchukuo and, therefore, he had nothing to do with Italy's adhering to the Pact.

His appointment as ambassador to Germany was dated 27 October. He left Tokyo on 24 November and arrived in Berlin on Christmas Eve of 1937. Japan was then trying to solve the China Affair through the good offices of Germany, but Germany's position was extremely equivocal. While professing to strengthen friendly relations, she for many years had military advisers in China and had sold arms and ammunition to China, and it was said that many Germans were training the Chinese Army and directing the construction of military works.

35651 *Japan, therefore, regarded the stoppage of German aid to China as most important and TOGO's instructions were to try to have the military recalled and the shipment of arms stopped. He made his approach to the German officials as ambassador and merely carried out a policy in accordance with his instructions.

With regard to the conversations with von Neurath of January 10, 1938, the witness stated that he had called on von Neurath merely to thank him for Germany's efforts in the mediation. He had nothing to do with the mediation plan. von Neurath brought up the matter of the China Incident. At that time the policy of not dealing with China *and of fighting the Incident to an end was being considered by the cabinet and had been decided upon. This policy, with which TOGO had no connection was published on 16 January, a few days after the conversations with von Neurath. TOGO had advance information of the decision and took it into account in telling von Neurath of Japan's policy.

35654 *The chief problem of his stay in Germany was 35655 German-Japanese economic cooperation in Germany,*which he need not amplify to much since these facts have been told to the Tribunal. In early 1938, he was instructed to begin negotiations to conclude a trade agreement to try to rectify the unfavorable balance of Japan's trade.
Negotiations started were undertaken by the Commercial Attache. In May 1938, Ribbentrop stated his desire to make an agreement that Germans trading in North China should be given substantially equal treatment with Japanese traders. TOGO flatly declined to enter into any negotiations because of lack of authority. He had told Ribbentrop in February that all important political 35656 and economic matters *should be transacted exclusively between the Foreign Minister and the Japanese Ambassador or with their approval. Ribbentrop had agreed. TOGO found that despite this Ribbentrop was discussing economic problems with others than the Embassy personnel directly concerned. TOGO made no effort to conceal his dissatisfaction and the discord between him and Ribbentrop became impossible to conceal.

Ribbentrop, after some delay, tried to reopen negotiations. He handed TOGO a similar memorandum and substituted "preferential" for "equal" treatment. This time TOGO transmitted it to the Foreign Minister but sent his opinion that it would result in violation of existing treaty obligations to grant to Germany anything more than most-favored-nation treatment in China, and he opposed it.

35657 In response to his *report, he was instructed to offer to Germany "the best possible preference" in economic matters in North China, and to promise that Germany's interests would be given preference over others.
TOGO tentatively narrowed down the proposal still further before presenting it in the form of the Pro Memoria. He limited it to German "foreign trade" and offered "benevolent" treatment, which was altogether different from the preference which Ribbentrop had in mind and which was substantially equivalent to most-favored-nation treatment.
Ribbentrop considered the formula unsatisfactory and the negotiations continued without progress. The negotiations were cut short when TOGO was ordered on 15 October to leave for Moscow as ambassador.

35658 TOGO had become unpopular with Ribbentrop and other Germans *because of his dislike of Naziism which came to their knowledge, as well as his lack of sympathy for the Anti-Comintern Pact. TOGO's greatest efforts had been toward improving relations with the United States, Britain, and the Soviet and objected to rapprochement with Germany at the expense of those other interests. He did not believe that Japan's future lay in alliance with Naziism and Fascism.

35659 Since his early tenure in Berlin, OSHIMA had been negotiating with Ribbentrop for the strengthening of the Anti-Comintern Pact. This was done without TOGO's approval or participation. The negotiations were in violation of Ribbentron's assurance that he would deal only with TOGO on important and political matters. The reason for TOGO being ignored *was because of his strong opposition to any project of the sort.

35660 Europe was increasingly tense and it was apparent that if Japan was tied by an alliance, she would be involved in an imminent war. TOGO emphasized the danger to which such an alliance would expose Japan. Reinforcement of the Pact meant a three-power alliance. Ribbentrop presented to OSHIMA a draft agreement which was sent to TOGO and thus came under the Foreign Ministry. Learning this, TOGO registered his opposition to be forestalled promptly since it could not contribute to the solution of the China Affair, but would involve Japan in an imminent European war. The Foreign Minister notified TOGO that the Five Ministers' Conference had made the decision to have the Military Attache ask German authorities to make a formal proposal. TOGO again repeated his objections. *As a result TOGO hereafter received a request for an assent to his transfer as Ambassador to the Soviet.

TOGO had long desired the Moscow post and he was not a success in Berlin. However, his removal from Berlin did facilitate a course of action which he had feared and fought and he felt that by remaining there he would be able to exercise some restraint upon the militarists and might sabotage the scheme. He requested the Foreign Minister to leave him in Berlin. On the following day a second request for his assent came and he had to submit. He was appointed to Moscow on October 15 and left Berlin on the twenty-seventh.

Page

His transfer to Moscow ended his negotiations with German affairs and the conclusion of the Tripartite Alliance was outside his sphere.

35661

*He had only once semi-official connection with these questions. In February 1939, he met in Berlin with OSHIMA, SHIRATORI, and ITO, the latter having been sent to convey TOKYO's opinion. He had received a telegram from OSHIMA saying he was asking permission to call a meeting in Berlin of all Ambassadors stationed in Europe. TOGO could not wait for advice from Tokyo and left for Berlin after advising the Foreign Ministry. Upon his arrival, he found that the Ministry had disapproved the conference and he merely had dinner with OSHIMA and SHIRATORI. He repeated to OSHIMA and SHIRATORI his views in opposition to the alliance and urged ITO to go home promptly to prevent the conclusion of the Pact as it would bring disaster to Japan.

With respect to the Knoll memorandum*of his conversation with KURUSU in June 1940 that he did see KURUSU in May 1940 but that they did not discuss this matter and he could not express such an opinion as Knoll records, for he did not hold it. A perusal of the original record shows that KURUSU did not state to Knoll the conclusion the prosecution have drawn.

The Tripartite Alliance was signed while TOGO was in Moscow so he had nothing to do with it. It was signed in such secrecy that a very few even in the Government knew of it beforehand. The Anti-Comintern Pact was renewed for a further term of five years on 25 November 1941, when TOGO was Foreign Minister. This was a continuance of the policy in effect since 1936, *and the Government had already been committed to it by MATSUOKA in the spring of 1941. However, TOGO succeeded in obtaining the abrogation of the secret protocol, the part of the Pact most distasteful to the Soviet.

In 1945, there was opinion in some quarters that the Anit-Comintern Pact should not be terminated. TOGO insisted that all political agreements with Germany be abrogated, including the Anti-Comintern Pact, in view of the need of not giving offense to the Soviet, as well as the desirability of disassociating Japan from Nazi ideology. This was done on May 15, 1945.

35664

The no-separate-peace treaty with Germany and Italy was concluded when TOGO was Foreign Minister but negotiations for it had begun before the outbreak of the Pacific war, but negotiations were undertaken only when it appeared that the United States' negotiations were hopeless and they were then undertaken only as a precautionary measure.

The Tripartite Japanese-German-Italian military agreement of 18 January 1942 was planned and concluded among the military authorities. TOGO had no knowledge of its conclusion or contents beforehand but was notified of it later by the High Command and then only as to the fact that operational zones were established. Such plans were not confided to civilians regardless of rank.

The Tripartite Pact *provided that the Foreign Minister should be ex officio members and it was as Foreign Minister of Japan and not as an individual of any particular ideology or views that TOGO became a member. The committee in Japan had only a nominal existence and never met. Until he became Foreign Minister TOGO had little direct contact with American-British affairs. His former bureau had to do with British affairs and his predecessor dealt with American. The American-British relations of those days were related mostly to problems of China and Manchuria and were really the concern of the East Asiatic Bureau. Most Japanese foreign policy could be conceived to ignore relations with these two powers and having served and traveled in those countries and knowing their conditions, he had long-considered ideas concerning

35666

*Japanese relations with Britain and the United States.

The specific policy which he had recommended in 1933 was obsolete, but he still had confidence in the plans. TOGO did not enter the TOJO Cabinet to strive for domination of the world, nor for the annihilation of American and Britain, nor their expulsion from East Asia. In accepting the portfolio, his intentions were to work for improved relations which would lead to an enduring peace and to settle somehow the China Affair. The obvious immediate policy could only be one to avert war.

35667 Before accepting the post, he had no correct knowledge of the United States negotiations because he had held no position since 1940 and was actually in retirement. He knew that negotiations designed to effect an improvement in relations with the United States and Great Britain had been in progress since Ambassador NOMURA's arrival in America, and he occasionally heard *the outlines of the subject matter. The whole subject was highly secret and he could know nothing concrete concerning it, except that relations were gradually deteriorating and if unchecked might lead to disastrous war.

He did know, however, when he assumed the post of the impotence of the Foreign Minister even within the field of foreign relations. In the Japanese system this position differed so radically from that of the equivalent officials in other nations that he wished to emphasize certain facts so his position could be understood.

35668 The Foreign Minister is not solely charged, even within the cabinet, with responsibility of foreign affairs. This is apparent from the Constitution which make ministers collectively*responsible. With the collective responsibility, there is the corollary, collective management of affairs. Also there was another tendency of recent years that the Premier was to assume more and more power over all affairs, including foreign. In Japan, the government in the past fifteen years had undergone a progressive weakening of its power as against the High Command. There was a gradual, but unceasing encroachment by the High Command on the government's sphere of action. By asserting that such matters bore directly on national defense, the High Command had the power, even in times of peace, to force the acceptance of its proposals in matters of budgets, national finance, industry, education, and other fields, as well as foreign affairs.

35669 The Foreign Minister *had no way of knowing the military strength of the country and even in foreign affairs was powerless to block any measures insisted upon by the military.

In the ten-year war period, the military had gotten strong influence over foreign affairs, and the area of influence over foreign matters was much circumscribed. The testimony of SHIDEHARA has shown how powerless he was to influence the decision of the policy where war questions were involved.

35670 After the beginning of the China Incident, there was strong opinion in the military that the Foreign Ministry be restricted, as far as possible, and they established the China Affairs Board in order to deprive the Foreign Ministry of more and more of its responsibility. This is the main reason why UGAKI resigned his office. *The Foreign Minister was ignored in the taking of the most serious decisions affecting the national policy in the period leading up to the Pacific War.

In the spring of 1941, military currency had already been printed without consulting the Foreign Ministry, notwithstanding that it was to be used in foreign countries and such a consultation might have been expected. When in the third KONOYE Cabinet, KIDO called in the War and Navy Ministers, but not the Foreign Minister, and urged them to review the Imperial Conference decision of 6 September and to come to a common agreement.

35671 Under these conditions, TOGO was asked by TOJO to become Foreign Minister. Knowing these things and knowing that it was the strong stand of the army which had brought about the downfall the KONOYE Cabinet, TOGO went to some pains to be *assured that as Foreign Minister he would have scope for action. He told TOJO on 17 October he must first be informed of the situation which had brought about the fall of the KONOYE Cabinet. TOGO said that even if the army's stand was uncompromising, even on the stationing of troops in China, the negotiations would end in a breakdown. Since the continuation of negotiations would then be meaningless he would have to reject the proffered portfolio. He would enter only if the army consented to make allowances in reviewing the question of troop stationing and to re-examine the other questions -- that is if the army genuinely intended to facilitate negotiations on a rational basis. TOJO assured him that reconsideration of negotiations, including that of stationing troops in China, might *be undertaken.

35672 TOGO agreed to accept and joined the next day. TOGO did not know whether there was a clique centering around TOJO. However, he had only met TOJO twice before, once in 1935 and once in 1937 -- the latter time it was in Hsingking where they met among a group. They never had more than a bowing acquaintance. TOGO knew nothing of TOJO's personality or 35673 outlook and he believed that the same was true of TOJO's knowledge about him. He was not selected because of his personal relations with TOJO but because he assumed he was a senior in the Foreign Ministry eligible to the place. *He met DOHIHARA, HASHIMOTO, and HATA for the first time in Sugamo Prison, and KIMURA, MUTO, and SATO when he became Foreign Minister. The rest he had known for varying periods, but the only two who could be said to be more than official acquaintances were HIROTA and SHIGEMITSU. He met OSHIMA first in Berlin when he found him there as Military Attache.

35674 *TOGO also took over the Overseas Affairs Ministry and was minister there only until December 1941. He did not conduct any business of that Ministry and only went there three times, including the time he quit. The Ministry was operated by the Vice-Minister and TOGO was too busy with the Japanese-American negotiations to devote any attention to its affairs.

35675 He did not know prior to becoming Foreign Minister of the details of the American negotiations. He did not know of the Imperial Conference decision of 2 July,*which decisively changed the course of Japan's policy, and he had only vague knowledge of the 6 September decision and was not familiar with the 14 October cabinet meeting, which had made the fall of the KONOYE Cabinet inescapable. He, therefore, needed at the very outset to acquaint himself in detail with the negotiations, and he did so immediately upon assuming office. His chief reference data were the cables from Ambassador NOMURA and the copies of cables to NOMURA and the opinion of the Foreign Minister TOYODA.

35676 His first impression upon examining this material was that while Japan basically had been trying to secure the stability of the Far East, taking into consideration actual conditions resulting from events, the United States had not been paying regard to these conditions and had brought negotiations to a stalemate. Also Japan had made considerable concession in order to settle the China Incident but the two nations could be said to be further apart by October than in April. This was due to the United States having taken progressively stronger stand from about June. It was generally understood in Tokyo that an agreement had been reached with the United States on two of the three basic questions. TOJO had told TOGO this and it, therefore, appeared that there remained only one large point of contention -- the stationing of troops in China.

*Since the second KONOYE Cabinet, the negotiations had been managed in the Liaison Conference. This Conference, which had no standing as a constitutional organization, dated from the first KONOYE Cabinet, when it was necessary to establish liaison between the High Command and the Cabinet. Its decisions had in a formal sense no weight. Since the decisions were treated as binding on those present, in practice they had great weight. The Vice-Chiefs of Staff were always in attendance *and since two of the three secretaries were military men, the military influence was strong.

35678

The establishment of the conference is proof that the military were not only interfering in politics but exercising such influence as to control and direct national policy, and coordination was needed. While the military exercised great influence on affairs of state, the civilians exercised very little or none on military matters and had no knowledge of military operations. Decisions of the conference had to be presented to the Cabinet and in some cases to an Imperial Conference and in almost no instance did the decision fail to pass.

35679

Drafts were always prepared beforehand and examined by the staffs of the ministries concerned and coordinated by the three secretaries before *submission. The matters were thus known in advance and this facilitated approval by the Cabinet. In accordance with custom at Imperial Conferences, the decisions were made by the Premier, with the Foreign Minister reporting only on the diplomatic negotiations.

Immediately after the new Cabinet was formed, the Liaison Conference was held almost continuously reconsidering Japanese policy and its adjustment to Japanese-American negotiations.

35680 One must bear in mind the state of opinion in Japan. The United States, Great Britain, and the Netherlands had severed economic relations with Japan in July and were known to be strengthening their measures cooperation directed against Japan, making it appear that those nations *regarded war as highly probable.

Japan was then fighting with China and it was unthinkable for any cabinet to ignore all of the changing conditions which had resulted from the years of warfare in China as the United States was demanding. No Japanese, including those most strongly opposed, felt they should do so. The strong policy advocates were already declaring with finality that there was no prospect of settlement with the United States and that measures of self-defense be taken without further loss of time.

35680 * TCGO stated that it was his desire to bring the negotiations to a successful consummation not only for Japan, but for the world. From the 35681 outset it was clear * that the military had strong views, but TOGC believed there was a prospect of saving the situation and insuring peace and a settlement of benefit to both countries. Since all matters were handled in the liaison conference, the foreign ministry was restricted in foreign affairs to that which was approved by the high command in the liaison conference. One of the first steps that TOGO took to further U. S. negotiations was to remove from his ministry a number of officials who urged a strong policy toward Britain and the U. S. and tried to guide foreign policy in an unsound direction, going to the extent of conspiring with the radical elements of the armed services to achieve this. This had gone so far that many moderates, who were in the majority, shrank from expressing their views and their influence was declining, which disturbed 35682 * the sound foreign policy and would have a bad effect on the negotiations. TOGC determined to eliminate the radicals, and instructed NISHI to carry out the purge. As a result foreign ministry discipline was restored to where they could exert all efforts for success of negotiations without internal dissention.

At the first meeting of the liaison conference on October 23, Chief of Staff SUGIYAMA emphasized the need of hastening a decision. He stated that the September 6 decision was that during the month of September diplomacy should have primary emphasis and military preparations be subordinated, but from the beginning of October military operations were 35683 to be primary and diplomacy secondary. * TCGO soon found that despite the understanding that the September 6 decision would be reexamined, the high command acceleration of military preparations and its strong stand on conditions for negotiations were an obstacle to the negotiations. The only change in membership of the liaison conference besides TCGC was the addition of KAYA and SHIMADA. There is a momentum that must be reckoned with in such a case. Those that had been members of the conference longer had greater influence than the newcomers, and they were unable to free themselves from past history. In reexamining the September 6 decision, they took the decision as a basis and studied possible revisions, and they had a strong feeling that it should not be easily changed. At the very first meeting, vice-chief of staff General TSUKADA was even more pessimistic and intransigent. He saw no possible prospect of a successful 35684 outcome, * and since Britain and U. S. had ruptured economic relations and strengthened encirclement of Japan, relations should be broken off at once and action taken in self-defense. TOGO opposed this vigorously, insisting that if there was a way of breaking the deadlock it must be tried, and he declared that since there is room to try them it would be an error to be over-hasty in taking military action now. In order to reconcile these conflicting viewpoints, the studies went on daily, sometimes throughout the night into the next morning. Debate often developed into heated argument, and no effort was spared for minute and careful discussion.

* There were three major points of difference between the two governments--the Tripartite Pact, the non-discriminatory access to trade in China, and stationing of troops in China. It appeared from NOMURA's report that the first two had reached a point of understanding where agreement could be readily reached. TOGO concentrated his efforts to persuade the liaison conference to agree to further concessions on the stationing of troops in China so that agreement could be reached with the U. S. His study convinced him that they would have to make further advance toward the U. S. position, and the best method of approach was to adopt as a basis the conditions which TOYODA had regarded as offering the possibility of agreement, then try to get agreement on new proposals. He therefore worked to get agreement by the conference upon a program developing those points. There was then a wide gulf between the two parties, * and it was agreed by all that it would require a radical, even revolutionary change in the U. S. attitude in order to settle on the basis of the minimum demands in the September 6 decision.

From the beginning, a majority in the conference opposed adoption of the principle of withdrawal of troops from specified areas of China, and TOGO had to fight unceasingly for it. The army insisted on the need of indefinite stationing in specified areas. As a result of TOGO's strong contention that it was improper and disadvantageous to station troops indefinitely, the others relaxed to the extent of agreeing to put a time limit on the stationing, but strong opinions were still presented. He first proposed the TOYODA time limit of five years, but could obtain no support, and then suggested eight and ten years, without success. Some in the conference suggested 99 years or 50 years. Finally 25 years was agreed upon as an approximate limit.

35687

* Proposal A did not mention the 25 year period, but limited the time to a necessary period. It was felt that the whole negotiations would be upset if debate over details were injected. The approximate goal was given to NOMURA, to be used in case of inquiry by the U. S., but TOGO had a private talk with TOJO and reached an understanding that if the U. S. was receptive still further moderation might be considered. TOGO succeeded in getting agreement to limit the stationing of troops in the geographical sense by having excluded from the areas where troops would be stationed the Shanghai triangular zone, Amoy and others. This was achieved only after a struggle, because some of the military and naval authorities believed that they should retain the right to station troops in all points specified in the 1940 treaty between Japan and Wang Ching-wei.

35688

A related problem was French Indo-China. * TOYODA's proposal was that there should be no further increase of troops, in view of apprehension of the U. S. over the threat of Japan's military advance to the south with Indo-China as a springboard. TOGO succeeded in prevailing upon the army to agree, that upon reaching an agreement with the U. S., all troops would be immediately withdrawn from Southern FIC, a concession greater than that proposed by TOYODA. Here, too, the opposition was strong, and TOGO won his point only by threats to resign if he was not given this much scope for diplomacy.

35689 This required a great deal of arduous work, because despite the fact that they had wiped the slate clean, it was impossible to ignore the past course of affairs, and the limitation imposed by the September 6 decision on diplomatic action still subsisted, at least the part which was a fait accompli, that the period up to the middle of October had passed, * and increased military preparations had given rise to a feeling that Japan would not be defeated in war. This was a great obstacle to reexamining the decision and determining the conditions of negotiations. While he had expected the army's position to be strong, he was astonished in view of the history of the matter to find from discussions toward the end of October that the navy was scarcely less strong. On October 30, in view of this, he sent a representative to Admiral OKADA, whom he thought had much influence in naval circles, to tell him of the situation and to have him use his influence to moderate the navy stand.

35690 With these efforts TOGC succeeded in obtaining consent to proposals A and B, which were approved by the Imperial Conference of the 5th. The plan of the two proposals was his own idea, subject to modifications mentioned. In the form adopted they represented the utmost concessions which could be wrung from the military. * Another question which was never absent was the one of what Japan's policy should be if the negotiations failed in the end. This question first became explicit at the all-night session of November 1-2, where TOGC insisted on avoiding war. It seemed of paramount importance to avoid war at almost any cost. He knew what modern warfare meant to the people of the country, and he felt that by only sound, steady, development, avoiding sudden expansion or war, could a nation progress. He therefore insisted if negotiations failed, war need not follow, but they should exercise patience and forbearance and await a change.

35691 The military insisted that Japan must fight sooner or later, for * the reason that Japan's dependence on imports of supplies, especially petroleum, was so great that with economic blockade gradual exhaustion of resources was apparent, and if after the stockpiles had fallen to a minimum additional pressure was applied by the U. S. and Britain relative to China or other problems, Japan would have no alternative but complete submission without being able to fight. A suggestion had been made that they should continue with economic relations ruptured, relying on production of synthetic oil. TOGC concurred in this, but the planning board's opinion was that there could be no reliance on this, since the production of iron and coal was insufficient, and their use to manufacture petroleum would be at the sacrifice of other vital industries. The board also felt that it would be four or five years before annual production of four million tons could be attained.

35692 While the overwhelming opinion of the conference * was that there might be a possibility of the situation turning in Japan's favor if it exercised patience and watched the development of affairs until the spring of 1942, in view of the gradual exhaustion of stockpiles and the operational disadvantages with delay, the prospect of negotiations must be definitely ascertained while the situation was still favorable to Japan, and if they failed they must go to war without loss of time.

It was felt that the U.S. was conducting negotiations only to gain time and it was disadvantageous to Japan. The Army High Command expressed confidence in victory. The Navy High Command felt confident of initial success, but felt that the situation after a year and a half would depend on the general strength of the country and the international situation and *they could establish an impregnable position if they occupied strategic points in the south; and that they would lose the opportunity of success unless they went to war immediately if negotiations failed. They therefore determined the steps to be taken in case of failure of negotiations. Since TOGO knew that it would be a long war, he thought it shortsighted to depend on good prospects at the outset. He told that he knew of the determination and indomitable spirit of the American and British people, and by going to war with them they would be inviting disaster to their country. He specifically asked the War and Navy Ministers for their views on the overall prospect of a war.

TOJO replied that the prospects were certain that there would be victory in the war as a whole. SHIMADA said there was no need for pessimism; and NAGANO stated* that the navy had every confidence in being able to carry out interceptive operations, and that if the U.S. fleet should go north from the Central Pacific the Japanese Navy could and would destroy it around the Mandated Islands. * As a result, the majority agreed that if the negotiations failed Japan would decide on war, but TOGO was not satisfied, and was not willing to concur in the proposal. Therefore, following that, the conference of November 1-2, despite the pressure for immediate decision, KAYA and TOGO requested that they be given the night to think over the matter before giving their votes.

35695

TOGO deliberated that night, and while he felt less than full credit should be given to the assurances of the military, he could not refute their arguments, having no accurate data with which to judge the armed forces of Japan or Japan's national strength in other fields. All of his arguments from the international point of view had been fully considered. He had pointed out the vast material and spiritual strength of the Allies, and told them that no great expectation could be expected from Germany. * He concluded that he was in no position to refute them or disprove their factual basis, but had to take them on trust. The only question was whether he could bring about a change in the situation by his resignation. As a result, on the morning of November 2 he called on HIROTA for advice, explained the general situation and told him how serious the question of U.S. relations were and that there was a great danger of war despite the resolution to succeed by diplomacy. He asked HIROTA whether he could bring about a change by his resignation. HIROTA was opposed. He pointed out that if a supporter of war were immediately appointed foreign minister, TOGO should remain in office to do all he could to maintain peace. In the meantime NISHI reported that KAYA had concurred in the decision of the majority.

35697 * It seemed to TOGO that there was nothing to do but agree, and he called on TOJC and so told him. He took the occasion to obtain TOJO's agreement to several suggestions. One was that if the U. S. was receptive to either proposal, TOJO would support TOGO in obtaining reconsideration of the maximum concessions for the sake of success. TOJO also confirmed the agreement which TOGO had from the High Command, that if negotiations were successfully concluded, military operations would be suspended and the original status would be restored. TOGO told TOJC that he would continue the negotiations on the basis of the two proposals, resolving that if they did end in failure he might resign. The proposals were reported to the cabinet, TOGO explaining how they had been decided at the liaison conference. They were approved by the cabinet and the Imperial Conference on November 5.

35698 * TOGO felt that if the U. S. was willing to understand Japan's position and show a spirit of reciprocity, the deadlock might be broken by agreement on the general lines of Proposal A. However, the matter had reached such a stage that the settlement of all problems at once was likely to be difficult and sure to be impossible if America continued its insistence. To avert a crisis by agreeing on most urgent matters needing immediate solution, he had prepared Proposal B. The intention of this was by restoring conditions to somewhat normal relations to create a calm atmosphere they could remove the imminent threat of war.

The negotiations based on the new proposal began on November 7. The liaison conference continued its deliberations. It would be a happy solution if the impasse could be broken by the new proposals, but in the light of the U. S.' past attitude there was not sufficient expectation 35699 * to justify abandoning further study of what should be done in the event of failure. The liaison conference therefore treated not only the conduct of the negotiations, but measures to be taken in case of failure.

Just a little before this, TOGO discovered that the conditions of the negotiations were not quite what they had all thought. The longer he studied the files the less evidence he could find of anything tangible to support the belief that the Tripartite Pact and China trade questions had been all but settled, and he finally inquired directly of NOMURA. NOMURA answered to the effect that reports had not been quite correct. This made the prospect of settlement even more remote, though TOGO felt that his proposals were fair and reasonable and hoped the U. S. could recognize this. It was at this time that he sent KURUSU to assist NOMURA, with the motive of having in Washington an experienced career diplomat.

35700 Since NOMURA * had specifically requested KURUSU be sent, and since KURUSU and TOGO believed in the importance of maintaining good relations with the U. S., KURUSU was a natural choice. On November 3, TOGO requested him to accept and he did.

TCGO outlined the situation to him for early settlement with war being unavoidable if they failed, and requested him to convey this to NOMURA and to cooperate that they do their best to succeed, which KURUSU promised. There was the question of the time limit. From the beginning of November the High Command had urged in the conference the need from operational consideration that it should be ascertained promptly whether the negotiations would succeed, and they stated strongly that it must be made clear during that month. They needed to make operational preparations on the assumption that military action would begin from the beginning of December should war become unavoidable.

35701 TOGC argued against a time limit, * stating that it would hinder diplomacy and would prevent successful conclusion of the negotiations, but he was overruled. This time limit imported additional difficulty, and it was because of this that the so-called deadline was set in instructions to the embassy.

35702 * Military preparations had been made continuously since September 6, but as they were operational secrets no information was given to the liaison conference. Civilian cabinet members were never informed of preparations, and never knew that the fleet had assembled and sailed from Hitokappu Bay, or that the Southern Army Headquarters had been formed and TERAUCHI named as commander. TOGC first knew of the sailing of the fleet after the end of the war, from newspapers. He never knew that the first target of military operations was Pearl Harbor, from any source. He personally assumed the Philippines and Malaya would be the first targets, since there had been some mention in early November by the High Command of the time required to occupy these places and a remark by the Navy High Command that they were confident of victory in battle with the American 35703 fleet when it came near Japan. * He never dreamed the navy would attack Pearl Harbor. The navy always spoke of luring out the American fleet and destroying it near the Mandated Islands.

Proposal A did not gain American acceptance or arouse any interest. After obtaining consent of the liaison conference, Proposal B was presented on November 20. Conditions at first appeared promising, and when American newspapers reported on the probability of a modus vivendi being concluded they assumed it was on the basis of Proposal B. On this assumption TCGO sent to the Embassy the instructions for the amount of oil which would be requested when agreement was reached. The figure adopted was much less than originally suggested by the Army General Staff, and owing to TOGO's insistence was nearly equivalent to the average of imports over several years.

35704 On November 26, Hull * handed his ten-point proposal. The cable summarizing this was received on the 27th. Almost simultaneously TCGO received another cable from the ambassador recommending a procedure for settling, by having Roosevelt send a personal message to the Emperor and await reply, after which Japan would propose the neutralization of FIC, Thailand, and NEI. They requested that KIDO be consulted on this.

35705 These suggestions raised many difficult and complicated questions. Only after many heated discussions and threat of resignation had TCGC been able to obtain the military consent to the withdrawal of troops from Southern FIC. Under the circumstances it was impossible to secure a decision for withdrawal from all Indo-China without an assurance of solution of questions of the Chinese peace, freezing of assets, and others. * The recommendation made no mention of the possibility of the rescission of freezing of assets, which was deemed absolutely necessary by Japan, nor of the U. S. readiness to mediate for peace with China, which had been a fundamental reason for stationing troops in FIC. It was clear that the ambassadors had no confidence in the success of this procedure after receiving Hull's note, for in the telegram after receiving the note they reported that there was no prospect of reaching an agreement and advised measures to be taken in case freedom of action was resorted to.

35706 * On the 27th there was a liaison conference regarding Hull's note. The reaction of all was the same. The U. S. had served what was viewed as an ultimatum containing demands far in excess of her former strongest positions. They felt that the U. S. had no hope or intention of agreeing to a successful settlement, for it was plain and it must have been plain to them that the document demanded as the price of peace total surrender by Japan to the U. S. position. Japan was not only to abandon all the gains of her sacrifices, but to surrender her position as a power in the Far East, which would have been national suicide. The only other way to face the challenge and defend Japan was war.

35707 On the 28th TCGC called on TOJO before the cabinet meeting * and talked over with him and SHIMADA the ambassador's recommendations and the Hull note. Though both of them should have been familiar with the ambassador's report, since copies of all important cables were automatically routed by the foreign to the war and navy ministries and the general staff, TOGO explained the contents to them. Both TOJO and SHIMADA felt that there was no hope of a solution by the means proposed. TCGC left before the end of the cabinet meeting, to be received in audience. Upon being received, he explained to KIDO about the Hull note, and talked with him on the recommendation.

35708 KIDO was discouraged by the note, and felt that the recommendation was insufficient to save the situation. He stated that even if its * conditions were adopted as a basis for settlement, the result might be civil war. TCGC promised to convey his opinion to NOMURA. The plan was not reported to the Emperor because there was no one to take responsibility for it, since the government and his chief adviser were against it. NOMURA was instructed accordingly that the recommendation was not regarded as appropriate for adoption at the time.

Page

TCJO, having received a report from NCMURA that the State Department had made public the development of negotiations, and that the U. S. press was saying that the decision for peace or war was in Japan's hands, they felt that America was expecting war. TCGO now considered resigning again. He had always intended to resign if he could further a settlement. Conditions were basically different from the time he had first considered resigning, and there * was little likelihood that a change of foreign ministers could affect the situation. He asked advice of former foreign minister SATO, who was much interested in success of negotiations, whether he could change the policy by forcing a change of cabinet and avoid war. SATO advised against resignation, saying there was no possibility, as did others. TCGO felt that his resignation would be useless. because prior to this the question had been one of wringing from the military authorities agreement which would lead to a compromise of the positions of the two sections, and by resignation he might have been able to force a change of government in favor of one able to take a stronger stand against the military.

35709

It now appeared that no concession would avail to reach an agreement with the U. S. The U. S. was no longer, if ever, interested in a compromise. It was now patent to everyone a question of the self-defense of Japan. There was only the * faintest hope of a diplomatic settlement, and this was based on the possibility of U. S. reconsideration. His resignation would not have assisted but would have only been an escape from responsibility. TCGO decided to stay and work on for every last chance to avoid war, and if war broke out to bring it to its earliest possible termination.

35710

Earlier, TCGO had felt that war need not be the consequence of failure of negotiations, but he had been overruled, and submitted. Now there was a far broader question. Japan's existence was at stake, and he was compelled to agree that they must wage war unless the U. S. reconsidered. At the conference of November 27 everyone had agreed, and there was no dissenting voice against war. The meeting adjourned with the decision to present the recommendation to an imperial conference. * This decision, after cabinet consent, was presented to the imperial conference of December 1 and approved, with the general feeling that Japan had no alternative.

35711

On the 29th there was an Elder Statesmen's meeting. There was a morning meeting and an afternoon audience with the Emperor. At the morning meeting, explanations were made by TCJO and other cabinet ministers. TCJO spoke of the reasons compelling Japan to resort to war, and TCGO confined his talk to the negotiations. WAKATSUKI and HIRATA alone made inquiries, which TCJO answered fully. No one expressed the view that the American proposal should be accepted. At the afternoon meeting, in the presence of the Emperor, KANAME stated that he was fully informed of negotiations and approved the government's efforts. He agreed there was no hope in view of the latest U. S. proposal, * but wondered if there was no way to avert war.

TCJC stated that the matter had been considered again and again, and the conclusion was that there was no other course than war. On December 1, the actual decision to begin was made by the Imperial Conference. All members of the cabinet, chiefs and vice-chiefs of the armed forces, chief cabinet secretary, directors of military and naval affairs bureau, and the president of the Privy Council were present. TCJC again made his explanations, as did TCGC. Other explanations were given by other cabinet ministers and the high command. The agreement was unanimous on the need of going to war.

35713 Even with the formal decision taken to go to war there remained some faint hope of reaching a solution through diplomacy. Japan had nothing new to offer, * but there was the possibility that if they took a strong stand and showed no intention to yield, the U. S. would repent and be willing to make a peace with honor for both sides and reconsider. TCJC urged the ambassadors to do what they could to get American reconsideration, and report to the conference. Prior to the decision he had instructed the ambassadors not to let negotiations lapse, which would have insured war. Because of this he is now charged with deceit and perfidy and keeping a pretence to gain time to cloak the military preparations. On Japan's side it was never a question of gaining time, but he had the constant struggle to prevent precipitate action by the military high commands. This struggle had existed all through the 35714 negotiations. Even when war had been actually decided * he would have been a traitor to his profession had he not tried to take advantage of the last hope for a peaceful settlement. He had already obtained a commitment of the High Command that if an agreement could be reached, all military plans would be cancelled.

35715 There remained an important question of procedure of how and when to notify the U. S. of the beginning of hostilities. This question came up at the first liaison conference following the Imperial Conference. TCGC asked when operations would commence, and SUGIYAMA stated "about next Sunday". TCGC said it would be appropriate to follow the usual procedure in notification, which he assumed would be done as a matter of course. He was met by the statement of NAGANO, that the Navy wanted a surprise attack, and the demand by ITC that the negotiations be left untruncated so that war could be started with the maximum possible * effectiveness. TCJC rejected this, stating it was contrary to usual practice and improper, and would be disadvantageous because when war came to an end Japan must think of its national honor and repute against the day of peace. He had received a telegram from Washington actually discussing this point and asking that notification be made in Washington. He quoted this to the meeting to show the suggestion was the natural and normal one and that notification was absolutely necessary. However, NAGANO continued to contend that if they were to go to war they must win. No one supported TCGC. This is probably why no one now remembers this altercation.

35716 * TOGO was disgusted with the navy, and took the initiative to adjourn the conference without decision. ITO immediately pleaded with * him to understand the navy's difficult position, and suggested that if a notice must be given it be given to the U. S. ambassador in Tokyo. TCGC refused, and there was no agreement. TOGO felt that the navy would have to agree to giving somewhere a notification of termination.

35717 * At the noon conference ITC announced that the Navy had no objection to delivering a notice, and requested that it be delivered at 12.30 p. m. December 7, Washington time, and no one opposed. TCGC asked whether this would leave sufficient time before the attack, and ITO said it would, and it was so agreed. TCGC felt that he had succeeded in stopping the navy's demand, but only at the ultimate limit of international law. Since the trial, the Navy has taken the line that nothing was ever further from their intention than to mount a surprise attack against the U. S. It is * clear that TCGC's testimony is in conflict with that of other defendants. TCGC had fought throughout his life for what he thought was right, and he determined to the best of his ability and recollection to tell the truth, neither evading responsibility which is his nor accepting that which others would transfer to him.

35718 * TCGC stated that he was no scholar of international law, but he had made some study, and in December 1941 he saw the matter as follows. He felt that the matter was one of self-defense--clearly so under the broad interpretation of the scope of the right of self-defense laid down by the U. S. in the negotiations--and he was aware that there was opinion that a war of self-defense required no declaration. He knew that when Hague III was considered, the American delegate specifically stated that the U. S. policy invested the president with the power to exercise self-defense at any time and place, and the U. S. did not apparently regard the convention as applicable in such case, as could be seen from the punitive expedition sent to Mexico in 1916. He also knew that Kellogg, in his 35719 * note to nations participant in the Kellogg-Briand Pact, had said that the right of self-defense was above treaty provisions; but since international agreements did provide for the giving of notice normally, TCGC thought it better that that course be followed even where it may be superfluous rather than that there should be any question of Japan's good faith.

The notice which they did serve was not in terms a declaration of war. He considered it a notice of termination of negotiations, to be sufficient and in compliance with international law. They regarded the Hull note as an ultimatum, since it offered to Japan the alternatives of abject surrender or war. Japan's answer rejecting it, they felt, was sufficient, and in effect a declaration of war.

35720 In any view, it appeared to him to be tantamount to a declaration of war. The expression * that the earnest hope of Japan to preserve and promote the peace of the Pacific had finally been lost, clearly indicated that peace was ended. He did not feel that the document would have been made any more a declaration of war by including in it stock phrases such as "a state of war exists between our countries" or the reservation of "freedom of action" which OKA states he proposed and TCGO never saw or heard of. This would have only emphasized the obvious.

The note was more plainly a declaration of war than the ultimatum contemplated by Hague III. So far as he remembered, there is a universal opinion among scholars that no special form of words is necessary, but any language which unequivocally expressed the intention was sufficient.

35721 Over and above all difficult questions, it had been unmistakably clear in Japan that rupture of the negotiations would lead to war, and * he had no doubt that it was so understood in the U. S. They thus drew the notice in the form of a breaking off of negotiations, which the liaison conference had authorized, and which was drawn in the full confidence that it would be understood as a full declaration of war.

35721 *Except for the final part the draft of the final note was drawn in the days after the United States' note 26th. It was written by the American Bureau and its contents were dictated by the Liaison Conference. After drafting the note was revised on the basis of opinions of Army and Navy officials. The draft note as eventually agreed on was given to the members of the conference on December 4 and approved and it was approved by the Cabinet on the 5th.

35722 On the afternoon of December 5, General TANABE and Admiral ITO called on TOGO * and ITO stated that the High Command wanted to postpone delivery until 1 o'clock. TOGO feared that the time between notice and attack might be made too short and asked the reason for the change. ITO said it was due to his own miscalculation. TANABE said the Army would commence operation after the Navy. When TOGO asked how much time was needed he was told the plan was secret and could not be disclosed. He then wanted to know if there was adequate time before the attack and upon receiving ITO's assurance, he agreed. ITO, on leaving, stated that the note should not be sent too early but TOGO said the note had to be sent to insure delivery to its destination at the time fixed. The agreement to change the time was reported to the conference by ITO on the 6th. It was approved. At the same meeting NAGANO said that this was a very important note and should be delivered to * Hull personally. TOGO promised to do this if at all possible.

35723 TOGO states that he knew that the Hague Conference had fully debated and rejected a proposal to fix a definite time for advance notice. Since many scholars had stated that one minute's notice was sufficient, he was assured that if a period of one hour were allowed, it would comply with requirements. He sought out legal opinions of others. He requested the opinion of Dr. TACHI, Japan's most learned law scholar and he discussed the matter with Dr. NAGAOKA who is a member of the Secretariat of the Hague Peace Conference and a judge of the Permanent Court. He done this when he was Councillor in Berlin. * Both were of the opinion that he was correct in his beliefs that a war of self defense required no notice and that a notice, not matter how short was necessary.

With respect to the Kellogg Pact, TOGO had worked on it and was familiar with its history and meaning. He assumed that Kellogg's explanations and the various reservations made before ratification on self-defense clearly meant that the Pact was not applicable in the case of the war against the United States and Britain.

* After the note had been approved, TOGO instructed that it be cabled to Washington in good time together with instructions to make all preparations for its delivery at the time agreed. Everything possible was done in Tokyo to insure proper delivery and delay was not caused deliberately or negligently by anyone in Tokyo. TOGO learned from American radio broadcasts that there had been mismanagement in Washington, that the attack on Pearl Harbor took place about twenty minutes after the time that the note should have been delivered. A few days after the war, ITO explained and TOGO protested and stated that he saw no reason for the Navy to have objected in the first place. ITO's reply was evasive and to the effect that he was sorry for TOGO that they had cut it too fine. Shortly after the war had begun, in a conversation with TOJO, this matter came up. Both TOGO and TOJO were dismayed and displeased with the report because of its propaganda value. TOJO queried how such a delay could have taken place and wondered if the United States was responsible. TOGO replied that he did not believe that and that they would have to wait for NOMURA's return to make inquiry. TOGO gave instructions to the Chief of the Cable Section to make investigation when the Embassy Staff returned. When the Staff returned on August 20, 1942, he again ordered an investigation without delay. A few days later he became busy with the Great East Asia Ministry and resigned on 1 September without receiving a report that the investigation was made.

The pamphlet, Exhibit 1270 introduced by the Prosecution was prepared without TOGO's direction or knowledge. He did not see it while Foreign Minister and it was unnecessary for him to seek justification for an incident in violation of his orders. The preface of the pamphlet shows that it was wholly unofficial and reports the individual opinions of those who prepared it.

TOGO first learned the contents of the Roosevelt message of December 7 to the Emperor about 12:30 when Grew called. They had heard that the message was on the way but TOGO had made inquiry and learned nothing. Grew stated he had an important message being decoded * and would call as soon as it was finished. He called after midnight and told of the President's message and asked that an audience be arranged. Since it was after midnight, it could not be said when it could be granted and Grew left a copy of the message with TOGO. TOGO wanted a translation and since it was important, he called the Imperial Household Minister, Mr. MATSUDAIRA and told him that a message had come through Grew, that Grew wanted an audience with the Emperor and asked him how he should proceed. MATSUDAIRA told TOGO that he should talk to KIDO as the matter was political.

TOGO called KIDO who suggested that he consult TOGO and stated that the Emperor would receive TOGO even at such a time. At 1:50 TOGO called on TOJO and TOJO said the message would do no good. TOGO started for the palace at 2:30 arriving there at 2:40. He met KIDO for a few minutes telling the contents of the telegram and was received in audience at 3:15 where he reported the matter and received the Emperor's answer and returned home.

The next morning Grew called around 7:30. TOGO had made arrangement to see him at 6 but they were reported delayed by difficulty in telephonic connections. TOGO gave Grew the Emperor's answer and a copy of Japan's final note. Since the war had already started, Grew never formally delivered the President's message to the Emperor. Before the interview, TOGO had heard the radio broadcasts on the beginning of the war and that the attack on Pearl Harbor had been made on the 6th and assuming that Grew had the information, he did not mention the state of war but only expressed appreciation for Grew's efforts and TOGO's regrets of the events. * TOGO stated he had no motive for deceiving Grew since commencement of hostilities had been published to the world.

Craigie visited TOGO at 8 at TOGO's request, the visit being later than planned. TOGO gave him a copy of the final note and informed him of the end of negotiations. He thanked him for his services. He thought that both interviews were understood to be final greetings.

35731 With respect to the delay of the President's telegram, TOGO had no knowledge at the time. The testimony shows that they were delayed by the Minister of Communications at the request of the Army, but neither TOGO nor the Foreign Minister were consulted and he had no knowledge that the delay was being carried on. * He heard from NOMURA that the message had been sent and had inquired from NOMURA about it and had his subordinates inquire at the Imperial Household lest it be directed to the Emperor personally but had no message until Grew reported.

35732 With respect to the non-service on Britain, TOGO stated that the decision to deliver notification in Washington precluded the delivery of a declaration of war in London. There was reason to expect that the course chosen would be equally effective. In the latter negotiations, relations with Britain were naturally considered. The assumption ran that any agreement concluded with the United States would be joined in by the British, Dutch and Chinese or that there would be simultaneous settlements made. TOGO * from time to time inquired on this point in the U.S. and British Embassies and invariably received the answer that all such matters would be managed by the United States which would inform the other governments. He also knew of Churchill's speech of November 10 in which he promised that war between Japan and U.S. would be followed automatically with war with Britain. It was evident that any notice which might properly be given to the United States alone relying upon it to inform its associates with whom it acted as representative.

35733 With respect to the charge that he was taking part in the making of plans for war he described accurately his thoughts and intentions of the six or seven weeks of his foreign ministership.

* With respect to the consular reports of shipping from the United States, Indies and elsewhere addressed to TOGO in answer to matters which had gone out over his name, these were routine matters managed by subordinates. TOGO himself never had any knowledge of the subject except the routine was followed. None of the messages ever came to his attention.

With respect to the charge that the negotiations were continued as a sham inasmuch as Exhibit 2975 is one of the same type of a large number of the same type produced by the Prosecution in which it states that it was customary 35734 for low ranking officials to prepare without instructions various studies or drafts relating to current * questions, these do not represent the policy of the ministry. On a proper occasion, they would be presented to responsible officials who may adopt them, use them or reject them. It would be impossible for the Foreign Minister to know all these papers. He denied that he had ever seen or known Exhibit 2975. It was a fallacy to presume that a state minister should know of such documents simply because they were found in the files of his ministry.

35735 The no-separate peace agreement of December 11, 1941 was the most natural thing for a nation which expects or fears to find itself at war to take such measures as are prudent including the acquiring of as many allies as possible. There was nothing wrong about concluding an agreement during the last week before the outbreak of war. The probability of war * was very great and the agreement was a result of the desire to get assistance from nations who would be co-belligerents. TOGO's own view was that the actual assistance would be little. In his opinion the main effect would be the encouragement it gave the people by warding off the feeling of isolation. Until the receipt of the U.S. note, TOGO had refused Ott's repeated requests to give Germany any information on the development of the negotiations since it would be inconsistent with his desire to succeed. After war became unavoidable on November 30th, TOGO instructed the Ambassadors in Berlin and Rome to inform the accredited nations the outlines of the negotiation and to begin negotiation for a no-separate peace agreement. He wished to point out the absurdity of Ott's report * of December 5 that a leading official of the Foreign Ministry gave him such misinformation as he recites concerning Japan's intentions in connection with hostilities. No such official would have discussed the matter with Ott or anyone. Whoever told him as late as December 4 that the procedure for opening hostilities was under deliberation could not have been one of the few who knew the matter had been settled by the Liaison Conference. Ott was apparently taken in by gossip of some director who wished to appear to have important information on a matter in which he was misinformed or perhaps, Ott was indulging in his imagination.

35737 * TOGO stated that he had some connection with the Naval Disarmament Conference in 1932. He worked for the success of the General Conference on Disarmament. Later in 1935 and 1936 Japan's abrogation of the treaties and withdrawal from the London Conference took place while he was director of the European-Asiatic Bureau and he worked with the Navy officials concerned. The Navy submitted to him its draft instructions based on the upper common limit. Japan agreed to the ratio principle and made a proposal approving it at the General Conference in Geneva. TOGO opposed the common upper limit not only because it would make the agreement difficult but would give rise to suspicion in Japan's intentions and probably block a new treaty and enhance the danger of an armament race in war. There were heated discussions for two or three months and TOGO never agreed to the Navy proposal. * Since agreement could not be reached on the bureau-directors' level, the matter went to higher authorities. HIROTA adopted TOGO's view but was overruled and the Navy proposal became policy. Since his efforts had failed for quantitative disarmament, he continued to work for qualitative limitation and the exchange of information but Navy opposition prevailed. The Navy's stand was extremely strong and assertion was freely made that the question of naval strength was solely in the prerogative of the High Command and allowed for no outside intervention.

It is self-evident that the fortification of the Mandated Islands was carried on and the Foreign Minister had no part. The matter of the correspondence of this matter was the responsibility of the Treaty Bureau in which he never served. * and had no connection with it or knowledge of it. He was assured by the Treaty Bureau that the military authorities had assured them that they had no intention of violating the mandate and that there was no reason to disbelieve it. The Foreign Ministry, as the only branch of the government which dealt with other governments, was a mere channel of communication to which the League inquiries and the answers of the military and Navy authorities passed.

Diplomacy in war time was much restricted. There were no diplomatic relations with the U.S., Britain and Netherlands. Questions of war were uppermost with Germany and Italy and there remained only questions of relations with the Soviet, countries of East Asia and South America and the question of diplomatic preparation for the eventual restoration of peace.

35740 War intensified the condition not to pay regard to the diplomatic function. It seemed * that diplomacy was to be wholly neglected. At the time of the question of Japan's participation in the war against Russia came up when TOGO reported to the Emperor on the refusal of Germany's request for Japan to go to war against the Soviet and discussed with the Emperor the steps to be taken to insure that this was to be correctly conveyed to the German Government without military interference, the Emperor mentioned his desire for an early restoration of peace. TOGO then learned that the Emperor had expressed this desire to TOJO but neither TOJO nor KIDO had mentioned this to TOGO. Military operations were still kept secret including those which had any connection with foreign affairs. The Navy kept the defeat of Midway secret.

35741 Partly over this question and partly over the policy of directing the war, there was a disagreement of views early after the war began between TOGO and TOJO and some of the others. * The general atmosphere was one of over-optimism due to initial victories. TOJO believed it was going to be a long war of 10 to 20 years and it would take a long time for the United States to build its fighting power so she could undertake her counter-offensive before 1944. Instead of establishing an impregnable position they concentrated on strengthening the political situation of the government by securing election of government sponsored candidates for the Diet by spring of 1942 and by creating a Greater East Asia Establishment Council and tried to consolidate government authority by putting into effect measures such as those for reorganization of enterprise and reforming education. TOGO opposed these measures on the ground of prematurity and that long range plans should not be made in an emergency. As to the war, he felt that a large scale war of attrition could not last longer than five or six years and he insisted upon preparation for increase of production and stabilization of living. He collided with TOJO on the China question for which he frequently urged a fundamental policy. These differences developed into a head on clash and TOGO's resignation over the Greater East Asia Ministry question in September 1942.

While in office TOGO attempted to maintain the best relations possible with the Soviet. Maintenance of neutrality was the fundamental policy. Beyond that, however, from the beginning of the war he planned for its end and considered the most promising method was to try to bring about a Russo-German peace as a preliminary step. He did in 1942 bring such a plan in motion.

During his tenure the Manchukuo border was maintained in peace. * In January 1942 Manchukuo and the Mongolian People's Republic approved the work of the border-demarkation commission which had marked the Nomonhan area. Considering that this border was quite secure, TOGO often suggested to the Army that they could rely on his assurance that the Red Army could not invade Manchukuo even if the Japanese forces on the border should be decreased. He tried to avoid irritating the Soviet by persuading the military not to reinforce the Kwantung Army. He never knew the Kantokuen.

35744

There were some disputes at the beginning of the war with the Soviet growing out of restrictions upon Soviet vessels. The Foreign Minister paid careful attention to these forwarding to the Soviet all Naval replies on measures taken in answer to them. The Foreign Ministry took the initiative * in offering conveniences for rescuing and repatriating Soviet sailors and vessels and recompensating the Soviet for sunk vessels by transferring replacement vessels. No steps were taken towards disturbing transportation at Vladivostok with munitions from America despite German complaints.

35745

* Wartime relations with Germany and Italy were restricted so far as the Foreign Ministry was concerned. Events bore out his prophecy on the cooperation to be expected from their allies and it was never more than nominal. The war with Russia had cut rail communications with Germany and sea transportation became increasingly difficult until it was practically restricted to token exchanges of small supplies by submarine. TOGO at the time had no information about the extent of cooperation it being a military * matter. The German-Japanese attitude towards the Soviet illustrates the relations between the two countries. Germany express desire was that Japan join in the war and this request was renewed in July 1942. It was decided that Japan should refuse for the reason that she could not undertake a two-front war. This was communicated through Ott and OSHIMA. He never dreamed or participated in any plan for Japan for domination of the world together with Germany and Italy.

In October 1942 for the first time, he managed as his own responsibility affairs relating to China and Manchukuo. In 1929 he had visited Manchuria and had reported to the then Lord Keeper that they must cooperate with China and achieve truly cordial relations. In the intervening years the Manchuria and China incidents had occurred. He had nothing to do with it. * He had never done anything to secure the fruits of aggression committed there. He was never sympathetic to those incidents and he did what he could to prevent their occurrence and spread.

35748

It was extremely clear in 1941 that the China incident must be settled and he hoped he could achieve it. At the time the China Affairs Board had been in charge of all political, economic, cultural and other business of China and had its agencies throughout China. Negotiation with regional regimes in China were its affairs. The Affairs Board had opened a new and major phase of China relations. Its purpose was to remove from the Foreign Ministry the control and normal functions of a foreign office. The Foreign Ministry's liberal attitude was heresy to the militarists and they had the China Affairs * confided to a new organ under their control. The Foreign Ministry had jurisdiction only to diplomatic negotiations in the narrowest sense and matters pertaining to consulates. Relations of the Foreign Ministry were all but severed and the Ministry had lost its power to deal with affairs in China. It was true that TOGO was an ex officio vice-president but since the purpose of the creation of the body had been to destroy his authority, the influence of his vice-presidency was nothing. The business was conducted almost exclusively by the Director-General.

Manchurian affairs were confided to the Manchurian Affairs Board and TOGO had nothing to do with this body and had little to do with Manchurian affairs. His only connection was they maintained * embassies and consulates but the functions discharged through them were only negotiations with the Soviet on Manchukuo matters. The Ambassador was held ex officio by the Commander of the Kwantung Army and the Foreign Ministry did not control him.

35750

The governments of Manchukuo and Nanking cooperated with Japan in the war without entering it. Exhibits 1214 and 1219 are intercepts and are not the text originally sent. TOGO did not remember sending messages of such content, and the language does not sound like Foreign Office. Even if they were sent there is nothing inherently sinister as it is customary for diplomatic language and diplomatic instructions to use such terms as "to have the foreign government do so-and-so" etc. * Similar expression may be found in telegrams sent to Washington, London and Moscow.

At the time of the outbreak of the China Incident, TOGO was opposed. He was not then in charge of the China Affairs but he believed it was an urgent necessity to arrest the expansion of the incident. With HORINOUCI and ISHII he advised HIROTA that he should object to sending troops to China and the latter agreed but their efforts failed. Later he worked on the U.S. negotiations to arrive at an early settlement of the China Affair. During war he insisted upon this. In March 1942 the question of the war policy was discussed in the Liaison Conference and TOGO pointed out that in the domestic field * the increase of production and the securing of food and internationally, the preservation of Soviet peace and prompt solution of the China Affair were primarily and immediately important. He obtained agreement of the conference that the basic policy towards China be examined from all points of views but it was later reported by the High Command that there were many difficulties and no conclusion had been arrived at. The matter failed though he tried to press it again in the middle of July when Ambassador CTA returned from China and reported that Wang Ching-wei had suggested a general peace between Japan and China. TOGO had reported this to TOJO with a request for prompt examination of China policy.

As to the Philippines in January 1942 Japan declared her intention to grant them independence. * TOGO's motives in supporting this policy were to demonstrate that they had no territorial ambitions in the south and to remove an obstacle to peace with the United States by manifesting the same intention towards those islands as did the United States.

As to Indo-China, the only new thing was the military agreement of December 9, 1941 by the military authorities on the spot with which the Foreign Ministry had nothing to do.

Despite the Imperial Conference it was Japan's intention to avoid, if possible, war with NEI. Holland declared war against Japan because of close relations with the U.S. and Britain and the Dutch Navy was reported as carrying attacks against Japan's shipping. Japan was compelled to take hostile measures.

35753

The relations of Japan with Greater East Asia brought about TOGO's final break with TOJO and his resignation. * There was a fundamental difference in outlook. Japan was long recognized as having the position of a stabilizing force. Recently they had begun to expound the idea of a new order which originated in the concepts of bloc economy and Lebensraum. TOGO's policy was quite different. His policy was in establishing good and amicable relations based on mutual respect for sovereignty and economic relations. His principle was that Japan should assist the progress of East Asia realizing their prosperity and Japan's peacefully. His idea of mutual assistance excluded any policy of exerting control by force.

35754

* His speech of January 22, 1942 expressed these principles. This speech does not express any intention that Japan should annex or exploit any part of East Asia. It does state that such areas as are absolutely necessary for their defense of East Asia were to be grasped by Japan. This was a war time speech. Ott's distorted account has nothing to do with TOGO. In his speech he clearly said that the Co-prosperity Sphere should not be conceived as an exclusive thing and measures to exclude non-Asiatic states should not be taken.

35755

With respect to Exhibit 1333-A, if this document were actually drafted in the Foreign Ministry * it could only be drafted by some low official and TOGO never approved it or saw it, or heard of it. It is impossible that it should be adopted or proposed since it is inconsistent with TOGO's policy which was finally adopted by the Liaison Conference. After Japan occupied the Southern areas, the High Command proposed that for military administration the disposition of these territories should be determined. TOGO insisted that such matters be decided at that time but nothing was finally settled. TOJO agreed and it was finally decided by the Liaison Conference.

35756

The confirmation of his true attitude of that matter could be found in the matter of the Great East Asia Ministry. This matter first came up in May or June 1942. There were then only rumors that the Ministry was contemplated but gradually the scheme began to emerge. It appeared * that all outpost agencies in Greater East Asia would come under the control and supervision of the new Ministry excepting all matters of pure diplomacy, all political, economic and cultural affairs concerning foreign countries in the Greater East Asia areas would come under the new Ministry. The Manchurian Board, the China Affairs Board and the Ministry of Overseas Affairs were to be abolished. The avowed purpose of the plan was to place the countries under special treatment and to contribute to the war's objectives by carrying out a general mobilization of material power.

35757 The Ministry had been planned by the four Cabinet board presidents, principally by the Planning Board, and by the summer of 1942 there was considerable prospect of its realization. TOGO then talked about it with TOJO and told him there was no time to change administrative structure, the urgent necessity being to establish an undefeatable position. He opposed the plan * because it would, in practise, remove from the Foreign Ministry the essential part of Japan's diplomacy thus impairing its unity and would injure the pride of independent nations and make friendly cooperation impossible. TOJO promised to give it careful consideration.

35758 On August 29 HOSHINO called at TOJO's direction and handed TOGO a copy of the draft proposed for the new ministry to be submitted to the Cabinet on September 1. TOGO asked HOSHINO as to the meaning of "pure diplomacy" and HOSHINO explained that this meant protocol and formalities relating to treaties. The Foreign Minister would conduct all negotiations. * TOGO pointed out the impropriety and requested that the matter be postponed until the meeting of September 5 so that he could study it. HOSHINO returned stating that TOJO wanted the plan decided on September 1. On August 31 TOGO repeated his opposition and asked that it be postponed. TOJO refused. At the meeting of September 1 TOGO explained his opposition basing it on four grounds.

35758 * The first reason for TOGO's position was that Japan's foreign policy would be under two different ministries which would make it impossible to a unified and consistent diplomacy and neither ministry would be able to function properly. The second was that countries of East Asia * by being treated differently from other countries would be suspicious of Japan and their pride would be hurt. Such treatment is contrary to the spirit of respecting independence of others. Third, the plan meant the extension of the jurisdiction of the China Affairs Board which had caused ill feeling among the Chinese and would be a failure. Fourth, it was necessary to concentrate their efforts for emergency measures and it was no time to change the administrative structure. Against these assertions TOGO argued that East Asia countries had to be treated differently since their relations with Japan were like those of kin. SUZUKI contended that the China Affairs Board had not been a failure. TOGO disputed this. Other cabinet ministers expressed themselves but none supported TOGO. The meeting then recessed and during the recess TOJO asked for TOGO's resignation. TOGO refused * saying the rest of the cabinet should reconsider. TOGO considered it necessary from the view of general war guidance to persist in his stand.

Shortly thereafter KAYA called on TOGO to have him reconsider as did SATO and OKA, the latter stating that the plan was being supported by the army and navy and asked him to agree. TOGO again refused. SHIMADA came and stated that a change of cabinet was not desired by the Court and that he would work for a compromise if possible. TOGO presented his final plan of compromise. SHIMADA left but returned stating that TOJO would not accept. TOGO had never said he would resign but had been doing everything to attain his purpose. In view of the talk with SHIMADA he decided to and did tender his resignation, so as not to cause annoyance to the Emperor by complicating the matter.

35761 *As a result TOJO became Foreign Minister and the plan for the Greater East Asia Ministry was decided at the cabinet meeting of September 1st. It was intended that the new Ministry would begin as of October 1st but public opinion was aroused and the Privy Council did not begin examination of the plan until October 9th.

There was sharp argument between the Privy Council and the Government over the plan and the Privy Council suggested that the Government withdraw the proposal. But TOJO and his supporters refused. On October 24th the Examination Committee adopted the plan by a majority. In the full Privy Council there was much controversy but it was passed with two councillors dissenting. The Ministry was inaugurated November 1st.

35762 Later TOGO learned that with respect to the scope of pure diplomacy * the Government had decided to define it in the cabinet, leaving the regulations without any provision on this point and this had been explained to the Privy Council. Pure Diplomacy as defined by the cabinet was somewhat wider than the plan shown to TOGO when in the cabinet. This was due to opposition of the Foreign Ministry and the criticism of the Privy Council.

35763 * At the cabinet meeting of September 1st the civilian members had supported the ministry. TOGO learned that they were not necessarily opposed to him but were of the opinion that a cabinet change was to be avoided. TOGO had by that time come to the conclusion that the TOJO government intoxicated by victory was not paying serious consideration to the preparations for war. Some within the cabinet felt there was no need for diplomacy. In general the Government policies were being executed very superficially.

35764 TOGO considered the Ministry proposal an expression of such tendencies and it was his conviction that the cabinet should be replaced. However he could not change the current singlehanded but events were justifying his views and the road to defeat was already plainly marked. * TOGO remained in retirement until April 9, 1945 notwithstanding the fact that in his second term he was also minister for Greater East Asia, his connections with that ministry were very slight, partly because he was chiefly occupied with the problem of ending the war and because all authority over East Asiatic countries had by then been transferred to the military ministries. TOGO took the ministry because he wanted it abolished and he felt by holding the two portfolios concurrently he could let it die of inanition and did. He did nothing as Minister for Greater East Asia Affairs.

35765 The continuity of his attitude can be seen in the decisions of the Greater East Asia Ambassadors' Conference held in Tokyo on 23 April 1945,* decisions were in accord with his proposals and represented the guiding principle for establishment of the world order. These principles were political equality, avoidance of racial discrimination; respect for national independence and non-interference in domestic affairs; freedom for colonials; economic reciprocity and equality; exchange of cultures; prevention of aggression; establishment of international order by means of both regional and universal security systems. This does not differ essentially from the United Nations plan.

By the time he became Foreign Minister again in April 1945 there was almost nothing for the new ministry to do although its jurisdiction included matters about occupied areas, they were not matters of administration but only of aiding the army and navy which did administer, by training officials to be sent to the area.

*In Burma and the Philippines the military was in control both of military affairs and internal politics because they were deemed inseparably related to the war. While ambassadors managed diplomatic affairs they were interfered with by the military commanders. The same was true in Indo China where despite the difference in status the ambassador could not act against the military commander. The whole situation had so deteriorated that in most countries there were no longer functioning ambassadors. Burma had been partially reoccupied and the ambassador had escaped from Rangoon and they could not even learn about conditions. The Philippines had been lost. The various plans for the disposal of British Malay were never approved or known by TOGO during either of his terms. He had nothing to do with the changed conditions in FIC in March 1945. As a result of the change FIC came under the military authorities and the Embassy was closed and the ambassador returned to Japan in April.

From that time the new ministry had nothing to do with FIC. At the Ambassadors Conference the Thai Ambassador's resolution was adopted giving full support to the movement for independence in Annam, Cambodia and Luang Prabang. It was the unanimous desire that all peoples have their independence and this was in conformity with the policy of Japan. The same may be said as to the resolution relative to the status of the NEI. TOGO emphasized in July at the Supreme Council for Guidance of the War the need * for assisting the Indonesians to independence to show Japan had no territorial aspirations in that area.

With respect to POW the The Foreign Ministry's connection began in January 1942 when notes from the United States and Britain were received through the Swiss Government asking whether Japan would agree to reciprocal application of the Geneva Convention. Japan was not a signatory but TOGO felt that out of humanitarian consideration she should agree to apply it so far as reasonably possible. The decision was not his to make. The sum of responsibility for managing matters for POWS rested in the POW Management Bureau and POW Information Bureau. The former was a War Ministry Bureau there was no responsibility for its connection on the Foreign Ministry. The Information Bureau was one especially created by Imperial Ordinance in wartime.

When such special ordinance is made it is countersigned by the ministers who have responsibility in the matter. Ordinances establishing this bureau were countersigned by ministers of war and navy and not by the foreign minister. The war minister was the responsible authority. The inquiries were the allies were referred in the normal course by the Foreign Ministry Treaty Bureau to the War Ministry with the ministry empowered to decide. The answer was that Japan should undertake to apply the terms of the convention "mutatis mutandis" and it was therefore so applied. While the prosecution seems to think that by this answer Japan became bound by the convention * as though she had ratified it, TOGO assumed that Japan was binding itself to apply it so far as circumstances permitted.

"Mutatis mutandis" implied that in the absence of serious hindrances the convention would be applied. He also assumed that where the requirements of the Convention conflicted with domestic law the convention would prevail. If this was a misconstruction neither War nor Navy Ministry ever suggested any other interpretation nor did the War Ministry's reply suggest it.

TOGO took it for granted on the basis of past history those precedents would be followed. This also accounted for the fact that when allied protests were received he accorded less credit to them. He felt that the War Ministry would take all steps to correct all abuses if any existed.

*He desired to emphasize that the Foreign Ministry received and answered the protests and inquiries regarding POWS only as a channel of communication and not as the responsible agency. The answers were not prepared in the Ministry but were given by the Information Bureau. However the Ministry was the only place to which correspondence from other governments could come and from which answers could go. There was little question about POWS during TOGO's first term. He did recall the case of Hong Kong when early in 1942 EDEN made a speech charging atrocities after the capture of the city. TOGO then told TOJO that special attention should be paid to treating POWS kindly in order to preserve the name of the Japanese Army. TOJO sympathized with this and stated he would give due attention. Soon after TOGO was pleased to hear that EDEN had made a broadcast to the effect that the situation had improved.

35772

*A more active question in the first term was that of exchange of enemy nationals. It was TOGO's idea that not only diplomatic personnel but civilian internees should be liberated. This was difficult because it involved allocation of shipping bottoms and facilities and the high command was reluctant to agree, but only after considerable insistence by TOGO were the exchanges brought about. They succeeded in returning some thousands of enemy nationals from Japan, China, Manchukuo, FIC and Thailand.

During his second term the Japanese army's situation in the Philippines, Burma and other Southern districts deteriorated extremely. There was a large accumulation of POW matters on hand when he took office. As the Allies advanced in the South protests began to be lodged regarding the treatment of POWS and internees. In those * days due to the severe air raids the neutral protecting powers' ministers had removed to Karuizawa and communication was very difficult. Despite these difficulties under TOGO's instructions the foreign ministry transmitted the protests to competent authorities and conveyed all replies received. They often sent and received personal letters or sent officials to Karuizawa, exerting all efforts to meet the situation. There was never any negligence by the Foreign Ministry of its duty. The foreign Ministry despite that it had no power over POWS repeatedly requested authorities to accord fair and generous treatment to POWS.

*When on June 3 1945 the Swiss Minister handed the protests regarding atrocities at Palawan Island, TOGO personally called the matter to ANAMI's attention and urged him to grant fair and generous treatment in general to POW to which he consented. Despite this, conditions were such that providing satisfactory information was impossible. The military explained that as a result of Japan's defeat telegraphic communication was very difficult and often impossible and even when possible confusion on the front rendered investigation almost impossible. The foreign ministry having neither jurisdiction nor means of investigation could do nothing but convey communications. The foreign ministry received no information of the trial of allied fliers.

35775

*The foreign ministry under TOGO's direction constantly tried to ameliorate conditions and in some ways succeeded, particularly in Japan proper. It could not meddle with matters under the military and could only urge the military to be humane which it did. If only in self-interest this would have to be the position of the foreign ministry because it was responsible for its own nationals in enemy countries. The foreign ministry had nothing to do with the truth or falsity of the replies furnished by the Army or in a few cases by the navy to inquiries from enemy countries. TOGO had no personal contact with inquiries and answers, it being purely routine liaison work. No one in the foreign ministry could do more than forward the answers received. *It had no right to inspect camps and they could have done nothing had they reason to doubt the truth of the answers, which in absence of opportunity to inspect conditions, they did not have. TOGO's entry into the SUZUKI Cabinet had only one purpose - to end the war. His various efforts to bring the war to an earliest possible end were an extension into wartime of his opposition to the war in the first place.

35777

They began at once after December 8 1941. He did not share the optimism or the illusions of most Japanese and believed it would be difficult to overcome the fighting spirit and the industrial productivity of the allies. * From the Japanese point of view the war had to be ended quickly if it was not to end in complete disaster. He still believed that if it became a long drawn out war there would be no real victor but mutual exhaustion and world impoverishment.

January 1 1942 TOGO addressed an instruction to his staff to suggest this idea. He elucidated the inter-relationship between war and diplomacy. He stated that though the prevailing tendency was to neglect diplomacy, diplomacy would gain in importance as the war progressed. They should make preparations to end the war lest they failed to seize the chance when it did come. TOGO thought there was some chance to end the war by a Russo-German peace which might begin the movement toward general peace.

When he conversed with the Soviet Ambassador * in February, he told him that the relations between Japan and the Soviets were like a bright spot in a troubled stormy sky and he desired to enlarge and extend it in order to restore world peace. He directed the Japanese Ambassador in Russia to prepare the ground so as not to miss the chance when the opportunity came about which he would be instructed later. TOGO's resignation prevented any development of this plan.

While out of office TOGO expressed his opinion to various persons that the war had to end promptly. In November 1944 he told Chief of Staff UMEZU that the war should be ended perhaps by first arranging to end the Soviet-German war. UMEZU agreed and said he would continue to work for this idea.

*April 8 1945, TOGO received a request from Admiral SUZUKI to come to see him. He called on SUZUKI who asked him to become Foreign Minister. TOGO suggested that it was necessary that for this purpose the Premier share not only a desire for prompt peace but also TOGO's estimate of the war situation. He asked SUZUKI for his views on the war before giving his answer. Although he found SUZUKI sincere and earnest for peace, having heard his estimate and it being different from TOGO's, TOGO felt he could not accept the responsibility unless they had identical opinions and told him so. He soon received serious persuasions from many quarters to enter SUZUKI's cabinet from people like OKADA, MATSUDAIRA, HIROTA, MATSUDAIRA, private secretary to the Lord Keeper, SAKOMIZU, Chief Secretary of the Cabinet.

35780 *After another talk with SUZUKI in which the latter agreed to TOGO's views, TOGO accepted. Shortly after taking office, TOGO met with the Japanese Minister to Finland who told him of an arrangement between SHIGEMITSU and the Swedish minister in which the Swedish government would on its own initiative sound out the U.S. for peace terms. The ambassador asked for TOGO's opinion. TOGO stated that this was the first time he had heard of this but would appreciate such services, and instructed the ambassador to so tell the Swedish minister. Nothing came of this and an attempt was made through another direction to secure Soviet mediation.

35781 * April 5, 1945 the Soviet had given notice of abrogation of the Neutrality Pact which had more than a year to run. Immediately upon TOGO's assumption of office TOGO received requests from military and others to make efforts to cooperate with the Soviet but it seemed to him that it was too late and he warned that there was a possibility of the Soviet having concluded an agreement with the allies to divide the spoils. He carefully watched the world situation to seize a good opportunity to restore peace.

35782 At the end of April Germany's defeat came and in the beginning of May the Goenitz regime surrendered. TOGO considered this an opportunity to end the war and early in May when he reported to the Emperor on the causes of Germany's defeat, including air raids he took the opportunity to add * that air raids on Japan were severe and that they should immediately bring the war to an end. He advised the Premier to that effect and urged him to convene a meeting of the principal members of the Supreme Council for the Direction of the war. The reason for this was that the meetings had a tendency to be formal and adopt a strong stand and there was a danger of leakage of secrets to lower military echelons. TOGO's advice was adopted and the principal members only, met three times in the middle of May. UMEZU can also claim credit for this.

May 14th it was agreed that Japan should realize a speedy termination of the war. It was further agreed that although an approach through CHUNGKING or negotiations with neutrals could be considered, such would only end in an American demand for unconditional surrender and the only way was to request Soviet mediation although this might be too late.

35783 * With this policy decided TOGO requested HIROTA to speak to the Soviet ambassador to feel out the Soviet reaction. They met several times in June and produced a friendly atmosphere. June 6 a meeting of the Supreme Council was suddenly called and on June 8th an Imperial Conference was held. TOGO then told them that the international situation was so unfavorable and the war time diplomacy was so under the influence of the war situation that they were likely to find themselves in great difficulty. The war situation continued to deteriorate.

Since April TOGO had explained his views on the need of ending the war on several occasions to KIDO who informed him on June 16th that it was the emperor's desire to see an early end and TOGO told KIDO that it was necessary to request Soviet mediation to gain an honorable peace even if the price was high. On June 18 a meeting of the principal members of the Supreme Council was held and an agreement was reached * to the effect that proper measures to end the war should be expedited. TOGO reported the developments to HIROTA and urged him to speed up his conversations with Russian Ambassador. The next day TOGO reported to the Emperor about HIROTA's mission and the emperor expressed his desire for an early ending of the war and TOGO promised to exert himself to the utmost. It was this time that TOGO learned that the allies were soon to meet at Potsdam in a conference in which the Soviet chief would also take part and he wanted the Soviet Govt to be informed of the Emperor's wish before such a conference took place. He sent instructions to the Japanese Ambassador to convey that wish to the Soviet. The intention to dispatch a special mission was also communicated to Moscow. Soviet reaction was not favorable.

35785

* July 26 the Potsdam Declaration was issued by President Truman, Churchill and Chiang. At a meeting of the Supreme Council on the 27th, TOGO pointed out that the declaration offered a peace on terms and that serious consequences would follow if they rejected. They therefore agreed to wait for the Soviet reaction to the proposal for mediation. The same explanation was given to the cabinet that day and it was agreed the Declaration should be passed without comment in order to guard against unfavorable public reaction. The press unfortunately reported SUZUKI's statement that the government had decided to ignore the Declaration which was interpreted as a rejection and used by Truman as a justification for the use of the atomic bomb and by the Soviet as a reason for entering the war. August 6th HIROSHIMA was destroyed and warning was served that bombs would be dropped until Japan was annihilated if she rejected the Potsdam Declaration.

*TOGO instructed SATO to press for an interview with Molotov to clarify the situation. The request was not granted and although Molotov returned to Moscow on Aug 5th it was not until the 8th that SATO was notified that Molotov would receive him on that day. After that no communication was received from SAITO. But on the morning of the 9th TOGO received an urgent report that Molotov had handed SAITO a declaration of war. Hostilities were reported from Manchukuo to have commenced at midnight. About 11.15 a.m. of the 10th TOGO received the Soviet Ambassador and received the first formal communication notifying the declaration of war. Having mentioned the Soviet commencement of war while the Neutrality Pact was in force and when the Soviet Government had not replied to Japan's request for mediation, TOGO asked him to transmit to Moscow Japan's reply to the Potsdam Declaration.

* A meeting of the Supreme Council was held at 11 o'clock that morning. All members recognized the difficulty of continuing the war and no one expressed objection to acceptance in principle of the Declaration. Various opinions were expressed regarding conditions under which it was to be accepted. All agreed that the fundamental structure of the state should be preserved. But the High Commands and the War Minister wanted to add three more conditions that the allied forces would refrain as far as possible from occupying the mainland and if occupation was inevitable, it would be on a small scale and exclude Tokyo; that the disarming of the Japanese forces should be done by the Japanese themselves; that the punishment of war criminals should be entrusted to the Japanese. No agreement was reached and the meeting adjourned. The Cabinet could not agree although most of them agreed with TOGO that the conditions should be limited to the absolutely necessary one of preserving the structure.

35788

* The matter was discussed with the Supreme Council when the President of the Privy Council met with the Emperor. TOGO repeated his previous statement and urged acceptance on the one condition mentioned by him. But there were various opinions demanding other conditions. Finally the Emperor agreed with TOGO. A Cabinet meeting was held at 3 a.m. and the answer was unanimously approved by the Cabinet. TOGO ordered the Minister in Switzerland to transmit it to the United States and China through the Swiss Government and the Minister in Sweden to transmit it to the U.S.S.R. and Great Britain through the Swedish Government.

* Trouble arose when the contents of the reply from the four governments to the Japanese government became known. TOGO learned of it and found the phraseology somewhat unclear and instructed the officials of the Ministry to study the text. They reached the conclusion that it could be interpreted as going generally in conformity with Japan's understanding that the Potsdam Declaration did not imply a requirement of a change in the fundamental structure of the state and that they should accept the Potsdam Declaration without proposing further conditions unless they were prepared to face and resolved to accept a breakdown of peace efforts. Meetings of the Cabinet and Supreme Council were held and TOGO strongly advised acceptance of the Declaration with no further representations. But there was strong opposition from the Minister of War group who insisted that the reply was unsatisfactory and further negotiations should be attempted.

A conference was again called in the presence of the Emperor for the morning of the 14th. It could not reach a decision. * At last the Emperor stated that they must accept the Declaration in order that the polity and existence of the Japanese nation could be preserved and the sufferings of mankind alleviated. At 1 P M a cabinet meeting was held and subsequently the Imperial Rescript was promulgated. The acceptance was sent through the Swiss Government on the morning of the 15th.

35791

The decision to end the war having been made, SUZUKI called a meeting at which he proposed resignation en bloc and all agreed and the resignations were submitted the following day. Prince HIGASHIKUNI requested TOGO to remain as foreign minister but TOGO refrained from accepting it because the reason for SUZUKI's resignation applied equally to him. TOGO had striven throughout his career to see Japan maintain friendly and peaceful relations with the world and had exerted every possible effort to improve relations with the allies * and to avert the Pacific war. He was driven into a position where conditions no longer permitted him to oppose war and he failed. But from the day of the outbreak of war he devoted himself with special care to bring an end to the war speedily and after becoming foreign minister in 1945 he worked toward that end at the risk of his own life, resisting all opposition until the decision was reached to end the war on August 14 1945. It is his great sorrow that he was not successful in preventing war in 1941 but some consolation that he was able to contribute to lessening the suffering of mankind by ending it in 1945.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. LOGAN
 Counsel for KIDO.

35792

The witness stated he knew nothing about the report that there was a small gathering at the palace on the morning of December 8th concerning the attack on Pearl Harbor. He went to the Palace because of the message which had come from Pres. Roosevelt to the emperor. He stated he went to the palace to meet KIDO the Grand Chamberlain and members of the Chamberlain's office. He met them in the waiting room but this was not a gathering. He did not go to find out about the attack on Pearl Harbor and as he understood it KIDO was not there for that purpose. When TOGO was received in audience by the emperor he was received alone. KIDO, the Grand

Page same place at the same time and Pearl Harbor was not even mentioned. There was not a single military man at the palace. When he received the message from Grew he first called on the Imperial Household Minister by telephone. When he called him he said that Grew had just 35795 *called on him and brought a message from the president to the emperor. Grew desires to present this message personally to the emperor but since it is in the middle of the night TOGO would like to ask how this matter should be disposed of. Since this constituted the whole of his conversation with MATSUDAIRA they could place any interpretation they pleased on it. Since his call concerned the steps to be taken regarding Grew's proposed audience one might say that it was a call regarding procedure.

35796 *He did not tell the household minister the contents of the telegram and the latter did not ask him any questions. He then called KIDO because MATSUDAIRA had told him that the matter being political he should talk to KIDO about it.

35797 *When he called KIDO he told him that Grew had brought a message concerning the problem that had been under discussion since the morning. Since he had explained the nature of the telegram to KIDO the latter did not ask him any questions over the phone regarding the contents of the telegram and KIDO did not tell him of the contents over the telephone. KIDO made the suggestion that the Emperor would receive TOGO at any time, TOGO did not recall that KIDO had done anything to obstruct an interview with the emperor. TOGO then went to the palace to speak to KIDO and then with the emperor. He left the palace about 3.15 am but did not see KIDO after he left the Emperor. KIDO had the duty of advising the emperor at all times.
35798 By this TOGO understood it to mean that if the emperor should address any questions to KIDO naturally he would answer them and whenever KIDO felt it necessary * he would give the emperor advice. If the emperor asked a question KIDO would answer it. But even if any questions were asked whenever KIDO felt it necessary and if he felt it fit to do so he would offer advice to the emperor. In a broad sense he would suppose this was for the purpose of assisting the virtues of the emperor. The emperor was a man of peace. When asked whether KIDO's views conflicted with the emperor the emperor would have discharged him, TOGO stated since that was a matter that concerned the emperor and the Lord Keeper alone he did not think it fitting or proper that he should give an answer nor did he feel qualified to do so.

35800 *He believed that he himself was a man of peace. He had not eliminated all the pro-army elements from the foreign office. He did not feel it was necessary. There were many of them still left. He only felt in carrying out this purge that he was to restore the feeling within the foreign ministry to the state where they could follow

35801 out their policies in a moderate atmosphere and eliminate the pro-Axis and anti-British atmosphere. He had no doubt however that if the Lord Keeper were a war monger the emperor would have gotten rid of him. * With respect to the meeting of the senior statesmen November 29, 1941 there was an additional meeting between two and three o'clock of senior statesmen and members of the cabinet. At all meetings attended by the emperor KIDO was also present and some of the cabinet members and all the senior statesmen.

35802 * Neither the emperor nor KIDO attended the meeting in the morning and they did not attend the meeting after three o'clock. At the meeting between two and three o'clock KIDO said nothing. During the morning session TOGO made a detailed explanation, but in the afternoon session which the emperor attended TOGO neither explained nor made any remark.

35803 * He explained in detail regarding the Hull note. He did not mention to the senior statesmen NOMURA and KURUSU's telegram with respect to the recommendation of Pres. Roosevelt cabling the emperor. The telegram from NOMURA and KURUSU was that the president and the emperor should exchange telegrams and that Japan should guarantee the neutrality of the NEI, Thailand and FIC. It was hoped by these means the situation would be saved.

35804 This telegram reached Japan on the 27th. It had been sent before the Hull note had been delivered to the ambassador. * Immediately after receiving the note the two ambassadors sent another telegram stating the success of the negotiations was now impossible and that the next thing to be considered was the procedure to carry out free action on Japan's part. The second telegram proved that the two ambassadors felt also that their first advice was useless.

35805 Furthermore, Roosevelt himself told the two ambassadors if there were not any agreement in fundamentals, no provisional agreement could be executed. Furthermore, on the morning of the 28th, TOGO met with TOJO and SHIMADA and had discussed the matter with them and they concluded that the situation could not be saved by such means. Also, since the telegram requested that KIDO be consulted, TOGO * met with KIDO and told him about the telegram and the Hull note. When he talked to KIDO on this matter he said the solution proposed by the ambassadors was impossible and if insisted in, civil war would result.

Thereafter KIDO told him he should reply to the ambassadors that their proposal was unadoptable. He stressed that point and on the afternoon of the 28th TOGO sent a telegram stating that he had 35806 talked with KIDO and that he felt that the proposal was improper.

*Such being the circumstances the question of the telegram was already a closed question. This was why on the 27th he did not mention that matter.

35807 "He did not tell the Elder Statesmen what he had just told the Tribunal. When asked whether he knew KIDO on Feb. 5 1942 had suggested to the ambassadors a desire for the early restoration of peace, TOGO stated that as to the details of the matter he heard about it for the first time during this trial but with respect to the fact that the Emperor had told TOJO of his desire for peace, the emperor himself told TOGO of this in July.

35808 "In ordinary circumstances when the matter concerns fundamental foreign policy, he thought it appropriate that the imperial will should be conveyed to the Foreign Minister by the Lord Keeper - also when the Foreign Minister goes to the palace to report to the throne. He was complaining because KIDO did not tell him about it at that time. He felt whatever the general feeling or atmosphere might be if the imperial will was for peace, he thought it only natural that such desire should be conveyed to the Foreign Minister. If the Premier had heard of the imperial will in this matter he should convey it to the Foreign Minister. As a matter of courtesy 35809 * it was only natural that the Lord Keeper should tell the Foreign Minister of a matter that so vitally concerned their fundamental foreign policy. When asked if TOGO were a militarist and KIDO had told him that he would not have been around very long, TOGO stated he did not believe there was anybody who believed he was more of a militarist than KIDO. He did not dislike KIDO. He was a friend of his.

35810 *KIDO was not a cabinet adviser but he did have relations with the cabinet. In most cases when a cabinet minister wanted to convey anything to the throne he told it to the Lord Keeper. He did this because it was the Lord Keeper's duty to advise the emperor at all times and to enable him to fulfill that purpose.

35811 Another reason for so doing was that it was the desire that what a minister reported should not be taken in a different meaning and to make sure of this he would tell the Lord Keeper what he had already told the emperor. This was the Japanese custom. There were many occasions when the Lord Keeper would convey to the cabinet ministers formally and informally the imperial will. The Lord Keeper stood between the cabinet ministers and the Emperor, acting as a go-between.*This was one of his duties. He was not however adviser to the cabinet.

Despite this, conditions were such that providing satisfactory information was impossible. The military explained that as a result of Japan's defeat telegraphic communication was very difficult and often impossible and even when possible confusion on the front rendered investigation almost impossible. The foreign ministry having neither jurisdiction nor means of investigation could do nothing but convey communications. The foreign ministry received no information of the trial of allied fliers.

*The foreign ministry under TOGO's direction constantly tried to ameliorate conditions and in some ways succeeded, particularly in Japan proper. It could not meddle with matters under the military and could only urge the military to be humane which it did. If only in self-interest this would have to be the position of the foreign ministry because it was responsible for its own nationals in enemy countries. The foreign ministry had nothing to do with the truth or falsity of the replies furnished by the Army or in a few cases by the navy to inquiries from enemy countries. TOGO had no personal contact with inquiries and answers, it being purely routine liaison work. No one in the foreign ministry could do more than forward the answers received. *It had no right to inspect camps and they could have done nothing had they reason to doubt the truth of the answers, which in absence of opportunity to inspect conditions, they did not have. TOGO's entry into the SUZUKI Cabinet had only one purpose - to end the war. His various efforts to bring the war to an earliest possible end were an extension into wartime of his opposition to the war in the first place.

They began at once after December 8 1941. He did not share the optimism or the illusions of most Japanese and believed it would be difficult to overcome the fighting spirit and the industrial productivity of the allies. * From the Japanese point of view the war had to be ended quickly if it was not to end in complete disaster. He still believed that if it became a long drawn out war there would be no real victor but mutual exhaustion and world impoverishment.

January 1 1942 TOGO addressed an instruction to his staff to suggest this idea. He elucidated the inter-relationship between war and diplomacy. He stated that though the prevailing tendency was to neglect diplomacy, diplomacy would gain in importance as the war progressed. They should make preparations to end the war lest they failed to seize the chance when it did come. TOGO thought there was some chance to end the war by a Russo-German peace which might begin the movement toward general peace.

When he conversed with the Soviet Ambassador * in February, he told him that the relations between Japan and the Soviets were like a bright spot in a troubled stormy sky and he desired to enlarge and extend it in order to restore world peace. He directed the Japanese Ambassador in Russia to prepare the ground so as not to miss the chance when the opportunity came about which he would be instructed later. TOGO's resignation prevented any development of this plan.

While out of office TOGO expressed his opinion to various persons that the war had to end promptly. In November 1944 he told Chief of Staff UMEZU that the war should be ended perhaps by first arranging to end the Soviet-German war. UMEZU agreed and said he would continue to work for this idea.

*April 8 1945, TOGO received a request from Admiral SUZUKI to come to see him. He called on SUZUKI who asked him to become Foreign Minister. TOGO suggested that it was necessary that for this purpose the Premier share not only a desire for prompt peace but also TOGO's estimate of the war situation. He asked SUZUKI for his views on the war before giving his answer. Although he found SUZUKI sincere and earnest for peace, having heard his estimate and it being different from TOGO's, TOGO felt he could not accept the responsibility unless they had identical opinions and told him so. He soon received serious persuasions from many quarters to enter SUZUKI's cabinet from people like OKADA, MATSUDAIRA, HIROTA, MATSUDAIRA, private secretary to the Lord Keeper, SAKOMIZU, Chief Secretary of the Cabinet.

- 35780 *After another talk with SUZUKI in which the latter agreed to TOGO's views, TOGO accepted. Shortly after taking office, TOGO met with the Japanese Minister to Finland who told him of an arrangement between SHIGEMITSU and the Swedish minister in which the Swedish government would on its own initiative sound out the U.S. for peace terms. The ambassador asked for TOGO's opinion. TOGO stated that this was the first time he had heard of this but would appreciate such services, and instructed the ambassador to so tell the Swedish minister. Nothing came of this and an attempt was made through another direction to secure Soviet mediation.
- 35781 * April 5, 1945 the Soviet had given notice of abrogation of the Neutrality Pact which had more than a year to run. Immediately upon TOGO's assumption of office TOGO received requests from military and others to make efforts to cooperate with the Soviet but it seemed to him that it was too late and he warned that there was a possibility of the Soviet having concluded an agreement with the allies to divide the spoils. He carefully watched the world situation to seize a good opportunity to restore peace.
- 35782 At the end of April Germany's defeat came and in the beginning of May the Doenitz regime surrendered. TOGO considered this an opportunity to end the war and early in May when he reported to the Emperor on the causes of Germany's defeat, including air raids he took the opportunity to add * that air raids on Japan were severe and that they should immediately bring the war to an end. He advised the Premier to that effect and urged him to convene a meeting of the principal members of the Supreme Council for the Direction of the war. The reason for this was that the meetings had a tendency to be formal and adopt a strong stand and there was a danger of leakage of secrets to lower military echelons. TOGO's advice was adopted and the principal members only, met three times in the middle of May. UMEZU can also claim credit for this.
- May 14th it was agreed that Japan should realize a speedy termination of the war. It was further agreed that although an approach through CHUNGKING or negotiations with neutrals could be considered, such would only end in an American demand for unconditional surrender and the only way was to request Soviet mediation although this might be too late.
- 35783 * With this policy decided TOGO requested HIROTA to speak to the Soviet ambassador to feel out the Soviet reaction. They met several times in June and produced a friendly atmosphere. June 6 a meeting of the Supreme Council was suddenly called and on June 8th an Imperial Conference was held. TOGO then told them that the international situation was so unfavorable and the war time diplomacy was so under the influence of the war situation that they were likely to find themselves in great difficulty. The war situation continued to deteriorate.

Since April TOGO had explained his views on the need of ending the war on several occasions to KIDO who informed him on June 16th that it was the emperor's desire to see an early end and TOGO told KIDO that it was necessary to request Soviet mediation to gain an honorable peace even if the price was high. On June 18 a meeting of the principal members of the Supreme Council was held and an agreement was reached * to the effect that proper measures to end the war should be expedited. TOGO reported the developments to HIROTA and urged him to speed up his conversations with Russian Ambassador. The next day TOGO reported to the Emperor about HIROTA's mission and the emperor expressed his desire for an early ending of the war and TOGO promised to exert himself to the utmost. It was this time that TOGO learned that the allies were soon to meet at Potsdam in a conference in which the Soviet chief would also take part and he wanted the Soviet Govt to be informed of the Emperor's wish before such a conference took place. He sent instructions to the Japanese Ambassador to convey that wish to the Soviet. The intention to dispatch a special mission was also communicated to Moscow. Soviet reaction was not favorable.

35785

* July 26 the Potsdam Declaration was issued by President Truman, Churchill and Chiang. At a meeting of the Supreme Council on the 27th, TOGO pointed out that the declaration offered a peace on terms and that serious consequences would follow if they rejected. They therefore agreed to wait for the Soviet reaction to the proposal for mediation. The same explanation was given to the cabinet that day and it was agreed the Declaration should be passed without comment in order to guard against unfavorable public reaction. The press unfortunately reported SUZUKI's statement that the government had decided to ignore the Declaration which was interpreted as a rejection and used by Truman as a justification for the use of the atomic bomb and by the Soviet as a reason for entering the war. August 6th HIROSHIMA was destroyed and warning was served that bombs would be dropped until Japan was annihilated if she rejected the Potsdam Declaration.

*TOGO instructed SATO to press for an interview with Molotov to clarify the situation. The request was not granted and although Molotov returned to Moscow on Aug 5th it was not until the 8th that SATO was notified that Molotov would receive him on that day. After that no communication was received from SATO. But on the morning of the 9th TOGO received an urgent report that Molotov had handed SATO a declaration of war. Hostilities were reported from Manchukuo to have commenced at midnight. About 11.15 a.m. of the 10th TOGO received the Soviet Ambassador and received the first formal communication notifying the declaration of war. Having mentioned the Soviet commencement of war while the Neutrality Pact was in force and when the Soviet Government had not replied to Japan's request for mediation, TOGO asked him to transmit to Moscow Japan's reply to the Potsdam Declaration.

* A meeting of the Supreme Council was held at 11 o'clock that morning. All members recognized the difficulty of continuing the war and no one expressed objection to acceptance in principle of the Declaration. Various opinions were expressed regarding conditions under which it was to be accepted. All agreed that the fundamental structure of the state should be preserved. But the High Commands and the War Minister wanted to add three more conditions that the allied forces would refrain as far as possible from occupying the mainland and if occupation was inevitable, it would be on a small scale and exclude Tokyo; that the disarming of the Japanese forces should be done by the Japanese themselves; that the punishment of war criminals should be entrusted to the Japanese. No agreement was reached and the meeting adjourned. The Cabinet could not agree although most of them agreed with TOGO that the conditions should be limited to the absolutely necessary one of preserving the structure.

35788

* The matter was discussed with the Supreme Council when the President of the Privy Council met with the Emperor. TOGO repeated his previous statement and urged acceptance on the one condition mentioned by him. But there were various opinions demanding other conditions. Finally the Emperor agreed with TOGO. A Cabinet meeting was held at 3 a.m. and the answer was unanimously approved by the Cabinet. TOGO ordered the Minister in Switzerland to transmit it to the United States and China through the Swiss Government and the Minister in Sweden to transmit it to the U.S.S.R. and Great Britain through the Swedish Government.

* Trouble arose when the contents of the reply from the four governments to the Japanese government became known. TOGO learned of it and found the phraseology somewhat unclear and instructed the officials of the Ministry to study the text. They reached the conclusion that it could be interpreted as going generally in conformity with Japan's understanding that the Potsdam Declaration did not imply a requirement of a change in the fundamental structure of the state.

and that they should accept the Potsdam Declaration without proposing further conditions unless they were prepared to face and resolved to accept a breakdown of peace efforts. Meetings of the Cabinet and Supreme Council were held and TOGO strongly advised acceptance of the Declaration with no further representations. But there was strong opposition from the Minister of War group who insisted that the reply was unsatisfactory and further negotiations should be attempted.

A conference was again called in the presence of the Emperor for the morning of the 14th. It could not reach a decision. * At last the Emperor stated that they must accept the Declaration in order that the polity and existence of the Japanese nation could be preserved and the sufferings of mankind alleviated. At 1 P M a cabinet meeting was held and subsequently the Imperial Rescript was promulgated. The acceptance was sent through the Swiss Government on the morning of the 15th.

35791

The decision to end the war having been made, SUZUKI called a meeting at which he proposed resignation en bloc and all agreed and the resignations were submitted the following day. Prince HIGASHIKUNI requested TOGO to remain as foreign minister but TOGO refrained from accepting it because the reason for SUZUKI's resignation applied equally to him. TOGO had striven throughout his career to see Japan maintain friendly and peaceful relations with the world and had exerted every possible effort to improve relations with the allies * and to avert the Pacific war. He was driven into a position where conditions no longer permitted him to oppose war and he failed. But from the day of the outbreak of war he devoted himself with special care to bring an end to the war speedily and after becoming foreign minister in 1945 he worked toward that end at the risk of his own life, resisting all opposition until the decision was reached to end the war on August 14 1945. It is his great sorrow that he was not successful in preventing war in 1941 but some consolation that he was able to contribute to lessening the suffering of mankind by ending it in 1945.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. LOGAN
Counsel for KIDO.

35792

The witness stated he knew nothing about the report that there was a small gathering at the palace on the morning of December 8th concerning the attack on Pearl Harbor. He went to the palace because of the message which had come from Pres. Roosevelt to the emperor.

He stated he went to the palace to meet KIDO the Grand Chamberlain and members of the Chamberlain's office. He met them in the waiting room but this was not a gathering. He did not go to find out about the attack on Pearl Harbor and as he understood it KIDO was not there for that purpose. When TOGO was received in audience by the emperor he was received alone. KIDO, the Grand

Page same place at the same time and Pearl Harbor was not even mentioned. There was not a single military man at the palace. When he received the message from Grew he first called on the Imperial Household Minister by telephone. When he called him he said that Grew had just 35795 *called on him and brought a message from the president to the emperor. Grew desires to present this message personally to the emperor but since it is in the middle of the night TOGO would like to ask how this matter should be disposed of. Since this constituted the whole of his conversation with MATSUDAIRA they could place any interpretation they pleased on it. Since his call concerned the steps to be taken regarding Grew's proposed audience one might say that it was a call regarding procedure.

35796 *He did not tell the household minister the contents of the telegram and the latter did not ask him any questions. He then called KIDO because MATSUDAIRA had told him that the matter being political he should talk to KIDO about it.

35797 *When he called KIDO he told him that Grew had brought a message concerning the problem that had been under discussion since the morning. Since he had explained the nature of the telegram to KIDO the latter did not ask him any questions over the phone regarding the contents of the telegram and KIDO did not tell him of the contents over the telephone. KIDO made the suggestion that the Emperor 35798 would receive TOGO at any time, TOGO did not recall that KIDO had done anything to obstruct an interview with the emperor. TOGO then went to the palace to speak to KIDO and then with the emperor. He left the palace about 3.15 am but did not see KIDO after he left the Emperor. KIDO had the duty of advising the emperor at all times. By this TOGO understood it to mean that if the emperor should address any questions to KIDO naturally he would answer them and whenever 35799 KIDO felt it necessary * he would give the emperor advice. If the emperor asked a question KIDO would answer it. But even if any questions were asked whenever KIDO felt it necessary and if he felt it fit to do so he would offer advice to the emperor. In a broad sense he would suppose this was for the purpose of assisting the virtues of the emperor. The emperor was a man of peace. When asked whether KIDO's views conflicted with the emperor the emperor would have discharged him, TOGO stated since that was a matter that concerned the emperor and the Lord Keeper alone he did not think it fitting or proper that he should give an answer nor did he feel qualified to do so.

35800 *He believed that he himself was a man of peace. He had not eliminated all the pro-army elements from the foreign office. He did not feel it was necessary. There were many of them still left. He only felt in carrying out this purge that he was to restore the feeling within the foreign ministry to the state where they could follow

35801 out their policies in a moderate atmosphere and eliminate the pro-Axis and anti-British atmosphere. He had no doubt however that if the Lord Keeper were a war monger the emperor would have gotten rid of him. * With respect to the meeting of the senior statesmen November 29, 1941 there was an additional meeting between two and three o'clock of senior statesmen and members of the cabinet. At all meetings attended by the emperor KIDO was also present and some of the cabinet members and all the senior statesmen.

35802 * Neither the emperor nor KIDO attended the meeting in the morning and they did not attend the meeting after three o'clock. At the meeting between two and three o'clock KIDO said nothing. During the morning session TOGO made a detailed explanation, but in the afternoon session which the emperor attended TOGO neither explained nor made any remark.

35803 * He explained in detail regarding the Hull note. He did not mention to the senior statesmen NOMURA and KURUSU's telegram with respect to the recommendation of Pres. Roosevelt cabling the emperor. The telegram from NOMURA and KURUSU was that the president and the emperor should exchange telegrams and that Japan should guarantee the neutrality of the NEI, Thailand and FIC. It was hoped by these means the situation would be saved.

35804 This telegram reached Japan on the 27th. It had been sent before the Hull note had been delivered to the ambassador. * Immediately after receiving the note the two ambassadors sent another telegram stating the success of the negotiations was now impossible and that the next thing to be considered was the procedure to carry out free action on Japan's part. The second telegram proved that the two ambassadors felt also that their first advice was useless.

35805 Furthermore, Roosevelt himself told the two ambassadors if there were not any agreement in fundamentals, no provisional agreement could be executed. Furthermore, on the morning of the 28th, TOGO met with TOWO and SHIMADA and had discussed the matter with them and they concluded that the situation could not be saved by such means. Also, since the telegram requested that KIDO be consulted, TOGO * met with KIDO and told him about the telegram and the Hull note. When he talked to KIDO on this matter he said the solution proposed by the ambassadors was impossible and if insisted in, civil war would result.

Thereafter KIDO told him he should reply to the ambassadors that their proposal was unadoptable. He stressed that point and on the afternoon of the 28th TOGO sent a telegram stating that he had 35806 talked with KIDO and that he felt that the proposal was improper. *Such being the circumstances the question of the telegram was already a closed question. This was why on the 27th he did not mention that matter.

35807 "He did not tell the Elder Statesmen what he had just told the Tribunal. When asked whether he knew KIDO on Feb. 5 1942 had suggested to the ambassadors a desire for the early restoration of peace, TOGO stated that as to the details of the matter he heard about it for the first time during this trial but with respect to the fact that the Emperor had told TOJO of his desire for peace, the emperor himself told TOGO of this in July.

35808 "In ordinary circumstances when the matter concerns fundamental foreign policy, he thought it appropriate that the imperial will should be conveyed to the Foreign Minister by the Lord Keeper - also when the Foreign Minister goes to the palace to report to the throne. He was complaining because KIDO did not tell him about it at that time. He felt whatever the general feeling or atmosphere might be if the imperial will was for peace, he thought it only natural that such desire should be conveyed to the Foreign Minister. If the Premier had heard of the imperial will in this matter he should convey it to the Foreign Minister. As a matter of courtesy 35809 * it was only natural that the Lord Keeper should tell the Foreign Minister of a matter that so vitally concerned their fundamental foreign policy. When asked if TOGO were a militarist and KIDO had told him that he would not have been around very long, TOGO stated he did not believe there was anybody who believed he was more of a militarist than KIDO. He did not dislike KIDO. He was a friend of his.

35810 *KIDO was not a cabinet adviser but he did have relations with the cabinet. In most cases when a cabinet minister wanted to convey anything to the throne he told it to the Lord Keeper. He did this because it was the Lord Keeper's duty to advise the emperor at all times and to enable him to fulfill that purpose.

35811 Another reason for so doing was that it was the desire that what a minister reported should not be taken in a different meaning and to make sure of this he would tell the Lord Keeper - what he had already told the emperor. This was the Japanese custom. There were many occasions when the Lord Keeper would convey to the cabinet ministers formally and informally the imperial will. The Lord Keeper stood between the cabinet ministers and the emperor, acting as a go-between.*This was one of his duties. He was not however adviser to the cabinet.

35815 *With respect to the question of the day before where counsel asked him to assume that he was a militarist, TOGO stated that he had received the impression from the question that by using the conditional term some doubt was being created as to whether he was actually a militarist.

35816 In February 1942, of course, KIDO had to exercise *great caution in telling anyone that the Emperor war urging peace, but if he were to talk about that matter to TOJO, TOGO could not see why he wouldn't tell him about it. It is true that the evidence shows that KIDO spoke to the Emperor and the Emperor spoke to TOJO. There is no evidence that KIDO spoke to TOJO about it.

35818 *TOGO stated that he had no desire to comment or criticize on the wishes of the Emperor in giving instructions to the War and Navy Ministers to review the decision of September 6. TOGO and everyone else in the government considered Hull's note the more important of the documents received on the morning of the 27th. He spoke to both TOJO and SHIMADA about these matters before the Cabinet and there was discussion about the Hull note in the Cabinet meeting.*When he stated that the government had no confidence in realization, he was speaking of both the Hull note and the telegram from Ambassadors NOMURA and KURUSU. The agreement was reached before he spoke to KIDO.

35820 Although KIDO claims that he did not remember the conversation, TOGO remembered it very well and he spoke to KIDO of both the Hull note and the telegram from the Ambassadors. The conversation was not principally about the Hull note. *He started the conversation with KIDO by stating that the telegram from the Ambassadors must have reached KIDO. KIDO stated that he had not seen it and TOGO explained the contents. TOGO did not bring a copy of that telegram to him because it was supposed to have been routed to KIDO and *TOGO did not know that it had not reached him. He did not show him a copy. At first a short telegram preceded the full text of the Hull note and KIDO stated that he had not seen that telegram.

35822 *With respect to the telegram, both TOJO and SHIMADA, whose responsibility it was to advise the throne, thought the contents of the proposal could not be adopted and TOGO did not speak of the matter to the Emperor. He did speak to the Emperor about the Hull note. The NOMURA-KURUSU telegram was in the nature of a diplomatic negotiation and it was TOGO's duty and responsibility to carry out the duties of his office.

35823 The telegram was a submission of opinion *to the government and it was up to the government to decide whether the proposal should be adopted. Since the government and the Lord Keeper agreed that the telegram was such that it could not be adopted, it was unsuitable and improper to present before the throne. He repeated that before the NOMURA-KURUSU telegram was submitted to the Cabinet meeting, he had only spoken to SHIMADA and TOJO. All matters need not be decided by the full cabinet and it was up to the Prime Minister and other ministers concerned to decide what should be presented.
In connection with the telegram, since the matter was agreed upon by the Prime Minister, the Navy Minister, and the Foreign Minister, the matter need not be 35824 presented to the *cabinet and it would be all right to say that this represented the views of the government.
If KIDO had gone to the Emperor and told him what to do about it, it would have amounted to interfering in governmental matters. If KIDO believed that steps should be taken in opposition, it was within his right to advise on such matters as he thought fitting and proper and direct the handling of the matter in the way he thought fitting and proper.

35825 It is true that the Foreign Minister reported only on the diplomatic negotiations themselves, and the telegram of NOMURA-KURUSU was a diplomatic negotiation. *He had no desire to shove any responsibility on to KIDO.

35827 On the morning of December 8, after talking to KIDO, TOGO went to see TOJO and discussed the contents of President Roosevelt's telegram. *He spoke to TOJO between fifteen and twenty minutes. In going 35828 to see KIDO, *KIDO gave his own opinion *and asked 35829 what TOJO's opinion was, to which TOGO replied that TOJO agreed with KIDO. During the conversation, TOGO had in hand a translation of the message and he spoke to KIDO about the contents. He did not show it to him and it was not necessary to do so. The conversation was concluded when he received word that the Emperor was waiting. KIDO did nothing to prevent TOGO from seeing the Emperor, nor was he in a position to do so.

35830 *TOGO and the members of the cabinet and the leading members of the High Command were all in agreement that after the Hull note was received, it would have been national suicide for Japan to accept. TOGO had no criticism of the actions of the accused in voting for war. If the Hull note had come on October 18, the conclusion would have been the same as that contained in the note of November 26.

35833 *The heart of the problem was how to lead the negotiations to a successful outcome. The Japanese problem was how to relax the conditions to bring about that outcome. No one including the members of the Liaison Conference favored going to war without fully negotiating the question. SHIMADA did not once propose going to war without negotiating first.

35834 *When the matter of giving notice came up, it was TOGO's recollection that SHIMADA sat in silence and did not utter a single word. It was his recollection that it was ITO, who was Vice-Chief of the Naval General Staff, requested that the negotiations be left un-terminated. This took place at a Liaison Conference.

35835 *When asked how he reconciled these statements with the testimony of other witnesses who stated that they had never heard these words, TOGO stated he did not have much confidence in the memories of the other defendants. He entered SUGAMO in May 1946, later than others because of illness. When he entered, the names of the men he had just mentioned had forgotten the fact that an Imperial Conference had been held on November 5, 1941. It was only after TOGO told them of this that these men recalled it. Since they forgot such a highly important conference, it is only natural that they would forget some things that were unfavorable to them.

35836 *He did not hesitate to talk about what took place in Sugamo and since the question had been asked it would be advisable for him to make certain explanations so that there would be nothing left unclear.

35838 *Sometime in the middle of May 1946, SHIMADA proposed a talk between himself and NAGANO and TOGO. SHIMADA expressed the desire that TOGO say nothing about the fact that the Navy desired to carry out a surprise attack. He also said something in the nature of a threat that if TOGO did say so, it would not be worth while. NAGANO said that even if he said so, TOGO would have to adopt the proposition submitted. To that statement TOGO replied that the situation at that time was not so.

* About ten days before NAGANO's death, NAGANO said that he was going to bear the full responsibility for the attack on Pearl Harbor. TCGC asked NAGANO if he was going to take the responsibility for the surprise attack also, and the latter said he would. There were other conversations where the Navy asked TCGC not to speak of the Navy's desire for conducting a surprise attack. The conversations took place among SHIMADA, NAGANO, and TCGC. NAGANO is dead. TCGC did not know that NAGANO took responsibility for the Pearl Harbor attack.

With respect to the attack on Pearl Harbor, there were various aspects, * such as the general operations and the fact of an attack without warning, and TCGC asked NAGANO if he was assuming entire responsibility. TCGC said he was not worried about himself. He spoke to NAGANO in order to bring the facts out fully. The conversations which took place did not put any restrictions as to the place where they desired TCGC would not speak about the matter. He thought the Tribunal was among them. It is proper to say that SHIMADA and NAGANO confessed that they wanted to attack Pearl Harbor without notice being given but they did not want TCGC to talk about it any place.

35841

* When asked whether in view of the testimony given whether it would have made any difference to the Navy whether a half hour or an hour's notice was given, TCGC said he had no knowledge on which he could comment from the naval expert's point of view. As an amateur, he figured that the attack couldn't be carried out without a surprise element and this fact occurred to him after the war broke out. The papers at the time widely publicized the fact that the surprise attack met with great success and he thought the phrase "surprise attack" was used elsewhere.

35846

* When asked whether he ever advised members of the Liaison Conference that hostilities commenced by Japan one hour after giving notice would be in compliance with international law, TCGC stated that he had advised the members to take the customary procedure, but there was no opportunity to discuss * such a question. His advice was premised on the fact that all present were generally familiar with the provisions of international law and he had no intention of conducting a lecture. He did not consider it his duty to give them special explanations because of the knowledge of the other members. Since all the members were familiar with international law, TCGC did not regard it his duty to give explanations over what they already knew. As to his idea of suggesting notice * this would require some explanation of Hague Convention III. When this was concluded, there was considerable discussion 35849 as to the time of advance notice. The Russian and Netherlands delegates desired to stipulate advance notice of 24 hours. There was no occasion in which he said anything about prior notice of one hour. With respect to the answer he gave in a prosecution interrogation February 22, 1946, TCGC stated the question, when asked him, * was based upon whether there was going to be sufficient time given by the notification prior to the attack. It was brought up at the Conference and later when ITO called TCGC asked ITO whether there was going to be sufficient time given by the notification prior to the attack, and ITO replied that there was.

35850 * He had told the prosecution that it was his understanding 35851 that it would be * at least one hour. The question of one hour did not include the element of surprise and he, therefore, could not reply to any question with regard to the hour or with regard to thirty minutes in regard to the question of surprise. TCGC thought there would be at least an hour between notice and the attack. When asked if there was an hour notice, there could have been no surprise attack, TCGC stated 35852 that * even one minute notice would have been sufficient time. However, from the point of view of good faith and from the spirit of treaties, he thought it proper to avoid a surprise attack. In the light of the then prevailing conditions, he thought one hour allowance would make it possible for Washington to inform its outposts and other quarters in sufficient time.

35853 * When asked whether in fact, his affidavit did not show a difference between his opinion and that of ITO and NAGANO over the delivery of the note, he said if the affidavit was read carefully such a misunderstanding would not arise. ITO asked that the notice be delivered in Tokyo and TCGC wanted it delivered to Hull. ITO then told him it was the Navy's desire to have the notification delivered in Washington. In other words, the Navy also agreed with TCGC and agreed to have the note delivered in Washington before the attack.

35854 When the question of delivery and to whom notice should be delivered, NAGANO suggested it would be well to have it delivered to Hull. * At first NAGANO entertained a different opinion, but later he agreed to sending notice prior to opening of hostilities. TCGC's impression was NAGANO stated that with a straightforward spirit. His impression was that NAGANO was familiar with diplomatic procedure when he said to have the note delivered to the Secretary of State, and that NAGANO had been a delegate to international conferences and gave his full attention to such matters of procedure.

35855 *He did not think that there was any inconsistency in his testimony. The question of delivery of the note to Mr. Hull is not a question of international law. It is only a matter of taking careful steps. The fact that NAGANO advocated surprise attack was out of operational need to obtain maximum success. When asked how it was possible for him to overrule the Chief of Naval General Staff on giving notice, TOGO stated that the power of the Foreign Minister was weakened but it was not completely absent and by applying whatever power there was, he was able to bring the High Command around to agreeing.

35856 *The fact is they agreed to his views and if it seems he had more power on the point, they could interpret it that way if they wished. There was an agreement of views on giving notice before any attack was carried out. When asked if he could also notify Grew, he replied that it was considered official to deliver certain documents to a certain destination, and certain documents were considered sent only for reference if sent to certain other quarters.

35857 *It would be contrary to diplomatic usage to have notified both. He had no opportunity to cooperate with the Navy in regard to Pearl Harbor.

35858 With respect to Exhibit 1258, *the witness stated that the official concerned in the Foreign Office sent the telegram in response to a request from the Navy and there was no occasion on which the telegram was shown to TOGO. When asked whether he was willing to accept responsibility for the acts of his subordinates, TOGO stated that from what he learned after the end of the war with regard to telegrams pertaining to *ship movements, the request came from the Foreign Office, and the Foreign Office sent the telegrams pursuant to that request. He did not think that SHIMADA knew of the telegrams.

Cross Examination by Mr. Roberts

35861 TOGO stated that the Chief Cabinet Secretary and the Directors of the Military and Naval Affairs Bureaus attended the Liaison Conferences and Imperial Conferences as secretaries. He stated that he knew nothing of the conversations between YAMAMOTO and OKA *and he had no date 35862 upon which to base any denial, but he did know that YAMAMOTO had testified that there was no such meeting. At the time he knew nothing about it, but he could not ignore YAMAMOTO's testimony. It was considered that the notification was tantamount to a declaration of war even if the words "reservation of freedom of action" were not mentioned. An addition of such words would be unnecessary or superfluous.

- 35863 *TOGO stated that he had once read KONOYE's Memoirs but did not remember the details. In later years 35864 he had opportunities to meet*with him and understood his feelings well. When asked whether he recalled the statement in the Memoirs that the Navy was in complete accord with his efforts to bring about a successful conclusion to the Japanese-American negotiations, he said he remembered it slightly different. He had not read them recently.
- 35865 *When a portion of the memoirs were read to him, he said one cannot pass judgment only on the basis of the proposed KONOYE-ROOSEVELT interview.
- 35866 *He generall recalled the circumstances of the 35867 fall of the third KONOYE Cabinet. *KONOYE stressed to him emphatically the point that the question was to what extent it was possible to bring about a success of the negotiation on the basis of the decision of September 6, and on what terms, and whether the terms should be released. The Navy said nothing about relaxing the terms. KONOYE said if war should break out, it would be the Navy's war rather than the Army's war. And yet the Navy said that it would entrust the decision to the Prime Minister. The Navy knew its naval strength and KONOYE was in no position to decide because he did not know the actual strength of the armed forces, and the attitude of the Navy was cowardly.
- 35868 *Of course the Navy had an interest in the successful conclusion of the negotiations, but the success of them depended upon the terms and the extent to which they were to be relaxed. It was, therefore, an entirely separate matter.
- 35869 *He had not heard that the Navy was willing to leave to the Premier the question of relaxation of the terms. The Navy said it would entrust the decision to the Prime Minister with regard to whether the negotiations should be continued or not, but nothing was said about entrusting to the Premier with any decision with regard to the terms as based those of the 6th of September, and TOGO had never heard from anyone that the Navy had entrusted that decision on the terms to the Premier.

CROSS-EXAMINATION BY MR. KEENAN.

35870

* With respect to the telegram from President Roosevelt, TCGO stated that he only spoke to KIDO of the general purport of the telegram. On the 7th of December there was no occasion in which he communicated with KIDO. He did not converse with him on the telephone during the 7th.

35872

* About ten minutes before three o'clock on the morning of the 8th, TCGO was awaiting audience in the anteroom of the Palace.

35873

About four minutes before three, KIDO entered. Since he had spoke to him earlier that morning about Grew having brought a message addressed by the President of the United States, * he immediately entered into a conversation about it. KIDO knew that a message had come from Roosevelt because TCGO had told him. In the telephone conversation TCGO stated that he supposed KIDO knew that a message was coming from the President to the Emperor as reported by NCMURA. Grew had just brought the message.

35874

He told KIDO the message had just come and he had inquired from the Imperial Household with regard to an audience with the Emperor and he had been told that he should communicate with KIDO. He asked KIDO what they should do about it. * When he spoke on the telephone it did not seem that he knew anything about the message. The telegram from NCMURA merely announced that the President's message was being sent to the Emperor and he did not remember the exact words used. In accordance with precedent the message could be sent direct to the Imperial Household without being routed through diplomatic organs.

TCGO first knew of this around 11.40 or 11.50 a. m. on the 7th. * He had received official notice from the Ambassador that the message was en route. * He knew that it was on its way. In so far as he knew, the only exchange of telegrams between the Emperor and the President of the United States was in connection with the Seal Treaty and the one that was supposed to have been sent in connection with the KONOYE incident on the Yangtze River. He knew of the tense conditions at the time and that is why when the message had been received from NCMURA he had inquired from the Imperial Household Ministry whether such a telegram had reached them. * He made the inquiry a number of times. If the telegram reached Japan, it would arrive at either the Imperial Household or the Foreign Office, and nowhere else. And if it did not come to the Foreign Office, the only way to ascertain whether the telegram had arrived or not was to ask. He made an inquiry and got a negative answer. One inquiry was made before noon and the other between five and six in the afternoon. TCGO did not make the telephone call.

35878

*He did not even dream that there would be any difficulty in locating it at the Imperial Palace to deliver the telegram. TOGO transmitted to the Emperor the message he received from Grew. The Emperor did not receive the telegram. He learned during the trial that the delivery had been held up. It was only last year that he first heard that the telegram to Grew had been delayed in its delivery. He talked to the Foreign Office officials about this matter and advised that some investigation be made.

35879

*Grew brought a decoded telegram which TOGO had translated into Japanese and it was this translation which he showed to the Emperor about 3 A.M. December 8. TOGO spoke of the entire message on the basis of this translation and he heard what was to be the Emperor's reply. He later communicated this to Grew. After the Emperor heard of the contents of the *message, he asked what reply might be made. In response to this, he told him of the consultation which he had had with TOJO and which KIDO had agreed with. The Emperor stated that the love of peace was his hope. Part of the contents that I just related was what I told the Emperor. This was a suggestion for a reply to President Roosevelt.

*In response to the Emperor's question, TOGO stated that it would be well if the Emperor replied in the language which was contained later in the reply handed to Grew. I told him that TOJO already knew this. The Emperor agreed and TOGO left.

35882

*He did not mean by the reply handed to Grew a copy of the communication theretofore sent to Washington. The confusion arose due to some misunderstanding on the part of Grew. The reply was that the message had been received and its contents represented only a part of the issues which had long been discussed. Japan's wishes and opinions had been fully explained and the President should be well aware of it. *It concluded with the Emperor's statement that he desired peace as ever but with regard to the proposal, he requested understanding of the points. This message was sent through Grew about 7:30 A.M. on the 8th.

35883

They did not discuss any question about the fact that it was too late because hostilities were being opened. TOGO did not know that hostilities were to open around 3 A.M. The telegram addressed to the Emperor concerned possible exercise of political power by the Emperor. The witness had not heard any orders given by the Emperor telling KIDO to come to the conference. When .

holding an Imperial audience, it was customary to go alone. If the Emperor desired to ask anything of KIDO, he would do that on a separate occasion. It would have been inconceivable for TOGO to ask the Emperor to call KIDO.

*KIDO had told TOGO that the Emperor would give him an audience at any hour and stated that he would also go to the palace. Shortly after KIDO came into the waiting room where TOGO was.

Page

35889 * TOGO stated that he did not read and speak English freely. On the morning of 8 December 1941 he called on TOJO and explained the contents of the message on the basis of the translation. The message was as follows: "President Roosevelt had proposed before withdrawal of troops from FIC, and Roosevelt stated that he had heard that troops were being concentrated in that area and the powers were uneasy and the US was greatly concerned. It was Roosevelt's desire that the troops be withdrawn from FIC, and the US had no intention of invading that territory, and was prepared to see that the Netherlands, Siam and China also did not invade that territory." (Exhibit 1245).

Afterward TOJO asked TOGO whether the US was not conceding more than that, and TOGO replied that nothing more was being conceded. Thereupon TOJO replied that there was nothing that could be done.

35891 * With respect to withdrawing Japanese troops from FIC, TOGO reminded TOJO that this had been brought up in a personal talk between Roosevelt and NOMURA during the Third KONOYE Cabinet, and further, that at that time the Japanese Government had rejected the proposal. TOJO said he remembered the situation very well and that at present it was impossible to save the situation on the basis of such a proposal. Thereafter, TOGO and TOJO consulted on a proposed draft of a reply to be sent by the Emperor to Roosevelt.

35892 * The message of President Roosevelt is recorded in Ex. 1245, and TOGO stated that he understood the message generally in English, but in order to explain the details he used the Japanese translation when speaking to TOJO.

35893 * TOGO stated that he realized that this was a very important message between two very important figures in the world at the time. He stated that he read almost the entire text of the message to TOJO. At that time the basic question was to report the matter to the Emperor as soon as possible. There was a considerable amount of historical background, including relations between the two countries, and TOGO did not consider it necessary to relate the entire contents, in order to enable TOJO to make a proper judgment, so he skipped a few passages.* He stated that he read the entire message to the Emperor.

35894 TOGO recalled reading two paragraphs of Exhibit 1245-J, as follows: "The people of the United States, believing in peace and in the right of nations to live and let live, have eagerly watched the conversations between our two Governments during these past months. We have hoped for a termination of the present conflict between Japan and China. We have hoped that a peace of the Pacific could be consummated in such a way that nationalities of many diverse peoples could exist side * by side without fear of invasion; that unbearable burdens of armaments could be lifted for them all; and that all peoples would resume commerce without discrimination against or in favor of any nation.

35896 "I am certain that it will be clear to Your Majesty, as it is to me, that in seeking these great objectives both Japan and the United States should agree to eliminate any form of military threat. This seemed essential to the attainment of the high objectives." TOGO stated that he regarded that as an important passage, and on the basis of the Japanese translation, he read it to TOJO.* He also had a very definite recollection that he read the message word for word to the Emperor.

35898 * TOGO wished to make a correction in the record to show that he met KIDO four or five minutes before 3 o'clock on the morning of 8 December 1948. He stated that this correction did not mean that he had a somewhat longer conversation with KIDO than his testimony would indicate.* He stated that he saw the Emperor at 3 o'clock.

35900 After KIDO gave TOGO his opinion, he asked what TOJO's opinion was, and TOGO replied that TOJO's opinion was the same as KIDO's. Then KIDO replied, "I see that it won't do." * It was after TOGO had told KIDO the contents of the message that KIDO expressed his views that it was not worthwhile, and, of course, his reply relates to the fact that by the contents of the message alone the situation could not be saved. TOGO told KIDO the results of his talk with TOJO and told him that TOJO's opinion was the same as KIDO's.

35901 * TOGO stated that he did not tell KIDO that the text of a reply had been decided on. There had been an agreement of views between TOGO and TOJO. TOGO stated that it was only natural that the Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal would be concerned with the Emperor's reply to the Roosevelt message.

35903 * TOGO stated that as he testified previously, it was his understanding that the Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal would reply to any inquiries addressed to him by the Throne, and he would also advise the Throne on any matters which he deemed proper. He also stated it was true that there were many duties of the Lord Keeper in advising the Emperor when it was proper for him to take political action and when it was not proper.

35904 * TOGO stated that KIDO was not a member of the Cabinet and that he was in no position to speak to the Emperor about KIDO's views. It was true that he suggested the draft of the reply to the Emperor and obtained his consent at that meeting. This consent refers to the consent of the Emperor of Japan and not to the consent of KIDO. TOGO did not know whether there was talk between the Emperor and KIDO and whether there was any opportunity for a conversation between the two.

35905 * During TOGO's audience with the Emperor there was no mention of KIDO.

35906 * After TOGO left the Emperor's presence he returned to the waiting room, but there was no one there. When he asked the Chamberlain where KIDO was, he replied that KIDO did not appear to be in his room, so TOGO left the premises. Since TOGO had already talked to KIDO before his audience with the Emperor, KIDO was in a position to advise the Throne if he deemed it to be proper, and TOGO stated 35907 that KIDO could have had an audience with the Emperor independent of TOGO.

35909 TOGO stated that after he left the presence of the Emperor he had no opportunity to see KIDO, so he did not talk with him. Since he had seen him before the audience and since KIDO understood the general circumstances of the matter, TOGO did not think it necessary to give him any further explanation. *TOGO stated that he thought the time he left the Emperor was about fifteen minutes past 3 o'clock, or the audience may have been a little longer.

35911 * As the question of the message from Roosevelt related to political affairs and the matter concerned the conveying of the Emperor's wishes to the sovereign of another party, the matter of

35918 * As there are three or four passages in which there are errors, TOGO could not say that this document was prepared by one who was 35919 fully informed of the facts. * He could not say that the document 35920 was substantially correct. * The witness was asked to refer to the paragraphs which were wrong and then give his reasons why the para-35921 graph was wrong. *The witness stated that the first error was in paragraph III at the passage, "...since it was midnight...arrangement for an audience" could not be made "until the following morning."
This was not a fact. TOGO stated that it being midnight, he could not reply as to when an audience could be arranged without first consulting the Imperial Household Department. He asked that the above passage be corrected as he had just explained it.

The next correction was in paragraph IV where it states ".... with the Premier and others." At that time TOGO only met TOJO, and at the official residence he met no one other than him. TOGO desired this correction to be made also.

35922 * TOGO stated that in order to make the document complete and accurate, the fact that he met KIDO should be mentioned.

The next passage is on page 2, ordinal 3 of the English text, in which it is stated under "Note", "at the time of the conversation on the morning of the 8th." The one who wrote this document assumed that the Ambassadors did not know; but as far as TOGO was concerned, he had no information which would permit him to assume that they did or did not know.

35923 * The next passage is the third from the last on page 3, beginning, "if you have something to add besides the personal message, I will naturally give considerations." With regard to this point, TOGO recalls that he asked Ambassador Grew whether there was something that he wanted to add in addition to what had already been presented in writing, to which he replied that he had nothing to add. TOGO recalled that as far as this point was concerned, their conversation was concluded. Subject to those corrections, TOGO could confirm the contents of the document as fact.

35925 Exhibit 3647 stated that the UP wire received the morning of 7 December reported that Hull officially announce that Roosevelt's message had been sent to the Emperor. The authorities in the Foreign Ministry, therefore, were awaiting the arrival of the message. The arrival of the message was delayed considerably, and it was after 10 o'clock that evening when Grew finally sent word to TOGO that he wanted to see him as he had just received instructions on an urgent and vital matter and they were deciphering the telegram. At midnight of the same day, Grew called on TOGO in order that TOGO might use his good offices as Foreign Minister to secure an audience with the Emperor for Grew as he had been instructed to present Roosevelt's personal message to the Emperor personally. * TOGO replied to the effect that since it was midnight he could not make arrangements for an audience with the Emperor until the following morning, but whether the Ambassador would be received in audience as he wished would depend on the contents of the message. Grew thereupon handed a prepared copy to TOGO, saying that he was again requesting special consideration for an audience with the Emperor which was most necessary in view of the exceedingly grave situation. Grew left, promising to see TOGO again.

35926 * TOGO went to TOJO's official residence with the translation of the personal message, and as the result of a hasty conference with TOJO and others, TOGO decided generally as to the method of handling the matter. At 2:30 a.m., the same night, he gave a detailed report to the Throne. (The Emperor appeared in full naval uniform.)

After TOGO returned to his residence after 3:30 a.m., he made arrangements to notify the British and American Ambassadors in Tokyo of the close of Japanese-American negotiations and made arrangements to notify Grew at 6 a.m. on the same day of the opinion of the Emperor regarding Roosevelt's message. The Emperor's reply was that the Emperor had had the Japanese Government reply to Roosevelt's inquiry concerning the circumstances surrounding the concentration of Japanese troops in FIC. The withdrawal of troops from FIC constitutes an item in the Japanese American negotiation, and since he 35927 * had had the Japanese Government express its intentions, he hoped that Roosevelt would understand. It was the Emperor's desire to bring about peace and quiet to the Pacific and the whole world, and he was sure that Roosevelt would truly acknowledge the fact that he had been having his Government make efforts for that purpose.

Soon after 4 o'clock, OKA, Director of the Naval Affairs Bureau reported to the Minister over the telephone of the success of the surprise attack on Pearl Harbor. On the morning of the 8th TOGO received the British and American Ambassadors, and a conversation took place between Grew and TOGO. Secretary KAZE was present as interpreter. The personal message was never presented to the Emperor at all. Both the British and American Ambassadors did not know of the outbreak of the state of war prior to the conversation on the 35928 morning of the 8th.

35929 * Exhibit 3647 continues the conversation between TCGO and Grew, December 8, 1941. TCGO told Grew that he had had the opportunity, after talking with Grew, to obtain the Emperor's opinion regarding Roosevelt's message. The Emperor ordered TCGO to reply to Roosevelt's message to the effect that the Japanese government would reply concerning the concentration of Japanese troops in FIC and the withdrawal of troops from FIC, and he 35930 hoped that Hull would understand the reply. * The Emperor stated that it was his cherished desire to bring about peace in the Pacific and the whole world. TCGO stated that Grew listened to this in awe and replied that he would deliver the Emperor's opinion to Roosevelt. He also requested an audience with the Emperor, since relations between the two nations at that time were at a great crisis. TCGO replied that he felt the audience unnecessary unless Grew had something to add besides the personal message.

*TCGO asked to have two further corrections made as to Exhibit 3647. The first correction was in Paragraph V. The text reads, "He made arrangements to notify the British and American Ambassadors in Tokyo of the close of the Japanese-American negotiations." The notification was actually given to Secretary of State Hull in Washington by NOMURA. This was the formal notification. The notification given to the British and American 35932 ambassadors in Tokyo * was a copy of that handed to Hull. Note number 2
35933 * stated that the personal message was never presented to the Throne at all. TCGO explained that although the personal telegram itself was never presented to the Emperor, the contents were presented to the Emperor through the document which was given him by Grew. He was to have that point clarified.

He stated that the statement was correct that OKA reported to TCGO over the telephone the success of the surprise attack on Pearl Harbor. He stated it was true that OKA used the words "surprise attack" on Hawaii. It was TCGO's first notification of an attack on Hawaii. As 35934 * to the meaning of the words "full naval uniform" with reference to the statement that the Emperor met TCGO in full uniform, TCGO explained that this was not full dress, but that the Emperor was simply wearing full uniform. He explained the Emperor always wore a uniform; sometimes he appeared in military uniform and sometimes in naval uniform. TCGO didn't think there was any significance in the Emperor receiving him in the formal dress attire of a naval officer at the time hostilities were opened against the U. S. at Pearl Harbor.

TCGO stated he never saw the telegrams or communications that were sent from the Foreign Ministry with TCGO's name attached to Honolulu with the name RYUJI concerning military installations, ship movements, etc. at Pearl Harbor from November 15 to December 6, 1941. He knew nothing about them.

- 35936 * As to whether the Navy Minister had responsibility on the question of the movement of shipping, TOGO replied that the Foreign Ministry had received a request from the chief of the 3rd Department of the Naval General Staff to find out information regarding the movement of ships. Therefore he believed that SHIMADA didn't know anything about the matter and had no responsibility. It was only after the war had ended that he learned that the Naval General Staff had made such a request to the Foreign Office regarding ship movements.
- 35937 * TOGO further explained that if younger officials or members of a ministry do something criminal the minister in charge of the ministry would have no responsibility unless he knew of the action and did nothing to stop it, or unless there was gross negligence on his part in not learning of such criminal actions. * As to the request of the Foreign Office for information from Japanese spies in Hawaii as to whether or not there were balloon barrages for protection against air attack or nets protecting battleships from torpedoes, TOGO stated that if a superior officer did not know that such telegrams were being sent or such reports were being received, it is impossible for him to take any responsibility.
- 35940 TOGO stated he was not told anything about the attack until it had happened. * He didn't believe that his subordinates were given any hints that an attack on Pearl Harbor was being contemplated. After the conclusion of the war, he learned that similar telegrams requesting this information were sent to other parts of the world at the same time. After the war it became clear that this kind of information was requested by the navy several months previous to the opening of hostilities and was handled as ordinary routine matter. These telegrams were never seen by the minister or the vice minister. * He explained that a section chief is not a high official of the Foreign Ministry. The higher authorities of the Foreign Ministry are the Foreign and vice-minister.
- 35941
- 35942 * As to Grew's visit to TOGO on December 8, 1941, TOGO stated that Grew was very serious, and before Grew called on TOGO he had learned that there was to be an announcement from Imperial Headquarters that Japan had
- 35943 * opened hostilities, and he assumed that Grew also knew about this. TOGO had already been permitted to deliver the Emperor's reply, and it had been
- 35944 telegraphed by Grew to Washington. * Grew expressed his desire to obtain an audience with the Emperor, but he told him that if he had nothing further to add the situation had developed so far that there was no use in having such an audience. TOGO stated that Grew made this request in the same spirit that he had made it the night before when he called on TOGO to request an audience with the Emperor. TOGO explained that since he didn't know anything about the attack on Pearl Harbor he had no information to furnish Grew on the attack. At that time TOGO explained the two countries were not yet in a state of war.

- 35947 * Crew's request for an audience with the Emperor came at 0015 on the morning of December 8, and at that time hostilities had not begun. TOGO stated he did not know the Emperor was going to sign a rescript for
- 35948 war within a matter of two or three hours. * In the first place, he stated he didn't know that an attack on Pearl Harbor was being contemplated. He did have misgivings that America might provoke Japan into taking the first
- 35949 overt step. * TOGO stated that he did not entertain such feelings as shame-faced conduct, and that he would've preferred to have Crew learn it for the first time from the cold steel helmets of the gendarmerie that would confine Crew for a considerable period of time.
- 35956 * As to the negotiations with the USSR as to the Manchukuo purchase of the half interest in the Chinese Eastern Railway, TOGO stated that he had forgotten many of the details, but that he was generally aware of the
- 35957 situation. * He recalled that declarations were made by the Soviet to the effect that the functioning of the CER was disrupted by actions of the Japanese Manchurian authorities. He also recalled that the Soviet Commissar for Foreign Affairs made a statement to the Japanese ambassador that there was considerable friction between the Soviet and Japan with respect to the Railway, and to eliminate such friction and to smooth out relations between the two countries the Soviet decided to sell her interest in the railway.
- 35960 * The witness was handed exhibit 3648, a statement of the Deputy People's Commissar to Ambassador OTA of April 16, 1933. The witness examined it and stated that he did recall statements made by Mr. Karakhhan to the Japanese ambassador, and supposed this document to be those
- 35962 statements. However, he could not confirm the contents of the document as being the statements. * When asked if he recalled that on May 2, 1933, Litvinov of the Soviet made a statement to the Japanese Ambassador that Japanese officials instigated the Manchurian authorities to commit acts of violence against the Soviet, he stated that he recalled that some statements of that nature were made.
- 35963 * Exhibit 3649, a statement of the People's Commissar to Ambassador OTA of May 2, 1933, was handed to the witness, who stated that this exhibit in substance correctly stated the representations made by Litvinov to the Japanese ambassador.
- 35964 * The witness was handed exhibit 3650 from the Soviet Ambassador to HIROTA of August 22, 1934, for examination, and he had no recollection as to whether or not it was a note of the Soviet Ambassador to HIROTA. He did recall that many incidents were occurring in connection with the

He recalled that the Manchurian authorities protested to the Soviet because Soviet employees of the railway were using the railway to conduct communist propaganda. He stated there may have been protests in regard to the incidents in exhibit 3650, but he didn't recall the document itself.

35966

* The witness was handed document 3651, a memorandum on the basic principles of the CER, July 3, 1933, of which he had no recollection. He recalled that there may have been representations made by the Soviet government that it was forced to dispose of the railway because of unlawful pressure exerted on the Soviet. * He recalled that the fundamental motive of the sale was that their receipts were not sufficient to cover the railroad's losses, and by the sale of the railway they hoped to create better relations with Japan.

In any case, he explained that a seller always wants to sell his goods for as high a price as he can get, and the price set by the Soviet of 450,000,000 gold rubles was questionable. As to the reduction in price, TCGO stated that the Soviet had given such reasons as they were forced to dispose of the railway because of unlawful pressure. However, the Manchurian side had a different story to tell.

*TOGO did not know a German military attache named von Petersborf who was in Tokyo from 1940 to 1942. He had never heard the name Petersborf. He may have met him at functions sponsored by the German Embassy but he had no recollection of having done so and knew nothing of his espionage activities.

*EX. 3652, Map of border between USSR and outer Mongolia, including certificate of Aug 15 1947 of Major Bazenko, Chief of Documents of Soviet Division IPS. TOGO had talks in 1940 with Foreign Commisar Molotov regarding the delimitation of their border line and reached an agreement with Molotov. He did recall that a map was drawn and a border line established, and that the map was initialed by Molotov and himself.

*When asked if he recognized the map that was initialed by Molotov and himself TOGO stated that his initials were not in the place where he initialed them in the original but he did find the seal of the Japanese Embassy on the map. He did not think there was any mistake that this was a copy of the map initialed by himself and Molotov. TOGO did find the initials of Molotov on the map.. also his own.

35973

*TOGO stated that exhibit 3652 was attached to the agreement of June 9 1940 regarding the rectification of the Mongolian People's Republic and Manchoukuo border line in the area of Lake Buir-Nur and the Numurgin-Gol river.

TOGO stated he was then chief of the Bureau of Europe-Asiatic Affairs in the Foreign Ministry and had direct charge of the matter then under discussion concerning the Chinese Eastern Railway. He was the official in Japan directly concerned with that negotiation.

*TOGO stated in July 1933 the Japanese Government was merely acting as a go-between. The actual negotiations were being carried on in Tokyo between the Soviet and the Manchukuoan representatives. The situation had not yet developed as far as to enable TOGO to speak directly with the Soviet representatives concerning negotiations for the sale of the Chinese Eastern Railway. The negotiations were commenced in Tokyo and concluded in Tokyo. He said the newness of the state had nothing to do with it. The Manchukuoan and the Soviet representatives wished to conduct negotiations for the sale and purchase of the Chinese Eastern Railway. The Soviet asked the negotiations be held in Tokyo as that was most convenient for them and that is why they were held there.

*TOGO stated that sometimes he did consult with counsel in the interim between sessions while on the witness stand and sometimes did not. He never talked with counsel with a view to changing any testimony he may have given but sometimes his attention was drawn to mistakes he may have made. The correction made with reference to the time TOGO met KIDO was the only instance TOGO talked with his counsel during the interims between sessions under cross-examination. He stated it was true that one or more of the accused had threatened him if he gave certain testimony but he did not consider it a threat to do him bodily harm. He was not able to understand specifically what the person who threatened him intended to do. All he heard was if he gave certain testimony it would not be for his good.

*TOGO stated it was difficult for him to try to interpret what the accused meant by what he said. It was SHIMADA who said it would not be for TOGO's good to testify as to certain things. TOGO recalled he had said SHIMADA had used words which sounded like a threat. He had never heard such words from the Japanese counsel. He had never heard anything of that nature from any counsel.

35979

*Until TOGO assumed his post in the TOJO cabinet his knowledge of the Japanese-American negotiations was restricted to that gained from newspapers and journalists. He also heard from friends in the Foreign Office broad outlines of those negotiations but heard nothing regarding specific details. Before accepting TOJO's request he did hear TOJO's explanation of the situation. That was all he knew of the negotiations when he assumed his post. At that time the Japanese-American negotiations were "State Secret" and discussing these matters was forbidden by law. TOGO had no chance to learn specific details of these negotiations. Therefore he had no opportunity to see his predecessor, TOYODA's written views.

35980

*Any person not connected with the liaison conferences or cabinet matters had no means of accurately sizing up the state of the Japanese-American negotiations regardless what his position might be. TOGO's whole knowledge regarding these negotiations was gleaned exclusively from newspapers, journalists and friends in the Foreign Office until he met TOJO.

35981

*After meeting TOJO and after being appointed Foreign Minister TOGO studied all the details. Before becoming Foreign Minister he had no time or opportunity to hear from cabinet members concerned with the negotiations. The greater part of his information was gathered from publications and conferences with TOJO. Only officials of the Foreign Office directly concerned with the negotiations would have the opportunity to know the details of the negotiations.

35983 *TOGO knew nothing of the details of the Imperial Conference of Sept 6 1941. He did not know an Imperial Conference had been held on that day nor did he know the actual contents of that conference. All he heard from Foreign Office acquaintances was that the success or failure of the negotiations had to be settled by the middle of October. Since the negotiations were a State secret he was not in a position to ask for such information. This was also true of the Liaison Conferences as well as the Imperial Conferences.

35984 *He did of course know of the existence of Imperial Conferences before he became Foreign Minister. He did not have the right to learn what was decided at Imperial Conferences or Liaison Conferences regarding relations with western Powers before assuming the important duty of Foreign Minister because he was not then in a position to be directly concerned with the negotiations and therefore had no right to ask for any explanations regarding them. He had been able to get a general idea of the situation regarding the negotiations from TOJO who was not yet Premier but who had nevertheless received the Imperial Command. If TOJO were to be punished for revealing State secrets to * 35985 TOGO, TOJO must have told him of them with full knowledge of possible consequences.

35986 Since Japanese-American negotiations were a State secret, no one not connected directly with those negotiations would know any more than himself regarding the details. His sole sources of information before meeting TOJO were the newspapers, talks by journalists and information regarding the general outline of the negotiations from friends in the Foreign Office. TOGO told TOJO he would not enter his cabinet unless TOJO really intended to carry the negotiations through. TOGO's reason for making this statement was that he had heard the reason for the collapse of the third KONOYE Cabinet was that the army took a very obstreperous stand.* This was general knowledge and would not come under the category of state secrets. He had learned from journalists and from newspaper writers that the reason for the fall of the KONOYE Cabinet was the stern military position taken by TOJO.

35987 *When asked if he drew a distinction between what the newspapers writers knew and what they printed in their papers TOGO replied that no newspaper is able to print all its reporters know. What they could print would depend on the policy of the censor and the Information Bureau which was responsible for controlling newspapers at the time. TOGO didn't know what that policy was.

TOGO did not intend to intimate or contend that the newspapers of Japan at or about the time of the formation of the TOJO Cabinet in 1941 had about the same freedom and liberty of expression as existed in the U.S. in the years TOGO served there. But he did know that even American newspapers of 1940 as compared to those of 1929 did reflect the feeling of the government to a greater degree. Reports from NOMURA indicated this same thing.

*TOGO was opposed to the Tripartite alliance. In human affairs trends are found and in foreign affairs there is also a certain continuity. It is difficult to try to change that established fact. After TOGO became Foreign Minister the situation was such that it was impossible for him to call for the immediate abrogation of the Tripartite Pact. He felt that the Tripartite Pact made Japan's international position very difficult.

35990

*If the effect of the Tripartite Pact was for peace, if it did have some force for peace, one couldn't say it was evil. If the Tripartite Pact were for peace one couldn't call it evil. But TOGO didn't say that the essence of the Tripartite Pact was either good or bad.

35991

*TOGO personally did not approve of HITLER's methods, nor did he approve of Hitler's results that he got temporarily.

35992

*TOGO knew at the time -Oct. 1941, that Hitler had established a totalitarian state in Germany. He knew it was a dictatorial totalitarian state. He had not heard about the concentration camps for those who did not adhere to Hitler's views when he was in Germany. * He never had the opportunity to see the concentration camps and his knowledge concerning them was inadequate. He knew it was becoming very difficult for Jews to live in Germany and that many had been forced to emigrate. He didn't know too much about the concentration camps they had been put in. He didn't speak German very well. His wife was a German by birth.

TOGO stated his knowledge concerning Germany was limited and his knowledge concerning concentration camps inadequate. He arrived in Germany in Dec. 1937 as ambassador and stayed less than one year. Previously he was in Germany as counsellor of the Embassy but the Hitler regime had not yet come into power. The Hitler regime was established after his departure from Germany. * In October 1941 TOGO was not well acquainted with the Nazi regime in Germany.

The phrase "new order" is in the Tripartite Pact text but TOGO did not think the meaning of the phrase was defined between the countries at the time. The best interpretation of the phrase was that it was a kind of slogan. As to what Hitler's New Order actually signified TOGO could not say. The main purpose to establish this new order throughout Europe and Asia is written in the text of the pact but there is no document showing what is actually meant by the phrase.

* order throughout Europe and Asia is written in the text of the pact but there is no document showing what is actually meant by the phrase.

35998

TOGO stated it was conceivable that Hitler's and Mussolini's practices for many years amply demonstrated what they meant by the new order. TOGO's concept of the treaty was that three great nations, Germany, Italy and Japan joined together in a solemn pact for a new order without having any common understanding as to what the new order should be. When asked if it were not important for the contracting nations to have some common agreement as to what that new order should be TOGO stated that treaties carry slogans and are often concluded with the meaning left quite vague. His own opinion regarding this pact was although the object of the treaty was said to be the establishment of the new order, this phrase was not qualified. Therefore, the purpose of the treaty as a whole was not made clear. The actual situation was not such.

His opinion regarding the vagueness of the Tripartite Pact relates to the vagueness of the ideology underlying the Tripartite Pact. Regarding the Nine Power Pact regulating certain specific details one cannot say the same thing. He thought the Nine Power Pact was quite explicit. He knew the general outline of that pact.

*TOGO's feeling in joining the TOJO cabinet was that he was joining a war prevention cabinet. Regarding TOJO's statement that all members of his cabinet worked and acted in accordance with the principles of the TRIPARTITE PACT, TOGO stated he did not know what may have been in TOJO's mind. He may have carried on his policies that that in mind. But with respect to objective facts his statement was wrong.

35600

TOGO stated in regard to the Manchurian Incident, in a statement to UCHIDA, TOGO stated it was important that steps be taken to insure peace with China as quickly as possible. Furthermore he was opposed to sending troops to China when the China Incident broke out. He had so testified in his affidavit and other evidence presented before the Tribunal made that fact clear. Regarding these incidents he had the same feeling even after accepting the foreign portfolio. He said it was correct to state when he took the portfolio of foreign minister he was opposed to Japanese troops remaining in China and he held that belief after he became foreign minister.

36001 when TOJO asked TOGO to enter the cabinet he told TOGO he would be willing to consider that matter on a rational basis. Therefore TOGO *did not consider TOJO was adamant in calling for the maintenance of troops in China.

*TOGO did not consider TOJO a pacifist. When TOGO entered the cabinet he made some studies to acquaint himself with the facts in order to perform his duties. He saw for the first time the decisions of the Imperial Conferences of the preceding eight to ten months and studied them. He saw the decision of July 2nd but didnt see the records in regard to the conference but did see the document embodying the decision.

*Exhibit 588 in English and Japanese was handed to TOGO. He stated he knew after he became Foreign Minister of the resolution adopted by the Imperial Conference contained in the summary of the Empire's policy. * He recalled the first statement as to principle - paragraph a which read "Regardless of any change in the international situation, Japan will adhere to the principle of establishing a 'Greater East Asia Co-prosperity Sphere', and accordingly contribute to the establishment of world peace".

36003

He recalled "b Japan will continue the disposition of the Chinese incident and will step up the Southward advance in order to establish for herself a basis for self-existence and self-defense. The Northern problems will be dealt with according to the changes in the situations."

He learned of this in the course of his investigation. He also recalled "c Japan will remove all obstacles for the achievement of the foregoing purpose".

*The decision was made to reconsider the decision of Sept. 6, but TOGO could not recall that the decision of July 2nd ever came up for discussion at all. He recalled the statement in Exhibit 588, the record of the Conference in the Imperial Presence of July 2, 1941 and the summary that in order to hasten the surrender of Chiang's regime, further pressure through the Southern regions will be strengthened to the changes in the situations, they shall execute their rights of war against the Chungking Regime at the proper time, and shall confiscate the enemy concessions in China.

He also recalled for the sake of her self-existence and self-defense, Japan would continue necessary diplomatic negotiations with relevant nations in the Southern regions and would also promote other necessary measures. For this purpose they would make preparations for a war with Britain and the U.S. First they would accomplish the execution

36006 * of their schemes against French Indo-China and Thailand following the Principle Policy toward French Indo-China and Thailand, and Matters concerning the promotion of their Southern Policy, thereby stabilizing their structure for the Southern advances. In order to achieve this purpose, Japan will not hesitate to have a war with Britain and the United States.

He also recalled the provision, though the spirit of the tripartite axis will form the keynote of their attitude toward the German Soviet war, they shall not intervene for a while, but take voluntary measures by secretly preparing arms against the Soviet Union. Meanwhile, diplomatic negotiations will be continued with detailed precautions; and should the conditions of the German Soviet war progress favorably to Japan they shall execute arms to solve the northern problems, thereby securing stability in the Northern Regions.

36007 In the accomplishment of the above, all measures, especially in the case of execution of arms, must be decided so that there will be no great difficulty in maintaining their basic posture for a war with Britain and the U.S. They shall do their utmost to prevent the U.S. participating in the war through diplomatic * measures in the pre-arranged programs, and every other possible way, but in case she should participate, Japan will act according to the Tripartite Pact. However, the time and method of military action will be decided independently.

36008 He read the above provisions at the time. TOGO as foreign minister executed policies with the purpose of removing friction between Japan and U.S. through the Japanese-American negotiations and to maintain peace between the two nations rather than with any idea of consummating the purpose mentioned in the document. Referring to note "c" of the summary which states "Though the spirit of the tripartite axis will form the keynote of our attitude toward the German Soviet war" and then goes on to state * that should the conditions of the German Soviet war progress favorable to Japan they shall execute arms to solve the northern problems, thereby securing stability in the Northern regions, TOGO said as Foreign Minister he never once executed policies in accordance with such principles.

Furthermore in note "b" was stated that Japan must stabilize her "structure for the Southern advance", and in order to do this Japan will not hesitate to have a war with Britain and the U.S. During his period in office as foreign minister, TOGO said his policy was rather one of withdrawing their troops from southern FIC and avoid a clash with Americans and Britains.

Paragraph "e" states that in case U.S. should participate in the European war Japan will act according to the Tripartite Pact. According to the text of this note it would mean that under such circumstances Japan would shoulder the obligation of assistance in line with Article 3 of the Tripartite Pact. However, after he became foreign minister, TOGO adopted the policy that in regard to this obligation of assistance the Japanese Government would arrive at an independent decision and in their exchanges with the United States, they said they would try to keep out of war even if the United States should participate.

* When asked as to page 3 of exhibit 588, under Section I, which reads that * Japan's minimum demand in her negotiations with the U. S. was that U. S. and Britain will not meddle in the disposition of the Chinese Incident, TOGO did remember that, but he thought this was one of the points of the decision of September 6. The witness was asked to review exhibit 588 and see if the decision contained the resolutions of Sept. 6, 1941, and TOGO replied that this document did contain the decisions reached at the Imperial Conference of September 6. He stated the provision with reference to the U. S. and Britain not interrupting the disposition of the Chinese Incident was adopted at the September 6 Imperial Conference, and the policy adopted during the period TOGO was Foreign Minister was considerably softened by this decision.

36012

* TOGO did think that the real hope of peace of the world consisted in arriving at a clear understanding between nations as to their mutual problems. He also stated that good faith in international affairs is as important as good faith among individuals. TOGO stressed this in the statement to Count UCHIDA in 1933. These sentiments are no different today than when he was foreign minister. TOGO said it was true that when he spoke of good faith between nations he included living up to treaties which had been entered into with other nations.

36013

* TOGO said it is true that good faith is not observed by keeping a treaty when it is advantageous to do so and breaking it when it seems to be somewhat burdensome. He remembered the Nine-Power Treaty referred to in his affidavit in connection with a request made on behalf of Germany, by Ribbentrop. TOGO said it was true that he felt then that giving special privileges to Germany in China was clearly violation of the Nine-Power Pact. * This was about May 1938. He answered that he thought he recognized the existence and the applicability of the terms of the 9-Power Treaty as late as May of 1938. He stated that his position was that the terms of that Treaty applied equally to each and every signatory nation, including Japan.

36015 TOGO said that it was true that the Treaty clearly provided for the territorial integrity of China and respect for its sovereignty as a separate term. He stated it was true that each of the other nations agreed that they would all have the same rights and privileges in China. * It was also true that the Treaty provided that the others agreed to respect the independence of China.

He recalled there was a provision that the powers other than China agreed to provide the fullest opportunity to China to develop and maintain an effective and stable government. He stated it was true that the treaty included a provision that the powers would use influence to establish and maintain the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations throughout the territory of China.

The witness agreed the Treaty provided that to effectuate the Open Door, the powers other than China agreed that they would not seek any arrangements which would establish in their favor superiority of rights with respect to commercial or economic development in any designated region of China.

36016 * TCGO agreed that one of the principal matters pending in 36017 conversations with U. S. was equal rights and opportunity of the U.S. and other nations signatory to this pact in China. * TOGO recalled 36018 that U. S. protests regarding the infringement of rights in China were received repeatedly since the Manchurian Incident, and he said it was true that he refused to advocate any such proposition or plan. * He said he would not deny the soundness of the claims of the U. S. in this regard, but at the same time he did not possess the data to claim that Japan's claims in this regard were mistaken. He stated that as Foreign Minister he had no intention to deny the justice of U. S. claims under the Nine-Power Treaty.

36019 In the negotiations toward peace, he stated the U. S. did not ask for any concession other than the right of equal opportunity possessed under the Nine-Power Treaty. * TOGO stated that the demands made by U. S. in regard to China were embodied in the Hull note of November 26--equal opportunity; fair treatment in regard to trade and commerce; withdrawal of all Japanese troops from China; that Japan should recognize no government other than the Chungking Government.
TOGO stated that in regard to the first point, Japan's position on 36020 fair treatment concerning commerce and trade required a brief explanation.
* TOGO stated that as far as China was concerned, equal opportunity in trade and commerce had been agreed to by Japan and that other nations should enjoy in China under the Nine-Power Pact. However, he stated the U. S. was making demands not only in regard to China, but in regard to the entire Pacific area. Japan wanted the principles applied not only to China or the Pacific area, but to the whole world.

homeland, by restrictions on materials to be consumed in the China operations, any by curtailment of military educational materials that Japan was able to meet the situation in the early part of the Pacific War. Due to economic pressure by U.S. and Britain and especially the economic blockade of July 1941, it was impossible for Japan to obtain raw materials and other goods. Japan could not expand production sufficiently to wage a war against U.S. and Britain. Difficulties were encountered in production of air arms and oil fuel. Wholesale war preparations against U.S. and Britain were nonexistent so far as the Japanese Army was concerned, TOJO said.

36289 *TOJO stated Japan had ample resources but because of demands from industry Japan could never attain its full expansion. The Government reluctantly permitted youthful scholars to continue their studies. With the advance of the Pacific War, the insufficiency of manpower became evident. A call to the colors was made for the greater part of these students. Japan was unable to make effective war preparations simply by using her ample manpower.

36290 TOJO said that after the Imperial Conference decision 6 September, *U.S.-Japanese negotiations were conducted through TOYODA. Negotiations were conducted through two channels, one through NOMURA and the other through TOYODA and Grew. Japan's hopes were pinned on these negotiations and on a personal meeting between Roosevelt and KONOYE. According to Hull, the U.S. believed a personal meeting between the chiefs of two countries was dangerous unless an understanding was first reached on matters to be discussed at that meeting. In order to maintain peace in the Pacific the U.S. felt a "patched-up" talk would not answer the purpose. The U.S. insisted on a "clear-cut" agreement. U.S.

36291 *demanded recognition of four principles:

Respect for the sovereignty of all nations,

36292 principle of equality of commercial opportunity, and non-disturbance of the status-quo in the Pacific. The U.S. insisted on a clear-cut expression of Japan's intentions in regard to the Tripartite Alliance, the stationing of troops in China and elsewhere, and non-discrimination in international commerce. The hopelessness of the personal meeting was made clear by these developments. TOJO said Japan had made concessions to the U.S. so that the negotiations might be successfully concluded, and yet the U.S. made no response and did not move an inch from its proposal dated 21 June 1941.

The U.S. Policy at that time was disclosed by NOMURA in his October 3 dispatch. He stated that the U.S. was involved more in the Atlantic war, thus creating a lull in its move toward Japan but still continuing the economic pressure against Japan. NOMURA suggested this warranted urgent attention. NOMURA observed that the U.S. by waging an economic war while keeping out of war, could reap the fruits of victory over Japan without resorting to an act of war.

36293 TOJO said there was a telegram from the British Ambassador in Tokyo addressed to *British Foreign Minister Eden. The British Ambassador said that the prospect of a moderate policy on the part of Japan was improved after the resignation of MATSUOKA, and that the U.S. was dilatory in its dealings and was employing varied tactics to adjust relations between the two Powers. He observed that the United States might miss this fine chance by needless precautions caused by inability to comprehend Japan's real feelings and Japan's internal situation.

TOJO said they looked upon this as a typical observation by a third party. The situation was not remedied, and the U.S.-Japanese negotiations met with another obstacle. The Third KONOYE Cabinet collapsed in the middle of October.

36294 *TOJO stated that prior to the downfall of the Third KONOYE Government there was a consultation of five ministers of state on October 12 which was followed by the regular Cabinet Council on the 14th. At this Cabinet Council TOYODA and TOJO disagreed as to the ways and means of conducting future state policy. The controversy culminated in the resignation en masse of the KONOYE Ministry. TOJO said the details are described in the "Circumstances Relative to the Resignation of the Third KONOYE Cabinet", Ex. 1148, as well as in the entry of Marquis KIDO's diary of 15 October, Ex. 1150, but due to some discrepancies TOJO did review the events.

36295 *It was for determining the fundamental principles for an interview with Roosevelt that the Imperial Council of September 6 was convoked. The determination was the reason for the convocation of the said conference, but TOJO said it would be misleading to say that that was the only reason. The said conference was called in order to 36296 determine the means of executing the southern policy with our diplomatic outlook, and that fact was revealed by the agenda of the Conference. The Imperial High Command requested conference to start emergency operational plans.

Both the government and High Command, in conformity with the decision were proceeding with diplomacy and operational preparations. Operational preparations were going on as scheduled, while diplomatic negotiations with U.S. were far from smooth. As late as the last of September the conversations were deadlocked. The High Commands of both Army and Navy in the September 25 Liaison Conference demanded a prediction of the success or failure of the pending negotiations, and a decision as to peace versus war not later than the 1st of October.

36297 TOJO said as he had already stated, the U.S. did not accept Japan's proposal based on the September 6 decision nor KONOYE's proposal concerning the personal meeting. Hull gave the oral reply of October 2, in which a spirit of mutual concession was discernible. Immediately the government convened the Liaison Conference and investigated the document. Another Liaison Conference was called on October 9th, but it was difficult to arrive at any conclusion. The attitude of the Army General Staff was that no hope could be entertained about the U.S.-Japanese negotiations in view of the U.S. attitude.

The Army General Staff disagreed with the unconditional recognition of the four cardinal principles enunciated by U.S., as well as to conditions on stationing of troops. The Army General Staff did not intend to revise the 6 September decision.

*TOJO was informed by the Chief of the Army General Staff that the Navy General Staff had a similar concept. Imperial Headquarters apprehended America's policy of procrastination which might be imposed upon Japan. TOJO was of the same opinion. On the 10th of October he saw the Prime Minister and expressed the gist of the concepts entertained by Imperial Headquarters.

The 12 October meeting was attended by KONOME, Navy Minister OIKAWA, Foreign Minister TOYODA, President of the Planning Board SUZUKI and Minister of War TOJO. No person was present other than the five Ministers. TOJO said he did not counsel with the Chief of the General Staff or with any other staff officers before participating in the meeting as he was well acquainted with the views of the Imperial High Command.

As to the paragraph found on page 2 of the Japanese text of "The Circumstances Relative to Third KONOYE Cabinet's resignation" that on the day before the conference, OKA of the Naval Affairs Bureau stated that with the exception of the Naval General Staff the brains of the Navy didn't want a Japanese-U.S. war, but since the Navy approved the decision of the Imperial Headquarters, the Navy Minister proposed to leave it in the hands of the Prime Minister at the conference, but the Navy would like to continue the diplomatic negotiations, TOJO stated

These things never came to TOJO's knowledge or the knowledge of his subordinates at that time. That meeting was concerned with prospects of the current U.S.-Japanese parley as well as the decision on the issue of peace versus war. The argument lasted many hours and the major points in the contention held by several participants are recapitulated by TOJO though the details have gone from his memory.

*KONOYE and Navy Minister TOYODA felt if Japan held fast to her policies there could not be any conclusion. A specific concession on withdrawal of troops from China might be accompanied by some success. They suggested that Japan agree at first to withdraw troops in conformity with the U.S. requests, and, subsequently retain forces in China under an agreement made with China on an entirely new basis. This was tantamount to a revision of the September 6 decision.

36301

TOJO's position was that from the U.S. reply of October 2d, and U.S. refusal to a personal meeting of the chiefs of the two countries *no one could entertain hope that the parley would ever successfully be concluded. To continue the conversations longer Japan would suffer by U.S. dilatory policy. In case Japan was forced to war with the U.S., she would be in a precarious position by allowing herself to drift along with procrastination. TOJO felt this was the time to make a decision anticipated in the resolution of September 6th. It was clear that U.S. demanded Japan's unconditional withdrawal of troops. U.S. demanded an instantaneous and entire evacuation. TOJO felt any compromise with the U.S. was inconceivable along the line suggested by the two Ministers.

*TOJO felt if Japan swallowed U.S. demands, giving up the stationing of troops in China, not only would Japan gain nothing by these sacrifices in the course of the China Incident of more than four years standing, but also the Chinese contempt for Japan would increase if Japan withdraw troops from China unconditionally. Relations between Japan and China would grow 36303 worse coupled with the thorough resistance maintained by the Communists in China. Certainly China Incident II and China Incident III would result, and Japan's loss of prestige would be felt in Manchuria and Korea. Due to U.S. demand for Japan's recognition of four fundamental principles, a compromise with U.S. was impossible. TOJO would reconsider his position if the Foreign Minister believes there is any hope of success*in this connection. The issue of peace versus war could not be entrusted to the Prime Minister alone.

According to TOJO, the Minister of the Navy OIKAWA suggested the Premier be entrusted to say whether there is any hope in the war. However, he said if Japan was to fight now was the opportunity. If we are to go to war, OIKAWA hoped the decision would be now. If they waited two or three months and then go to war, the Navy would be annoyed indeed. If they were to do it diplomatically, OIKAWA urged them to do it diplomatically, right or wrong. As to a compromise and methods to achieve it, OIKAWA wanted to entrust this to the Premier.

36304 There was no agreement so by mutual consent they considered TOJO's proposition. This was that no alterations were to be made about the policy concerning the stationing of troops. *There was to be no impairment to the fruits of the China Incident.

As long as diplomatic proceedings were followed preparations for military operations were to be suspended. The Foreign Minister will investigate whether the above proposition is possible. This agreement was not reduced to writing, but this is corroborated by entry in KIDO's Diary of 12 October 1941 (Exhibit 1147).

Next morning TOJO met the Chief of the General Staff and gave him a resume of the Five Ministers' meeting, and briefly related the items in the mutual consent, indicating that he should suspend operational preparations while diplomatic negotiations were going on. The High Command was perplexed, but his assent was given.

36305 The 14th of October fell on the day on which a regular Cabinet council was to be held. *Prior to the Cabinet meeting TOJO saw KONOYE at his official residence. At the Cabinet council TOYODA expressed an opinion similar to that which he had disclosed during the talk at "Tekigaiso". TOJO also explained as he had done at that meeting. In this council KONOYE, OIKAWA, and other colleagues, except the Foreign Minister, did not make any remarks at all. A collision ensued between the Foreign Minister and TOJO, and that was all.

36306 *Details after that event are set forth in exhibit No. 1148, "The Circumstances Relative to the Third KONOYE Cabinet Resignation". On page 7 of the English text there is a statement that MUTO of the Military Affairs Bureau called on Chief Secretary TOMITA and reportedly requested that the Navy be asked to make a definite statement. When TOMITA relayed this to OKA of the Naval Affairs Bureau, OKA reportedly stated that the Navy could not say any more than that she would comply with the decision of the Premier, etc. About this matter, TOJO said he had a report from MUTO. Again on page 8 of the English text of the said exhibit, there is a statement that TOJO sent SUZUKI, President of the Planning Board, as his proxy to KONOYE to report that it was better that the decision of September 6th be tentatively reduced to a blank paper state and that Prince HIGASHIKUNI be requested to take the situation into his hand. TOJO said this doubtlessly is a fact. He met SUZUKI on the 14th of October in the official residence of the War Minister, and requested the Director to comply with his wishes.

TOJO stated the causes for the resignation of the Cabinet en bloc were that the steps in the U.S.-Japanese negotiations had not progressed to determine whether or not there was a hope of settling the matters diplomatically. Another cause was that the Navy was uncertain as to war.

TOJO said then it was obvious that the September 6 decision was not proper. If that decision was impossible to carry out, which TOJO's own opinion, the Government that formulated the policy should assume responsibility and resign en bloc to enable the incoming Cabinet to revise the decision and conduct the U.S.-Japanese negotiations with renewed courage.

On October 17th, TOJO was in his official residence preparing to move as his resignation had been tendered the day before. About half past three, he was informed by the Grand Chamberlain that he should proceed *to the Imperial Palace immediately as His Majesty so wished. This Imperial call was unexpected, and feeling that His Majesty wanted TOJO's views concerning the Cabinet resignation en masse, TOJO carried with him papers in preparation for replies to be offered to the Emperor.

It was past four p.m. when TOJO reached the Palace, and he was at once given audience of His Majesty who gave him the Imperial mandate to form the Cabinet. The Imperial utterances are given in the entry of the KIDO Diary of 17 October 1941. TOJO stated he asked His Majesty for time to consider, and withdrew. While he was sitting in the waiting room, Minister of the Navy OIKAWA, came to the Palace and was given audience by the Emperor and was given an Imperial message "to cooperate with the Army." Soon KIDO came into the same room and told OIKAWA and TOJO of the Imperial message. KIDO, in his Diary entry of 17 October 1941, stated that he imagined we had the Imperial Message of cooperation between the Army and the Navy.

*The Emperor had said that in determining the policies of the state His Majesty desired that careful considerations should be made without adhering to the decision of September 6th. KIDO said he offered this statement to them by order of His Majesty. This was subsequently known as the "Back to Blank Paper or clean slate."

36310 TOJO did not dream the Imperial Mandate would fall upon his shoulders. TOJO felt no one but Prince HIGASHIKUNI could control the army with success following the resignation of the KONOYE Cabinet. This opinion he expressed to KONOYE and also to KIDO,*and as he felt it was proper to bring his opinion to the knowledge of the Senior Statesmen, he requested SATO, Chief of the Military Affairs Section, to transmit this opinion to ABE and HAYASHI, and he did so. TOJO was advised that SATO transmitted to these men only the message that he had entrusted to SATO and nothing more, and that the two senior statesmen listened to him report this message with no comment. TOJO said that the testimony of TANAKA had no factual foundation whatsoever.

36311 TOJO's reason for advocating a member of the Royal blood to head the Cabinet was that the new Cabinet would be placed in a position to revise the decision of 6 September. Any decision by the outgoing Cabinet might be reversed by the incoming Cabinet. A decision of the Imperial Conference is of a different nature. It is a decision arrived at by the highest formality involving the participation of the Government as well as the High Command. A most perplexing situation might arise if the High Command refused to consent the revision of 6 September decision. In such eventuality a Cabinet headed by one of the Royal blood *could surmount that difficulty. TOJO thought it improper that he should be entrusted with the Premiership to succeed KONOYE, or even ordered to remain as War Minister, and he never dreamed such an event would occur. He felt this strongly since he had been the one to advocate the resignation of the Third KONOYE Cabinet, and also because he was one of the Ministers who formulated the decision of 6 September. If it had not been for the "clean slate" message from the Emperor, TOJO might have declined to accept the Imperial Mandate to form the new Cabinet.

36312 As for the "clean slate" message, he was firmly resolved that it must be accomplished without fail. Another thing was to set up a system of internal politics that would respond both to peace or to war. *TOJO concluded that the post of War Minister as well as Home Minister had to be assumed by himself, and requested KIDO to address the Throne in that respect. TOJO felt there would be internal confusion if peace were decided upon instead of war. To meet such a state of affairs he felt he should make himself responsible as Home Minister. To assume the post of War Minister, one had to be on the active list of the Army, so, on the confidential representation to the Throne by His Highness Prince KANIN, TOJO was placed once again on the active list and appointed a full General.

36313 The formation of a new ministry was hard so TOJO sought the Divine Will at Meiji Shrine and the TOGO Shrine. While so engaged, an idea for forming the ministry came to him. To complete the formation of a cabinet he must go to the last extremity. *No delay was permissible. As to the selection of personnel, he determined that it should be made on merits of each man. Those well trained in several administrative capacities should be assigned suitable posts. Persons of sound administrative experience with force of character would be selected so that they might execute the decisions of Cabinet fearlessly. No attention would be paid to political and Zaibatsu although they should not be shunned by reason of what they stood for.

36314 *In the evening of October 17 TOJO set to work on the formation of the ministry. In choosing the personnel, no consultation was made with anybody else, and he made the selections single handed. Because he needed an assistant, it was necessary for him first to choose the Chief Secretary of the Cabinet. He rang up HOSHINO at half-past eight that evening and asked him to comply with my wishes. HOSHINO having been one of his colleagues in the Second KONOYE Cabinet, TOJO considered him the ideal man for the post both in point of previous career and personal ability. HOSHINO came to see him, accepting the offer at once. The following persons agreed to act over the telephone: HASHIDA (candidate for Education Minister), IWAMURA (candidate for Justice Minister), INO (candidate for Agricultural Minister), KOIZUMI (candidate for Public Welfare Minister), SUZUKI (candidate for Director of the Planning Board), and KISHI (candidate for Minister of Commerce and Industry). KAYA, TOGO, TERAJIMA, and *YUZAWA consented after consulting with TOJO. TOGO and KAYA wanted to know if foreign policy was to be conducted strenuously along diplomatic lines. TOJO made plain the policy of a "CLEAN SLATE" and answered that Japan would do its utmost to put through U.S.-Japanese negotiations. Although YUZAWA was to be Vice-Minister, TOJO needed a person of ministerial calibre as he was going to assume the post of Home Minister.

Next morning (October 18th) TOJO received an exact report from DIKAWA, the Navy Minister, that SHIMADA inquired whether problems regarding U.S. were to be solved by diplomacy or not, and expressed a desire that a drastic change in the affairs at home be avoided. TOJO replied by enlarging upon "back to blank paper" policy, and TOJO assured him that drastic changes at home would of course not be resorted to. After hearing TOJO's words, SHIMADA consented to assume the post of Navy Minister.

On October 18th *TOJO and His Majesty paid personal homage to the YASUKUNI Shrine. At one p.m. he tendered to His Majesty a list of personnel for the succeeding ministry, and the investiture of the new ministers took place before the Throne at four p.m.

After the formation of the Cabinet, the Government and the Supreme Command immediately deliberated high state policy on the basis of policy of clean slate. From 23 October to 2 November Liaison Conferences were held frequently, and foreign affairs, national strength, and military matters excepting purely strategic problems were studied from all angles. As the result of U.S.

36317 demands of 2 October 1941, a proposed outline of negotiations *with U.S. was decided upon. This was the decision of the Imperial Conference of 5 November, and the contents, to the best of TOJO's recollection, are almost identical with the latter part of Exhibit No. 779.

Following this, three plans were finally drawn up. The first plan was to continue Japan-U.S. negotiations on the basis of the outline newly adopted for negotiations with America. Even if the negotiations ended, the Government was to continue its policy of patience and caution. The second plan called for the termination of negotiations and an immediate decision on war.

36318 The third plan was to continue negotiations with U.S. on the outline but a determination to go to war would be made in the event of the failure of negotiations, and operational preparations would be commenced accordingly. Diplomatic solution was to be had by the early part of December. If the negotiations *succeeded, all operation preparations were to be rescinded. In case the negotiations ended in failure, a decision to go to war was to be made forthwith. This decision on war was to be taken up at that time as an independent issue.

With regard to the first plan, it was impossible to accept in toto the U.S. proposal of 2 October. TOJO said it was probable that there would be no solution through diplomatic negotiations unless there was a change in U.S. attitude. There was no assurance that there would not be a rupture in the negotiations. If there were a rupture, the question of entering a war with U.S., Britain, and the NEI was one for reflection.

36319 TOJO said one reason was Japan had been engaged in the China Incident for over four years and there yet no settlement. From the standpoint of Japan's national strength and the sacrifices of her people *Japan must avoid war with United States and Britain on top of the China Incident. The fullest efforts of the nation must be exerted to solve the China Incident. TOJO stated that another reason Japan should not immediately go to war was the maintenance of military production in view of the continuance of the China Incident. The most important problem of all was the procurement of liquid fuel. For this reason, the problem of synthetic gasoline was undertaken with the object of producing the absolute minimum requirements.

TOJO said that of all the vital materials the one most affected as the result of the embargo by U.S., Britain, and the Netherlands was liquid fuel, and should matters progress as at present the Navy and the Air Force would come to a standstill within two years. A most serious study was being made on synthetic petroleum and completing installations. The annual minimum requirements was set at four million kilotons. It would require from four to seven years of the concentrated productive capacity of the synthetic industry alone, even by halting the military production for the Army and Navy. During this period it would be necessary to draw on the reserve stock even though it was impractical to operate on a reserve over so long a period. National defense would then face a serious danger.

36321

*To halt the major part of military production was something that the Army and the Navy would not countenance, TOJO stated. TOJO said that to adopt a policy of patience under such impediments would mean the self-annihilation of the nation. It were better to face death by breaking through the encircling ring. To burden the people with war against U.S. and Britain over and above the China Incident was something the Government could not easily urge, but it was thought that in the interests of Japan and her national honor the people would be willing to undergo further hardships.

36322

TOJO said the second plan, to go to war immediately was reasoned upon the basis that it was obviously impossible to accept the U.S. proposal of 2 October, and that there was no hope of surmounting the crisis and normalizing the relations between the two countries. To continue the negotiations would play into the hands of the U.S. policy of procrastination, and *in time the disparity of armaments between U.S. and Japan would further increase, and the reserve stock of oil would be lessened with no hope of replenishment. If there was no hope through diplomatic means then emphasis must be placed strategic measures. From a strategic viewpoint, November was the most suitable period from a meteorological aspect as well as for operations. In December, landing difficulties would increase but it was still possible to carry out operations. After that it would be necessary to wait a year. There was the danger of an exhaustion of liquid fuel and, during the following year, the strength of the U.S. Navy would be vastly augmented. This was the view of the Supreme Command.

36323

TOJO said the opposition contended it was not proper to admit that there was no possibility of finding a solution through diplomatic means. It was felt that so long as there was a slight hope *of diplomatic solution those measures should be resorted to up to the very limit. It was recognized that there would be strategic handicaps but preparations for strategic needs could be advanced while continuing diplomatic negotiations. In fact, by so doing there might be reconsideration by U.S.

TOJO said the reasons for the third plan to fight and to continue with operational preparations in anticipation of the failure of negotiations while continuing negotiations were the same reasons given in opposition to the adoption of the above first and second plans.

The above decision was submitted by TOJO and C/S of Army and Navy General Staffs to the Throne informally on November 2nd 1941. TOJO could see that His Majesty was suffering from a painful sense of distress arising from his peace-loving faith. When His Majesty had listened to the report he was thoughtful and then with an air of concern asked if there were no way left but to determine to wage war against U.S. and Britain in case U.S.-Japan talks failed. The Emperor said if the state of affairs were as stated, there was no alternative but to proceed in preparation for operations, but he hoped that Japan would adopt every possible means to negotiate.

TOJO remembers that they were awe-stricken by his words. In compliance with the wish of His Majesty, they continued further discussion of the matter on November 5th at the Imperial Conference. TOJO decided to hold a joint conference of the Army and Navy Councillors prior to the Imperial Conference of November 5th so that further deliberations on the problem might be made in addition to the discussions at the Liaison Conference, Cabinet Meeting and the Imperial Conference. He hastened to obtain His Majesty's approval and arranged to have conference on November 4th. The conference of the Military Councillors was held for the first time since the establishment of the Military Councillor system in 1903. On November 4, 1941, this meeting was held. His Majesty asked whether it was advisable for the Navy and Army High Command to draw up an operational plan in case negotiations failed pursuant to the agenda of the Imperial Conference to be held on 5 November. TOJO attended the Conference as one of the Councillors in his capacity as War Minister. Although the details are beyond his memory, he was able to give a summary.

36330

TOJO related that NAGANO first of all explained naval operations. NAGANO pointed out that if matters continued the resiliency of national strength would be lost. The Navy concurred in bending all efforts toward diplomacy. Since Japan might be placed in a position where there was no alternative but to commence hostilities, the High Command desired to make operational plans to meet such a contingency on the theory that by so doing they could expedite diplomatic negotiations.

As to the prospect of war with the U.S., Britain and Holland, NAGANO stated that there was a good chance in the initial operation and if the commencement of war be in *early December, on the basis of respective actual fighting strength in the Pacific. If the initial operation was properly carried out, NAGANO said Japan would possess the strategic points in the Southwestern Pacific and would be in a position to fight a prolonged war. The war with the U.S. and Britain is destined to become a protracted one requiring firm resolution and thorough preparedness. As to the forecast in case the war was a protracted one, NAGANO said it was difficult to predict, because much depended upon the total potentials of respective nations and how the world situation developed. TOJO said in NAGANO's explanation, no mention was made of the Pearl Harbor attack.

According to affiant, SUGIYAMA, Chief of the Army General Staff, discussed matters relating to the army command. He stated armaments in the Southern region were strengthened day by day. Army forces were increased three to eight times over the *number prior to the opening of the War in Europe, aggregating more than two hundred thousand men and six hundred planes. It could progressively increase with added speed. In case of war between Japan and U.S. and Britain, reinforcements would be dispatched to the battle zone by the allies from India, Australia and New Zealand at a strength estimated at 800,000 men and 600 planes.

36332

TOJO said SUGIYAMA stated the basic strength of the Japanese Army to be 51 divisions. In addition to the China affair Japan had to allot a substantial strength for precaution against the Soviet Union, which could be estimated at not more than 11 divisions. In opening hostilities no delay could be permitted considering the rapid increase of the U.S. and British military strength and also meteorological conditions. The date desired was early December. The success of army oper-

TOJO stated SUGIYAMA explained that they must prepare for a protracted war and use every strategy and tactic to demoralize the enemy after the first stage in the southern regions has been concluded. He said they could frustrate the enemies plan by holding military and air bases to the last in conjunction with the maintenance of the sea transportation route. Defensive measures against the U.S.S.P. and strategy in the China Affair should continue 36334 *TOJO continued SUGIYAMA's explanation that the possibility of the Soviet taking an offensive attitude was slim except for utilizing propagandistic activities of the communists in Manchuria and China. He said the U.S. might eventually force the U.S.S.R. to grant certain territory as air or submarine bases in an offensive strateg. against Japan. They should, therefore, concentrate attention on the Soviet. When the hostilities in the South become protracted or in case the internal situation of the Soviets improves there was a possibility of the Far Eastern Red Army turning to the offensive. Japan should put an end to the Southern hostilities as early as possible and should prepare for any eventuality in the North.

TOJO said after this explanation some questions were propounded by the Councillors, to which the Chiefs of both staffs and TOJO gave answers. These questions concerned operations, although TOJO did not recollect them in detail. He recalled the answers were based on the results of the Liaison Conferences from 23 October to 2 November.

36335 *TOJO related that at the Conference a report to the effect that the Supreme War Council deemed it proper that the Army and Navy High Command expedite operational preparations to meet the worst possible contingencies was unanimously adopted. TOJO wanted Exhibit 1158 corrected where it conflicted with his affidavit in the November 5th Conference.

*TOJO stated the same program was discussed at November 5 Imperial Conference. He stated the object of holding Imperial Conference was to ensure co-ordination between the Government and the High Command. Under the Japanese system, the Government and the High Command were two separate entities. The Prime Minister usually presided by Imperial permission. Decisions made at the Conference, on administration, were further submitted to the Cabinet meeting for final decision, while those pertaining to the Supreme Command were referred to the High Command Headquarters.

The Government and the High Command requested the Emperor's sanction separately for their several proceedings. Constitutionally, the responsibility rested separately with the party concerned, the Cabinet was responsible for decisions in matters of administration. The High Command was responsible for matters relating to Supreme Command.

*The Directors of the Military and Naval Affairs Bureaus and the Chief Cabinet Secretary were present at the Conference, but they were not responsible members. The Liaison Conference and the Imperial Conference were a necessary adjunct for the Government and the High Command but were not conferences to further the purposes of a conspiracy, as the prosecution contended.

At the Imperial Conference of 5 November, TOJO, with the Emperor's permission, presided at the meeting and explained the circumstances which necessitated the convening of that Conference. The Foreign Minister explained problems centering around the Japanese-American negotiations, the Finance Minister gave an account of the financial situation attendant upon the war, while the President of the Cabinet Planning Board discussed national resources in relation to war, and the Chiefs of the Army General Staff and the Navy General Staff spoke on their respective plans. The third plan formulated at the previous Liaison Conference, and the foreign policy cited therein to be followed in the American negotiations were approved.

36339 From reports from abroad the military and economic pressure by the United States, Britain, the Netherlands and China was intensified, and those powers were strengthening their cooperative relations. Mr. Grady, special East Asia economic envoy of President Roosevelt, in late 1941 flew to Batavia in early September to have a talk with Van Mook, the Minister of the Dutch East Indies, and then on to Calcutta via Singapore in mid-September. Early the next month he *flew to Rangoon, then to Chungking, Hongkong, and back to Manila. In mid-October he returned to the United States.

36340 Mr. Duff-Cooper, of England, in September proceeded via Batavia to Singapore where he met British Ambassador Carr on September 21st. On September 29 when the British Far East Conference was held in Singapore, Mr. Duff-Cooper met Brook-Poohan, Layton, Crosby, Carr, Page, and Thomas, the Governor-General of Malaya. Early October he flew from Singapore to India, stopping at Bangkok, where he had an interview with Pibul, and thence on to Rangoon and Calcutta. About the end of August 1947, Roosevelt announced the intended dispatch to Chungking of a military mission headed by Brigadier-General Magruder. The party went to Hongkong for a conference there, and then proceeded to Chungking. They were reported to have made the statement that the object of their visit to China was to help the Chungking regime to carry on the hostilities against Japan. They intended to make a round of visits in China with headquarters in Chungking so they could speedily fulfil their mission. *At Rangoon they would improve the transport efficiency of arms and other war supplies by the Burma Road.

TOJO stated that in October 1941, the American and British military heads met at Manila. According to reports, technical views were exchanged at the meeting regarding various Pacific problems, followed by a series of discussions on the necessary strategical policies to be adopted in that connection. The conferees were General Pohan, the Commander of the British East Asia Army, Brigadier-General Magruder, the Representative of the U.S. Chiang Aid Military Mission, General McArthur, the Commander-in-Chief of the U.S. East Asia Army, and others. The issues discussed were the British-U.S. joint aid to Chiang Kai-shek via the Burma Road, the plan for joint operations of the Chung-King's Southwest China Army and the British reinforcements in Burma, and a consolidation of U.S.-British joint operations in the Pacific, especially in Air Force operations.

At the end of September Japan was informed that British East Asia Fleet Commander Layton said the Singapore Naval base would be offered to the U.S. Navy. *In October, Niemeyer arrived in Manila from Singapore, while the Commander of the British Far Eastern Forces, Sir Brooks-Pohan, left Singapore for Australia. Around the end of October, Australian Premier Curtin announced the successful completion of negotiations between the United States, Britain, the NEI, New Zealand and Australia with regard to a joint Pacific front. From all these reports, TOJO said it was patent that the military and economic links connecting the United States, Britain, the Netherlands and China against Japan were growing closer and only a tiny spark was needed to set off a giant conflagration.

*TOJO said news continued to reach Japan that the United States, Britain and Australia were steadily enlarging their land, sea and air forces. The U.S. Navy Department announced that since January 1940 it had drawn contracts to build 2,831 ships at a total sum of $7,234,000,000, and that 968 of them were already under actual construction. Late in October 1941, Knox reported that 346 fighting ships were in commission, 345 fighting ships were under construction or under contract for construction, 323 auxiliary ships were in commission, 209 auxiliary ships were under construction or under contract for construction. 4,535 navy planes were on hand and 5,535 planes were under construction. Early in November Roosevelt requested an appropriation of $449,720,000 for the building of new planes. Late in October the Secretary of War, Stimson, announced an increase in the number of Air Academy cadets and conscripts to 400,000, which was about three times present size.

6343 The Australian Prime Minister Curtin announced that 450,000 men had been enlisted since the beginning of the European War. In the Philippines, the Chief of the General Staff of the Philippine Army announced the discharge of active service men had been suspended. It was reported also in October that Major General Brian, new commander of the Philippine Air Force, had left Washington for Manila. In the middle of September 1941, Roosevelt requested a supplementary budget of $5,985,000,000 in accordance with the National Defense Promotion Law. He presented a supplementary budget bill requiring $150,198,000 for national defense purposes. From all this, TOJO it was apparent the U.S. was planning an enormous rearmament program for her Army, Navy and Air Forces.

144 Prior to these Liaison Conferences and Councils and the Imperial Conferences, the speeches and actions of U.S. leaders had become more provoking. Toward the end of September 1941 it was reported that Hull had said that the Government was thinking of revising the Neutrality Act, and that Secretary of the Navy Knox on launching the battleship Massachusetts, referred to the Neutrality Law as "out of date." It was also reported that Knox stated in late October that a clash with Japan was unavoidable so long as Japan held to her present policy.

TOJO said steps were taken against Japan: First, the Indian Government repealed the right to import cotton and rayon textiles that were to be shipped from Japan after September 12th. Second, on 29 October 1941 the Indian Government prohibited all imports from Japan and Manchuria. He said the pressure of the Allied Powers economically and militarily against Japan became more flagrant. Because of this, he contended the Liaison Conferences and the Imperial Conference were constrained to make the decisions referred to.

According to the decision of the Imperial Conference of November 5th, the Liaison Conference of 12 November decided on its foreign policy (Ex. 1169). *The Supreme Army Command appointed TERAUCHI on 6 November as Supreme Commander of the Southern Army, and decided the organization in the southern area. Orders to prepare for the attack on the key points in the same area were issued and on the 15th of the same month the general strategic outline against the U.S. and Britain was decided. This was only a preparatory action. As War Minister, TOJO knew of this procedure, but the other members of the Cabinet were entirely ignorant of this action by the Supreme Army Command. TOJO did not know what the Supreme Navy Command did during this period. Ex. 3662 was received in evidence.

36346

*Ex. 3662 stated the plans for peacetime operations for 1940 and 1941, plans of operations by the Imperial Headquarters about the middle of November 1941, and operations orders given to the Commander-general of the Southern Army on November 6, 1941.

36347

TOJO said in his Cabinet, the Foreign Ministry handled negotiations with the U.S. so his personal knowledge is confined to the general outlines. As soon as his Cabinet was formed, *NOMURA was advised that the negotiations should be started afresh. The gist of the telegram was conveyed to Welles by Minister WAKASUGI on the 24th of the same month.

The Japanese Government had prepared the plans, A and B, for negotiations with the U.S. under the direction of the Foreign Ministry and according to the general outline decided in the Imperial Conference of 5 November 1941.

36348 TOJO stated that due to increasing difficulties and to gain a prompt solution, Ambassador KURUSU was sent to assist NOMURA in the negotiations, which NOMURA had requested. KURUSU arrived at Washington on the 15th of November. In this procedure, TOJO said there was no design to camouflage Japan's intention to start war. There was merely a plan to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion, as was testified by witness *YAMAMOTO. TOJO told TOJO before KURUSU left for the U.S. he had explained to KURUSU the contents of the definite plan which the Liaison Conference had prepared and intended to present for discussion at the coming Imperial Conference. TOJO advised NOMURA that the situation required a rapid solution and the Japanese wanted this same effect conveyed to the American Government. TOJO said this is supported by the documents produced during the testimony of the witness YAMAMOTO. (Ex. 2928, 2957).

36349 TOJO stated negotiations with the U.S. were commenced with the A Plan, but the B plan was simultaneously sent to NOMURA. The points at issue were still questions of the Tripartite Alliance, indiscriminate international trade, and the stationing of troops in China. The Japanese Government presented the B Plan to expedite the negotiations within the limits of the most urgent and *immediate terms. TOJO said this was also shown in YAMAMOTO's testimony.

36350 On 17 November 1941, as Premier, TOJO explained to the 77th Diet the administrative policies of the Government. Ex. 3663, TOJO's speech to Diet was received in evidence. TOJO continued, stating that after six months of negotiations the sole remaining question was whether any effort should be made to maintain peace in the Pacific by means of reciprocal concessions. Japan realized the necessity of explaining to the world the limit of the terms that could be borne by *her. The Japanese Government expected that third powers would not disturb Japan in her disposition of the China Incident, that military and economic interference with Japan by foreign powers would be eliminated, that the European War would not spread to East Asia.

TOJO's speech was followed by that of TOGO, who elucidated two points in the negotiations. The first point was that there should be no prolongation of time in negotiating with the U.S. The second point was that they should reject any matter injurious to Japan as a major power. The speeches made by TOJO and TOGO were broadcast. TOJO was advised that the full text of these two speeches appeared in the U.S. press. It was assumed that the U.S. authorities were well acquainted with them.

36351 *Both Houses passed unanimously on November 18th resolutions for assisting and encouraging the Government. In the House of Representatives, SHIMADA, a Diet member made a speech explaining the resolution, which was considered to be a reflection of public opinion at that time.

Defense Exhibit No. 3664, SHIMADA's speech, was received in evidence. Defense Exhibit No. 3665-A, excerpt from proceedings of House of Peers, was also admitted in evidence.

36352 *In negotiations on Plan B, the U.S. continued its policy of negation, and despite all efforts of NOMURA and KURUSU, the U.S. adamantly adhered to its plan of June 21st. Report came to TOJO that the U.S. had communicated with England, Holland and China to establish a closer contact with those Governments, which did not afford TOJO much optimism for the future.

36353 TOJO said prior to this, in America, England, Australia and Holland, the political situation had become more tense, armaments had been expanded, and their leaders had been markedly provocative in their attitude towards Japan. These facts were calculated to excite the Japanese, TOJO said, and they effected the aforementioned resolutions in both Houses. Premier Churchill of England declared on 10 November 1941 that should the U.S. fight with Japan the British will follow within the hour. (Exhibit 2956, exhibit 1173). Two days later, King George proclaimed at the opening of Parliament that the British Government was concerned with the situation in East Asia.

Roosevelt stated on Armistice Day that the U.S. would fight to preserve liberty throughout the world. Secretary of Navy Knox said on the same day that the time had come to become resolute against Japan. TOJO pointed out that these leaders of America and England had taken an extremely offensive and provocative trend prior to the *77th Session of the Diet. Roosevelt declared on November 14th that the withdrawal of marines from China had been decided upon. Iraq severed her diplomatic relations with Japan on November 16. About the middle of November, TOJO said it was reported the Canadian Army for the defense of Hong Kong had arrived Hong Kong. The U.S. announced on November 24, its decision to dispatch army forces to Netherlands Guinea. This dispatch of U.S. forces to Holland territory disturbed Japan. On November 21st, reinforcements to the British Far Eastern Army was announced by the Navy Minister.

Early in November, the U.S. Navy announced that naval construction for the two ocean fleets carried out between January and October of that year was: Capital ships, 2 commissioned, 2 launched; Destroyers, 13 commissioned, 15 launched. On 25 November U.S. Army authorities in the Philippines announced that by the end of December mines would be laid at the entrance of Manila. The British authorities at the Straits Settlements declared that mines would be laid at the eastern entrance of Singapore Harbor. Toward the end of November, Knox proclaimed that the naval recruiting was at the rate of 11,000 a month. One hundred U.S. residents in Tientsin were evacuated about the end of November. These joint undertakings by U.S. and Britain impressed Japan with the close imminence of a war.

TOJO said on November 26, 1941, the U.S. replied to NOMURA and KURUSU that after carefully studying Japan's proposal of November 20th, the U.S. dissented from the proposal and submitted a note as a basis for further negotiations. This the "Hull Note" of November 26. Its contents were as set forth in Exhibit 1245-I.

36356 The said "Note" adhered to the former assertions on the part of U.S. and TOJO said made unreasonable demands, which were unacceptable to Japan that Japan make unconditional withdrawal of the Japanese army and navy from French Indo-China *as well as from China, that Japan deny the Manchukuo Government and the Nationalist Government at Nanking, and that they make the Tripartite Alliance a dead letter.

Prior to the receipt of "Note", a Liaison Conference was held on 22 November 1941 for a discussion of U.S.-Japanese negotiations. Viewed from existing conditions, the members of the Conference were discouraged but the Government did not abandon hope, but made an exploratory study as to Japan's attitude in case U.S. should reject Japan's proposals; and as to what the next step should be when the U.S. made some concession to the request for oil.

36357 In the first event there would be no alternative but to act in accordance with the decision of the Imperial Conference on 5 November. In the second eventuality Japan should propose some concrete demands. TOJO remembered it was decided to request a total amount of *six million tons of oil from the U.S. and the Netherlands. Defense Ex. 3666 to the effect that the plan-B, concerning the amount of gasoline decided necessary to be imported from U.S.A. and the Dutch Indies formulated at the Liaison Conference of November 22, 1941, was destroyed by fire at the time of the termination of the war, was then admitted in evidence.

36358 TOJO stated that on 27 November the Government and the Supreme Command held a Liaison Conference at the Imperial Palace. The Hull note had not yet arrived. *TOGO explained the difficulties of the U.S.-Japanese negotiations. The gist of the U.S. proposition was reported by Military Attache in Washington. This consisted of the harsh demands heretofore outlined. A similar message was sent by the Naval Attache. On the same day, 27 November, a Liaison Conference was again held to discuss the items in the information received. They were all dumfounded at the severity of the U.S. proposition.

TOJO remembered they concluded the U.S. note of 26 November was an ultimatum to Japan, and that Japan could not accept the conditions TOJO said the U.S. knew full well that they were unacceptable to Japan. The memorandum was made with the joint understanding of other countries concerned.

36359 Taking notice of the measures taken by the U.S. towards Japan and U.S. attitude, the U.S. seemed to have *already decided upon war against Japan. They felt Japan might be attacked by the U.S. at any moment, and she should guard fully against it.

The Liaison Conference decided that since there was no hope in negotiating, Japan should act in accordance with the decisions made at the Imperial Conference on 5 November. But the final decision was to be made at the Imperial Conference, and the next Imperial Conference was scheduled to be held on 1 December with all members of the cabinet. TOJO stated they allowed substantial time between the Liaison Conference and Imperial Conference because they knew His Majesty wanted to hear the senior statesmen's opinions on this matter. That was why they did not convene an Imperial Conference immediately.

36360 A cabinet meeting was held on 28 November at 10 o'clock in the morning. TOJO recalled that TOGO made a detailed report concerning the negotiations. They discussed the decision of preceding Liaison Conference, to which all the cabinet members agreed. However, they did not decide on *war. This was deferred until the Imperial Conference to be held on December 1st.

Just prior to the Cabinet meeting TOGO reported to TOJO the telegram of 26 November from NOMURA and KURUSU concerning their suggestions on the Imperial message (exhibit 2249) and TOGO also told him that he had already communicated this to SHIMADA.

They concluded that the measure suggested would not solve the current impasse, and since the Hull note had already been handed to them the method set forth in telegram was out of the question. TOJO said the NOMURA telegram must have been dispatched before they had received Hull's note. In accordance with decision instructions were forwarded to NOMURA in Washington.

TOJO stated that there were some fact which came to his knowledge after the war's termination. For instance, that the U.S. authorities had deciphered Japan's secret code and knew our decision before it had been presented to them; that the U.S. State Department had knowledge that Japan's proposition of 20 November would *be the final one.

That prior to the Hull note the U.S. had formulated a draft of a modus vivendi based on Roosevelt's idea, which left room for negotiations and would gain time for the U.S. Navy's replenishment of armaments, but which was abandoned owing to opposition from British and Chinese, and consequently the Hull note was adopted and the U.S. knew that this note would never be accepted by Japan; that the U.S. knew that Japan was regarding Hull's note of 26 November as an ultimatum; that by the end of November 1941, the U.S. and Britain, had decided to enter war with Japan and that the U.S. was determined Japan should commit the first overt act.

36364 * On 29 November 1941 the Senior Statesmen convened at the Imperial Palace to hear the Government's intention relative to opening hostilities against the U.S., Britain and the Netherlands, and to report their opinions in that regard.* His Majesty yearned to assume a discreet attitude toward a decision for war. Those who attended were ex-Premiers KONOYE, HIRANUMA, HAYASHI, HIROTA, ABE, YONAI, WAKATSUKI, OKADA and HARA, the President of the Privy Council. This type of meeting was no more than a confabulation of the above named senior statesmen. No one presided at the meeting, and they did not pass any decision.

36365 Even though these men were called "senior statesmen," TOJO said they substantially differed from those elder statesmen or "Genro" at the period of the Russo-Japanese War. Elder statesmen, or "Genros," were named as veteran statesmen of the nation by Imperial rescript and they shouldered responsibilities in the gravest national problems. These senior statesmen were not those officially nominated as such. They had occupied the post of premiership in the past.

36366 * At that discussion between the Government and the Senior Statesmen, the Government was represented by TOJO as Premier and War Minister, Navy Minister SHIMADA, Foreign Minister TOGO, Finance Minister KAYA, and the President of the Planning Board, SUZUKI. No one attended from the Supreme Command. TOJO explained why Japan was placed in a position where resort to arms against the U.S. and Great Britain could not be avoided. TOGO expounded on the situation of the U.S.-Japanese negotiations. Some questions were asked concerning U.S.-Japanese negotiations and Japan's war potentials, etc., which the Government answered and explained, the details of which TOJO did not recall. OKADA's statement that TOJO refused to explain on the grounds of a "State Secret" is not founded on fact, TOJO asserted. The only matters not exposed concerned pure strategy.

36367 After luncheon the Emperor asked the Senior Statesmen their opinions concerning a possible war against the U.S. * and Great Britain. In addition to the Senior Statesmen, the Ministers of the Cabinet who had been present in the morning and KIDO attended. The opinions of the attendants are recorded in KIDO's diary. The opinions consist of the following four points: first, if the negotiations were broken off, Japan should refrain from war and make plans for the future; second, that there was no alternative but to rely on the Government's decision to resort to war after deliberate investigations; third, if the war were protracted there would be much anxiety as to Japan's supply of materials and the trend of public opinion as well. TOJO said no one gave his definite opinion as to the measures Japan should take on this point; fourth, if this war were for self-existence, they must wage war even in the fact of eventual defeat. However, if they resorted to war for East Asiatic policy, this was considered highly dangerous.

36368 TOJO explained the Government's intentions on each point. As to the first, he stated that the * Government had concluded that if they adopted the course notwithstanding the failure of the negotiations, Japan's national defense would be jeopardized and her existence as a nation would be threatened. TOJO explained why the Government had not adopted the first plan; and he said there was no need for an explanation on the second point. With regard to the third, he explained that Japan desired an early decisive battle, but in warfare the war will not develop as expected, so they must be prepared for a prolonged war. They had made inquiries about a prolonged war in the Liaison Conferences, and the two problems were whether Japan's supply would hold out in a protracted war, and whether there would be any rupture in the fighting morale of the Japanese people, and how the war could be terminated.

36369 * With regard to Japan's supply, this, TOJO said, depended upon the initial stage of the fighting. The High Command seemed confident of success at the outset of the hostilities. TOJO said they did not mention matters of pure strategy including the projected attack on Hawaii. If they could attain the success of which the High Command was so confident, they could handle the problem of supply by securing the strategic points and thus acquiring important war materials, especially oil. For this purpose both the Army and the Government would exert their utmost efforts. The question of sustaining transportation would be chiefly the Navy's problem. The Government would take every possible precaution as to the people's morale in view of four years of war against China and the increasing propaganda and strategy of the enemies. They felt they could depend on the loyalty of the people who had never yet failed their country.

36370 As to how the war could be terminated, they had investigated a plan to negotiate peace at a proper time through the mediation of the Soviet or Vatican. They were * not confident they had a definite plan, so members were asked to suggest a plan, if there was one. To succeed in the initial engagement they should secure the strategic points as rapidly as possible so they could establish a plan for a prolonged war. They would execute an active operation and at the same time develop every national potential. Secondly, they would politically and strategically compel Chungking and Britain to fall out and thus reduce the U.S. will to fight. TOJO explained that they would proceed on the basis of this policy, adding there were no means at present to bring the war to an end; that it must be decided later according to the circumstances.

After the above meeting, a Liaison Conference was held in the Palace, where the subject of opening hostilities against the U.S., Britain and the Netherlands was discussed and adopted.

36371 * On 30 November, TOJO was summoned by the Emperor. He immediately proceeded to the Palace and was granted an audience accordingly. The Emperor told TOJO that Prince TAKAMATSU, the Imperial brother, told His Majesty that the Navy's hands were full and it desired to avoid war. TOJO answered that it was the desire of the Government and the High Command to avoid war. Since the Liaison Conference, after deliberation, decided the course to take, as reported to the Throne TOJO said there was no alternative but resort to war of self-defense. The High Command was fully convinced of victory. TOJO said that if His Majesty should entertain any doubt he should summon the Chief of the Navy General Staff and the Navy Minister, and let them explain. KIDO notified TOJO by telephone later that the Emperor allowed the Imperial Conference to be held on 1 December as slated.

36372 * TOJO stated the deadlock in the negotiations compelled them to resort to war. The Imperial Conference on 1 December was convoked for that purpose. This Conference was attended by the ones who attended the Liaison Conference and all Cabinet Ministers. TOJO presided over the proceedings, and that day's agenda stated that since the negotiations with the U.S. ended in failure, Japan would open war against the U.S., Britain and the Netherlands. At the outset TOJO said he made the statements as shown in Exhibit 2954 and then discussion ensued.

36373 TOGO reported on * negotiations. NAGANO, Chief of the Naval General Staff, representing the Chiefs of both Staffs of Imperial Headquarters, explained the situation from the military point of view. As TOJO recalled, NAGANO's main points were: first, the U.S., Britain and Holland were increasing their armed strength. The Chungking forces were redoubling their fighting power with the aid of U.S. and Britain. Japan could see that the U.S. and Britain had already decided to fight; second, the Japanese Army and Navy had been preparing for and were ready to go into operations as soon as the Imperial command was issued; third, through diplomacy they hoped to avoid trouble with Soviet; and fourth, the Army and Navy were in high spirits, burning with the desire to serve the nation and the Emperor, and willing to give their lives if necessary.

36374 * As Home Minister, TOJO explained the current public sentiment, the supervision of interior affairs, the protective means adopted for the protection of aliens and diplomatic officials. KAYA spoke on economic and financial strength, and the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry on the question of food supplies in case of prolonged warfare. In answer to inquiries from HARA, the President of the Privy Council, 36375 the Government and the High Command made these main points: * As to the prospect of a naval victory in the face of a progressive increase in U.S. armament, the Chief of the Naval General Staff answered that it was true that the U.S. had a big armament plan, however, he pointed out that 40% of its naval strength lay in the Atlantic, which would not speedily be transferred to Pacific waters. An increase in the British fleet in the Far East was to be expected and was already actually taking place. Judging from the European war situation, the British could not move any major fleet to the Far East. The U.S. and Britain power had the defect of being an allied and combined force. If they challenged Japan, they were ready to meet them with a hopeful prospect of success. As to how Japan would manage if the war became protracted, his answer was that it was impossible to calculate on the outcome of the war if protracted, as much depended on the total potentials of the belligerents, and the fluctuating world situation. TOJO said even then NAGANO did not betray a word on the operational plan including an attack on Hawaii.

36376 * As to the second question regarding the move of Siam and Japan's attitude toward her, TOJO answered that Siam was moving in a very delicate manner strategically as well as diplomatically as the British Government had a latent influence upon her. Therefore, the Government and the High Command should adopt proper measures toward Siam in pursuit of strategic operations against the U.S. and Britain. In view of the recently increased intimate relations between that country and Japan, they were confident they could pass through its territories in the event of action against the U.S. and Britain.

36377 * As to the third question regarding air attacks on the Homeland of Japan, the Chief of the Army General Staff answered that the initial success would decide the issue not only at the beginning of war but also in its later course. If Japan won the initial battles there was little possibility of the homeland being mass-raided. They could not say there would be none at all. The U.S. might request the U.S.S.R. for the use of bases, so they had to be very cautious. In such a case the homeland would require better protection. The military authorities were already prepared to take emergency measures for air defense. They would not have adequate defense power for the homeland because the fighting forces at the front would require increased anti-air raid equipment. This would be improved in the course of the war.

36378 HARA opined that war was unavoidable, that there was no doubt about initial success. If there were protracted warfare, the government should conquer the restlessness of the people as early as possible. HARA stated there might be a danger of collapse if the war were drawn out. * TOJO answered they should be very careful regarding what HARA said as to general war measures. They would also try to bring the war to the earliest conclusion. The government and the high command were proceeding with war plans under a mutual understanding that they would relinquish war plans provided the U.S. acceded to Japan's representations before the blow was struck.

36379 In prolonged warfare they would guard the people against restlessness and maintain law and order by preventing disquieting influences within and disturbing artifices without. TOJO said they realized their responsibility was great at that critical moment. In other words, TOJO said they were prepared. If His Majesty decided on war they would strengthen the resolution to serve His Majesty's cause and cement the cooperation between the government and the high command in carrying out the plans and measures, thus maintaining a national unity towards ultimate victory to accomplish the purposes of war. The proposal was adopted. * TOJO said the Emperor uttered not a word during this conference.

TOJO said the cabinet, prior to the conference, on the same day decided that the government had no objection to the proposal. All the cabinet ministers attended this Imperial Conference, and they regarded the decision of the conference to be taken as the decision of the Cabinet. The high command took the necessary course of action under its responsibility.

TOJO said the entire responsibility rests upon the responsible persons in the cabinet and in the supreme command, and not with the Emperor.

36380 In issuing a mandate for the formation of a new cabinet the Emperor acted * upon the recommendation of the Elder Statesmen and upon the advice of KIDO who was responsible for constant advice to the Throne. There was no precedent where an Emperor issued a mandate according to his own opinions to any person to formulate a new cabinet. As for the appointment of the Chiefs of Staff of the Army, the three chiefs (War Minister, Chief of the General Staff and Inspector General of Military Education) would have a joint consultation, and their nominee is submitted for Imperial sanction by the War Minister, who assists the Emperor in that respect. This same procedure was followed by the Navy. TOJO could not recall any instance where the Emperor made an appointment at variance with the recommendations. *This long established procedure was used during the Meiji, Taisho and Showa eras.

TOJO explained all affairs of state were conducted on the advice of cabinet and the supreme command, and the Emperor never took personal action on administration or high command without advice. This system was provided by the former Constitution of Japan, and the Emperor refrained from placing a vote upon any final decision made by the cabinet and the supreme command.

The Emperor's suggestions were issued on the recommendation of KIDO who assumed the responsibility for advice to His Majesty. Even as to these suggestions of the Emperor, the political counsellors of the cabinet or the military advisors of the supreme command advised the Emperor after a careful study on their own responsibility.

* All their conclusive recommendations and suggestions were sanctioned without fail by His Majesty. TOJO recalled no instance where the Emperor refused to accept the persuasion of political counsellors and military advisors.

36383 * TOJC, in summing up, said the Emperor had no choice. He could not reject the recommendations and advice of the Cabinet and High Command. His wishes were scrutinized by the Cabinet or the Supreme Command, and suggestions after this examination had to be approved by the Emperor and never rejected. TOJC said therefore the responsibility was solely that of the Cabinet and Supreme Command as to political, diplomatic and military affairs of the nation. Accordingly, the December 1 decision for war is the responsibility of the Cabinet Ministers and members of the High Command, and not that of the Emperor.

36384 * Up to the actual outbreak of war, two items were studied; the preparations for carrying out the commencement of hostilities and the execution of state affairs connected with these preparations. The staff officers of both the army and the navy were responsible for preparations for hostilities, as the government did not have any responsibility in such matters. There were some matters within the field of military administration that TOJC assumed the responsibility for as War Minister. As for matters concerning naval administration, TOJC did not participate as War Minister or as Premier. TOJC called attention to Regulations of the Army General Staff (Exhibit 78) and Regulations of the Naval General Staff (Exhibit 79) which clearly indicate that both the General Staffs are responsible for matters concerning the Supreme Command of the Army and Navy.

36385 * The doctrine of the independence of the Supreme Command is peculiar in the Japanese system. No administrative office can interfere in the execution of operations and tactics, or, administrative officers have no voice in matters concerning Supreme Command. Accordingly, an administrative department of the government cannot assume responsibility for policies of that nature. Of all the Cabinet Ministers, only the War and the Navy Minister are different from those of other Ministers in that these two ministers were participants in the council of war. Both the War and Navy Ministers participated in administrative matters which related to operations including personnel affairs. However, the War and Navy Ministers did not participate in the operational plans, nor in the implementation of such plans. Both War and Navy Ministers were informed of operational plans only after they had been reported and assented to by the Emperor. The testimony of the witness ISHIHARA as to this is correct.

36386 * TOJC wished to clarify exhibit 1979-A, with reference to answers attributed to him in answer to the prosecution's interrogation of 14 March 1946, as these answers did not convey his meaning exactly. The Imperial Headquarters consists of members of the Army and Navy General Staffs, and partly by members of the Army and Navy Ministries concurrently (other than the Ministers of War and Navy). They are divided into Army and Navy Departments of Imperial Headquarters and are under the control of the respective chiefs of the Army and Navy General Staffs. The Ministers of War and Navy are not included in Imperial 36387 Headquarters as regular members, as stated in Exhibit 1970-A. However, War and Navy Ministers can attend the Imperial Headquarters Conference as participants, so that military and naval matters connected with High Command may be handled with dispatch. During his tenure of office as War Minister, * TOJC said there was not a single occasion when he had to attend such a conference. A War Minister cannot participate in the decision of affairs purely in the nature of High Command. Such matters are communicated to the War Ministry after a final decision in Imperial Headquarters.

36389 From December 1, 1941, to the outbreak of the war, liaison conferences were held to decide matters outside the sphere of pure Supreme Command, but connected with both the High Command and military administration, as, first, the note to the U. S. and the time of its delivery; second, the decision on the guiding principles for the conduct of the war; third, the decision on administration of occupied areas; * fourth, the measures in relation to foreign countries following the outbreak of war; fifth, the drafting of the Imperial Rescript for the declaration of war.

36390 The affiant stated that on 8 December 1941 NOMURA handed the U. S. notice of Japan's determination to sever diplomatic relations with the U. S. and its intention to open hostilities. TOJC said the Foreign Ministry was responsible for all the diplomatic steps concerning this notification. According to TOJC's recollection, TOGC presented the draft of the notice at the December 4 Liaison Conference. This proposal was approved unanimously. TOJC remembered that it was agreed * first, that diplomatic steps concerning the last note were to be left to TOGC; second, that notice was to be in form a notification of war based on international law, and Japan was to reserve freedom of action after notice to U. S. Third, the notice must be delivered to the U. S. before the attack. The notice was to be handed by NOMURA to the responsible U. S. official. The notice to the American Ambassador in Japan was to be delivered after the attack. TOJC stated the Emperor had frequently instructed him and the two chiefs of the general staffs to deliver the notice before attacking, and all members of the Liaison Conference were aware of his wishes. Fourth, the time of delivery of the notice was decided after consultation between TOGC * and the two chiefs of the General Staff.

The strategic plan for attacking Pearl Harbor and other places, and troop movements, especially the time of launching attacks, was made top secret by Imperial Headquarters. All Cabinet members except War and Navy Ministers knew nothing of Pearl Harbor plans. As War Minister, TOJO was informed secretly by the Chief of the Army General Staff, but the other Cabinet members didn't know of it. In his interrogations in evidence, TOJO stated that TCGO and SUZUKI had knowledge concerning the time of attacking Pearl Harbor, but TOJO says this was a misrecollection on his part, and he asked to correct his testimony.

TOJO remembered that at the Cabinet meeting of 5 December 1941, TCGO explained the gist of the Japanese final note to the U. S. and all the Cabinet members agreed. On 6 December the Japanese Government * wired instructions to NOMURA that a note was to be sent to U. S. that further instructions as to the time of delivering this note to the U. S. would be sent, and NOMURA was instructed to make all preparations to present the note to the U. S. on its receipt. Thereupon the text of the note was wired to NOMURA.

36393

TOJO recounted that on 7 December the instructions to NOMURA were to hand the note in person to the U. S., preferably to the Secretary of State, at 1.00 p. m. Washington time 7 December. The Japanese Government had every intention that it should be delivered before the attack on Pearl Harbor, and acted in accordance with this intention. TOJO believed that delivery was made in conformance with TOJO's instructions. TOJO said it was natural to place full faith in diplomatic officials, and the Japanese Government regretted learning subsequently that the actual delivery of the note was delayed. As to the contents and the delivery of the final note, the Cabinet and the Liaison Conference relied upon the Foreign Ministry to act in the light of international law.

36394

TOJO said the actual date escaped his memory, but an agreement was reached in the Liaison Conference pertaining to the principles in conducting coming war. It was agreed that after outbreak of war against the U. S., Britain and the Netherlands, efforts will be made to bring about the fall of Britain and the Chungking regime. It was planned that key points * in the Philippines, British Malaya, NEI and Southern Burma would be occupied. A foundation for self-sufficiency would be established by occupation of those regions. Preparations were to be perfected to meet the situation to the North. The Supreme Command estimated five months as the time for these preparations. The military operations were to be conducted in conformity with conditions, particularly with the results of naval warfare.

36395

* TOJO said it was agreed that the declaration would be limited to U. S. and Britain at first. No declaration of war was to be made against the Netherlands. With the outbreak of the war, the Netherlands will be regarded as quasi-hostile, and appropriate measures will be taken towards her on this status.

It was agreed to continue the policies pursued to date in settlement of the China Incident. Hong Kong would be attacked at the outbreak of the war. The British concession at Tientsin, the International Settlement at Shanghai, and other rights of hostile countries in China would be dealt with. The neutrality pact with the Soviet would be respected and the policy of maintaining tranquility in the North would be adhered to. Soviet-American cooperation would be carefully watched.

It was agreed to request passage for Japanese troops through Thai territory prior to the advent of Japanese troops on Thai borders. * TOJO said it was also agreed that Japan would not request Manchukuo and the Nanking Government to participate in the war. It was agreed to conclude a treaty of a no-separate peace with Germany and Italy. Such an offer was made to Germany and Italy on 29 November 1941, at the time the negotiations with the U. S. ended. No notice was made to them as to the date for opening hostilities. After the outbreak of the war on 11 December 1941, this treaty was concluded. TOJO said this shows that there was no close cooperation between Japan and Germany and Italy prior to the outbreak of war, and Japan's decision to go to war was made without regard to the attitude of Germany and Italy. It was agreed to keep secret the time for opening hostilities.

36397

Preparations for hostilities along the decision of 1 December would terminate if U. S.-Japanese negotiations result in an understanding prior to 8 December. TOJO explained that since the Pearl Harbor attack * was solely in charge of the Navy Division of the Imperial General Headquarters, he had no connection with it. On 1 December the Army Division of Imperial General Headquarters issued orders for preparations for opening hostilities to the C-in-C of the Southern Area Army, the C-in-C of the Expeditionary Forces in China and the Commander of Forces in the Southern Seas. It was directed that if U. S.-Japanese negotiations reached an understanding, these preparations would be called off. Since these matters concerned the Supreme Command and were outside TOJO's jurisdiction he could testify as to them.

36398

Defense exhibit 3668, stating the written orders regarding preparations for war, issued by the Army Department of Imperial Hq. on December 1, 1941 to the commanders of the Southern Area Army, of the Expeditionary Forces in China, and of the South Seas Detachment, could not be found, was admitted in evidence and read.

36399 They decided on the administration of future occupied areas in the South at the Liaison Conference on 20 November 1941. These principles were communicated to the respective commanders simultaneously with the order for commencement of preparations for hostilities. TCJC said the plan for administration of occupied regions followed certain basic * policies in accordance with military operations. Occupied territories were to be placed under military administration and supervised by operational forces. Such military administration would be abolished as soon as possible and self-government was to be granted promptly in so far as local political conditions warrant. These self-governing regions have to cooperate in the establishment of the Greater East Asia Co-prosperity Sphere and, depending on local conditions, will assist in prosecuting the war.

36400 TCJC stated the outline of administration in occupied regions was, as shown in exhibit 877, which provided for peace and order within the occupied areas, the speedy acquisition of critical natural resources needed for national defense, and local self-sufficiency of forces engaged in military operations.* In the execution of the above principles, they were required to use existing governmental agencies, respect existing organizations and racial traits, customs and habits, and to recognize freedom of religion. They were also required to get local foreigners to cooperate with military administration; and those who refused to cooperate would be requested to withdraw. They were to bring about a severance of relations of local Chinese with Chungking. Japanese nationals advancing to the south were to be carefully selected.

36401 TCJC said he would next discuss measures taken against foreign countries. The Netherlands declared war against Japan on 10 December 1941. On 12 January 1942, Japan proclaimed a state of war between Japan and the Netherlands. * The Imperial Conference of 5 November 1941 decided in case of war against the U. S., Britain and the Netherlands, close military relations should be established between Japan and Thailand. TCJC said the Liaison Conference of 23 November 1941 decided that Japan should request Thailand to permit her to send troops over Thai territory. Measures were to be taken to avoid any conflict between Japan and Thai forces. In case British forces invaded Thailand before the Japanese, Japan would inform the Ambassador in Thailand of that fact, and would cross into Thai territory after an understanding was reached. The measures decided on 1 December 1941 were dispatched to the forces at the spot to enable them to carry them out prior to crossing the troops.

36402 * The Japanese Government relied heavily on Thailand and was confident that passage of troops would be permitted. Japan refrained from presenting the request prematurely because it might be disclosed to the British. The Japanese Ambassador to Thailand commenced negotiations with the Thai Government for passage just prior to the advent of Japanese forces. It was not until around noon of 8 December that the agreement was signed. The Japanese army forces had already received intelligence to the effect that the British forces had entered the southern part of

- 36403 Thai territory. A skirmish between Japanese and Thailand forces was taken care of on 8 December by the Thai Government. The crossing of the Thai border by British forces was confirmed by Col. Wild and TOJO. * said he received intelligence on that matter at the time. TOJO remembered that KIMURA stated in TOJO's name at the 78th Diet session on 15 December that the British Empire had long been pressuring Thailand to participate in the Anti-Japanese front. Britain under cover of darkness at midnight of 7 December had broken through the Malaya border and invaded the southern part of Thailand. Japanese army forces with the support of the Navy completed landing operations at strategic points of the Malaya Peninsula at dawn of the 8th.
- 36404 * Defense exhibit 3669-A, KIMURA's speech to the Diet, an excerpt from proceedings of the House of Representatives, was received in evidence.
- 36405 TOJO continued, stating Japan promulgated the Imperial Rescript on the declaration of war on 8 December 1941. The Rescript was addressed to the people of Japan, and TOJO said it was not * a communication of commencement of hostilities as contemplated under international law. It was decided at the Liaison Conference of 29 November, if he remembered correctly, to start drafting the Imperial Rescript on a declaration of war. The final draft was decided at the Cabinet Council on 5 December and at the Liaison Conference on 6 December, and submitted to the Throne on 7 December 1941. TOJO made two or three interim reports to the Throne prior to its final form. They amended the two points in the Imperial Rescript in obedience to His Majesty's wishes as to the responsibility of the Cabinet.
- 36406 The reading "It has been truly unavoidable and far from our wishes that our Empire has now been brought to cross swords with America and Britain" was amended and added in accordance with the Emperor's wishes. The second amendment was * also made by the Emperor's efforts, which changed a phrase in the concluding paragraph which read, "raising and enhancing thereby the glory of the Imperial Way" to read "preserving thereby the glory of our Empire".
- The promulgation of the Imperial Rescript on the declaration of war was submitted to the Privy Councillors for discussion. TOJO remembered it was past 11 a. m. on 8 December 1941 that the Rescript was announced, after Privy Council and Imperial sanction. TOJO said that as stated in exhibit 1241 he explained before the Investigation Committee of the Privy Council that after war was decided upon 1 December the negotiations with U. S. were continued only for strategic considerations, and that Japan would not declare war against Holland in view of strategic convenience.

* TOJO said his statements before the Privy Council did not correctly convey what he actually said on that occasion. What he actually said was that the decision to go to war was made on 1 December. After that date although preparations for hostilities were foremost, they continued to hope for a diplomatic settlement through U. S. reconsideration. If this hope materialized they contemplated suspension of all military operations. They did not anticipate attacking the Netherlands at the outset so it was deemed unnecessary to declare war against her, and Holland was not included in the Imperial Rescript.

Japan, following the strategic plans of the Imperial Headquarters, undertook * to break through enemy encirclement at four points, Hawaii, the Philippines, Hongkong and Malaya on December 8, 1941. The operations were pointed at military targets. This operation was arranged in the strictest secrecy by the Supreme Command. As Minister of War, TOJO had been notified of its general outline through the Chief of the Army General Staff. No cabinet colleague other than TOJO and the Minister of Navy were acquainted with the operation. TOJO believed that if the Japanese-American negotiations succeeded he could immediately notify the Supreme Command, and the Supreme Command would immediately suspend action. TOJO felt confident that the Supreme Command would call off operations despite its thorough-going plans and its confidence as to the outcome. TOJO was anxious for fear that the plan might collapse because of an enemy attack. His apprehension was based upon the knowledge that America and Britain had already determined to wage war against Japan. The order of the Supreme Command dated 1 Dec. 1941, * provided that in case of enemy attack hostilities should be entered into. It was probable the enemy might open the attack. TOJO said they did not know that the U. S. was attempting to force Japan to make the first overt act.

6012

At 4.30 a.m. 8 December 1941, TOJO received news from the Navy of the successful attack on Pearl Harbor. He was enthusiastic and grateful for this miraculous success. Imperial Headquarters announced at 6 a. m. that they had entered into a state of war with U. S. and Britain. On the same day the Cabinet had an extraordinary session, and complete plans for military operations were explained by the Army and the Navy Ministers. In the meantime they had received reports on the successful operations in the Malay area.

* TOJO said the time of the delivery of the note was decided by the Foreign Ministry and Supreme Command. TOJO said the wilful delay of the note to secure the success of the attack was inconceivable. He said that since the U. S. had full knowledge of the attack prior to its launching and had completed the necessary measures to cope with the situation, any delay in delivery of the note would not have had any particular effect.

36411 About 1 a.m. on 8 December 1941, TCGO called on TOJC at the Prime Minister's residence and told him Grew informed him that Roosevelt had sent a personal message to the Emperor and handed him a copy of the document. TCGO also informed TOJC that he would deliver the message to the Emperor. He asked * TCGO if the message contained any concessions by the U. S. and the reply was there were none. TOJC stated that although he had no objection to reporting the matter to the Emperor, he was afraid that the planes of their task force would be taking off from the carriers. TCGO left, and TOJC believed he immediately reported to the Throne.

This was the first time TOJC knew of Roosevelt's message. He said it was absolutely untrue, as alleged by the prosecution, that he had previous knowledge that the President's message would be forthcoming. It was not true that the Government contrived to delay the delivery of such message. In Japan, TOJC said no one would commit lese-majeste and wilfully delay a message from the head of a nation addressed to the Emperor.

36412 * TOJC explained that the responsibility for controlling and directing subordinates in the military was divided into two categories. The first category covers matters within the chain of command of the Supreme Command, strategy, security, transport, and treatment of POWs during the period of transportation to POW camps established by the Minister of War. All these matters fall within the jurisdictional responsibility of the Supreme Command, and final responsibility rests with the General Staff chief. The occurrences which took place on the Malay and Bataan Peninsulas, and the affairs which occurred on transport vessels took place prior to * the internment of POWs in the camps established by the War Minister, and therefore the responsibility is with the Supreme Command.

36413 The second category covers matters which occur within the authority of the War Minister. The treatment of POWs after internment at detention camps established by the War Minister, or treatment of civilian internees interned in the war zones, except for China, are in this classification. The treatment of prisoners employed in the construction of the Burma-Siamese Railway fell within the jurisdiction of the War Minister. TOJC said he assumed administrative responsibility as War Minister for the period beginning with the Pacific War up to 22 July 1944. Regarding affairs in the first category, TOJC said he took administrative responsibility as the Chief of the General Staff from February to July 1944. He also assumed responsibility for any matters concerning foreign affairs such as protests from enemy countries, or through the international Red Cross, during the period of * September 1942, when he was also the Minister of Foreign Affairs. He also assumed administrative responsibility in his capacity as Minister of Home Affairs for any treatment of civilian internees in Japan from December 8, 1941, to February 17, 1942.

0162 0002 5962

As Prime Minister and War Minister, TCJO said he was politically responsible for the POW punishment law. He had nothing whatever to say as to his legal or criminal responsibility, other than to state frankly that at no time during his entire career did he ever contemplate the commission of a criminal act. He gave orders in accordance with the POW Treatment Regulations and POW Service Regulations prohibiting maltreatment and imposition of forced labor, and he ordered that they 36415 * should be treated with humanity according to the principles of international law and the regulations. In January 1941 he issued the Field Service Instructions, in which directions were given to all army officers, soldiers and civilian employees of the army as to their behavior at the front.

TCJO said the Geneva Protocol was not ratified by Japan. He said the Japanese conception regarding POWs differs from that of Europeans and Americans; the differences in living conditions, customs and manners between Japanese and other nationals, together with the enormous number of prisoners and the acute shortage of materials and supplies, made it 36416 impossible for Japan to apply the Geneva Protocol verbatim. * He explained that the statement that the Japanese conception regarding POWs differs from that of Europeans and Americans meant that the Japanese have deemed it most degrading to be taken prisoner, and all combatants had been instructed to choose death rather than be captured. Ratification of the Geneva Protocol would lead public opinion to believe that the authorities encouraged them to be captured as prisoners, and there was fear that such ratification would conflict with the tradition concerning POWs. When the Foreign Office inquired regarding the Geneva Protocol, the War Ministry replied that it had no objection to the application of the Protocol with necessary reservations concerning POWs. In January 1942, ACC announced through the Ministries of Switzerland and Argentina that Japan would apply the Protocol with modification. The Japanese Government meant that it would apply the Geneva Protocol with changes to conform to the domestic law and regulations and existing conditions.
36417 * This was stated clearly in the Japanese note of April 22, 1944, in reply to the protest of the U. S.

Defense exhibit 3670, the Japanese reply to the U. S. protest, was admitted in evidence.

TCJO said the disciplinary law for POWs was amended in March 36418 1943 because the Law for POWs was first enacted * at the time of the Russo-Japanese War, and conditions prevailing then were different from those in the present; for instance, there was the differences in race and nationality and number of POWs involved, and the entire situation was more complicated. TCJO said the new law adjusted articles relating to the crime of violence or insubordination against POW supervisors, the crime of escape in mass conspiracy, and the breach of parole. The new law adopted new penalties for misconduct, such as prisoners' mass meetings, assault and intimidation, and the formation of bands for the purpose of killing, wounding, intimidating, insulting or insubordination against POW supervisors. TOJC said these reforms were drafted with the conviction that they were not in conflict with the Geneva Protocol.

* Penalties for violations of wartime laws and regulations during an air raid were provided for in the Vice-War Minister's communication issued by order of the War Minister. TOJC said when the Doolittle fliers invaded the Tokyo area, atrocities were committed by these fliers in violation of international law and regulations. TOJC said these same atrocities instigated against a civilian population constituted war crimes according to established International Law. There was a demand for action to prevent such atrocities in the future. TOJC said, however, it was considered important to prevent rigorous treatment of plane crews by troops on the spot. TOJC said the conclusion was that all these cases go to trial and be disposed of after due deliberation as to whether there were violations of international law and regulations. This communication of the Vice-Minister was issued in July 1942. Based upon this and similar * communications, "Military Regulations for the Punishment of Enemy Flyers" was enacted in August 1942, in the name of the Commander of the Japanese Forces in China. This law was a compilation of the principles of the law and regulations then existing in international practice.

TOJC said a trial was held pursuant to the sforesaid court-martial law at a court established in Shanghai, and all eight Doolittle flyers were sentenced to death. The court reported its findings to Imperial Headquarters, and the Chief of the Army Staff recommended to TOJC that the sentences should be carried out as pronounced. Knowing the Emperor's concern, TOJC, after an informal report to the Throne, took measures to have the death penalty of five of the prisoners commuted.

* TOJC said the object for the construction of the Thailand-Burma Railway was to expedite supplies to the Japanese forces in Burma and facilitate commerce and communications between the two countries. On account of enemy submarines, it was important to open a land route to that area, and this railway was surveyed and constructed by order of the General Staff. TOJC agreed to the proposed undertaking. With respect to labor on the railway, he agreed to the employment of POWs, which were placed under his jurisdiction. TOJC said there were no military operations in that area so the construction work on the railway could not be construed as military operations prohibited to POWs by the Hague and Geneva treaties. He also stated the district was not an uncommonly unhealthy one. Japanese soldiers were treated equally with * men of other nationalities, and TOJC said they never thought that this type of employment would ever be challenged as prohibitive under international standards.

36422 * The Army Staff Chief directed the construction work of the railway, but TCJC held the administrative responsibility as supervising authority over the POWs. In May 1943, on report of deficiencies in sanitary conditions and treatment of POWs, TCJC dispatched HAMADA, Chief of the POW Section and a number of expert surgeons. A company commander who dealt unfairly with the prisoners was tried by Court Martial. TCJC also relieved from duty the commanding general, railway construction, as testified to by WAKAMATSU, Tadichi.

36423 TCJC stated that TANAKA's statement that the "Summary of the Disposal of the POWs" * had the effect of compelling compulsory labor by the prisoners was grossly erroneous. TCJC said the Summary did not order nor suggest compulsory labor. The statement of the witness is his own interpretation. TOJC pointed out that according to "The Regulations on the Work of the POWs", officer POWs may voluntarily choose to labor. This Summary was not decided upon in the Bureau Directors' Council, TOJC said. It was drafted by Chief of the Prisoners Control Section and adopted by TOJC. This Summary, as well as the instructions TOJC gave commanders of camps, did not order compulsory or severe labor.

In exhibit 1984-B in answer to a question as to whether heads of various prison camps made a monthly report to the MAB with respect to the prisoners under their care in connection with food, health, labor, etc., TCJC replied in the affirmative. As regards the death of prisoners due to malnutrition and other causes, TCJC replied that the Commanders in the field were responsible. In case they could not fulfill their 36426 responsibilities they were to request the War Ministry. TCJO had answered that these requests came to the Chief of the MAB and that after consultation between the latter and the commanders in the field, the War Ministry would send food or take other action. TCJO said the rations of prisoners were in charge of the Accountant's Bureau, and he was wrong to say they were * in charge of the MAB. The monthly report on POWs was presented to the War Minister and the Chief of the POW Information Bureau and not to the MAB.

36427 TCJO said the Greater East Asia Policy was expressed in different terms according to the particular period in history referred to. "The New Order in East Asia", "The New Order in Greater East Asia", etc., were used. The ultimate object of the policy was to establish the stability of the Far East. * TCJO actually participated in formulating and promoting this policy, so he was well qualified to explain their true intentions, since all ministries were concerned subsequent to the 2nd KONOYE Cabinet of July 1940.

36428 Japan's Greater East Asia policy was formed to effect economic cooperation among neighboring countries, which was one of the major results of the First World War, when the entire world was organized into economic zones or blocs. TCJO said the China Incident broke out because of the spread of Communism in Asia and the anti-Japanese policy of China. Japan's basic policy was the establishment of peace and stability in East Asia through friendly relations with China by anti-communistic and economic cooperation. One fundamental of her East Asia policy was the settlement of the China Incident. However, TCJO said despite Japan's valiant efforts, the relationship between Japan and China deteriorated because of U. S., British and Soviet assistance to the Chiang regime. Japan * did her best, but U. S. and Britain adopted a policy of strangulation against Japan, forcing her to strive for economic cooperation with FIC, Thailand and NEI, and she had to work alone to reestablish stability in East Asia.

36429 TCJO said Japan appealed to the powers for assistance. U. S., Britain and the Netherlands increased their pressure directed against Japan to such an extent that it became impossible to solve the problems through diplomatic negotiations. Japan was forced to exercise its sovereign right of self-preservation, and resort to arms in order to break through the barrier encircling her. The decision to resort to arms was necessary for self-defense. Japan's war aims included the materialization of its East Asia policy and steps were taken to establish a sphere of common prosperity in East Asia. * The means for realizing the policy were the emancipation of the Asiatic peoples in bondage and the establishment of a family of independent nations in East Asia.

- 36430 * TOJO said the Great East Asia Policy aimed at the liberation of East Asia from the status of colonies under the control of western powers, so that they might enjoy freedom with other racial states. He said the movement was similar to that in Latin America a century ago when they fought to free themselves from European domination. East Asia groaned under the oppression of western powers. TOJO referred to the statement of Wan Waiyaken, Thailand's delegate to the Greater East Asia Conference at Tokyo on 6 November 1943, that over a hundred years ago Britain and the U. S. extended their power to Greater East Asia by taking territories as colonies and as fields of exploitation for raw materials for manufactured * goods, and for markets for their manufactured goods. Nations in Greater East Asia lost sovereignty, or were subject to extra-territoriality and unequal treaties, having no reciprocity in accordance with international law. Asia had become a mere geographical name. At the conference, Wang Ching-wei quoted an address made by Sun Yat Sen, father of the Chinese revolution, that Japan and China were brothers, that Japan got rid of restraints of treaties and eventually became an advanced state in the East as well as one of the world's powers. China is going to abrogate the discriminatory treaties concluded by her. Sun Yat Sen wished he could get every assistance from Japan, for China's emancipation is the emancipation of Asia.

- 36432 * Defense exhibit 3671-A, an excerpt from pamphlet entitled "Address delivered before the Assembly of Greater East Asiatic Nations," was received in evidence.
- 36433 TOJO next explained why his Cabinet made the Greater East Asia policy an objective of the war. * Successive Japanese Governments felt this discontent in the Orient would constitute an eternal root of unrest in that part of the world unless there was a peaceful understanding among the nations concerned. Japan had proposed racial equality to the Covenant of the League at the Peace Conference in January 1917.
- 36434 Defense exhibit 3672, Proposal to League to Abolish Racial Discrimination, was received in evidence. TOJO said the proposal was shelved by the Powers. The Washington Conference in 1922 strengthened * the colonial or semi-colonial status of East Asia by the Nine-Power Treaty, and this ran counter to the Asiatics' desire for the emancipation of East Asia. In 1924 a U. S. law with an anti-Japanese immigration clause became effective. As early as 1901, the Australian Government prohibited the immigration of colored people. Thus, the aspirations of the Asiatics were denied. The Asiatics were irritated over these developments, and the Japanese Government noticed this trend of affairs. Out of anxiety the successive Japanese cabinets advocated the Greater East Asia policy, and TOJO's Cabinet made it one of the aims of the war.

36436 TOJO stated the aims of the Greater East Asia policy at the Greater East Asia Conference on November 5, 1942. They set the five goals in the establishment of Greater East Asia. First, the countries comprising Greater East Asia should * set up co-existence and co-prosperity based upon justice. The order of co-existence and co-prosperity of Greater East Asia was to be based on a moral and spiritual foundation of Eastern tradition and therefore different from the old order, which sacrificed other races and other countries; second, TOJC said they thought that the countries in Greater East Asia should establish respect for the other's sovereignty and independence, for there exists no friendly relation where there is exploitation of others. TOJO believed that friendly relations could only exist where the sovereignty * of others was respected, and where all people were able to prosper and to let others prosper in return. TOJC said the third characteristic was that the countries of Greater East Asia should respect another's national traditions and develop creative faculties of each race, and enhance the culture of Greater East Asia. TOJC said that there had been a superior culture in Greater East Asia marked by sublimity and profoundness. They thought if they spread this culture all over the world it would contribute to the welfare of mankind. They believed that the nations in Greater East Asia would respect one another's glorious traditions, promote the creative powers of their own races and thereby elevate the culture of Greater East Asia.

36438 TOJC said the fourth characteristic was that the nations in Greater East Asia were to accelerate economic development through close cooperation * and promote prosperity of their own region. TOJO said it was their belief that though Asia had been exploited by the Powers, Greater East Asia would in future be autonomous and independent economically and build up its own prosperity by mutual reliance and assistance. TOJC said the final characteristic was the countries of Greater East Asia would cultivate friendships with the world powers and work to abolish discrimination, the promotion of cultural intercourse and the opening of resources throughout the world, and thereby contribute to the progress of mankind. The new order in Greater East Asia was not to be exclusive, but cooperative in that it would contribute towards world progress. TOJO said they were convinced that suppression and discrimination of other peoples and * the exclusive possession of lands and resources as a threat to others while advocating freedom and justice was detrimental to world development.

TOJC said they never imagined that the Greater East Asia policy would be construed as planning for conquest, the domination of the world, or of aggression. He said the establishment of East Asia had always been the cherished dream of Japan. In concluding the Sino-Japanese Basic Treaty, in the announcement of the Japan-Manchuria-China Joint Declaration, in reaching a solution of the China Incident and settling amicable relations with FIC and Thailand, Japan tried to achieve the above goal by peaceful means. This was made known to the world in * The Greater East Asia Joint Declaration of 6 November 1943, which was approved by the respective nations attending the Greater East Asia Conference.

36441

TOJC made every effort to realize the Greater East Asia Policy while prosecuting the war; consequently, various measures were undertaken. There was established the Greater East Asiatic Deliberative Council in March 1942 as an advisory organ to the Prime Minister in matters concerning Greater East Asia Policy. Defense exhibit no. 3673, Imperial Ordinance establishing Greater East Asia Construction Commission, was received in evidence. * The Ministry of Greater East Asiatic Affairs was established in November 1942 to supervise business with Greater East Asia Policy.

36442

In accordance with the new policy, Japan intended to replace the unequal treaty which formerly existed between Japan and China with a new treaty based on equality. TOJC said Japan intended to effect concrete measures in response to the desire of the people of the Asiatic countries. Japan would follow the proposal of the Greater East Asiatic Conference to promote understanding among the respective peoples and to gain mutual cooperation by mutual agreement.

36443

TOJC said the Greater East Asia Deliberative Council was established in February 1942 as an advisory organ to the Prime Minister. The Council was established to reflect the ideas of well-informed circles in Japan upon the concrete measures to be adopted in the establishment of Greater East Asia. A similar proposition had been proposed in the Diet for the establishment of an investigating organ.

36444

Defense exhibit No. 3674, proceedings at the Diet Session, was received in evidence. TOJC said this proposal gave birth to an Advisory Committee. The members of this organ were experts in politics, diplomacy, * finance, economy, industry and culture. In response to governmental demands the committee made studies, proposed views, presented plans, and discussed ways and means of contributing to the construction of Greater East Asia.

TOJC said the only organization to implement the East Asiatic Policy was the Great East Asia Deliberative Council; the government was not in the least concerned with private research or an investigating organ in regard to the construction of a Greater East Asia. TOJC said the government had nothing to do with the National Institute for Research 36445 Institute, as suggested by the prosecution. The Total War Research Institute had the training of students and investigating total warfare as its * aims, and had nothing to do with governmental policy.

The Ministry for Greater East Asiatic Affairs was established November 2, 1942. External affairs with regard to the Greater East Asia Policy were placed under this ministry while the Foreign Ministry handled purely diplomatic affairs as the conclusion of treaties. The Foreign Ministry could devote itself to pressing foreign policies toward allied countries, neutrals as well as belligerent powers, outside the Greater East Asiatic area, and could contribute more toward the prosecution of war and also bringing the war to an end. TOJC said they formed this policy believing relations between independent states within Greater East Asia were like a great family necessitating harmonious relations, a mutual understanding and sincere cooperation.

36446 * TOJC said there was a difference from other nations which based their diplomatic activity on self-interest. The Greater East Asiatic Affairs Ministry had jurisdiction as to negotiations concerning economy, culture and commerce, the administration of the Kwantung Bureau and the South Sea Bureau, and business to assist military administration in occupied areas. Proceedings in the Privy Council at the time when the ordinance establishing said Ministry was submitted are set forth in exhibit No. 687, TOJC said.

36447 * The new China Policy was formulated on 21 December 1941 in line with the Greater East Asia Policy. The Cabinet adopted measures to repeal the unequal treaty between China and Japan. The execution was completed on 30 October 1943. TOJC stated the Sino-Japanese Agreement redeeming every concession in Chinese territory and abolishing extra-territoriality was concluded and became effective January 9, 1943. On 8 February 1943, Japan transferred control of enemy property held in China to the Nanking Government. On 30 October 1943, Japan and China concluded the Sino-Japanese Alliance, whereby Japan renounced rights of occupation in the Basic Agreement concluded on 30 November 1940, and promised complete evacuation of the Japanese troops. The last of the 36448 * discriminating treaty between China and Japan was removed.

In the new alliance the two nations promised to respect the territorial integrity of the other, and to effect mutual aid and economic coalition for the establishment of Greater East Asia. On 6 November 1943, Wang Ching-wei stated that Japan had given back her settlements to China and abolished extra-territorial jurisdiction and had concluded a Sino-Japanese Alliance treaty, abrogating the former Sino-Japanese Fundamental treaty and accessory documents. Wang Ching-wei stated the Principle of Greater East Asia, which Sun Yat Sen advocated has commenced to dawn. Japan's aid toward China and the abolishment of the discriminating treaty 36449 * have been attained.

Japan recognized the independence of Burma as a nation on 1 August 1943; Exhibit 3675, the Japan-Burma Alliance, was received in evidence. TCJO said in the first article of the treaty Japan agreed to respect the independence of Burma. TCJC said on 25 September 1943, Japan concluded a Burma-Japanese Pact.

36450 * Defense exhibit 3676, the Burmese-Japanese Treaty, was received in evidence. TOJC said in treaty Japan promised to assign to Burma part of the Japanese occupied territory with which Burma had a close racial association, and this promise was fulfilled. He stated Japan had no territorial ambitions in Burma.

TCJO said soon after the outbreak of the Pacific War, he revealed in a speech on administrative policy to the Diet on 22 January 1942 the plan to acknowledge Burma as an independent state.

36453 * Defense exhibit No. 3677-A, excerpt from proceedings of Diet, was admitted in evidence. TOJO said when Dr. Maw came to Japan, TOJC informed him of the government's intention. Preparations for the establishment of a state were made and on 1 August 1943 independence was accomplished. Dr. Maw, who represented Burma at the Greater East Asia Conference held on 6 November 1943, stated the Burmese had for generations fought the British, but because they never realized that what sixteen million Burmese could not do a thousand million Asiatics could do. Every * revolt was crushed. Burmese villages went up in flames, Burmese women were massacred, Burmese patriots were imprisoned, hanged, exiled. But the Asiatic flame kept burning in every Burmese heart. Dr. Maw said at last their strength was not only the strength of sixteen million Burmese but of a thousand million East Asiatics, that so long as East Asia was strong, Burma was strong.

36455 TOJO said on 14 October 1943, Japan recognized the independence of the Philippines and the enactment of its constitution. * Defense exhibit 3679, an alliance between Japan and the Philippines, was received in evidence. TOJO explained the U. S. had announced her intention to recognize independence of the Philippines as of July 1946. Japan

36456 announced her intention * to recognize the independence of the Philippines at the Diet on 22 January 1942. TOJO in 1942 went to the Philippines and assisted the people in establishing an independent nation. In June the drafting of a constitution and the arrangements for independence were progressing. On 14 October 1943, the Republic of the Philippines was an independent nation. A constitution based on the consent of the people was enacted, and Mr. Laurel was elected President of the Republic. The Japanese Government agreed with Mr. Laurel's proposal that the Philippine Republic should not participate in war nor organize military forces. TCJC said this shows Japan never had territorial ambitions in the Philippines.

36457 * On 12 June 1940 the Japan-Thailand treaty was concluded. On 9 May 1941 a protocol of guarantee and political understanding was signed by Japan and Thailand. These understandings were entered into prior to war. On 21 December 1941, the two nations signed the treaty of alliance, furthering the establishment of East Asia order, respecting each other's independence and sovereignty, and promising political and military assistance.

36458 Defense exhibit 3680, Japanese-Thailand Treaty of Alliance, was received in evidence. Defense exhibit 3681, the Japan-Thailand * Cultural Agreement of 28 October 1942, was received in evidence.

36459 Defense exhibit 3682, the treaty which provided that Japan should return to Thailand the four Malayan provinces of Perlis, Kedah, Kerantan and Trengganu out of the former Siamese territory in Malay and the two Shan provinces of Kentung and Monpang, was received in evidence. * TOJC said he proposed the return of the territory in accordance with the decision of the Imperial Conference of 31 May 1943 entitled "Outline in Directing Greater East Asia Policy", which defense exhibit 3683 shows was lost at the end of war.

36460 * TOJC said he visited the capital of Siam on his tour of inspection through South Asia after an interview with Prime Minister Pibul. The reason they transferred these areas to Thailand was that these were more recently plundered by Britain, and they would consider other areas later. The High Command was inclined to oppose this transfer, but TOJC insisted on the basis of the Great East Asiatic policy and finally obtained their assent.

36461 At the Great East Asia Conference on 6 November 1943, the Siamese delegate stated the Japanese Government is large-hearted in assisting Thai to recover lost territories and to unite the people of Thai race. He stated the Japanese Government has concluded a treaty * recognizing the incorporation into Thailand of the four states in Malaya and the two states in the Shan region. He said this showed that Japan respects the sovereignty of Thailand, but promoted the increased power of Thailand. The Thai Government and people are grateful to the Japanese Government. TOJO stated this speech implied that Japan had no territorial ambitions in the occupied areas and showed the support of the Siamese for the measure.

36462 At the investigating committee meeting of the Privy Council on 18 August 1943 the questions as to whether respecting treaty the occupying power had territorial rights to the occupied area were discussed. MORIYAMA expressed the legal views concerning the above question. The treaty was drafted in accordance with this view. TOJO's explanations at the meeting were given from the military and political points of view. TOJO said the statement that * Articles 1 and 2 of the treaty were drafted to avoid unnecessary friction meant that they did not adopt an exclusively military and political viewpoint but adopted the legal conception. He did not think the treaty was in violation of international law. They did not include the occupied areas into the occupying powers territory. They permitted Thailand to recover her old territory plundered by England.

TOJO said he knew that an agreement providing cession of the Polish territory and settlement of the border was made between Germany and the USSR in December 1940 and the annexation of a part of Roumanian territory to the USSR in June 1940. He understood this parceling out of territory was made according to international law. TOJO pointed out that the treaty between Japan and Thailand was concluded * when war was going on. As the object of the war was the emancipation of East Asia, TOJO said they carried the liberation of East Asia in rapid succession. They extended independence to the country worthy of independence, autonomy also to those worthy of autonomy, and recovery of their lost territories when expedient to do so. They thought it unnecessary to wait for the termination of the war to carry out measures.

6464

* TOJO said the information received after the war convinced him those demarcations were not opposed to international law. At the Cairo Conference the U. S., England and Chungking Government promised to cede Formosa and the Pescadores Islands to the Chungking Government. TOJO said this was territory of Japan not yet occupied by the Allied Powers. In the Yalta Agreement in February 1945, the Soviet was promised the Kurile Islands, also Japanese territory, not yet occupied. TOJO said this was one of the conditions to induce the USSR to join in the Pacific War. Such actions according to the big powers were in accordance with international law. TOJO believed then that the Japanese methods were not contrary to the law.

6465

TOJO said local conditions in the NEI prevented immediate independence. Based on the Outline in Directing Greater East Asia Policy, 31 May 1943, TOJO * told the Diet on 16 June 1943 that it was the government's policy to allow the Indonesians political participation. Defense exhibit 3684-A, an excerpt from Proceedings of the Diet, was received in evidence. On the strength of this the Indonesians were allowed active participation in governmental affairs. TOJO understood that subsequent to the fall of his Cabinet the Japanese Government recognized the independence of NEI.

TOJO referred to prosecution exhibit 1344, Course of Events Leading up to Decisions on Political Control and Reversion of the East Indies in the Second World War, and prosecution statement that the Imperial Conference of 31 May 1943 decided to make the East Indies a part of the Japanese Empire.

36467 TOJO said it was the Imperial Conference decision that appears to incorporate the NEI under Japanese jurisdiction. The Japanese Government desired to recognize its independence as promptly as possible. The high command and the army and navy staffs opposed an early acknowledgment of independence on the grounds of strategy. The conference reached an impasse. They expedited the independence of Burma and the Philippines, and also the cession of lost territories to the possession of Thailand, so it was necessary to retain the NEI temporarily under * military administration for consideration. The decision was secret, and the fact that they could participate in administrative affairs was withheld from commanders on the spot. TOJO said at the time of decision it was not their plan to hold this territory to the end. Before altering that decision, TOJO's cabinet resigned en masse. During the KOISO administration the Indonesians declared their independence, which TOJO favored.

36469 TOJO said the Greater East Asia Conference was held in Tokyo on 5 and 6 November 1943 under the sponsorship of the Japanese Government. Those present were Wang Ching-wei, China, the President of Yuan; Laurel of the Philippines; Waithayakon, of Thailand; Chang Ching-hui of Manchukuo; * Mr. Pa Maw of Burma, and TOJO himself for Japan. Mr. Bose of Free India attended. The object of the conference was to set up a new order in Greater East Asia, and ways and means to achieve success in the Greater East Asia War. This conference, said TOJO, was convened with full agreement on principles. At the recommendation of the countries TOJO presided. On the first day each representative expressed his opinions and the second day, Joint Declaration of Greater East Asia, was unanimously adopted.

36470 The countries were agreed to win * The Greater East Asia War and to establish Greater East Asia. Chang Ching-hui proposed that they hold meetings again. Maw proposed support to the Provisional Government of Free India. Mr. Bose discussed the independence movement in India. TOJO said the Japanese Government would return Andaman and Nicobar Islands and the conference closed.

36471 * TOJO said the conference was not compulsory. Laurel stated his gratitude to Japan for sponsoring this Greater East Asia Co-Prosperty Sphere, so they could discuss the common problems affecting their safety and welfare. Bose pointed out the conference was not to divide war booties, and it was not a conference to plot the sacrifice of the smaller and weaker nations. He stated the conference was one of liberated nations 36472 with the purpose of forming * a new order based on justice, sovereignty, reciprocity and mutual help.

Defense exhibit 3686, address of Bose, was received in evidence. Maw of Burma said he had dreamed Asiatic dreams. His Asiatic blood was always called to other Asiatics. He had always heard the voice of Asia calling to her children. For the first time he could hear Asia's voice calling, but not in a dream

36473 * TOJO said the Indictment charged that the Japanese policies were dominated by a critical militaristic clique, but TOJO said there never existed a so-called militaristic clique, much less a criminal militaristic clique. In the early part of the Meiji Era, there might be a militaristic clique. Upon the establishment of the Japanese Army and Navy as systematized national institutions, and the emergence of a liberal political consciousness, the above-mentioned factions could not exist. Later the military influence again replaced the political 36474 parties. * but TOJO said this was not by the old military clique. The factor of influence at a later stage was the official military institution. This was in character and in historical emergence entirely different from Nazism and Fascism, both philosophically and politically.

TOJO said the military was involved in politics because the Army and Navy supported the reformation movement against the inroads of communism. The military became politically involved also because national activity was swept into general mobilization because of prolongation of the China Incident and shifting to a wartime structure 36475 * after the outbreak of the Pacific War. TOJO said independence of the Supreme Command, as provided by the Japanese constitution, made the military a powerful force within the political sphere.

TOJO had no concern with the state of affairs at the time of the Manchurian Incident, but he was interested in the fate of his country. He said free trade was broken down after World War I by over-production and selfishness of the big powers. Japan had the decay of capitalism and liberalism. The national economy suffered and the people were impoverished. The world-wide unrest overflowed into Japan, and she was impelled into an evolutionary period. * He said there was a radical and a moderate movement to improve capitalism. The radical revolutionists used soldiers and involved young officers, such as the May Incident and the 26 February Incident. These incidents sprang from the officer's sympathy for the farmers, villagers and fishermen.

However, the 26 February Incident was considered a deterioration of military discipline and defiance to the constitution, so a military purge was performed and the offenders were punished. Individual interference in politics by military men was forbidden. The War Minister demanded that the government implement policies to eliminate social uneasiness. The * ordinance requiring Army and Navy Ministers to be officers on the active list was revived for this as well as for the military purge, so the military authorities were given a voice in politics. General mobilization was prompted by the prolongation of the China Incident and demand of the military authorities, along with the outbreak of the Pacific War.

The management of the war, state affairs and * administration moved toward success. This revolved around the Army and Navy. Since the formation of Imperial Hq. in 1937 the military gained great power in politics. TOJC explained they had to concentrate national strength toward victory. He said there was no criminal element in the participation, and he knows that no criminal military clique dominated the politics of Japan.

36479

According to the old constitution, military operations and strategy were placed independently outside the scope of state affairs. * TOJC explained that the government had no authority to restrict or direct the Supreme Command, but could coordinate the civil administration and the High Command by means of Liaison Conferences or Imperial Conferences. Discussions could not include operations and tactics. Once hostilities started, they were carried on by unilateral decisions of the Supreme Command; the Civil Government supplied what the High Command demanded, thus always yielding to the High Command. TOJC pointed out modern war was prosecuted on a global scale, requiring total mobilization. The situation was different when the system of the independence of the High Command was instituted. Japan had no organ to restrain the High Command from plunging into hostilities, and no authority to employ High Command * at its will. TOJC said this is why every cabinet worried about adjusting civil affairs and the High Command. anxious to get rid of the above inconsistency, TOJC accepted the position of Chief of the General Staff in February 1944 in addition to the Premiership. He said it was too late to accomplish much; but even then he could not affect matters of the Naval High Command

6280

TOJC said the effect of the system was an increased influence of the military and the Imperial Headquarters on management of ordinary state affairs and administration. He said it was not true that a criminalistic military clique then dominated and directed the policies of Japan

36481 * As the 15 May and 26 February incidents suggested military interference in politics, the Army authorities were forced to discipline these cases. As the 26 February Incident broke out TCJC was commander of military police of the Kwantung Army. He ordered a thorough investigation of all military and civilian personnel suspected of having any connection, and he endeavored to maintain the highest military discipline. War Minister TERAUCHI prohibited any military participation in politics, and prevented factional relationships in military circles. Successive War Ministers adhered to the same policy. TCJC also supported this policy. In order to check the growth of factional relationships, TCJC endeavored to put the right man in the right post, considering ability and experience.

36482 TCJC * respected everyone's responsibilities in his position, and enforced correct sequence of command in each office. He also prohibited military men from meddling in political affairs. After becoming Premier he prevented any confusion between the War Ministry and the Cabinet. He said it was true that the political organization was in a state of total war during his tenure as War Minister and Prime Minister, but there never was political control or domination by a military clique.

TCJC said Japan never intended to invade USSR, which the prosecution has asserted. She was bent on defense against Russian aggression in East Asia. After the establishment of Manchukuo Japan devoted herself to the defense of Manchuria against USSR.

36483 * The Japanese army aimed military preparations mainly at the Russian army in the East. The nature of the operational plan towards USSR was essentially defensive. TCJC said it was true the plan contained offensive measures, but they were preparations in case Japan was forced to open war and it was never intended she would open the war. Japan has never considered Siberia as a part of the Great East Asia Co-Prosperty Sphere. The so-called plan of "Kan Toku En" presented by prosecution is a plan for replenishing materials and personnel. TCJC said Japan's policy towards Soviet Russia always was to keep tranquility in her relation with Russia. After the outbreak of the China Incident and the Pacific War, Japan tried not to create any trouble in the north, and especially after the Russo-Japanese * Neutrality Treaty in April 1940, Japan intended to keep the treaty firmly. TCJC said it was not Japan who broke the treaty and committed aggression in August 1945, when its terms were still valid. Japan also was concerned in that the Third International began to pervade through East Asia.

Japan had been anxious for long that infiltration of communistic policy into East Asia would destroy her public peace and upset the stabilization in East Asia. The Public Peace Maintenance Law in 1925 was revised in 1941 to guard against plots to revolutionize the national constitution by communism.

TOJO said Japan felt the activities of the Chinese Communist Party was preventing the establishment of peace between Japan and China. She made the prevention of communism a condition for settling the China incident. * This was done to save East Asia from Bolshevization.

36486 TOJO stated the present condition of the world two years after World War II explains how important these barriers were for the peace of the world. TOJO said he had described Japan's position and the honest policy of its officials to activate some program to safeguard the national honor of the Empire. He stated that from a thorough knowledge of the facts that the devastating war beginning 8 December 1941 was*provoked by the allies to force U.S. into the European conflict, and that it was a war of self-defense so far as Japan was concerned. TOJO said there was no doubt in his mind that Japan's decision to make war was a last resort.

TOJO said he had pointed out the absurdity of a consistent plan of aggression on the part of Japan throughout the Manchurian and China Incidents and the Pacific War. Such a conspiracy formed by a few officials and continued over a long period of years through numerous Cabinet changes is unthinkable, TOJO averred.

36487 * TOJO said in conclusion he wanted to restate that Japan's 36488 policy involved neither aggression nor exploitation. Japan * came to the realization that a war of self-existence was her only alternative. They staked the fate of Japan on that decision and lost.

TOJO said the question whether the war was a just one considered from international law and responsibility for defeat are two different matters. The former is a legal problem between foreign countries, but TOJO said he believed and would contend to the last that it was a war of self-defense and not a violation of international law. They never conceived that the waging of war would be challenged by the victors as an international crime or that public officials of a vanquished nation would be charged as criminals.

As for the responsibility for defeat, TOJO said it fell on him as Premier. The responsibility he desired to accept fully.

36490 *DIRECT EXAMINATION OF TOJO BY COUNSEL FOR TOJO, MR. BLEWETT

TOJO said there had been a conference between the Army Ministry and the Army General Staff concerning the treatment of Doolittle fliers. He recalled that the conference was held after the air raid of April 18th. He said no one ever insisted on punishment without trial, and that he never knew a report to His Majesty on the matter had been made by SUGIYAMA. He only heard of it before the Tribunal. He said such allegations are false.

36491 * TOJO said when HASUNUMA visited him at the trial, TOJO questioned him as this concerned his responsibility. HASUNUMA replied that no such thing ever occurred. HASUNUMA also told defense counsel KIYOSE the same thing. TOJO said he could definitely deny this fact. General HASUNUMA was Chief Aide-de-camp to the Emperor during TOJO's term of office.

TOJO said he assisted him in the disposition of business with all his heart. 36495 According to regulations, it was customary for various *orders to be issued by the Vice-Minister by order of the War Minister. The responsibility for orders issued by order of the War Minister fell on the War Minister. TOJO said he made the important decisions within the War Ministry.

Decisions as to how prisoners of war were treated were made by the Minister of War and subordinates who made such decisions within limits of delegated authority.

36497 * TOJO said after he became Prime Minister there was no change of status in the War Ministry.

36498 TOJO said the secretaries did not participate in decisions of the Liaison Conference. They did not participate in discussions. *TOJO said he did not allow secretaries to express their opinions at Liaison Conferences. This was true of OKA, HOSHINO, MUTO, SATO, and others.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. FUJII, COUNSEL FOR HOSHINO

36499 * With reference to his statement that he needed an assistant, and therefore he first chose the chief secretary of the cabinet, TOJO
36500 said by "assistant" he meant somebody to make * telephone calls and take down notes. He did all the important things himself, but he needed someone to help him. Between the middle of October and the 8th of December 1941, TOJO said he did direct HOSHINO to attend the Liaison Conferences and the Imperial Conferences in order to fulfill duties as secretary. TOJO said the secretaries attending the Liaison and Imperial Conferences performed clerical duties, and they were not regularly constituted members of the Liaison and Imperial Conferences.

36501 When asked if at the Liaison or Imperial Conferences HOSHINO ever expressed a strong stand against making concessions to the U.S., *TOJO replied that he did not allow secretaries to voice their opinions. TOJO said he never heard HOSHINO express an opinion that Japan should show a strong opposition toward the U.S. and should not withdraw troops from China, and he had proof to the contrary.

TOJO said at the end of October when plans A and B were adopted by the Liaison Conference, HOSHINO stated that with plans A and B, the Japanese-American negotiations would probably go very smoothly.

36502 About the 24th or 25th of November, when Japan received information that the U.S., Britain and the Chungking Regime had been having * a conference, HOSHINO told TOJO that "the Powers are conferring at Washington. Of course, they are conferring about the Japanese proposals. Maybe the negotiations will go well." TOJO stated that what he had said regarding HOSHINO applied to all Japanese leaders at the time.

36503 * When asked if HOSHINO ever advised him with regard to military or diplomatic matters, TOJO said in foreign affairs he consulted TOGO and in military affairs, he did not allow HOSHINO to interfere.

36504 TOJO was asked if any studies made by students of the Total War Research Institute ever were incorporated in governmental policy, and he * stated no results of studies were ever adopted by the government.

CROSS EXAMINATION OF TOJO BY MR. LOGAN, COUNSEL FOR KIDO

36505 TOJO said it was true that in conversation with OIKAWA, OIKAWA stated he had received an Imperial message that the cooperation between the army and navy should be closer. * When asked if he interpreted the Emperor's words to mean that the army should blindly follow the navy or that the navy should blindly follow the army, TOJO said such a proposition was inconceivable, and equally inconceivable that the Emperor should think of such a stupid thing.

36506 TOJO explained the words he received from the Emperor * were to the effect that he should form a cabinet and obey the provisions of the constitution. He was told the army and navy should cooperate closely and the Emperor said he would call the Navy Minister later and give him the same message. TOJO said OIKAWA received a separate message, and therefore he didn't know what the Emperor said to OIKAWA. TOJO said he was convinced that OIKAWA did not lie before the Tribunal.

36507 * When asked if after he received this message from the Emperor, and KIDO's message that the Imperial Decision of September 6 be re-examined, he told his secretary, Colonel AKAMATSU, that he was not the 36508 old TOJO but since he was appointed Premier he would try to realize the Emperor's wishes, TOJO supposed he said something to that effect. * When asked if he requested the Navy to recommend a Minister for his Cabinet who would blindly follow him, TOJO said he never heard of such an absurd proposition.

- 36509 TOJO said it was a fact that neither the Emperor nor KIDO attended the morning session or the session after 3 o'clock in the afternoon of 29 November. TOJO stated at the session between 8 o'clock and 3 o'clock, the Emperor and KIDO were there.* He said it was a fact that KIDO was there merely to wait on the Emperor and that he said absolutely nothing. TOJO said this was not a conference to make any decisions, and no decisions were made.
- 36510 As to * matters falling within the sphere of the High Command, those matters arising out of Article 11 of the Constitution, KIDO had no authority to interfere. TOJO did not think he listened to the Emperor's desires in this respect nor gave advice. Article 11 provides that the Emperor shall command the Army and the Navy.
- 36511 * TOJO explained Cabinet decisions were made on the responsibility of the Cabinet and the decisions of the Supreme Command were made on the responsibility of the Supreme Command; and no other person could interfere, and other people included KIDO.
- 36512 * TOJO said it was true that at the Imperial Conference of 6 September, President HARA of the Privy Council asked questions. TOJO said he recalled one of the questions asked by HARA as to the main object of the Imperial decision of 6 September, and whether it was preparation for war or for the establishment of peace. TOJO said the Navy Minister replied that the main object was the solution of the situation through peaceful negotiations.
- 36513 At the conclusion of the conference * TOJO said it was true the Emperor repeated Emperor MEIJI's poem, "Yomono-Umi."
- 36515 * TOJO was asked if prior to 8 December 1941 he found out KIDO's state of mind with respect to war and peace through conversations with him.

Page

36518 *TOJO answered his memory was not clear but he felt KIDO followed the desire of the Emperor for peace.
36519 *At the time they decided on propositions A and B and the time they made decision with regard to the question 36520 of withdrawal of troops, TOJO talked with KIDO *and KIDO was elated on learning that the High Command had submitted to the idea, and TOJO recalled that KIDO said that things would probably go well. TOJO said they were referring to Japanese-American negotiations.

TOJO said he could only cite this instance, although he felt there were other instances indicating KIDO's state of mind.

36521 TOJO said KIDO had nothing to do with the appointment of SHIMADA as Navy Minister. He would not have permitted it. *As to whether KIDO acted contrary to Emperor's wishes, TOJO stated no Japanese would go against the will of His Majesty.

Cross-Examination by Mr. Brannon,
Counsel for SHIMADA.

36522 TOJO stated he decided upon all state ministers in his cabinet with the exception of SHIMADA and himself as War Minister. *TOJO said it was true that the Navy Minister was appointed last.

36523 TOJO said it was correct that before SHIMADA accepted the Navy Ministership, he insisted that negotiations with the United States would be carried on. TOJO was asked if he felt if he failed to agree to continue negotiations the Navy might refuse to appoint a minister, and he answered that the question never occurred to him because it had always been his desire 36524 to settle through negotiations. *It was only natural for SHIMADA to ask this question.

TOJO was asked if he knew OIKAWA had insisted on the negotiations in the third KONOYE Cabinet. TOJO replied he did but his impression was that it was evasion of responsibility.

TOJO was asked whether there was a sharp issue between him and OIKAWA regarding negotiations, and he said not with OIKAWA, but there was a split in views between him and the Foreign Minister and Prime Minister then. That led to the downfall of the third KONOYE Cabinet.

36525 *TOJO was asked if the statement were true that SHIMADA joined the TOJO Cabinet because he was an active supporter of TOJO policy. TOJO could not accept that statement.

He explained SHIMADA was not a person who would tolerate anything against the interests of his country. The Navy Minister is selected by the approval of the Chief of the Naval General Staff and the Vice-Chief of the Naval General Staff, as well as the former Navy Minister.

36526 TOJO said it was not a fact that SHIMADA was a member of the Imperial Rule Association Political because he was an active naval officer and could not enter any political organization. TOJO was asked if the statement were true that in June 1944 reorganization of the Cabinet TOJO suggested SHIMADA be appointed Welfare Minister in order to have a member of IRAA in the Cabinet. TOJO said it was not a fact. The SHIMADA spoken of was the late SHIMADA, Toshio, and not the accused.

36527 *The court asked TOJO whether the fact that he was not acting against the interests of the country was the reason SHIMADA supported him. TOJO explained that if anything were against the country's interests, SHIMADA would have argued against TOJO if TOJO happened to be taking *such a policy. If the stand taken was right, SHIMADA would give his all to see it carried out. TOJO was asked if at any time the Navy ever advocated an attack on the U.S. or Britain without giving a notice. He said there was no instant.

He was asked if he recalled that while at Sugamo NAGANO or SHIMADA or both asked him whether he recalled this. TOJO said there was such an occasion, but he answered there was no case he could remember. He stated he was positive.

36529 TOJO was asked if he remembered TOGO's statement that TOJO's memory, as that of other accused who attended the liaison conference, was not dependable and *whether the Navy at a liaison conference advocated an attack without notice. TOJO replied that he had already answered the question.

36532 *TOJO was asked whether the words "notification of war" meant a declaration of and he stated that in accordance with international law, the correct procedure was taken. He said he did depend upon the advice of the Foreign Minister as to last notification. He said the notice was written outside the Liaison Conference and then brought into the Conference for discussion.

36533 *He said the notification was drafted by the secretaries and the completed draft was proposed and discussed at the 4th December Liaison Conference. TOGO presented the notification to the Liaison Conference.

36536 Cross-examination by Mr. Keenan,
Chief Counsel for Prosecution.
*TOJO said the fact that U.S. powers were interfering with plans for Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity was not a direct reason for attacking U.S.

36537 *TOJO said it was one of the remote causes. TOJO said it was true they intended to establish the New Order throughout Greater East Asia prior to Pearl Harbor attack, but at the same time they desired to bring it about by peaceful means. He said that a policy was made clear at the time of the Second KONOYE Cabinet.

36538 *TOJO said he did believe that every people had the right to determine its own government and its own way of life so long as such did not menace any other country, and he believed so today. TOJO said he got no rights to determine the way of life for people of Greater East Asia.

36539 When asked if he advocated peace terms
 36540 between China and Japan in 1941 while there was a huge army occupying a large part of China, he replied there was no inconsistency in *situation. He continued such efforts for peace. *When asked if he advocated the Japanese Army remain in China until the terms of peace were agreed upon, he said they could not withdraw troops from China until the peace terms were agreed upon.

36541 TOJO said it was not true that he refused to enter into an agreement with the U.S. in 1941 unless they agreed Japanese troops would remain in China until two years after the peace terms had been agreed upon. TOJO said Japan proposed that if SINO-Japanese peace were realized Japan would withdraw her troops generally from China leaving only a part behind. The only question was the stationing of small *force in China.

TOJO said by the term "after peace," he meant after the agreement had been reached. TOJO said the terms of the treaty would determine whether any self-respecting nation would discuss peace terms with a huge enemy army occupying its main cities. TOJO said if it would contribute to stability of East Asia he would consent to the conditions of determining a peace while the enemy army was occupying Japan.

36542 *TOJO said there was no secret about the fact that the Tripartite Agreement was entered into between Germany, Italy and Japan. He stated at that time he was the War Minister. *He stated he did not deny that 36543 the Minister of War was a very powerful man in the Japanese Cabinet.

- 36544 *He said he knew a part of the negotiations with the German envoys before the Tripartite was adopted. He did have a general idea of it. Under the situation prevailing he was in favor of it. He knew very well it provided for the establishment of a new order. As to the meaning of the term "new order", TOJO thought the interpretation of the term was made in accordance with the situation in respective countries. He did not make any study of Hitler's new order.
- 36545 *As War Minister he knew the general outline of the Hitlerian new order; but he did not make any deep study as to what Hitler himself thought it meant. There was no need to find out the real intentions of the German new order. It was only necessary for Japan to know her own conception of her own new order. When asked if he denied that it was the pact's purpose to help Hitler maintain his new order in Europe. He said that is not what he meant. Mutual assistance is clearly stated in the treaty.
- 36546 *When asked if he didn't know what the new order as put into practice by Hitler in September of 1940 was, he said that he knew of the historical processes and in general the outline. TOJO was asked if he approved the action of Hitler in renouncing his promises to the Netherlands and Belgium to respect their independence and, without warning marching into their territories with huge armies. *He answered he had no knowledge whether Germany renounced its promise vis-a-vis Holland and Belgium, or whether they were justified or not. He thought history would judge that. TOJO did not recall Hitler's assurance that he would not invade the Netherlands.
- 36547 *He answered he had no knowledge whether Germany renounced its promise vis-a-vis Holland and Belgium, or whether they were justified or not. He thought history would judge that. TOJO did not recall Hitler's assurance that he would not invade the Netherlands.
- 36548 *TOJO said he knew very well prior to the Tripartite in September 1940 that Holland was invaded by Hitler. He did recall when Hitler marched into Austria. He was asked if he considered Hitler was acting in self-defense, and he replied he did not know the particulars, nor had he studied such particulars.

36549 *He heard of the Munich Agreement but did not know the contents. He remembered that Hitler marched into Czechoslovakia and took over the entire country. As to whether that was self-defense, TOJO said history would judge that.

He did recall that Hitler invaded Norway. He said he never stated that was in self-defense. He stated he could not judge whether or not it was an act of self-defense.

36550 *He was asked if he knew very much about Hitler, German history, modern history at the time he approved of the Tripartite Pact, and he replied that as an ordinary person and as a matter of common sense, he knew prior to the Tripartite Pact about the persecution of the Jews. He knew nothing about the blood purge and concentration camp.

36551 He was asked if the U.S. had anything to do with Japan embarking upon Manchuria in 1931, and he answered that he was not qualified to speak on that matter because he was not holding any position of responsibility then. *From a layman's point of view, he replied that the U.S. had nothing to do with it. He was asked whether the invasion of Manchuria by Japan caused anti-Japanese feeling. He stated Japan never invaded Manchuria.

36552 *TOJO thought some Chinese had antipathy toward Japanese because of Japanese troop movements in Manchuria.

36553 *TOJO said it was probable that such feelings were found among a part of the Chinese people after the clash at Marco Polo Bridge, but as to the causes or cause of the Marco Polo Bridge Incident that is another matter.

36554 Leaving out the reasons which accompanied the movement of Japanese armies in China, TOJO said there was among the Chinese people such feelings of antipathy. TOJO stated that by 1941 *somewhere between six hundred and seven hundred thousand troops were dispatched to China, but this figure was not accurate.

TOJO asked the prosecution to tell him the number of Chinese casualties caused by Japanese Army. TOJO said the communique of Imperial Headquarters reported in Japanese Year Book was reliable. The prosecution then read Imperial Headquarters statement which estimated the number of Chinese killed during July 1937 to June of 1941 as 2,015,000. TOJO was asked if the Japanese Army had services in China to obtain information as to the number of Chinese killed, and TOJO said he was not sure but he thought the figures were compiled by estimating at the front.

*TOJO said it was important but there was no organization for the purpose of investigating such casualties. Orders were sent to the various armies to report casualties incurred in fighting, both Chinese and Japanese. TOJO assumed that Imperial Headquarters announced the total of those reports. TOJO said he believed the report of the loss of Chinese forces of 3,800,000 must have included the former report of 2,015,000.

36560

*TOJO said he sent regular reports during the period in which he was connected with Kwantung Army of the number of Chinese killed. TOJO's attention was called to the next entry, "Booty", which included "Arms, 482,257."

36562

*TOJO explained that commanders at the front were fond of reporting their own exploits, and they were apt to report the number of casualties in exaggerated figures. TOJO said he would not consider tank figures of 1475 as accurate.

36563

* Since it is easy to count locomotives and carriages, TOJO supposed those figures, 2449 were correct.

36564

*TOJO was asked if he thought the figures 109,250 were accurate for losses to Imperial Army including "the Nomonhan Incident." TOJO thought there was a mistake in the digits. He thought Japanese forces lost 1,200,000 or something like that. He would not consider 109,250 accurate. He didn't think the figure could be so small for Japanese casualties.

36565

*TOJO said he could not recollect the exact figures but during the period in which the Chinese forces lost something over 2,000,000, the Japanese forces lost something around 1,200,000 and that included Japanese residents in China.

10566

*As to China Incident, TOJO explained the hostilities were called an incident in Japan. Actually, he said, it was a war, and on the 8th of December 1941 the Chungking Regime declared war on Japan.

10567

*TOJO said he then was not in a position of responsibility and could not explain why the war was called an incident. TOJO said he could understand how the Chinese developed anti-Japanese feelings but he felt their leaders would hold a different view. TOJO said he felt the whole war was unfortunate * for both countries. He felt sorry for the Chinese and that is the reason the early solution of the China Incident was the established policy. TOJO stated that as for the people of both countries, they were innocent people and had nothing to do with the war.

10568

TOJO said, however, their statesmen were different. The anti-Japanese movement, the contempt-for-Japanese movement, and the boycott of Japanese goods, and the massacre of innocent residents * were their acts and they constituted one of the great causes of the war.

10569

TOJO did not agree that war was a crime, but he would agree that wars have an unfortunate effect upon the victor and the vanquished.

10570

*TOJO said he joined the KONOYE Cabinet in July 1940 as War Minister. * He was named for the War Ministership by the three army chiefs. But when asked if it were a surprise to him he said he was surprised in one sense and not in another. As he was recommended by the three army chiefs it was up to him to do his best, and therefore, he was not surprised. It is the custom of a military man to obey orders.

10574

*TOJO was asked if he had heard any rumors that he was to be so chosen beforehand. He had never heard such rumors. He had just come back from Manchukuo and had heard the general details of the fall of the YONAI Cabinet from the Vice Minister. He had been Vice Minister of War in the earlier KONOYE Cabinet for four months. TOJO became Vice Minister before ITAGAKI became Minister of War. TOJO said it is true that they both served in the Kwantung Army.

- 36575 *The first time he knew MATSUOKA was when he was Chief of Staff of the Kwantung Army and MATSUOKA was president of the South Manchuria Railway. He remembered the expression "Niki Sansuke," but he didn't know the reason for it. *TOJO was asked if the expression were not made up of the last letters in the first name of the five men who were the important Japanese figures in Manchuria, he replied that it could be taken that way. TOJO said it was true that he and MATSUOKA were two of the five figures referred to. TOJO said he thought HOSHINO was included among the five.
- 36576
- 36577 *TOJO said he got the impression that the YONAI Cabinet fell because it no longer led Japan in the international situation and the domestic situation. * TOJO said he meant the YONAI cabinet did not have the ability to dispose of matters relating to the international situation and the domestic situation. By international situations, TOJO referred to the whole effect which the war situation in Europe had on the Far East.
- 36578
- 36579 *At that time it appeared that U.S. was about to enter the war, whereas in East Asia no prospects of settlement were seen; in the domestic situation political parties were dissolved and public opinion estranged from the government.
- 36580 *KONOYE and KIDO met during some time in May and concluded that the situation couldn't be handled under the present cabinet. It was the feeling that the cabinet lacked political power. And, this called for the appearance of the second KONOYE Cabinet.
- TOJO said KIDO did not have considerable influence in terminating the YONAI Cabinet on the basis of his knowledge - he was speaking on the basis of evidence introduced.
- 36581 * TOJO said he did not know if YONAI disapproved of the German Alliance and he knew nothing of YONAI's state of mind. * Outwardly the fact that the Big Three refused to give YONAI a War Minister may be regarded as the cause of the fall of the cabinet, but TOJO believed the real cause could be found elsewhere. TOJO said it was not a fact that YONAI cabinet did not seize the opportunity for expansion and did not take advantage of events in Europe and so this caused its fall.

- 36584 *TOJO was in Manchukuo and did not know that the Foreign Office instructed Ambassador HATA in July 1940 to confer with German authorities upon strengthening the coalition between the two countries. TOJO heard of this as War Minister at the time policy was being decided but he was not in a position of responsibility.

- 36585 *Exhibit 541 was handed to the witness. He identified it as the copy of the cabinet decision on the outline of Japan's basic national policy including a decision to strengthen the relationship among Japan, Germany and Italy. However, he explained the strengthening of the Japan-German-Italian relations and others were not cabinet decisions.

- 36586 *TOJO stated he helped make that cabinet decision about nine days after he became War Minister. TOJO explained that one second of idleness was permitted. * TOJO recalled the outline started off with the observation that the world was now on the threshold of a stupendous historic change. * TOJO said by "stupendous historic change" they meant the world convulsion that began with the European War. *As he explained before, there was apprehension that the U.S. might participate in that war and her entry would spread to the Pacific area.

- 36588

- 36592 *TOJO was asked what effect early victory for Hitler had upon Japan. He stated that in view of the fact that Japan was a party to the Anti-Comintern Pact with Germany and Italy, Japan took a friendly attitude toward Germany. TOJO said no profound consideration was given to Germany, for the Japanese followed the Anti-Comintern Pact in the sentimental sense. TOJO recalled that the same exhibit contained a statement that Japan was faced by a great ordeal unparalleled in history.

- 36594 *TOJO said they were speaking of the critical situation in Japan because of the international and internal situations, and that the Japanese people were fated to surmount the difficulties. * He said it was true that the basic policy was decided within a few days after TOJO joined the KONOYE Cabinet as War Minister. TOJO said he agreed with the statement in the basic policy that it was directed toward a new order of Greater East Asia built upon a solidarity of Japan, Manchukuo and China with Japan as the center.

*On July 26, 1940 TOJO said he and members of the cabinet had no intention of forming an alliance with Germany. TOJO had known MUTO before he became War Minister in the KONOYE Cabinet but did not know at the time what views MUTO held with regard to the Tripartite Pact. TOJO did not believe the reason for the fall of the YONAI Cabinet was that MUTO and his group had not persuaded YONAI to enter into alliance with Germany.

*Before the Tribunal TOJO first learned the Big Three in the Army refused to name a War Minister for YONAI and thereby caused the fall of that cabinet. TOJO did not know that HATA asked the Emperor to appoint TOJO War Minister.

36603

*TOJO said HATA could not have visited the Emperor after he left the post because a man who is no longer War Minister cannot make any report to the Throne.

As to KIDO's Diary of 18 July 1940, which said HATA saw the Emperor and later, that the Emperor stated to KIDO that the War Minister had secretly recommended TOJO for War Minister and Tomoyuki YAMASHITA for Inspector-General of the Air Force but the Emperor thought procedure was wrong for KONOYE was still forming a cabinet and had not yet accepted TOJO.

*TOJO said he could not have known, that he arrived at 10:40 p.m. on the 18th from China.

36607

*With reference to the possibility that HATA secretly suggested to the Emperor TOJO for War Minister, TOJO replied that this was the case. Before any appointment of General Officers is made, an informal recommendation is made to the Throne, and therefore TOJO presumed that informal recommendation was made. * The proper procedure is after the Premier-designate has determined upon the Navy Minister and the War Minister of his cabinet, then the preceding Navy Minister and the War Minister should make their informal recommendation.

36609

*TOJO was asked if KIDO were mistaken when he said that the War Minister had just secretly recommended TOJO for War Minister. TOJO said the translation was mistaken * with regard to the word "naiso" -- informal recommendation. There is nothing secret about "naiso." The Language

Arbitrator agreed the word "naiso" meant "informal recommendation."

*If recommendation was made between 225 in the afternoon and 250 on 1^o July 1940, TOJO said he believed

6614

as KIDO states that the informal recommendation was made a little prematurely. * TOJO insisted there was nothing unusual or strange about the outgoing War Minister informally recommending to the Throne the succeeding War Minister. TOJO said the situation then required a very detailed explanation. * TOJO suggested that this was very difficult to understand. TOJO said he understood the situation very well. He understood what KIDO stated and he understood what the Emperor felt.

6615

6616

*TOJO again explained there was nothing strange with regard to the procedure of "naiso" or informal recommendation. When an outgoing War Minister makes an informal recommendation to the Throne before the Premier Designate had determined on the War Minister or the Navy Minister of his cabinet, the procedure would be out of the ordinary. In this case the doubt arises whether the recommendation was made at the proper time and in a proper manner. The War Minister and the Navy Minister of a cabinet are formally recommended to the Throne by the cabinet itself, but there is the necessity for the army and navy respectively to make an informal recommendation to the Throne in addition.

6617

*TOJO knew nothing about a recommendation being made to the Emperor for ABE Cabinet for TADA for War Minister that was not accepted. TOJO never heard that in the ABE Cabinet the Emperor wanted to have either UMEZU or HATA appointed War Minister.

6620

*TOJO was asked if the Big Three of the Army received a message from the Emperor as to whom he wanted for War Minister would they make their own selection regardless of the choice of the Emperor. TOJO explained the Big Three select the person after viewing the general over-all situation and they petition for the approval of the Throne. Even where a specific candidate is favored by His Majesty, the Big Three consult and study the candidate and, after unanimity of views present his name to the Throne and receive the Imperial sanction.

36621 TOJO was asked if the Emperor automatically agreed to the War Minister thus chosen. * TOJO said the selection of the War Minister cannot be decided only by the Big Three Chiefs. The Premier designate must make recommendation to the Throne and receives its approval. The Big Three recommend the succeeding War Minister to the Premier designate. That is the formal recommendation. It is necessary to have an informal recommendation from Army because of the shift that would naturally arise because of the change in War Minister.

26622 * TOJO said he had no knowledge in connection with the selection of the War Minister in the ABE Cabinet. He would think that the candidate for the War Minister was unanimously agreed upon by the Big Three of the Army, considering the desire of His Majesty.

36623 * Exhibit 3199-A was handed to the witness. TOJO
36625 has not * read this article or seen the article before. TOJO said the cabinet decision of 26 July 1940 was made about two months before the Tripartite Agreement was entered into. In that decision there was the statement 36626 that the urgent * task was to renovate all branches of the government in accordance with the fundamental principle of the national polity.

TOJO said he was not a statesman but he explained "to renovate all branches" meant to renew. TOJO said he was fundamentally a military man. TOJO was asked what wrongs had to be righted in the branches of the government.

36627 *TOJO explained Japan was internally and externally faced with a critical situation. The biggest cancer was the question of the settlement of the China Incident, and it was necessary to complete the structure of national defense.

36628 TOJO was asked what was wrong with the branches of the government. * He said it was recognized that an overall renovation of the administration was needed.

TOJO did not know what was meant by "totalitarian form of government." TOJO said to say Japan planned the form of government in Nazi Germany was wide off the mark.

36629 *The necessity to change their government arose from the situation within Japan itself.

36630 TOJO was asked in what manner they intended to renovate the educational system. TOJO said he could give a general explanation. First, there was stress on materialism; there was to be emphasis on spiritual values. Second, in the academic world thought was * beclouded by unhealthy thought. Japanese thought was tarnished by communistic views.

36631 *TOJO said it was true that the educational program was to suppress communism coming upon Japan at that time. They wanted to save their students from such thoughts. TOJO said that Japan never considered one nation, one party or one-party rule.

36632 *TOJO was asked what was meant by setting up a new national political structure. The outline's aims were set forth in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), TOJO pointed out.

36634 TOJO was asked what was meant by reform of the Diet system. At that time the desire was to have a national Diet which represented the will of the eighty million people of Japan. TOJO said when he became War Minister the Diet in form represented the people. TOJO said the intention was to see that the Diet functioned effectively. TOJO said * he was then Prime Minister and he could not explain political issues but he did not say this to evade any responsibility.

36635 TOJO was asked what was meant by the establishment of the foundation for a national defense economy on the basis of autonomous construction of the economies of Japan, Manchukuo, and China with Japan as the center. Japan at that time laid the basis of its economy on Britain and U.S., TOJO believed. Raw materials were derived from British and U.S. spheres of influence. With the *abrogation of the treaty of commerce and navigation between Japan and the U.S. by the U.S. in July, 1939, Japan received economic pressure from the outside. She had her hands full with the China Incident. It was necessary to establish an autonomous economy involving the three countries which was planned.

*TOJO was asked what was meant by making Japan, Manchukuo and China a single unity. TOJO said it meant the promotion of close economic collaboration among Japan, Manchukuo and China against the economic bloc.

TOJO was asked what was meant by "the whole of Greater East Asia." He replied that with Japan-China-Manchukuo economy as a nucleus, closer relationship economically should be established with other parts of East Asia. He was then asked what countries were included in the whole of Greater East Asia.

*TOJO said the state and the people of Japan, Manchukuo and China, and in addition, FIC, Thailand and the NEI. The idea was to promote active trade among these nations and establish stable economies.

36638

TOJO was asked if the whole of Greater East Asia included the Philippine Islands. At that time the Philippine Islands were not clearly within their consciousness. At that time the Philippines were not definitely within the idea of Greater East Asia. TOJO said the Malays should have been included. At that time, TOJO said India was not considered. TOJO said then the idea of Greater East Asia did not include Burma.* It was only after the outbreak of the Greater East Asia War that Burma and the Philippines were considered. He said Australia was not included.

- 36642 *TOJO said that Navy Minister YOSHIDA resigned for the surface reason of illness, but TOJO presumed
- 36643 *he disapproved of bringing relations among Japan, Germany, and Italy to the point of an alliance. Preceding the decision of July 26, 1940, YOSHIDA agreed at discussions to the political strengthening of the relationship among Japan, Germany, and Italy. However, in September 1940, the question as to whether the relationship should be advanced to an alliance was asked as to why YOSHIDA refused to become a member of the KONOYE Cabinet.
- 36644 *TOJO said he believed YOSHIDA opposed placing of the three-power relationships on an alliance basis. TOJO
- 36645 said this was merely a presumption because the reason YOSHIDA gave for resigning was illness. *TOJO said YOSHIDA did not say directly he was opposed to a military alliance. TOJO said it was true that very well informed men in Japan felt the signing of the Tripartite would cause a war between Japan and the Western Powers.
- 36646 TOJO said he recalled that the investigating committee talked at length with the members of the Privy Council the day before the Tripartite was executed. *TOJO said a discussion as to how much petroleum was available to fill the warships and the airplanes to go to war with the Western Powers might have been discussed, but it was brought up as a matter of course. He didn't recall that in any detail.
- 36647 *TOJO said the character of the Tripartite
- 36648 Alliance was of a self-defensive nature under the prevailing situation. *TOJO said the economic pressure on Japan by U.S. had something to do with signing the pact. TOJO said there was no direct and active military action on the part of U.S. but there were plans. See exhibit 3567 and 3660. After U.S. abrogated the United States-Japan treaty of commerce and navigation, Japan's economic life was under strong pressure.
- 36649 *TOJO was reminded to discuss military situation and he stated that in May 1940 a large U.S. fleet was concentrated in Hawaii, its personnel active and on the alert.

36650 TOJO was asked if he claimed that because the U.S. vessels concentrated at Pearl Harbor, this was evidence that Japan was in danger of attack by U.S. TOJO said he was asked what kind of military threat against Japan existed at *that time, and he gave this explanation.

36651 *TOJO was asked if the only way the U.S. could avoid that type of threat would be to take all warships out of the Pacific. TOJO said that may well be so. The threat was felt by Japan and TOJO felt it. TOJO was asked what other kind of military threat was made by the U.S. prior to the Tripartite Pact. *He said the increase in armed forces in the areas of the Philippine Islands, Malaya, Burma and the Netherlands East Indies as well as strengthening the contact among the powers; the implementation of air bases and their facilities in the same area; and the U.S. had intentions to create and strengthen its air bases in Alaska.

36653 In the war between Japan and China, the U.S., Britain and other powers were assisting China by strengthening Chinese resistance to bring about the attrition of Japanese national power. *Japan considered the building of airfields and strengthening of armaments in insular possessions of *the United States were threats against Japan.

36654 TOJO was asked if it were true that U.S. action in strengthening naval forces and armaments in Hawaii and other Pacific islands was grounds for Japan *to anticipate attack, but the action of the Japanese in sending several hundred thousand troops into the heart of China was a defensive measure. TOJO replied that U.S. reinforcing its troops, constructing or strengthening its airfields and concentrating its fleets in its own territory, were felt to be threats against Japan. The hostilities going on in China were entirely different. There was the necessity for the protection of Japanese residents and the purpose was self-defense. *IPS Doc. 36655 3150-373A handed to witness *and he was asked if this

- 36657 excerpt from SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs contain the result of the Four Ministers' Conference held before TOJO became War Minister in the second KONOYE Cabinet. TOJO said he had no confidence in this document. TOJO said he did not place much trust in the person HARADA. TOJO said he considered HARADA a sort of highclass information broker. *If he were alive or dead, TOJO said he would say the same thing. TOJO said he never met HARADA, but his impression was that he was a peddler of information.
- 36658 *TOJO said he would not say that Prince SAIONJI had passed judgment on any issue on the information brought to him by HARADA. TOJO said he did not deny that
- 36659 all premiers were chosen by SAIONJI. *TOJO was asked if he agreed that in appointing the Prime Minister of Japan SAIONJI exercised the most important governmental function. TOJO agreed if the question means that it was performing a function of the highest political responsibility and
- 36660 *playing one of the most important roles in the appointment of the Prime Minister. If Prince SAIONJI himself
- 36661 wrote the diary, TOJO would place reliance on it. *TOJO said it depended on the way SAIONJI edited it to determine whether he would have more respect for it.
- 36662 *TOJO did not know SAIONJI. He had never met him. TOJO, MATSUOKA, YOSHIDA and KONOYE met for the first time on the 19th of July 1940 at what is known as Ogikubo Conference. The purpose was to provide for
- 36663 political leadership and guidance. *TOJO said no secretary was there. No one was there but the Prime
- 36664 Minister, MATSUOKA, YOSHIDA, and TOJO. *TOJO said they were only concerned with a high degree national defense state. TOJO said YOSHIDA did not manifest any opposition to plan at that conference.
- 36665 *Exhibit 3687A was handed to TOJO for examination. He was asked if this did not relate to what took place
- 36666 at the Four-Ministers' Conference on the 19th of August, and also the Liaison Conference. *TOJO said he did not remember the Four-Ministers' Conference of August 19, 1940. TOJO said also the document did not contain facts. "The Outline of the Solution of the Situation," presented in evidence, was decided at the Liaison Conference and the exhibit is accurate, but the summary which TOJO was

- 36667 examining has portions which were not consistent with the original document and show what a high-class information broker can do. *TOJO said he inferred that this was written by HARADA on the basis of what HARADA heard
- 36668 indifferent places. *A portion of Exhibit was read but
- 36669 TOJO said he did not change his opinion about it. *In order to point out inconsistencies in Ex. 3687, TOJO asked to compare it with the "Outline of the Solution of the Situation." *TOJO said Ex. 1310, "Main Points in Regard to Dealing with the Situation," was different from the HARADA document both in form and in content. The HARADA document states, "The Essential Points," and then gives articles I, II, which is not the form which was taken at the Liaison Conference. The HARADA diary describes the plan for the prompt submission of the Chungking Regime. Ex. 1310 plans the settlement of the China Incident by preventing Third Powers from assisting the Chiang regime. TOJO said at the Liaison Conference no one had yet thought of planning the prompt submission of the Chungking regime.
- 36671 *TOJO said the HARADA diary states as to the South Seas Islands policy, they will seize an opportunity and utilize any changes in the situation. The actual exhibit states that to settle the Southern Problems they will act within the limits so as not to cause a war against a Third Power. TOJO stated the HARADA diary was wrong in regard to many points and he believed HARADA must have written down what he heard from miscellaneous sources.
- 36672 TOJO was asked if the entry in HARADA Diary which stated they would plan the prompt submission of the Chungking Regime was in error. He replied that he could not say but TOJO said at the time this decision was adopted no one had yet decided on that matter. *TOJO said that decision was embodied in the Imperial Conference decision of 13 November 1940, when the policy towards China was decided upon, and in that decision the national will toward China was clearly established.

- 36674 *TOJO pointed what HARADA calls "Article II" and said the original document didn't have any Article II. HARADA's diary states that emphasis is to be placed on policies towards Germany, Italy, and Russia, but TOJO said the phrase, "emphasis is to be placed on policies towards Germany, Italy, and Russia" cannot be found in the original decision of the Liaison Conference.
- 36675 *HARADA wrote that although they would not refrain from boldly carrying out the policy deemed necessary by the Empire in spite of the inevitable and natural aggravation which will accompany it. TOJO pointed out that portion is something that was added by HARADA. He said it was not in the Liaison Conference decision.
- 36676 HARADA stated that regarding French Indo-China (Kwangchow Bay*included) and TOJO pointed out the phrase "Regarding French Indo-China (Kwangchow Bay included)" was not included as Kwangchow Bay, was not even considered. TOJO said that part of HARADA Diary that FIC must supply troops, permit the use of airfields and the passage of troops, and that they would also strive for the acquisition of raw materials necessary to the Empire, was not included when*the national policy was decided on at the Liaison Conference. That way of thinking did not appear until September 1940.
- 36677
- 36678 *TOJO said the statement that with respect to withdrawal of troops of belligerent countries, they would induce China to take these back, was going too far, that Japan didn't think of such a thing at the time and it is difficult to understand what is meant.
- 36679 HARADA stated in regard to the Dutch East Indies, they would endeavor to *secure vital resources through diplomatic measures. TOJO said this was off the track, for the Liaison Conference decided to strengthen the diplomatic policy towards the Dutch East Indies in order to obtain important materials. TOJO said the Liaison Conference decision did not include statement they would take measures to secure the return of the former German and French territorial islands in the South Pacific through diplomatic negotiations.

- 36680 *TOJO stated it seemed to him that HARADA confused the outline of the fundamental national policy decided upon on the 26th of July 1940, and the Liaison Conference decision regarding the outline for the solution of the situation, which was arrived at on the following day. And HARADA apparently wrote this portion of his diary as Articles I, II, so forth, just as if he had written down, verbatim, the actual decisions of the Liaison Conference, and that is why TOJO called him a high-class information broker.
- 36681 *TOJO said Ex. 541 stated correctly the Cabinet decision of 26 July 1940 and exhibit 541 correctly stated the *decision of the Liaison Conference of 27 July 1940. He assumed responsibility for these decisions as War Minister.
- 36682
- 36688 *TOJO was asked what was meant by maintaining a firm attitude towards America. *TOJO said this meant to advocate righteousness and not take a servile position in diplomatic negotiations. *TOJO said he never dreamed of attacking the U.S. in war unless the U.S. would desist from sending any supplies or aid to Chiang Kai-shek.
- 36689
- 36692 TOJO said he never even thought of making war unless assistance to Chiang Kai-shek ceased.
- 36693
- 36695 *TOJO was asked if he recalled the 4th item that the U.S. would obstruct Japan's effort to a peace with China. Whether it was item four or one, TOJO did not recall, but such an item was there. TOJO explained that if Proposition A failed Japan intended to improve the situation by means of Proposal B. *It was their intention to improve the situation and then to enter into more negotiations on broader issues.
- 36696
- 36697 *TOJO said if Plan B had been accepted by the U.S., the Pearl Harbor attack would not have occurred. Even if half of Plan B were accepted by U.S., TOJO did not believe war would have occurred, if the U.S. truly desired peace in the Pacific.

36698 *TOJO was asked what part of Plan B would have been sufficient for the U.S. to accept to prevent the Pearl Harbor attack. TOJO said any item would have done if U.S. had approached Japan with an attitude to make concessions on her own part. TOJO believed that the terms could have been relaxed if the U.S. approached Japan in a spirit of reciprocity. TOJO said he approved of both plans. He was the one holding the highest responsibility on the matter.

36699 *TOJO was asked if he remembered that about October 18, 1941, TOGO told Grew, KURUSU and NOMURA that Plans A and B carried the last concession that possibly could be *made by Japan. TOJO couldn't remember exactly how it was worded, but he believed it was only natural TOGO must have said something to that effect as Foreign Minister.

TOJO took such steps on the basis of decisions made by the Liaison Conference, and he was doing his duty as Foreign Minister. TOJO was asked if TOGO wasn't acting in TOJO's responsibility as Prime Minister, and he said in some sense he was but TOJO's position was different from that of the Foreign Minister.

TOJO said he did not deny that at Liaison Conference, November 5, 1941, Plans A and B were drawn up with the last concessions from Japan, and they were sent to the United States through *diplomatic channels with instructions that they constituted the farthest extent in concessions. *TOJO said this was not the last word. The last word was contained in the note delivered to U.S. on the 7th of December. In the meantime, TOJO said the Hull Note was thrown into their faces. *TOJO said the language was used that they were the final concessions that would be made.

36703

*TOJO said that accurate information was transmitted to Ambassadors at Washington. As for TOGO, he took various measures in regard to this very vital question, whereas TOJO was occupied with *the question of the rise or fall of Japan.

36706

*TOJO said the Premier could not say that once a plan had been decided upon he wanted the whole plan carried through in toto. TOJO said TOGO did not act against TOJO's intentions or desires when TOGO told the Japanese Ambassadors at Washington that Plans A and B contained the maximum concessions that Japan was willing to agree to. *TOJO said he took the responsibility therefor.

36707

TOJO was asked when they decided that the U.S. was not acting in good faith. TOJO said they never made up their minds on such a thing. TOJO said he did not know of naval preparations for the departure of the Japanese fleet for Pearl Harbor. They were handled by the Naval High Command. TOJO said he was not trying to evade responsibility.

36708

*TOJO said plans A and B were also discussed at the Liaison Conferences and the discussions considered whether or not they would constitute the final concessions of Japan.

36709

*Exhibit 3688 was handed to the witness. TOJO identified the document definitely as the record embodying the cabinet decision 3 September 1940.

36710

*TOJO was asked what was meant by "special facilities for the establishment and operation of Japanese enterprises as contained in Exhibit 3688.

36711

*TOJO said he thought this was a demand that every possible convenience should be afforded Japanese enterprises in their establishment and operation. This had no relation to why an army was dispatched to Indo-China. TOJO said this was a cabinet decision so he was sure that these were demands on FIC. TOJO said this was the basis for diplomatic negotiations with French Indo-China, and Japan hoped to solve the matter through peaceful negotiations. TOJO said Japan didn't have any rights to make demands.

*TOJO said it was true that they planned to advance troops into Northern FIC at the time. But the purpose was not to enforce demands. TOJO was asked if it were merely a coincidence that the army was dispatched to Indo-China at the same time they made the demands. TOJO said rather than say that the troops advanced into FIC, Japan's advance into FIC was based on negotiations conducted with the Vichy Government. Roosevelt had discussed in detail the FIC problem with the Emperor. TOJO believed he employed the words, "with the permission of the Vichy Government."

36713

*TOJO said troops first advanced into FIC. TOJO was then War Minister. TOJO, as War Minister, was responsible for initiating that plan of dispatching the Japanese troops into Indo-China at that time. TOJO said the troops were sent to Indo-China after agreement with the Vichy Government. *TOJO could not say for sure, but according to his recollection, probably a portion of forces stationed in South China were sent to FIC besides those from Japan. TOJO recalled it was the Fifth Division that was sent.

36714

TOJO was asked if he recalled the entry in KIDO's diary where KIDO quoted the Emperor as stating, with reference to transactions in Indo-China, that he did not *like the application of the principle of thief at a fire. TOJO said he recalled that entry, and he thought KIDO used very strange language. TOJO said he had no recollection of ever taking action similar to that of a thief at a fire. TOJO said he could not imagine the Emperor using such a phrase as "a thief at a fire". He thought KIDO must have imagined that and written it down. In Japan that is the lowest form of expression.

36716

TOJO's attention was called to decision of September 3, 1940, and he was asked *what the phrase "existing interests" referred to. TOJO replied that as to what is meant by existing interests, he did not have sufficient knowledge to reply fully. He felt that inferentially interests already existing were meant. TOJO said he did not have enough knowledge to reply.

36717 *TOJO was asked what was meant by "driving out," and he said this had no reference to military force. They intended to use diplomatic negotiations. Since the words "drive out" were written, TOJO supposed drive out was meant. They intended by diplomatic negotiations to drive them out.

36718 *TOJO then read the phrase "a Committee for Economic Construction and other suitable organs which include Japanese." He thought this meant an intention to see the establishment of a committee which would include. TOJO's attention was called to the language that the banks of FIC would offer Japanese all possible financial facilities, but even realize the exchange control guided by the Empire. *He believed the words honestly conveyed the Cabinet decision of that date. As Minister of War and also as a Minister of State, TOJO had responsibility for this decision. In order to effectuate the stabilization of the Far East, troops were sent to FIC to shut off supplies to Chiang Kai-shek TOJO said.

36720 *TOJO said they took the action referred to because they thought the immediate solution of the China Incident was an important factor in stabilizing the Far East. TOJO said it was a fact they requested the German Government for assistance, which was refused. He didn't recall the date. This request was made by TOJO so TOJO did not remember the date. TOJO could not recall whether the matter was discussed at a Liaison Conference, or whether TOJO did it on his own responsibility.

36721 *TOJO stated the Netherlands declared war on Japan on the 8th of December 1941, and that is how the state of war arose between the two countries. *TOJO said the wording of the Imperial Conference decision of December 1 states Japan intended to war against Netherlands, but the declaration of war made no mention of this. The declaration of war was against U.S. and Britain. It was the Netherlands that declared war on Japan.

36723 TOJO said they made up their minds on the 1st 36724 of December that war with Britain, U.S. and Netherlands was unavoidable. This arose from the necessity of self-defense. *TOJO was asked in what way the Netherlands menaced Japan. TOJO said the threat *was military, economic and political. In close military cooperation with Britain and U.S. the Netherlands participated in the military encirclement of Japan. Japan saw the Netherlands Navy allied with the British and American Navies.

Airfields in NEI were available to the British and American air forces. Submarine bases were offered to Britain and U.S. The armed forces of NEI and those of Britain and U.S. were increasing. Together with Britain and U.S. the Netherlands was a threat to Japan.

36725 *TOJO said exhibits 3660 and 3567 state the details of this threat. TOJO was asked if any representative of the Netherlands ever uttered a threat to use military force against Japan. TOJO said in May of 1941 the Foreign Minister of the Netherlands stated they were ready to meet the Japanese challenge at any time, together with Britain and the U.S.

36726 *TOJO said it was true that every country has the privilege of defending itself, but as to whether the language used by the Netherlands representative had to do with the challenge from Japan, TOJO said the words were the customary diplomatic language and the interpretation of what those words meant was up to Japan. What Japan wanted to know was not the words themselves but the real significance behind them. TOJO said Japan interpreted those words as a threat. TOJO said they felt they had received a political challenge.

*Exhibit No.3735. "Plan for Disposing of Incident, dated August 7, 1936 stated that the main object was to settle the Incident quickly by effective military operations and diplomatic measures so that China would lose her pretext for anti-Japanism and there be created between Japan and China a fair and permanent diplomatic relation with cooperation and co-prosperity between Japan, Manchukou and China.

The aim of the military action is to make China give up her will to fight in the shortest possible time. For prompt settlement measures such as the use of military force, occupation of strategic points and accompanying necessary operations, etc. shall be taken.

The aim of diplomatic measures is to urge China's reconsideration as soon as possible so she may be led to the position desired. *Timely negotiations and actions will be carried out. The way of settling the Incident and its remedial measures is to make China lose her pretext for anti-Japanism and to negotiate with her under conditions unbiased by past circumstances. All measures and accompanying operations shall be carefully taken within the bounds of international law.

37221

"Principal areas for using military force on the land shall be Hopeh-Chahar and Shanghai and against areas where it is needed, military operations shall be carried out from the sea and air. To carry out military operation smoothly the various organs of the nation will be brought to wartime status by executing general mobilization and establishing emergency laws.

The settlement of the NORTH CHINA problem aims at realizing co-existence and co-prosperity of Japan, Manchukuo and China, bringing about a really bright North China under the control of China's Central Government. They expect to see the creation of such condition in Central China and South China as to be suitable for continuous promotion and development of trade between Japan and China.

*Measures to be taken behind the operation field of North China should avoid for the most part any idea of enemy territory occupation. There shall be no administration by the Occupation Army but maintenance of peace and order shall be ensured under Army guidance. Political organs shall be left to the local inhabitants but they will give necessary guidance to make them carry out a fair administration. Transportation facilities and exploitation of materials necessary for military purpose shall be under necessary control.

Trade, economic and financial relations between Japan, China and third countries shall be ruled in line with Japan's main object of having China lose her hostile spirit.

*Military and diplomatic measures and accompanying actions, shall be carefully taken for least they cause entanglements with third countries or induce intervention. Depending upon the situation, all Japanese residents shall be evacuated and their relief will be considered. Although it is the main purpose to bring the Incident to an immediate settlement, they should be determined to exercise military power on a large scale for a long period of time. They should make quick preparations to be able to meet any development in the situation.

This was decided and signed on August 7 by Foreign, Army and Navy Ministers. The Foreign Office will try secretly and quickly to have the Chinese make proposals for peace.

The first plan entrusted to the Foreign Ministry for the creation of a disarmed zone provided that the eastern and northern areas of the line connecting Paochang-Changpei,-- Lungmen-Yenking-Mentoukou-Chow-Chow-Mauu-Yungtsin-Singan-Tuliuchen-Hsingnunchen-Faoshaling (including areas on the line) shall be a disarmed zone shutting out Chinese troops. Peace and order shall be in charge of the "Peace Preservation Corps" whose strength and equipment shall be stipulated hereafter.

The second plan, taken as the final one provided that Paochang-Changpei-Lungmen-Yenking-Mentoukou line and the adjoining areas in the Hopei Province, left of the Yungtung and Hai rivers shall be disarmed zone with maintenance of peace and order by the "Peace Preservation Corps".

In case China lays emphasis on a time limit for the disarmed zone, there is no objection.

The first plan provided that if a time limit is attached, they will take into consideration what is to be done on its expiration. The second plan adopted provided that in case a time limit was attached, an understanding shall be had that on expiration another disarmed zone shall be newly-established along the Sino-Manchurian border, drawn by a fixed line. According to need, Japan will express willingness to voluntarily reduce the strength of occupation troops within the limits of the strength at the time of the outbreak. The TANGKU Truce shall be abolished and various agreements based on it will be adjusted, if necessary. Various arrangements based upon the Peiping arrangement, such as * Confiscation of the Great Wall's gates; through railway traffic, customs, through mail service, aviation, shall not be abolished. The DOIHARA-CHIN TE-CHIN and UMEZU-HO YING-CHIN Agreements shall be abolished but the Central Army will 37227 *Japan agrees to dissolving of the Hopei-Chahar and EASTERN HOPEI Governments, the administration there to be left to the discretion of Nanking. They hoped that the Chief Administrators would be influential persons suitable for Sino-Japanese harmony. An agreement shall be reached on economic collaboration in North China. It should be collaboration under joint management based upon Sino-Japanese equality. Although there is no objection to dissolving the Eastern Hopei Government, they must consider making the most of bargaining in the negotiations.

37228 Negotiations for adjusting Sino-Japanese relations, unbiased by past circumstances, shall be made concurrently with or following the peace negotiations stipulated herein. *If the peace agreement be reached between Japan and China, and the evacuation of Chinese troops from the disarmed zones and the Central Army from the HOPEI Province is effected, then the evacuation of troops shall commence. Announcement of Japan's intentions of evacuation shall be timed with the reaching of the agreement.

A mutual announcement shall be made that the two countries will henceforth enter into a "New Deal" for realization of true friendship." And then, "TOP SECRET (STAMP) "Outline of the Proposal for the General Adjustment of Sino-Japanese Relations decided Evening 6 August 1937, stated that politically CHINA shall give a tacit promise to leave MANCHOURUO alone. There shall be concluded an anti-communistic agreement between Japan and China and anti-communism in the disarmed zone will naturally be practiced, and strictly controlled; that besides dissolving EASTERN HOPEI and HOPEI CHAHAR Governments, Japan will negotiate 37229 * with NANKING on Inner Mongolia and Suiyuan districts to have it accept Japan's rightful requests, Japan having no intention of excluding Nanking's influence from those districts, and that China shall strictly control anti-Japanese movements and emphasize its 'good neighbor Ordinance' throughout the country and any anti-Japanese movement in the disarmed zone must be especially controlled.

Militarily, if China strongly demands the abolition of the Shanghai Peace Agreement Japan will agree after making the most of the transaction and free aviation will be abolished.

Economically, customs tariff on specific articles will be lowered, EASTERN HOPEI special trade will be lowered. EASTERN HOPEI special trade will be abolished and free hand control in China's smuggling on the sea bordering the disarmed zone will be restored.

*Exhibit 3268 previously for identification (29886) (HIROTA) to rebut 29786 et seq. Views concerning the attitude of the Empire toward Arbitration or Intervention by America, European Powers or the League of Nations in the Sino-Japanese Incident, decided by the War Department Oct 11 1937 stated that Japan would forcibly refuse and exclude intervention or pressure by U.S., European Powers, or the League in connection with the Incident but will accept peace-recommending arbitration after it has achieved the object of its military movements against China. This principle upon confirmation by Navy, Army and Foreign Affairs, shall be sent to envoys in foreign countries with orders to act in accordance.

Germany and Italy will be informed of this decision at an appropriate time and required to support Japan's assertion. The reasons for this are that the cooperation of England and U.S. and the meeting of the Nine Power Treaty Powers * show that the powers and the League may interfere or arbitrate.

Such interference and arbitration before accomplishment of the purpose of the military movement will never make China feel contrite. Japan will forcibly prevent and reject them if they are not impartial peace-recommending arbitration proposals even after the purpose of the military movement is accomplished because this would be throwing away the results of all previous efforts. There is no reason to reject just, peace-recommending arbitration as it may facilitate negotiations with China. If such countries as Germany and Italy, though they are not so powerful, should come forward as arbitrators at China's request it would be the better because of their special relations with Japan.

Though this principle is generally accepted it is not yet decided as the national attitude. It should be negotiated among War, Navy and Foreign Affairs and become the foundation of diplomatic measures. They should be careful not to publish it too hastily, nor to speak of it to the Powers since it might leave the impression that Japan is anxious to bring the incident to a close.

In the matter of the course decided upon to be taken by the Japanese Government on Mediation or Intervention by Third Powers in Connection with the Sino-Japanese Incident, decided by Navy and Foreign Affairs on October 22, 1937, stated that with the progress of the Incident England, Soviet Russia and the United States showed indications of intervening. They are either intervention or arbitration founded on placing Japan in the position of a defendant. It was natural that Japan should reject them from the first. With the advance of military movement, when its purpose shall be practically attained, the Nanking Government, under the pressure 37240 of Japan's force, will want to sue for peace although obliged to *assume outwardly a strong attitude. The good will offices of England, United States and others in such a case will be advantageous to draw China to negotiations. If Germany and Italy should act as arbitrators at the request of China, it would be excellent.

Such being the case, the following principles are adopted. They will positively refuse and exclude hasty intervention or arbitration by third parties but may accept impartial peace-recommending services from them at a time when they have nearly achieved the purpose of military movements toward China. This shall be sent to appropriate envoys with instructions to take measures accordingly. They should avoid publishing it too hastily or making it known to foreign governments because it is not an advisable measure since it may give an impression that Japan is in a hurry to conclude the Incident because of some weakness.

37241 *They should tell beforehand only Germany and Italy on some proper occasion and take such measures as might induce them to act according to Japan's wishes. When they recognize that the purpose of military movements toward China has nearly been accomplished or that they should notify Germany and Italy, this will be decided by consultation among War, Navy and Foreign Affairs.

37245 (HIROTA) For Ident. 29866 to rebut 29858.

37246 Exhibit No. 3269 - The Course Towards the Opening of the Imperial Conference January 14, 1938, East Asia Bureau, stated that Wang Ke-Min recently put before TERAUCHI three questions - whether Japan will give full-scale support to the new North China regime; whether Japan intends to regard CHIANG Kai-shek as a party to deal with, and whether Japan intends *to make North China similar to Manchukuo.

Commander TERAUCHI conveyed these to the Central Army authorities, who were unable to reach a decision. TERAUCHI urged the War Minister or Vice Minister to come to Tientsin. Almost simultaneously MATSUI urged the central authorities to establish a policy, stating that it was inadvisable to save the situation by dealing with CHIANG Kai-shek. Central Army authorities decided to hold the Liaison and Imperial Conferences.

MATSUDAIRA understood that the outline decided by the Imperial Conference was carried by UMEZU to China, but was doubtful as to the reliability of the story.

37249 *Exhibit No. 3270-A. Communication from Prime Minister KONOYE to HIROTA January 21, 1938 stated that the general principles of National Policy had been decided. They would, he stated, make it the basic principles

37250 *Military aims in the China Incident shall be perfectly attained, and the status of general mobilization completed according to the needs of national defense and plans to strengthen military preparedness will be made. All measures shall be taken against prolonged resistance of China.

Within the next four years the development of important industries shall be planned, the over-all expansion of productive capacity achieved, and supplies of materials necessary for national defense secured under a comprehensive plan, including North China, international balance of trade improved by promoting export trade. The establishment of a national defense economy and strengthening of the economic power of the Empire can be expected.

37251 *The home front shall be managed, aid given to the war dead, wounded and diseased and their families; proper measures taken for demobilization and for the recovery of Japanese residents in China. The future development of the Empire is expected to be secured.

The guidance of national thought shall be strengthened and made complete, science and culture shall be promoted and education will be reformed to cultivate the character of the people of a great nation.

The determination of the nation towards the emergency shall be increasingly emphasized and every effort shall be made to enforce various policies for stabilizing national livelihood, especially in promoting the development of agricultural and fishing villages. The welfare of medium and minor merchants manufacturers and laborers and the physical strength of the people shall be emphasized.

Together with imposing necessary state controls over prices, finance industry, foreign trade, transportation and communication, power, labor, etc.

*for national preparedness, the promotion of industry and the stabilization of the national livelihood, an emergency financial plan shall be established. Efforts shall be made to eradicate and overcome Communism and other thoughts or actions inconsistent with the national structure. To assure rapid and precise execution of the policies, the political administration shall be reformed and the various organs of the state shall be made to conform to it.

The reasons for this are that although the Chiang Kai-Shek Regime has lost its capital and other important districts, they have not awakened from anti-Japanese delusions but are still expecting foreign aid and anticipating the economic collapse of Japan and are devoting themselves to prolonged resistance. This will tend to prolong obstinate resistance.

Meanwhile both England and Russia are skillfully agitating *China and the general trend is far from reassuring. From the long point of view, it is necessary to achieve the military objectives and plan for undermining long term resistance and for a rapid overseas expansion. In order to meet any changes in the international situation with unity, it is necessary to attain complete military preparedness. With the next few years as the objective, it is an urgent necessity that the nation's course be clarified, and that all elements in the state devote themselves to the attainment of this objective.

37256

*Exhibit 3271. Instructions of February 8, 1938, to Consul Generals in Shanghai and in Hongkong from HIROTA on matters pertaining to propaganda work for the destruction of the Nationalist Government, stated that to aid the self-dissolution of the Nationalist Government, stated that to aid in the self-dissolution of the Nationalist Government, the Foreign Ministry has been making various propaganda leaflets and pamphlets which aims at disintegration within the enemy's army and the alienation of the people's minds. These have been scattered in various important areas by navy aircraft. In view of the frequent outbursts of internal dissensions in the Canton, Szechwan areas for the past few days it is thought that this might be the appropriate time to hasten disintegration and destruction by aggravating domestic discord through the reinforcement of this type of project. Since this work necessitates timeliness in the future on matters which require immediate planning, it is requested that the recipient also make appropriate leaflets and pamphlets, or give consideration to completion of the work through radio and newspapers.

In Szechwan there is an idea that Szechwan should be ruled by its people. They must emphasize this idea strongly and help the Szechwan army unite against Chiang Kai-shek.

37258 *In the Canton area, we must observe the relationship between certain Chinese and Nanking and the internal disintegration.

In Hsu-Chow they must plan estrangement of the local Central armies. They must plan to cause and promote anti-communistic movements in all areas.

37261 *Exhibit 3272. Matters Regarding the Imperial General Headquarters Council February 18, 1938, stated that the Council was opened on the 16th. The Navy stated that it was necessary to obtain air bases in Nanking in the Yangtze-Kiang area and near Hongkong in South China to facilitate future air raids.

The Army stated it planned to advance its military activities up to the Lunghai Railway Area, but it could not consider the capture of Nanking at present. The Army never thought of sending troops to the Hongkong and Kuangtung area. It was necessary to leave a margin of power behind in view of the situation of the Soviet Union.

37262 *The Navy insisted on the need of expanding naval power to prepare against Great Britain and America. The Emperor asked the War Minister whether the Army could, at one and the same time, carry out preparations against the Soviet and Great Britain and America and the latter replied that he would answer after consulting other members of the cabinet.

37264 *(R.29703-4; 29861-2)
Exhibit No.3736 Telegram from Trautmann to Ribbentrop, 15 January 1938 stated that the President of the Executive Yuan expressed thanks for everything that Germany had done to bring about peace, and for the words of the Fuehrer.

37265 *The Chinese Government did not by any means want to adopt an evasive attitude and many discussions were held because the decision involved difficult national and international complications. China who has suffered so much, was willing to come to a real understanding with Japan which would guarantee lasting peace and she wanted to make all earnest endeavors to seek every possibility of peace.

Kung requested that an oral report be conveyed to HIROTA stating that it was most unfortunate that China and Japan should be engaged in armed conflict. China still entertained the desire to reach a real understanding with Japan so that durable peace might be maintained in East Asia. China had expressed the earnest wish to be informed of the nature and content of the "basic conditions" proposed by Japan because they wanted to use every effort to restore peace.

*Trautman felt that China might tone down the defect of her answer by this statement.

37285

"Exhibit No.3737 A. Proceedings of Budget Committee Meeting of February 16, 1938, House of Peers stated Baron OKURA asked KIDO in view of the fact that foreign newspapers write distasteful things about the actions of the Japanese forces in Nanking and Shanghai areas

*what was being done in the field to education to correct such conduct. KIDO stated that he heard about the reports of actions of Japanese troops in Shanghai and he did not think that they were all absolutely true. It was a fact that there were quite a number of such reports from other sources. He had often heard about the wrongful actions of Japanese abroad caused by extreme senses of superiority in and around China and Manchuria. He believed this was caused by some shortcomings in education. Japan which will expand to the continent in the future must be concerned with this point and make reflections.

It is necessary to give a more grand and virile education from elementary school on, in order to maintain the broadmindedness of a great nation. Up to this date they had paid some attention and started working in that direction in the summarized programme of instruction revised last year. In the future, they want to make full studies and carry out remedial measures.

*When asked by OKURA why Japan had tried to deal with Chiang Kai Shek, HIROTA stated that since the beginning they had adopted the policy of local settlement and non-aggravation. In those days they had negotiated constantly with the Chinese in compliance with this policy. It became impossible for Japan to continue that policy because of the subsequent Chinese attitude. Japan decided on a policy to necessarily chastise them. Parallel with chastisement by force of arms, Japan constantly continued negotiations with the hope of making them reflect and to make them correct the extremely wrong ideas of Chiang Kai-Shek and others in the National Government, if possible. These negotiations were carried out by contacting various nations.

37294

* In those days, when the resolution of aiding China was passed in the meeting of the League of Nations and when conference of the Nine Power Treaty was to be held, there was a tendency of the Powers to jointly settle this incident with sympathy directed toward China. It was impossible for Japan to accept the mediatory acts of the Powers, although Japan notified those Powers, especially Germany and Italy respectively, of Japan's preparedness for negotiating if China made reflections and requested a direct negotiation. China's attitude was as strong as ever. She strongly stated that she would never independently negotiate with Japan to settle. She stated this in the Nine Power Conference.

*Later the Germans made a proposal that the Chinese intention of entering into direct negotiations with Japan seemed fairly intense, and that the Chinese had heard that Japan would accept but wished to obtain Japan's view as to the attitude which the Chinese must have. Japan decided upon the four basic conditions. In addition to these

*Chiang Kai-shek would have to put an actual end to the situation of cooperating with the Communist party. Japan might agree to open negotiations on the basis of these four conditions, provided Chiang showed evidence of complying with the spirit of the so-called anti-comintern by severing relations with the Communists or ousting those in intimate relations with it.

It is absolutely not true that Japan tried to compromise. It took the attitude that it would accept direct negotiation if Chiang-Kai-shek would accept the terms demanded and ask for peace. China gave various noncommittal answers to the terms presented and no sincerity was perceived. As the result of reaching the decision that they could no longer try to settle by dealing with Chiang Kai-shek, they issued the declaration.

- 37315 *Exhibit No.3739 - Telegram from SHIDEHARA to Consul General HAYASHI at Mukden, 5 September 1931, re Control of the Activities of adventurers in connection with the NAKAMURA Incident, stated that they had heard that ITAGAKI and others of the Kwantung Army were exerting themselves in various activities with ample funds and were manipulating Japanese adventurers in China and members of the KOKUSUI-KAI. In view of the tardy progress of the negotiations on the NAKAMURA Incident especially, they had decided on some concrete move around the middle of the month. He hoped it was merely a rumour.
- 37316 * In view of the appearance of excitement on the part of military authorities, it would be regrettable if they ruined Japan's position by behaving rashly; he was to take further deliberate steps to control the activities of the RONIN.
- 37322 *Exhibit No.2406, telegram from Consul General HAYASHI, Mukden, to Foreign Minister SHIDEHARA, October 13, 1931, stated that according to the Chief of the Manchurian Railway's local office, Japan's army supplied Chang Waipeng with 5000 rifles to give him independence.
- 37323 Chang asked for * further assistance of 200,000 yen as a war fund. - Exhibit 2407 telegram from Consul General HAYASHI Mukden to Foreign Minister SHIDEHARA, 17 Oct 1931, stated that according to Hsieh Chieh-Shik, Chang Hai-peng telephoned his family in Taonan on the morning of the 15th that his entry into Tsitsihar would be a little delayed because a bridge was destroyed on the way. Hsieh stated that there was a condition that Chang Hai-peng be supplied with 10,000 rifles, 200,000 yuan, field guns and planes by a certain quarter for entering Heilungkiang and that he declare the independence, and then proceed with the restoration of the Monarch. He received only 3000 rifles and 200,000 yuan. His troop strength is some 3000, although he is planning to increase it to more than 5000, training is insufficient.
- 37326 *Even if he succeeds in occupying Tsitsihar peacefully, it is doubtful that he could maintain his position since there are quite a few soldiers in various parts in the province who possess troop strength. It would be still more difficult to support Pu-Yi for the throne. Chiang's success or failure depends wholly upon the amount of support given by a certain quarter.

He learned that though the Army had no objections, they instructed the office to state the stipulations clearly and get the approval of Headquarters before the plans are put in operation, and also to report to the consulate and the police. These are not only unfavorable from the viewpoint of international relations, but they are the materialization of a part of the plans of the Army of October 2nd. *Exhibit 3457, decision of the Five Ministers Conference. The Measures to be taken in the case of Surrender of the Present Central Government of China, decided 8 July 1938, stated that * in case of surrender of China, Japan will regard the Central Government as one of the regimes and treat it accordingly to the "Must be made to join the newly established Central Government of China" policy. Japan will adhere to the decided policy and shall not try to adjust the general relations between Japan and China in negotiation with the present Government.

In case the present Government surrenders and accepts the third condition, stated later, it shall either be considered a friendly regime and be permitted to join the newly established Central Government, or be made to establish another new central government in cooperation with various existing pro-Japanese regimes.

The merger with or establishment of a new central government shall be undertaken chiefly by the Chinese, with internal assistance by Japan. The merger with or taking part in the establishment of the new Central Government of China; the change of title and reorganization of the former National Government; the abolition of anti-Japanese, pro-Communist policy and the adoption of pro-Japanese-Manchukuo and anti-Communist policy, and the retirement of Chiang Kai-shek are conditions for recognizing the surrender.

The suspension of hostilities shall not be taken up unless Japan is satisfied with the facts of surrender. In the case of negotiation the cessation of hostilities, the conditions shall be considered separately. The Measures to be taken in the case where the Present Central Government of China does not Surrender, (decided 8 July 1938) stated that:

"The Policy" Japan shall control her national power more rigidly and her whole strength in administration, foreign relations, financial tactics and propaganda shall be concentrated upon bringing about the 0152 0002 6944

37353

destruction or surrender of the present Government of China. The various measures necessary for long term warfare shall be intensified to actually realize wartime conditions spiritually and materially.

Before occupying strategic points, Japan must direct positive war operations without break to occupy strategic points to control the general situation of China so as to cause the self-destruction of the present government and the abandonment of fighting spirit, through repeated defeats and especially the loss of their midland.

In accord with the development of war operations, the pro-Japanese and anti-Comintern influences should be fostered through strengthening tactics of administration, finance, foreign relations and thought. The aim is to break up anti-Japanese influence and to bring about an atmosphere for peace as well as the ruin of its financial and economic basis, so that the present Government might collapse, or be reduced to a mere local regime at the earliest possible time.

*These policies shall be carried out not only by Japan but also thru guidance of the various pro-Japanese regimes of China and others. The various pro-Japanese regimes shall be enlarged and strengthened and be incorporated into one regime as early as possible. It should be made really worthy of the name of a Central Chinese Government so that it may be inevitably recognized at home and abroad as the government replacing the present government.

Recognition of the new central Government of China by Japan depends solely upon the situation but it must be done as soon as possible. While Japan will respect the rights and interests of third powers, and avoid trouble with them, it should adopt powerful and straightforward measures to settle the Incident so that the policies toward China be understood.

*The others will be compelled to support Japan's attitude in order to protect and increase their vested rights and interests. As a result the present Government will be isolated. After occupying the strategic points, in case the present government should not surrender, Japan should not be impatient so as to resort to force to settle the Incident, but should make efforts to enlarge and strengthen the new Government, and at the same time attempt the downfall of the present Government chiefly by increasing pressure upon it by political, economic and ideological measures.

STRATEGY TOWARD CHINA IN CONFORMITY WITH THE CURRENT SITUATION decided 8 July 1938, stated that in order to break down the present Chinese Government and bring about Chiang Kai-shek's fall simultaneously with the destruction of fighting power, the plans shall be strengthened.

*By engaging persons of the first rank in China they will pave the way for a new strong administrative power concurrently with the weakening of the people's fighting spirit. By conciliation and submission of irregular forces they plan to disrupt and weaken the fighting power. By utilizing and controlling the authoritative anti-Chiang Kai-shek elements, they will establish in the enemy's midst an anti-Chiang Kai-shek, anti-Comintern and anti-war government.

By promoting the Mohammedan movement they will create an anti-Comintern zone operated by Mohammedans in the northwestern region.

By confiscating Chinese funds abroad, they will cause financial destruction. They will spread necessary undercover propaganda to make easier the execution of all the measures.

*THE GUIDING POLICY FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE NEW CENTRAL GOVERNMENT OF CHINA, decided 15 July 1938, stated that the new Central Government shall not be confined to the mere party concerned in settling the Incident, but shall be made the government of China, so that Japan and China will sweep away all frictions in past relationships and establish a friendly relationship from a broadminded viewpoint.

Though the establishment will be undertaken mainly by Chinese, it will be internally assisted by Japan. The principle of the collaboration of individual local governments shall be adopted. A Joint Commission shall be established by cooperation between the Provisional and Restoration Governments to be joined later by the Mongolian and Hsiang-Kiang Joint Commission. Japan should guide this regime to make it grow into a real central government.

*The new Government shall not be established until after the fall of Hankow with the Chiang Kai-shek regime reduced to a local government or until the reformation of the present government is brought about by Chiang retirement.

In case the split or reformation does not take place after the fall of Hankow they should establish a new central government from existing governments. In case the Chiang Kai-shek regime is broken up or reformed, and should a pro-Japanese government turn up, they would make it a factor of the central government system and proceed to set up a central government.

The date for recognition of the new Government would be when the reformed government could take charge of suspension of hostilities, or when the United Government has grown to be a efficient central government.

Adjustment of the relations between Japan and China in connection *with control of the new Government shall be done on the following basis - that the basic matters to be agreed upon for setting up new relations with China shall be the utilization and development of natural resources in North China, the recognition of the highly cooperative zones by Japan and China in North China and the lower Yangtze, the establishment of a special position against the Soviet Union in Mongolia, the establishment of a special position on the various islands along the coast of South China, and the establishment of a general policy for the collaboration among Japan, Manchukuo and China based upon neighborly friendship and goodwill, anti-Comintern and joint defense and economic cooperation. For these objectives, Japan will give internal guidance during a certain period.

37359

37360

*DIPLOMATIC POLICY TOWARD BRITAIN FOR THE TIME BEING, decided July 8, 1938, stated that in order to cause Britain to give up her policy of aiding Chiang, it is necessary to make her understand Japan's just attitude. Pending matters will be investigated concretely and settled rapidly according to the above mentioned plan.

37361

ATTITUDE TOWARD PROPOSALS OF THE BRITISH AND THE GERMAN AMBASSADOR FOR PEACE MEDIATION decided July 12, 1938, stated that with the British Ambassador, they would first decline but not sever the connection, * while with the German Ambassador, they would first hear what he says.

PROCEDURE TAKEN IN CONNECTION WITH THE SETTLEMENT OF THE CHANG KU FEND INCIDENT decided July 22 1938, stated that they have made preparations for emergencies and the use of military power is to be carried out by the Imperial Order after negotiation among the authorities.

SPECIAL COMMISSION ON CHINESE AFFAIRS decided July 26, 1938, stated that The Special Commission for China belonged to the Five Ministers' Council and is an executive organ for working out important strategems against China and establishing the new Chinese Central Government in accordance with the decision of the council.

Every organ concerned with the above-mentioned business is directed by the Special Commission for China. The Army and Navy Ministers will be in charge of the liaison between the Special Commission and Imperial Headquarters.

*COMMENTARY ON THE SPECIAL COMMISSION ON CHINESE AFFAIRS decided July 29, 1938, stated that the Commission is an organ under the leadership of BOIHARA, TSUDA and BANZAI, and that the important strategems against China are political and economic strategies not directly connected with military operations.

Page

The Supreme Command is not included in the local organs. If there is necessity to adjust a certain strategm of the Supreme Command organ with that of the Commission, both will be adjusted through their channels of subordination.

37363

*OUTLINE FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A JOINT COMMITTEE decided September 9, 1938, stated that the policy was to establish a Joint Committee in accordance with the Policy to Guide the Establishment of the New Central Government of China decided by Five Ministers, 15 July, 1938.

The establishment of the Joint Committee is to be carried out mainly by China, but is to be unofficially assisted by Japan. Assistance shall be offered after due approval by the Central Government of a locally framed plan for guidance in establishing the Joint Committee.

*When the Japanese plan for guidance of the establishment of the Joint Committee is completed, with the aid of the administrative guidance organs of North China and of Central China, a Preparatory Committee meeting shall be opened in Dairen to make preparations for a Federal Committee.

The Joint Committee shall be held in Peiping, based on preparations of the Preparatory Committee.

"CONCERNING THE SETTING UP OF A COMMITTEE FOR LIAISON WITH THE CONFERENCE ON THE FIVE MINISTERS decided October 7, 1938, stated that the liaison committee is established to accelerate matters agreed upon by the Five Ministers Conference for disposal of the situation in China, and to study and investigate measures to be discussed by the Conference.

"This committee is a secret committee which will have as members the Chief of East Asia Bureau, the Chief of the First East Asia Section; Chief of Finance Bureau, Finance Ministry; Chief of Foreign Affairs Section; Chief of Military Affairs Bureau, War Ministry; Chief of Military Affairs Section; Chief of Naval Affairs Bureau, Navy Ministry; Chief of First Naval Section and as Secretaries, the Chief of the First East Asia Section, Foreign Office; Chief of Foreign Affairs Section, Finance Ministry; Chief of Military Affairs Section, War Ministry; the Chief of the First Naval Affairs Section, Navy Ministry.

*R. 30,505 - ITAGAKI.

37409 Exhibit No. 3746 *Strictly secret telegram of May 27, 1939 from Ott stated that on hearing rumors of new cabinet struggles over alliance he asked the Army for information. The Foreign Minister wired *Five Ministers decision of May 20 to Berlin and Rome in a form which Army rejects, because it does not automatically fix the entrance into a state of war against England and France, but proposed to make it dependent on the situation at the time. The Japanese Ambassadors had refused transmittal. The Premier had ascertained this departure from the decision after it had left and had delivered a correction to the cabinet. With the express approval of Supreme War Council the War Minister is again struggling together with the Prime Minister on this basic question.

37410 Ott pointed out to spokesman that the theoretical reservations of Navy against Western Power was in contradiction of their procedure in Army and Western Powers were working for a Soviet alliance. Spokesman counted on the possibility of the resignation of Foreign Minister. The private secretary of Prime Minister also expressed a similar view.

*Heard from other sources that Emperor had made agreement between Army and Navy a condition for his assent in answer to Prince KAN-IN, who represented the alliance demands of the Army.

37417 *Exhibit No. 3747, memorandum from MUTO July 11, 1944 stated that his bureau had no objection to the draft of telegraphic instruction to NOMURA on the French Indo-China Problem as submitted by the Navy. As reply material for the Northern Problem, this draft is offered by the Army. * This draft is to be submitted to the Foreign Office as reply material when the U.S. questions NOMURA after the strengthening of military forces in Manchuria becomes known. As the time of dispatch is a military top secret requiring ample consideration, the Army and Navy are asked to confer. In view of the circumstances when she sent her military forces to Siberia and to Iceland, this draft has the object of not giving a pretext to, as well as preventing, the United States from making its influence felt in Kamchatka or elsewhere under the pretense of the self-defense and security.

37419 *The draft stated that it is self-evident that Japan watches with the great interest the development of the German Russian war. Japan and Manchukuo directly border the Soviet and Japan is making efforts to establish the Co-Prosperity Sphere. International defense could be endangered by the European conflict, felt in the Far East, or by the third power's sphere of influence spreading to the Soviet territories in the Far East. Japan absolutely cannot allow such eventualities to happen.

Japan was strengthening her defensive military forces within the minimum limit required solely to prepare for such a serious state of affairs.

37420

*The Navy is sending drafts of instructions to Ambassador NOMURA as materials for answering questions on penetration into French Indo-China and instructions to NOMURA as materials for answering questions on the management of Northern problems. It is quite dangerous if matters regarding the North leak through to the U.S. too early. Time, etc. should be discussed at the liaison conference.

As to the southern plan, there is generally no objection of the Chief of the Bureau, but about the Northern plan there are further opinions on the part of the Army.

*(Muto) foundation, 33,206-8). Exhibit No.3748,
*Report of U.S. Military Mission to China, December 26, 1941, stated that on October 8, 1941, the military attache was invited to call at the General Staff, Tokyo and was presented to MUTO. MUTO stated that he had been informed that the attache had been ordered to leave Japan and inasmuch as the attache had just completed a tour of duty with the Japanese Army, he desired to explain the seriousness of the international situation. This explanation repeated the usual statements of Japan's desire to maintain peace. Following this, MUTO said there was no longer any real hope of settling the problems by diplomatic talks. The matter was one for the armies to settle. It was possible that the armies could do this *without fighting and the attache should try to report that Japan has a good army. He did not care how he criticized Japan but he should be careful to tell only the actual facts. If he could not convey the true state of things, Muto feared that he must give a very unpleasant farewell at present which was simply that if an understanding was not reached, they would be fighting Japan in six weeks in Manila. The conversation was reported to the Military Attache and to the Ambassador.

He was merely reporting the main features in the event the Attache was unable to forward his report. It has very little value except as an interesting forecast of the opening date of the war.

37432

*Exhibit No.3474, the statement of KAGESA and OKA, Chiefs of military affairs and Naval Affairs Sections, August 30, 1938, stated that *conferences on concrete plans for the capture of Canton, between the Army and Navy have been held for two or three days. Army strength is expected to be about three divisions.

In consideration of friction with Britain, land forces will land on the peninsula at the East part of Bias Bay and will carry out the capture. The capture is deeply connected with diplomatic considerations, and it is thought by some that the policy should be decided by the Five Ministers' Conference. This conference has already in accordance with the transition of the war situation, decided the policies of occupying various important places in China; and the capture of Canton is only the application of the over-all policy.

37433

As the Canton operation is purely within the Supreme Command sphere, a decision to leave the formal decision to the Conference might give rise to the charge that the prerogative of the Supreme Command has been violated. No definite view has been decided upon, but it is believed probable that either the army and Navy Ministers will discuss the matter privately with the Foreign Minister or that it will be decided by the Five Ministers' Conference.

37444

*Direct examination MURAYAMA, Tomiji, by Mr. Comyns Carr.
*The witness identified exhibit 3749 as his affidavit and verified it.

37447

*The affidavit stated that the witness was family physician for the late Baron Kumao HARADA from 1922 until his death in 1946. From 1922 until 1941 he attended HARADA during several illnesses, none of which were serious, and at no time was there a loss of memory or any sickness which would impair his mentality.

From 1930 to 1941 HARADA was in complete command of all his faculties and was alert mentally.

CROSS EXAMINATION

37449

The witness stated that he was HARADA's principal physician until the date of his death. * In 1943, August, Baron HARADA was affected by thrombosis of the brain which was a relatively acute disease. *HARADA was affected by this disease for the first time in August 1943. While his records were destroyed during the air raids, the witness recalled that during 1922 he attended HARADA two or three times for colds or indigestion from overeating. He attended HARADA several times from 1922 to 1941 - about five or six times. This was for the whole period. He had no other doctors. *He could not give the exact years of treatment. Throughout that period he never contracted any disease important enough to call by name.

He could not recall the exact times of treatment. He had seen HARADA on other occasions because he treated other members of his family for diseases, but he only treated him five or six times. He had opportunities *to see HARADA two or three times a month. HARADA was a little too obese and his heart was weakened and his thrombosis came from that. He showed signs of a weakened heart from the year previous to the outbreak of this disease.

He never heard of HARADA having any headaches from 1937 on. He had never seen him affected by any disease covering an extensive period of five months. He did not know that during a period of time in 1937 he had to get KIDO to take over his work as secretary for SAIONJI. He did not recall visiting him during that period of time, but might have. He first suffered with paralysis after he contracted thrombosis of the brain.

37452

*He was sure HARADA contracted thrombosis in 1943. For about a month after he contracted thrombosis of the brain he was not able to use his tongue, and even after that, up to the date of his death it was difficult to understand what he was saying.

37453

He thought that HARADA made his home in Oiso after he contracted this disease till the date of his death. Once in a while, when his disease was not too heavy, he would go to Hakone. The witness did not know how long he lived in Oiso before contracting this disease. He went to Karuizawa the year he contracted this disease and in fact became sick while on the train from Karuizawa to Oiso.

37454

*The witness specialized in diseases of the heart, kidneys and of the digestive organs, and metabolism. He did not specialize in mental diseases. The witness was 55 years old.

37455

*The witness made the statement of HARADA's memoirs of his own free will in answer to a question. The prosecution put the question. In some cases paralysis affects the memory, in other cases it does not. He thought a doctor's knowledge would be sufficient to cover the matter without examining for memory. In examining brain disease, loss of memory and the state of mentality would be taken into account. * In some cases tests are required. He made tests on HARADA in 1943 after he became ill. He had never made any especially before.

37456

*HARADA never contracted any disease requiring a special examination, and throughout the period of his association with him he never showed any signs of loss of memory or of an impaired mentality. Paralysis or semi-paralysis is caused by a blood clot. He never treated HARADA in 1937 for a paralytic condition. A blood clot on the brain causes pressure and is quite probably likely to affect the memory.

37458

*He had no recollection of HARADA ever telling him about having paralysis in 1937. He thought HARADA would have told him if he had had such a condition. He did not know of HARADA having suffered any mental disease.

37459

He did remember every illness of every one of his patients he treated from 1922 to 1941 but he was on especially intimate terms with HARADA and so he remembered his case better than the others and should. He was one of his patients with whom he was most intimate. He thought that the thrombosis of the brain was first contracted by HARADA in 1943.

37460

*If he had it before, he should have shown some symptoms, but in 1943 the witness found no symptoms of a prior outbreak. The witness graduated from the Okayama Medical College and later continued his studies at the University of Pennsylvania and at Harvard.

Direct examination of KONOYE, Yasuko. The witness identified Exhibit No. 3750 as her affidavit and verified them. (Exhibit No. 3750-A and B).

*The first affidavit stated that the witness from 1930 to 1940 as stenographer took in shorthand the notes of HARADA. She had been shown a photostatic copy of the finished transcription which she recognized as the memoirs of HARADA written by her in her own handwriting. These notes were transcribed in Japanese by her and given to HARADA for approval. HARADA took the transcript to SAIONJI for corrections and suggestions. SAIONJI's corrections and suggestions were incorporated in the completed form which she wrote in her handwriting and which was identified above.

37464

*The second affidavit stated that HARADA dictated to the witness once or twice a week from notes and from memory. HARADA was a university graduate and was about average in methodical methods of work, being neither outstanding nor lax in organizing. With reference to a statement by KIDO that HARADA was sick for three or four months from the time when UGAKI failed to form his cabinet, and that KIDO took over his duties, she stated that from a study of the records from 1 February 1937-31 May 1937, there was only one sickness mentioned, this being on 23 February and HARADA was active on 3 March having gone to Okitsu on that date. During the whole of the rest of the four months * he was travelling between Tokyo, his own and SAIONJI's country homes, and calling upon people.

37465

During such times as he was sick, either then or any other period, he never ceased dictating. She took the dictation in his bedroom or sitting room. During such a period he gathered information by telephone and by people visiting him. At no time did KIDO or anyone other than HARADA dictate any part of the records. She took the dictation in his bedroom or sitting room. During such a period he gathered information by telephone and by people visiting him. At no time did KIDO or anyone other than HARADA dictate any part of the records.

With regard to KIDO's statement that HARADA suffered from drowsiness during the latter part of his life, if this refers to the five years between the death of SAIONJI and his own she saw him very seldom and could not express an opinion. It was not true as to any part of the time when he was keeping the records. It is true that all the time regardless of health, he occasionally appeared abstracted, as if thinking of something else, while someone was speaking, but she noticed that in spite of appearance, he always knew quite well what was said. He was at all times fully competent mentally.

With regard to the entry of 19 August 1940, Exhibit 3687, she remembered * that when HARADA was dictating he was reading from a document.

Page
37466

CROSS EXAMINATION by Mr. Logan.

- * She first started taking dictation of the Memoirs in 1930. There were occasions when she didn't take this dictation but once every two weeks, sometimes once every three weeks, but when there was little to write, sometimes in one sitting she would take down what should have been put down on two separate dates, and therefore the dates of the Diary may not be accurate in all respects. She didn't feel that there were any other inaccuracies besides the date.
- 37470 *She continued to take dictation from HARADA from 1930 to the date of SAIONJI's death in the winter of 1940. She didn't distinctly remember how many times during those ten years she took dictation once or twice a week.
- 37471 *When there was little to write the number of pages was also naturally small and what would ordinarily take two or three dictations on separate occasions, would be incorporated into only one dictation. The regularity of her visits to HARADA depended upon the amount of material that he had to dictate and considerations of HARADA's health were also involved. Sometimes he would catch cold or be otherwise indisposed.
- 37472 On these visits where a space of three weeks or less elapsed, HARADA would dictate what happened three weeks previously. He dictated from memory and notes. On the whole the notes he used were obtained by him from his diaries. She did not know very much about the contents of his diaries.
- 37473 The writing in the book shown to her looked like that of HARADA. On subjects other than persons' names, HARADA dictated from memory. There were many occasions when HARADA dictated from memory and not from the diary, but even in the diary there will be found many notations of events as distinguished from names of persons.
- 37474 *There are places here and there where conversations are recorded, but whole conversations were not recorded and it was something like notes to which comments had been added. She couldn't say that all conversations came from notes. In regard to specific details, he dictated from memory. There were also occasions on which he had papers in his hand other than the notebook from which he would dictate. She could not remember specific instances, but it was on many occasions.
- 37475 *They were pieces of paper on which notations were written down, for instance, dates, names of people, and the broad outline of events or matters under discussion. She had never seen those papers. She was able to tell about them by the way in which he read them. He may have read documents to her in which he was quoting conversations that he had with other people, but she didn't recall for sure. She took the dictation home and wrote it out in Japanese script.

*She did not know how many times during the ten year period she went to see HARADA and took dictation once or twice a week. One might assume on the basis of elimination she didnt know how many times she went once every three weeks or so. She did not remember during those ten years she went once every three weeks in succession. She believed there were occasions when she didnt go for three weeks when HARADA was ill or indisposed. She felt there were occasions when she didn't go for three 37479 *weeks twice or three times in succession one after the other. But on the whole she went to see him once or twice a week.

On these occasions when three weeks elapsed twice in succession, when she brought the document back to HARADA it was six weeks after the first date mentioned in the transcript. She could not say that he would keep them for a while and then take them up to Prince SAIONJI later on. Her recollection is that he took them with him on the next occasion he visited Okitsu.

*She didnt know that the Memoirs were taken after she wrote them to SAIONJI to be edited. She could not say whether HARADA brought the manuscripts back with him on the same trip to SAIONJI,waited and picked them up at a subsequent date.

37481

When asked if after HARADA had gone to see SAIONJI, he brought them back and turned them over to her to have them rewritten, she stated that she rewrote the whole thing after considerable time had elapsed. * She said she didnt remember when she started rewriting the Memoirs. He sense of time was very hazy and she often confused what happened yesterday with what happened the day before. She did not have a good memory. When she started rewriting the Memoirs there were some insertions in SAIONJI's handwriting; they were very few.

37482

*She rewrote a third of the whole series from the beginning to the end. There were hardly any deletions. She could recognize SAIONJI's handwriting. As SAIONJI looked through them every time HARADA took them he must have made corrections on each occasion when he found a mistake. When she was rewriting the document, she noticed the correction. She did not recall whether SAIONJI corrected any conversations that HARADA had with other people.*Her memory was not so good. When the documents came back from SAIONJI they were put in a vault at the Sumitome bank. She didnt think there were any other persons who made additions to the original, but there is one person who wrote a book based on the original document. She was sure of that. She worked alongside a man who made corrections on the diary down at the Sumitome Bank. * He was a novelist with a pen name of SATOMI, Ten. She didnt remember how long he worked but it was up to the time the book was published.

37483

37484

37485

*He worked before HARADA became sick. She thought she rewrote the manuscript before SATOMI began researches in connection with the composition of the book. Her recollection was that he rewrote the manuscript on HARADA's request. She didn't know whether he was paid for it. She thought he was employed to make it grammatically correct, to figure out whether HARADA was referring to the present or the past and who was speaking in the various conversations.

37486

*There are many portions where it would be difficult for one to determine whether HARADA was referring to present or past, to determine the predicate and the subject of the sentences, and tell who was saying what. When asked whether there wasn't shorthand confusion she stated her system of shorthand is written phonetically and each character differed from the other.

37487

*When she transcribed the shorthand notes which she had taken down she tried to avoid the possibility of mistakes arising and took every care that confusion would not occur. When transcribing her notes, she had great difficulty in trying to discover just what portion in a given sentence was the subject. She did the best she could and wrote it out the way she thought it should be. SATOMI asked her to rewrite the diary before he started to work to put larger margins so he could make his corrections.

37488

*After he finished making all his corrections, she rewrote it again. She did not recall when she finished working on it. The Japanese original of the notes which she transcribed from shorthand into Japanese script is what is left today. SATOMI's corrections do not appear on the document, which HARADA took to SAIONJI for correction.

37489

*She rewrote the document which HARADA had taken to SAIONJI for correction and SATOMI corrected the rewritten copy of that document.

37490

*The photostatic copy she saw is a copy of the document she just spoke about. During the ten years HARADA was often slightly ill or indisposed but she didn't remember how many times. She found in the diary that HARADA had been ill on the 23rd of February 1937 and had gone to Oiso. She was taking dictation from him at this period. She didn't remember whether the left half of his body was semi-paralyzed. She felt that on February 23rd he had caught a cold but the *entry does not say that in so many words. She was relying on her memory.

The appearance of abstraction did not occur all the time but once in a while she would get such a feeling. She couldn't say if he was a man who had a great imagination. He didn't dislike speaking. Once in a while he would appear to be quite abstracted and when reply was made he wouldn't understand it. She did not recall that in 1937 he requested KIDO to take his place as secretary to SAIONJI. That might have happened without her knowing it or else she might have forgotten it.

*She could not say that sometimes he would become sleepy while he was dictating or while talking to somebody else.

*In Chapter 262 she thought the dictation was given on February 9 and HARADA was dictating as far back as to what occurred on January 21 on that occasion.

CROSS EXAMINATION by Dr.Kiyose.

*She personally did not see the document mentioned in her affidavit from which HARADA dictated. She did not recall that he told her anything as to the nature of that document. She merely recalled that he read the original document,

37497

"She was in no position to state that both HARADA and SAIONJI intensely disliked HIRANUMA. She didn't know about SATOMI's final draft.

*REDIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. COMYNS CARR.

37505 The document in court does not contain any corrections or alterations made by SATOMI. * The copy of the document referred to in her answer was not the copy rewritten after SATOMI had made corrections.

37510 *In the copy here there are only a few corrections and additional nota-

37511 tions by SAIONJI. * SATOMI's corrections were made on another copy which she made from the original from which the photostat copies were 37512 made.* The corrections are in SAIONJI's handwriting. SATOMI's corrections were not made on the copy which was photostated. What she said yesterday was that SATOMI made his corrections on a copy which she made herself from the original from which the photostat was made.

37514 *After she gave her work to HARADA, she thought generally he read it through and where he found mistakes she thought he made corrections. At the beginning of the text of Chapter 262, the date was 31 January.

37516 *On Chapter 261 the date is January 28. * When the dictation

37517 was rather short, dictation for two occasions were combined to constitute one. She didnt recall if long chapters were dictated at the same time or at more than one time.

37518 * CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. BROOKS
HARADA dictated by chapters. The headings placed at the chapters were not put on there after this book was edited by SATOMI.

37549 *EXHIBIT 3751 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI Memoirs, October 1940 stated that HARADA consulted SAIONJI about requesting TAKAMATSU to keep the transcript until they were delivered to the Emperor. SAIONJI agreed. On 37550 the 20th * HARADA talked with TAKAMATSU. He told TAKAMATSU that this record was started in 1929. At the time of the London Treaty only false rumors prevailed, and the truth was never known. Especially, the attitude taken by the Emperor had been for the most part, falsely rumored. The counsel given to the Throne and actions taken by the Genro, court officials and the Cabinet Ministers had been falsely rumored. This created serious perturbations in the political circles and was the direct cause of subsequent disturbances in the Army and Navy. The virtues and intelligent perspicacity of the Emperor were perverted almost beyond imagination by propaganda. He felt this was exceedingly regrettable. Since he knew the truth, HARADA felt * it was necessary to record this for posterity. He consulted KONOYE and then decided to seek the assistance of Viscountess KONOYE and have her taken it down and preserve it for posterity. It was now 10,000 odd pages.

37552 , *Every week he went to see SAIONJI and reported. His memorandum for this report was used as basic material and he had it taken down and kept. He then took the transcribed manuscript to SAIONJI who read it personally, corrected mistakes, and added whatever additional notes he deemed necessary.

37553 He returned it to HARADA the next time. A clean copy of this was made, edited and filed away. This fact has occasionally appeared in the newspapers. Even the fact that it is deposited for protective custody in the Sumitomo Trust Company has become known. He had heard there was danger that a rightist faction might destroy it. He had consulted with SAIONJI and had decided to request TAKAMATSU to keep it in personal custody until completed. When completed, the original manuscript which has SAIONJI's corrections and revisions will be presented to the Emperor in its original form. The edited copy will be *printed and published at a suitable occasion. It won't be possible to publish the document until after ten or fifteen years from the death of SAIONJI. The future custody is entrusted to MATSUDAIRA, Chief Secretary to the Lord Privy Seal. He wanted TAKAMATSU to consult MATSUDAIRA and make thorough arrangements so that he will be able to keep in close touch with TAKAMATSU's steward.

TAKAMATSU consented and said he would give thorough instruction about the matter to his steward, to make suitable arrangements.

*Exhibit No. 3754 A, an excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs stated that on the night of the 13th a newspaperman told HARADA that ARAKI was to be the Chief Aide-de-Camp to the Emperor. He was very intimate with ARAKI but he was an idolizer of HIRANUMA and a prominent figure in the KOKUHONSHA. To have such a person serving the Emperor is a serious matter and very dangerous.

37567

*Exhibit 3754 B, an excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs 16 July, 1931 stated that HARADA went to the War Ministry and looked at the Army list in secret. Even the Army thinks ARAKI is a follower of HIRANUMA. The Army says that HAYASHI, Korean Army commander, is the most suitable man for the position. If not he, then KAWASHIMA. He called the Imperial Household Minister on the phone and told him about this. It was clear that the extreme rightist KOKUHONSHA is maneuvering with the army.

37569

*Exhibit No. 3755-A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, August 23, 1931, stated that KONOYE and the Chief of the Asia Bureau said the army was attempting to use the killing of NAKAMURA in Mongolia as a tool for the solution of the Manchuria-Mongolian matter by enlarging the importance of the incident. HARADA met Railway Minister EGI and mentioned this to him. He said he knew nothing about it but MINAMI came and told him all about it. EGI asked MINAMI as to what he thought about the bomb incident of UGAKI and stated it was outrageous to speak of an expedition to Manchuria-Mongolia because it is unthinkable to move troops without an Imperial order. MINAMI only made very obscure replies on the matter of UGAKI.

*Exhibit No. 3756 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA Memoirs September 4, 1931, stated that on Sept 4 HARADA met Finance Minister INOUE who said MINAMI on the whole was in complete accord on the Army reorganization plan, and the matter had been agreed upon. Upon returning to the office MINAMI was severely criticized by Military Affairs Chief KOISO and another. He returned and said that he had previously agreed but found it very difficult to appease the members of his staff. For this reason the matter had reverted to its starting point.

*Exhibit No. 3757-A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA MEMOIRS, 14 September 1931, stated that on the 14th the War Minister returned and immediately had TATEKAWA deliver a confidential letter to the Commander of the Kwantung Army. The contents were about the warning to the War Minister received from the Emperor on the 11th regarding discipline, and about the fact that he was told by His Majesty to take extra precautions in regard to the Army actions in Manchuria and Mongolia. The War Minister transmitted the imperial wishes to the Commander of the Kwantung Army intending to bring pressure so as to put a stop to various Army schemes in Manchuria and Mongolia.

37576

The incident broke out on the night that TATEKAWA arrived at Mukden with the letter. It seemed that it was TATEKAWA's plan to have the scheme carried out before the Commander saw the letter. This *may be seen from the fact that although at the beginning of the conference of the so called War Councillors, representing the Supreme leaders of the Army, the attitude of the members was very firm. When the War Minister conveyed the imperial wishes the attitude of the members changed completely. They decided that the present plans of the Army should be completely abandoned. This appears to have resulted in having the letter sent to the Kwantung Army/

37577

*Exhibit No. 3757-B excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, 19 September 1931, stated that on the 19th he went to the Premier. The Premier appeared very troubled and said No reports had been delivered by the Foreign Ministry nor the War Minister. He had told Chief Secretary KAWASAKI to caution them. He was trying to prevent this incident from spreading, and if possible to settle it. The army authorities desired to make a guarantee occupation. This is a matter to be decided by the government, and the Army authorities have no power to make such decisions. Chinese military forces in Manchuria exceed 200,000, the strength of the Japanese is a little over 10,000. When asked what they intended doing if something should possibly happen, against such a huge opposing force, he said they would send out troops from Korea and probably troops had already been sent. There was a precedent for this during the TANAKA ministry troops were moved without Imperial sanction.

*Exhibit No. 3758 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, 22-3 September 1931, stated that on the 22nd the Premier reported to the Emperor on the progress of the Cabinet. He stated that it was decided to cause absolute cessation of establishing military administrations, and of seizing customs offices and seizing banks and to forbid all actions excepting those to prevent risks. The War Minister proposed to send the Korea Army to Manchuria. He had been notified by the Chief of Staff that the Commander of the Kwantung Army had demanded it of the Chief of Staff 37580 *because of the shortage of strength in Manchuria. The Cabinet did not approve the proposal in its meeting because the matter might be taken up by the League and also because upon the withdrawal of the Manchurian Army there would be difficulty. The Premier severely rebuked the War Minister for sending troops as far as Kirin and Changchun.

The War Minister again consulted with the Chief of Staff about dispatching the Korea Army and decided to bring up the matter in the Cabinet on the 22nd. The War Minister told the Premier that the commander of the Korea Army decided that the situation was urgent and already had sent one brigade.

37581 *The War Minister was anxious to have dispatching of the Korea Army approved by the Cabinet. On the following morning the Emperor summoned the Premier. In the Cabinet it was decided that troops having been dispatched, the government should defray the expenses, though the Finance Minister was not admitting that the dispatch of troops had been carried out in accordance with a Cabinet decision. In view of the fact that the Chief of Staff had received a report from the War Ministry that troops had been sent arbitrarily, the government should defray the expenses without objection. The Premier was compelled to report exactly what had happened to the Emperor and the War Minister and the Chief of Staff presented themselves. The dispatch of troops decided and carried out arbitrarily had been submitted for Imperial ex post facto approval.

37582 *During the Cabinet meeting there was given the Emperor's message that the policy of non-expansion of the Incident was very appropriate and they should endeavor to carry it out completely.

37586 *Exhibit No. 3759 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, 30
 37587 September 1931, stated that the Premier said that "In the Cabinet the War Minister repeatedly stressed he wants to dispatch troops to Chientao. The premier refused and said it was better to evacuate the Japanese nationals. The War Minister retorted that in case lives and properties of Japanese are endangered, would the Premier take the responsibility and the Premier replied 'That cannot be helped'".

*Exhibit 3760 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, 1 October 1931, stated that in the Cabinet Meeting of October 1, SHIDEHARA stated * he wanted a clarification of attitude before the opening of the Council meeting in Geneva on the 14th. If Japan withdrew troops by that time, there would be no problem. The stationing of troops for the purpose of self-protection was all right, but the maintenance of more than needed troops and the keeping of troops in Kirin and Tungkia was far from good. The War Minister said if they withdraw troops the situation would be very difficult and they could not maintain control in Mukden and Kirin. He believed it better for Japan to withdraw from the League.

*Exhibit No.3761 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, 22 October 1931, stated that the Premier complained that in the cabinet MINAMI said there was no need to pay deference to the League and there should be no objection to seceding. If Japan be determined to wage war against the whole world, this can be readily done.

37598

Exhibit No.3762 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, about 11 March 1932, stated that the decision on the Manchurian-Mongolian policy which was the topic of the Inter Ministry Conference (Army, Navy, Foreign Affairs, and Finance) was reached and placed before the Cabinet meeting on Friday.

37599

*Among the problems was that of the new nation. If this is regarded as a violation of the Nine Power Pact it would be unsatisfactory. At least on the surface, its recognition should be postponed for the time being. If Chang Hsueh-Liang acts as an insurgent and sends punitive troops, it will not be able to quell the rebellion because it has no army. In order somehow to safeguard it the Japanese Army must repel the attack. At the time of the Feng-Chili War, the Japanese Army under the guise of a Manchurian peace preservation force, was on the alert. The problem whether or not they might do the same raised so much trouble that the Cabinet meeting was carried over to Saturday.

The demands of the Army, to a certain extent were repulsed. HARADA showed the original and corrected plans to SAIONJI.

*Exhibit 3763A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, stated that there were many in the Foreign Ministry like SHIRATORI advocating withdrawal from the League. Army circles were enthusiastic about this. The basis of SHIRATORI's argument is that Japan is unable to remain in the League after taking such actions in Manchukuo since September 18. It is unreasonable for the small European nations who lack knowledge to restrain Japan in any way. Even if Japan desires to have the understanding of the great powers, it is still unnecessary to remain in the League. Japan can do anything if she'll negotiate directly with England, France or the US. It is quite improper to remain in * the League. Chief Cabinet Secretary MORI went directly to the Premier and urged withdrawal.

* Exhibit No. 3764A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 12 September 1932, stated that HARADA visited SHIRATORI and the latter repeatedly asked about appointing ARAKI as the next premier. He stated that up to now the exchange rate had dropped considerably because Japan did not possess a strong government. In foreign affairs it is prodded from behind by the militarists and changes are made to the right after proclaiming that foreign policy is to the left. This is very harmful to the country's reputation. It would be a more becoming policy for Japan to have ARAKI representing the powerful militarists, become the premier and proceed upon an unwavering policy for 5 or 6 years. * HARADA stated it was bad to have the militarists restrain the administration after it had once set its policies. The reason Japan had lost confidence of other nations is the absence of diplomacy resulting from militarist direct intervention in international problems. They even interfere in domestic affairs directly. This is the reason for the instability of political affairs and the loss of trust. It is possible to regain this faith only by placing the militarists in the background. Domestically, freedom of action, without restriction by militarists is the basis for stabilizing the political situation.

37607

*Exhibit No. 3765A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, about 21 August 1932, stated that the Chinese Ambassador came to KONOE asking could not Japn abandon the idea of the recognition of Manchukuo. Since the problem was one between China and Japan, it should be settled between the two without the League. HARADA told KONOE that if the Chinese Ambassador felt that way, it was better for him to speak directly to a person who was responsible. If he spoke to the War Minister and the Army took action, the way would be made much easier for the Foreign Ministry. KONOE went to see ARAKI and discussed the problem in detail but ARAKI was entirely disinterested. He said it might be all right if the matter were handled as a local issue but not as a general problem, and if settled without taking it to the League. ARAKI's attitude seemed to favor creating a * situation in which Japan as a result of League deliberations would become isolated and would have to wage a war against the world.

* Exhibit 3766A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 1 November 1932, stated that HARADA told TAKAHASHI, Finance Minister, about the national policy that ARAKI is said to have shown KONOE on October 30, but since the residents. The soldiers were then sent and the matter was settled very satisfactorily, better than expected. Everyone was indifferent to the army or to the Shanghai Incident. They seem to have completely forgotten that they had been very particular about the army, and this was exasperating. Japan would not be spoken well of no matter what she does.

37621

*HARADA told him it was their fundamental point of view to avoid as much as possible what was harmful and unprofitable. If they actually put something into practice, it must be right in mane and reality. It was disadvantageous to be deemed to have waged an unjustifiable war. ARAKI stated that if about 3 divisions were first to land at Tsingtao and go thru Tsinan, Chang Hsueh-liang would flee before the troops reached Tsinan. He would like to carry out this plan if permitted but it would be rather difficult. He said in general he wanted as much as possible to limit the matter to Jehol alone, and that the General Staff seemed to be deliberating on such methods.

37630

* Exhibit 3769A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 13 January 1933, stated that when he visited TAKAHASHI on the 14th the problem of Jehol was again brought up. TAKAHASHI stated that at the cabinet meeting on the 13th, the Foreign Minister had reported that there had * been an unofficial negotiation on the Russon Non-Aggression treaty and that the Soviet, intending to announce the particulars of the failure, had inquired whether Japan would agree. TAKAHASHI asked why they did not conclude the treaty. The answer was that the army and such circles feared that might facilitate communist propoganda. * When TAKAHASHI stated that they could not rightfully complain until there was a treaty, the War Minister said something about the public or national opinion. When TAKAHASHI said there was no such thing as public opinion but that they were threatened by the military whenever they said anything disadvantageous to the army, that pressure upon freedom of speech had never been so strict, and that the gendarmes were shadowing statesmen, ARAKI flared up and said that could not be and was impossible. * When TAKAHASHI said it was possible and asked what he intended to do about it, ARAKI said later on or something like that.

37631

37632

37633

37634

Exhibit 3770A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 1 February 1933, stated that at the Cabinet meeting of the 1st, when criticism was made that the army was completely in control of Japan's diplomacy and was making announcements on each and every diplomatic affair, * it was explained that the army did not make propoganda. The newspaper offices do the writing. TAKAHASHI severely reproached ARAKI, asking if the newspapers do the writing, why the army didn't stop them. It would be quite easy for the army. ARAKI seemed to be at quite a loss.

* Exhibit 3771A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 13 February 1933, stated that on the 13th the premier asked the opinion of the ministers about the draft of the reply. The draft of the Foreign Ministry was on the whole agreed to and sent off on the night of the 13th. They were again reminded that if the League should turn to Article 15, par. 4 and 37614 he had already talked it over very carefully with ARAKI, he seemed very well informed on this matter. The national policy which ARAKI is said to have shown KONOE provided for carrying on an emergency policy for 2 years, studying whether to attack the Soviet within the 2 years, planning the perfection of military preparedness and national defense with the 2 years. Another item was promotion of friendly relations with the US and the furtherance of international goodwill. ARAKI seems to have discussed this matter * with TAKAHASHI. TAKAHASHI said that ARAKI talked about carrying on the emergency policy for 2 years but it could not be fully executed in that time. It would take 4 or 5 years.

37616 Exhibit 3767A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 7 November 1932 stated that that evening he met ARAKI who said that the Finance Minister had a thorough understanding of the situation. Japan must continue emergency provisions for 2 or 3 years. It must decide whether to attack the Soviet or to convene a peace conference for the Far East, and by inviting England, US and France having vital interests in the Far East, hold a peace conference among Japan, Manchukuo, China and Russia. It would be very well if they could agree to prevent the spread of communistic propoganda. If the security of neighboring nations is disturbed by red movements, Japan must attack and destroy them. * Within 2 or 3 years it must perfect its national defense. They must complete preparations and assert their intent by displaying power for both peace and war in order not to allow other nations to make light of them. In regard to relations with the US, they must keep American goodwill as their keynote and continue diplomatic relations with others along the same line.

37617 He further stated that TAKAHASHI understood very well, and was such a splendid person. He said that in view of the present national situation an annual budget of ¥2,500,000,000 to ¥ 2,600,000 000 was reasonable. The present differed from the past and the present budget was not unreasonable. This could be had without overburdening the people. A considerable amount of revenue could be obtained from Manchukuo if desired. The Finance Minister wanted to hold the combined Army and * Navy budget down to 8 hundred million yen, but they wanted an additional increase of 2 hundred million. No definite outcome could be foreseen.

37619 *Exhibit 3768A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, stated that on the 6th, ARAKI stated that the Jehol problem was a local matter because it was a part of Manchukuo. He wanted to settle the matter by shortening the time. He was afraid that if they kept on moving small troops into Jehol, another failure like Nikolayevsk might be had. They should send out large troops and decisively settle the matter once and for all in a short period. * He was still very indignant about the Shanghai Incident. From the first the army did not want to send troops. It was much discussed at one time that the army should act only within the leased territory, and at other times that the army should be prohibited from passing through the settlement. He had demanded to know Japan's aim and asked them to decide the aim. It was decided that the aim was to protect send an advice, their stand was not to be decided upon carelessly without scrutinizing the contents. It was decided that the Jehol issue should continue to be treated as one of bandits. The attitude that the so-called bandits, not the Chinese Army, were to be attacked should be assumed. It was also clearly decided that it should be disposed of within the boundaries of Jehol, not going south of the Great Wall.

* Exhibit 3772 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 15 February 1933, stated that a cabinet meeting was held on the * 15th for the purpose of clarifying opinion on withdrawal from the League with the intention of making doubly sure. UCHIDA and ARAKI pressed for immediate withdrawal but the majority of the cabinet did not agree to this.

37641

* Exhibit 3773A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA MEMOIRS, 14 May 1933, *stated that Vice-Minister ARITA stated that a plan had been made to change personnel, sending SHIRATORI abroad and TANI to Manchukuo as a Councillor. It was already to be put into effect. UCHIDA told SHIRATORI he wanted him to go abroad either as minister or councillor. SHIRATORI stated he would consider it but asked about sending * ARITA abroad also. Before this, when SHIRATORI was approached on the subject, he strongly objected stating if he were sent out, there was no telling what might happen. The Foreign Minister was placed at a complete loss. He told ARITA that he wanted him to go as Ambassador to Britain or to any other country he preferred because of SHIRATORI. ARITA felt it was utterly useless to support the Foreign Minister. As matters stood at present it was absolutely impossible to continue assisting him. He thought it would be best for him to resign before the decision was reached. * When ARITA resigned, SHIRATORI seemed to feel that he had to resign. As the result of conferences with SUZUKI of the army, SHIRATORI finally said he would accept a foreign post provided there was no change in policy. He told this the next day to UCHIDA, who was overjoyed.

37642

37643

37647

* Exhibit 3774A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 19 October 1933, stated that Vice Minister SHIGEMITSU took a pessimistic view of the whole situation. He made various statements re the Russian problem, China policy, general disarmament, American problems and the League. He said the navy demands equality in armaments, and it stresses that should this demand be denied, it will abrogate the Naval Disarmament Treaty. It was demanding equality thru reserving the right to maintain a minimum of armaments absolutely necessary for national defense and by abrogation of the treaty.

37650

Exhibit 3775 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 5 December 1933, stated that the Domestic Policy Conference was held on the 5th, but an ordinary cabinet meeting was held in the morning. At the conclusion of the cabinet, the Foreign Minister said that since Europe and the US had increased tariffs under a unified policy against Japanese exports and were striving to place Japan in an isolated position, he wanted the ministries concerned to consider counter-measures. TAKA

37650 HASHI said that this unity in taking a defensive attitude towards Japan did not arise simply from trade relations alone. The anti-Japanese attitude in trade relations was something appearing only on the surface.

37651 the real fact was that the Japanese militarist were claiming that 1935 or 1936 would be critical * years, and with hints that war with Russia and the US would break out, were inciting the rural and urban districts. Such activity had its effect abroad. When European countries and the US were trying to conduct matters as peacefully as possible and trying to avoid war, Japan's pro-war atmosphere created a bad feeling in diplomacy, and this was what appeared in trade relations. The military must restrain its speech and actions. There would be no crisis in 1935 and 1936. The War Minister replied that was not true. The military had not intention of waging a war but must be prepared. It could not be said that this was not a crisis.

37652 * Exhibit 3775B, excerpt from the SAIONJI*HARADA Memoirs, 9 December 1933, stated that since the resentment from various circles reflected on the military, the army and navy jointly issued something resembling a statment on the 19th and 10th stating their views in regard to the 37653 alienation of the public from the military. * They said in connection with the budget and other questions, the number of those who act to alienate the people from the military was not small. There were those who said that the crisis of 1936 was for propoganda, that in past wars only those from the lower classes were killed in action while among high ranking officers none died in action, or that the agrarian problem was sacrificed for the military budget. This movement destroyed the harmonious unity of the public mind which was the most essential basis of national defense, and the military could not tolerate it.

37654 Two important measures used as international schemes to impair the power for national defense were anti-war movements which aim at the defeat of one's country upon insturctions from the Third Internationale, and the movement to alienate the people from the military. The former was well known while the latter was surprisingly unknown although its evil was great because its movement was only * moderate and disguised. They declared that those who made such statements despite the fact that the military had only made demands for minimum national defense was extremely insolent.

37662 *Exhibit 3776A, excerpt from the SAIONJI*HARADA Memoirs, 17 April 1934, state that since AMAU made a informal statement to that effect the newspapers printed it conspicuously as a declaration of the Foreign

37663 Ministry. * The comments of various countries were very strong and the Foreign Ministry was also taken back. Actually, the Minister and Vice-Minister knew nothing of t'is. Since various countries were selling arms and doing other things in China, a strong feeling of insecurity arose, so the Foreign Ministry sent instructions to the ministers overseas. The Chief of the Information Bureau translated into English the contents of the instructions and he blabbed something to the foreign at Tientsin, and declared he definitely would like to have troops sent out. KONOE said he did not want to expand the issue. It might be all right to send troops according to need. He added that if they opposed at this time and did not heed the army wishes, the War Minister would be compelled to resign and the cabinet with him. Since there might be no one who could possibly check the army, there was no other way than for KONOE to assume responsibility and meet the issue. The War Minister finally stated he would definitely not expand the issue. The Emperor received the C/S twice and the C/NS once. The War Minister said he would settle the issue neatly by sending a large force to smash the opposition and withdraw quickly, but when asked if he could do it as expected he was unable to * give a definite answer.

On the 12th, a report came that the Chinese Army would accept all demands. These demands were the withdrawal of troops, guarantee of the future, and the punishment of responsible officers. The Chinese officers were justifying themselves by saying that the troops were being influenced by communists. Even the General Staff thought this was probably a Chinese attempt to make Japan stop military preparations. The army, as long as it had decided to send troops, seemed to want more stringent demands.

37687

* Exhibit 3781A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, 13 August 1937, stated that the Foreign Minister told MARADA there were individuals in China and Japan who said that the reasons for the assassination of OYAMA and the rousing of excitement in Shanghai were the increased number of Japanese warships and the increasing of Japanese marines to 3000. The increase of personnel was only natural and he believed it was actually inevitable. Consul-gen'l OKAMOTO sent a message saying that if possible he would like to see Shanghai kept free of war. The increased warships, while not good, the Foreign Minister felt could not be helped. If they announced * a mobilization order, then situation would become troublesome. At the cabinet it was decided that the mobilization order would be issued but not announced.

37690

* Exhibit 3782A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, 24 September 1937, stated that HIROTA said it was decided at the cabinet to mobilize 4 divisions and to have another 4 in readiness.

* Exhibit 3783A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, about 26 September 1937, stated that KONOE said the British Ambassador had come three times to HIROTA and said he believed Britain would try to persuade Chiang Kai-shek and asked what were Japan's demands. HIROTA replied that his personal idea was that the terms were, drawing a line in the area slightly south of Tientsin and Peiping and making it a demilitarized zone where neither side would station troops, the recognition of Manchuria, ceasing of anti-Japanese movements, defense against communism, equal diplomatic opportunity in * North China. It was said that these five conditions were given to the Ambassador.

* Exhibit 3784A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 2 November 1937, stated that HIROTA said that he told the industrialists that the anti-British movement was very embarrassing especially at present when there was no country other than Britain which could act as intermediary between Japan and China. The government would be placed in a very awkward position and in the end Japan might have to fight Britain. Japan might have to collide with Britain sometime but it was absolutely out of the question then. Diplomatically the government would be greatly inconvenienced if such things were carried out at present.

* Exhibit 3785A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 5 November 1937, stated that HARADA said that the British Ambassador repeatedly asked him which country at this time would be the best mediator. HIROTA replied England was still the best. When the Ambassador doubted this,

37698

HIROTA stated * that England was the most suitable and they had been holding preliminary conversations with her. It was Britain's report that it seemed as though those near Chiang wished to somehow settle matters with Japan. HIROTA told the Ambassador that even if Germany or Italy were to act as intermediary, it would not do at all.

37699

* Exhibit 3786A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 7 December 1937, stated that KONOE said he was distressed with HIROTA. On November 2, HIROTA met the German ambassador and submitted the plan based on the assumption of circumstances when the Supreme Command had * decided not to advance further than the Paoting line. The German ambassador transmitted this to Chiang on November 6. Chiang however rejected it. Recently, when Nanking was in imminent danger, the German ambassador in China reported to Dirksen that Chiang accepted it. They found out about it because the army stole the telegram. It is quite impossible to accept the terms proposed at the time when they stopped at the Paoting line. HIROTA, prepared for a case like that, had carefully said that if the war situation changed, the terms would also change and to bear that in mind.

37700

37702

* Exhibit 3787A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 11 December 1937, stated that KONOE said he had had enough and when recognition was withdrawn from Chiang's * government after Nanking falls, his government would collapse. Japan would issue a statement withdrawing recognition from Chiang. That was the time for KONOE to get out.

* Exhibit 3788A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, 21 December 1937, stated that HIROTA said the General Staff wanted to stop the war as soon as possible. They say they would like to have Germany as mediator ascertain China's desires. They wanted to set up their stipulations in hope of securing a concrete plan by liaison conferences. The result was presented at a cabinet meeting and it was said that if this plan was submitted and not accepted, Japan would be placed in an embarrassing position. The plan was to be changed to 4 abstract terms, anti-Comintern, economic collaboration, reparations and recognition of a special regional government. The plan was to be reported to the Emperor by the premier and the army and navy leaders of the Supreme Command. It was decided to close without holding an Imperial conference. The President of the US * asked Ambassador SAITO whether it was not one way to try to have Germany handle the matter. HIROTA said he had heard that Italy wanted to enter into the negotiations. He thought that Shantung must be included if a Chinese government was to be set up in view of firing by the Chinese of the Japanese cotton spinning factory at Tsingtao. One of the problems was what the results would be if, when the request was transmitted, Shantung was attacked. The political parties were very strong in their demands because of overseas atmosphere. The Soviets were approaching Yen Hsi-shan and the German militarists seemed to be approaching Chian Kai-Shek.

37712

KIDO told MARADA that the whole matter had been disorderly and he had said plenty in the cabinet. He wondered if the General Staff had not committed certain concrete stipulations through the German military attache. He felt it very dangerous for the army and navy to be so anxious to press for peace. If Japan submitted many concrete * stipulations and was turned down, it was only letting China in on what it wanted. It would be a loss with no gain. He was worried why they were in a hurry. He had said that it was necessary the terms be more abstract and cover everything. There was no need to force themselves into asking Germany. It was very strange that the General Staff was so eager. He was worried Germany might put one over on Japan.

* Exhibit 3789A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, 14-17 January 1938, stated that HIROTA said that at the Imperial Council the Premier expedited the proceedings while HIROTA did the explaining. After he first described the progress of foreign policy and the future peace and war policies, the Chiefs * of Staff gave their approval to the government proposals. HIRANUMA also approved. All decisions passed without objection and were reported to the Emperor.

MARADA met the Lord Keeper and discussed subsequent matter. The Lord Keeper also talked about the details of the Council.

On the 5th China was requested to give an answer by the 15th as to whether she accepted or disapproved of the terms of peace. This being the day the answer was to arrive, it was the desire of the General Staff to settle the matter on this occasion by waiting five additional days even if the proposal was rejected. A liaison * conference was convened on the 15th, lasting from 9:30 AM to 8:30 PM. According to KONOE, the army staff was out and out in favor of ending hostilities with China even if only a day sooner and of preparing against the Soviet. The Deputy C/S stated that even if there had been an Imperial Council, the Emperor did not make any comments. Since this was similar to the

37722 Emperor Organ theory, he wanted to have the matters submitted to the Emperor's judgment before a decision was made. He thus reversed everything that had been settled up until then. It seemed it was his desire to deal with Chiang in person and come to a peaceful settlement. The reply already received from China thru the German ambassador was that 37723 the terms * were too abstract in content and too difficult to comprehend and requested that a more concrete proposal be presented. MIROTA said that the army staff had already informed China thru the German military attache and China was well aware of the concrete proposals. But she feigns ignorance and says that cannot be understood. If this was the case, there was no hope. There was no alternative but to proceed with the alternate plan to transfer the hostilities into a long-term war. It was vital that they strengthen their determination to oppose China stubbornly. The premier and his cabinet felt it was not good to be led on and on. The same arguments were being repeated but YONAI asked whether the army staff did not have confidence in the government which would mean that either the staff or the cabinet must resign. * The army staff retired to consult and returned. The Deputy C/S stated it was unwise to have a change in the government. The staff had confidence in the government and would concur with its decision. The cabinet was again convened and the premier made a complete report to the Emperor.

Both KONEE and KIDO said the army staff was justified in its ardent desire to have out and out peace, but after matters had developed this far, to stop midway by taking an attitude very similar to that of a defeated nation and purposely showing magnanimity was not an attitude to be taken by a winning country. If such an action were taken, 37725 it would be said that Japan had weakened considerably, * and was in a precarious situation. Her cards would be revealed. Externally, it would mean a sudden fall of yen exchange and depreciation of government securities and Japan would not be able to carry on commerce. If they were going to settle matters, it should be done logically.

According to KIDO, on the 12th, Prince CHICHIBU, as though representing the army staff, questioned KIDO on the grounds on which the government refrained from concluding the hostilities. KIDO explained the circumstances at length. In the course of the conversation, CHI* CHIBU remarked that hostilities differed from the Sino-Japanese and 37726 the Russo-Japanese wars in * that they were not waging war against the people but against the regime. He wondered if it could not be done by eliminating all friction to date and clasping hands from a broad standpoint. KIDO replied that even if the situation differed, after Japanese troops had killed 7-800,000 Chinese soldier, even if they said let us shake hands, it could not be clasped sincerely. For a victorious nation to say it by all means would like to make peace as soon as possible and submit various terms and lay their cards on the table would be used as propoganda if China should refuse. If they spread such propoganda

37727 at home and abroad, it would result in Japan being put at a great disadvantage. This would cause a slump in yen exchange and government securities and a loss of confidence in Japan's economy and finance. It would also result in the nation not being able to purchase any commodities and prices * would soar and internal administration would be thrown into confusion. Diplomacy is needed to establish peace, but unless the settlement is made very firm, and if things are immediately handled as the General Staff desire, they would have no end of worry for the nation. CHICHIBU agreed but thought the government was incompetent.

On the 18th HIROTA said as China failed to accept the proposal, the Imperial council decided on the alternative plan.

* Exhibit 3790A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, 14 February 1938, stated that the Vice Foreign Minister stated that at the liaison conference of February 14, the army said it was impossible to attack Canton and Hankow in the future. They should go as far as southern Shansi and up to the Yellow River but it was impossible to advance to Suchow. The navy would like to advance its air base to Anking, but the army felt that it was impossible, because military preparations must be made against Russia. As a result the navy said it was not wise to continue as they were and extend the incident into long-term hostilities. Cessation of war should be attempted through diplomacy and the forces must advance without * yielding an inch. The navy requested the Chief of Naval Staff to inquire of the Chief of Army staff whether they were not intending to force Russia. The army denied this. The Emperor then asked the war minister whether it was possible to put into effect a simultaneous plan for long term hostilities, military preparations against Russia, and the expansion of the navy. The war minister stated he would discuss the matter with the government and take proper action.

* Exhibit 3791A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, 16 June 1938, stated that KONOE said that Foreign Minister UGAKI, Finance Minister IKEDA and he held a 3 ministers meeting. ITAGAKI Persisted in recommending SHIRATORI as Vice Foreign Minister to UGAKI. When ITAGAKI was at the front and SHIRATORI was touring China, they talked and their opinions on foreign relations coincided very well. The greatest nuisance to UGAKI were the army field grade officer. If UGAKI wanted to carry out some foreign policy, he would have to hold them down and yet let it appear that he was cooperating. SHIRATORI was not considered highly by his seniors * and his reputation outside was bad. If UGAKI were to use him, he would probably handle him appropriately. Using SHIRATORI would be very good politically. The navy was wholly opposed. YAMAMOTO said that in view of SHIRATORI's personal conduct, they could not keep such a man for disciplinary reasons. KONOE would not assume any responsibility in forcibly recommending SHIRATORI. In reality, he thought SHIRATORI would be the best suited person. UGAKI stated that he had heard that SHIRATORI was very loose with his finances.

147 *Exhibit 3792 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, July 5, 1938, stated that on July 5, 1938, the Lord Keeper stated that yesterday the Emperor summoned the War Minister and the C/S and stated he thought this war should be ended as soon as possible. Both replied simply that they would continue until Chiang failed. The Emperor was quite concerned because the Chief and Vice Chief of staff had previously told him that the staff feverishly wanted to stop the war and make preparations against Russia. Since then nothing had happened. The Emperor, thinking the C/S had in mind to settle the incident as soon as possible, put the question * to them.

HARADA told this to navy vice-minister YAMAMOTO, who said that though the war minister said they would continue until Chiang failed, in reality it was the army which was most troubled. It desired most earnestly to quit. There was no doubt about this point.

155 * Exhibit 3793A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, July 1938, stated that MATSUDAIRA said the C/S and war minister expressed their desire to submit some matter to the throne. The Emperor, thinking that the war minister was coming to appeal the question of using real force on the Soviet-Manchukuo border and thinking that it would cast a reflection upon the C/S and the war minister if the sanction was denied had the Chief Aide tell them that if they were coming to to get his sanction to use force, he had not the slightest intention of approving it. If they were coming for that, they needn't come. The message was conveyed but they said they wanted an audience. * They kept the Emperor waiting for more than an hour. As the Emperor had thought, the war minister submitted the question of the use of force and asked sanction. The war minister said that both the foreign and navy ministers had agreed. Although both of them had previously expressed their opinion in favor of troop dispositions, they were absolutely against the use of force. The Emperor felt that he was going to be deceived again and excitedly admonished them by stating that the actions of the army were abominable. There were frequent instances when a sneaky method was used. It was quite improper for his army * to disobey orders from the central authorities and to decide on the judgment of the authorities on the spot, as in the Manchurian Incident and the actions at Marco Polo Bridge. Nothing like that must happen this time. He told the war minister that thereafter he must not remove one soldier without the Emperor's command. The war minister said he should by all means like to resign.

158 KIDO wondered why the Lord Keeper did not act in concert with the premier and do something. It was disturbing to have the Emperor take such pointed action. KIDO also said that if the army said that Japan had to fight with Russia, then he would recommend KONOE to resign.

*Exhibit No. 3794 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, 2 July 1938, stated that HARADA met with the Navy Minister and Vice Minister and had a leisurely conversation. It was brought out that OKAWA, Shumei recently brought a petition from the young officials of the Foreign Ministry to UGAKI which asked that he appoint SHIRATORI Vice Minister.

*Exhibit 3795 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA Memoirs stated that the Lord Keeper said that the Deputy Chief of Staff said he strictly warned OSHIMA that the supreme authority of diplomacy is vested in the Emperor, and cautioned him that it was not desirable to forget one's position and always do as Germany says by agreeing. Japan has the deciding authority. The Army has no intention of infringing upon the diplomatic prerogative. The Army does not pay any attention to the present day Rightists because they are most outrageous. The civil police and Kempeitai have been instructed to take action.

Exhibit 3795 R, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA Memoirs stated that the army's desire reached the Emperor. The Emperor personally told the Chief Aide to go to the General Staff and say that if it was embarrassing if KONOYE resigns, as a condition for keeping KONOYE in office they should decide that question of strengthening the anti-Comintern pact as decided at the First Five Ministers' Conference. He asked about the Army eliminating those points advocated by it, in discord with the general decisions of the Five Ministers' Conference and to have this anti-Comintern pact directed strictly against the Soviet as decided. The army did not show any signs of submitting to the Imperial will and said they were not in favor of that.

*Exhibit No. 3796 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS early February 1939 stated that the Foreign Minister said he was *reluctantly assuming an extremely strong attitude. This must be done to see the situation through. If they fail in this he thought foreign policy would be a total failure. The Foreign Ministry knows nothing about the telegram between OSHIMA and the General Staff concerning the strengthening of the anti-Comintern pact. No matter how long the Army may study diplomacy, what right do they have to do such a thing without consulting the Foreign Ministry. He asked for reconsideration and the Army said they were sorry.

37773

Exhibit No. 3797 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, March 1, 1939, stated that the Foreign Minister said there are no problems any more of routine. It is a pending question which has already been reported to the Emperor who has sanctioned it. No matter what the ambassadors to Rome and Berlin might say, Japan cannot cancel its decision. All we have to do is to change the Ambassadors if they are going to rush to conclusions and say that decisions will not do. The transfer of Ambassadors should be carried out after the close of the present session of the Diet. They wired back instructions to both ambassadors to do as recommended.

*Exhibit No. 3798 A,, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, March 1939, stated the foreign minister said on the 8th he went to the Palace with the decision of the Five Ministers and made a confidential report of the decision to the Emperor. He reported that OSHIMA and SHIRATORI made a clarification of their own opinion only, to Germany and Italy of Japan's intention to fight in the event that they should wage war with England and France. They should be made to take this back since they acted without regard to the wishes of the central authorities and their words and actions overstepped their authority.

37782

*Excerpt from SAIONJI HARADA Memoirs, April, 1939, Exhibit No. 3798 B, stated that * on the 12th HARADA on the 12th asked MATSUDAIRA the Lord Keeper's secretary the reason behind the war minister's visit to the Palace on the 11th. The reply was that on the 10th, the Emperor made an inquiry of the Foreign Ministry about the progress of the Five Ministers meeting. Prior to this, the Emperor had learned of the opposition to governmental instructions of both SHIRATORI and OSHIMA. He thought that for the Ambassadors to have expressed subsequently Japan's intention to participate in war although they had no authority was extremely bad. He was also aware that the War Minister was covering up such acts committed abroad at the Five Ministers' Conference. *He asked the Lord Keeper about rebuking the War Minister. The Lord Keeper replied that since the opinions of the war, Foreign and Navy ministers as well as other cabinet members were in agreement and the matter already settled, that for the Emperor to make reproach on the matter would be rather ill-advised since it would bring about an irritation. Furthermore, since present circumstances were entirely different from the Changkufeng, it would be better if the Emperor did not rebuke the War Minister. The Emperor said that if that was the case he would do so and the idea of summoning the War Minister was abandoned.

37783

37784 * That day the War Minister went to the Palace on some other business. The Emperor patiently informed him of matters with which he was not pleased in regards to this question but did not rebuke him. His words were that it was an infringement upon his supreme authority for the two ambassadors abroad to express Japan's intentions of participating in war and that he was extremely displeased with the War Minister's supporting them under such circumstances and was very dissatisfied with the War Minister's deviation from the subject. The War Minister was very angry.

37789

*Exhibit No. 3799 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, 20 April 1939, stated KIDO said he had met the Premier HIRANUMA the day before and found that since the Premier appeared to be in a dilemma between the Army and the Lord Keeper or the Emperor and since he seemed to think that the Army's actions were essentially right, he wanted to settle matters according to their whim by some means. To achieve this he felt he would like to have a little more understanding and cooperation of the Lord Keeper and the Emperor's understanding along this line. His principal object was that he wanted KIDO to intercede. HARADA could not understand KIDO's attitude.

37790 *in regards to this. According to KIDO, the premier and others feel that although the main text of the Anti Comintern Pact had received Imperial Sanction, the Army wants to omit the secret treaty which says that Japan interprets as the principal object of the Pact the activities of the Comintern or only Soviet Russia. The Emperor will not give his permission and since the Army wishes to omit the secret treaty and avoid being involved in a war against England, France or others by applying only the text of this Pact, and since both the Army and Navy say they wish to avoid Japan's being drawn into the war it should be permissible to omit the secret treaty.

37791 *At some time KIDO expressed that he, too was of this opinion. KIDO said that the Emperor is essentially a scientist, an extreme liberal and at the same time a pacifist. Unless he would somehow change his way of thinking a serious gap would develop between the Emperor and the Army and rightists. They cannot tell what will happen; and to the Army, they must make it appear as though they understood the Army a little more. HARADA listened to this from KIDO with an extreme feeling of surprise but remained silent because he thought to argue with KIDO would do no good. He thought that KIDO's concern should be to lead the Army or the rightists to comply as much as possible with the will of the Emperor and it was his original mission to fulfill his responsibilities in this sense.

37792 He told KIDO that the two of them were ones who best know the *reasons that brought about the present situation. It was the coarse, uncultured and unrepresentable group among the rightists. They broadcast whatever they please and by creating an atmosphere in which they gave power to whomever they pleased, and against which nothing could be done, they brought about disunity of the Army. Although he believed a man in KIDO's position could eliminate this since it no longer could be helped he was thinking of beating to death five or six of the group who might be obstacles in the future although this was going to great extremes. KIDO was distressed at this.

Just before HARADA left, KIDO spoke vaguely and said since he would also think of something HARADA should not worry.

37804 Exhibit 3799-B, excerpt from the SAIONJI HARADA MEMOIRS, 22 April 1939, stated on the 22nd KIDO conferred with the Lord Keeper. According to KIDO he said that Japan was resolved to push stubbornly ahead under the terms as stood; it was still intended to make contact with Hitler through OSHIMA instead of having the Premier do it directly. If this method did not work, the cabinet would resign and it was desired that consideration be given to a change in cabinets. It meant that instead of trying to change the Emperor's mind or the attitude of the Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, 37805 *he stated it clearly in definite terms of "A" or "B". But unless to some degree the Imperial Sanction is secured through the Lord Keeper, matters would be advanced as they stand, but in the event they do not agree the government may have to resign.

*Exhibit No.3800 A, excerpt from the S.H. Memoirs, April 1939. On the 24th KIDO seemed to have greatly changed his attitude and said there was no alternative but to recall OSHIMA and SHIRATORI. If this influenced the internal peace and order he intended to control matters suitably and expected to suppress the Rightists himself.

37809 On the 25th after the Five Ministers' Conference, ARITA told HARADA that an urgent request had come from SHIRATORI and OSHIMA for recall. A discussion was held on counter-measures. It was decided that direct communication be made by the Premier with Hitler and Mussolini through the Ambassadors in Tokyo instead of using the Japanese Ambassadors abroad.

On the 26th he called Vice Minister YAMAMOTO and said it would be better, after doing everything possible, to assume the attitude that they were contented with whatever the result might be. The Navy Minister said the same thing. ARITA also said that through the Ambassadors in Tokyo, the Premier will approach Hitler and Mussolini generally. The Foreign Minister will present the particulars to the Foreign Ministers of Germany and Italy. They will push this matter until conclusion, but if there should be any difference to the demands of Japan, negotiations will be cut off. This is the decision of the Five Ministers' Conference.

37811 * Exhibit No.3801A, excerpt from the S H MEMOIRS, May 9, 1939, stated that on the 6th he said that yesterday, after he handed the Premier's message to the Ambassadors in Tokyo he received an official wire from USAMI in Berlin which said that USAMI was asked by Gauss, the Deputy Vice Minister of the Foreign Office * if Japan wouldn't agree to a proposal such as this, and added that it had not been shown to Ribbentrop yet. GAUSS did not know what the Foreign Minister would say but he was showing it to USAMI unofficially as his private plan. Though written indirectly emphasis was put on the German demands previously refused by Japan. ARITA said he had investigated the origin of this draft and it seemed it was submitted by the Japanese Army to the German Foreign Office through the attaches. He felt this was outrageous and declined to be responsible if this sort of conspiracy went on. ARITA did not show HARADA the actual contents.

37915 * Exhibit No.3801 B, Excerpt from the SH MEMOIRS, May 8, 1939 stated that Overseas Affairs Minister KOISO said that the solution of the China Problem, namely, the reaching of the conclusion of the war as soon as possible would be impossible without a tri-partite alliance. Since the men at the front are displeased with British and French aid to Chiang Kai-shek, an alliance with Germany and Italy would alleviate their feelings. It would then be in order to settle the China Problem through England and France. Otherwise, it will be extremely difficult to pacify the army at the front.

37823

*Exhibit 3801 C, excerpt from the S.H. Memoirs May 1939, stated there was a wire from Ambassador OSHIMA which said that two or three days ago Ribbentrop on his way to meet Ciano at Como questioned OSHIMA that when a contracting nation goes to war against a third nation, and even if there is no military aid from Japan, would it be permissible to recognize Japan as being in a state of war? OSHIMA had replied in the affirmative.

37024

ARITA said it was inexcusable for those abroad to propose, on their own authority participation in war and to make such an arbitrary reply. A five Ministers Conference was scheduled for the next day but this matter will be difficult for HIRANUMA is inclined to assume a supporting attitude rather than remain neutral. He believed that such matters had already been transmitted abroad by the Army, and he could not assume the responsibility for foreign policy. *HARADA told this to the Lord Keeper. On the 7th, ARITA reported that at the Five Ministers Conference, the Premier supported the War Minister and upheld OSHIMA's answer to Ribbentrop, that in the event of war between one of the contracting parties and a third nation, Japan will be considered to have entered a state of war, although it would not give any military support.

37825

Exhibit 3802 A, excerpt from S H MEMOIRS, May, 1939, stated that the Navy Vice Minister said the Navy Minister said in the conference that the Gauss draft did not come through legitimate channels. If they were to follow the proper course they had not even received an official reply from Germany to the premier's message. * He thought it odd to attach themselves to the Gauss draft without demanding a reply. No one said anything about it and they again continued discussing the Gauss draft. The Premier gave the impression that a reply to his message was unnecessary because the matter had already been solved when OSHIMA had replied "yes" to Ribbentrop's question. In other words, it was agreeable for Japan to be considered as ready to participate in the event of war between England-France and Germany-Italy.

37825

*Exhibit No. 3803-A, excerpt from the S H MEMOIRS, May 1939, stated that the War and Navy Ministers each saw the Premier individually and gave him the story, and a Five Ministers' Conference was hurriedly held on the 20th and the problem was settled in substance roughly as above. With regard to ARITA's proposal to make OSHIMA retract his affirmative answer to Ribbentrop's question, the Premier was evasive and would not make him retract. ARITA cautioned the Premier to report privately to the Throne, because *though it could not be said that a complete agreement in opinion had been reached between the Army and Navy the matter had actually been decided and it appeared that instructions would soon be issued.

*The deletion of article III of the above-mentioned secret understanding concerning the participant nations, etc. and the revision of the wording of the announcement to be made to the world had finally been carried out, but the statement about "entering into a state of "ar". by OSHIMA in reply to Ribbentrop was left unrescinded.

288

*Exhibit 3803 B, excerpt from S H MEMOIRS, May 1939, stated that on the 23rd Vice Minister YAMAMOTO said he understood that both SHIRATORI and OSHIMA said nothing could be done about that particular draft and they kicked it back. He said that at the same time the Army claimed that there were some words missing * and that the whole business was scandalous.

289

Later ARITA said they had discussed the matter at the Foreign Ministry and it fell back on Germany and Italy demands to enter the war. The army's contention that words were missing meant a clear-cut expression of participation in war and he could not agree. The Premier said it should be done as the Army wants. It appears as if he too wishes to have it read "participation in war".

The Navy Minister said it was outrageous even to mention participation in war or condition of war. In view of the fact that the Emperor often says he shall not permit it to the General Staff War Minister and the Premier, it is abominable for the Premier to support the Army and the ambassadors who take action contrary to the Emperor's will.

Exhibit 3804 A, excerpt from the S.H. MEMOIRS, July 1939, in regard to the Tientsin problem stated that the Premier agrees with the view of the Foreign Minister. Although they wish to make firm restrictions from July the Central Government has no control. The units abroad do as they wish. The strong argument by the Consul in Tientsin and the comparatively strong attitude taken by Minister KATO is somewhat regrettable. The points in the Tientsin problem which Japan is considering are the placing of Japanese in the Industrial Bureau, the placing of Kempei within the concessions, the demand of handing over of 45,000,000 Yuan to the provisional government as a friendly gesture, cooperation to preserve peace and order, and the handing over of the criminals. The stupidity of the War Minister seems to be the cause of all the problems becoming extremely disorderly.

2832

*When the Emperor asked about the Incident, the War Minister said the reason the Army requested the surrender of 45,000,000 Yuan in the British Concession was to maintain the currency exchange. When the Emperor asked if that was sufficient, the War Minister said, no. The Emperor was shocked and said that was very bad thinking on his part and rebuked him. The Lord Keeper consented to the extent that the Army was going to destroy the nation.

*Exhibit 3804B, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, early July 1939, stated that the Lord Keeper on the 7th said the War Minister went to the palace and spoke about TERAUCHI being sent to the Nazi Party conference. Although the navy had planned to send OSUMI, there had been no formal notice from Germany, and since it was still confidential, it hadn't been reported to the Emperor. The Emperor already knew that at the Supreme War * Council the War Minister reported that ARITA favored the Military Alliance, and the Emperor thought it very distressing. The War Minister stated it was necessary to send TERAUCHI to strongly bind the anti-comintern pact spiritually. The Emperor did not think it very good and said the War Minister knew his opinions. At the Supreme War Council he had reported an actual falsity that ARITA favored the military alliance. That was very insolent.

*Exhibit 3805A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA MEMOIRS, July 1939, stated that * ARITA said that when KONOE met the War Minister the other day, the latter asked KONOE if it wasn't possible to change the Emperor's mind on the military agreement, and KONOE replied it was very difficult.

37842

*Exhibit 3806A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, 3 August 1939 stated that Education Minister ARAKI said he was not too worried about the rightists. If the government acted resolutely they could be swayed. The important question was how the army situation would develop and how to gradually take control of it. He said he knew quite a bit about Overseas Minister Koiso. He was a man of intrigue and trickery. When the problem of legal tender arose in the Cabinet he boldly suggested that counterfeit currency be used. There were instances when he sent the Kempei to China and Manchuria dressed in work clothes. When Japan was trying to strive for the new order based on virtue, these acts were contradictory and extremely harmful. KOISO had power and enthusiasm, but he had no set opinions and dealt only in intrigues and trickery. He could easily be swayed. He spoke very ill of KOISO. Although KONOE often proposed to unite ARAKI and KOISO, MARADA felt it utterly futile.

37846

*Exhibit 3807A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, August 1939, stated that the Foreign Minister talked about the Five Ministers conference of the 8th August 1939. He stated that the Premier said that yesterday the War Minister explained the army proposal. They had been making efforts along the pre-arranged plan because they recognized the necessity of a treaty. He said that this proposal would not deviate from the plan, but the premier did not think so. He asked for questions.

37847

These introductory remarks * were followed by questions from the cabinet. The army's contention was that a change in the situation necessitated an offensive and defensive alliance. As the first step, the pre-arranged plan was to be followed. If this could not be done, the second step was the conclusion of an offensive and defensive alliance. The premier then asked the war minister what he thought. The war minister replied that he was both a state minister and war minister. As state minister, he had consented to the pre-arranged plan being followed, but, as a representative of the army, he consented also to the second step being taken. The Foreign Minister thought it appeared that either there was still some leeway on the unconditional alliance or that ITAGAKI would be ousted.

37862

*Exhibit 3808A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, 12 July 1940, stated that Chief Cabinet Secretary ISHIWATA said ANAMI and MUTO said the present cabinet must amicably withdraw. Since diplomatic relations are going ahead satisfactorily due to the 4 Ministers conference and other connections, they would say nothing more about foreign policy. In order to realize KONOE's new political order, they would like the cabinet to withdraw. When ISHIWATA disapproved, they said there was nothing to be done but force the resignation of the War Minister.

37865

*Exhibit 3687, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, 19 August 1940, state that the following was decided at the 4 Ministers conference. In order to evolve a policy for settling the China Incident and dealing with the new world situation, the establishment and strengthening of war-time economy should be made the basis of domestic and foreign policy. The government would assume unitary leadership in all economic activities and strive to the utmost in its promotion, except where it was absolutely necessary for the existence of the military for them to assume leadership

37866

Corresponding to the sudden changes in the world situation and to quickly establish a new order, they planned to strengthen the axis. The East Asiatic nations must act in concert and carry out various important policies. They must decide on the most opportune time * for strengthening the axis and realizing it. A non-aggression pact would be concluded with the Soviet by Japan, Manchukuo and Mongolia for 5 to 10 years. In addition to the immediate solving of pending questions they would realize sufficient military preparedness to safeguard against defeat by the Soviet during the period of the pact. * Arrangements would be made to include the English, French, Dutch and Portuguese colonies and the orient within the new order. They would try to exclude themselves from international conferences on this. Though they would avoid unnecessary collisions with the US as long as it concerned the establishment of a new order they were firmly determined to eliminate any interference by actual force. These were discussed by KONOE MATSUOKA, YOSHIDA and TOJO, while the cabinet was being organized. These were the fundamental policies for organizing the new cabinet.

At the liaison meeting between Imperial GHQ and the government in July, the points presented by GHQ for solving the situation were * Japan would improve its foreign situation, accelerate settling the China Incident and would seize the most opportune time to solve the southern problem. In case settlement of the China Incident could not be made, the

- 37868 change of attitude by stressing the southern region policy would be decided upon taking into consideration domestic and foreign situations. The preparations needed to cope with these items would be given utmost acceleration.
- 37874 *Exhibit 3809A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, September 1940, stated that Capt. TAKAGI told MARADA of the conversation between MUTO and TAKAGI at the Preparations Committee meeting. According to MUTO, the leading element of the new organization regardless of title was actually an association of political parties. It was not therefore
- 37875 desirable that the army * participate in it. However, the arguments had changed and when practical applications were considered, it was necessary to delegate strong political powers to the nucleus of the new organization. To do this, it was necessary to appoint party members. The opinions of a great number of directors was that this new organization was one in which the military, government and people must unite in order to construct a country with powerful national defense. It was unlike former times when there were various disagreements on theoretical policies and struggles for selfish interests. This included former politics, economy, education and all other aspects of national life. The present movement was not one which arose from the masses. The situation was such the the military and government must do the leading and spread the movement. The nucleus of the new organization was therefore appropriate. The fact that the army and navy would withdraw did not signify that this new movement would succeed. On the contrary, there
- 37876 was fear that * the movement would be rendered impotent thereby. In this manner, the other directors all agreed with his proposal. These were all superficial reasons and the inner purpose of the army's contention must be clarified. The army had been exerting all its efforts to induce dissolution of existing political parties. The Promotion Association, which had been dissolved, did not have much voice in the Preparations committee. They had become very fidgety and uneasy. On the other hand, the army planned to unite the political parties into 1 unit and create a so-called pro-army party, and to lead them according to their own wishes. Their plan received a blow when KONOE's proclamation was published. KONOE got the jump on the army, whereas it had planned to use him as a robot.
- 37880 *Exhibit 3810, excerpt from the SAIONJI-MARADA Memoirs, 20 October 1940, stated that MARADA explained the circumstances under which the Tripartite pact was concluded. He had doubts as to how the Lord Keeper and premier explained the matter to the Emperor. SAIONJI was greatly doubtful as to how they explained the matter and obtained imperial sanction for the Emperor had said he would never give his consent. According to KIDO and KONOE, the navy agreed to it and both the foreign minister and premier also explained to the Emperor along the line that there was no other step to take towards the US and the only measure to keep the
- 37881 US out of war was the conclusion of Amilitary alliance. When they thought of the Emperor's innermost feelings, they were filled with with trepidation. Imperial Household minister MATSUDAIRA said that every time he went to the Emperor, the latter showed indefinable regret.

37881

37882

SAIONJI was kept in complete ignorance and the pact came as a complete surprise. MARADA heard from naval sources that there was going to be a September liaison conference on the day it was held. He telephoned KONOE and KONDE answered that he had just returned from the conference. The navy had finally consented and the agreement could be concluded. The following day KONOE told him the general circumstances, but the most important point of how they were able * to obtain Imperial sanction was not mentioned. He asked KIDO why he had not told SAIONJI beforehand. There was nothing wrong with the Genro and it was regrettable that not a word was said to him on such an important problem which directly concerned the fate of the country. KIDO replied he felt too sorry for SAIONJI so he did not tell him. MARADA told KIDO that however opposed SAIONJI might be, or however sorry KIDO might feel, he must report all he had. That was KIDO's duty to the Emperor. KIDO promised henceforth he would report all he could.

37900

*Exhibit 3811, memorandum of Wiehl, December 21, 1938, stated that *on orders of Ribbentrop, he informed OSHIMA that the former in the Pro-Memoria on German-Japanese economic cooperation was holding out for a written statement of preferential status with respect to third powers, and was asking OSHIMA to intercede for a prompt favorable ruling. He handed to OSHIMA the last proposal given to TOGO on 6 October. He said they had definite news from Tokyo that Japan was ready to grant a written statement on preferential treatment. Even TOGO had originally held out hopes for this but later said that Japan could not grant it. The new ambassador to Rome, SHIRATORI, on 26 October, also spoke of preferential treatment for German technology, industry and trade. Wiehl emphasized that on the grounds of German support of Japan in China, not only for political but for economic and moral * reasons they were entitled to preference particularly as to Americans and British who had again demonstrated a reverse attitude by granting credits to China. He brought to OSHIMA's attention the unsatisfactory settlement of protests on practical restraints on German economic activity in China by Japan and delivered a new memorandum.

OSHIMA was completely sympathetic. He stated he had always worked for preference but opinion was divided in Japan. The army and part of the foreign service, like SHIRATORI, were for it. Opposition was to be found principally among domestic economic circles. He emphasized that often military considerations worked inevitably in favor of practical restrictions. The ill-humor of front line troops over the fact that at the beginning the Chinese almost always had only German weapons might still be in evidence here and there. He had about 9 December * sent a telegram that preference should be granted in writing and that practical German difficulties in China should be removed or German officials be informed in detail by Japan on what grounds this was presently not yet possible. He had also sent by a general letters in favor of 37902 this to leading figures of the army. He promised to report again both by telegram and in writing.

37905 *Exhibit 3812A, telegram from Wiehl January 15, 1942, stated that 37906 *on January 2 in a conversation with Ribbentrop, Oshima stated he had been commissioned to concentrate in himself the handling of all questions concerning general principles of cooperation in the whole field of the common prosecution of the war, and to speak at the proper time with Ribbentrop, and, in so far as Italy was interested, with the Italian Ambassador. Nothing except purely military and economic questions of detail were to be handled by the military and economic members of the Tripartite subcommissions. He delivered a memo setting forth that parallel with the conversations on military cooperation, concrete negotiations would soon be begun on reciprocal use of German and Japanese economic power. While Japan was doing the utmost to facilitate delivery of East Asia products Germany, Germany should do everything to deliver machines, munitions material and plants to Japan. To avoid * payment difficulties, Germany must grant Japan a total credit of $\text{¥}1,000,000,000$ for 3 years. Until this was available a temporary credit of 30 million for most urgent German deliveries should be immediately placed at disposal. Japan was ready, with the development and use of the raw materials rich South Seas regions, which went with the progress of military operations to look out for Germany's interest in every possible way.

37910 *Exhibit 3813A, memorandum on Hitler's conference with OSHIMA, 37911 January 3, 1942, stated that * Hitler again asked OSHIMA not to mention his statements to Italy. If anything were let out, all efforts would be in vain. He added he would discuss military affairs only with OSHIMA. Hitler explained to OSHIMA on the map the prospective naval situation in the Atlantic, emphasizing it was his most important task to get the submarine war going full blast. After making further explanations he pointed out that no matter how many ships the US built, one of their chief problems was personnel shortage. For this reason merchant vessels were being sunk without warning so that as large a part as possible of the crew would perish. If word should get about that most seamen were lost in torpedoings, the * US would have difficulties in recruiting. The training of sea personnel took a long time. They were fighting for their existence and could not permit any humanitarian points of view to govern. For this reason he had to order that in case foreign seamen could not be taken prisoner, submarines were to surface after torpedoing and shoot up the lifeboats.

OSHIMA sincerely concurred in these statements and said that Japan was forced to follow these methods. OSHIMA was empowered to discuss the prosecution of the war with Ribbentrop. Even though individual questions could be discussed directly between the army, the air force and the navy, it was of the greatest importance that main policy should be laid down exclusively by Ribbentrop and him. The same was true of economic and political questions.

*Exhibit 3814, telegram to the Vice Chief from the Military Attache to the German embassy, May 5, 1941, stated that as reported MATSUOKA's visit to the US would produce a bad effect upon the Tripartite Alliance. The statement by ISHII, Chief of the Publicity Bureau, and the report in the Japan Times implicitly confirmed the visit which would greatly shock not only Germany, but also the axis countries creating a very unfavorable situation that would nullify the results of MATSUOKA's having visited Germany and Italy. ISHII could not be excused when he boldly stated that Germany and Italy should be asked about the visit to the US. If the situation be left alone the problem regarding the resignation of OSHIMA might arise causing a fiasco in the basic problems of foreign diplomacy.

*Exhibit 3815, memorandum by Wieszacker, July 12, 1941, stated that OSHIMA * mentioned he had had an exchange of telegrams with his foreign minister. He had tried to induce him to determine the center of gravity of further Japanese policy and to decide between south and north since a dispersal of forces was impossible. In principle MATSUOKA had agreed with OSHIMA without expressing himself concretely.

When asked how things stood with FIC, OSHIMA replied that the occupation of certain positions in Southern FIC, an aircraft and warship base was an urgent Japanese need. Whether they should previously inform France or merely sound it out was another question. OSHIMA did not consider the move toward south FIC imminent, and thought that Tokyo would probably wait for a good opportunity.

OSHIMA gave a few opinions on the further development of American relations. He was evidently poorly or not at all informed. He sought to gather some news from Wieszacker. The latter said that there was * only a partially decoded report from Ott indicating that Tokyo had received news from Washington. He could not explain further. It had struck him with what naive and impudence, the US had established itself in Iceland. He asked OSHIMA if he thought the US considered its rear in the Pacific as the Iceland case would really lead one to believe. OSHIMA answered that his own view on how America was to be handled was known. He had again advised MATSUOKA simply to break off the conversations.

37924

Exhibit 3816A, Notes on the conversation between Ribbentrop and OSHIMA, July 9, 1942, stated that Ribbentrop said Vladivostok was the biggest threat for Tokyo for the air, particularly if US bombers should be stationed there. Sooner or later this would take place anyway, if the Soviet were not eliminated promptly. With regard to the 60 or 80 Russian submarines there, the Russians little knew how to use them. In the Baltic, there were on hand a like number, which never had been able to do the slightest harm. He thought it best to make the decision and attack the Russians if Japan felt strong enough and was ready with deployment in Manchuria. Hitler held the opinion that Japan, after its big successes, should first consolidate its new territories, and that the German offensive in Russia should first be farther advanced. He had thought it best that Japan should not undertake too much, so as not to endanger its own situation. After the favorable military developments in Russia, he was of the opinion that the moment had come for Japan to enter the common fight against Russia, providing she felt strong enough. Should Japan rapidly occupy Vladivostok and the territory up to Lake Baikal, the Russians on both sides would be in an extremely difficult position. The war would then be practically decided, and the Tripartite powers could exert all their power against Britain and the US, who would have no hope.

OSHIMA replied that he was overjoyed at the developments in Russia and North Africa. He was convince of the imperativeness of a Japanese attack on Russia and of the blocking of English supplies to Egypt and would immediately report.

*Exhibit 3817, Minutes on the discussion of Ribbentrop with OSMIMA *March 6, 1943, stated that Ribbentrop questioned OSMIMA about the telegram sent from Tokyo during the last discussions, whether he had new reports from Japan concerning the submarine question and what actually it intended to do in this direction. OSMIMA replied Japan intended to accentuate the submarine warfare and would like to make necessary preparations for this. Present submarines were not suitable for this warfare, which Doenitz had confirmed after examination. Japan's navy would have to arrange its building program and would be thankful if they could obtain two U-boats as specimens from Germany.

37933

Ribbentrop later informed OSMIMA that Germany was prepared to put 1 or 2 U-boats at Japan's disposal. He suggested that Admiral NOMURA discuss the details with Admiral Meissel. Germany did this on condition that Japan * would start as fast as possible the U*boat building program on a large scale in mass production. OSMIMA stated that Japan was prepared to do this. The training of crews would not offer any special difficulty as the training of a crew for use against merchant shipping was easier than for use in large submarine cruisers for naval operations. OSMIMA thought the mass production would be solved as the smaller boats could be built faster and did not require so many complicated installations. Ribbentrop pointed out that the U-boat could be built rather quickly, the main difficulty lying in machine construction. To assist Japan in carrying out the program it would be possible to lend German engineers for machine construction and officers who had sufficient experience in the tactical use of the boats against merchant shipping. OSMIMA stated Japan would be very grateful for every assistance and he would ask NOMURA to discuss the details with the German navy. *Ribbentrop stated that Japan within a short time would be able from her far advanced bases to make an effective assault at enemy supply lines. OSMIMA for his government expressed his thanks for German willingness.

37938 *Exhibit 3818A, telegram from Wohltat, January 23, 1942, stated that OSMIMA's proposal on granting of 1000 million credit, which was on his own initiative, only enlarge the order of magnitude of the objects under negotiation. The content of the treaty text was not fundamentally affected, because contrary to OSMIMA's assumption, an agreement to take effect right now had been negotiated with Japan. Japan and Germany, in advance of OSMIMA's action, had already agreed that the treaty being printed should be put into use as soon as possible. In view of the fact that OSMIMA had not been able to put across his personal views in the economic-political field, it must be doubted whether Japan would empower him to commit in the above sense and to the extent * necessary to cover German demand for raw materials.

37939 Exhibit 3818B, Memorandum of Wiehl, January 24, 1942, stated that MATSUSHIMA * stated he had reported to OSMIMA on yesterday's conversation. The latter felt it would delay concluding the credit treaty too long if first the position of Japan regarding the treaty proposal advanced by Wiehl were obtained. OSMIMA had ordered him to deliver his proposal for an economic alliance treaty with a secret protocol, although the assent of Japan already requested some time ago had not yet come in. OSMIMA had on his own altered the secret protocol to this economic alliance so that it corresponded with Item 1 of the German credit proposal. He believed he would get approval to the adjustments proposed by him just as soon as he could report that Germany was in accord. The adjustments could then be signed in Berlin immediately. If the treaty were concluded in this way, subsequent negotiations in Tokyo on the further details contained in the German proposal would swiftly lead to a result.

January 22, 1948

37943 *Exhibit 3819, telegram from Ribbentrop to Ott, March 26, 1942, stated that in conversations with OSMIMA on March 23, he gave him more details on the present situation. He started with the very bad prospect facing Russia, the air of deep depression among the leading politicians in England, and the gigantic confusion in the US with its blustering armament propaganda. If allied propaganda tried to keep the axis from profiting from its victory, it was all the more necessary that they counter it with full use of allied weakness and bring to fruition this year the boldest * conceivable strategic plans. Germany this year would maneuver Russia into a position which would eliminate it as a decisive factor. They then proposed to push forward into the Near East to shake hands with Japan. Japan was confronted with a situation where in safeguarding of its conquests could only be assured by the final annihilation of the allies. The axis powers should undertake this year bold military offensive operations and in view of the enemy current weakness, they could undertake them to end the war as soon as possible with the smallest possible sacrifices. Japan should obtain security for herself, so that Australia could no longer become a base for attack against Japan. Japan's fleet should advance into the Indian Ocean, occupy Ceylon and establish bases on Madagascar, and Burma should be completely occupied. Japan's advance against Vladivostok in the direction of Lake Baikal would be of especial significance. Germany did not expect anything of Japan which would overstep its power for Japan's strength was also hers. If Japan should be strong enough this year to attack Russia, this would * materially contribute to Russia's rapid, final elimination as an opponent. Even now food and economic situation in Russia was dreadful and the Russians were literally devouring each other in many districts. Russia had already lost 10 million of its best soldiers while Germany's total loss since the war had only been about 237,000 dead and 750,000 wounded. Of the latter at least 5-600,000 could again be used. The German Army was much stronger today than last year and ready for the new offensive to be directed against the decimated Russian army. There was no doubt that Germany would attain her goal in Russia. Together with the common push this blow would decide the war. If things went this way, the British Empire would collapse in the foreseeable future, and the US would then be unable to do anything serious.

OSFIMA agreed fully and completely. He had received no official communications on Japan's intentions, but would do * everything on his own to persuade his government to undertake the advance against Vladivostok and East Siberia this year. He felt that such a good opportunity would never return.

RIBBENTROP spoke to OSFIMA about future economic cooperation between the Europe-Africa sphere under axis leadership and the Greater East Asia under Japan's leadership. He designated as the goal a large-scale economic agreement with preference for the partners, and third parties, the US in particular, excluded as far as possible. A firm alliance between the Tripartite powers must form the basis. The main outlines for economic cooperation should as soon as possible be laid down in a skeleton agreement. OSFIMA emphasized the special significance which such an agreement would have as a substitute for the former economic ties between Japan and the US. They would again discuss this question in the very near future.

*Exhibit 3820A, Memorandum on the conversation of Ribbentrop with OSFIMA, May 9, 1942, stated that Ribbentrop emphasized that it was absolutely necessary while the war was on to lay down clearly a definite basis for economic relations between Germany and Japan. A starting point for all discussions and plans was the tripartite pact, which would prove effective for all international settlements even after the war and for an enormous length of time to come. The two political major areas created by it, i.e., the East Asiatic Area with China, Siam, Burma, the NEI, and the European Area with the European countries, North and Central Africa, the Near East etc., * must in advance so fix their economic relations that they would in no way adversely affect political re-

37951 lations. Government policy was primary and economy need not, as it had under the old liberal principal, serve for the enrichment of a few, who did not bother about political necessities, but existed for the economic well being of the whole people to raise through proper organization their standard of living.

OSPIFA enthusiastically concurred. The conclusion of an economic treaty was particularly important because it would be very difficult to bring the US to its knees in the present war unless there was an internal outbreak of unrest. Even after the war, a battle would have to be waged with the US in the field of economy through economic boycott by Japan and the Axis.

37952 Ribbentrop proposed to draw up a basic accord to be published and a secret protocol which would include all important details. * He went over the points to be settled by treaty, emphasizing that at the moment they were only dealing with a proposal which he had not yet examined in all detail and which for the time being should only be an exchange of ideas between them.

37953 Ribbentrop said that economic cooperation between the two areas would be considerably facilitated by strict central control of economy. There would remain other independent states in both economic areas. These would be forced completely to carry out a far reaching control of their economy, and the guiding powers would immediately from their natural economic predominance be in a position to exert influence on their economy. In time the two areas would more and more grow in the direction of 1 unit, which would have effect on customs and currency. * The two areas would have to give mutual preference in all economic fields. Preferential tariffs would have to be granted in the exchange of goods. Care should be taken that the products of one should not be forced from the market thru an outsider offering its goods more cheaply. The sale of important goods to third powers should only occur after the partner had been supplied. They should think over whether they shouldn't now provide that after the war resumption and later continuation of economic relations with the enemy should only take place after mutual agreement between the partners. This applied particularly to the US and the Central and South American countries which had shown themselves under the sway of the US. Where economically independent forces remained within the two areas opposed to all this regulating and so acting, such as MITSUI, measures would have to be taken to eliminate them.

37954 *OSMIMA fundamentally agreed with these * statements and emphasized that the two areas must determine a uniform economic policy for a long time, covering not only their internal policy, and mutual economic relations between each other, but also those with outside areas.

*Ribbentrop mentioned that Japan might conclude a similar treaty with Italy. He considered this necessary politically, because the conclusion of the treaty would nip in the bud all rumors and lies which would arise if a treaty were concluded solely between Germany and Japan. OSMIMA recognized this as correct and necessary. Nevertheless he pointed out a difficulty that Japan so far had had almost no economic relations with Italy. Despite this he also felt that Japan for the reasons given by Ribbentrop should conclude a treaty with Italy.

*Exhibit 3821, Memorandum of Wieszacker, April 21, 1942, stated that he had informed OSMIMA how great Iran estimated Russian fear of Japan to be. OSMIMA stated how matter of course it seemed to him that Japan should attack Russia in East Asia. A certain dispersal of naval forces would of course be involved and for this reason Japan seemed still undecided when it should take up the battle against Russia. Wieszacker told OSMIMA how little the Russian submarines at Vladivostok were to be feared. OSMIMA assured that he was * working hard to end the wholly unnatural situation in which Japan was living in peace with the Russian enemy.

37959

37961

*Exhibit 3822A, Memorandum of conference between Ribbentrop and OSMIMA in field quarters, July 30, 1942 stated that * OSMIMA explained that his wish to receive from Japan a positive reply on participating in war against Russia had not yet been fulfilled. He had cabled details of his last talk with Ribbentrop and had added his own view that an early intervention against Russia and intensive action to paralyze English shipping in the Indian Ocean was proper. He had a telegram on July 27 which stated that since the beginning of war Japan's operations in the Pacific and Indian Oceans exercised an ever increasing pressure on the US and Britain and made a substantial contribution to the conduct of the joint war. Japan would have to occupy herself vigorously with the elimination of Chungking. Despite the success of the armed forces, the resistance of the US remained so obstinate that Japan must more and more harness her strength for future operations. Japan's efforts to deny the resources of the South Seas to the enemy and to hold them for herself were only the beginning. In these circumstances, action by Japan *against the Soviet would bring about too great a dispersion of strength. An increase in the war strength of the US and Britain in Europe might be brought about through lessening Japanese pressure. The US might be provided with a favorable base for an attack on Japan. Japan could not enter upon such a policy even though she should be ready for all eventualities. For that reason Japan wanted to keep quiet in the North but make utmost efforts to intensify her operations in the Pacific and Indian Oceans.

37962

OSMIMA continued that the problem had been earnestly studied anew in Tokyo. Personally he shared the view that it was uniquely favorable for Japan to deal a blow to the Russians. The army had always advocated that such action against Russia was necessary. He could only hazard a guess as to the reasons. He assumed that Japan considered the taking of Vladivostok a protracted undertaking and feared that while it was going on the US would get air bases in Eastern Siberia from which they could bomb Tokyo. The Japanese army certainly would have * difficulties especially with the air force. This could be seen from the requests for supplies from Germany. Japan carried out its operations only after thorough preparation and the stage did not seem to be set for an action against Russia. There were various opinions in Japan on this matter and he did not consider the answer the last word. An action against Russia might be possible before October, or if not, probably not before next spring.

Page 7000

37962

OSHIMA stated that he had repeatedly proposed to use the opportune moment and this would be borne in mind in Japan. He believed that operations in the Southern theater had already been initiated and that these could not now be easily broken off in order to go North instead, since great results had already been obtained. To be secure, Japan must beat the US and for this purpose the operations towards Australia and Midway must have first priority. Only in that way could the establishment of US bases in Australia be forestalled. * Despite this, he was for conducting a thrust against Russia too. Apparently the air force was engaged in the south and it lacked experienced officers since about 20 officers were recently recalled from Germany, a measure which could not be understood if operations in the south only were considered. OSHIMA summed up by saying that Japan first must build up her position in the south and occupy Midway and other islands. He did not know what further action against India was in view, but the essential thing was the weakening of England and the US which called for all Japan's strength. Japan could only move towards Russia, when it became practicable. * OSHIMA assured that the advance to the North was the question Japan's fate hung on.

37965

Ribbentrop stated he shared OSHIMA's view completely and hoped that Japan might soon feel strong enough to risk the advance into the North. The final result of such action must not be in doubt from the outset.

37967

*Exhibit 3823A, telegram from Erdsmannsdorf, October 18, 1941, stated that he had questioned OSHIMA in detail on the cabinet change. In OSHIMA's view Japan must have been certain in its mind at the time the Tripartite pact was concluded that the Greater East Asia Sphere could only be achieved thru a push to the south and by force. The only question was when things should start perhaps in conjunction with possible German operations against Britain. * OSHIMA averred again that it would be good if Japan by a push into East Siberia contributed to the restoration of a land connection between Germany and Japan. He had often submitted proposals to this effect to his government.

37968

37971

*Exhibit 3824, excerpt from the KONOE Memoirs, stated that the representations stated that Germany was obliged to express its desire for total participation in the American negotiations and for an immediate report regarding the US reply. It was an infringement upon the Tripartite pact for Japan to listen to US representations and determine Japan's future policy without entering * into a previous understanding with Germany regarding all important problems. At the same time OSHIMA repeatedly sent cables reporting that German leaders were extremely antipathetic toward the US proposal. He declared his own opposition in strong language.

37972

In Tokyo joint conferences were held on May 15th and 22nd, but they did not go beyond an exchange of information and opinion. It was evident that due to the influence of German representations and the objections of OSHIMA, the originally vague attitude of the Foreign Minister had become more and more vague. It was obvious that he was standing alone in his opposition.

37981

*Exhibits 3825A, 3825B, 3825C and 3825D were received in evidence but not read.

37983

*Exhibit 3826, telegram from Ott, November 1, 1938, stated that KONOE at two meetings during the crisis vigorously expressed his high esteem for German policy but noticeably avoided going deeper into conversations which would fix clearly the Japanese attitude. * Ott had tried thru SHIRATORI who was especially active in favor of the anti-comintern policy to influence KONOE toward a stronger expression. His congratulatory telegram to Hitler might have been based upon such influence.

37984

*Exhibit 3827, telegram from Vieszacker, September 4, 1939, stated that they should inform SHIRATORI that Ribbentrop would see him in Berlin.

37987

Exhibit 3827A, telegram from Mackensen, September 9, 1939, stated that SHIRATORI had dropped the idea of returning via Siberia. He regretted not being able to see Ribbentrop again, but planned to ask OSHIMA to transmit to Ribbentrop what he wanted to state personally.

37990

*Exhibit 3828, telegram from Ott, January 27, 1941, stated that at his farewell breakfast for OSHIMA, he and SHIRATORI directed the conversation to the recognition of Wang-Ching-wei. Both advocated that Japan's request to Germany for recognition was not advisable at that time so as not to decrease the possibility of a later German influence on Chiang Kai-shek. Both found understanding for this from the foreign minister. OSHIMA said he would inquire from Ribbentrop whether a special representative of the German government could be sent to influence Chiang.

*Exhibit 3829, telegram from Ribbentrop to Ott, July 3, 1941, stated that SHIRATORI was having to leave political discussions because of serious illness. When Ribbentrop asked how SHIRATORI was getting along, Japan's ambassador to Rome was astonished to hear of it and claimed to know that SHIRATORI was as well as ever. He had only recently had good news from him. Ribbentrop requested a report on SHIRATORI's true state.

*Exhibit 3830, Report of the Metropolitan Police Board on the Meeting of the Parliamentary Members' League for the Consummation of the Sacred War, June 18, 1940, stated that the conference was held * under the joint sponsorship of the League and the National League for the establishment of the Far East. SHIRATORI gave a speech in which he stated that being a government servant, he had to refrain from language insinuating the overthrow of the cabinet, but on the reorientation of Japan's foreign policy, he would say that it appeared that they had already missed the opportunity when they considered the present advance of Germany. This did not mean that they could see no prospect at all. It was absolutely impossible to entertain any hope as long as the persons who opposed a tripartite alliance held the cabinet posts.

*Exhibit 3831A, excerpts from the interrogation of YONAI, Mitsumasa, May 15, 1946, stated that YONAI's cabinet resigned because of war minister Hata's resignation. Military circles did not put forward a successor for the post, and that forced the cabinet resignation. The reason for HATA's resignation was that YONAI's cabinet was deemed a weak one and HATA was unable to exercise control over the army. There were misunderstandings between HATA and YONAI and they all boiled * down to the point that the cabinet, being weak, could not carry out the active war policy on which military circles insisted. Differences mainly concerned the alliance between Japan and Germany. Military circles demanded the alliance, and YONAI was opposed to it. HATA thought that a treaty with Germany at that time would be advantageous. YONAI's cabinet was considered a weak one because at that time the main question of Japan's international policy was the question of creation of the IRAA, and the main question of foreign policy was the building * up an alliance with Germany. Any cabinet that would not support these two measures would be considered a weak one, just as any cabinet that would bring about their materialization would be considered a strong one. YONAI was in opposition to both measures and this was why his cabinet was considered weak.

38002

38003

He opposed the IRAA because it aimed to establish a fascist regime on the same lines as in Germany. It meant the establishment of a dictatorship in the country where the Parliament instead of being the organ of deliberation would become an organ where the members would simply vote for and * applaud any measure demanded by dictatorship. The navy opposed both measures but the leading military circles insisted on it. He could not name any of the military leaders who insisted on realizing the ideas put forward by middle officers. Among influential persons

- 38003 in military circles at that time were war minister HATA, Chief of Military Affairs Section MUTO and C/S SUGIYAMA. These were the people who thought it necessary to create a political organization of the IRAA and
- 38004 the conclusion of an alliance with Germany. * HATA, being of the opinion that the cabinet was weak, never disclosed his views on the subject. MUTO was known to him by sight only and he could not say anything about his views. At that time YONAI was first navy minister and then premier, and was not in direct contact with the army. All he could say was that army leaders were dissatisfied with his cabinet, considering it as a weak one. Dissatisfaction with his policy were expressed by HATA, MUTO and SUGIYAMA.
- 38016 *Exhibit 3832, excerpts from the minutes of the Budget Committee
38017 of the 75th Diet stated * that HATA said it was a matter of course for the army to follow the government policy in dealing with the 9
38018 Power Treaty, but he would like to give his personal opinion. The insulting anti-Japanese * policy of the Chiang regime induced the present incident. To correct this misguidance and bring about everlasting peace in East Asia, Japan was then fighting a holy war. Therefore he believed the present incident was beyond the scope of the 9 Power Treaty. The treaty still existed but he did not think that the carrying out of their military operations ought to be restricted by it. The foreign minister knew that the general circumstances of East Asia then were radically different from when the treaty was concluded.
- 38021 HATA stated that the object of the incident was to establish a new order in East Asia by thoroughly crushing Chiang's pro-communist and anti-Japanese policies. They firmly believed that the establishment of the Wang Regime was only a stage in the incident, and when it was established, Japan's army would give every possible assistance, especially military help. The policy would be firm and unchangeable until Chiang surrendered. Since the soldiers at the front and at home understood this idea thoroughly he was sure that there was no fear of demoralization even if a change in the war purpose might arise through its establishment. It was a great mistake to take the establishment of the new regime as the accomplishment of the incident. It would be a very serious problem if demoralization and change in the resolution of the people should be brought about thru establishing the new government, 38022 and if that should arise, they would demand * demand the first-line troops to raise their morale and do their best in the operations until the ultimate aim of the incident was attained. They must unite and cooperate with each other, and it was necessary to impress deeply in the mind of the nation that the establishment of the new regime was only a stage in the incident, and they must undergo many more difficulties in the future to accomplish the object.

He stated that their diplomatic policy was the so-called non-participation policy which the army understood as an unfettered and independent

- 38022 policy. There were various blocs, such as Anglo-American bloc or German-Italian bloc. In order to settle the incident, there would be
- 38023 no change in policy which was to concentrate all * ability to exclude any third power which would persistently interfere with the establishment of the new order.
- 38025 *Exhibit 3833, Proceedings of Budget Committee, 75th Diet stated that HATA said they should follow the government's policy on the Nine Power Pact.
- 38030 *Exhibit 3834A, Testimony of Lt. Nelson and Captain Barr at the SAWADA trial in Shanghai, May 1946, stated that Charles J. Nielsen testified on direct examination that the injuries of Lts. Hallmark and Meder were so bad that they couldn't walk well. They were crippled.
- 38031 *Nielsen was captured by the Japs on April 21st. They were loaded in coolie chairs and taken to the Japanese garrison, and were transferred from there by boat to Shanghai. On the trip by boat 3 of them were kept in one small room. They were handcuffed and tied by the elbows tight enough to cut off circulation. They were kept this way while being transferred from one place to another but while on the boat their arms weren't tied although they were handcuffed. At night the 3 of them
- 38032 had their legs cuffed together. * They were about 4 days coming up the coast until they came to Shanghai. At Shanghai they were taken to the airport.
- Lts. Hallmark and Meder's injuries had not been treated up to that time. At the airfield, during the questioning, when he wouldn't answer questions, he was slapped and kicked around. He was slapped around the face and head very severely by four Japanese guards who took him from
- 38033 the prison into the building. * He was kicked on the shins by these Japanese guards. He was kicked hard enough that he still had the scars today.
- 38034 * In the questioning they more or less wanted to find out where they came from. They asked where he came from, if he was army personnel and what he was doing in China. He was slapped on the head at least 20 or 30 times. His hands were behind the chair and his legs were tied to the chair legs. He was slapped hard enough to make his head ring severely. He was given several different types of torture. The questioners said that the POWs were captured and no one in US would know where they were, and if anything happened to them, they would be listed as missing
- 38035 in action. * During this treatment all he gave them was his name, rank and serial number.

He was given the water cure. He was put on his back on the floor with his arms and legs stretched out, one guard holding each limb. A towel was wrapped around his face and water poured on. They poured water until he was almost unconscious from strangulation, and they would let up until he'd get his breath, and then start over again. When he re-

38035 gained consciousness they kept asking questions. This treatment continued about 20 minutes. It felt more or less like he was drowning, just gasping between life and death. * During the administration of this treatment he did not answer their questions.

38037 The guards then brought in a large bamboo pole about 3 inches in diameter which was placed directly behind his knees. He was made to squat on the floor like a kneel. One guard had hold of each arm. Another guard then placed his foot on his thigh and would jump up and down, causing severe pains in the knees. It felt like his joints were coming apart but after about 5 minutes of that his knees were so numb he couldn't feel anything else. During that time the Japanese kept on questioning. * He told them he had given them all the information he had. This treatment lasted about 15 or 20 minutes.

38038 From talking to the others later, he found out they were given similar treatment. Hallmark said they put him on a stretcher and stretched him until he felt like his limbs were coming apart. At that time it was almost sundown and they said if he wouldn't talk, they would take him and execute him. He was then blindfolded and taken out. He could hardly walk so guards took hold of him under each arm and they marched about 3-400 feet down a gravel path. He could hear different groups of Jap soldiers marching around in the area. They were drilling. After marching about 400 feet, they stopped and as one of the squads marched up, it also stopped. He could hear the rifle butts hit the ground and he thought that was the execution. After a short conference between the officers the interpreter came back and said they were Knights of the Bushido of the Order of the Rising Sun and didn't execute at sundown but at sunrise. He was taken back to his cell and the interpreter said unless he had decided to talk by morning he would be executed by sunrise.

38039 *In the cell the blindfold was taken off, but he still kept the handcuffs. He was given several vegetable sandwiches and a cup of coffee. One of the guards that had been in the room administering punishment came back. There was a peg in the wall and the witness was suspended by his handcuffs from that peg so his toes would just barely touch the floor. It was about 7:00 PM when he was suspended. After about 3 hours he lost consciousness. The next thing he remembered the sun was coming up and the guards were taking him down from the wall. At that time he was not asked any questions. * His legs were still in great pain from the treatment the night before and when he let his arms down he thought they were both going to drop off. * From hanging up all night his arms and shoulders were numb. He was numb clear to the waist. He was able to stand.

In the cell there were 2 old dirty ragged blankets that were infested with vermin. Latrine facilities was an open hole in the corner without lid, and the stench that came out of it was enough to put one to sleep.

38042 He had three open sores from the kneeling. No medical attention was given them. He didn't think the others were molested during the night although they did receive about the same punishment in the afternoon. * The stretcher treatment was some sort of a mechanism where they put ropes around wrists and ankles. It was operated with some sort of a lever and every time they moved the lever this thing would stretch out.

38043 They arrived in Tokyo about 7:00PM April 25, 1942. They had not been permitted to shave or change clothing or wash since the time of capture. Clothing wasn't in very good condition. Some was torn in the plane wreck. After the swim in the ocean they were all muddy and dirty. They had picked up vermin and lice while being held by the Japanese.

38044 *They were blindfolded before they left Shanghai and wore handcuffs and were tied and continued to wear the blindfold until inside MP hqs in Tokyo. They were there put in solitary, and after 15 minutes were taken out and questioned again. He was mistreated the first night in Tokyo. He was slapped about the head and face and kicked on the legs. His hands were kept behind the chair and his feet were tied to the legs. In his questioning there were 3 guards, 1 interpreter and 2 reporters present. * They slapped him about the face and head and kicked him on the shins. They slapped him hard enough to start his head aching and they kicked his shins drawing blood and reopening the wounds received in Shanghai the day before. They asked him where he had come from, if he had bombed Tokyo the previous week, if he had been stationed in China or the Philippines, and if he was US army personnel. This continued until 4:00 AM. He was slapped and kicked around nearly all the time. * He found out later te others received the same sort of treatment.

38046 During the 18 days of questioning he was not allowed to take a bath or shave. At the conclusion of the 18 days he signed papers which were written in Japanese but interpreted to him. According to the interpreter the papers said that about 3 weeks after they had bombed Tokyo he had been shown maps and charts that the Japs had picked up from one of the abandoned planes. After the Japs picked up those maps and charts, the Americans confessed to bombing Tokyo, told them the areas they had bombed, and confessed leaving an aircraft carrier. There was a small sketch of their life's history. * When these statements were read back, they did not state they had admitted bombing schools and churches. The way the statement was interpreted he had bombed steel mills in the northeast of Tokyo at the edge of a bay. At first he refused to sign, but after being threatened he signed it. From previous treatment they knew what would happen if they did not sign. He was not given a copy of the statement. All the men signed after being put under the same threat. From what they said later their statements contained almost the same thing as his, other than * Farrow's crew which had bombed Nagoya. They were kept in solitary until the last 2 weeks, when Farrow and he were placed in the same cell and the others were doubled up in cells. They were in Tokyo from April 25 to June 17, 1942.

*When he left Tokyo his wounds were all infected and he had many bites from lice and bed bugs which were also infected. He was not afforded any medical treatment. They were not allowed to bathe or shave or clean their clothing during this time. All the while they were in cells they wore leg cuffs and couldn't get their clothing off. They were not given medical treatment.

38049 After they left Tokyo they went by train to Nagoya and from there to Shanghai by boat. As soon as they arrived at Shanghai, they * were loaded on a truck and taken to Bridge House. Eight of them were put in a cell with 15 other Chinese, Japanese, Jews, Dutch, French, every nationality there was in Shanghai. All were quite weak. They had lost quite a bit of weight but were able to get around on their own power. The cell was approximately 12 by 15 feet. There were already 15, making 23 in total. Latrine facilities were an open box in the corner. There was no furniture. They were forced to sleep on the wood floor without blankets. They were held there for 70 days. During this period they 38050 were not allowed to bathe * or shave. They got about a pint of conji, watery rice, for breakfast, 4 ounces of bread each at lunch and at night. They were given as much as 2 quarts of water for 8 in an entire day. At the end of their stay, 7 were able to move around and that was about all. Lt. Hallmark was sick and had to be helped continuously and had been that way for 10 days.

38051 Lt. Hallmark was taken before the court on a stretcher. The rest were on their feet but were in a pretty weak condition. After they had made their statements as to education and air corps training, one of the court * read a manuscript in Japanese. He asked the interpreter to interpret. The latter asked permission from the court but it was denied. No other statements were made except as stated. The names of the other fliers were Lts. Farrow, Hite, Barr, Hallmark, Meder and Sgts. Spatz, DeShazer. They were not afforded defense counsel at the hearing. There were no witnesses. They were never served any charges nor advised of 38052 the charges. * At that trial no one was advised. Nothing was interpreted into English. Lt. Hallmark was not able to sit up in the courtroom. He was lying on a stretcher. Witness doubted if Hallmark ever knew what was going on. Lt. Barr was so weak they finally had to get a chair for him. He never did see the statements he signed. They were not given an opportunity to plead. They didn't even know it was a 38053 court martial. They were not bound but there were about 20 * armed guards in the building or right outside. At this hearing no one admitted he had bombed schools, churches or civilians in the raid on Japan. Nothing was said about the bombing of Japan. The hearing lasted from 20 to 30 minutes.

38054 Capt. George Barr deposed that they all went to Nanking on the same plane. He was tortured during questioning. He was brought out for questioning about 8:30 PM on April 20, 1942. He was handcuffed and blindfolded, but they took the blindfolds off for a while. He was mistreated

- 38054 downstairs when he refused to answer questions. He was assaulted by fists while handcuffed and blindfolded. Later they laid him on the floor, and a fellow came in with water and rags and suffocated him. He laid him on the floor and his mouth was gagged with the rags but his nostrils were left open for water to be poured down them. This continued until he decided he had enough and would answer questions. This lasted about 20 minutes. They stopped from time to time long enough to ask him if he would talk. Then they would continue. The water was going down his lungs. It just stopped his breathing. * This was administered by soldiers and the officer looked on. He could not describe the soldiers. The command to administer was given by the officer in charge. The assault with fists was from enlisted soldiers but he couldn't describe any of them. While they did it, the officer hadn't entered the room yet. When he entered, he gave the signal to stop. 3 or 4 beat him, in the face and body. The blows did not break the skin or blacken his eyes. After they gave him the water treatment, they wanted to know where he came from and after they found that out, they let him go.
- 38055
- 38056 * He told they took off from an aircraft carrier.

The others were questioned and mistreated as well. Lt. Nielsen was beaten and hung up by his thumbs. Lt. Meier was given the water treatment. He did not witness this. They were not at the Nanking prison at the same time but came a few days later. He was gone when they arrived, but received this information from them at Shanghai, when he was in a cell with members of the crew of It. Hallmark. When he was brought into a room after the meeting of the board of inquiry, he passed an open door and fellows were standing around Cpl. DeShazer. He told him later they were using pencils between his fingers and squeezing his knuckles.

- 38059 *Exhibit 3834B, testimony of MIYANO at the SAWADA trial, stated that HATA ordered the 13th army to set up a military tribunal and that the Realittle fliers he tried by it. He did not remember whether Nanking issued any orders to the 13th army in regard to the treatment of the fliers. The trial was ordered by HATA to be tried at Shanghai. HATA requested the 13th army prosecutor to ask for the death penalty.
- 38060 *He meant that General HATA requested the death sentence.
- 38065 *Exhibit 3835, talk between TOGO and Ott, October 27, 1941, stated that Ott said he had come under instructions to ask the view of Japan on the prolongation of the anti-comintern pact, which lapsed on November 25. * He had told Bureau Chief SAKAMOTO that Germany wanted a joint protocol to be signed by the original and later signatory powers. In case Japan agreed with this, Germany wanted a joint proposal from Japan, Germany and Italy to be made to Manchukuo, Spain and Hungary.
- 38066

TOGO stated that he had heard of the suggestion. He had been taking part in connection with this pact since its conclusion, and personally had a serious concern with it. As it was one of the fundamental

Page

38066 national policies of Japan to prevent propagation of communism, he did not wish the pact to terminate but desired to prolong it. He favored abolition of the secret agreement. Since a resolution of the cabinet was required before they decided Japan's views would be communicated after a cabinet decision. It had to be referred to the Privy Council for deliberation, and for this purpose, some document drawn up jointly 38067 by * Japan, Germany and Italy was needed. He asked for a draft.

Ott said since there was little time before November 27, he wanted to know Japan's decisions as soon as possible.

TOGO said that he agreed that the US attitude was not only extremely questionable legally, but also in fact German-American relations had become acute and crises had greatly increased. He thought Germany very wise in taking an attitude till the end of September of never being taken in by Roosevelt's provocation. He wanted to know if Germany still held the same attitude.

Ott said from the fact that Hitler had been so tolerant with US actions and in his speech in October he did not refer to the US, he judged that Hitler had to do his best to avert actual conflict with the 38068 US. It was hard to say if Hitler could maintain * this patient attitude when US transports penetrate war areas. He believed Germany thought that whoever came into war areas should take its own responsibility for the result. Whether Germany actually fought with the US or not, a Japanese warning to the US might prevent the US from taking more hostile action against Germany and might result in prevention of war. The US feared operations on 2 fronts and Japan's attitude should influence Roosevelt.

TOGO stated that the fundamental reason which made a Japanese warning effective to check US actions was the existence of the navy by which they were restraining the US and preventing Roosevelt from achieving his big movements on the Atlantic and from participating in the war. He could presume that Germany fully understood this point, and appreciated 38069 it. As to relations between Japan, Germany and the US, * he would consider these points. When Ott asked if the mission of KURUSU was also resolute, TOGO replied not only the mission of KURUSU but also the attitude of Japan was firm. There was a limit to the concessions to be made, and TOGO could not assent to exceeding this limit. He could not tell the details.

38070 *Exhibit 3836, telegram from TOGO to the ambassadors at Peiping, Nanking, Manchukuo and Special Envoys at Shanghai, Hongkong, Hanoi, Batavia, Thailand, San Francisco, November 12, 1941, stated that * they 38071 had been holding liaison conferences every day and had been discussing the principal national policies to meet the grave situation as well as the principal policies as to the adjustment of diplomatic relations with the US. These were decided at the Imperial council on the 5th.

38071. It was decided to continue the negotiations and the government had already opened them. There existed a considerable gap, and it was doubtful whether a conclusion could be reached. Although they were making a final effort, the situation did not permit any further concessions. It did not allow them to take an optimistic view, and Japan's situation was expected to take a sudden turn in the event of maladjustment of * the negotiations.
- 38072
- 38074 *Exhibit 3837, telegram from TOGO to the Ambassadors in Britain, US, Fanoi, Thailand, Soviet, Germany, Italy, Batavia and Australia, North China, Nanking, Shanghai and Hongkong, November 25, 1941, stated that NOMURA had made a new proposal to Hull and Roosevelt which was worked out after the new cabinet by revising part of the former one. Negotiations had been carried on since the beginning of the month between Roosevelt, Hull and NOMURA, and by KURUSU since the 17th. TOGO had been pressing upon the US and British ambassadors in Tokyo the necessity of the earliest solution, but the US was assuming the attitude of insisting upon requesting Japan to affirm its peaceful intentions and at the same time to affirmatively promise in advance concerning other fundamental problems, before clarifying her own answer * to the proposal. It still held fast to theoretical fundamentals and its attitude did not conform to the situation which was daily becoming more serious. On the 20th Japan presented its final proposal to ease the situation in the southwest Pacific and avoid an imminent crisis in the Pacific. The US seems to have consulted with Britain, Australia, Holland, China and other interested countries about it, and the answer was expected shortly. Judging from the US attitude until then, there was little probability the US would accept the final proposal. It was very difficult to save the situation and there existed danger that they would be confronted with the worst in the near future.

- 38086 *Exhibit 3569, newspaper article entitled "Make Manifest the Reality of National Total Warfare! Says Admiral SHIMADA upon Return", September 15, 1941, stated that SHIMADA returned to Tokyo on the 15th, and after reporting on the war situation to the Emperor and visiting the navy ministry, held a press interview. SHIMADA remarked that he had reported on the war situation. 1 year and 4 months had elapsed since he received * command on May 1, 1940 to serve as Commander of the China Area Fleet. During that time he had dealt a serious blow to the Chungking regime by further intensifying the blockade and air operations against it. All officers and men under his command were doing their utmost towards the attainment of the object of the holy war. The Chungking regime was practically on its last legs as the result of the close combined attack of the navy and army, and the steady development and strengthening of the Nanking government. The settlement of the Incident had been making steady progress. The confrontation between the 38087 Chiang supporting powers and Japan had come to assume serious propor-38088 tions suggestive of an aggravated tension inter- * nationally. To attain the final goal of the holy war, the determination to save this grave situation with a united national front and colossal efforts were required. The morale of the men of the China Area Fleet was very high and they were determined to annihilate the remnants of the foe.

38098 *Exhibits 3838, 3838A and 3838B were received in evidence but not 38099 read. *Exhibit 3838 showed on December 7, 1941, the US had 6 aircraft carriers while Japan had 10. Exhibit 3838B showing comparative strength 38100 in the pacific, showed Japan had 10 carrier, *US, 3. Exhibit 3838 showed the US had 15 battleships, 142 destroyers, 176 miscellaneous types. Exhibit 3838B showed the US had under construction 10 aircraft carriers, 18 light cruisers, 88 destroyers, 38 submarines, 349 miscellaneous.

38108 *Exhibits 3838C, 3838D, and 3838E were received in evidence but not read.

38110 *Exhibit 3839 was received to show that all 10 of Japan's aircraft carriers were used offensively.

38115 *Exhibit 3840, affidavit of Captain Edwin T. Leyton stated that witness YOSHIDA distinguished between a "konkyochi" and "kichi" but admitted the air bases were there. Almost every Japanese base, except the very major ones, were called kichi. Moreover the Japanese-English Dictionary of Sea Terms showed that the word "kichi" was defined as 38116 "base" and gave 10 examples of detailed use of the word, * with various kinds of bases. YOSHIDA intimated that the US navy used "available spot" to apply in some way to a kind of base. The US navy has never used the term for "base" whether temporary, advanced or permanent.

Documents 1 and 2 show that Wotje, Roi and Taroa were fortified well before Pearl Harbor. No. 3 confirmed that these 3 were well fortified with coastal defense guns, anti-aircraft, storage houses and other facilities, which by Japanese definition constituted a naval base. 1 and 2 show that the first Japanese move to bring large amounts of naval 38117 personnel, * materiel, engineers and ordnance experts to the Marshalls was actually observed in mid December 1940. YOSHIDA denied their existence until a decision made in November 1941. US intelligence indicated the movement in 1940 and was correct. YOSHIDA suffered from a year's lapse of memory. From information on hand at the time, he was positive that it all took place not on November 5, 1941, but probably November 5, 1940, as they picked up the indications of such a movement in December 1940.

Annex 1 showed that for many years Japan had effectively prevented observation of activities in the Mandate. It was known as a result of extensive hydrographic and meteorological surveys that considerable expansion and improvements had been completed in harbor development, "con-38117 mercial air facilities, communications and meteorological establish-38118 ments in the principal * islands. Since late 1940 Orange Naval and air operations in the are had increased and some 40 to 45 naval auxiliaries made continuous shuttle trips to the Mandates with personnel, material, equipment and supplies.

38119 Orange's decision to speed up militarization was reached concu-rently with signing of the tripartite pact, as movement of naval reserve auxiliaries to the Mandate became apparent thereafter. Since late 1940 this movement had progressively increased until in July 1941, there were 40 to 45 constantly engaged in round trips between the mainland and the Mandates. Analysis showed that * 65% of this shipping was destined for the East Carolines and Marshalls. During early 1941 evidence showed that an administrative organization had been set up for control and expansion of the military development. This mandate organ was taking the line parallel to but separate from the parent organ, Yokosuka administration chain. While Palao had been always the Mandate administrative center, the focus of supply, civil engineering and munitions was centered at Truk.

38120 *Annex 2 stated in October 30, 1941, that the principal change consisted of a further increase in number of fleet commands, arising from regrouping of aircraft carriers and plane tenders into separate forces, and from the creation of special task forces for the southward advance.
The regrouping had resulted in notable specialization within the various commands. Japan's navy included more vessels in active service than ever before. More merchant ships had been taken by the navy, and the line between merchant ship and naval auxiliary grew fainter. The base forces and guard divisions in the Mandate had greatly increased naval strength which was on full wartime footing.

38121 *Until the present the entire Mandate had been lightly garrisoned, the majority of the units being naval defense forces corresponding to US marine corps, but some army troops were believed to be on Saipan, Palao, Ponape, Truk and Jaluit. The total garrison force was 15000.
Civil engineering units were engaged on various islands. Working in conjunction with them were naval engineering units, ordnance specialists, yard units with civilian workers and technicians. The network of naval radio stations had been greatly expanded, meteorological stations and high frequency direction finders installed at strategic loc-38122 cations, aviation facilities increased in scope and number, and shore batteries placed on strategic islands of key atolls. * The naval movement began in December 1940 and had increased in scope and number until 70 odd vessels were engaged in this traffic. The average present in the Mandate at any one time was 40 odd vessels. In addition to the in-38123 stallations listed in Table A there were a number of potential bases, principally in the lagoons of the naturally protected atolls, which might be used as emergency bases or earmarked for priority 2 development. * Combined Fleet Top Secret Operation Order indicated there

38123 were bases on Saipan, Kwajalein, Wotje, Jaluit, Taroa, Truk, Ionape and Palau.

38124 Annex 3, Admiral Halsey's report, February 9, 1942, stated that enclosures provided details of the action of the Enterprise Air Group and squadron in the objective areas. * On Wotje the entire installation was apparently destroyed, including two hangars, fuel oil tanks, gasoline storage, warehouses, shops and barrack. Two AA batteries and all coastal defense guns were silenced or abandoned. On Taroa, two hangars were destroyed, several buildings fired in industrial area. Poth fuel tanks were ablaze. The radio station on Ollet was destroyed. On Roi two hangars were destroyed, the ammunition dump blown up and fuel fire left burning, radio building demolished. All store and warehouses were demolished by explosion from bombing. Both Roi and Taroa had complete 38125 air bases of recent construction. Wotje had also a new * installation. Pilots reported Taroa better equipped than Ford Island. AA batteries present on the islands had guns of 3", .50 and .30 caliber. Kwajalein was apparently used as a submarine base.

38128 *Exhibit 3841, Top Secret Communication No. 18 from 8th Submarine Squadron Commander to the navy ministry, July 30, 1944, stated that 38129 from the last month on, the squadron stayed at Penang base as the southwest Area Submarine Squadron. With the submarines * the squadron prevented enemy reinforcement for counter-attack from Indian Ocean and crushed its tactical attempt to attack vessels, cooperated with and supported the army in preventing reinforcement towards the India-Burma border, cooperated in transporting spies and men on special missions to feel out the situation in India, reconnoitered and ravaged transportation routes from Australia and the east coast of Africa to Aden Bay, Arabian coast, India and the Bay of Bengal, greatly contributed to judgment of enemy's conditions in the western area by carrying out reconnaissance and patrol on all strategic points under joint operations with No group.

38130 *Part of the submarines were sent to the Atlantic and European waters on special duty to engage in joint operation for a long period to keep liaison with Germany. Sub "I" No. 8 having accomplished on December 20 the special duty returned from Europe. It was operating in his area. The German submarines hastily sent for joint submarine operations in the Indian Ocean gave sufficient cooperation in liaison as well as in preparation, such as maintenance and supply. German submarines were able to show efficiency in the joint operation, resulting in the 38131 success of the strategic * plan for the destruction of transportation in the Indian Ocean. Material battle results during this period show there were sunk, merchant ships 20 of 190,000 tons, and sailing vessels 8 of 1,200 tons. There was damaged one large merchant ship. 9 enemy crew, besides an English Captain, were taken as prisoners.

Direct Examination of NAKAMARA, Jiro
by Captain Robinson

38132 *The witness identified Exhibit 3842 as his affidavit and verified 38136 it. *The affidavit stated that the witness was born in Hawaii and came to Japan in 1938. The Naval Staff in November 1942 called him to work as a civilian radio monitor at the naval foreign broadcast listening post.
In February 1943 he was ordered to Truk. He returned to Japan in Octo-38137 ber 1943, and * worked at the listening post in naval hqs until February 1944. In February, Cmdr ARIIZUMI of the submarine I-8 asked for a civilian radio monitor and the witness was assigned to that duty on written order of the Vice C/S. They left Japan in February and headed for Penang. They stayed there for a week and then went to the Indian Ocean on a patrol south of Ceylon from March to May 1944.

In March, the I-8 sank the Dutch ship Tjisalak. About a half hour after the torpedoes hit, the submarine surfaced. ARIIZUMI ordered the witness to call by megaphone to the lifeboats to come to the submarine.
He was told to tell those in lifeboats to board the sub one by one, go to the foredeck and sit there, and that they would be shot if they looked back. As they boarded, they were stripped of life-belts, watches and all possessions except clothes. There were about 100, passengers and crew. The captain, radio man, engineer, about 4 other and a woman 38138 *were taken below. As they boarded their hands were tied behind their backs. After most had been seated on the forward deck, 4 of the crew brought the POWs back, 1 by 1, and they were killed. On learning this the witness went below to the officer's mess. He was told by the Senior Officer to tell the POWs that they would be shot if they looked back. He did not actually witness the killings, but according to the crew, survivors were clubbed, slashed with swords and shot to death.
This continued for 1 hour. The Senior officer told him to stay on the foredeck and to tell the POWs to face front otherwise they would be shot.

He had returned to the mess when the sub submerged. ARIIZUMI ordered him to act as interpreter in questioning the POWs below. He first questioned the woman who was then taken to the forward crew's quarters. About an hour later he went to that room and asked the woman if there was anything she wanted. * She told him she was in Japan for 38139 some time before the war, was an American Red Cross worker and was on her way to Bombay. While they talked the senior officer and 4 sailors came in with 2 rifles. The senior officer said in Japanese she would have to be shot. He did not tell her but she knew. It was night. The sailors took the POWs up on deck and shot them. Some of the crew afterwards told him that they were shot. She told him she knew what was going to happen. The senior officer asked her if she wanted to be blindfolded and her hands tied but she didn't. He did not remember whether they completed the interrogations of the men POWs before the woman was 38139 executed. The master of the ship told ARIIZUMI it was contrary to Inter-38140 national law to have his hands tied. When the witness * interpreted to ARIIZUMI, he said this was war. The master asked ARIIZUMI to be kind and lenient with the crew. After they finished interrogating him, they took him to the forward crew's quarters.

When ARIIZUMI finished interrogating him, the radio officer was interrogated by the sub communications officer. Then the engineering officer was interrogated by the 1st officer. He never saw any of the POWS after he left the forward crew's quarters. He heard ARIIZUMI tell MONDA and the medical officer and another on the day after the sinking that the navy staff had ordered all survivors of sunken ships killed. MONDA passed this order to the crew. All obeyed orders from ARIIZUMI because they knew he was ruthless. His nickname among the crew was gyangu, gang-38141 *naval hqs had issued an order that everyone on enemy vessels was to be slain. He also told them not to tell anybody about the slaying of POWS.

38142 *When the first patrol was finished they came back to Penang. The witness told ARIIZUMI he couldn't go on another trip because he was ill and had to wear a cast. ARIIZUMI told him if he didn't go, he would be courtmartialed. He knew this was false.

They left Penang after 3 weeks making repairs. The second patrol
In July the I-8 sunk the SS Nicolet. It was exactly the same story as 3 months earlier. As soon as the sub fired, it surfaced. On orders of ARIIZUMI the witness called for the survivors to come aboard. Again they were stripped of all belongings except clothes, bound and sent forward under guard to sit on the foredeck. There were about 80 survivors who came aboard. After the master and others had been taken be-38143 low the rest, according to the crew, were brought * back 1 by 1 and shot, bayoneted, clubbed or slashed with swords. The master, radio man, engineer, a state department man and maybe others were interrogated. The master was questioned by ARIIZUMI, the radio man by the communication officer and the engineer by the sub engineer. He heard that all POWS were executed, except the master and the state department man.
The only POW he later saw leaving the sub was the state department man.
He was thin and had a beard. He asked for a razor but the captain told the witness he could not give him one, but a petty officer gave it to him. The witness told the state department man he would get along better if he would cooperate more with personnel. This was while they were anchored at Penang. They brought him back to Japan and the witness later 38144 saw him at Yokosuka. He did not see any of the executions but * was told by others that some of the POWS were beheaded and that ARIIZUMI did some himself. He saw the engine room divisional officer wiping blood off his sword after the executions. Since he was a civilian and a nisei, he was not trusted by many of the crew and they did not tell him everything.

38145 He returned to Japan on the I-8 in September 1944 and resumed his work at the naval staff, where he worked until August 1945. Soon after he reported to the staff he was told by the Chief of 3rd section not to relate his experience overseas. He later heard that ARIIZUMI killed himself in August 1945. ARIIZUMI was promoted to captain in October 1944. He had never been questioned at the naval staff, or elsewhere by naval or foreign office personnel in regard to the events described. He never *heard that any member of the crew was questioned by Japanese personnel. He was first interrogated by Lt. W. Salter, Legal Section, GHQ, SCAP on June 13, 1947 and at later dates by Thomas C. Fisher of that section.

Cross-examination by Mr. Brannon

38146 He was sure about 200 were killed on both ship. This was not exact but it was a rough estimate. He did not personally see * any of them killed. He wasn't trusted by the Jap member of the crew because he was a nisei. Some of them told him what went on but they didn't tell him everything. When asked whether it wasn't possible that these people were not all killed, he said he saw only one POW brought back to

38148 heard the commander tell some other officers and him that there were such orders. When asked why he was told to tell about the killings (not) if it was in compliance with orders, he said it might have been that it might be troublesome. He was a civilian at the time and didn't

38149 know about that because he wasn't an officer. * When he went back to Tokyo he did not relate his experience or activities to any of the officers. He did not know whether ARIIZUMI reported the killings. As far as he knew, no one reported these acts to anyone in Tokyo. When asked why he made point of the fact that he was never questioned by the navy staff regarding the events, he said they went to Truk once, and when he came back, the Chief of the 3rd section told him not to relate his experience. He didn't think the instruction was given to prevent revealing the commission of atrocities. Some of the people on the 38150 Dutch ship spoke English. * They were the master and the radio man. He didn't remember how long the submarine stayed surfaced during the Dutch ship incident. It may have been 1 or 2 hours but he was not sure.

38153 *Exhibit 3843, letter from POW Information Bureau to C/S 13th army, April 10, 1942, stated that although permission had been asked by the Swiss Consul-general in Shanghai and the Red Cross to inspect Shanghai POW camps and report on its condition to the nations concerned after

- 38153 personal talks with POWS, in view of the fact that preparation and equipment of the camp had not been completed then so soon after the fighting, they had kept it postponed until then. It was presumed that they had completed arrangements in accordance with international provisions intended to permit the tour of * inspection of the Shanghai camp in the near future.
- 38154
- 38155 *Exhibit 3843A, reply to the previous exhibit, April 13, 1942, stated that as to the inspection by the Swiss Consul in Shanghai and the RedCross, it should be postponed for a while because the arrangement of the camps, such as dispensary, sick room, kitchen, bath were not completed, and also a part of the POW room was being renovated. Besides, the present mental attitude of the POWS was not reasonable.
- 38156 Exhibit 3843B, reply from Pow Information Bureau to C/S 13th army, *April 16, 1942, stated that the various installations of the Shanghai POW camp should be improved quickly as possible so that there might be no trouble at the inspection by the foreigners. When they considered the proper time for inspection had arrived, they were to let him know immediately. The inspection of the Hongkong POW camp by the Red Cross was to be permitted in early May.
- 38165 *Exhibit 3844, affidavit of Cecil Raymond Farley, stated that 38167 *another incident happened about November 15 1943 when a Red Cross representative visited Jinsen Camp. They had some knowledge of the proposed visit from information gained from various sources and also from the hasty effort to make the camp look a little more presentable than usual. The representative arrived and was shown around the camp. The commandant called Major Polohan, Capt. MacGillivray and WC Clapp * to interview the representative in the Jap lines. These officers had a long list of complaints which they intended to place before the Red Cross if possible but after being taken to the interview they were prevented by those in charge from saying anything more than a few words. The interview closed very abruptly. While the interview lasted they were able to impress upon the representative their poor condition. 2 days later the 3 were summoned to appear before commandant OKAZAKI. He charged them with making untrue statements and then sentenced the major to solitary for 10 days and the others for 2.

- 38174 *Exhibit 3845, Matter relating to Establishment of an office for enemy nationals residing in Japan, November 14, 1942, stated that the foreign ministry found it necessary to ensure the protection of Japanese interned in enemy countries and to make the world aware of Japan's moral principles by treating enemy nationals fair and justly. Since the treatment of Japanese interned in enemy countries and the treatment accorded enemy nationals by Japan had an inseparable relationship, it was necessary that matters relating to it, be unified and dealt with in a comprehensive manner. It was requested that * a new office be established under the Vice minister compose mainly of repatriated dip-

- 38175 diplomats to deal with the matter. They are to look after matters relating to enemy nationals who are internees, pows or interned in concentration camps under Japan's jurisdiction; look after business related to the treatment and appointment of and calls on the nation representing their interests and the delegation of the Red Cross, communications of enemy nationals, including replying to proposals from enemy countries and other sources. In dealing with this business, they should handle negotiations with and guidance * of the protecting power, Red Cross, or Vatican, and to give guidance to relief bodies at home and abroad. The foreign ministry had SUZUKI as chief arrange to have several diplomats and consulate members who had returned to Japan from enemy countries, engage in duties regarding investigations and improvement of the conditions of Japanese held as internees, concentration camp internees or POWs in enemy countries; business relative to FCWS, internees or enemy nationals now in concentration camps within Japan's influence. Business
- 38176 would be handled pertaining to the * treatment of enemy nationals, the visit by representatives of protecting powers or the Red Cross, shipments from enemy countries of relief supplies and remittance of money, inquiry and information of status of persons affected. This business included dealing with protests or other representations submitted by enemies and others.
- 38177
- 38181 *Exhibit 3846, excerpt from interrogation of MASHIMOTO, Kingoro, stated that MASHIMOTO believed these orders were issued 2 days before the fall of Nanking, about December 10, 1937. They were received about 0200 when he was about 5 or 6 kms from Wuhu. He returned to Wuhu and prepared his guns. The next morning the river was heavily fog bound and when the fog lifted about 1000 he noticed 4 ships, 3 of which were gray and 1 white. He immediately started shelling and the 3 gray ships fled. The white ship came forward and turned out to be the Ladybird. The other 3 were Chinese ships landing troops on the shore.
- 38184 *Exhibit 3847, telegram from Hencke, German Armistice Commissioner, August 8, 1940, stated that General Huntziger made an oral report to General von Stuelpnagel on August 7. He said on August 1 or 2 Japan sent a note to the Governor-general of FIC demanding that France grant Japanese in Tongking all requisite facilities for waging war against China. The Japanese wished to have the Paiphong-Yunnan Railway placed
- 38185 at their disposal for troop transport to southwest China * to be able to carry out shutting off of Chungking from the southwest. The demand was in ultimative form but without time limit. In case of rejection Japan reserved further measures. Vichy on August 3 ordered the governor to reply that the demand meant a violation of French sovereignty. Vichy had given no grounds for this, since it had already stopped the arms traffic through Tonking some 8 or 9 months earlier. Vichy could in no case meet the demand in this form. Eventual concessions could only be made on the basis of free agreement. The sovereignty of the French colonial empire must in no manner be infringed.

- 38185 Muntzinger stated that Vichy had informed the US of these events. He further requested that Germany communicated the French point of view to Japan, since neither Vichy nor the Japanese embassy had an unobjectionable connection to Tokyo. Vichy felt that on the basis of the armistice Germany must have an interest in having * no new warlike complications in the French colonial empire. They would be unavoidable in case of a Japanese move by force against Tonking. Muntzinger remarked that it must surely be in general European interest to prevent a further push-back of the influence of the white race in East Asia. No position was taken by Stuelpnagel. He promised to transmit them to Germany.
- 38186
- 38188 *Exhibit 3848, telegram from Rintelin, February 23, 1941, stated that Ribbentrop requested them to get in touch with de Brinon or Darlan
- 38189 and to transmit that Japan had communicated to Germany * its offer of mediation in the conflict between Thailand and FIC with the request to use its influence with Vichy to accept. Germany pointed out the dangers threatening France in the event of the non-renewal of the armistice expiring February 25. He considered it as being in the French interest to accept the offer of mediation.

January 26, 1948.

- 38193 *Exhibit 3849, telegram from Dr. Schwarzmann in Paris, March 1, 1941 stated that de Brinon delivered at 1800 a communication received from Darlan concerning the Japanese offer of mediation in the FIC dispute, with a request to appeal * to the influence Germany had in Tokyo
- 38194 so that the slight alleviations which Vichy asked might not be denied. The communication stated that Vichy did not find itself in a position to accept the offer of mediation delivered on February 25 by Japan as go-between in the conflict with Thailand. MATSUOKA had taken up a new attitude by appearing no longer as go-between but as an arbitrator. He had given his claim the character of a formal demand and had added that in case of refusal Japan would abandon mediation and depart from the position laid down in the agreement of August 30 to guarantee the settling of the affair by other means. Since France could not withstand this threat, nothing remained but to yield to the peremptory demands presented. Appropriate instructions were transmitted to the ambassador
- 38195 in Tokyo. * Japan's offer had accordingly been accepted as a whole.
- 38196 Exhibit 3850, teletype from Rintelen to the Minister Bureau, Berlin, March 2, 1941, * stated that Ribbentrop had directed that the French request contained in the telegram not be acceded to. In view of the new state of affairs OSFIMA should be informed by Stahmer that Ribbentrop did not intend to support the French request, but intended to leave the position to be taken entirely with Japan.

*Exhibit 3851A, The Assizes of the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the USSR stated that in 1935 the white guards Kobylkin and Pereladov, secretly penetrated into the Soviet thru Manchuria to carry out espionage, sabotage and terrorist acts. They were apprehended in East Siberia, having arms, incendiary cartridges and counter-revolutionary literature. At the end of May 1935, Oleinikov was apprehended in the Zabaikalye while crossing the frontier. He had secretly penetrated into Soviet with two others, M. Oleinikov and Kustov who * were shot when attacking a border post. Revolvers, poisons, and counter-revolutionary litterer were found on them and on Oleinikov.

38230

It was established by documents and confessions that Kobylkin and Pereladov who were a white guard colonel and sub-lieutenant, living in North Manchuria since 1922, and being members of various whiteguard counter-revolutionary organizations took an active part in preparing an armed attack on the Soviet to overthrow soviet power, and restore capitalism with foreign help. Kobylkin also received and obeyed instructions of the secret service of a certain foreign power. He helped and personally organized the smuggling of armed bands, weapons and individual agents from * Manchuria to the Soviet to carry out espionage, sabotage etc. While he was a police supervisor at Djalainor, 5 armed bands were smuggled from Manchuria to the Soviet. In January 1935, Kobylkin, following instructions of a certain military mission in Kharbin, with the knowledge of that power, smuggled to the Soviet Pereladov to carry out espionage etc. Following his instructions, he with the help of the head of the military mission crossed the frontier with weapons in March 1935, but was held up. There were on him 3 pistols, a large quantity of literature and incendiary cartridges.

38231

In organizing the transfer of * secret agents of a certain power and of representatives of counter-revolution, and in transporting weapons and receiving information, Kobylkin was assisted by V. Oleinikov, who since 1933 maintained thru General Shilnikov close contact with the military mission. When Shilnikov died in 1934 the direction of whiteguard activities of the Russian General Military Union passed to Kobylkin and Oleinikov received his instructions from Kobylkin and from the secretary of the military mission in Kharbin and from the heads of the missions in Manchuria and Hailar. With the help of Oleinikov, who had smuggled in Pereladov, Kustov, M. Oleinikov and Kobylkin, the latter transferred to Soviet 12 pistols with a large supply of rounds for terrorism, 10 incendiary cartridges * for sabotage, a camera with film for espionage and strychnine and atropine for terrorism. Kobylkin got all these things from official representative of the military mission of a certain power in Kharbin and Manchuria directly or thru the head of the editorial office of a certain paper. The same persons gave him money for carrying on sabotage work,

- 38233 *The witness identified Exhibit 3852 as his affidavit and verified 38238 it. * The affidavit stated that from April 1924 to April 1925, the witness served in the 4th division, 2nd section, General staff. In April 1925 he was transferred to the Kwantung Army on the recommendation of 38239 his chief to aid in * collecting material at the Harbin Intelligence office on the military topography of North Manchuria and the Soviet.
At the same time he was to investigate drawing up an anti-Soviet subversive plan. He was in the Harbin Intelligence from April 1925 to December 1927 and studied the problems of strategic activity against the Soviet. He wrote a report on the study of methods of strategy against Russia at the end of 1927. He sent the report to Col. KAWAMOTO, incharge of intelligence, Kwantung Army. The full text of the same document was sent direct to KASAHARA, Chief Russian Department, 2nd section, General staff, who handled Russian problems. He wished to inform the Kwantung army and the staff of all the problems stated in it. He hereby affirmed that the document entitled Research Materials for a Strategic 38240 *Plan Toward Russia presented to him was a photographic copy of the whole text of the secret document drawn up in 1927 and sent to KAWAMOTO and to KASAHARA.

- The document presented the outline of a strategic plan towards Russia, summary of an espionage plan to be carried out in Siberia and points east, agencies to be established to carry out the plan, that part of the plan relating to means of communications in North China, that part of the plan on the collection of resources in North China, a collection of reference materials, and an appendix on peace-time establishments necessary in the Far East for the plan covering Russia. * He identified 38241 Exhibit 698 as his report.

- 38250 *Exhibit 3651, Memorandum on the basic principles of the purchase 38251 of the Chinese Eastern Railway by Manchoukuo * submitted by the Soviet delegation July 3, 1933, stated that in defining the purchase price of the railway, they should adhere to the Mukden Agreement that the contracting parties would define the real value and that that the railway should be purchased at a fair price. In conformity with this, taking into consideration the basic articles of the balance precisely establishing the real expenditures, the Soviet being guided by the principle of justice carefully considered all circumstances enabling it to considerably cut down the price. The sum for the construction and for the completion of work undone, for acquisition of rolling stock, losses in 38252 course of use of capital for construction and for payment of * interest as well as improvement amounted to 411, 691,976 roubles. This did not include 178,579,610 roubles lent by the Tsar to the railway to make up deficits and to maintain it during its first years. The great indebtedness of the railway to the soviet due to interest on capital invested had

38252 likewise not been taken into consideration. Taking into consideration the wear of technical equipment and changes in economic importance of the railway from new railways, and trying to cut down the price, the Soviet agreed to reduce the purchase price to 210 million roubles. This 38253 sum did not include the cost of various properties of great * economic importance and the original cost of which had considerably increased.

It was common knowledge that the railway owned much land. In conformity with the Peiping and Mukden agreements the Soviet agreed to transfer the land not needed by the railway to China. In 1925, the joint Soviet-Chinese commission for the delimitation of land was established. The Mukden authorities evaded convoking the commission, preferring to unlawfully seize the land piecemeal. The Soviet agreed to estimate all this property as amounting only to 40 million roubles. The total purchase price of the railways and all its property was fixed at 250 million 38254 *roubles.

38272 Exhibit 3853, excerpts from the Great Manchurian Empire stated that in connection with events of July 7, 4th year, central hqs of the Concordia Society sent to all provincial and district hqs instructions as to rousing national spirit in masses of the people, propagation of economy, unselfish service, renovation of life. These were strictly carried out in conformity with local conditions and contributed to quieting the people and to conducting general mobilization of spirit. One of the measures was having on the 1st of each month a day of service devoted to Greater Asia for which purpose all members of Concordia assembled in shrines. All provincial and district hqs conducted organizational meetings * at which were explained the reasons for the China

38273 Incident.

In 1938 the Society headed the movement for collecting donations for building aircraft for military purposes. Manchukuo, on the initiative of the Society, sent to friendly countries official missions for strengthening friendship and economic relations and to establish a common powerful anti-communist bloc. At the end of August the society had 123 districts, 3000 branches and 1,000,000 active members.

38274 Japan and Manchukuo joined forces and came * forward to protect the frontiers of the state at Nomonhan. The society from the beginning took an active part and established close relations with the government and its local organs. The society took measures to maintain peace in the country, to fight and prevent provocation and sabotage, and was especially active in the field of mobilization of the spirit, mainly in Hailar close to the scene. A special committee was formed by Hailar authorities. The society undertook propaganda and information activity. Volunteer detachments were organized by the society, which were of great help in defense, in consolidating the rear and in assisting the army.

The enlarged society consisted of 3,569 branches with 2,050,000 members. On December 8, 1941, the Holy War for East Asia broke out.

38275

Following the rescript * of Japan, the Emperor promulgated a rescript in support of Japan's righteous cause. Director TAKEBE issued a declaration that the people must render every possible spiritual and physical help to Japan which consisted of strengthening spirit, inseparable ties with Japan, strengthening joint defense, helping with resources, personnel, manpower, materials and products, a unified effort of sacrificial work of all, keeping secrecy, suppressing rumors and provocations, economizing staple products and control of supply. The statement supporting the government was issued by the society * the same day.

38276

In 1942 the carrying out of defensive maneuvers and strengthening of defense were the principal items of the society activities. To strengthen the ties with the administration, the governors were appointed chiefs of provincial hqs of the society. The vice-governors were appointed deputy chiefs. Similar measures were had in districts and towns. The part played by chiefs of administrative bodies became more important. It increased their responsibility for the work of the society. It was necessary for them to do their work actively and be guided by the spirit of the society. * The chief of the society and UEDA of the Kwantung army repeatedly instructed new governors. It was pointed out in UEDA's directive that the society set itself the task of being a leading organ in carrying out state policy. Besides, the society considered it its duty to maintain order in the country while it carried out state policy.

38277

On July 25, 1936 in Maining a review and ceremony were held * for the creation of central hqs of the society. Members of all branches, representatives of the army, and government, more than 30,000 people participated. UEDA and ITAGAKI, Admiral HANADA, the premier, Marshal Chang, MATSUOKA took the review.

38279

At present youth along with adults must overcome all obstacles confronting the nation and other East Asia nations. * Bringing the war with the Anglo-Saxons to a victorious end and the creation of mutual co-prosperity require all strength be concentrated in the cause. The government conducted a policy to solve these vital problems. It was trying to increase agriculture and the extraction of natural resources by developing local industry and to strengthen the northern defense. They decided to introduce general labor conscription throughout the emergency. TANABE in his report at the Congress of the society pointed out that in the government's opinion the successful solution of the 3 tasks must be based on sacrificial work for the state of all young required to work under labor conscription.

*A conference of military, government and the society was held on April 23, 1938 to establish mobilization organizations which were to include youths and adults. A plan was fully worked out for the creation of Public Volunteer Detachments. On July 14, 1938, the state issued an 38280 order on the formation of detachments under which they were connected with the youth movement of the society and included in the general plan of education of the people. At a conference of the government and society December 26, 1940, it was decided that the preparatory period was over and the Volunteer Detachments could become a basic defense organization. The best age for rank and file * was 20 to 40. This completed the plan for general mobilization.

Since 1932 numbers of Russian emigrant organizations cropped up everywhere there were Russians, especially in Kharbin. Manchukuo issued a decree December 28, 1935, creating a special organ for these, called the Russian Emigrant Bureau in the Manchurian Empire. It had the task of contributing to strengthening of the material and legal status of Russian emigrants, relations with the authorities of the Empire with regard to emigrants, rendering assistance to competent authorities * on emigrants. The Chief Russian Emigrant Bureau contributed to the cause of building the empire and realized the idea of cooperation of all nations inhabiting the country. The outward expression of the aims of the emigrants was in close connection with the society. The Chief of the special department of the society was concurrently advisor of the chief bureau. The president of the bureau was a direction of the society. The bureau worked in close contact with the society. The attitude of YAMAGITA, Chief of the Japanese Military Mission in Kharbin, * was especially valuable for the bureau and for the emigrants since he had shown himself a real friend and patron of the emigrants.

by General Vasiliev.

38285 *The witness identified exhibit 3854 as his affidavit and verified
38290 it. * The affidavit stated that from 1937 to 1942 the witness was at the Maritime border of the Far Eastern Region as commander of the 59th Khassan border guard detachment, which guarded 236 km of land border facing west and 400 km of sea boarder facing east. The land border started in the north from border mark P 2 kms southwest of point Shufang and ran south to the Sea of Japan, ending at Chikashimi. The sea sector started north at Peschanaya Bay and ran south to Chikashimi. The 59th detachment comprised outposts Podgornaya and Pakshikori which had direct responsibility to guard the sector west of Lake Khassan. Lt. Col. Tereshkin and Majors Patarshin and Chernopyatko were his subordinates when the events in the are occurred.

38291 The eastern slopes of Zaozernaya * and Bezymyannaya hills had always been guarded by soviet border guards. Before July 1938, there were no Japanese border guards on the western slopes of Zaozernaya. He knew this sector, going there often and attaching great importance to it since there the 3 borders of the Soviet, Manchuria and Korea met.

38292 Early in July 1938, Japan started massing infantry and artillery in the Zaozernaya area. The troops kept arriving at Khamoku and Digasheli. Prior to July 29 there were no armed clashes in the hill area. There was no clash on July 11, 1938. On July 15, Japanese gendarmes violated the border and MATSUSHIMA was killed. That day, commander of outpost Podgornaya Tereshkin reported * by phone that Japanese soldiers had crossed the border on Zaozernaya. The patrol there spotted the trespassers, who, on challenge, started to run back to their territory. One of the men was shot and killed. A pistol with 8 cartridges, a camera, a notebook with results of the observation and a visiting card of MATSUSHIMA were taken from the body. The witness conducted a detailed investigation. An examination of footprints of Japanese soldiers at the spot of trespass was made. The film was developed. The examination of the footprints showed 5 persons had come into Soviet territory and only 4 went back. The film showed 6 pictures, part of which were pictures of Soviet territory, particularly Zaozernaya.

Soon after the Japanese sent 2 Chinese disguised as * truce bearers to outpost sector Krainov. They held poles with white flags, and had an envelope addressed to the commander of the detachment. They were detained. The envelope contained a Japanese letter and was a demand to withdraw Russian guards from the sector west of Lake Khassan. It was addressed to the commander at Kraskino from the commander of the Japanese Hanchun detachment. 5 days later a white flag and letter in Korean were found on the ground near Novoya-Derevnya, about 100-150 m from the border. Its text corresponded to the text of Exhibit 753. It was anonymous, undated and bore no signature. The Soviet then began to prepare against an attack in the area.

38294

On July 26, the witness with a group of officers went to Zaozernaya to * to observe. From the 26 or 27th he personally saw Japanese troops crossing on boats to the east bank of the Tunen-Ula River and massing west of Zaozernaya. It was estimated from observation that more than 3800 had crossed in 3 days during daylight. They were unable to see what the Japanese were doing, as they hid behind natural rises. The Soviets tried to avoid giving even the smallest cause for dispute. No fortifications were erected by the Soviets on the west slopes of Zaozernaya. On the hill, there was only an observation post and there was no red flag. They secretly watched the Japanese.

38295

On July 29 at 1600 from Zaozernaya he heard machine gun, rifle and mortar fire and grenade explosions near Bezymyanaya. It was reported that a Japanese unit, company size, had deployed in 2 groups and launched an attack on Bezymyanaya, where there was a patrol of 11 under Makhalin. At first, the witness could not personally observe * because although the distance was not more than 1-1½ km, a fog considerably reduced visibility. After the fog had partly lifted, he saw a platoon of Japanese infantry which had crossed to Soviet territory between the 2 hills. He 38295 He ordered Ratnikov with a group of guards, including Batarshin, to support Makhalin from the south. At the same time he ordered Bykhovtsev, commander of the Pakshikori outpost to alert his outposts and use his entire personnel in support from the north. He then sent a message to the regular army since he felt, knowing the Japanese strength, his own forces would not be able to hold out. As a result, 5 guards including Makhalin were killed and 6 wounded. * Due to the support given the Japs were repulsed and the Soviet unit consolidated.

Page

38296

Crossing and concentration of Jap troops on the east bank of the Tumen went on on July 30. On the night of July 30-31, the Japs launched a vigorous attack on the hills with artillery support, bringing into action the whole 19th Infantry Division. By that time field troop reinforcement was only reaching the field and the hills were defended only by guard outfits which had been somewhat reinforced by reserves. There were 92 on the 2 hills including 60 on Zaozernaya.

38297 On July 31 at 0625 the Japs occupied the hills. Almost the whole guard garrison fell on the battlefield. Tereshkin was wounded. Later Soviet troops arrived and subsequent operations were conducted by the regular army. * In 10 days fighting the regulars wiped out the 19th Infantry and repelled the Japs from Soviet territory. The remnants of the Jap troops withdrew to the far bank of the Tumen. While on Zaozernaya, the witness commanded his unit from the outbreak. None of his guards ever crossed the border. The Japs were the first to start the attack with the slightest provocation. After the defeat of the 19th Infantry, the Japs made no claims as to Soviet withdrawal from Zaozernaya.

January 27, 1948

38299 *The border was restored and was now being guarded as it was prior to hostilities. It ran as provided by the Munchun Protocol of 1886 along the watershed, along the hill tops which form a mountain range

38300 on the west bank of Lake Khassan. The east slope of * Zaozernaya belonged to the Soviet while the west was Manchurian. To determine the border on the terrain was no problem and the Soviet guards knew precisely where it ran. Both before and after fighting the border was in full conformity with the data on the map attached to the Munchun Protocol.

38302 *On being shown Exhibit 2642B, he stated that this sketch map was drawn up in a very premature way and didn't correspond to elementary rules of topography. It didn't correspond to the actual state of affairs because prior to July 28 there were no clashes, and prior to * the morning

38303 of July 31 there were no clashes on Zaozernaya. The clash shown on the map for July 11 didn't correspond to actual occurrences.

No fortifications were erected on Zaozernaya because it was categorically forbidden by the Chief of the Border Guard Corps and would have shown contempt to the neighboring state. The trenches shown west of the border didn't correspond to the actual state of affairs because the Soviet guards never crossed the border. Such action would have violated the sovereignty of the neighboring state, which they always respected. The tank shown east of the hill was a pure invention because before July 31 there were no tanks within 60-70 km. Any man with elementary knowledge of military questions, who could read a map, would * conclude that a tank couldn't approach the place because the east slope of Zaozernaya was very steep, more than 45 degrees and was not accessible to tanks.

* The border guard post was established on Zaozernaya from the time the Border Guard Corps was established. According to the instruction of the Chief of the Corps the border was guarded by border guard troops constantly, day and night, the whole length of the border. Each meter was constantly guarded. In 1937 when he took over the sector guarded by the 59th detachment, he was on Zaozernaya and personally saw the guard posts and inspected how well they knew their task.

*The witness stated that during the battle of July 31, 92 guards, 1 infantry company and 1 tank platoon of the Soviet armed forces were under his command. Between July 1 to 31 the number of guards increased. The increase was considerable. Usually, the patrols consisted of 3, 5, or 10 men. The increase took place from July 29, from the beginning of hostilities on Bezymyanaya * They increased gradually in accord with the situation. At first they had only OP's 3 men on Zaozernaya, and then gradually the number was increased. * As to the strength of the border guards on the entire sector, he was unable to testify because it was a matter of state security. Prior to July 1 this section was guarded in a normal way by the usual posts consisting of 3-5 men. From July 1, when the Japs began to cross the Tumen, the garrison was increased gradually depending on circumstances. * He could not state the details but on July 30 there were 92 guards. On July 30 to 31, 92 border guards 1 infantry company and 1 tank platoon participated in battle. Guards increased from 3 to 92 from July 1 to 31.

38308

38311

38312

38313

When he referred to Zaozernaya, he included the entire sector starting from Bezymyanaya, Zaozernaya and then further to the south where fighting broke out on the morning of July 31. The rifle company arrived on the night of July 30-31, *at 2400 or 0030 from the field troops from the direction of Zarechie about 10 or 12 km away. They might have come from Novo-Kievskoye but he didn't know. The actual point at which they came under his command was Zarechie, which was 10 or 12 km from the hostilities. * They hadn't been stationed there before. When he called 38314 for them they were stationed at Zarechie. The tank platoon came under his command at the same time. There was 3 tanks. There was only the 38315 tank platoon on July 31. Tank forces * appeared later on August 6. They took up their initial position near Hill 68.8 northeast of Bezymyannaya. They went into action at dawn that morning, but only 1 tank participated because 2 couldn't cross the bog. They did not cross the border. The tank was not in the area of Zaozernaya but northeast of Bezymyannaya, 38316 * at all times. There was no steep slope there. It was quite accessible for tanks.

38314

The Podgornaya outpost was under his command. The distance between there and Bezymyannaya was 4 to 5 km. This outpost was stationed at its 38317 billet at the uninhabited point called Podgornaya. *This outpost was a regular military unit billeted near Podgornaya. There was a guard patrol 38318 on Zaozernaya but these were 2 different territories. *There were no hqs on Zaozernaya and no shelter. Podgornaya was regular military unit billeted 150 m from Podgornaya 4 1/4 km from Zaozernaya, which sent out a patrol. The border patrol was not a guard outpost. It was just a border 38319 guard patrol. *Bezymyanaya was somewhat to the east of the border. The western slopes did not go down into Manchukuo. The entire hill was on the Soviet side.

38320 *On the killed Jap gendarme they found a notebook, a camera, a pistol and 8 cartridges. His notebook contained the results of his observations. The witness was unable to outline it accurately in detail then, but the observations set down referred to a sector of the area. From the developed film pictures of Zaozernaya east slopes, Bezymyannaya, Lake 38321 Khassan and other parts of the terrain showed up. * MATSUSHIMA was not killed because he took pictures of the area. He was killed for violating the border south of Zaozernaya near Dygasheli and didn't obey the demand of the guard.

The witness had received 2 letters. The first was delivered by 2 trespassers. He didn't remember the exact date of delivery but it was after July 15. The second was left by an armed Jap detachment which had violated the border, fired the patrol, felled a telephone line, severed 38322 the line 150 m deep in * Soviet territory, set up a pole and fixed the letter to it. The contents of both letters were approximately the same.
38323 *Novokievsk was about 30 to 35 km from Zaozernaya and there were units of the regular Red army there at that time. He did not personally call on the commander of those units for help but called thru his hqs. Those 38324 who brought the 1st letter were detained. * The armed detachment which brought the 2nd letter was not detained. Neither the 1st nor 2nd letter was returned. The bearers of the 1st letter were turned over by the witness on July 24 to the Japs near Border Monument 8, which was not near 30325 Zaozernaya but about 50-60 km away. * He didn't remember exactly the Jap names, but a special reciprocal protocol was signed by both parties in Russian and Japanese. They belonged to the Jap army and held the

- 38325 rank of major. The Jap consul in Hanchun was present. The two persons detained were either Chinese or Koreans. The witness did not reply to either of the letters. * That was beyond the scope of his functions and duties. The reply had been already given by the Soviet government. Matters of such kind in his country were not decided by a single man and he was not authorized to answer the letters. They were answered by the Commissar for Foreign Affairs, Litvinov. The witness knew about that from the papers.
- 38326
- 38327 *As soon as he received the letters, after the trespassers had been turned over, he with a group of officers went to Zaozernaya. He sent as many guards as he could there. There were 29 there. He also observed
- 38328 the conduct of Jap troops and instructed his officers to do so. * Subsequent to July 16, no special measures were taken. Observation of Manchukuo was intensified. He was awaiting instructions from higher hqs. They constructed no trenches and no forts because previous instructions of the Chief of the Corps categorically forbade that. Prior to July 31, prior to arrival of field troops, no trench works were carried out. Subsequently, when the field troops arrive, they undertook some trench works, but they were no more than lying in or sitting in trenches. They
- 38329 were dug to reduce the number of casualties * from bullets and fragments, and served as resistance centers to repel the Jap attack and to launch counter attacks when the Japs broke into Soviet territory. It was impossible to undertake trench work on Zaozernaya which was a stone cliff with an earth crust of only 12 to 20 cm. The western slopes of Zaozernaya were even steeper and somewhat reminded one of ravines. This can be seen on the map. The water-shed ridge of Zaozernaya along the border amounted to about 200 meters. The breadth was from 2 to no more than 15
- 38330 ms. The ridge was very distinctly shown, and * passes from north to south. The state border was in accord with the Hunchun Protocol and map and passes along that ridge.
- July 26 was the first time he went to the outpost. Jap troops had been observed there in the early part of July. He was at Zaozernaya
- 38331 several times * , and during his 5 years of service there he frequently went there because of the junction of the 3 borders. He had seen the Jap troops at the very beginning of July when he saw about a platoon of infantry establishing wire communication from Rumenula toward Zaozernaya. The beginning of the wire was very hard to see because it was hidden behind natural rises. Beginning on the 26th he saw the Japs crossing the
- 38332 Tumen from the west bank and they didn't return. * The number of Jap troops were about 3800. Infantry and small calibre artillery crossed to the east bank of the river, to Manchurian territory. The guns were about 37 or 40 mm.
- 38334 *Neither Soviet field troops nor border guards ever crossed the frontier during fighting because they were forbidden to do so. Since the field troops were not very familiar with the country, special border

- 38334 Officers were detailed to assist as guides. Of course, it was possible that during the fighting some wounded man trying to get to the rear and unfamiliar with the sector and hiding behind natural rises, could have violated the border, but he knew of no such case. The direction for non-violation came from higher hqs, so as not to expand hostilities in the Lake area and not to give any pretexts to the Jap aggressors to develop or expand hostilities. This order also applied to firing across
- 38335 the border. *Neither troops nor guards ever crossed the border, but in the course of fighting there might have been cases when shells or bullets exploded where the Jap troops were located. Where the Japs were directly near the border and in front of the Soviet and firing at the Soviet troops, the Soviet opened fire in reply and the bullets and shells exploded on territory occupied by Japs. Soviet artillery arrived on August 1st. On July 31 there was no artillery action by Soviet troops and
- 38336 guards * because there was no artillery in the area at that time. Without crossing the border and without intentionally firing across it, the Soviet wiped out the part of the Jap division which participated in the action. The gun positions aiding the attackers were also wiped out. The whole Jap division took part in the fighting. He was at the scene of of fighting from July 26 until August 10. When hostilities ceased he was not at the scene because he left on August 10.
- 38337 *Fighting actually stopped at 1205 August 11 because according to agreement the Japs were supposed to stop at 1200 but didn't. They stopped five minutes late. According to agreement the troops of both were to continue the line they then held. The Soviet were along the border and the Japs were on their territory. Subsequent to August 11, the Japs were withdrawn completely to the west bank of the Tumen. After the attack and after Soviet troops had repelled the Japs, the border remained as defined by the Munchun protocol. The line at the end of fighting was
- 38338 exactly the border claimed by the Soviets. * After hostilities ceased the regular field units were withdrawn and only guards remained in the
- 38340 area. * No mechanized troops participated on the part of the Japs.
- 38345 *Exhibit 2855, Certificate of the Military Topographic Department of the USSR General Staff, stated that in 1933 the 7th sheet of the map of the Asiatic part of The Soviet was republished. The border between the Monglian Peoples Republic and Manchuria in the Lake Buir-Noir area was erroneously marked as not to the east of the Khalgin-gol River as it should have been done but on the river itself. After the 7th sheet had
- 38346 been republished * the error was discovered and measures taken to study cartographic materials available in archives, geographical atlases of various contries and documentary maters of the Mongolian government. These materials corroborated that the border between the Mongolian Peoples Republic and Manchuria as shown on the 7th sheet was wrong. Afterwards when maps of any scale were published, the border was marked to the east of the Khalkin-gol River where it actually passed in the area. This was corroborated from 14 maps of different sources.

Direct Examination of A. E. Bykov
by General Vasiliev

38361

*The witness identified Exhibit 3857 as his affidavit and verified it. The witness stated that in 1939 he served in the territory of the Mongolian Peoples Republic (MPR) as a senior lieutenant in command of a mechanized rifle battalion of the 11th tank brigade stationed in Under-han. On March 1, 1939, General Yakovlev, brigade commander, put him in command of a mixed detachment and ordered him to march to the area of Tamsak-Bulak, 120 to 130 km west of the Malhin-gol. As Yakovlev explained, the purpose of sending the detachment was that in the river area, on the sector guarded by the 7th Mongolian frontier guards there were increased cases of the boundary being crossed by Jap troops, and there were cases when the Japs kidnapped Mongolian soldiers and took them to Manchuria. The detachment was to prevent the Japs from similar unlawful actions against the Mongolian border guards. His mechanized rifle battalion reinforced with an armoured-car company, with a battery of 4 76 mm self-propelled guns and a battery of 4 122mm. howitzers was part of the mixed detachment.

On May 28 this detachment was the first unit of Soviet regulars which engaged with the Jap Manchurian troops which crossed the border of MPR east of the Malhin-gol and seized part of the Mongolian territory on the east bank of the river. On March 5 the detachment arrived in Tamsak-Bulak, where there was also stationed the 6th Mongolian cavalry division. East of the town were neither Mongolian nor Soviet regulars, but only Mongolian border guards. He went to the 7th Mongolian border outpost in March 1939 to investigate the situation. This outpost guarded the * sector of the border east of the river beginning from Eris-Ulin-Obo and to the north in a straight line to Mulat-Ulin-Obo and from there in a straight line to Nomonhan-Burd-Obo. The territory guarded was on the east bank of the river 20-22 km in depth toward Nomonhan east of the river. The sector guarded by his outpost ended a few kms north of Nomonhan. The bulk of the outpost was on the west bank of the river in the Sumburin-Tsagan-Nur Lake area. The outpost daily sent patrols to the east bank of the river. This bank was very carefully guarded by Mongolian guards especially in connection with systematic violations of the border by the Jap Manchurian troops from January 1939.

38364

* On the night of May 14-15, hqs of the 6th Mongolian cavalry received a report from the 7th outpost that on May 11 a Jap Manchurian cavalry unit of more than 200 crossed the border at Nomonhan and advanced 15-18 km. into Mongolia. In the clash several Mongolian guards were killed. On May 12 the guard reserves drove the violations into Manchuria. On May 14, up to 2 squadrons of Japs and Manchurians again crossed the 38364 border and advanced into Mongolia on the east bank of the river driving back the guards. The commander of the 6th Mongolian and the witness de-38365 cided to go to the * site to investigate. About 35-40 km from the 7th outpost they came across 2 mounted soldiers riding at top speed to the west. They stopped them. The soldiers carried a message from the chief of the outpost that 5 Jap single-engined dive-bombers raided the outpost and made 4 bombing runs. During the 1st 2 runs the outpost was bombed and during the last 2 it was machine-gunned. They went to the outpost and saw the damage. Three soldiers were killed, 25 injured. He saw the traces of machine gunning. The same day they returned to Tantsak and he reported to corps hqs in Ulan Bator.

38366 On May 18 the Mongolian division went to the Mamardaba mountain area on the west bank of the river. By order of corps his reconnaissance platoon went with the Mongolian cavalry. The first minor clash with Jap Manchurian troops took place on * May 22 or 23 when in accord with instructions he ordered his platoon to cross the river to its east bank and conduct reconnaissance in force on Mongolian territory seized by the Japs.
He gave strict orders to the platoon commander under no circumstances to cross the border. The platoon went 7-8 km to the east without hindrance and then being 12-13 km from the border was fired on by the enemy and surrounded. They broke thru the encirclement and withdrew to the west bank of the river. On May 25, the 6th Mongolian crossed the river to its east bank and took up a defensive position 8-10 km from the border. His detachment arrived at the Malhin-gol on May 24. On the 26 he put across the river to its east bank 2 mechanized rifle companies, a battery of 45 mm guns and a few armored cars. On the 27 he transferred the command post to the east bank, about 9-10 km from the border. On 38367 May 26 and 27 the Soviet-Mongolian units had no * battle contact with the Japs. They though the incident was closed.

38368 On the night of May 27-28 the Japs took up the offensive about 3:00 AM. It was conducted by a group, part of the 23rd infantry division and Bargut cavalry, under the command of Col. YAMAGATA, commander of the 64th infantry regiment of the 23rd division. The group contained part of the 64th, a reconnaissance detachment of the 23rd under Lt. Col.
AZUMA, a motorized company under Capt. KAWANO, the 8th cavalry rgmt. and units of the 1st and 7th Bargut cavalry. The Japs tried to outflank the Soviet troops from the left to appear in their rear and get to the river crossing and cut off the way of retreat. Regular fighting took place during which his detachment lost 65-70 men. At the end of May 28 a regiment of the 36th rifles under Major Remizov arrived at the river. * It was thrown into action. That day might be considered as the date of opening of large-scale hostilities on the river between the Japs and units of the Soviet army. Prior to May 28 major clashes did not take place.

He participated in further battles and stayed in the area till the cessation of hostilities and the conclusion of the truce. In all the operations he had strict orders not to cross the border and those orders were never broken by him. The commanders of other units had similar strict orders. He knew that during hostilities there was not a single case of a border violation by Soviet or Mongolian units. After the Japs had been defeated, the Soviet did not follow them across the border though they had a chance of going up to Mailar without encountering resistance. After hostilities ceased they took up the defensive along the border which was exactly as it had run prior to May 11."

- 38370 *The witness stated that the total Jap losses in the conflict amounted to 52-55 thousand. This data came from the analysis of fighting operations made by Commander Zhukov of the corps in that area after the end of hostilities. The analysis was made at a conference of unit commanders when they were informed of the number of Jap losses. He knew Exhibit 766. This was a map captured on May 28 from AZUMA, commanding
- 38371 * the Jap reconnaissance detachment. The map was captured by Lt. Seminov of the witness's outfit. It was found in the car belonging to AZUMA, which had been put out of action., as had been two armored cars which guarded AZUMA's hqs. The border shown on that map was in accord with the Soviet Mongolian contentions.

Cross-examination by Mr. Blakeney

38372. *The witness stated that Soviet Mongolian losses amounted to 9-9 $\frac{1}{2}$ thousand. When he arrived at the river there were no Soviet or Mongolian troops in the area. He came there on May 24. When he arrived there were only his platoon and the 6th Mongolian cavalry in the area of Harar-jaba. * The 6th Mongolian Cavalry had 250 sabers. His unit consisted of
- 38373 3 motorized infantry companies, 1 battery of 45mm guns, 1 battery of 76 mm self-propelled guns, 1 battery of 120 mm guns, a reconnaissance platoon of 5 armored cars and 1 armored company of 16 armored cars.
- 38374 There were 1200 in his unit. * There were no other units in that area.

- He was in the area guarded by the 7th Mongolian outpost for the first time on March 12 or 13, and for the second time on May 15. At
- 38375 neither time were there any Mongolian or Soviet troops in that area except for the border guards, * which consisted of 150-200 men. This
- 38376, outpost like any other outpost had no hqs. It had only its commander, who was with the main force of his outpost on the west bank of the river, near a small lake not far from Mt. Khamar-Daba. The posts and patrols
- 38377 of the 7th outpost were on the west bank of the river in Mongolia. They were along the border and were about 20 or 22 km from the river. * The main force of the outpost was on the west bank and patrols and posts sent out by these outposts were on the east bank 20 to 22 km. This was both in March and May. The Mongolian border was from 20 to 22 km east of the river.

*In March he together with the commander of the 7th border guard outpost, Lt. Chogdon, was on the east bank of the river and went along the border. At that time they went along the border where posts and patrols were located. He was unable to and not entitled to inspect the outpost since he was a Soviet officer. * He did not inspect the posts and was not authorized to do that. *They went along the border and saw where the posts and patrols were situated. He was not interested in the number of posts and did not know whether he saw all of them or not. 38379
38381 The front was from 55 to 70 km long. * The first night fighting, or dawn fighting, occurred on May 28. There was some night fighting after May 28 from time to time.

38382

The soviet troops used aircraft but he could not tell the number participating. They were fighters and bombers used only against the Jap and Manchurian forces. * The aircraft bombed artillery positions and divisional dumps. He didn't know if they bombed Jap airfields. Hailar is about 120 to 150 km from Nomonhan. There were neither land nor air attacks on Hailar by Soviet and Mongolian troops

*His unit was the first engaged in the fighting and they were in the area till the truce was signed, and he and all others had strict instructions not to trespass or violate the border of the MPR. * He and his unit belonged to the north group of troops and they were outflanking the Japs on the west. They followed the north border. The south group of forces which outflanked the Japs from the south did not violate the border either. Neither the north nor the south groups ever trespassed the border.

January 28, 1948

38388

*The 7th Mongolian Border outpost was 120-150 strong. What he called the border was the territory between the bank of the Falha River and 20-22 km east of the river up to the border of the MPR. The terrain features of this territory were very rough. There were hills 50-60 m high, ravines 35-40 m deep. The territory was covered by small bushes. 38389 *The border did not run along the river, it ran 20-25 km east of it. There were no mountain ranges on the border east of the river. The border was marked by obos approximately from 8 to 12 km apart. Between obos the border was marked by border monuments, which were wooden posts with plates bearing inscription in Mongolian on the Mongolia side.

38390

*He couldn't either read or speak Mongolian. It was not his duty to get informations as to who put the monuments on the border or when. He did not know * who erected the monuments.

38392

*When he first visited in March the sector, he personally saw those border monuments. They were set up the entire length of the border about 1 to 1½ km apart. Their size was from 2½ to 3 m in height. On the side of Mongolia, their inscriptions were in Mongolian. On the other side he 38393 he did not know. * From obo to obo the border ran in a straight line. Since he couldn't read or speak Mongolian he had no knowledge of what the inscriptions meant. He did not know that during the Nomonhan Incident Russian or Mongolian aircraft bombed Tsitsihar in Manchuria. This area was uninhabited.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF FRITZ VON PETERSDORF
By General Vasiliev

38414 *The witness identified Exhibit 3858 as his affidavit and verified 38420 it. *The affidavit stated that the witness' predecessor as German assistant military attache was Lt. Col. Schol, and his successor was Col. Niemoler. His chief was Col. Mazki before December 1940 and General Kret-38421 chmer after that date. He was personally acquainted with * Prince KANIN and SUGIYAMA, chiefs of army staff, General OKAMOTO, chief of a division of the staff, Lt. Cols. SAIGO and YAMAGATA, chiefs of the German division of the staff, and Major KANDORI and Lt. Col. AKITA of the German division. He was personally acquainted with TOJO. He met TOJO in November 1938 during an outing for foreign military attaches and their assistants on the celebration of the conclusion of the anti-comintern pact.
38422 He believed that TOJO was then commander of the army air force. * He met TOJO several times at official receptions. He last saw him on January 1, 1943, when he paid him a farewell visit.

38423 He had not read any official Jap documents on Japan's military plans against the Soviet but he heard about it during a confidential conversation between Ott and Tojo. In June or July 1942, TOJO asked Ott to receive him for a confidential talk, Ott, Kretchmer and the witness as interpreter were present for Germany. TOJO, two generals whom he did not remember, and Capt. YAMAZAKI as interpreter were present for Japan. At that time German troops * were very successful in North Africa and Japan supposed Germany would reach Suez. At the same time German troops were successfully advancing in the Caucasus. TOJO said Germany should advance as far as Aden and Basra and Japan to India and Ceylon via Burman and the border of their spheres would lie along 70 degrees east. TOJO said the Anglo-Saxons should be driven out of East Asia and that all the sources of raw material there would provide Germany with the raw materials needed for her industry.

38424 The conversation turned on the Soviet Far East. He did not remember whether Ott asked TOJO or TOJO spoke about it himself. TOJO said that Japan was a mortal enemy of Russia and that Vladivostok was a permanent threat to Japan from the flank, and in the course of that war there was an opportunity of removing that danger. He said it was not so difficult to do as there was an excellent Kwantung army which included the best troops. TOJO made it understood that Japan intended to make a surprise attack on Vladivostok by land sea and air, carrying on a diversive operation against Blagoveshensk. He heard confirmation of that plan of attack at different times and under different circumstances from the interpreter KOGURE and KANDORI and YAMAGATA. When he visited YAMAGATA, in reply to his question how the Japs intended to attack the Soviet, YAMAGATA pointed out the Vladivostok and Blagoveshensk directions on the map. During the conversation TOJO said it was not sufficient to occupy Vladivostok and Blagoveshensk and it was necessary to extend the Jap sphere up to Lake Baikal. The conference lasted about 2 hours. Ott and Kretchmer kept silent during the conference. TOJO talked almost exclusively. He knew from subsequent conversations with Kretchmer that he was pessimistic. He thought the * Japs were dispersing their forces. He hoped that a concentrated blow would be strak in the Far East but not at India.

38425

He thought TOJO wanted to know from Ott and Kretschmer whether Germany would reach Aden and Basra at that time. Before launching the offensive TOJO wanted to know if Germany was sufficiently sure of her success.

38426

He received information of a military nature pertaining to the Soviet from the Jap staff in 1941 and 1942, from Major KANDORI and other officers of the German division. He received all military information about the Russian Far Eastern army, disposition of troops, strength, military transportation, details about reserves, movements of troops at the * European front as well as dat concerning Soviet war industry. Prior to his leaving his post, he daily visited the general staff to furnish them with information about the Germany position, and if they had information from the Russian division it was furnished to him. At first the information was not received so often, but later he received it 2 or 3 times a week. This information by cipher was transmitted to the attache department of the OKW in Berlin. It was transmitted as soon as received, first rarely and later oftener. Especially important pieces of information passed through the ciphering bureau of the Embassy. KANDORI told him that the * grenade presented by Hitler to the general staff was to be mainly used on the Manchurian place d'armes. This was a hollow grenade of great piercing capacity to pierce the armor up to 8 cm thick. In spring of 1942 Lt. Col. Niemeler and Capt. Merkel brought with them a specimen of hollow shell with drawings and designs. The shell was turned over to the C/S as Hitler's present to the Emperor. After that Niemeler and Merkel worked in a special bureau with Jap officers from the armament department to arrange the serial production of the shell in Japan. He learned about that from conversations of the military attache with Niemeler at which he was present. He personally received for decoding some telegrams addressed to Niemeler from which his * mission was clear.

He saw TOJO in his office on invitation to all attaches and their assistants to attend the New Years of 1943. TOJO said nothing on that visit about Japan's plans to attack the Soviet. He only said that Japan would support Germany with different raw materials at her disposal from the occupied areas. Germany had to provide the transport for exporting 38428 those raw materials. Many raw materials were exported on German ships breaking the blockade. He knew about that from Admiral Wenneker, German naval attache and because in January 1943 he went to Germany on one of the ships breaking the blockade. It was the Italian ship Pietro Crseolo, 38429 *which carried over 1000 tons of rubber, 1000 tons of tin and 100-200 tons of tea all taken on board at Singapore.

38430 * In 1942 they received accurate information as to Russian transport movements out of Khabarovsk on the German Russian front. It was accurate information regarding the Russian air corps and also military strength. In June 1942 accurate information was received as to troop movements west of the Tambov area in Stalingrad. In October they received information of Russian reserve troop movements in the Caucasus. In August information was received regarding the monthly production of armored equipment in Russia.

Cross-Examination by Mr. Cunningham

38444 *The witness stated that while ass't military attache he did not have access to all the report made by Ott between 1934 and 1938. He 38445 received only direct orders from the attache in Tokyo. * When he left Berlin he was not sent as an ass't to the attache but as a language officer. He received no special instructions.. He became ass't military attache in December 1938. His orders were to interpret as a language officer and to take care of telecon correspondence with the Japanese General staff. He did not collect material on his own initiative but 38446 carried out the orders of his superior. * He was under the orders of 38447 the attache and carried out his orders. * He made his reports directly to the attache. He at no time made any direct reports to the ambassador. Usually his reports were worked in together with the attache's. Sometimes they were sent separately. The attache determined which were to be sent directly and which were not to be so sent. There was no special regulation.

38448 *He was at all times in the presence of Jap high officials only with the attache as his assistant. He was associated directly with the officers of the staff of the German section. The principal mission of the military attache was the normal one of exchange of information between two countries. Due to the alliance, they at times received additional 38449 information. * Reports on the movements in Soviet and Mongolia were naturally only a part of his reports. They did not as a whole revolve around the problem of Mongolia or of the Soviet. Collection of information about movements and dispersal of Soviet troops was not only a routine matter, but was a very important part of the cooperation between 38450 the * Germans and Japs.

38452 *His investigations and the reports of his chief did not as far as he knew cover activities other than military operations.

- 38455 *He did not discuss the information he gathered with others in the German embassy other than the military attache. Since 1940 there was a specific command that no one would discuss his work with any other person.
- 38460 *The witness received his information from the general staff and he did not know the source of Ott's information.
- 38463 *He admitted stating previously that he was aware of the strength of the Kwantung army at different periods and that he knew that partly from the Jap staff, Richard Zorge from whom they received exact data as to the number of Kwantung army divisions, and some of their numbers, and
- 38464 from the German Mission in Manchuria. *Zorge was a correspondent on a
- 38466 German newspaper and had no special post in the German embassy.* Zorge was never employed the German embassy.
- 38471 *The military attache reported directly to Berlin. That was the method used in Tokyo. As far as he recalled, he visited with the military attache only Jap military organizations. He had no access to information along political lines. They never took * Zorge to the general
- 38472 staff when they went for information. He knew Crome personally. He was
- 38473 a German correspondent in Tokyo. * Reports were kept in the safe of the military attache. He did not recall in detail, but the attache determined which reports would be sent directly thru the cypher system of the embassy.

January 29, 1948

- 38488 *There were no other methods of exchange of commodities between Japan and Germany after 1941 than the blockade runner. He had no definite information as to ship sinkings because Admiral Wenneker, the naval attache, kept this matter strictly secret. He had no definite information but he heard on his return to Germany that in the fall of 1942 7 German blockade runners were sunk by British action.

Cross-Examination by Mr. Blewett

- 38490 *He did not believe that the outing or celebration on the occasion of the conclusion of the anti-comintern pact in 1938 was very significant. The attache's personnel were simply invited for a recreational excursion
- 38491 of the Tokyo area. The pact was concluded in 1936.* He believed TOJO was then commander of the Jap army air force. If he were told that TOJO was not appointed to the air force until December, that would only be proof that over ten years he had committed an error in judgment of about 6 or 7 weeks. At that time he was the language officer and had not yet assumed his duties as ass't to the attache, but since his arrival in Tokyo, he had been working in the office of the military attache.
- 38493 *He knew that TOJO asked Ott to receive him from Kretschmer. The meeting took place in the afternoon. As interpreter for TOJO Captain

- 38493 YAMAZAKI and 2 other Japanese officers were present. He knew SUGIYAMA but didn't know his position at that time. No other accused in the dock was present at the conference. He could not say whether SUGIYAMA was present. *He believed Tojo was War Minister at the time this conference took place. He did not know that after June 1941 Ribbentrop directed Ott to urge the Japs to enter the war against Russia. He was not familiar with the secret cipher report sent by Ott to Ribbentrop on October 4, 1941, since he had no access to the cipher bureau. This was the first time he had heard of this telegram. During the conference TOJO spoke * mostly alone and he did not recall that the subject was mentioned by Ott. TOJO spoke and Ott listened. He did not recall having heard that Ott ever made a request of that type. After the conference he only talked for a short period with Kretschmer and he told him that he had talked to Ott regarding this matter and that the reports had been sent to Berlin. *He had never heard directly of any Japanese refusal to attack Russia but he felt that the Japs would logically not let themselves be dictated to by another power. Kretschmer was very pessimistic for the reason that he considered an attack upon India as splitting up Japs striking forces. When asked whether he was pessimistic because of the information received that Japan might go south, the witness said at that time Japan had made quite a progress in a southerly direction and he would not know just where further south they could have gone.
- 38494
- 38495
- 38496
- 38497 *It often occurred that invitations were issued to higher officers of the Jap staff, and meetings took place in the embassy. At many of these affairs he was personally present but did not recall one for TOJO, SUGIYAMA and MUTO. He could not definitely recall what TOJO was at the time, but in any case he was one of the highest ranking officers of the Jap army. The fact that in 1942 TOJO was premier and went to an ambassador's office for a consultation was exactly what emphasized the meaning of this conference. This conference did not take place in September 1941 because at that time the witness was on vacation in Kawana. He was away from Tokyo about 10 or 14 days. He did not believe that TOJO would utter an answer to an important statement of attacking the Soviet in the presence of servants at a dinner party. * He heard no comments of that nature from TOJO. He believed that Kretschmer and Ott were under the impression that Japan was capable of making the undertaking. Only Kretschmer was still pessimistic despite this. He knew that Ott informed Berlin as to the contents of these conversations, but Kretschmer never consulted the witness or talked to him about the matter. * It was impossible that he made a mistake as to the date of this conference since the Jap War Minister as well as a Japanese Minister were present at this conference. Counsel was talking of another conference which took place in 1941. He was referring to a conference of 1942. He had forgotten the names of the other two generals. Other officers present were Capt. YAMAZAKI and no others. *The witness was a German POW in the Soviet. He had not been charged with any crime. He spent 8 years at the cadet school in Germany and entered the German army in June 1918.

38503 He was at the Jap general staff more than 300 times, and on the information received there he sent information to the German general staff.

38504 When he returned in 1943 Chief of the Attache Section Schuhardt * told him that the information sent had been of considerable importance to the German staff, and that due to this information proper precautions and actions could be taken in regard to the Russian army.

38505 *Exhibit 3859A, The Report of the Frontier Corps Department Home Ministry Mongolian Peoples Republic, was received in evidence but not read.

38514 *Exhibit 3860, telegram from Stahmer to Ribbentrop, February 1943, stated that from recent conversations with the premier, minister of the navy, chief of the navy staff and chief of the army staff and with Ministers AOKI and SUZUKI he was impressed that all parties stressed their firm conviction in victory and expressed the desire for closest possible cooperation with Germany, as well as complete * confidence in the accomplishments of German armed forces and people. The necessity and importance of direct contact between Japan and Germany in every manner possible was stressed. This should be given special prominence in view of the propaganda effect.

TOJO stated he was not concerned with the situation in Russia. He was convince of Germany's ultimate victory. He was particularly interested in the situation in North Africa, Turkey and Spain. He would be grateful for bulletins on all important events and would be prepared to give any information freely. The present war was one of weapons and nerves, particularly in view of enemy propaganda which sought to use all possible means to weaken Jap German friendship. In this connection he mentioned neutral diplomats who were spreading false and damaging rumors.

38516 *TOJO who as Minister of war played an important role in concluding the tripartite pact, was the strongest personality in Japan's cabinet. Despite these characteristics and his popularity he has been attacked several times. Previous centuries of vague representations of the Emperor as a purely spiritual figure led to the belief since Meiji in comparatively frequent government changes so no outstanding predominating character could in any wise assume the aspect of emperor. It was not inconceivable that TOJO even if his policies were approved might have to withdraw after a given time. Such a withdrawal would be regrettable for the German view, since TOJO was a dynamic personality and an outspoken friend of Germany. The change in government would not affect the Jap policy under the tripartite agreement since it was universally recognized that Japan's fate was bound up with the axis.

38519 *Exhibit 3861, telegram from Ribbentrop, September 6, 1940, stated that OSHIMA declared that Japan would take no steps in this direction

38519 without German concurrence. On the question whether Germany had changed her war aim toward the Soviet, Hitler answered that when a state fell apart everything fell apart. The Soviet Infantry was bad and when once the entire Soviet structure began to totter, everything would fall apart as happened again and again among the Slavs. Stalin did not capitulate when they stood at the Don, the same held true for Germany. The Carthaginians stood before Rome once but the Romans did not capitulate and finally beat Carthage. When again they went on the offensive against the Red army could not be said. They could not be on the defensive on all 38520 *fronts at the same time. OSHIMA declared once more that Japan would fight with Germany until final victory and it would use its last troops to realize this, as there was only one road for Japan. Hitler closed the conversation then with assurance that the same will for fight and victory remained with the Germans and with such determination victory must be theirs.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF PUNTSUGIN CPOGDAN
By General Vasiliev

38528 *The witness, a major in the Mongolian army, identified Exhibit 38532 3862 as his affidavit and verified it. * The affidavit stated that the witness served in the frontier guard detachment from October 1938 to October 1940 and occupied various positions becoming commander of the frontier guard detachment, in 1939. In 1939 he was commander near Lake Samburin. The guard outpost of the Khalkin-gol River detachment was 1 km west of Samburin which was 30 km west of the border. By order his outpost was transferred to a point 1 km southwest of Khulat-Ulan-obo.
38533 The border ran from Eris in a straight line to Khulat, and from there straight northwest to Nomonhan.

During his service the outpost was subjected to repeated attacks from Jap detachments (Bargut) and units of Jap forces. On the night of May 11 a temporary patrol of 20 men under the command of Tsedjipa was sent to the area 6 km southwest of Nomonhan. At about 8 AM a Japanese cavalry detachment of 300 armed with machine guns and sub-machine guns, rifles and grenades, accompanied by 4 trucks, crossed the frontier at Nomonhan and attacked the outpost. During the fighting 2 soldiers were killed, 1 wounded and 3 horses were killed. Under pressure of superior forces the patrol was forced to retreat into Mongolian territory. The Jap unit advanced 20 km into Mongolia but was stopped at Nuren-obo, 18 km south of Nomonhan by the reserve guards that arrived, and toward the evening of May 12 were driven back on their territory.

On May 14 he received a report stating that at 5 AM a Jap cavalry unit of 600 armed like the previous one and accompanied by 10 trucks, had crossed at Nomonhan and was moving into Mongolia along the right bank of the river. He with * 40 men went to the Dunggu-obo area, 15 km southwest of Nomonhan, leaving part of his personnel under Tsedjip's command. At Dunggu they were engaged with the Jap vanguard. He succeeded in slowing 38535 down the enemy advance. The enemy was stopped by the reserves on the border of Dungar-obo-Nuran-obo, and was forced to take to the defensive. On May 15 at 10 AM there appeared 5 Jap bombers from the east which crossed the frontier and for 30 km raided the outpost near Lake Samburin by dropping 65 bombs. After that the planes machined the outpost at a low flight. As a result 3 men were killed and 25 wounded.

38536 On May 15 at 1700 the patrols reported that at Khulat 2 cavalry regiments and a tank and 7 armored cars crossed the frontier. Following these * 90 trucks with infantry crossed. The units advanced into Mongolia toward Nuren, where they joined the unit which had crossed on May 14 and was occupying defensive position at the border of Dungur and Nuren. The Mongolian reserves were forced to retreat to the west bank of the river but later units of the Mongolian army came to assist and the Japs cavalry units were thrown back into adjacent territory.

38537 From May 15 to 28 his outpost was subjected several times a day to air raids by Jap aircraft. On May 22 his deputy Tsedjip was killed and 6 guards wounded. After the deputy was killed his post was filled * by Nanzat. On June 5 the witness received an order to transfer his post to an area 1 km southwest of Khalat. On June 7 he moved.

38538 On June 28 at 8 AM he sent a patrol of 5 under Nanzat to take positions 4 km southwest of Khulat and guard the frontier. About noon the man on duty heard firing in the area where the patrol had been sent. When the witness arrived Nanzat reported that a group of 8 Jap cavalry had violated the frontier and made a surprise attack against the patrol. During the engagement the patrol killed 6 Jap soldiers, 1 officer was taken prisoner and one escaped. The dead were all Japs and were wearing Jap army uniforms. The officer * stated that his detachment had been sent out for reconnaissance and that it was part of the Jap troop unit.

38539 *On June 29 at 10 AM the guard notice a cavalry group of 30 crossing the frontier in the area 2 km south of Mt. Khylat and moving towards the outpost. The alarm having been sounded, the outpost personnel took positions of defense. The cavalry group at about 700 m from outpost dismounted and attacked. During the engagement, 1 Jap was killed and 1 taken prisoner. The others hurriedly retreated. His personnel pursued the retreating Japs to the border and in strict obedience to the order of their command that under no circumstance should there be any violation of the border, stopped. Both the dead man and the prisoner were Japs and wore the Jap uniform

38540 Together with attacks by land forces, from June 29 air raids by Jap aircraft*became more frequent. On June 30 at 10 AM there was a report from a patrol 3 km northwest of Khulat that a column of troops was moving along the road leading from Djindjim towards the frontier. It was preceded by 8 tanks and 4 armored cars, which were followed by an 38540 infantry regiment behind which horse-drawn artillery was moving. He prepared his outpost for defense. The witness and Nanzat occupied an observation point and proceeded to observe the advance. He noticed that the column was moving towards his outpost. From 1 km he saw the marching order of the Jap infantry wearing summer uniforms. At Khulat the tanks were the first to cross the frontier, and at a distance of about 8-900 m they opened machine gun fire. The witness decided to retreat south.

38541 Having gone in that direction * he observed the movement of the column. The personnel under Nanzat retreated and occupied defensive positions 12 km south of Khulat. He saw that following the tanks the infantry with artillery crossed the frontier, occupied the outpost and continued moving into Mongolia to the southwest. Having gone 15-16 km into Mongolia the column took up a position on the east bank of the river. That evening he received an order from his superior and proceeded to carry out another task.

38542 *Exhibit 3862A was a sketch map which correctly showed the border of the MPR. It also correctly showed the places at which clashes occurred at the beginning of fighting. *The east bank of the river was 15, 20

38544 or 22 km in the direction of the border monuments, Ers Ulya, Huld Ulyn and Nomonhan. They had sent out daily more than 10 patrols to guard

38545 the border line. *The distance between the border and the east bank of the river was rather long, and Jap trespassers could not penetrate for a long distance because the guards would have detained them near the border and not on the east bank of the river. In October 1938 when the patrol was 6 km from Taliymanhan, which was 6 km from the border, 30

38546 Japs in cars violated the border and were driven back into their territory. The testimony of MITSUI was not trustworthy. He did not know whether this MITSUI was in the group of 30 mentioned, but if he was not, the witness did not know of any other case of border violation.

Cross-Examination by Mr. Blakeney

38547 The witness stated he did not know Russian. He served in his sector for a long time and therefore knew the area well. Even without knowing Russian, he could read the map very well. Being an officer * he understood maps and could read them. This map was drawn by another person under his direct instructions. He didn't know the name of the person who made the map. The map was drawn in Ulan Bator in 1946 and after his affidavit was drawn. As he didn't see the man personally he did not 38548 know his nationality, whether he was a Mengel * or not. After his affidavit had been administered he was shown this map.

*The witness could read classical Mongolian and modern Mongolian and also write it. As to Russian, he was not very fluent but could read a little, especially military terms, but didn't speak it. *He read the affidavit himself, and it was also read to him. That is what he said in his affidavit.

38552 Nomonhan is located on the bank of the Khalkin-gol river. It is an obo, called Nomonhan-Burd obo. There are two obos and the border line runs between them. The area around Nomonhan was covered with small hills called barkhans, and there were also plains in the area. The obo itself was situated on top of a hill near the river. He couldn't tell the elevation of the hills from sea level but the height * of the hills was 40-50 m and near Nomonhan the height was 45 m. Near the river it was low country but the Nomonhan area had small swamps and ravines. * His tenure at Samburin began in June 1938 and from that time he became familiar with that part of the country. He did not know it before. From June 1938 to June 30, 1939, he served in units in this area, and after that he was transferred to another place and did not participate in the last phase of the fighting. At the beginning he was there and participated. * He still served in that sector but in July-August 1939 he was transferred inland and received another mission. After August he returned to that sector and was still working there. He had last seen that area in September 1947.

38555 Before the fighting this sector was marked by bordermarks--Nomonhan Ulyn and Ers Ulyn. In the area of Nomonhan there were two obos between which the border ran. These were made of earth and on the top of them were poles. *Huld and Ers were also made of stones and there were poles on top of them. This was prior to hostilities. Between the 3 obos there were certain places by the border could be determined. Between Eris and Huld there were small hills on top of which the border ran. Starting from Huld they were Harulinogo, Nogantolgy, Mahurinmanhan and they ran from Huld to Nomonhan. From Eris to Nomonhan there were Gunzalgan, Oboto, Huruntulge and Otorinmanlan. In addition, in certain places where orientation was difficult, there were poles which facilitated orientation. There were no poles the whole length of the border. There were only separate places where it was difficult to determine where the border passed, and there were poles on top of obos. Those poles were over 2 m. He would say they were more than 20 cm thick. The poles between obos bore numbers in numerical succession and those on top of obos had the * inscription The Mongolian Peoples Republic. On markers between obos there were no inscriptions except numbers in numerical succession. The markers were not placed in any strict order, and it would be pretty hard to say whether they ran from south to north or otherwise. They were placed in some places between the obos. There were more than 10. * In June 1938 the markers were all there, but in the course of hostilities there were cases when the Japs destroyed them or carried them away. After hostilities stopped, from 1940, in accord with the agreement on redemarcation of the border, special markers were established. As to the markers

- 38558 atop obos, they had been there a very long time, but when they were first set up and under what agreement and by whom he had no knowledge. The markers between obos served for orientation and were set up when necessary. * The markers were there in March 1939. He had stated previously between obos there were markers which were at a distance sometimes of 1 1/2 km, and sometimes even more. *Upon these markers there were numbers in succession written in old Mongolian figures. The poles on top of obos bore the inscription Mongolian Peoples Republic.
- 38560
- 38561 *The border between the MPR and Manchuria remained the same as it was prior to hostilities in the Nomonhan area. In accordance with the agreement redemarcation of the border took place. There were no changes whatsoever.
- 38562 The eastern bank of the Halha River was * always guarded by Mongolian border guards, and the outpost of the detachment was on the west bank and the patrols sent out were on the east bank. After June 5, 1939 when the cases of violations by Japs and Manchurians became more frequent, in accord with his instructions the outpost was transferred to Huld.
- 38563 The east bank * of the river was guarded by Mongolian guards from olden times. They did not appear on the east bank when the cases of violation became frequent.
- 38565 * In his affidavit there was not a word that on May 11 there were regular Mongolian forces on the east bank. On May 11 there were only border guard units and reserves on the east bank to block the Jap advance. The unit sent on May 11 was a border guard patrol and it was sent to guard the border. *Patrols were sent there not only on May 11 but before and after that date. That was a usual procedure and they were sent to other places as well. The date May 11 was pointed out in connection with violation of the border. *A large force of Japs attacked Mongolia specifically on that date. Violations by Japs took place even earlier. Since December 1938 small Jap groups frequently violated the border, invaded Mongolia, and there were small-scale incidents. But the first violation by a large force occurred on May 11. * The Jap forces which invaded and were repelled were unable to cross the river. It was only on May 14 and 15 when the guards under pressure of overwhelming forces were forced to withdraw to the west bank, that the Jap troops seized territory up to the east bank. During the fighting of May 14 and 15 the outpost had 200 in the fighting, and also a reserve unit sent out by the detachment of 100. That made their strength 300 and this force blocked the way of the Jap invaders. *They had no reinforcements that day from the regular army. They received reinforcements from the regular army on May 20. He couldn't tell the exact number of them but it was approximately 2 squadrons. * He believed a squadron had over 100 men. The first Soviet units arrived at the scene on May 23-24. He didn't know their strength. These first units didn't have tanks but had armored cars. Subsequently there were tanks, artillery and infantry. At the beginning

38570 there were no soviet aircraft. When large-scale operations began there were Soviet aircraft. The first blow was dealt to the Japs on May 28-29
38571 and finally they were repulsed * at the end of July and in August. *The Soviet air force took part in operations on May 28-29, and were engaged in fighting Jap aircraft. They did not bomb the Jap installations.

38572 His rank at the time was Junior Lieutenant. * He had under his command at the time about 200 men. The Mongolian military units were in their own territory in the course of fighting and he could state that not a single time did they cross the border. They were on their own territory during the fighting as well as before.

38573 Redirect Examination by General Vasiliev

38574 *He stated that when he testified as to the map attached to his affidavit he was apparently misunderstood. In December 1946 when he gave his testimony there was a large map and he marked on the map when, where and in what direction the Jap and Manchurian forces violated the border. He marked all events on that map and marked the position of the Mongolian troops. When giving his testimony he asked to have this map traced in order to facilitate the use of his affidavit and that the * tracing be made as a sketch map. One of the personnel was authorized to make the tracing on a separate sketch map. That was done, and the sketch map was shown to him so he could see that it fully corresponded to what he marked.

38575 *He understood defense counsel's question on post hostility changes to refer only the witness's sector, that is the 3 obos and he replied that there were no changes. In the neighboring sector to the west, the border was changed and it was established closer to the river.

38576 *Exhibit 3863 showed that KUMAGAI, Toshio was a 3rd class secretary in the Police Bureau of the Home Ministry when SATO's speeches, Exhibit 2235 were delivered.

38577 *Exhibit 3864, affidavit of KUMAGAI, Toshio, offered by the defense, 38578 state that * when conferences of Chiefs of Prefectural police were held at the Home Office, people from various circles were often requested to give lectures on current questions. SATO, then Chief of Press Section War Ministry was invited by the Bureau to give a lecture at the police chiefs conference on the actual state of the China affair so that the chiefs might be able to dispel rumors by use of the information given.

38579 *Two lectures were given. After the lectures, the witness jotted down roughly about 100 pages which he arranged in about 50-60 pages. SATO spoke very fast and he remembered finding it extremely hard to take notes of what he said. Exhibit 2235 was not reviewed by SATO. The responsibility for the wording of the document rested with the witness.

38583 *Exhibit 3865, Report of General Martin, September 1940, gave a deto tailed account of the events that transpired in French Indo China from 38585 September 22, 1940 to September 25, 1940.

DEFENSE SURREBUTTAL

38600 *Exhibit 3866, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, October 24, 1933 stated that in general outline of the 5 Ministers conference held on October 25 was given by the premier for transmittal to SAIONJI. In international relations, measures were to be taken for consummating Japan's plans peacefully by diplomacy. They must endeavor as much as possible to avoid collison. On national defense expenditures, they must be adjusted to national resources so that Japan might not suffer from threats of others or be held in contempt by others. On domestic problems with each ministry devoting its efforts to solving difficult issues, they would encourage deliberations among the ministers, plan for national stability and prepare for adequate national defense.

38616 *Exhibit 3867, Affidavit of General SHIMOMURA stated that on October 8, 1942, orders were issued for a change in command of the 13th army.
 SAWADA was in Shanghai at the time while SHIMOMURA, commandant of the 38617 army general staff college, was in Saitama engaged in maneuvers. The latter was immediately recalled to Tokyo and assigned as army commander.
 On October 9, 1942 the affiant made a courtesy call on Imperial hqs. He was told by the C/S that the Doolittle affair had been thoroughly investigated and final decision had been made in Tokyo. As a result, there was nothing that Shanghai or Nanking could do about the decision except carry it out. As to the details and procedures of the trial he could get a report from the one responsible when he reached Shanghai.

February 2, 1948

38621 *Exhibit 3868, excerpt from the SAWADA trial, showed that OKADA, Rhuhei, testified he was a member of the 13th army in China, and in August 1942 was serving as a member of the staff. He was appointed in August to a military tribunal for the trial of the Doolittle fliers. He did not know the exact words Major HATA said but he first mentioned the names of the 8 fliers, the named the evidence and questioning of the 38622 fliers. He said it was evident that they were * guilty under military law. He requested the death sentence.

38639 Exhibit 3869, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, October 24, 1933 stat that HIROTA said he desired to conduct matters so as not to arouse deiplomatic difficulties. He wondered if the time wasn't coming when US would recognize Russia and, with China would subject Japan to an ordeal like the Washington Conference. To prevent Japan from being confronted with such a situation, they must act now on Japan's relations

38659 with US, China and Russia. To bring the Manchurian problem to a solution Russia must be handled harmoniously and existing issues settled. These were the Chinese Eastern Railway and armaments. There was no other recourse than to settle the Simla conference and improve relations with Britain.

38644 *Exhibit 3870A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, August 29, 1934, stated the premier stated that HIROTA strongly asserted that in Anglo relations it would be unreasonable to have Britain possess only the same amount as Japan. Even if there were a difference of 60 or 70,000 tons, or several more, it would be well if there were no protest. He didn't want to irritate Britain but desired to be on friendly terms. He said the first problem was abrogation. Japan was abrogating the Washington treaty because she wanted to go her own way. He suggested a mutual abrogation instead of having just one country do it. If the other parties did not agree, Japan would be forced to do it alone. In Anglo-Japanese relations he wanted to handle matters so there was room for compromise.

38645 *He thought the navy minister would agree. HIROTA said he told the premier that he could not accept future responsibilities if he were told to carry out strait-laced diplomacy. The only solution would be to resign. If he were allowed a small leeway he would cooperate as much as possible. These were grave times and he favored conferences in the Imperial presence. The premier replied that such conferences were very dangerous. The cabinet wanted to handle this on its own responsibility.

38646 *Exhibit 3871, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, August 20, 1934, stated that HIROTA said the navy minister seemed to have calmed down the young officers, saying they might feel assured for the government was firm in determination. HIROTA's plan for naval disarmament was to realize the demand for parity. Some people claimed of necessity a prolonged term and suggested a 10 or 12 year term to be first proposed and then to be cut to 6 years. If they wished to reach an agreement at all, HIROTA hoped they would go about it fully ready to make concessions if necessary.

38649 *Exhibit 3872 A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, Chapter 155, stated that HIROTA said the railroad negotiations were being carried on very slowly. As to the conference in London, the disarmament plan had been drafted, but the US and Britain could not openly oppose Japan's plan. They were changing their course toward a political standpoint. Apart from this problem, the ministry was trying to bring about a rapprochement with Britain. It would not come right out and make an alliance but it was going to form something like a 4 Power pact. At the present time MATSUDAIRA was making approaches to Britain. Those invested with full powers had been given instructions to suppress gradually the question of disarmament, and to take a calm attitude. * They were carrying out their instruction. The plans of rapprochement with England were of the utmost secrecy and were not even discussed in the cabinet.

- 38651 Exhibit 3873A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, Chapter 161, stated that HIROTA said he was going to give a statement explaining Japan's abrogation of the Washington treaty and her intrinsic desire for naval disarmament so the world would understand Japan's true intentions. Around March next year various questions would crop up. They must first of all keep a sharp and careful watch on China's attitude. At the same time they must note that the powers were apprehensive lest Japan should on her abrogation of the Naval Disarmament * treaty, deal with China in her own free way. To dispel their misgivings, he would like to have a treaty concluded with China directly, thereby evincing forcibly the security of China's territorial integrity and clarifying Japan's true attitude.
- 38652
- 38655 *Exhibit 3874A, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, chapter 246, stated that HIROTA said for the time being he would like to carry out a non-expanding settlement of this incident, but since any direct negotiations with the army have been unfavorable, he had been negotiating thru the navy minister. He would like to act without taking the army's feelings into too much consideration, but this was a very delicate problem.
- 38656 The fact that the interior * of the army was unsettled was very disadvantageous. Just after the incident occurred WACHI of the staff of the Tientsin army gave a report and objected very strongly to government actions. When the incident first arose, the Tientsin army believe that it could settle it by themselves. The government became greatly alarmed and tried to pass a bill to send 3 divisions. The Tientsin army became very indignant over it and strongly denounced the fact that the cabinet should become alarmed over the situation.
- Around the 24th to 26th, another trouble broke out in North China, and Japan's army was beaten by the Chinese. Angered by losses, the air corps had bombed the military installations around Peiping. This made the situation so difficult that greatest anxiety was felt about the future.
- 38658 *Exhibit 3875A, excerpt from Chapter 247 of the SAIONJI-Harada Memoirs, stated that on August 3, MATSUDAIRA, Chief secretary to the Lord Keeper said that on August 2 the C/S said to the Emperor that the
- 38659 army would send the troops as far as the Paoting line but would * not extend the battlefield further.
- 38671 *Exhibit 3876, excerpt from Chapter 257 of the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, stated that HIROTA said they had an understanding with the other side that the terms would vary with the change of the war situation, but the junior army officers, ignorant of the circumstances, said the fault was with HIROTA, who had too early confided Japan's intention to the other side. He was annoyed to have the members of the staff, including KAGAWA, threatening that HIROTA should be killed or apprehended.
- 38672 *When KONOE told it to the war minister, the latter said that he would tell the chief of the second section beforehand to keep it secret, for

38672 it would be troublesome if the middle-class officers should hear about it. Already, the junior officers, including KAGESA, were exceedingly angry to learn it.

38673 The minister and vice-minister of the navy said the fault was with the army. Both the army and navy once wanted to stop war as soon as possible, when the staff was so intent on a peace move thru Ctt that it pressed the foreign ministry for negotiation. Since then negotiations had been continued by HIRCTA. The three ministers, army navy and foreign, once a week dined together to talk about diplomacy and had arrived at a mutual understanding. Nothing would happen so long as the army was well controlled. They would argue for * HIROTA that the hitch had taken place because the army failed to inform the foreign ministry thru the premier of the change of operations plans according to the change of situation. They ought not to reproach HIRCTA only. HIRCTA had previously sought an understanding with the other side that Japan might present new terms, so there was no objection to submitting new stronger terms. Those who wanted to attack and exclude HIRCTA took the opportunity to cause trouble because they had an understanding with the other side that former terms corresponded to the then situation and would vary according to the change of the latter.

38675 *Exhibit 3877, excerpt from Chapter 260 of the SAICNJI-HARADA Memoirs, stated that HIROTA said as China failed to accept the proposal the Imperial Council arrived at a decision to launch into the alternative plan. This was told to the German Ambassador and he replied that there was nothing more to be done under the circumstances.

38677 *Exhibit 3878, excerpt from Chapter 338, of the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, stated that KIDO, KCNCE and the Lord Keeper agreed that HIROTA was the number one candidate. HARADA was asked to sound out HIROTA's personal opinion. * On the 24th, HARADA visited SAIONJI and gave him a complete report that HIRCTA was number 1 candidate and UGAKI was number 2. HARADA met HIROTA and felt that HIROTA was undependable. There was an indication that he wanted to receive more concrete instructions from the Lord Keeper about forming the cabinet. They knew that HIROTA from a character and experience view was a very righteous man but he was a diplomat and very ignorant about internal affairs. He promised Hirota he would give the * matter careful consideration. On the 24th HARADA learned that feelings of ostracism against HIROTA were high at the staff. The army was starting an expulsion movement against him. HARADA told HIROTA the army was very clamorous and it would be advantageous in every respect if he would give a definite answer. HIROTA replied he was declining definitely and to so inform the Lord Keeper.

38683 Exhibit 3879, excerpt from KIDO's Diary, February 27, 1937, stated that HARADA called and KIDO was greatly surprised to learn that he was suffering from nervous prostration and the the left half of his body was semi-paralyzed.

*Exhibit 3880, the affidavit of Dr. SASSA, Rempel, stated that he specialized in internal medicine only and was not a specialist in arteriosclerosis or diseases of the brain. He knew HARADA as a friend for many years but never treated him professionally until March 15, 1941. In reviewing his records he found that on March 15, 1941, HARADA told him that about two or 3 years before he experienced being suddenly reduced to a condition incurring difficulty in speaking. Dr. SASAKI came to examine him, as a result of which he was forbidden to take meat and to smoke. On March 8 he consulted Dr. KATSUNUMA of Nagoya University. The *diagnosis was cardiac weakness as a result of high blood pressure with fat heart. Prognosis was good continuous attention for 1 or 2 weeks necessary.

During 1941 he treated HARADA on March 15, 1941, March 27, 1941, April 26 and May 31. The next time he saw him professionally was August 1942. On May 31, 1945, his condition changed for the worse. He sent for Dr. MURAYAMA and left for Oiso with him. He was seen yawning in the train. Half of his body was in bad condition and his tongue rather thick. When he got off at Oiso, he was unable to speak but could walk quite well. *Diagnosis was paresis of the right half part of body and there was fear of aphasia. Thrombosis of * the brain. From 1942 on Dr. SCNEDA was the doctor in charge of HARADA's case and MURAYAMA also treated him and each knew that the other was treating him.

*Exhibit 3881, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, December 27, 1937, stated that on the 23rd HARADA submitted to SAIONJI his reports. SAIONJI asked whether this German mediation was to be carried on by Germany or by some individuals. It seemed they should definitely punish the responsables for the bombardment of the British ship as it would likely open up a favorable way for subsequent diplomatic negotiations. SAIONJI was also greatly concerned about the reasons for and the manner of hurrying through these peace negotiations.

*IPS document No. 3150-3360, excerpt from the SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, August 12, 1939, offered by the prosecution and received in evidence, stated that KIDO said that when he met KONO the latter said that although he believed that ARAKI would suffice for the succeeding cabinet, would it not be better to have HIROTA. When KIDO met HIROTA his opinions were very similar to those of the army and since HIROTA was optimistic and acted intelligently, he should do. It was beside the point whether HIROTA in the end would accept or not.

38707

*Exhibit 3882, deposition of ABO, Kiyotane, stated that in 1931 he was the navy minister in the 2nd WAKATSUKI cabinet and attended all the cabinet meeting until the cabinet resigned on December 10, 1931. Neither at the cabinet or elsewhere did he hear MINAMI say it was better for Japan to withdraw from the League, or there was no need of paying deference to the League or that should Japan be determined to wage war against

- 38707 the whole world this could be done. If there was any discrepancy between the words of SHIDEHARA and the Memoirs of HARADA, he would believe implicitly in * SHIDEHARA.
- 38708
- 38710 *Exhibit 3883, affidavit of ISHIWATA, Sotaro, stated that he was chief secretary of the YONAI cabinet from January to July 1940. The resignations of the cabinet were tendered on July 16. On the 17th war vice minister ANAMI conveyed the view of the army as to filling the vacancies in the House of Peers. The witness refused saying that a decision had already been made by the cabinet. This was his first and last interview with ANAMI in those days. He was sure that on his visit MUTO was alone and was not accompanied by ANAMI. He often did not tell HARADA all the precise details of matters, as he believed that YONAI was not pleased to see him because of fear of HARADA's thoughtlessness and frivolity in speaking. MUTO, being a soldier and type of man who was always
- 38711 very careful about his choice of words, never said any- * thing to the effect that HATA would be asked or made to resign. He remembered that he said that HATA might be forced by circumstances to resign.
- 38714 *Exhibit 3884, affidavit of NAKAMURA, Masao, stated that he was a member of the Military Affairs Bureau from April 1940 to March 1943 and was under MUTO. In those days his duty was liaison with and reception of foreign attaches. With reference to an American officer calling on MUTO in early October, he recalled that a certain US officer attached to a regiment at Hirosaki, Captain Merrill, called to say farewell to MUTO as he was being transferred to the Philippines. The witness was present. This officer being quite a joyful and merry fellow, they had a very good
- 38715 impression * of him. MUTO was very busy and his interviews usually ended in about 5 minutes. This interview lasted an hour or so, and they both made straightforward remarks. He talked a good deal about his happy experiences in official and private life in Japan. His chat with MUTO was prolonged. During the talk, MUTO laid stress on the need of good will between Japan and the US under the prevailing taut circumstances. He repeatedly explained how he had been trying his best to bring about a peaceful conclusion of the negotiations. MUTO then referred to the issue of infringement on US rights in China by Japan's army during the hostilities as being one of the important reasons which interfered with
- 38716 the negotiations. *He mentioned that it was difficult to have the whole case understood through the explanations given by diplomats, but that such military personnel as Merrill could well understand the whole case. He asked him to explain to his superiors the situation. He said from such a mutual understanding of the military circles, the crisis of a collision could be averted. He further stated that in case this understanding could not be reached there were possibilities that it might expand into war and that was worrying him. He added half in jest that in case they arrived at that, since Merrill was going to Manila, they might meet again there. During this interview there was absolutely no state-

38718 those days the whole staff, including MUTO, * had been trying their utmost by order of TOJO to bring about a satisfactory conclusion of the negotiations. This was still in the period in which no decisions whatsoever had as yet been made. MUTO was the type of man whose utterances and behavior were based on common sense. It was impossible he should have stated such an unscrupulous matter.

38722 *Exhibit 3885, the affidavit of HASHIMOTO, Gun stated that he was 38723 chief of the operational division * of the general staff from January 1938 to September 1939. He saw all telegrams sent or received by the staff, or exchanged between the staff and military attaches or others in foreign countries. The Foreign, war, and navy ministries used different telegraphic codes. It was impossible to directly exchange telegrams between the staff and the ambassador in Germany, keeping such exchange secret from the foreign office. In January or February 1939 no telegram was sent from the staff to OSHIMA stating that the prerogative of diplomacy belonged to the Emperor. At that time the staff did not send any telegram to OSHIMA concerning the question of strengthening the anti-comintern pact, nor was any telegram received by the staff from OSHIMA.
38724 *Military attaches in foreign countries belonged directly to the staff.
In the negotiations for a treaty with Germany and Italy the staff never sent in 1939 a draft of such a treaty by telegram to the attache in Germany.

38725 *Exhibit 3886, affidavit of KAWABE, Torashiro, stated that he was in Berlin From December 1, 1938 to February 1940 as military attache. OSHIMA was the ambassador from October 1938 until October 1939. In Japan, since telegraph codes of the three ministries were completely different, it was technically impossible for the staff to send directly a telegram to ambassadors in foreign countries. If telegrams were exchanged between the staff and the ambassador, it must have taken place thru his military attache. In January or February 1939 no telegram was sent from the Deputy C/S to OSHIMA stating that the supreme authority of diplomacy was 38726 rested in the Emperor...*At that time no telegrams were exchanged between OSHIMA and the staff, secretly from the foreign office, concerning the question of strengthening the anti-comintern pact. With respect to negotiations for a Japan Germany Italy treaty, he as military attache never submitted a draft of a treat to the German foreign office. During his stay in Berlin no draft of a treaty was sent to him from the war ministry or the staff. He was never ordered to submit such a draft to the German foreign office.

*Exhibit 3887, affidavit of YAMAMOTO, Kumaichi, stated that he was appointed on September 2, 1940 director of the East-Asiatic department of the foreign office, and held concurrently as director of the American department since October 28, 1941. He was vice foreign minister from September 18, 1942 to October 31, 1947. As one of the highest responsible officials of the foreign office * he saw all important telegrams sent from OSPI"A to the foreign office. After the outbreak of the German-Russian war several reports arrived from OSHIMA that Germany desired a Jap attack on Soviet. He did not remember that OSHIMA ever advocated such an attack positively to Japan.

*Exhibit 3888, excerpt from SAIONJI-HARADA Memoirs, April 18, 1939, stated that ARITA said he could not do any more and let it be compromise or anything else. The situation was favorable to sit tight. ARITA told this and IWAKURO seemed to be satisfied with the answer. IWAKURO had always supported KOISO but IWAKURO had been pressed by KOISO that since the situation * would not progress any further, it was absolutely unavoidable. IWAKURO had also calmed down.

*Exhibit 3889, the affidavit of ISHIWATA, Sotaro, stated that from January 1939 to August 1939 he was minister of finance in the HIRANUMA cabinet. It was quite inconceivable that on the falsification of Chinese paper money, a member of the cabinet should have made a careless statement without any prior arrangement with the finance minister. As such minister he was never consulted * by KCISO on subjects of this kind. He did not remember KCISO making such a statement in the cabinet.

*Exhibit 3890, affidavit of YAMAGATA, Arimitsu, stated that from October 1939 to the end of February 1941 he was on the staff of the 2nd section, and in March 1941 became aide-de-camp to the Emperor. When on the staff of the 2nd section, Fritz von Petersdorf, assistant German military attache called several times at the staff for information. He wanted information chiefly on the progress of hostilities in China, and, in return, gave information of the development of Germany's operations in Europe. He referred to the witness in his affidavit stating that YAMAGATA in reply to his question how the Japs intended to attack the Soviet showed him in silence the Vladovostock and Blagoveschensk directions on the map. *The real facts were entirely different. The witness was appointed aide to the Emperor in March 1941 serving until December 1944. During 1942 he did not serve at the staff. It was impossible for Petersdorf to visit him at the staff during that year. The 2nd section handled information. Affairs concerning operations were handled by the 1st section, and he was in no position to have any connection with the plan of anti-Soviet operations. That portion of Petersdorf's affidavit was utterly at variance with the facts.

*Exhibit 3891, certificate of the Demobilization Office, stated that YAMAGATA, Arimitsu was appointed aide to the Emperor on March 1, 1941 and continued to serve until December 21, 1944.

*Exhibit 3892, deposition of AKITA, Hiroshi, stated that he was chief of German section, general staff, 2nd section, intelligence from April 1941 to March 1943 as successor to YAMAGATA. KANDORI was his subordinate. In the deposition of von Petersdorf, his name was mentioned on matters concerning his having obtained information on the Soviet in 1941-2 from the general staff. If Petersdorf had obtained any information from the staff from March 1941 till his departure, there would have been no other way but to have obtained it thru the witness or his subordinate. As a matter of practice, Kretschmer used to come about twice a week for this purpose. It was only when * he was unable to come that Petersdorf used to come. Such occasions were extremely few. In such cases the witness did not meet him but KANDORI did. It was KANDORI's practice to report to the witness on the conversation that took place. So called intelligence was in gaining information from Germany about the European war and by Japan reporting on the Pacific war. It was very seldom that they furnished Germany information on the disposition of the Soviet Far Eastern army, its number, transportation, reserve forces. About the only time he remembered was when he was asked by Kretschmer once if there was any news on the transfer of a unit of the Far East Soviet Army to the western front. The witness inquired of the Russian section, but as there was no positive proof, he replied that he had no definite knowledge. It was true that Japan received from Germany samples of grenades and their construction * plan. These were not a present to the Emperor but to the staff. It was not true that the grenades were turned over to the staff in a solemn ceremony. To say that it was decided that these be used chiefly on the Manchurian front was absolutely unfounded.

38770

*Exhibit 3893, the deposition of URESHINO, Michinori, stated that from the outbreak of war in December 1941 until August 1945 he was with the 10th section of the army staff, which was in charge of shipping and railway transportation. Transportation from field operations to Japan was handled by the army staff. It was controlled by the director of transportation and communication, chief of shipping command and chief of shipping transportation command under C/S. POWS in POW camps in the field were controlled by the local commanders * under the supervision of the war minister. In transporting POWS to Japan proper under the control of the war minister, the war ministry made a request for their transportation to the staff and such sea-transportation was carried out at the responsibility of the staff. While aboard ship, the chief of PW camp or acting chief in charge came under the supervision of the war minister. However, as far as transportation including rations was concerned, he came under the staff. Exhibit 1965 was sent from the vice war minister and vice C/S in 1942 to the units concerned, because the relations between war ministry and staff on transportation of PWs from 38773 the field to Japan required cooperation from both. It did not mean that the war minister issued an order with regard to staff affairs.

38773

38780 *Exhibit 3895, affidavit of MATSUMOTO, Shun, stated he was vice foreign minister from November 1942 to October 1944. In the fall of 1942 the duties of the foreign ministry on managing matters for Japs in enemy countries became so onerous that the 2nd section of the Treaty Bureau was charged with drafting a plan for the establishment of a bureau with specific responsibility for these matters. In November 1942 a plan was drawn for the bureau and in that month the bureau was established, beginning to function on December 1. Its title did not include the words

38781 *and enemy nationals residing in Japan. The bureau was a mere intra-ministry office. It was not a bureau under the government organization law but a mere administrative office and was only a semi-official office. Its name indicated its semi-official status. This bureau was one to which was designated matters already within the ministry, but it was not established by cabinet action which signified the assignment of new or different duties. It was established with the approval of the minister. No other approval was needed or obtained. The word "Kosaian" on Exhibit 3845 meant a draft submitted for approval of the higher officials within the ministry, which might be given by the minister or vice minister 38782 *according to the nature of the matter. The draft was approved by the minister. Such action did not, could not, and was not intended to assume new or expanded duties.

38783 During his tenure the bureau dealt with matters relating to Japs in enemy countries. Matters on treatment of enemy pows and internees, visits to camps, the bureau handled only in liaison with the authorities in charge, and as representative of the foreign ministry. The work of the bureau was the same as that theretofore conducted by the treaty bureau. He had been shown Exhibit 3898, a proposal relating to expansion of the bureau, which correctly stated the scope of the duties of that bureau as they were discharged during his tenure. Defense Exhibit 3897 was a circular sent by Minister SUZUKI, Chief of the bureau, to the directors of bureaus and chiefs of section of the ministry informing them of the change in the name of the bureau from that proposed in the original draft.

38784 *Exhibit 3896, entitled Liaison business relating to enemy nationals who are pows, internees or residents in camps under Japan's authority, stated that liaison business included the handling of outgoing communications to representations from enemy countries and other sources.

38785 *Exhibit 3897 stated that the commencement of the business of the bureau in charge of war-time internees had been notified. The name of the bureau had been changed to the bureau in charge of Japanese nationals in enemy countries.

*Exhibit 3898, affidavit of SUZUKI, Tadakatsu, stated that the affiant was until August 1945 chief of the bureau in charge of Jap nationals in enemy countries established in December 1942. He held the post under SHIGEMITSU from April 1943 to April 1945, and under TOGC from April 1945 to August 1945. This bureau was in charge of matters on the protection of Japs in enemy countries which was under the jurisdiction of the foreign minister, and formed part of his duties. Matters pertaining to pows in Jap hands belonged to the war minister, while matters concerning civilian internees in Japan belonged to the Home minister. In view of the collateral relations between the duties of his bureau to protect Japs in enemy countries * and the treatment of pows and internees in Jap hands, TANI who established the bureau as well as SHIGEMITSU and TOGO charged his bureau for convenience with the duty of transmitting requests for information and protests on pows and internees.

38788

SHIGEMITSU showed a special interest in the matter of pows and internees. He often mentioned that war was only temporary but humanity permanent. He always tried to live up to what SHIGEMITSU meant. A great difficulty was felt in realizing this idea due to complete lack of jurisdiction over pows and internees. When the foreign ministry was requested to supply information or had received protests against alleged ill-treatment, the foreign ministry had no means to make direct inspections or directly to collect information. When it was approached for permission to visit camps or send good to pows, the ministry had no competence to permit visits, or means to transport goods. The only thing it could do was transmit the requests to the competent authorities and await their action. In spite of this SHIGEMITSU ordered him to do his best to contribute to the amelioration of the treatment of pows, and in compliance with this he did his best.

38789

When a communication was made in regard to pows his bureau transmitted it to the competent authorities promptly and accurately as soon as translation had been made by official note and sometimes orally. Where replies were not received in due course, his bureau tried to press for them. To transmit or press orally, he often took advantage of conferences of officers in charge * regarding the protection of Japs in enemy countries held usually twice a month. They were attended by officials of the war, navy, home affairs, transportation, communication, finance and other ministries. From the war and navy ministries, officers of the Pow Information Bureau and the 2nd section of Naval affairs bureau joined the conferences. They were concerned with the duties of the foreign ministry to protect Japs in enemy countries, and on these occasions they were not at liberty to take up the matter of pows as such. He referred indirectly to pow matters in connection with the question of protecting Japs, or after the conferences, his subordinates or he talked privately with the officers in charge of these matters. Whenever the foreign ministry transmitted requests for information or a protest, it made efforts to see that * their treatment was improved. When Exhibit 2024 was received in February 1944, SHIGEMITSU called the attention of the war minister and ordered the affiant to avail himself of this protest for home consumption to assure better treatment of pows. He stated that affiant should call the attention of the competent authorities to this matter to correct the situation if the facts should happen to be in any way true, and to expedite the solution of the question of visits to camps which neutrals had frequently requested without result, to press for replies to to unanswered inquiries and to facilitate solution of other matters. He tried to comply with this order. As a result, relief goods were accepted from the allied powers to distribute them among pows, relief funds were delivered to pows and internees, facility was given to send telegrams and steps were taken towards solving the question of permission to visit camps in occupied territories.

*In calling attention of the authorities on pows, SHIGEMITSU ordered his staff to use as materials information from enemy sources even if not based on official protests. One instance was the telegram from SFICHIDA in Afghanistan, which was sent to the chief of Pow Information Bureau.

38793

As to pows, the foreign ministry had no competence over their treatment or to collect information about them. SHIGEMITSU thought of a plan in April or May 1944 to set up in the cabinet something like an international law and customs committee to have it discuss the question of pows. Dr. YAMAKAWA, ex-director of the treaty bureau and an authority on international law and affiant worked on this plan. The plan was to organize a committee under the premier consisting not only of members of the army and navy but of foreign ministry officials and authorities on international law, and have them study * war time international laws and customs and matters on pows. This plan was not successful and since the administration of pows was under army jurisdiction.

38794

SHIGEMITSU took up pow matters at the Supreme Council for the Direction of the War in October 1944. He pointed out that according to recent information from enemy sources, it was reported that Jap treatment of pows left much to be desired. He stated that the humanitarian treatment of pows had been a virtue of Japan and it was an important matter for Japan's international reputation and future relations. As it was a matter for regret if by any chance they had committed the slightest fault, he desired that direct be issued to the responsables so matters might be fully discussed. The Supreme Council was composed of the premier, army and navy ministers, the Chiefs of staff and foreign minister. Soon after *affiant was told by a liaison officer of the pow Information Bureau that it had sent its members to Pow camps and had instructed officers to be considerate in treatment.

SHIGEMITSU earnestly worked for the exchange of nationals resident abroad, as well as for transportation and distribution of US and British relief goods. He was successful in making the 2nd exchange of US and Japanese nationals in October 1943 at Port Marmagao. Then, large quan-

38794 titles of relief goods were sent by exchange ship and distributed among the pows. When a request was made in 1943 by the US for the sending of relief goods from Vladivostok and for delivery to pows, SHIGEMITSU immediately transmitted the request to competent authorities and urged his subordinated to request the authorities to solve the matter. As a result 38795 *the request was granted and the goods sent first to Kobe, and then to China, Hong Kong, FIC, Singapore and elsewhere

As to permission for visits to pow camps in occupied territories, SHIGEMITSU made all possible efforts. Affiant tried under instructions from SHIGEMITSU, oral and by note, to obtain permission to visit the camps. The military made it a policy not to permit visits in occupied territory and did not readily comply. Neutrals several times requested permission and the ministry continued unceasingly to make the requests. As a result, in December 1944 the army consented to permit the Red Cross to visit the camps in the southern areas.

38796 TOGO, like SHIGEMITSU, had deep concern over the pow problem. He instructed affiant to transact such affairs with utmost care and to try to take * advantage of every opportunity to improve treatment from a humanitarian view. He exerted all his efforts in conformity with his instructions. Ever since TOGO became foreign minister the 2nd time, he was busily occupied with various important war problems. He did not fail to pay due attention to the treatment of pows. On June 3, 1945, the Swiss minister handed to TOGO a US protest on atrocities at Puerto Princesa on Palawan. TOGO immediately took steps to have it transmitted to the competent authorities and personally called the attention of ANAMI to the subject and urged him to accord fair and generous treatment to pows in general to which he got the latter's consent.

38797 Despite this attitude the war situation became very stringent rendering the management of pow questions increasingly difficult. * In the spring and summer 1945, the situation in the Philippines, Burma and other southern areas deteriorated. As the allies advance, the Japs retreated, and fresh protest began to be ledge on pows and internees. The foreign ministry transmitted them to the competent authorities. According to war ministry explanantions, as a result of the defeats, telegraphic communication between Tokyo and the front was very difficult and often impossible, and even when possible, the confusion at the front rendered investigation almost impossible. Accordingly despite frequent foreign ministry requests, the cases increased where they could not get sufficient answer satisfactory to the allies. The Awa Maru incident of April 1 occurred, exciting the military and adversely affecting the solution of the pow question. During SHIGEMITSU's time, affiant often saw the ministers of 38798 neutrals representing * enemy countries for liaison business. Under TOGO these ministers had evacuated to Karuizawa, and in accord with TOGO's instructions affiant often kept speedy contact with them by exchanging letters through courier or by going to Karuizawa, exercising all possible

38798 efforts to meet the situation by using expedient measures in time of emergency.

In the meantime, the foreign ministry received from the military no information whatever on the trials of allied fliers such as took place in the middle of July 1945

38799 As to visits to POW camps in occupied areas by the Red Cross, TOGO tried to see its realization without delay, and regardless of the fact that by June 1945, the acceptance of conditions of reciprocity which had been imposed * upon permission for such visits had not yet been officially notified by all allied countries concerned, permission to visit camps in Thailand was notified to the Swiss on June 5. As for visits to camps in Singapore, there were some questions on the status of visitors and the selection of qualified persons, but affiant was informed by the military that the visit was actually made. As far as visits to the camps in Manila, the city was recaptured by the spring of 1945 and US nationals there liberated.

Direct Examination of UGAKI, Kazushige
By Mr. Mattice

38802 *The witness identified Exhibit 3899 as his affidavit and verified 38810 it. *The affidavit stated that the witness was foreign minister in the 1st Kono Cabinet from May 1938 til September 1938. ITAGAKI became war minister early in June 1938 and remained in office after the witness resigned. He had read court exhibit 3457 at the request of ITAGAKI'S coun-38811 sel. * At times proposals were submitted to the 5 Minister conference in writing. On such occasions, on proposals having some relation to national policy he used to sign the documents and hand them to his subordinates.
If any documents were held in the foreign ministry they were not true originals unless they bore his signature.

38812 In the alleged measures to be taken in case of surrender of the present Central government of China, decided July 8, 1938, such a decision was highly improbable. The retirement of Chiang Kai-shek from public life was mentioned as the fourth condition of surrender in item No. 3.
When UGAKI accepted his post he asked KONOE to cancel the KONOE statement of January 16, 1938, when the occasion required and made this a condition of acceptance. KONOE willingly accepted saying it was all right to cancel it. There was no * reason for him to take up the question of Chiang's retirement on July 8 long after he entered the cabinet. It was an improbable thing.

With regard to the alleged strategy toward China in conformity with the current situation under item 4, he did not remember that he ever made such a decision. As for the item where he was to have China ruin itself financially by acquiring Chinese funds abroad, he was at a loss as to what it meant. In view of the attendance of the finance minister he could 38812 not think that such a decision could have ever been made.

38813 As for the alleged policy to guide the establishment of a new Central Government of China under item 5, he believed it was improbable considering his ideas at that time. He never thought of the establishment of a new central government at that time, and devoted himself to solving the affair by establishing a Hankow government, which was a Chiang regime, and negotiating with it. He had no reason to consent to such a decision and would have strongly opposed such proposal if there were any. * If there were any such decision, he would have remembered it, and since he didn't he was sure that such question was not taken up at all at that time.

With regard to the alleged special commission on Chinese affairs under 12, neither a committee like that was ever set up nor any decision made by the conference. In view of the fact that the conference was not a legislative organ or anything else, it was absurd that an executive organ would be created under the jurisdiction of the 5 ministers conference.

As to the alleged outline for the establishment of the joint committee in item 15, since he had no idea of establishing a central government and felt they should carry out their national policy by respecting the Chiang government, there was no reason for having discussed such matter.

Cross-Examination by Judge Nyi

38814 *The witness stated that the 5 ministers conference was first instituted probably sometime in June 1938, but he had no exact recollection. Before that time there was no such thing as 5 ministers conference. He did not think there was anything of the kind in 1936. The situation was exactly as set forth in his affidavit. *When asked when a proposal came from another ministry and was approved by the conference, was it a usual practice that the bureaus or sections concerned in his ministry would have to read and study it, he replied not to study. Anything decided by the conference or cabinet was carried into effect if it related to foreign relations. There was no room for study after a decision was once made. The only procedure left was to carry it into effect or to find means of carrying it out. They no doubt read it. *There were no occasions in which copies were made, and if there were it would have been a very rare case. There might have been such a case, but if so, it was very rare. He would not be surprised if he were shown a document containing a 5 minister decision although it didn't bear his signature.

38817 The condition of his joining the KONOE cabinet was that the KONOE statement was to be retracted or cancelled if necessary, but such a necessity did not arise during his tenure. He never reminded KONOE as to why he delayed the * promised cancellation. The cancellation was not delayed.

- 38817 It was up to the witness to decide when it was to be cancelled. When peace negotiations were formally under way, and depending upon their progress, the situation might have arisen in which the statement need be cancelled. At the same time the condition for such cancellation might not have arisen. When he became foreign minister, the non-recognition of Chian was already just a policy in name only. It merely existed as words. Actually, that was not the case because informal or private talks were already under way between Japan and the regime at Hankow. The foreign
- 38818 ministry handled the negotiations with the Hankow government. * There was a Jap consulate general in HongKong, and the Hankow government sent its emissaries there, and all telegrams were exchanged from that spot. At that stage they were just exchanging view, and he could not say that the negotiations were progressing favorably. In his estimation the prospects at the time, as he saw them, were favorable. They were not planning the campaign of H_{ankow} and Canton. The high command was of course moving troops. The fall of Hankow and Canton took place after his resignation. * He did not know that it took more than 10 months for Japan to reach from Nanking to Hankow. By establishing a Hankow government he meant to respect the dignity and prestige of the Hankow government.
- 38819
- 38820 *He had no connection with any matter within the jurisdiction of the high command. Whether the Canton government should be the office of negotiations was a question of national policy. But diplomacy and military operations must progress hand in hand. This was the established rule for the prosecution of any war. * Of course consultation would have been held on such matters with the high command. He made no mistake when he said he had never participated in any decision with regard to the establishment of a new central government or the joint committee. * He did
- 38823 not recognize Exhibit 269, * his report to the Emperor in which he said
- 38824 the opposite. There was a mistake about its source and authenticity. This consisted of materials for a private report. It contained raw materials to supply his mind with ideas on the basis of which he was to make a report. This was not the report. This document contained the opinions of the 1st section which drew it up as its opinions and as its desires as the views it wanted conveyed. The contents * did not represent his
- 38825 opinions and they were not the opinions he reported.* It represented only
- 38826 the views of that section and was submitted to him. The minister naturally would select appropriate material out of this particular document for preparing a report. He did not now remember whether a report of this nature was actually made to the throne.

- 38827 This was a section in the East Asiatic Affairs Bureau in charge of China affairs. Since the talks between the foreign ministry and the Hankow government were merely preliminary talks, this section was not informed. * In view of the possibility if subordinates were informed such information might leak out, it was only after preliminary arrangements had been completed and formal steps were to be taken that these subordinates were informed. He realized that a report to the Throne was a very 38827 important thing. It was not a discussion at random or over teacups.

38828 *He never talked to ITAGAKI about operations.. Operations was a matter for the high command. He had to talk to him about the campaign in connection with other things which properly belonged to the war ministry but had no recollection. Their views were generally agreed but he had no recollection in detail. If there was any divergence, he might recall something, but since he didn't, he believed their views were generally the same. He did not know that on August 16, 1938, the cabinet adopted some of the 5 minister conference decisions. * He had no recollection that 6
38829 of the decisions were so adopted. He did not recall that in this meeting he made a report on the conference. Whatever there might be in KIDO's diary, he could only say that KIDO had nothing to do with, and did not attend the 5 Ministers conference. The witness was 81 by Japanese reckoning.

DIRECT EXAMINATION OF HOGEN, Shinsaku
By Mr. Blakeney

38837 *The witness identified Exhibit 3900 as his affidavit and verified
38838 it. * The affidavit stated that in 1941, the witness was assigned to the 2nd section European-Asiatic bureau, and served as secretary of the foreign ministry, acting as interpreter of all conversations between TOGO and Ott during October and November 1941. Memos of the conversations were prepared by him immediately after each conversation, and after being submitted to TOGO for correction, were recopied for filing. He did not remember the details of each conversation, but did remember the general outlines. He had been shown Exhibit 3835. This memo was not in his handwriting but the contents of the first 7 Jap pages conformed to 38839 his memory of the conversation. The last page, however, * dealing with the dispatch of KURUSU to Washington, contained matters not discussed at the time. The first knowledge which he had of the dispatch of KURUSU was after his departure on November 5, having never heard of the matter before either at a conversation with Ott or elsewhere. He remembered that the matter was discussed between TOGO and Ott on November 6 as was shown by Ott's report, Exhibit 3901, which was incorrect in particulars. The last page of Exhibit 3835 was a page of the memo of this conversation. In the conversation purported to be recorded in Exhibit 3835 there was no suggestion of abrogating the secret clause of the anti-comintern pact.

38841 *Exhibit 3901, telegram from Ott, November 7, 1941, stat that TOGO to whom Ott had spoken about the sudden dispatch of KURUSU to Washington, explained that NOMURA had asked for the dispatch of an experienced professional diplomat to support him. The dispatch of KURUSU had been decided only recently, as he learned confidentially and as was proved also by his overhasty departure.

38846 *Exhibit 3902A, excerpt from Report of Activities for the Year 1941, was received in evidence.

*Exhibit 3903, affidavit of TANAKA, Ryukichi, stated that the affiant was at the time of Chankufeng, commanding officer of the 25th Mountain Artillery of the 19th division. The only Jap artillery in the vicinity at any time consisted of rifles, 75 mm pack horse carried, and 15 cm short range mortars, except a battery of railroad artillery which came on August 8 to 8 km north of Kogi west of the river. It did not fire until August 9. All artillery remained west of the river, at no time crossed it, and no artillery positions were constructed east of the river. * When he returned to hqs at Ranan, Korea, 100 km from Chankufeng, all men and guns under his command returned with him leaving on the 15 cm mortars. When he returned to the west bank of the Tumen on July 31, at 5 AM, the 15 cm mortars were placed under his command as was the railroad artillery when it arrived.

Prior to July 26, 1938, the only Japs in the vicinity east of the river consisted of 40 border guards, infantry, armed with nothing heavier than light machine guns. Other infantry crossed the river from the west to the east on July 26, but all were withdrawn west on July 27, and did not cross again until July 29 after the skirmish began. None of the latter took part in any hostilities until the am of July 31. The infantry at no time had any heavier armament than 37 mm anti-tank guns, * man carried and trench mortars, 75 mm, muzzle loading, short range and man carried.

When he returned on July 31, he saw two Russian tanks which had been disabled by the 15 cm mortars on the north slope well within Manchukuo even under the Russian claims. 3 more Russian tanks were disabled on the northwest slope of Bezyryannaya, also within Manchukuo under Russian Claims. All 5 remained on Manchukuo territory throughout the hostilities. In all, 10 Russian tanks crossed the border as claimed by the Russians into Manchukuo on July 31. When he arrived, Russian artillery was firing on objectives west of the river and several shells scored hits on his men and guns. Russian military headquarters was at Novokievsk, 20 km from Chang-ku-feng.

*Exhibit 3904, affidavit of YANG, Mitsuji, stated that he visited the * area in October 1938 following the river from near Handagaya to Nomotsohrin without finding Mongolians on the right bank. From his 2 inspections he could testify that there were no border markers of any nature between obos, nor were there in either 1936 or 1938 any markers or poles on top of obos bearing inscriptions in Mongolian. A feature of that country was the extreme scarcity of wood. The country was steppe and there was nothing to obstruct the view except occasional small hills. In his tours he made various side trips and constantly examined the country with field glasses. He saw neither described markers on Nomonhan, Huld and Eris, nor poles or border marks of any description between them. *At Nomonhan there was a building of the Nomonhan branch of the Manchukuo police in which resided 7 or 8 police.

He had traveled on other borders of the MPR but never had seen wooden border marks. On parts of the border which were marked with stone obos, they were erected in pairs. Nomonhan obo was a pair, but when they were used for marks the pairs were not confined to one pair but were continuous. During his 1938 trip he met Manchukuan cavalry, border guards or police at Handagaya, Nomotsohrin, Amkoro and Nomonhan.

*Exhibit 3905, affidavit of YOKOI, Tadamichi, stated that from May 1938 to July 28, 1939, he was chief of the Hailar Military Special Service detachment. Immediately after taking office, he made a trip through the east bank of the river to inspect condition. The country was a steppe area with undulating features, without trees, and a wide view was to be had. He made frequent excursions from some distance toward the river to * within a few km of it, inspecting the whole adjacent country. At that time he found Manchukuan or Jap units stationed in Assursum, Amkoro, Nomotschirin, Nomonhan, and Handagaya. He found no outer Mongolian guards at all on the east bank of the river. No one molested his party or attempted to prevent them from travelling in that area. He did not see any trace of border markers, either in the form of paired obos, except one pair at Nomonhan, or as wooden or other border monuments. Such markers were non-existent.

38861

*Exhibit 3906, affidavit of SUIBAYAMA, Kenshiro, stated that from March 1937 to July 1938 he was chief of the military affairs section, war ministry handling business relating to China affairs such as liaison with respect to policies between the ministry and the front. He had been shown Exhibit 3269 from which it appeared that UMEZU was reported to have gone to China, taking the outline of the * Imperial conference decision.

38862

This was quite incorrect. Other matters referred to such as that TERAUCHI requested the visit of the minister or vice-minister at Tientsin are untrue. It was true that UMEZU went to China at that time. Japan had decided upon a policy of undertaking through Trautmann negotiations with Chiang for peace. By order of the war minister, the witness drew up together with Director Bureau of Eastern Asiatic Affairs, and the chief of the 1st Military Affairs section of the navy, a plan for peace negotiations. The government meanwhile carried on discussions with Trautmann. Since it was feared that some disturbance might occur at the front if the plan was realized, it was considered it might be better if a preliminary understanding could be reached at the front. To carry out this intention, it was decided that UMEZU should be * sent to the China front.

38863

The witness accompanied him. They left on January 9, 1938 and visited various places in China, conveying the intention of the army authorities to army and division commanders. There was nothing conveyed to anyone in China of any intention of not dealing with Chiang. They had obtained agreement of the field commanders to the intent of attempting to make peace with Chiang through Trautmann, and were ready to return, convinced that no disturbance would occur among the field forces when on January 16 the KONOE declaration entirely nullified their work.

Exhibit 3907, affidavit of SAITO, Yoshiye, stated that from July 1940 to July 1941 he was a foreign office counsellor and assisted MATSU oka on concluding the tripartite pact. According to the pact, in case any part was attacked by another power not involved in the European war or China incident at the conclusion of the pact, the remaining contractors should aid the party attacked by political, economic and military measures.

*The problem of judging as to whether 1 of the contractors was attacked was a matter the various governments had to decide individually, and the commission incidental to the pact was not empowered to decide that. Japan never did authorize the commission to decide such matter. As a result of the pact, 3 commissions, the general, military and economic, were to be established in Tokyo, Berlin and Rome, but they were nothing more than liaison organs for the 3 governments and they were not authorized to decide matters binding their governments.

38872

*Exhibit 3908, affidavit of USAMI, Uzuhiko, stated that from November 11, 1938 to May 1940 he was counsellor of the Jap embassy in Germany. He helped OSHIMA in connections with negotiations for the tripartite pact. It was true that in reply to the directive concerning the negotiations, brought in February 1939 by ITO, OSHIMA and SHIRATORI submitted their opinions to ARITA in March. Late in March Arita in turn wired a new directive. It was not true that between the beginning and end of March ARITA sent a directive urging them to carry on the negotiations pursuant to the original directive.

38873

*Exhibit 3909, affidavit of MAEDA, Minoru, stated that from October 15, 1940 to May 15, 1942, as chief of 3rd section naval staff, he was in charge of collecting and arranging all information with reference to the navy. The navy was never informed by Germany, OSHIMA, the naval attache or any other naval personnel in Germany of any intention to use subs to massacre crews of * merchant vessels or to kill the surviving crew of vessels sunk by subs. The navy never received any report from anybody that OSHIMA had such talks with Hitler concerning the killing of crew members. He never heard anything discussed as to the intention of the naval authorities to adopt such measure or that the navy committed such acts.

38874

*Exhibit 3910, affidavit of MATSUSHIMA, Shikao, stated that he was from April 1936 to November 1939 Director of the Trade Department, foreign office. Thereafter he was in Sweden as minister until March 1941. From then until May 1945 he was in Berlin as envoy at large for Europe principally in charge of economic matters. The Jap German Economic agreement on the exchange of goods between Japan and Germany, which included the matter of a 1 billion yen credit for 3 years, was signed in January 1943 by Ribbentrop and OSHIMA after negotiations of more than a year. He participated in the negotiations. OSHIMA talked from time to time with Ribbentrop about the matter, but routine negotiations were conducted almost exclusively between the witness and * Wiehl. He heard every detail of Ribbentrop-OSHIMA talks from OSHIMA and Wiehl. All proposals made by Japan were either approved by the foreign office beforehand or were in 38876 accordance with their instructions. OSHIMA never made any proposal on his own without basing them on approval or instructions previously obtained. During these negotiations the witness often communicated instructions of the government on specific matters to Germany saying that they were personal proposals of OSHIMA, and that if Germany agreed, OSHIMA would try to persuade Japan to accept other demands. This was diplomatic tactics used to secure concessions from Germany. The contents of these talks were previously agreed between OSHIMA and the foreign office.

38877 The question of defining the sphere of application of the economic agreement was raised by Ribbentrop. On this * question OSHIMA and the witness conducted talks with Germany always after obtaining instructions. The signing of the agreement took place after full approval had been given by Japan beforehand.

38878 *Exhibit 3911, memo of Doenitz on a conference with Hitler, February 26, 1943, stated that Doenitz reported that NOMURA had mentioned that the Jap navy was planning to use its subs against merchant shipping and that it had asked OSHIMA and Ribbentrop * to request 2 German subs be put at Japan's disposal. He explained that nothing would be gained militarily by turning over the subs, since he did not believe that they could be produced in large numbers in Japan for material reasons. Hitler favored the idea of releasing 1 sub to the Japs because he had to make return shipments for rubber. If he found it difficult to carry out return shipments in high grade steel and finished products, it would be easier to deliver a sub. He would not decide until the demand had taken a more concrete form.

DIRECT EXAMINATION of SUZUKI, Tadakatsu
By Mr. Furness

38893 *The witness identified exhibit 3898, previously read as his affidavit and verified it.

Cross-Examination by Col. Mornane

38896 *He stated he thought it was possible to say that his bureau was established in connection with the passage in Article 1, Exhibit 76, referring to Jap subjects residing in foreign countries. Exhibit 3845 was prepared in the foreign office to obtain agreement within the ministry before * establishment of the bureau in charge of Jap nationals in enemy countries over which he presided. In the draft was a statement of date of explaining at cabinet meeting re internee and POW duties. He could not say whether the data was submitted to the cabinet. He thought probably it was not submitted. The establishment of his bureau was not in accord with the regulations governing the organization of the ministry, but was rather to unify and coordinate in 1 department business which had been handled by various bureaus and sections. These documents were prepared before the bureau was established and they were prepared before

38898 his * time by his colleagues and he had no direct concern with them. When it was called to his attention that his name was mentioned in it, he said he did not say the document was prepared before his return in August that year. His began his work after arrangements had been completed within the ministry. It was only after that that he was approached to take over the job. When asked whether the statement in the document that on November 19, 1942, the ministry had already arranged with him was incorrect, * he said on seeing this draft he saw that it was approved on November 14, and he thought he was approached on the matter after that. He did not know how this document was handled or whether the data prepared for explanation at the cabinet was used or not. He couldn't say anything definite or positive about this.

38899

38901 This document laid down the duties of his office in this bureau. *When asked whether the document didn't show that the duties of his office included looking after business relating to treatment of pows, he said unless he gave some explanations in detail he would not be able to give a definite reply. His bureau was unable to arrange for visits to pow camps, due to the fact that the army would not allow his people to visit those camps. By army he meant the war ministry. Very frequently there were long delays by the war ministry in answering protests transmitted by his bureau.

38902

*With respect to the protest referred to in his affidavit of February 1944 in regard to the Philippines, he was disturbed over the long delay. He thought he mentioned the matter to SHIGEMITSU at the time.

38903

*If his recollection were correct as to protests to which replies were delayed, provisional replies were made in the interim. When replies were made to long protests, replies were also made to protests as to which replies had been delayed. * When it was suggested that no written communication was made by the foreign to the war ministry in regard to this protest after March 27, 1943, he said he did not think there was such a case. There were many documents, and unless he was shown them, he could not give a definite reply. All communications were not necessarily referred to.

38904

38905

*When asked about the delays involved in Exhibit 2024, he said he had not read the entire text but there were many questions involved, and the foreign office made contacts with all the various quarters concerned with the matter and did its best to draft a reply. He presumed there were delays. There were many cases where he pressed for replies to protests. *When very serious delays took place he brought the matter to the attention of the foreign minister. As for most of the work, he as the person in charge did his utmost to clear up the matter.

38906

*When very serious delays took place he brought the matter to the attention of the foreign minister. As for most of the work, he as the person in charge did his utmost to clear up the matter.

SHIGEMITSU ordered him to use material information from enemy sources with regard to securing better treatment of pows. These sources included broadcasts from enemy countries. It was possible to listen to broadcasts from overseas during the war on foreign office shortwave. The foreign

38906 office was not monitoring shortwave broadcasts from other countries and 38907 distributing copies of the text to officers in the foreign office. * Not only the foreign office, but also the war and navy offices had such facilities. What the foreign office was able to hear with regard to pows, the 38908 foreign office utilized. *The foreign ministry had facilities in its own premises to listen to broadcasts. The foreign office did in fact circulate transcripts of those broadcasts around the foreign office. They were called to the attention of SHIGEMITSU

38909 SHIGEMITSU had very serious interests in the question of pows. His plan was prevented because matters relating to pows were under the army.
Inasmuch as such matters were primarily and exclusively handled by the army * departments outside the military could not on their own take up the matter. He did not know whether the war minister himself refused the plan. He did not think SHIGEMITSU discussed the matter in the cabinet.
As a result of SHIGEMITSU taking the matter up with the Supreme Council considerable improvements were realized. Pow Information Bureau sent personnel to the various areas and saw to it that improvements were effective.
They received protests after October 1944.

38910 *During his whole time very fervent desires were expressed to obtain permission for protecting powers to visit pow camps. He well understood the importance of obtaining permission to visit pow camps and did everything in his power to realize such visits. He knew that under article 36 of the Geneva Convention it was required that protecting powers should be allowed to visit, but at the same time Japan had not ratified the Geneva Convention. When the war began, Japan on its own declared its intention 38911 to apply the various terms of the treaty mutatis mutandis. * He brought to SHIGEMITSU's attention that the protecting powers were clamoring for permission to visit. He did not think SHIGEMITSU himself submitted any-38912 thing of this kind to the cabinet. *If he had decided to do so, the witness would have had to prepare some statement of facts. He was not re-38913 quired to prepare such a statement. *That SHIGEMITSU spoke to TCJO he heard from SHIGEMITSU. According to Jap practice and custom one cannot conceive of anything relating to pows being taken up by the cabinet unless that matter were submitted by the war minister. The witness never discussed the matter with KIMURA at any of the conferences, nor with SATC.
SATC did not attend these conferences.

38914 *Once or twice the witness pow camps. He was specially permitted by the army on those occasions. He visited the camp in Nagoya in the summer of 1943. On conditions there there was nothing special to say. He didn't think SHIGEMITSU discussed with KOISC the treatment of pows.

Redirect Examination by Mr. Furness

38915 *He found nothing particular at Nagoya upon which complaints could be based.

EVIDENCE IN MITIGATION

38925 *Exhibit 3912, the affidavit of OKADA, Keisuke, stated that the witness was a senior statesman in 1944-5. Before the end of the TOJO cabinet he thought it necessary to have one who would identify himself with restoration of peace by terminating hostilities join the cabinet. He broached his idea to WAKATSUKI, KONOE, HIRANUMA and KIDO and obtained their approval. He tried to have YONAI reinstated and appointed navy minister to succeed SHIMADA, but this was in vain.

38926 His efforts were successful when the KOISO cabinet was formed. The so-called KCISO-YONAI coalition cabinet came into existence with YONAI appointed navy minister. * When the SUZUKI cabinet was formed on April 5, 1945, he did his best to have YONAI and TOGO join to restore peace by terminating hostilities, and they assumed those posts.

In April 1944 KIDO and he had a confidential talk about ending the war. The very nature of the subject required extreme caution. Their ideas coincided that efforts be made to end the hostilities as soon as possible, but that they would have to wait for an opportune moment. The affiant had previously discussed the matter with MATSUDAIRA and asked him to transmit his thoughts to KIDO. He had many talks with KIDO about early termination of the war.

38928 *Exhibit 3913, affidavit of HIRASE, Hisatada, stated that in February 1945 he was appointed minister without portfolio and chief secretary to the KCISO cabinet from which he resigned the same month. In August 1945 he was appointed Mayor of Tokyo. He had known KIDO intimately since 1938. He knew that KIDO had been watching for a long time for a chance to conclude the war, as may be seen from circumstances under which he tried to appoint YONAI, a pacifist, as vice premier in the KCISO cabinet, from the fact that during the term of that cabinet he repeatedly expressed his desire for an opportunity to realize peace, that he made efforts to form the cabinet of SUZUKI, a pacifist, and that he cooperated with YONAI, * in efforts to realize peace. The witness sometimes helped communicate between YONAI and KIDO. When KIDO had to communicate with YONAI in an informal way on the peace problem, the affiant immediately transmitted this to YONAI and obtained his consent. The two men worked for peace secretly under the circumstances in those days. After the war, YONAI said that KIDO was more responsible than any other for the conclusion of the war.

38930 Exhibit 3914, affidavit of HOSOKAWA, Morisada, stated that the witness married the daughter of KONOE, and as KONOE's son-in-law, he had many confidential private conversations with him. He was secretary to the premier in the 2nd and 3rd KONOE cabinets. During the war he acted as private secretary to KONOE and assumed the post of secretary to KONOE as minister without portfolio in the HIGASHIKUNI cabinet. KONOE told him that KIDO's efforts to terminate the war were magnificent. KONOE often paid this compliment to KIDO from the time *KONOE was chosen special envoy to the Soviet Union, to which he did not go.

*Exhibit 3915, affidavit of ISHIKAWA, Sotaro, stated that affiant was Imperial Household minister from June 4 1945 to January 16, 1946. When on June 3, he was asked to become minister, KIDO spoke to him emphasizing the pressed war situation and the need of grasping the earliest possible chance for peace. After his appointment, he saw KIDO at least 2 or 3 times a week. KIDO told him he was firmly determined to bring the war to a close, and bravely, patiently and painfully fought opposition until the war was finally ended. He was one of the people who contributed most to quick realization * of capitulation.. In the desperate situation around July 20, KIDO prepared himself for any violence such as assassination that might be used by the army. He stated he hoped he might be spared until the war be successfully brought to a close. Feeling uncertainty he consulted the affiant 2 or 3 times about his possible successor if he should be killed. The person he had in mind was SHIDEHARA.

*Since August KIDO and affiant had talked about requesting the Emperor to broadcast to keep to the minimum internal confusion that might follow capitulation. On August 11, KIDO said he had talked with the Emperor and the Emperor had told KIDO to consult affiant. He told KIDO he had no objection whatsoever to the plan. The affiant made the necessary arrangements for the broadcast.

On August 14, a unit of the Imperial Guards besieged the Household ministry and scattered some mimeographed bills. One of the items listed was to rid the throne of Lord Keeper who was a traitor trying to end the war. KIDO was on their black list. * The leader of the insurgent army tracked KIDO and affiant that night. They hid in the vault in the basement of the Household ministry. KIDO came there about 3:10 AM. KIDO said he was completely ready to be killed. General TANAKA of the Eastern Area army forced the insurgent army to withdraw and KIDO and the affiant come out of the vault about 8 AM on the 15th.

*Exhibit 2765B, the affidavit of General George C. Marshall, was admitted in evidence. *The affidavit stated that the reason he had said in his report to the President that there was no close strategic coordination between Japan and Germany was that evidence that the Japs gave Germany prior notice of Pearl Harbor had not come to his attention. There were great distances between the 2 theaters. The logistical factors and long period involved in shifting resources made close strategic coordination unnecessary to achieve a proportion of the * remuneration possible from it. The effect was achieved by dividing the allied attention and resources. The lack of close coordination was indicated by a question of whether Japan told Germany of her intention before December 7, the fact that Germany was fighting the Soviet, that Japan preserved strict neutrality to a large number of Soviet ships carrying US lend lease, Japan did not press her attack to the west beyond Burma to divert more allied resources, the fact there was no evidence of close cooperation on intelligence and operational information, Germany did not make a major effort in the Egyptian-Suez area coordinated with Jap pressure on India.
